Meanwhile, with the priming wire from his cartridge-box, he cleaned out the vent-hole of his gun, and filled it with fresh powder, in order not to renew the miracle of failure, to which Isidore owed his life.

During the next five minutes no noise was heard. Even Pitou's breathing was nearly suspended, as well as the farmer's, and the throbbing of their hearts was inaudible.

Suddenly, amidst the silence, was heard the barking of the dogs, confined in the courtyard on the farther side.

Billot stamped his foot, listened an instant, and then stamped again, saying: "Ah, she is sending him away through the orchard, and the dogs are barking at him."

Bounding across the ditch, over Pitou's invisible head, the farmer slipped on the other side; but in spite of the darkness, thanks to his acquaintance with the locality, he disappeared around the angle of the wall, quick as lightning, hoping to reach the other side of the farm enclosure as soon as Isidore.

Pitou saw through this manœuvre. With the alertness of a man of his nature, he clambered out of the ditch, went straight across the road to Catherine's window, pulled open the outside shutter, which was unfastened, pushed open the casement, climbed into the empty room, passed through into the lamp-lighted kitchen, entered the courtyard, and ran along the alley-way leading into orchard, where — thanks to his power of seeing in the the darkness, like an owl — he could discern two shadows, one bestriding the high wall, the other at its foot, standing upright, with extended arms.

Before throwing himself down on the other side of the wall, her lover turned to Catherine for the last time, saying: "We shall meet again! Do not forget, thou art mine!"

"Yes, yes, yes!" said the girl, "but go, go!"

"Yes, — go, go, Monsieur Isidore!" cried Pitou.

They could hear the noise made by the young nobleman, as he struck the earth on the other side of the wall, and then they heard the neigh of recognition from his horse. Presently they heard also the animal's rapid gallop, then one gunshot, and then another.

At the first shot Catherine uttered a cry, and made a motion as if she would rush to Isidore's assistance. At the second she groaned, and fell nerveless upon Pitou's arm.

He listened, with extended neck, to see if the horse continued his course with the same rapidity as before the shots were fired. Hearing the uninterrupted gallop of the animal, as it receded farther and farther away, Pitou said sententiously: "Good! There 's some hope. One can't see by night as well as by day, and the hand is not so sure when it draws on a man, as when it draws on a wolf or a boar."

Lifting Catherine, he intended carrying her in his arms; but by a powerful effort of will she rallied all her strength, slid to the ground, and asked Pitou, holding him by the arm: "Where art thou taking me?"

"Why, to your chamber, Mademoiselle," said the astonished Pitou.

"Pitou," she demanded, "is there any place where I can hide?"

"Oh yes, Mademoiselle; or if not, I can find one," said Pitou.

"Then take me there!"

"But the farmhouse —?"

"In five minutes I hope to leave it, never to return."

"But your father —?"

"All is broken between me and the man who wishes to kill my lover."

"But, nevertheless, Mademoiselle, —" Pitou ventured to say.

"Thou refusest to accompany me, Pitou?" asked the girl, abandoning his arm.

"No, Mademoiselle Catherine, God forbid!"

"Then follow me!"

Walking ahead, Catherine went through the orchard, into the kitchen-garden. At the other end of the kitchen-garden was a small door, opening towards the Pasture Farm.

Catherine opened it without hesitation, took out the key, shut the door, double locked it behind her, and threw the key into a cistern near the wall.

With a firm step she walked over the uneven earth, leaning on Pitou's arm, and the two soon vanished into the valley, extending from the village of Pisseleu to the Pasture Farm.

Nobody saw them go; and God alone knew where Catherine found the refuge which Pitou had promised her.

CHAPTER XV.

AFTER THE STORM.

It is with human storms as with meteorological hurricanes. The sky is shrouded, the lightning flashes, the thunder rumbles, the earth seems quivering on its axis. There is a moment of paroxysm, when we may well believe men and things to be alike on the verge of annihilation, when we tremble, moan, and lift our hands to our Lord, as the One good and merciful.

Little by little calmness supervenes. Night flees and day reappears. The sun revives. The flowers reopen their petals. The trees straighten themselves. Men return to their business, their pleasures, their passions. Life laughs and sings, along the highways and in the doorways, and nobody worries about the partial desert left in the track of the storm, or where the lightning had fallen.

Thus it was at the farm. All night long there was a terrible tempest in the heart of that man, resolved upon a vengeful project, which he had partially carried out.

When he discovered his daughter's flight, when he searched vainly in the darkness for some trace of her footsteps, when he called her name, — first in anger, then in supplication, and finally in despair, and no response came to these passionate moods, — he was smitten in some vital part of his powerful organization; but at last, when the silence of exhaustion succeeded the lightning and thunder, as after an atmospheric storm; when the dogs, having nothing more to disturb them, ceased their barking; when rain, mixed with hail, effaced the traces of blood, which, like a half-loosed belt, encircled one side of the farm; when the village clock, that mute witness of whatever had taken place, sounded out on the air, with its vibratory wings of bronze, the last hours of the night, — then, at last, things resumed their usual course at Pisseleu.

The big courtyard door creaked on its rusty hinges. The laborers again went forth, some to sow seed, some to ply the harrow, others to harness the wagons. Then Billot appeared in his turn, crossing the field, with all his senses level.

Finally, when it was full day, the rest of the village awoke, and some, who had not slept so soundly as the others, said, with an air half inquisitive and half careless: "Father Billot's dogs howled tremendously last night, and two gunshots were heard in the neighborhood of the farmhouse."

This was all! Ah, so we deceive ourselves.

When Father Billot returned to the house at nine o'clock, for his breakfast, as was his custom, his wife asked: "Say, my goodman, where 's Catherine? Dost know?"

"Catherine?" answered the farmer, with an effort. "The air of the farm does n't agree with her, and she has started for Sologne, to visit her aunt."

"Ah!" said Mother Billot, "will she stay long at her aunt's?"

"As long as she 's no better," replied the farmer.

Mother Billot sighed, and pushed away her cup of coffee and milk.

On his side the farmer made an effort to eat; but at the third mouthful his food choked him. He lifted a bottle of burgundy by the neck, emptied it at a draught, and then said, with a hoarse voice: "They haven't unsaddled my horse, I hope?"

"No, Monsieur Billot," replied the timid voice of a child, who every morning came to the farm after some breakfast.

"Good!" said the farmer, as he brusquely shoved the little fellow aside, mounted his horse, and pushed his way into the fields; while his wife, drying a couple of tears, retreated to her usual corner, under the huge chimney-piece.

Minus the singing bird, minus the smiling flower, — which the young girl resembled, in those traits which cheered and perfumed the old walls, — the farm took up its wonted course, and went on the next day as it had gone on the day before.

As for Pitou, he saw the daybreak from his own home in Haramont; and those who were there at six o'clock found his place lighted by a candle, which had apparently been burning a long time, if one could judge by the slanting wick, which needed snuffing; for Pitou was preparing to send to Gilbert, with all the receipts, an account of the use he had made of the twenty-five louis which the Doctor had donated for the clothing and equipment of the Haramont National Guards.

It is true that a woodcutter declared he had seen Pitou about midnight, going down the steep declivity leading to the hermitage of Father Clouis, and carrying on his arm something heavy, which looked like a woman; but this report was hardly credible, inasmuch as Father Lajeunesse pretended to have seen Pitou running, with all his legs, along the road to Boursonnes, at one o'clock in the morning; whereas Maniquet, who lived at the extremity of the town, on the Longpré side, asserted that at two, or half-past, he saw Pitou pass by his door, and called out, "Good-evening, Pitou!" a courtesy to which Pitou had responded by saying: "Good-evening, Maniquet."

There was therefore no reason whatever for doubting that Maniquet saw Pitou at two o'clock, or thereabouts; but whether the woodcutter did or did not see Pitou at midnight, in the neighborhood of Clouise Rock, carrying a heavy object resembling a woman; whether Father Lajeunesse did or did not see Pitou running, with all his legs, at about one o'clock, along the Boursonnes road; whether Maniquet did or did not say Good-evening to Pitou, who was passing by Maniquet's house about two or half-past, — this is certain: that if Pitou, — of whom we lost sight, along with Catherine, about half-past ten or eleven in the evening, in the valley which divides Pisseleu from the Pasture Farm, — if Pitou did go from there to Clouise Rock, a league and a half; if he went from Clouise Rock to Boursonnes, two leagues farther; if from Boursonnes he returned to Clouise Rock; if, finally, he returned from Clouise Rock to his own home, — if Pitou did these things, we say, it may be well conjectured that first, he put Catherine into a place of safety; then, went to Boursonnes after news of the Viscount; next, returned to Catherine, with intelligence concerning the Viscount; and that he covered all this ground, eight or nine leagues, between eleven o'clock in the evening and two or two and a half in the morning, — a supposition hardly admissible, even for one of those royal couriers, who, as some people assert, could formerly break all present records; but this effort need not astonish those who have heretofore learned to appreciate Pitou's locomotive faculties.

Nevertheless, as Pitou revealed to nobody the secrets of that night, when he was apparently endowed with the gift of ubiquity, the result was, — with the exception of Désiré Maniquet, to whose Good-evening he had responded, — that nobody, not even Father Lajeunesse or the woodcutter, dared affirm on oath, that it was indeed Pitou, who was seen in these other places, — at the declivity of Clouise Rock or on the Boursonnes Road, — and not a spectre or phantom, taking on some resemblance to Pitou.

At about six o'clock the next morning, as Billot was mounting his horse to ride afield, Pitou was seen, without any appearance of fatigue or excitement, making up Tailor Dulauroy's accounts, to which he added, as vouchers, the receipts of each of the thirty-three soldiers.

There is one other person of our acquaintance who slept badly that night. This was Doctor Raynal.

At one o'clock he was roused by the Viscount's lackey, who rang the bell as if he would pull it off.

The Doctor, as was his custom when the night-bell sounded, opened the door himself. The Viscount's lackey had come for him, because of a serious accident to his master; and he led a second horse, ready saddled, so that Doctor Raynal need not be delayed a single instant.

The Doctor dressed himself in a turn of his hand, straddled the horse, and started at a gallop, preceded by the lackey, as if he were a courier.

What was the accident? He would be informed at the château; only he had better bring his case of surgical instruments.

The accident proved to be a wound in the left side and a scratch on the right shoulder, made by two balls, which appeared to be of the same calibre, that is, twenty-four; but as to the details of the occurrence, the Viscount would say nothing.

One of the two wounds, the one in the side, was serious, but not dangerous, as the ball passed through the flesh, without touching any important organ.

As to the other wound, it was not worth talking about.

When the injuries were dressed, the young man gave the Doctor twenty-five louis to maintain silence.

"If you wish me to keep silence, you must pay me only my ordinary fee, that is, one pistole, or ten francs," responded the brave physician; and taking only one louis (twenty-four francs) from the pile, he gave fourteen francs in change to the Viscount, who in vain urged him to accept more.

This the Doctor would not do; but he announced that he thought three visits would be necessary, and that he would therefore return the next day, on the day after that, and again on the day following.

At the second visit the Doctor found his patient up. By the aid of a band, which held the plaster in its place against the wound, Isidore was able the next day to mount his horse, as if nothing had happened to him; so that nobody in the household knew anything of his accident, except his confidential servant.

At the third visit Doctor Raynal found his patient had gone out; and therefore he would only accept a half-pistole, or five francs, for his visit.

The Doctor was one of those rare physicians who are worthy to have in their offices a certain famous engraving, which represents Hippocrates refusing the gifts of Artaxerxes.

CHAPTER XVI.

MIRABEAU'S GREAT TREASON.

MIRABEAU'S last words to the Queen are not forgotten, — the words which he spoke just before leaving the pavilion at Saint Cloud, when she gave him her hand to kiss: "Madame, through this kiss the monarchy is saved."

This promise, made by Prometheus to Juno, on the eve of her dethronement, Mirabeau endeavored to make good.

He began the struggle, confident of his own strength, not dreaming that — by reason of so many royal imprudences, and three abortive conspiracies — he was bidden to wage a losing fight.

Perhaps if Mirabeau had been able to work longer under the shelter of a mask, anonymously, — and this would certainly have been more prudent, — he could have fought to better advantage; but one day, not many weeks after his interview with the Queen, as he was on his way to the Assembly, he saw groups of men standing here and there, and heard various outcries.

He approached one of these groups, to ascertain the cause of the commotion.

Leaflets were being handed about. From time to time a voice cried out: "The Great Treason of Monsieur de Mirabeau! The Great Treason of Monsieur de Mirabeau!"

"Ah ha," said he, drawing a piece of money from his pocket, "I fancy this concerns me! — My friend," he continued, — addressing the man who was distributing the pamphlets, and who had several thousand of them in the panniers placidly borne by a donkey, whithersoever his master wished his stock to be transported, — "My friend, how much for Mirabeau's Great Treason?"

The distributor looked Mirabeau straight in the face and said: "Count de Mirabeau, I give it away for nothing;" adding in a lower voice: "And a hundred thousand copies have been printed."

Mirabeau thoughtfully passed along. That leaflet, which was given away! That colporter, who recognized him! Doubtless this was one of those stupid or malicious publications, which appeared by millions at that epoch. Undue malice or foolishness would rob it of all mischief, and deprive it of all value.

Mirabeau threw his eyes over the first page, and grew pale. This first page contained a list of Mirabeau's debts, and — strangely enough! — the list was exact: two hundred and eight thousand francs!

Below this list was the precise date on which this sum was to be paid to Mirabeau's different creditors, by the Queen's treasurer, Monsieur de Fontages.

Then came an estimate of the sum paid him monthly by the Court, — six thousand francs.

Finally, there was a full account of his recent interview with the Queen.

What Mirabeau could not understand was this, — the anonymous pamphleteer was not wrong in a single cipher, and had hardly misstated a single word.

What enemy pursued him thus, — terrible, mysterious, full of dangerous secrets? or rather, what enemy thus pursued the monarchy, through him?

The colporter to whom he had spoken, who had recognized him, who had called him by name, — it seemed to Mirabeau the man's face was not strange to him.

He retraced his steps. The donkey was still there, with his panniers three-quarters empty; but the first distributor had disappeared, and another had taken his place. The new man was entirely unknown to Mirabeau; but he did not carry on the distribution with less alacrity than his predecessor.

It chanced at this moment that Doctor Gilbert — who was present nearly every day at the Assembly debates, especially when those debates were important — passed by the place where the colporter was stationed.

Absorbed in meditation, his attention would perhaps not have been drawn, either towards the groups of people or their exclamations, if Mirabeau, with his customary audacity, had not walked up to Gilbert's right side, taken him by the arm, and led him straight to the leaflet-distributor, who said to Gilbert, as he said to everybody else, stretching out his hand: "Citizen, here's Mirabeau's Great Treason!" but at the sight of Gilbert his tongue and arm were checked as if by paralysis.

Gilbert in turn looked at the fellow, dropped the pamphlet in disgust, and went away, saying: "This is a rascally business you are up to, Monsieur Beausire!" and taking Mirabeau's arm he continued his way towards the Assembly, which, as we have said before, had forsaken the Archbishop's Palace for the Riding School.

"Do you know that man?" asked Mirabeau of Gilbert.

"I know him as one often knows such fellows," said Gilbert. "He is a discharged soldier, a gambler, a shark. For want of something better to do, he has evidently turned slanderer."

"Ah, if it was slander!" murmured Mirabeau, putting his hand on the place where his heart had been, — a place now occupied by a wallet containing money from the palace; and then he walked sadly along.

"Are you so little of a philosopher that you will let yourself be floored by such an attack as this?" asked Gilbert.

"I?" cried Mirabeau. "Ah, you don't know me, Doctor. — They say I 'm sold, when they should say I 'm merely paid! Well, to-morrow I 'll buy a mansion; to-morrow I 'll set up a carriage, horses, servants; to-morrow I 'll have a cook, and keep open house. Floored? I? After all, what matters the popularity of yesterday and the unpopularity of to-day? Have I no future before me? — No, Doctor, what kills me is this, that the promise I made I shall not probably be able to keep. This comes from the error — I might say, the treachery — of the Court towards me. I saw the Queen, did I not? Well, she appeared to put entire trust in me. For an instant I dreamed — an insensate dream, with such a woman! — well, for an instant I dreamed, not merely of being Prime Minister for the King, like Richelieu, but the minister — or, let us rather say, the lover — of a Queen, as was Mazarin of Anne of Austria; and the world of politics was no worse off on that account. Very well, what did she do? The very same day, after she left me, she wrote to her agent in Germany, Herr Flachslauden: 'Tell my brother Leopold that I am of his mind; that I make use of Mirabeau, but there is nothing serious in my relations with him.' — I have proof of this!"

"You are sure of that?" asked Gilbert.

"Sure, — practically sure. — That is n't all! You know what question is before the Assembly to-day?"

"I know it 's some question of war, but I am not well posted as to the cause of that war."

"Oh Lord, it 's very simple," said Mirabeau. "Europe is divided between two parties, Austria and Russia on one side, England and Prussia on the other side; yet both are moved by the same sentiment, hatred of our Revolution. For Russia and Austria, a manifestation of this dislike is not difficult, for it is their natural bias; but as for liberal England and philosophical Prussia, it takes some time for them to decide to change from one pole to its opposite, — to abjure what they have been, and swear allegiance to what they have not appeared to be, and so avow themselves, what they really are, the enemies of liberty."

Gilbert listened eagerly as Mirabeau went on: "England, on her part, sees Brabant extending her hand to France for help; and this has hastened England's decision. Our Revolution, my dear Doctor, is alive; it is contagious. That Irishman, Edmund Burke, a pupil of the Saint Omer Jesuits, and the sworn enemy of Pitt, has just launched a manifesto against France, for which he is paid in good yellow gold by Mr. Pitt. England does not declare war against France; no, she dares not do so, as yet; but she abandons Belgium to the Emperor Leopold, and she will go to the end of the world to pick a quarrel with Spain, our ally."

Coming from things foreign to those with which Gilbert was more familiar, Mirabeau continued: "Well, yesterday, Louis Sixteenth informed the Assembly that he had put fourteen ships on a war footing. Thereupon will arise the great discussion in to-day's session. This is the question: To which department of Government belongs the right to declare war? Already the King has lost the right of administering Interior Affairs, of levying taxes, and so on. He has also lost control over the department of Law and the Courts. If he loses the administration of the War Department, what is there left for him?"

As Gilbert made no reply, Mirabeau began to talk very confidentially: "On the other side, — as friends, my dear Doctor, let us frankly grapple with questions which cannot be wisely touched in the Assembly, — on the other side, the King is distrusted. The Revolution is not yet completed, — though I flatter myself that I have done more to help it than anybody else, — and it will not be completed, without breaking the sword in the King's hands. Of all his privileges, the most dangerous to leave in his hands is the power of waging war."

"And what then will you do, Count?"

"Oh well, faithful to my plighted word, I shall demand that this power be left in the King's hands; though I risk my popularity, and perhaps my life, in maintaining this demand. I shall propose to the Assembly a decree which will render the King victorious, triumphant. Now what is that King doing, at this very hour? He is having the Keeper of the Seals search the old Parliamentary records, for certain ancient formulas of protestation against the States General, in order to draw up a new and secret protest against the Assembly."

"Is it possible?"

"Ah, there 's the pity of it, my dear Gilbert! There is too much of this secret business, and not enough frankness, — not enough publicity! And that 's why I wish — I, Mirabeau, do you hear? — that 's why I wish that everybody should know that I 'm on the royal side, since so I am. You think that this slander, directed against myself, must trouble me? Not so, Doctor, it will help me. To bring me out, I require what a storm requires for its outburst, — dark clouds and contrary winds. — Come in, Doctor, come in, — and you 'll see a great session, I answer for it."

Mirabeau was not mistaken. As soon as he entered the Riding School he had a chance to prove his courage.

Everybody cried Treason, under his nose; while one showed him a cord and another a pistol.

Mirabeau shrugged his shoulders, and walked on like Jean Bart, elbowing aside those who were in his way.

The outcries followed him inside the hall, and seemed to evoke new cries therein. Hardly did he appear than a hundred voices shouted: "There he is! The traitor! The renegade orator! The man with a price!"

Barnave was on the rostrum, speaking against Mirabeau. Mirabeau looked at him pointedly.

"Well, yes," said Barnave, "it is thyself who is called a traitor, and against whom I am speaking."

"Then if it's against me thou art talking, I will take a turn in the Tuileries. I shall have time to get back before thy peroration."

Sure enough, with head erect and threatening eye, he went out, — amidst hisses, imprecations, menaces, — took the Feuillant Terrace (so called, because an order of Cistercian monks once had a convent on this site) and thence descended towards the Gardens of the Tuileries.

Half way down the Grand Avenue was a young woman, holding in her hand a spray of verbena, whereof she was inhaling the perfume, while a circle of listeners gathered about her.

On her left was a vacant place, to which Mirabeau drew a chair, and sat down by her side.

Half of those who sat near them rose and walked away. Mirabeau smiled, as he saw them go. The young woman offered him her hand.

"Ah, Baroness," he said, "have you no fear of catching the pest?"

"My dear Count," responded the young woman, "they say you are leaning towards our side, and I would draw you still nearer to us."

Mirabeau smiled, and for three-quarters of an hour he chatted with this young woman, — none other than Anne Louise Germaine Necker, Baroness de Staël.

At the end of three-quarters of an hour, looking at his watch, he said: "Ah, Baroness, I ask you to excuse me. Barnave is making a speech against me. He had been talking an hour when I came away from the Assembly. I have had the happiness of chatting with you three-quarters of an hour. That makes two hours that my accuser has been on the rostrum. His speech must be near its end, and it is necessary for me to answer him."

"Go!" said the Baroness, "speak, and be of good cheer."

"Give me that branch of verbena, Baroness," said Mirabeau, "and it will serve me as a talisman."

"This verbena? Have a care, my dear Count! Verbena is the herb for funeral libations."

"Give it me, all the same. It is well to be crowned as a martyr, when one descends to fight brutes in the amphitheatre."

"The truth is," said Madame de Staël, "it is difficult to be more brutish than yesterday's session of the National Assembly."

"Ah, Baroness," responded Mirabeau, "why limit the date to yesterday."

Taking from her hands the sprig of verbena which she offered him, partly in recompense for his jest, Mirabeau saluted her gallantly, went up the steps which led to the Feuillant Terrace, and re-entered the Assembly.

Barnave descended from the tribune, amidst the acclamations of the whole assemblage, having pronounced one of those high-sounding discourses which go well with all parties.

Hardly was Mirabeau seen on the tribune than a storm of cries and curses uprose against him. Lifting his powerful hand, he waited. Profiting by one of those intervals of silence, which always come amid storms or riots, he presently exclaimed: "I well know that it was not far from the Roman Capitol to the Tarpeian Rock."

Such is the majesty of genius, that this bright saying silenced the most angry listeners. When Mirabeau had thus compelled silence, the victory was half gained.

He demanded that to the King should be given the right to declare war. This demand was too great, and it was refused. Then began a struggle over the amendments. The principal attack having been repulsed, it was necessary to gain the day by partial onslaughts; and five times Mirabeau mounted the tribune.

Barnave had spoken two hours. During three hours, at different times, Mirabeau spoke; and this is what he obtained: That the King should have the right of making warlike preparations, and directing the forces as he wished; that he might propose a declaration of war to the Assembly; and that the Assembly should decide nothing warlike, unless sanctioned by the King.

What might Mirabeau not have obtained, but for that leaflet, gratuitously distributed, at first by some colporter unknown, and afterwards by Beausire, and which was entitled, as we have said, Mirabeau's Great Treason?

At the close of the session Mirabeau was fortunately not chopped into mincemeat.

On the other hand, Barnave was carried away in triumph by the people.

Poor Barnave! The day was not far distant when, in his turn, he would hear a cry: "The Great Treason of Monsieur Barnave."

CHAPTER XVII.

THE ELIXIR OF LIFE.

MIRABEAU went away from the Assembly with a proud eye and high head. So long as he was in the presence of danger, he considered only the task, and not his own strength.

In this respect he was like Marshal Saxe, at the battle of Fontenoy. Enfeebled, ill, Saxe remained all day on horseback, firmer than the most valiant soldier in his army; but when the English ranks were broken, when the last smoke of the last cannon-shot saluted the rout of the English, he fell dying on the field of battle he had won.

It was the same with Mirabeau. One day, when he returned home, he threw himself down on a pile of cushions, in the midst of a profusion of flowers.

Two passions had Mirabeau, women and flowers.

Since the organization of the Assembly, his health had visibly altered. Notwithstanding his vigorous temperament, he had suffered much, both physically and mentally, from persecution and imprisonment; so that he was never in a state of perfect health.

So long as a man is young, and all his organs are submissive to his will, ready to obey the first commands communicated to them from the brain, they work together simultaneously, and fulfil, without opposition, every desire of his heart; but as a man advances in years, every organ (if it may be so expressed) begins to argue, — like some old servant, who still obeys, but has been spoiled by long service; and it is not without patience and effort that these faculties are brought to reason.

Mirabeau was at this stage of life. To make his physical organs continue to serve him with their wonted alacrity, he had to rouse them; and anger alone would stimulate these aching and exhausted servants to action.

This time he felt that his condition was more critical than ever; and he offered but faint resistance to his lackey, who was urging the necessity of sending for a physician, when Doctor Gilbert rang, and was immediately ushered into the room.

Mirabeau offered his hand, and drew the Doctor down upon the cushions, where he was reclining, amidst leaves and flowers.

"Well, my dear Count," said Gilbert, "I could not go home without congratulating you. You promised me another victory to-day; but you have done better than that, for you have wrought a triumph."

"Yes! but this sort of a victory is like one achieved by the great Pyrrhus, — won by awful losses. One more such triumph, and I am done for."

Gilbert looked at Mirabeau, and said: "In fact, you are sick!"

Mirabeau shrugged his shoulders, and replied: "At my rate of living, anybody else would have died a hundred times. I have two secretaries; they are both up to their eyes in work, and under the weather. Pellinc, especially, has been sick abed three days. It is his business to copy the loose sheets, covered with my abominable handwriting; and I can't get along without him, because he alone can decipher and understand me. Doctor, point out something, I don't say by which I may live, but which will give me force while I live."

"What can you expect?" said Gilbert, after having felt the sick man's pulse. "There is no advice to be given to an organization like yours. Why counsel repose, to a man who finds all his strength in activity? Why advise temperance, to a genius who flourishes in the midst of excess? If I advise the removal from your rooms of all these flowers, which send forth their oxygen by day and their carbonic acid by night, — why, flowers have become a necessity with you, and you suffer more by their absence than by their presence. If I warn you to treat the ladies like the flowers, and keep them at a distance, especially overnight, you may say you would rather die. Live, then, my dear Count, according to the conditions of your life; but have about you only scentless flowers and platonic affections."

"As to the last requirement, my dear Doctor, you are well served. Passionate love has been too poor a success, for me to recommence it. Three years in prison, one death-sentence, the suicide of the woman whom I loved, — killing herself for another man, — these occurrences have cured me of that sort of passion. For an instant, as I told you, I dreamed of something great! I dreamed of an alliance like that between Elizabeth and Essex, between Anne of Austria and Mazarin, between Catherine the Second and Potemkin; but it was only a dream. That woman, in whose behalf I have contended, I have not seen since that interview; and probably I never shall see her again."

Gilbert mournfully contemplated the great statesman, as he continued: "See here, Gilbert, there is no torture so great as the feeling that one carries in his brain immense projects, — the prosperity of a kingdom, the triumph of his friends, the annihilation of his enemies, — and that all these plans elude him, by a wrong throw of the dice, by some caprice of fatality. Oh, the follies of my youth! How they make me atone for them! How they avenge themselves!"

He paused a moment, and then went on: "Why do the royal family mistrust me? Except on two or three occasions, when I was pressed to the wall, and when I had no choice but to strike back, in order to show them the strength of my blows, — except on those occasions, have I not belonged completely to the royal side, from beginning to end? Did I not contend for the King's right to an absolute Veto, when Monsieur Necker was contented with a provisional Veto, which might be overruled by the Assembly? Did I not oppose the proceedings of the night of the Fourth of August, when the nobility were despoiled of their privileges? Did I not protest against the promulgation, by the Assembly, of the Declaration of the Rights of Humanity, — not that I wished to destroy it, but because I believed the day for its proclamation had not yet come? To-day, — yes, even to-day, — have I not served royalty beyond its hopes? Have I not obtained what nobody else could have obtained, — whether cabinet-minister or prince, — and have I not done this at the expense of my honor, my popularity, my life? Reflect well on what I am telling you, you great philosopher, for perhaps the downfall of the monarchy lies in these simple facts. Perhaps I ought to regard it as a great favor, but only once have I been allowed to speak to the Queen! Yet when I think of it, if my father had not died so short a time before the Bastille was destroyed, and if decency had not prevented me from appearing in public on the second day after his death, — the day when Lafayette was appointed General of the National Guard, and Bailly was appointed Mayor of Paris, — I should undoubtedly have been chosen Mayor in place of Bailly. How things would have been changed! The King would have then seen the necessity of being in harmony with me. I should have inspired him with different ideas from those which he now cherishes, towards a city which encloses the Revolution within its walls. I should have won his confidence. I should have led him, before the evil was too deeply seated, into decisive and preventive measures. Instead of that, I am merely an Assembly Deputy, a man suspected, feared, hated, envied, kept away from the King, and slandered to the Queen. Can you believe this, Doctor, that when she saw me at Saint Cloud, she grew pallid? The explanation is very easy. Has she not been led to believe that I brought about the horrors of the Fifth and Sixth of October? Well, during the past year I have tried to do all that I was urged to do; but to-day, — ah, to-day! — both for the safety of the monarchy and myself, — I fear it is too late."

With an expression of pain over his whole physiognomy, Mirabeau grasped the flesh on his chest, just over his stomach.

"You are suffering, Count?" said Gilbert.

"Like the damned! There are some days, on my honor, when I could believe my enemies to be torturing my body with arsenic, as they torture my mind with slander. Do you believe in the Borgia poisons, the aqua tofana of Pérouse, the Inheritance Powder of Lavoisin?" asked Mirabeau, smiling.

"No; but I believe in that fiery steel which wears out its scabbard, in that lamp whose dilated flame shatters its globe."

Gilbert drew from his pocket a small crystal vial, containing two thimblefuls of greenish liquor.

"Here, Count," he said, "we 're now going to try an experiment."

"What is it?" asked Mirabeau, regarding the vial with curiosity.

"One of my friends, who I wish might be one of yours also, — a man thoroughly instructed in all natural sciences, and in occult science also, as he pretends, — has given me a recipe for this decoction, as a sovereign antidote, as a universal panacea, — almost an elixir of life. Often, when I have been afflicted with those gloomy thoughts which lead our English neighbors to melancholy, spleen, and even death, I have taken several drops of that liquor; and I must say that the effect has always been salutary and prompt. Will you try it?"

"From your hand, dear Doctor, I would drink anything, even hemlock, — and certainly, the elixir of life. Does it require some preparation, or do you take it clear?"

"No, this liquor is very powerful. Tell your servant to bring a few drops of brandy, or spirits of wine, in a spoon."

"The Devil! Brandy, spirits of wine, to soften your beverage? Then it must be liquid fire! I did n't suppose anybody had drunk such a beverage since Prometheus poured it out for the great ancestor of the human race. However, I warn you that my lackey may not be able to find six drops of brandy in the house. I 'm not like Pitt, and don't draw my eloquence from that fountain."

However, the lackey returned a few seconds later, bringing a spoon containing five or six drops of brandy.

To this Gilbert added an equal quantity of the liquid contained in the vial. As soon as the two liquors met, they assumed the color of absinthe. Seizing the spoon, Mirabeau hastily swallowed its contents.

"Morbleu, Doctor," he cried to Gilbert, "you did well to warn me this drug was so vigorous. It seems as if I had swallowed lightning."

Gilbert smiled, and appeared entirely confident of the result.

Mirabeau looked for an instant as if he were being consumed by those drops of fire; his head hung down upon his bosom, and his hand was pressed against his stomach. Suddenly he raised his head, and said: "Ah, Doctor, that is truly an elixir of life, which you made me drink!"

Then he rose and said, with his forehead elevated, his breathing buoyant, and his arms extended: "Even though the monarchy totters, I have strength enough to sustain it."

Gilbert smiled and asked: "You feel better, then?"

"Doctor, tell me where they sell this decoction! I tell you, I 'd have that flaming liquid, although I had to pay, for every drop of it, a diamond of equal size, and renounce every other luxury in life; for I should then feel myself invincible."

"Count, give me your promise not to take this medicine more than twice a week, and to apply to no one except myself for a renewal of the prescription, and this little bottle is yours."

"Give it me, and I 'll promise anything you wish."

"Good!" said Gilbert, "but that is n't all. You mean to buy a carriage and horses, you told me."

"Yes."

"Well, then, live in the country. These flowers, which vitiate the air of your rooms, would purify the air of your garden. The drives which you would have to take every day, to and from Paris, would be very healthful. If possible, select a residence on high ground, amidst trees, or near a river, — say at Bellevue, Saint Germain, or Argenteuil."

"At Argenteuil!" replied Mirabeau. "That's just the thing! I sent my man to look up a country-house. Teisch, did n't you tell me you had found something that would just suit me?"

"Yes, Monsieur," responded the man who had been assisting the Doctor, "yes, a charming house, about which a compatriot of mine, one Fritz, spoke to me. It appears that he once lived there, with his master, who is a foreign banker. It is vacant, and Monsieur can take it, if he will."

"Where is the place?"

"Just outside of Argenteuil. It is called the Château Marais," (a name which might be rendered, Swamp Castle).

"Oh, I know it very well," said Mirabeau. "When my father drove me away from home, with his curse, and several whacks of his cane, — you know, Doctor, my father lived at Argenteuil —?"

"Yes."

"Well, as I was saying, when he drove me away from home, it often happened that I promenaded up and down outside the walls of that same beautiful house, and exclaimed with Horace, — I ask pardon, if the quotation is wrong, — O rus quando te aspiciam? — Oh villa, when shall I behold thee?"

"Then, my dear Count, the time has come for realizing your dream. Go at once. Visit the Château Marais, and take your household with you, — the sooner the better."

Mirabeau reflected, and then turned to Gilbert. "It 's your duty to watch over the invalid whom you have restored to life. It 's now only five o'clock. The days are at their longest. It 's fine weather. Let us take a carriage, and go to Argenteuil."

"So be it," said .Gilbert, "let us go to Argenteuil. When one undertakes the care of health so precious as yours, my dear Count, everything should be considered. Let us go and examine your villa."

CHAPTER XVIII.

NO KINSHIP BEYOND THE FOURTH GRADE.

MIRABEAU had as yet no well-appointed establishment, and consequently no carriage of his own. The servant was therefore sent after a hack.

At that epoch it was almost a journey to Argenteuil, which one can now reach in eleven minutes, and which one may reach in eleven seconds, ten years hence.

Why did Mirabeau choose Argenteuil? Because of the life-long remembrances, as he told the Doctor, which bound him to the little town; for this man was so convinced of the need of doubling the short period of existence left to him, that he was glad to lay hold upon the past, in order to avoid being drawn too swiftly into the future.

It was at Argenteuil, on July 11, 1789, that his father, the Marquis de Mirabeau, died, — like a true gentleman, who would not aid in the capture of the Bastille.

At the end of Argenteuil Bridge Mirabeau ordered the carriage to stop.

"Are we there?" asked the Doctor.

"Yes and no! We have not yet reached the Château Marais, which is situated a quarter-league the other side of Argenteuil; but what we are making to-day, dear Doctor, — I forgot to tell you, — is not merely a visit, but a pilgrimage, — such as devotees make in their devotions, — a pilgrimage with three stations."

"A pilgrimage?" said Gilbert, smiling; "and to what saint?"

"To Saint Riquetti, my dear Doctor, — a saint whom you do not recognize, but a saint whom men have canonized. In truth, I greatly misdoubt if God — supposing he pays any attention to the foolery of this stupid world — has ratified this canonization. None the less a fact is it, that here died Riquetti, Marquis de Mirabeau, — the Friend of Mankind, as men called him, — martyrized by the extravagance and debauchery of his unworthy son, Honoré Gabriel Victor Riquetti, Comte de Mirabeau."

"True!" said the Doctor. "Your father did die at Argenteuil. Pardon me for having forgotten it, my dear Count. My excuse is this, — that I arrived from America in the early days of July, and was arrested on the way from Havre to Paris. When your father died, I was imprisoned in the Bastille. On the Fourteenth of July I was released, with seven other prisoners. Important as was this personal occurrence, it was nevertheless forgotten, — to say nothing of lesser details, — in the tremendous events which came to light before the month was over. — Where did your father live?"

At the moment when Gilbert asked this question, Mirabeau stopped — for they had left the carriage, and were on foot — in front of the gateway of a mansion situated on the pier, facing the river, from which it was separated by a lawn of three hundred paces and by a row of trees.

Seeing a man stop in front of the gate, an enormous dog — of the race found in the Pyrenees — sprang forward, growling, and thrust his head between the bars of the gate, trying to grab a mouthful of Mirabeau's flesh, or else a fragment of his coat.

"Pardieu, Doctor!" said Mirabeau, recoiling a step, in order to escape from the fierce white teeth of this Thracian watchdog, "pardieu, nothing is changed! I'm received just as if my father were alive."

Thereupon a young man appeared on the porch, and advanced towards the strangers, after silencing the dog, and calling him back.

"Your pardon, gentlemen," said the young man. "His masters have no share in the reception accorded you by their dog. Many wayfarers stop in front of this house, which was once occupied by the Marquis de Mirabeau, and as our poor Cartouche cannot comprehend the historic interest connected with the abode of his humbler masters, he growls eternally. — To your kennel, Cartouche!"

The young man made a threatening gesture, and the dog went growling to his kennel; but on his fore paws, which protruded through the opening, he laid his head, with its sharp teeth, red tongue, and fiery eyes. Meanwhile Gilbert and Mirabeau exchanged glances.

"Gentlemen," continued the young man, "there is now within this gate only a host, ready to open it and welcome you, if your curiosity is not limited to the outside."

Gilbert touched Mirabeau with his elbow, as a sign that he would be glad to see the inside of the mansion. Mirabeau understood. Besides, his wishes accorded with Gilbert's, and so he replied to the young man: "You have read our thoughts, Monsieur. Aware that this house was formerly occupied by the Friend of Mankind, we are curious to visit it."

"And it will increase your interest to know, gentlemen," said the young man, "that while the father lived here, the house was twice or thrice honored by visits from his illustrious son, who — if one may judge from hearsay — was not always received as his merits warranted, — as we would receive him, if he should ever have the fancy which you have, gentlemen, and which I hasten to gratify."

Bowing, the young man admitted the two visitors, and preceded them towards the house; but Cartouche did not seem disposed to let them enjoy the proffered hospitality, for he darted out of his kennel, barking frightfully.

The young man threw himself between the dog and the one visitor against whom Cartouche seemed particularly enraged; but Mirabeau gently pushed the young man aside with his hand, saying: "Monsieur, dogs and men always bark at me like this. Moreover, men have bitten me, but dogs, never! It is said that the human gaze is all-powerful over animals. So please you, let me make an experiment."

"Monsieur," said the youth, quickly, "I warn you that Cartouche is ugly."

"Let me alone, Monsieur, let me alone," replied Mirabeau, "I have business, every day, with uglier beasts than he. Yes, this very day I had to do with just such a whipper-in, — a hound, a pack of hounds."

"Oh yes, but you could talk to those hounds," said Gilbert, "and nobody can doubt the power of your tongue."

"Doctor," said Mirabeau, "I believe you are an adept in magnetism?"

"Undoubtedly! What then?"

"In that case, you ought to recognize the power of the human gaze. Let me magnetize Cartouche."

Mirabeau spoke in that venturesome mood, so well understood by superior minds.

"Try it!" said Gilbert.

"Oh Monsieur," repeated the youth, "don't expose yourself!"

"By your leave?" said Mirabeau.

The young man bowed his consent; and he retired to the left, while Gilbert stepped to the right, as if they were witnesses at a duel, where the adversary was to fire on their friend.

The young man also went up two or three steps towards the porch, so that he could stop Cartouche, if the words or looks of the unknown gentleman should not suffice.

The dog turned his head right and left, as if to see if the enemy, against whom he had apparently vowed eternal hatred, was really cut off from all help. Seeing the man alone and unarmed, he crawled slowly out of his kennel, more like a serpent than a quadruped, and then suddenly leaped forward, clearing at the first bound a third of the distance between the kennel and his antagonist.

Mirabeau crossed his arms, and with that tremendous look which made him the Jupiter Tonans (the Thunderer) of the rostrum, he fixed his eyes on the animal. At the same time, all the electricity which his powerful body could contain seemed to concentrate itself in his countenance. His hair bristled like a lion's mane; and if it had been in the first hours of the night, — instead of an hour of the day when it was still quite light, though the sun was setting, — one would undoubtedly have seen every hair sparkling with electric fire.

The dog stopped short, and looked at him. Mirabeau stooped, snatched up a handful of gravel, and threw it in the dog's face.

The dog howled, and made another leap, which brought him within three or four feet of his adversary; but now it was the man who advanced upon the dog.

For an instant the animal remained immovable, like the granite dog of Cephalus the Hunter, in the classic fable. Disquieted by Mirabeau's steady approach, he appeared to hesitate between anger and fear, still threatening with his eyes and teeth, yet crouching on his hind legs. At last Mirabeau lifted his arm, with a commanding gesture, — such as he often used on the tribune, when he hurled sarcasm, irony, and insult at his enemies; whereupon the conquered dog retreated, trembling in every limb. Glancing backward, to see if the way was still open, he finally turned tail, and rushed precipitately into his kennel.

Mirabeau lifted his head, as proud and joyous as any victor in the Isthmian Games of ancient Greece. "Ah, Doctor," he said, "the elder Mirabeau had good reason to call dogs the types of humanity. You shall see this blatant coward become as servile as any man!"

With a tone of command he then said, letting his hand fall by his side: "Here, Cartouche, here!"

The dog hesitated; but as the man made an impatient gesture, he crawled again out of his kennel, his eyes fixed on Mirabeau's, and crossed the intervening space till he reached the feet of his conqueror, the ends of whose fingers he lapped with the tip of his palpitating tongue, after slowly and timidly raising his head.

"That 's right!" said Mirabeau. "Now go back to your house!" and, at a sign, the dog went back, and lay down on his straw.

While the youth remained on the steps of the porch, cold with fear and mute with wonder, Mirabeau turned to Gilbert, and said: "Do you know what I was thinking of, when engaged in the bit of folly you have just witnessed?"

"No; but tell me, for you have not acted from simple bravado, I take it."

"I was thinking of that famous night of the Fifth and Sixth of October. Doctor, Doctor, I would give half the remainder of my life, to have had King Louis the Sixteenth see that dog spring at me, retreat to his niche, and return to lick my hand." Then he said to the young man: "You will pardon me, doubtless, for having humiliated Cartouche? Now we will see the Friend of Mankind's house, whenever you will allow us to do so."

The youth stepped aside to let Mirabeau enter, who indeed seemed to need no guide, but to know the house as well as if he had been there before.

Without pausing on the ground-floor, he rapidly mounted the stairs, ornamented with an artistically wrought iron balustrade, saying: "This way, Doctor; this way!"

Indeed, with the leadership habitual to him, — arising from that domination which belonged to his temperament, — Mirabeau at once ceased to be a spectator, and became an actor, seeming to be the master of the house, rather than a mere visitor.

Gilbert followed. Meanwhile the youth summoned his father, a man of fifty or fifty-five, and also two sisters, girls from fifteen to eighteen years old, in order to tell them what a singular guest had come thither.

While the young man was telling them the story of Cartouche's defeat, Mirabeau showed Gilbert the former Marquis's study, bedroom, and parlor; and as each corner roused some remembrance, Mirabeau recounted anecdote after anecdote, with that charm of narration which was one of his characteristics.

While this cicerone told them the story of their own house, the proprietor and his family listened, — hearing and looking with open ears and big eyes.

The upper apartments having been inspected, and seven o'clock sounding from the Argenteuil church, Mirabeau feared they should be too late if they remained any longer, and urged Gilbert to descend, setting him the example by striding at a leap down the first four steps, to the turn of the staircase.

"Monsieur," then said the owner of the house, "you seem to know very much about the history of the Marquis de Mirabeau and his illustrious son; and it seems to me that you could, if you would, tell us the story of these four stairs, — an account — from what I hear — which would be no less entertaining than your others."

Mirabeau stopped and smiled, saying: "Very true, but I meant to pass this by in silence."

"Why so, Count?" asked the Doctor.

"Faith, you shall judge! In leaving his dungeon at Vincennes, where he had been eighteen months, Mirabeau — being double the age of the Prodigal Son in the parable, and not perceiving any preparation for killing the fatted calf in joy over his return — took a fancy to come hither, and reclaim his legitimate rights. There were two reasons why Mirabeau was badly received in the paternal mansion. In the first place, he had come away from Vincennes against the old Marquis's will. In the second place, he came home to ask for money. The consequence was that the Marquis, who was busy putting the last touch to a philanthropic disquisition, arose when he saw his son, grasped his cane when the boy began to speak, and sprang upon him as soon as the word money was mentioned. The young Count well knew his father, yet had hoped his thirty-seven years might save the son from the punishment wherewith he was menaced; but he saw his error when he felt a shower of blows on his shoulders, dealt with the cane."

"How? Blows with a cane?" said Gilbert.

"Yes, and good cuts, too, — not such as they get at the Comédie Française, in Molière's plays, but real blows, enough to split one's head and break one's arms."

"And what did the son do?" asked Gilbert.

"Gracious! He did what Horace did, at his first fight, — he ran away! Unfortunately he had no buckler, such as Horace wore; or he might have used it to parry his father's attack, instead of throwing it away, as did the Lydian songster; so, having no shield, he flung himself down these four steps, to the turn of the staircase, — as I did just now. At this point the son faced about. Lifting a cane, in his turn, he cried to his father: 'Hold on, Monsieur! There is no kinship beyond the fourth grade.' It was a wretched pun, — comparing the gradation of a stairway to the grades, or degrees, of family relationship; but all the same it checked the good man, when fair reasoning would have failed; for he said: 'What a pity the Bailiff is dead, or I would have written that out for him;' — referring of course to his brother, who was known as the Bailiff."

The narrator continued: "Mirabeau was too good a strategist not to profit by the chance thus offered for beating a retreat. He descended the rest of the flight, almost as quickly as he had the first few steps; and, to his great sorrow, he never entered the house again. He was a great knave, that Count de Mirabeau, was n't he, Doctor?"

"Oh Monsieur," said the young man, approaching Mirabeau with clasped hands, — as if he asked pardon of his guest for entertaining a contrary opinion, "I would rather call him a great man!"

Mirabeau looked into the youth's face, and said: "Ah ha! Are there really some people who think well of Mirabeau?"

"Yes, Monsieur," said the young man; "and at the risk of displeasing you, I think so, first of all."

"So?" replied Mirabeau, laughing. "Well, it won't do to say that too loud in this house, young man, or the walls may tumble about your ears."

Saluting the old man respectfully, and the young ladies courteously, Mirabeau crossed the garden, making a sign of good-will to Cartouche, who responded by a sort of growl, — the remnant of his protest against absolute submission.

Gilbert followed Mirabeau, who ordered the coachman to drive into the village, and as far as the church; but at the corner of the first street he stopped the carriage, took a card from his pocket, and said to his servant: "Teisch, take this card back to that young man who does not agree with me about Monsieur de Mirabeau." Then he added, with a sigh: "Ah, Doctor, — there is somebody who has not yet read about Mirabeau's Great Treason."

Teisch returned, followed by the youth.

"Oh Monsieur de Mirabeau," he said, with an accent of admiration which it was impossible to mistake, "grant me the same privilege accorded to Cartouche, — the honor of kissing your hand."

Mirabeau opened both arms, and pressed the youngster to his heart.

"Count," he said, "my name is Mornais. If ever you need the help of one who is ready to die for you, remember me!"

Mirabeau's eyes were suffused with tears, as he said: "Doctor, these are the men who will succeed us. Upon my word, I believe they will be worth more than we are."

CHAPTER XIX.

A WOMAN RESEMBLING THE QUEEN.

THE hack stopped at the door of the Argenteuil church.

"I told you I had never set foot in Argenteuil, since my father turned me violently out of doors. I forgot! I did come back one day, when I escorted his body to this church."

Mirabeau left the carriage and doffed his hat. With uncovered head, with slow and solemn step, he entered the sacred edifice.

There were in that singular man such contradictory sentiments, that sometimes he clung to the commonplaces of religion, in an epoch when everybody talked of philosophy, which many pushed into the extreme of absolute atheism.

Gilbert followed, a few steps behind. He saw Mirabeau walk the whole length of the church, and lean against a massive pillar, which stood near the altar consecrated to the Madonna, — a pillar whose Roman capital evidently belonged to the Twelfth Century.

With bowed head he gazed steadfastly at a black slab, forming the centre of the small chapel before that altar.

The Doctor tried to see what could so absorb Mirabeau's attention; and as his eyes followed his friend's, they were arrested by the following inscription:

FRANÇOISE DE CASTELLANE, MARQUISE DE MIRABEAU,

a model of piety and virtue, a happy wife and mother.

Born in Dauphiny, 1685; died in Paris, 1769:

She was first interred in Saint Sulpice, Paris;
then brought here, to be reunited in the same tomb with her worthy son

VICTOR DE RIQUETTI, MARQUIS DE MIRABEAU, surnamed the FRIEND OF MANKIND:

Born at Pertuis, in Provence, October 4, 1715; died at Argenteuil, July 11, 1789.

Pray for their Souls.

The religious instinct is so powerful in connection with death, that Doctor Gilbert lowered his head, and tried to find a prayer remaining in his memory, that he might obey the invitation which the sepulchral stone addressed to all Christians who chanced to cast their eyes upon it; but if ever in his infancy, which is doubtful, Gilbert had learned the language of humility and faith, skepticism, that gangrene of the last century, had effaced it, to the last line in that living book, and philosophy had inscribed sophisms and paradoxes in the place of religion.

Finding his heart and tongue alike mute, Gilbert lifted his eyes, and saw a few tears roll down Mirabeau's strong face, seamed by passion, as the slopes of a volcano are scored by fiery lava.

Those tears moved Gilbert so strangely, that he went to Mirabeau and took him by the hand. Mirabeau understood him.

Tears shed in memory of such a father, who had imprisoned, tortured, martyrized his son, seemed so utterly incomprehensible and perfunctory, that Mirabeau hastened to show Gilbert the true cause of this sensibility.

"She was a worthy woman, this Françoise de Castellane, my father's mother. When all the world found me hideous, she found me only plain. When everybody else hated me, she almost loved me. But most of all, she loved her son. As you see, my dear Gilbert, I have reunited them; but who can reunite me to them? Whose bones will lie next to mine? I have not even a dog to love me!" and he laughed gloomily.

"Monsieur," said an authoritative voice, with the rasping tone, full of reproach, which belongs to devotees, "Monsieur, people do not laugh in church!"

Mirabeau turned his tear-stained face towards the side whence the voice sounded, and saw a priest.

"Are you the priest in charge of this chapel?" he mildly asked.

"Yes. What do you wish?"

"Have you many poor folks in your parish?"

"More poor folks, than rich folks disposed to relieve them."

"You have however some charitable hearts, some philanthropic souls — ?"

The priest began to laugh.

"Monsieur," said Mirabeau, "you did me the honor just now to remark that people do not laugh in church!"

"Monsieur," said the priest, a little touched, "do you pretend to lecture me — ?"

"No, Monsieur, but to show you that people who feel it their duty to come to the relief of their fellow-men are not so rare as you suppose. In all probability, Monsieur, I am going to live in the Château Marais. Well, every laborer out of work may find employment there, at good wages. Every hungry old man may come there for bread. Every invalid may find help there, whatever his religious or political opinions. Beginning with to-day, Monsieur Curate, I offer you, to that end, a credit of a thousand francs a month."

Tearing a leaf from his tablet he wrote on it, with a pencil, as follows:

Good for the sum of twelve thousand (12,000) francs, which M. the Curate of Argenteuil may expend for me, at the rate of one thousand (1000) francs per month, to be employed by him for charitable purposes, beginning with the day of my residence in the Château Marais.

Done at the Argenteuil church, and signed on the altar of the Virgin.

MIRABEAU.

Mirabeau indeed wrote and signed this promise on the altar dedicated to the Madonna. When it was done he gave the note to the curate, who was stupefied when he read the signature, and more so when he read the agreement.

Then Mirabeau left the church, beckoning Gilbert to follow, and they re-entered the carriage.

As short a time as Mirabeau had been in Argenteuil, he had already left behind him two souvenirs which would endear him to posterity.

It is the faculty of some organizations to make something eventful spring up wherever they touch their feet; as Cadmus raised soldiers from the soil of Thebes, as Hercules wrought his twelve famous labors in the face of the world; and so to-day, though Mirabeau has been dead over sixty years,[1] you may find at Argenteuil, in the same place where Mirabeau found them, both the stations which Mirabeau selected for his pilgrimage; and unless the mansion is uninhabited, or the church abandoned, you will also find there somebody to confirm these details, as if they were events of yesterday.

The carriage followed the main street to the very end. Then they branched away from Argenteuil, and rolled along the road towards Besons. They had not gone a hundred rods in this direction, before Mirabeau saw, at his right hand, groups of tufted trees, cloven by the slated roofs of the château and its outbuildings. This was Marais.

At the right of the road, before reaching the avenue which led up to the gate of the château, there was a poor little cottage. In the doorway was seated a woman on a wooden stool, holding in her arms a haggard child, emaciated by fever. As she rocked her half-dead little one, she raised her eyes to Heaven and wept, addressing herself to that power to which we all appeal, when there is no help to be obtained from a human source.

From afar Mirabeau noted this sorrowful scene, and said to Gilbert: "Doctor, I am as superstitious as any old woman. If that child dies, I won't take the Château Marais. See what is before you!"

He stopped the carriage opposite the hut, and added: "Doctor, as I have only twenty minutes more of daylight, in which to inspect the château, I will leave you here. You can rejoin me presently, and tell me if you hope to save the child."

Then he said to the mother: "Good woman, here is a gentleman who is a great physician. Thank Providence which has sent him to you. He will try to heal your babe."

The woman doubted if this was not a dream. She rose, holding her child still in her arms, and stammered her thanks.

Gilbert left the carriage, which continued its journey. Five minutes afterwards Teisch rang the bell at the gate of the château. They waited some time without seeing anybody, but at last a man came to open the gate, whose costume made it easy to recognize him as the gardener.

Mirabeau first inquired about the condition of the building. The château was in good order, — at least, the gardener said so; and certainly it so appeared, at first sight.

The place had formed part of the estate of the Abbey Saint Denis, and been the headquarters of the Argenteuil Priory, and was now for sale, on account of the decrees which deprived the clergy of their landed property.

As we have said, Mirabeau knew the place already; but he never before had the opportunity of examining it so attentively as he could under present circumstances.

Passing the gateway he found himself in the first court-yard, which was nearly square. At the right was a pavilion, or small house, occupied by the gardener. At the left was another pavilion; but by the style of its decorations, even on the outside, one might well doubt, for an instant, if it was meant to be the twin brother of the one opposite.

The two pavilions were mates, however; but its setting made one of these plebeian edifices almost aristocratic. Gigantic rose-trees, in full bloom, formed an open-work robe, which was girded with a belt of vines, like a green border. Every window was shielded by a curtain of carnations, heliotropes, fuchsias, whose thick branches, embossed with flowers, kept both the sun and the eye from penetrating within. In front of this little house was a little garden, filled with the lily, the cactus, the narcissus, — a veritable carpet of flowers, such as might have been embroidered by the hand of Penelope; and this garden extended all the way along the first court-yard, making a beautiful contrast to a gigantic weeping willow and some magnificent elms, growing on the other side.

We have already spoken of Mirabeau's passion for flowers. At the sight of this charming garden, and this pavilion buried among its roses, which seemed like a little Mansion of Flowers, he uttered a cry of joy, and said to the gardener: "Is this pavilion for sale or to let, my friend?"

"Certainly, Monsieur, as it belongs to the château, and the château is to be let or sold. Just now the pavilion is occupied; but there is no lease, and if Monsieur takes the château, the tenant of the pavilion can be sent away."

"Ah! And who is this tenant?"

"A lady."

"Young?"

"Thirty or thirty-five."

"Handsome?"

"Very handsome!"

"Well," said Mirabeau, "we will see. A beautiful neighbor is n't a bad idea! Show me the château, my friend."

The gardener walked on ahead, from the first court-yard into the second, from which it was separated by a bridge, beneath which was a rivulet.

There the gardener paused, and said: "If Monsieur does not wish to disturb the lady in the pavilion, the matter may be easily adjusted; for this little stream completely isolates the rest of the garden from that portion of the grounds belonging to her residence.

She would be by herself, and Monsieur could be by himself."

"Good, very good! Now show me the château," said Mirabeau, as he briskly sprang up the five steps of the porch.

The gardener opened the principal door, which led into a vestibule, finished in stucco, with niches containing statues, and columns supporting vases, in the fashion of that era.

A doorway at the other end of the hallway, opposite the main entrance, afforded an exit into the large garden beyond.

On the right of the hallway were a billiard-room and dining-room, and on the left were two parlors, one large and one small.

This arrangement pleased Mirabeau well enough, who, however, appeared absent-minded and impatient.

They went upstairs to the main story of the mansion. This story was composed of a large drawing-room, marvellously well fitted for an office or study, and three or four bedrooms, for the master of the house.

The windows were closed in the drawing-room and bedrooms. Mirabeau went himself to open one of the windows; and the gardener was about to open the others, when Mirabeau made a sign for him not to do so, and the gardener obeyed.

Just beneath the window which Mirabeau opened, at the foot of the big weeping willow, a woman was reclining and reading; while a few steps away was a little child, five or six years old, playing on the grass and among the flower-beds.

Mirabeau understood at once that this was the lady of the Floral Pavilion.

It was impossible to appear more gracefully or more elegantly arrayed than was this woman. She wore a loose muslin morning gown, trimmed with lace, over a white taffeta bodice, ornamented with red and white ribbons. Her skirt was also of white muslin, with quilled flounces of red and white, like the bodice. On her rose-colored taffeta corsage were knots of the same color. Her hood was bordered with lace, which fell down like a veil; and through this, as through a mist, one could see her face.

Her hands were beautiful, and her fingers tapering, with aristocratic nails. Her infantile feet played in and out of loose slippers, made of white taffeta, with red knots, completing a harmonious and seductive vision.

The child was clad in a suit of white satin. He wore a little Henry the Fourth hat and — a singular combination, not unusual at that epoch — a tricolored belt, called the National. What was more surprising, his dress resembled the costume worn by the young Dauphin, the last time he appeared on the balcony at the Tuileries, with his mother.

The sign made by Mirabeau to the gardener was to prevent him from disturbing the beautiful reader. She was indeed the lady of the Floral Pavilion, the queen of this garden of the lily, cactus, and narcissus, such a neighbor as Mirabeau — a man whose senses always inclined him towards the voluptuous — would have chosen, if chance had not led him into her neighborhood.

For a while he devoured with his eyes this charming creature, immovable as a statue, ignorant of the ardent gaze which enveloped her; but, either by chance, or drawn by a magnetic current, her eyes suddenly detached themselves from the book, and turned towards the window.

She saw Mirabeau, uttered a little cry of surprise, arose, called her child, and went away, holding him by the hand, — not, however, without two or three times turning her head. She disappeared among the trees, in the midst of which Mirabeau could see her striking dress here and there reappearing, as its whiteness struggled with the first shadows of night.

To the cry of surprise uttered by the unknown lady, Mirabeau responded with a cry of wonder. Not only had this lady the royal bearing, but her face — so far as the lace veil, which half covered it, would permit a judgment — wore the features of Marie Antoinette.

The child added to the resemblance. He was exactly the age of the Queen's second son, the Dauphin, — of that Queen whose walk, whose face, whose every movement had so steadfastly remained, not merely in the memory, but in the heart of Mirabeau, ever since the interview at Saint Cloud, that he could recognize her wherever he might see her, even were she enwrapt in a divine cloud, like that in which Virgil declares Venus was encompassed, when she appeared to her son on the outskirts of Carthage.

What marvel had led this mysterious woman into the park of the mansion which Mirabeau was about to hire, — a woman who, if not the Queen, was her living portrait?

At that instant Mirabeau felt a hand on his shoulder.

CHAPTER XX.

WHEREIN THE INFLUENCE OF THE UNKNOWN LADY BEGINS TO MAKE ITSELF FELT.

MIRABEAU turned with a start. It was Doctor Gilbert who had touched his shoulder.

"Ah, it 's you, Doctor! Well?"

"Well," said Gilbert, "I 've seen the child."

"And you hope to save it?"

"A physician should never lose hope, even in the face of death itself."

"The Devil! That 's as much as to say the malady is serious."

"More than serious, my dear Count; it is mortal."

"What 's the trouble?"

"I ask nothing better than to enter into the details of this subject, inasmuch as these details will not be devoid of interest to a man who has made up his mind to live in this château, without knowing to what he is exposing himself."

"What? Do you mean to tell me that they run the risk of the plague here?"

"No; but I will tell you how this poor child caught the fever, of which it will probably die in a week. Its mother was helping the gardener cut the grass hereabouts. In order to work more freely, she laid the child down by itself, in a place which happened to be only a few steps from one of those ditches of stagnant water which encircle the park. The good woman, having no idea of the duplex movement of the earth, laid the little thing in the shade, without thinking that in an hour the shadow would give place to the sun. When she came after her infant, attracted by its cries, she found it doubly injured, — injured by prolonged exposure to the sun, which had brought a sunstroke to its young brain, and injured by absorption of the marshy effluvia, which brings on a species of poisoning called malaria."

"Excuse me, Doctor," said Mirabeau, "but I do not understand you very well."

"Have you not heard more or less about the fevers which come from the Pontine Marshes, outside the city of Rome? Are you not acquainted, at least by reputation, with the deleterious miasma which exhales from the Tuscan swamps? Have you not read the Florentine poet's story of the death of Pia dei Tolomei?"

"Oh yes, Doctor, I know all that; but as a man of the world, as a poet, not as a chemist or a physician. Cabanis told me something like this, the last time I saw him, in reference to the Assembly Hall, at the Riding School, where we are so badly off. He even pretends, if I don't go out three times during every session, and breathe the air of the Tuileries Gardens, that I shall die of poison."

"And Cabanis is right."

"Will you not explain this, Doctor? It will give me great pleasure."

"Seriously?"

"Yes. I know my Greek and Latin well enough. During my four or five years spent in prison, at different periods, — thanks to the social irritability of my father, — I have had a good chance to study antiquity. I even wrote, in some odd moments, an obscene book, on the morals and manners of the aforesaid antiquity, — a book which is not destitute of a certain kind of science; but I am completely ignorant how one can be poisoned in our National Assembly Hall, — at least, unless he is bitten by Abbé Maury, or reads Marat's daily sheet."

"Then I will tell you. Perhaps the explanation may be obscure, for a man who modestly avows his ignorance of chemistry and his small knowledge of medicine. However, I 'll try to make it as clear as possible."

"Speak on, Doctor. You will never find an auditor more willing to learn."

"The architect who constructed the Riding School, — and, unfortunately, most architects, like yourself, are very bad chemists, — the architect who built that hall had no idea of so arranging the chimneys as to carry off the bad air, nor of having a secondary system of pipes, for the admission of fresh air. The result is that eleven hundred mouths, shut up within that hall, exhaust the oxygen, and leave carbonized vapor in its place. Consequently, at the end of an hour's session, — especially in winter, when the windows are shut and the stoves heated, — the air is not fit to breathe."

"That 's just the sort of thing I should like to understand, if only to pitch into Bailly about it."

"Nothing is simpler than the true explanation. Pure air, the air designed for absorption through our lungs, the air which is breathed in a dwelling-house half-turned towards sunrise, with running water in the neighborhood, — that is, in the best conditions under which air can possibly be breathed, — is composed of seventy-seven parts of oxygen, twenty-one parts of nitrogen, and two parts of what is called watery vapor."

"Very well! So much I can understand, and I note your figures."

"Well, now listen to this. The venous blood, black and full of carbon, is carried into the lungs, where it should be revived and cleansed by contact with the outside air, — that is, by the oxygen which the act of breathing borrows from the free air. Here a double phenomenon is produced, which we designate by the name of hematose. The oxygen, brought into contact with the blood, so combines with it as to change the color from black to red; and also imparts the element of vitality which is needed throughout the system. At the same time the carbon, which combines with part of the oxygen, is transformed into carbonic acid, or oxide of carbon, and is exhaled from the lungs, being mixed with a certain quantity of watery vapor, in the act of expiration. Well, this pure air, absorbed by inspiration, is vitiated by expiration, and forms, in a close room, an atmosphere which not only ceases to be in a proper condition for breathing, but may reach a point where it acts as a genuine poison."

"According to your theory, Doctor, I am already half poisoned."

"Precisely. Your intestinal discomforts arise from no other cause; but you will understand that the poison you now breathe, in the present Assembly Hall, follows and augments the poison you breathed in the Archepiscopal Palace, in the dungeon at Vincennes, in the fortress at Joux, and in If Castle. Do you not recollect what Madame Bellegarde said, that there was, in Vincennes Castle, one chamber worth its weight in arsenic?"

"So, dear Doctor, that poor infant is wholly what I am partially, — that is, poisoned!"

"Yes, dear Count; and the poisoning has brought with it a pernicious fever, whose seat is in the brain, or in the coatings of the brain. This fever has brought on another malady, commonly called cerebral fever, but which I would baptize with a new name. It might be called, if you please, a hydrocephalic ague. From this malady come convulsions, a pimply face, purple lips, lock-jaw, a displacement of the eyeballs, labored respiration, a pulse which trembles instead of beating regularly, and finally a viscous sweat over the whole body."

"My dear Doctor! Do you know that it gives me the shivers, this enumeration of yours? Indeed, when I hear a physician discourse in such technical words, it is much the same as if I were reading a paper crammed with astrological terms; and it always seems as if the pleasantest thing awaiting me was death. — But what have you ordered for the poor little thing?"

"The most energetic treatment; and I ought to say that one or two louis, wrapt in the prescription paper, will enable the mother to follow it. I have ordered cooling applications on the head, irritants on the extremities, emetics, and a decoction of that invaluable tonic, known as Peruvian Bark."

In 1790 the sulphate of quinine was unknown, and it was not yet the custom to apply leeches behind the ears. Doctor Gilbert's directions were as complete as the medical progress of the Eighteenth Century permitted.

"Indeed! And will all that do no good?" asked Mirabeau.

"All that will do no great things, without the aid of nature; but to satisfy my conscience, I have prescribed this treatment. Its good angel, if the little one has a good angel, must do the rest."

"Hum!"

"You understand, do you not?" said Gilbert.

"Your theory of poisoning by the oxide of carbon? Partly!"

"No, not that. I want to know if you understand that the air of this Château Marais will not suit you."

"You think so, Doctor?"

"I 'm sure of it."

"That 's very unlucky, for the château suits me to a charm."

"There you are, your own eternal enemy! I advise high ground; you select a flat locality. I suggest running water; you choose a stagnant pool."

"But what a park! Just look at yonder fine trees, Doctor!"

"Sleep a single night here with open windows, or walk about in the shade of those beautiful trees, — well, you may tell me the news the next day!"

"Which is to say, that in place of being half poisoned, as I am already, I shall be poisoned outright?"

"Have n't you asked for the truth?"

"Yes; and you are telling it, are you not?"

"Oh yes, in all its baldness. I know you, my dear Count. You come here to escape the world. The world will come and find you. Every man drags his own chain after him, whether it be of iron, gold, or flowers. Your chain is made up of pleasures by night and study by day. As long as you were young, voluptuousness afforded you relief from work; but now you are used up with your days of work, and weary with your nights of passion. You once told me, in your own language, — so expressive and picturesque, — that you felt as if you had passed from summer into autumn. Well, my dear Count, if, following this excess of pleasure by night and this excess of work by day, I should be obliged to bleed you, after such a multiplied loss of force, you would be more apt than ever to absorb this air, vitiated at night by the great trees in the park, and vitiated during the day by the malarial miasma from the standing water. What will happen? There will be two against me, both stronger than I, — you and nature. I might as well give up."

"So you believe, Doctor, it is through the intestines I must perish. The Devil! You pain me when you say that. Long and unbearable are these intestinal maladies. I should prefer a good rousing fit of apoplexy, or even heart-enlargement. Can't you arrange one of them for me?"

"My dear Count," said Gilbert, "don't ask me for anything of that sort! What you desire is as good as done. In my judgment, your entrails are only secondary; it is your heart which plays, and will play, the chief rôle. Unhappily, heart-diseases are numerous and various, with men of your age, and do not always lead to instant death. As a general rule, my dear Count, — listen well to this; it is nowhere written down, but I state it, more as a philosophic observer than as a physician! — as a general rule, acute distempers in mankind follow an absolute order. In infancy it is the brain which is attacked; in youth, it is the chest; in maturity, it is the bowels; in age, either the brain or the heart, — that is, the parts which have respectively been used most and suffered most. When science speaks its last word, when the whole universe, at man's interrogation, delivers up its last secret, when every malady finds its cure, when men — with few exceptions — die only from old age, like the animals around them, then the only two attackable organs will be the brain and the heart; and even then, brain-disease will have its seat in heart-disease."

"Mordieu, my dear Doctor! You have no idea how this interests me. Look here! One would think my heart knew what you 're talking about. See how it beats."

Mirabeau took Gilbert's hand, and placed it against his heart.

"There!" said the Doctor, "there comes an illustration of what I have been explaining. How can you suppose that an organ which shares all your emotions, which increases or decreases its pulsations in following a simple pathological conversation, how can you think that such an organ — above all, yours — should not be affected? By the heart you have conquered; by the heart you will be conquered. Understand this: there is not a mental or moral emotion, not an acute physical sensation, which does not give a man a sort of fever. There is no fever, without greater or less acceleration of heart-beats. Well, in painful and tiresome work, especially in that which is accomplished outside the normal order of things, the heart exhausts itself and undergoes some change. With old folks this change leads to hypertrophy of the heart, — that is, its too great development, — or to aneurism, a diminution of the heart. Aneurism leads to laceration of the heart, the only death which is instantaneous. Hypertrophy leads to apoplexy of the brain, and a slower death. Therein intelligence is destroyed, and, consequently, genuine pain no longer exists; because there is no suffering, without the feeling which judges and measures that suffering."

Mirabeau listened in wonder to Gilbert's exposition.

The Doctor continued: "Well, consider within yourself that you have loved, that you have been happy, that you have suffered, that you have had joyful and happy hours, such as nobody else ever had; that you have attained unheard-of triumphs, that you have descended to unknown deceptions; and that for forty years your heart has been precipitating the blood in boiling cataracts from the centre to the extremities of your body, while you have thought, worked, and talked the livelong day, while you have drunk, laughed, and indulged in pleasures the livelong night; and all this time your heart, though you have used and abused it, has not once failed in a single beat. Yet, my dear friend, the heart is like a purse. However well lined it may be, if we go to it often enough, it runs dry. In showing you the worse side of your condition, let me also speak of the better. The heart must have time wherein to do its work. Do not tax your heart more than it can endure. Do not ask of it more work than it is able to perform. Give it no more excitement than it can bear. Try and maintain the conditions which do not lead to grave disorders in the three chief functions of life, — respiration, which has its seat in the lungs, circulation, the seat whereof is in the heart, digestion, whose seat is in the intestines, — and you may live twenty or thirty years longer, and die of old age. On the contrary, if you wish to commit suicide, — my God, nothing is easier than for you to voluntarily hasten or retard your own death. Imagine that you are driving a pair of fiery steeds, who drag you along, — you, their guide. Constrain them to trot moderately, and they will last a long time and make a long journey. Let them gallop, and, like the fabled Horses of the Sun, they will make the everlasting circuit of the sky, doing a year's work in a single day and night."

"Yes," replied Mirabeau, "but during that day they lighten and warm the world, which is a good thing. — Come, Doctor, it is growing late. I 'll think about all this!"

"Reflect upon it as much as you please," said Gilbert, following Mirabeau; "but begin by obeying the orders of the Faculty. Promise me, first of all, not to hire this château. You will find, in the neighborhood of Paris, ten, twenty, fifty, which will offer you the same advantages as this."

Perhaps Mirabeau, yielding to the voice of reason, would have made this promise; but suddenly, amid the first shadows of evening, it seemed to him that he saw, behind a curtain of flowers, the head of the woman wearing the skirt of white taffeta, with rosy flowers. This woman smiled, — at least, Mirabeau so believed; but there was no time to make sure of it, for in an instant, guessing that something new had come across his patient's mind, Gilbert looked in the same direction, in order to account to himself for the nervous tremor of the arm on which the Doctor was leaning. The woman's head was speedily withdrawn, and one could see nothing, at the pavilion window, except the slightly agitated branches of roses, heliotropes, and pinks.

"You do not answer," said Gilbert.

"My dear Doctor, you recollect what I told you I said to the Queen, when she gave me her hand to kiss, as she left me: Madame, through this kiss the monarchy is saved!"

"Yes!"

"Well, I took upon myself a heavy load, Doctor, — especially if they abandon me, as heretofore they have done. However, I must not fail in this undertaking. Don't misjudge the suicide of which you spoke, Doctor. Suicide may perhaps be the only honorable way out of this affair."

Two days later, by a lease of the ground rental, Mirabeau had bought the Château Marais.

CHAPTER XXI.

THE CHAMP DE MARS.

We have already tried to make our readers understand into what an indissoluble knot of union all France was about to bind herself, and what effect this national federation, anticipatory of a more general federation, produced in Europe.

Europe began to understand that some day, though the dawning of this day was hidden in the clouds of the great future, — Europe, we repeat, began to understand that some day she must become an immense federation of citizens, a colossal society of brothers.

Mirabeau urged the grand gathering of the French people, which was about to take place. To the fears expressed to him by the King he responded, that if there was any salvation for royalty in France, it must be sought, not in Paris, but in the provinces.

Moreover, he saw one great advantage in such a reunion of men, from every corner of France, — that the King would see his people, and the people would see their King. When the whole population of France, represented by three hundred thousand delegates, — tradesmen, magistrates, soldiers, — should shout "Long live the Nation," and strike hands over the ruins of the Bastille, certain purblind courtiers, or courtiers interested to blindfold the King, could no longer insist that Paris, led by a handful of factious agitators, demanded a measure of liberty which the rest of France was far from claiming.

Mirabeau counted on the good sense of the King. He relied upon the spirit of loyalty still surviving, at that date, in the hearts of the French. He argued for this unusual, unheard-of, novel contact of the monarch with his subjects, and believed it would result in a sacred alliance, which no intrigue could thereafter break.

Men of genius are sometimes possessed with such sublime follies, which furnish the political blackguards of the future with a chance to laugh their memories to scorn.

Already one preparatory federation, so to speak, had been held on the plains of Lyons. France was instinctively marching towards unity, and believed the definite watchword of that unity might be found in the valley of the Rhone; but it soon became obvious, that while Lyons might betroth France to the Genius of Liberty, the marriage must be solemnized and consummated in Paris.

When this proposition for a general convention was brought before the Assembly by the Mayor and Council of Paris, who could not resist the impulsion of other cities, there was a great commotion in the audience. This reunion, which would bring innumerable men to Paris, — that eternal centre of agitation, — was disapproved by each of the two parties which divided the Chamber, the Royalists and the Jacobins.

The Royalists declared that to invite such a gathering would be to risk another gigantic Fourteenth of July, not against the Bastille this time, but against royalty itself. What would happen to the King, amidst such a frightful medley of opposing passions, such an inevitable conflict of differing opinions?

On the other side, the Jacobins, who were not ignorant what a hold Louis the Sixteenth still had upon the masses, liked this project of a convention no better than did their political opponents. In the eyes of the Jacobins, such a reunion would deaden the public spirit, lull mistrust to sleep, awaken the old idolatry, — in a word, royalize France.

There was no way, however, of paralyzing this movement, which was without a parallel since the Eleventh Century, when all Europe was roused to recapture the Holy Sepulchre of Jesus at Jerusalem; and these two movements were not as foreign to each other as might at first be supposed, inasmuch as the first tree of liberty was planted on Calvary.

The Assembly tried, however, to make the reunion less formidable than was expected. The members dragged out the discussion; so it came to pass, for those who travelled from the ends of the kingdom, — what had happened likewise to the delegates from Corsica to the Lyons Federation, — that they did not arrive till the last gun-fire, — and scarcely before the day after the wedding.

Besides, the expenses were to be charged to the different sections; and, as the opponents of the convention very well knew, there were provinces so poor as to be able to raise, even with their strongest efforts, only enough money to defray half the expenses of their deputies, or even a quarter-part of the cost of travel; and that consequently these deputies would not be able to reach Paris, to say nothing of getting home again.

These enemies had reckoned, however, without their host, without the popular enthusiasm. They had not taken into consideration the spirit of co-operation, whereby the rich give twice, — once for themselves, and once for their poorer neighbors. They had not counted on that hospitality which exclaimed, all along the roads: "Ye French, open your doors! Here are your brothers, who come to you from the ends of France!" — a cry which did not find a deaf ear or a rebellious door.

There were no longer strangers or foreigners, but everywhere Frenchmen, relations, brothers. Unseen voices cried: "Come, ye pilgrims, to the grand festival! Come ye National Guards! Come soldiers! Come mariners! Come among us! You will find fathers and mothers and wives, whose sons and husbands are elsewhere, in other generous homes, enjoying the same hospitality we offer you."

If one could have been transported, as the Christ was, not indeed to the summit of the highest mountain on earth, but simply to the highest peak in France, he might have seen a splendid spectacle, — three hundred thousand citizens marching towards Paris, all the rays of the star converging into a common centre.

And by whom were they guided, these Pilgrims of Liberty? By aged men; by soldiers of the Seven Years War; by subordinate officers who had fought at Fontenoy; by volunteers, for whom it had required all the labor, courage, and devotion of a lifetime to reach the two epaulets of a captain or the one epaulet of a lieutenant; by poor miners, compelled to bear on their foreheads the sign of the granite rule of ancient France; by sailors, who had conquered the Indies under Bussy and Dupleix, and lost their prize under Lally Tolendal, — living ruins, broken down by cannon on fields of battle, or worn out by the ebb and flow of the sea.

During the last days, veterans of fourscore made long journeys, of ten or a dozen leagues at a stretch, in order to arrive in time; and they were in time. At the moment when they were about to lie down forever, and sleep the slumber of eternity, the force of their youth was renewed, and they mounted on wings of eagles.

Their country had made them a sign, beckoning them with one hand, while with the other she pointed to the future of their children. Before them was the banner of Hope.

They chanted one unique song, these pilgrims, coming from the north, the south, the east, the west, from Alsatia, Brittany, Provence, Normandy. Who taught them this song, clumsily and heavily rhymed, like the ancient canticles which guided the Crusaders across the seas of the Grecian Archipelago and the plains of Asia Minor? No one knows! The angel of the Revolution, perchance, scattering music from his passing wings, as he soared over beautiful France.

This song was the famous Ça ira, — not the Terror Song of 1793; for in '93 everything was inverted, hope was changed into tearful laughter, and France "sweat, as it were, great drops of blood."

As all France was leaving home, to bear to Paris the universal oath, she sang no words of threat. She had not yet learned to sing the Ça ira of later days; which ran thus:

Ah! ça ira, ça ira, ça ira,
Les aristocrates à la lanterne;
Ah! ça ira, ça ira, ça ira,
Les aristocrates, on les pendra!

This quatrain may be translated as follows:

Ah, go ahead, go ahead, go ahead!
Aristocrats straight to the rope!
Ah, go ahead, go ahead, go ahead!
The Royalists, let them all hang!

No ! The song was not then a death-chant, but a life-giving melody, not a hymn of despair, but a canticle of hope; for to another air they chanted the following verses :

Le peuple en ce jour sans cesse répète:
Ah! ça ira, ça ira, ça ira !
Suivant les maximes de l'Évangile.
Ah ! ça ira, ça ira, ça ira !
Du législateur tout s'accomplira :
Celui qui s'élève, on l'abaissera ;
Celui qui s'abaisse, on l'élèvera !

These lines may be rendered thus :

The people this day without ceasing, repeat,
Go ahead, go ahead, go ahead !
The plain Gospel precepts are guiding their feet :
Go ahead, go ahead, go ahead !
The Lawgiver's word is fulfilled in all ways :
Whoever is lofty shall soon be abased ;
Whoever is humble, the same shall be raised.

To receive five hundred thousand souls, from Paris and the provinces, there was needed a monstrous arena, — besides a colossal amphitheatre, capable of accommodating a million spectators.

For the arena, the Champ de Mars (Field of Mars) was selected ; for the amphitheatre, the heights of Passy and Chaillot.

As the Champ de Mars presented a flat surface, it was necessary to turn it into a vast basin, by digging out the earth in some places, and piling it up in others.

Fifteen thousand laborers — men of the sort who eternally complain aloud of their fruitless search for work, while, with bated breath, they pray God not to let them find it — fifteen thousand such laborers were set to work, with spades, pickaxes, and hoes, by the city of Paris, in order to transform this plain into a valley, flanked by a large amphitheatre. Only three weeks remained for these fifteen thousand men to accomplish this Titanic work; yet at the end of two days it was evident these men would not get through in three months.

Besides, they were being paid more for doing nothing, than they could have earned at their regular trade, — if they had any.

Then there occurred a species of miracle, whereby one may measure the enthusiasm of the Parisians. That immense labor, which thousands of lazy workmen could not or would not accomplish, was undertaken by the entire population. On the very day when it was noised abroad that the Champ de Mars would not be ready for the festival of the Fourteenth of July, a hundred thousand men rose up and said, with that assurance which belongs to the popular will, as it does to the will of God: "It shall be done!"

Deputies went to the Mayor of Paris, in the name of these hundred thousand laborers, and it was agreed that the volunteers should work by night, in order not to interfere with those who worked by daylight.

The same evening, at seven o'clock, a cannon-shot announced that the task of the day was finished, and that the night's work would begin. At this sound the Champ de Mars was invaded from its four sides, — from the side of Grenelle, of the river Seine, of Gros Caillou, and of Paris.

Each workman bore some implement, — a hoe, shovel, wheelbarrow, or pickaxe.

Others rolled along casks of wine, to the accompaniment of violins, guitars, drums, and fifes.

All ages, both sexes, and all sorts and conditions of men mingled in the crowd, — citizens, soldiers, curates, monks, actresses, fine ladies, Dames from the Market-place, Sisters of Charity, together with many others who could handle a pickaxe, trundle a barrow, or drive a wagon. Children marched ahead, bearing torches. Bands followed, playing on all sorts of instruments; and sounding above all this noise, all this hubbub, all these instruments, might be heard the Ça ira, chanted by an immense choir of a hundred thousand voices, to which responded three hundred thousand voices, coming from all parts of France.

Among the most earnest workers two were noticeable, who arrived first, and wore their uniforms, as deputies to the great Federation.

One was a man forty years old, of robust and muscular proportions, but gloomy face. He sang not, and hardly talked.

The other was a young fellow of twenty, with a frank and smiling countenance, big blue eyes, white teeth, blond locks, standing square on his great feet and straightening his broad knees. With his large hands he lifted enormous weights. He constantly pushed wagons and handcarts, always singing, and without once stopping to rest. He watched his companion, out of the corner of one eye, and occasionally addressed a few words to him, which the older man did not answer. He brought him a glass of wine, but it was thrust aside; and so the younger man returned to his own place, shrugged his shoulders, and again put himself to work like ten men, while he sang like twenty.

These two men were two deputies from the new department of Aisne, only some ten leagues from Paris. Hearing that strong arms were needed, they hastened to offer their services, — one for silent work, the other for brisk and joyous co-operation. These two men were Billot and Pitou.

Let us see what was taking place at Villers Cotterets during the third night after the arrival of these two men at Paris, — that is, on the night of the Fifth and Sixth of July, at the very time when they were doing their best in the midst of so many laborers.

CHAPTER XXII.

WHEREIN ONE SEES WHAT HAS HAPPENED TO CATHERINE, BUT NOT WHAT WILL BECOME OF HER.

DURING that night, of the Fifth and Sixth of July, about eleven o'clock, Raynal, who had gone to bed, in the hope of sleeping the livelong night, — a hope often deceptive with physicians and surgeons, — Doctor Raynal, we say, was awakened by three vigorous blows at his door.

As we know, it was the Doctor's custom, when anybody rapped or rung for him in the night, to go to the door himself, in order to come into quicker contact with whoever demanded his services.

This time, as always, he jumped out of bed, slipped on his dressing-gown, put on his slippers, and descended the narrow stairway as rapidly as possible.

However diligent the Doctor's movements, they doubtless appeared very slow to the nocturnal visitor; for this visitor began to rap again, and this time his blows were without number or limit, when suddenly the door opened.

The Doctor recognized the lackey, who had come on a certain previous night to take him to Isidore de Charny's, and exclaimed: "Oh ho! Are you here, my friend? I do not say it by way of reproach, you understand, but if your master is wounded again, he will have to be very careful. It is not well for him to go into neighborhoods where it rains bullets."

"No, Monsieur, it is not for my master, nor even for a wound, but for something very different, and not less pressing. Finish your toilet. Here is a horse, and you are waited for."

The Doctor never wanted more than five minutes for his toilet. This time — judging by the tone of the lackey's voice, and particularly by the way in which he had knocked, that a physician's presence was urgent — he was dressed in four minutes.

"Here I am!" he said, reappearing almost as soon as he had disappeared.

Without dismounting, the lackey offered the bridle of the extra horse to Doctor Raynal, who climbed at once into the saddle; but instead of turning to the left from the house, as on the former occasion, he turned to the right, following the lackey, who pointed out the road, which was in the direction exactly opposite to that which led to Boursonnes.

They crossed the park and entered the forest, leaving Haramont on the left, and soon found themselves in a very uneven part of the woods, where it was difficult to proceed on horseback.

All at once a man sprang from behind a tree. "Is it you, Doctor?" he asked.

The Doctor reined in his horse, ignorant of the newcomer's intentions; but at these words he recognized the Viscount, and replied: "Yes, it's I. Where the Devil are you taking me to, Monsieur?"

"You 'll see," said Isidore. "I beg you to dismount and follow me."

The Doctor dismounted, and said, as he began to understand the situation: "Ah ha, it 's a case of confinement, I see!"

Isidore grasped his hand. "Yes, Doctor; and you will positively promise me to keep silence, will you not?"

The Doctor shrugged his shoulders, as much as to say: "Oh Lord, be easy! I've been there before!"

"Then come this way," said Isidore, replying to the Doctor's unspoken words.

Amidst the holly-bushes, treading on the dry and rustling leaves, the travellers were soon lost in obscurity, under gigantic beeches, through whose tremulous leafage they from time to time perceived the scintillation of a star; and thus the two men descended into the depths of the forest, where, as we have said, horses could not penetrate.

Presently the Doctor could see the height of Clouise Rock, and exclaimed: "Oh ho! Is it to Goodman Clouis's hut we are bound?"

"Not exactly, but very near it."

Walking around the immense rock, he led the way to the door of a little brick building, a sort of lean-to against the old gamekeeper's hut, so built that an observer might well believe, — as was generally believed in the neighborhood, — that the good man, for his own convenience, had added an annex to his lodge.

Apart from the fact that Catherine was lying prostrate on a bed, any observer would have been undeceived at the first glance into the interior of that little chamber.

A pretty paper covered the walls, and the woollen window-curtains were similar in pattern to the paper. Between the two windows was a handsome mirror, beneath which was a dressing-table, furnished with all sorts of toilet utensils, in porcelain. There were two chairs, two armchairs, a small sofa, and a diminutive bookcase. Such was the interior, — pretty comfortable, as one would say, even to-day, — which disclosed itself to view, as one entered the little room; but the good Doctor's glance did not rest on all this. He saw the woman on the bed, and went straightway to her relief.

Perceiving the Doctor, Catherine hid her face in her hands; but she could not repress her sobs or conceal her tears.

Isidore approached, and called her by name. She threw herself into his arms.

"Doctor," said the young man, "to you I confide the honor and life of one who is to-day my mistress, but who, I hope, will some day be my wife."

"Oh, thou art good, my dear Isidore, to say such things to me; but thou knowest well how impossible it is, for a poor girl like me ever to be the Viscountess. None the less I thank thee. Thou knowest I shall need strength, and it is thy wish to give it me. Be calm! I shall have courage; and the first manifestation of it, — the greatest I can display, — is to show you my uncovered face, dear Doctor, and offer you my hand;" and she at once extended her hand to Doctor Raynal.

A pain, more violent than any she had before felt, made Catherine clinch her hand the instant it touched the Doctor's; and he made a sign to Isidore, who understood that the decisive moment had come.

The young man knelt by Catherine's bedside, and said: "My darling child, perhaps I ought to remain here, to sustain and encourage thee, though I fear my strength would fail; but if thou desirest —"

Catherine put her arm about Isidore's neck, saying: "Go, go! I thank thee for loving me so much, that thou canst not bear to see me suffer."

Isidore pressed his lips lovingly to hers, shook the Doctor's hand, and hurried out of the room.

For two hours he wandered, like the ghosts of whom Dante speaks, who could not stop for a single instant's repose; or, if they did pause, were at once spurred into motion, by a demon with an iron trident. After taking a circuit, more or less extended, he invariably returned to that door, behind which the sorrowful mystery of childbirth was taking place; but whenever Catherine uttered a cry loud enough for him to hear, it pierced him like the demon's iron prongs, and forced him to resume his errant course, going once more to the same point, from which he inevitably returned again.

In the midst of the darkness he heard himself called by the Doctor, and also by a voice more sweet and feeble. In two bounds he was at the door, which was open this time; and on the threshold of which the Doctor stood, holding an infant in his arms.

"Alas, alas, Isidore!" said Catherine. "Now I am doubly thine, — as thy mistress, and also as the mother of thy babe."

A week later, at the same hour, on the night of July 13, that door again opened. Two men came out, bearing a woman and child in a litter, escorted by a young man on horseback, who urged the bearers to the greatest precautions. On reaching the highway, between Haramont and Villers Cotterets, they found there a berlin, drawn by three horses, in which they placed the mother and babe.

The young man dismounted, threw the bridle to the domestic, to whom he also gave some orders, and entered the vehicle, which, without stopping at Villers Cotterets, or even passing through it, drove along by the park, as far as the Pheasantry, at the end of the Rue Largny, whence it started at a round trot for Paris.

Before their departure, however, the young man had left a purse of gold at the disposal of Father Clouis, and the young woman had left a letter, addressed to Pitou.

Doctor Raynal had decided, in view of the rapid convalescence of the mother, and the good constitution of the infant, which was a boy, that the journey, from Villers Cotterets to Paris, might be made without detriment, in a comfortable carriage. It was in virtue of this assurance that Isidore decided upon the trip, which was, moreover, rendered imperative by the speedy return of Billot and Pitou.

God — who, up to a certain moment, watches over those whom he afterward seems to abandon — had permitted her confinement to take place in the absence both of Billot, still ignorant of his daughter's retreat, and of Pitou, innocently unsuspicious of Catherine's maternal condition.

Towards five o'clock in the morning, the vehicle arrived at the Saint Denis Gateway, but could not cross the boulevard, because of the blockade occasioned by the holiday.

Catherine ventured to thrust her head outside the curtain; but she instantly withdrew it, uttering a cry, and hid her face in Isidore's bosom.

The first two persons whom she saw, among the federal delegates, were Billot and Pitou.

CHAPTER XXIII.

JULY 14, 1790.

THE work necessary to convert an immense plain into an immense valley, between two hills, was completed, thanks to the co-operation of all Paris, on the eve of the Thirteenth of July.

Many of the laborers, in order to secure places for the next day, slept there over night, like victors couching on the battlefield.

Billot and Pitou joined the federal delegates, and took their places in the midst of their brethren on the boulevard. As we have seen, chance assigned these deputies from the Aisne Department a position opposite the point where the carriage halted, which was bringing Catherine and her babe to Paris.

This line, composed wholly of federal delegates, reached from the Bastille to the Boulevard Bonne Nouvelle.

All did their best to receive these welcome guests. When it was known that the Bretons, those eldest sons of liberty, had arrived, the vanquishers of the Bastille marched in front of them, as far as Saint Cyr, and constituted themselves their entertainers.

There was a singular glow of disinterestedness and patriotism.

The innkeepers came together, and with one accord agreed to lower their prices, instead of raising them. So much for disinterestedness!

The journalists, those tournament-fighters of these latter days, who constantly embitter, instead of allay, the general spirit of hatred, — these journalists — two of them, at least, Loustalot and Camille Desmoulins — proposed a federal compact between the scribblers. They renounced all competition, all jealousy. They promised, in future, only to cultivate that emulation which is for the public good. So much for patriotism! Unhappily this proposition found no echo in the press; and it remained for that time, as for the future, a sublimely Utopian suggestion and a dead letter.

On its side, the Assembly imbibed a portion of that electric concussion, which shook France like an earthquake. Several days before the festival, under the lead of Montmorency and Lafayette, the Assembly abolished hereditary titles of nobility, which were defended by the Abbé Maury, the son of a village cobbler.

As long ago as the month of February, the Assembly had begun by abolishing hereditary responsibility for crime, or bills of attainder. As a result of the hanging of the brothers Agasse, condemned for forging bills of commerce, it was decided that the scaffold should not cast a blight over either the children or other relatives of criminals.

On the same day when the Assembly abolished the hereditary transmission of privileges, as it had already abolished transmitted criminal responsibility, a German from the borders of the Rhine, — a Prussian baron, born at Clèves, a man who had exchanged his baptismal names, John Baptist, for Anacharsis, Anacharsis Clootz, — presented himself at the bar of the Assembly, as a Deputy from the Human Race. He was the leader of a score of men, — all political exiles, dressed in their respective national costumes, — who came to demand, in the name of all races of people, — the only legitimate sovereigns, — a place in the great federation. A place was duly assigned to the Orator and Delegates of the Human Race.

The influence of Mirabeau made itself felt in these days. Thanks to this powerful champion, the Court gained many adherents, not only in the ranks of the right, but also in the left benches of the Assembly, — not only among Royalists, but among the Jacobins; for the King had been growing unpopular with both parties. The Assembly voted him — we might almost say, with enthusiasm — a civil list, or income, of twenty-five million francs, and also a dower of four millions for the Queen.

This liberality recompensed them for the two hundred and eight thousand francs wherewith they had paid all the debts of their eloquent defender, Mirabeau, and the six thousand francs salary which he was to receive from the Crown every month.

It appeared that Mirabeau was not deceived as to the spirit abroad in the provinces. Those federal delegates, who were received by Louis Sixteenth, brought to Paris their enthusiasm for the National Assembly; but their feeling towards the Crown was a religion. They lifted their hats to Monsieur Bailly, and cried, "Long live the Nation!" but they bent the knee before Louis, and laid their swords at his feet, crying, "Long live the King!"

Unhappily the King, not very poetic or chivalrous, responded clumsily to this hearty enthusiasm.

Unhappily the Queen was too haughty, — too Lorrainish, so to speak, — to rightly estimate these testimonials, coming straight from the soul. Besides, poor woman, she had a great sorrow in the depths of her heart, like one of those dark spots which speck the sun.

This spot, this ulcer which gnawed into her heart, was the absence of Charny, who certainly was able to return, but chose to remain with the Marquis de Bouillé, at Metz; though she knew not his whereabouts.

For a moment, when she met Mirabeau, she had an idea of seeking distraction, by coquetting with him. His powerful genius flattered her self-respect, both royal and feminine, by bending at her feet; but after all, what is genius to the heart? Of what value, to the passions, are the triumphs of self-respect, the victories of pride?

After all, the Queen could only see Mirabeau with a woman's eyes, could see in him but the material man, — the man with unwholesome corpulence, his cheeks furrowed, creased, torn, and distorted with the smallpox, his eyes red and his neck swollen.

She immediately compared him with Charny,—Charny, the elegant gentleman, in the flower of his age, the maturity of his beauty. Charny, in his brilliant uniform, was like a prince of battles; whereas Mirabeau, in whatever costume, except when genius animated his powerful figure, looked like some sensual monk in disguise.

She shrugged her shoulders. With eyes red with tears and sleeplessness, she sighed deeply. She tried to pierce the distance, and with a mournful voice, full of sobs, she murmured, "Charny, Charny!"

At such moments what mattered, to this woman, the assembled population at her feet? What mattered the great waves of men, driven, like the sea, by the four winds of heaven, beating against the steps of the throne, and murmuring, "Long live the King! Long live the Queen!"

If a familiar voice could but have murmured in her ear:

"Marie, nothing is changed with me! Antoinette, I love thee!" this voice would have made her forget that anything was different around her, and would have contributed more to her heart's delight, and the serenity of her countenance, than all these shouts, all these promises, all these oaths.

The Fourteenth of July crept along imperceptibly, bringing with it events, great and little, which make up the history of both the humble and the exalted, of kings and common folks.

As if this disdainful Fourteenth of July did not know it was to witness an unprecedented, novel, and splendid spectacle, it came on with a face veiled with clouds, the wind soughing and the rain falling; but one quality of the French people is to laugh at everything on feast-days, — even at the storm.

As early as five in the morning the boulevards were crowded with Parisian National Guards and federal delegates, soaked with rain and dying with hunger, but laughing and singing.

Though they could not save these gallant fellows from the rain, the Parisians caught the idea of at least curing their hunger. From the windows, bottles of wine, loaves of bread, and hams were lowered by cords. In all the streets through which they marched it was the same.

While the procession was in progress, a hundred and fifty thousand persons took their places on the hillocks in the Champ de Mars, and a hundred and fifty thousand more stood behind them.

As to the amphitheatres of Chaillot and Passy, they were crowded with spectators, whom no man could number.

Magnificent field, gigantic amphitheatre, splendid arena, where was symbolized the Federation of France, and where the Federation of the World will take place some day. Whether we see that day or not, what matters it? Our sons will see it! The world will see it!

One great human error is the notion that the whole world is for our short lives; whereas times and seasons are composed of a chain of human lives, each link infinitely short, ephemeral, almost invisible, — except to the divine eye, which embraces the period, longer or shorter, during which Providence (that four-breasted Isis who watches over the nations) disentangles the mysterious web and evolves the incessant genesis.

Certainly those who were there expected to detain, by her two wings, the fugitive goddess, whom we call Liberty, — a goddess who escapes and disappears, only to reappear, each time more proud and brilliant; but they deceived themselves, — as their sons deceive themselves, if they believe Liberty lost forever.

What joy, what confidence possessed that waiting crowd, seated or standing, as well as the long procession which, crossing the river, over the wooden bridge built in front of Chaillot, invaded the Champ de Mars, through a triumphal arch.

When the federal battalions entered, they uttered great cries of enthusiasm, and perhaps also of admiration at the picture which met their eyes, — cries which escaped from the heart through the lips.

Indeed, no such spectacle had ever before greeted the human gaze.

In half a month the Champ de Mars had been transformed, as if by enchantment, from a plain into a valley, which measured a league in circumference.

On the quadrangular sides of this valley were standing or sitting three hundred thousand persons.

In the middle was the Patriot Altar, the Altar of our Country, accessible by four stairways, corresponding to the four faces of the obelisk which surmounted the altar.

At each angle of this monument was an immense censer filled with incense, which the National Assembly had decreed should henceforth burn for God alone.

On the four faces of the monument were inscriptions, announcing that the French people were free, and invoking other nations to share this freedom.

Oh, the great joy of our fathers at this sight, — which was so living, so profound, so real, that its echoes survive to our own day!

And yet the heavens were discoursing like Sinai's ancient oracles.

At each instant there were heavy sheets of rain, gusts of wind, black clouds, — prophetic of 1793, 1814, 1815. Then there were occasional sunbursts in the midst of the gloom, symbols of 1830 and 1848.

If a prophet had appeared, to reveal the future to this million souls, how would he have been received? As Calchas was received by the Greeks, and Cassandra by the Trojans; for on that day but two voices were heard, the voice of Hope, antiphonally responding to the call of Faith: "Lift up your hearts!" — "We lift them up unto Jehovah!"

In front of the buildings belonging to the Military School, at the farther end, galleries had been erected. These balconies, covered with drapery, and canopied with tricolored flags, were reserved for the Queen, the Court, and the National Assembly.

Two twin thrones, three feet apart, were designed for the King and for the President of the Assembly.

The King, appointed to be the supreme and absolute head of the French National Guard, for that day only, transferred his command to Lafayette; and Lafayette was therefore, on that day, the Generalissimo and Constable of six millions of armed men. His fortunes had reached their culmination. Greater than himself, their decline and extinction could not be retarded. On that day he was at his zenith. Like those fantastic nocturnal apparitions, projected upon the sky, which surpass all human proportions, he had grown disproportionately, only to dissolve into vapor, vanish, and disappear; but during that federative festival, everything was real, or had the power of reality.

There were personages present who would soon go into disgrace, the King whose head would soon fall from his shoulders, the Generalissimo, whose white horse's four feet would soon bear him into exile.

In this wintry rain, amidst these tempestuous squalls, beneath occasional rays of daylight, — hardly of the sun, — filtering through the sombre vault of the clouds, the procession of federal delegates marched into this immense arena, through the three openings of the triumphal arch. Behind this advance guard, so to speak, of some twenty-five thousand men, — who separated into two circular lines, to embrace the circuit of the arena, — behind them came the electors of Paris, the city officers, and finally the National Assembly. For all these bodies places had been reserved in the galleries, built up in front of the Military School, towards which these men marched in a straight line, opening only to flow around the Patriot Altar, like waves around a rock, reuniting again on the farther side; till at last the head of the procession reached the galleries, while its undulating body, like that of a huge serpent, extended back to the entrance.

Behind the electors, the city representatives, and the National Assembly, came the rest of the procession, — more delegates, military deputations, and local militia companies.

Each department bore its distinctive banner; but these local banners were united, enveloped, nationalized, by that grand girdle of tricolored banners, which spoke two words to the eyes and hearts of the people, Country and Unity, — words with which God's workers can do so much.

At the moment when the President of the Assembly ascended to his armchair, the King ascended to his also, and the Queen took her place in the tribune.

Alas, poor Queen! Her retinue was shabby enough. Her nearest friends had quitted her, through cowardice. Perhaps if they had known, thanks to Mirabeau, that the King had obtained twenty-five millions for his civil list, and the Queen a dower of four millions, some of these Royalist fugitives would have returned!

As for the one person whom her eyes vainly sought, Marie Antoinette knew that neither gold nor power could again draw him to her side. In his absence, her eyes longed at least to rest on the face of some devoted friend.

She asked for his brother Isidore, and wondered why the defenders of the Crown were not at their posts, near the King or at the feet of the Queen, inasmuch as royalty had so few partisans amidst that great crowd.

Nobody knew anything about Isidore de Charny; and if anybody had said, that just then he was conducting a little peasant-girl, his mistress, to a modest house on the declivity of the hill at Bellevue, every shoulder would have shrugged with pity, unless some heart had been pierced by jealousy.

Who knows, indeed, if this heiress of the Cæsars would not have given her throne and crown, would not have consented to be an obscure peasant, — the daughter of an obscure farmer, — to be once more loved by Oliver, as Catherine was loved by his brother Isidore?

These were the thoughts revolving in her mind, when Mirabeau, catching one of her dubious looks, — half like a ray from heaven, and half like a flash from a storm-cloud, — could not refrain from exclaiming aloud: "What can that lovely magician be thinking about?"

If Cagliostro had heard these words he might have responded: "She is thinking of that fatal machine which I caused her to see in a decanter, at the Château Taverney, and which she recognized one evening at the Tuileries, under the pen of Doctor Gilbert!" but he would have been mistaken, — this great seer, who so rarely blundered; for she was thinking of the absent Charny and his extinguished love.

Amidst the noise of five hundred drums, and two thousand other musical instruments, were heard shouts of "Long live the King! Long live the Laws! Long live the Nation!"

Suddenly there was a great silence. The King, like the President of the National Assembly, sat down.

Two hundred priests, clad in white albs, advanced towards the altar, preceded by the Bishop of Autun, Talleyrand, the patron saint of all oath-brokers, past, present, and future. On his lame foot he mounted the staircase leading to the altar, — a Mephistopheles, awaiting the Faust who was to appear on the Thirteenth Vendémiaire. A Mass, recited by the Bishop of Autun! Among so many bad omens, we have forgotten that one.

At that moment the storm redoubled its fury. One might imagine Heaven was protesting against the false priest who was about to profane the holy Sacrifice of the Mass, and to offer, as a tabernacle for the Lord Christ, a breast prophetically soiled with future perjuries.

The department banners and the tricolored flags drew nearer the altar, forming a breezy circle, whose thousand colors were violently agitated by a southeast wind.

When Mass was over, Talleyrand descended a few steps, and blessed the national standard, and the flags from the eighty-three departments.

Then began the sacred ceremony of taking the national oath. First, Lafayette took the oath, in the name of the National Guards throughout the kingdom. Second, the President of the Assembly swore, in the name of France. Lastly, the King swore, in his own name.

Lafayette dismounted from his horse, crossed the intervening space between him and the altar, ascended the steps to the altar, drew his sword, touched with its point the Book of the Gospels, and said, in a firm, decided voice: "We swear to be ever faithful to the Nation, the Laws, the King; to maintain, with all our might, the Constitution, decreed by the National Assembly and accepted by the King; to protect, in conformity with the laws, the safety of persons and property, the circulation of grain, and other articles of food, in the interior of the kingdom, the receipt of the public revenues, in whatever form they exist; to live united with all the French people, in the indissoluble bonds of fraternity."

There was a great silence during this oath. Hardly was it taken, when a hundred cannon thundered the signal to the neighboring departments.

The whole fortified city was ablaze with an immense flash, followed by the menacing thunder of human invention, — a thunder far superior to heaven's, if measured by its devastation, which long ago distanced the mischief caused by natural storms.

As the circles produced by a stone, thrown into the midst of a lake, grow larger and larger, till they are lost on its banks, so each circle of flame, each growl of thunder, enlarged itself, going from centre to circumference, from Paris to the frontiers, from the heart of France to foreign lands.

Then the President of the National Assembly arose in his turn, and all the members stood around him, while he said: "I swear to be faithful to the Nation, the Laws, the King, and to maintain, with all my might, the Constitution, decreed by the National Assembly and accepted by the King."

Hardly had he completed his oath, than again the flame broke forth, again the volleys thundered, and echoes upon echoes rolled to the farthest boundaries of France.

Then came the King's turn. He arose. Silence! Listen, all, to the voice in which he takes the national oath, — which he betrays in his heart, even while he is uttering it.

Have a care, Sire! The cloud breaks, the sky clears, the sun shines. The sun is God's eye! God sees you!

"I, King of the French, swear to use all the power delegated to me, by the State Constitutional Laws, in maintaining the Constitution, decreed by the National Assembly and accepted by myself, and to see the laws properly executed."

Oh Sire, Sire! Why, even on this occasion, did you prefer not to swear on the altar?

The Twenty-first of June might respond to the Fourteenth of July; Varennes might explain the riddle of the Champ de Mars.

False or genuine, however, this oath roused no less flame and thunder than the other two. The hundred cannon blazed, as they had for both Lafayette and the President of the Assembly. A third time the artillery of France bore this threatening notice to the kings of Europe: "Have a care! France is afoot! Have a care, for France means to be free! Like the Roman ambassador, who carried in a fold of his cloak both peace and war, France is ready to spread her cloak over the world!"

CHAPTER XXIV.

DANCING HERE.

It was an hour of great joy with the multitude. For an instant Mirabeau forgot the Queen, and Billot forgot Catherine.

The King withdrew, amidst universal acclamations. The members of the Assembly returned to their hall, accompanied by the same escort which had graced their arrival at the arena.

As to the flag, given by Paris to the veterans of the army, it was decreed — so says the History of the Revolution, by Two Friends of Liberty — that the flag should be suspended on the walls of the Assembly Hall, as a symbol, to coming legislatures, of the happy epoch just celebrated, and as a reminder to the troops, that they should be submissive to those two conjoint higher powers, the Crown and the Assembly, without whose concurrence the military strength must not be employed.

Did Chapelier, in making this proposition, anticipate the Twenty-seventh of July, the Twenty-fourth of February, and the Second of December?

Night came on. The festival of the morning had been at the Champ de Mars. The evening festival was at the Bastille.

Eighty-three trees, covered with foliage, — as many as there were departments in the kingdom, — stood in place of the eight towers of the prison, on the foundations whereof they were planted. Rows of lights were hung from tree to tree. In the middle rose a gigantic mast, bearing a flag, on which was the word LIBERTY. Near the ditches, in a tomb purposely left open, were interred the chains, instruments, and gates of the Bastille, together with that famous bas-relief from the old clock, representing enchained slaves. Moreover, there had been left yawning, and lighted in a lugubrious fashion, those basement dungeons, which had absorbed so many tears and stifled so many groans. If, finally, attracted by the music which sounded from amidst the trees, one found his way as far as the spot formerly occupied by the interior courtyard, there he found a ballroom, brilliantly lighted, above whose entrance were these words, which were but the fulfilment of Cagliostro's prediction :

DANCING HERE.

At one of the thousand tables set up in the vicinity, under the improvised forest, — which represented the ancient fortress almost as well as the little stones carved by Architect Palloy, — two men were recruiting their strength, exhausted by a whole day of marching, countermarching, and manœuvring. Before them were two bottles of wine, a four-pound loaf, and an enormous sausage. The youngest of the two wore the uniform of a captain in the National Guards; while the other, twice his age, wore the uniform of a federal delegate.

" By my faith," said the younger, emptying his glass at a single draught, " it is a good thing to eat when one 's hungry, and to drink when one 's thirsty." After a pause he asked : " Are you neither hungry nor thirsty, Father Billot ? '

"I have drunk and I have eaten," was the reply, "and I now hunger and thirst for only one thing."

"And what is that?"

"I'll tell thee, friend Pitou, when the hour comes for my banquet."

Pitou saw no malice in Billot's response. However, Billot had eaten and drunk very sparingly that day, as Pitou said, despite the fatigue of the festival, and the hunger which beset him. In fact, ever since his departure from Villers Cotterets, — notwithstanding his five days, or rather five nights, of labor in the Champ de Mars, — Billot had drunk and eaten very little.

Pitou knew that certain diseases, without being otherwise serious, temporarily deprive the most robust men of their appetites; and every time he noticed how little Billot ate, the lad asked him the reason, as he did now. Billot always answered that he was not hungry, an answer which satisfied Pitou.

There was one thing, however, which perplexed Pitou. This was not Billot's physical abstinence, for everybody is at liberty to eat or not to eat. Besides, the less Billot ate, the more remained for Pitou. What perplexed him was, the farmer's abstinence from speech.

When Pitou ate in company, he liked to chat. He had noticed that conversation is an aid to digestion, not a hindrance; and this fact had taken such a deep root in his mind, that when Pitou ate all alone, he aided his digestion by a song.

Pitou was not melancholy. He had no motive for being sad, but quite the contrary.

For a considerable time his life at Haramont had become very agreeable. As we know, Pitou loved Catherine, or rather he adored her; and I ask the reader to take this word literally. How is it with the Italian or the Spaniard, who adores the Madonna? To see Mary, to kneel before her, to pray to her, — that is his need.

What had Pitou been doing for six months? When night came, he went to Clouise Rock. There he saw Catherine, kneeled to Catherine, prayed to Catherine; and the girl, recognizing the service he had rendered her, allowed this to go on, although her gaze was always higher and farther away.

Sometimes there was a slight feeling of jealousy in the brave boy, when he brought Catherine Isidore's letters from the post, and carried back one of hers, directed to Isidore; but, take it for all in all, his situation was incomparably better than when he returned to the farm, after his first visit to Paris, and Catherine — seeing in him only a demagogue, an enemy of nobles and aristocrats — had shown him the door, telling him there was no work on the farm for such as he.

Blind to Catherine's maternal condition, Pitou had no misgivings lest their mutual relations should not last forever.

He therefore left Haramont with the greatest regret, though forced to go away by his superior grade, which bound him to set a zealous example; so he took leave of Catherine, recommending her to Father Clouis, and promising to return as soon as possible.

Pitou therefore left nothing behind to make him sorrowful; nor had he run against anything in Paris, to rouse this sentiment in his heart.

He found Doctor Gilbert, to whom he rendered an account of the use made of his twenty-five louis, and reported the vows and thanks of the thirty-three National Guardsmen, who had been clothed with the aid of those twenty-five louis; and Doctor Gilbert gave him twenty-five louis more, to be applied, not to the exclusive use of the Haramont National Guard, but to Pitou's own needs.

Pitou accepted these twenty-five louis simply and ingenuously. Whatsoever Monsieur Gilbert — who was a god in Pitou's eyes — saw fit to give, it could not be wrong to accept.

When God sent rain or sunshine, it never occurred to him to hold up an umbrella or a parasol, and repel the divine gifts. No, Pitou accepted both, and like the flowers, the plants, the trees, he found every gift profitable.

At this visit, after thinking an instant, Gilbert raised his handsome and thoughtful head, and said to Pitou: "I believe, my dear Pitou, that Billot has many things to tell me. Wouldst thou like, while I am talking with Billot, to visit Sebastien?"

"Yes, indeed, Monsieur Gilbert," cried Pitou, clapping his hands like a child, "I wish it awfully, but have n't dared to ask permission."

Gilbert reflected an instant. Then he took a quill, wrote a few words, sealed the letter, addressed it to his son, and said to Pitou: "Take a hack, and go after Sebastien. After what I have written, he will probably wish to make a visit. Thou wilt take him whither he wishes to go, wilt thou not, dear Pitou? Thou wilt wait at the door. He may make thee wait an hour, perhaps more, but I know thy good-nature; and, knowing thou doest me a service, thou wilt not be weary."

"Be easy," said Pitou. "I am never bored, Monsieur Gilbert. Besides, on the way I will get a morsel of bread, and if I am tired of waiting in the carriage, I can eat."

"A good idea!" smilingly responded Gilbert. "Only, hygiene says, it is not good to live by dry bread alone, but to drink while we eat."

"Then I will buy, besides the bread, a junk of hogs-head cheese and a bottle of wine."

"Bravo!" said Gilbert.

Thus encouraged, Pitou went down and hired a cab, and was driven to College Louis le Grand, where he inquired for Sebastien, who was promenading in the private garden. Pitou lifted the boy in his arms, as Hercules did Telephus. Having embraced him at his leisure, and set him down again, Pitou gave the boy his father's letter.

Sebastien kissed the letter, with that tender and respectful love which he cherished for his father, and then said · "Pitou, did my father tell thee that I was to go somewhere with thee?"

"Is it agreeable to thee to go with me?"

"Yes, yes," said the boy, quickly, "yes, indeed, it is agreeable, and thou wilt tell my father how eagerly I accepted."

"Good!" said Pitou. "It appears that this is a place where thou wilt be amused."

"It is a place where I have been only once, Pitou, but one to which I shall gladly return."

"In that case," said Pitou, "it's only necessary to notify Abbé Bérardier of thy going out, as the cab's at the door."

"In order to lose no time, dear Pitou," said the youth, "go thyself to the abbé, with my father's message. I will make my toilet, and rejoin thee in the courtyard."

Pitou carried the message to the principal, received a permit for Sebastien, and then went down into the courtyard.

The interview with Abbé Bérardier gave great satisfaction to Pitou's self-respect. For the first time the principal saw him, a poor peasant, sporting a helmet and armed with a sabre, and no longer wearing the breeches, which, on the day when the Bastille was captured, a year before, had made him the cause of such commotion in the school, as well by the clothing which he lacked, as by the arms which he bore.

To-day he wore a three-cornered hat, a blue coat with white lappels, short breeches, and had the epaulets of a captain on his shoulders. To-day he bore himself with the confidence derived from the respect of one's townsmen. To-day he presented himself as a federal delegate, with a right to proper deference; and Abbé Bérardier treated him accordingly.

By the time Pitou came down the stairs from the director's office, Sebastien, who had a private chamber, came down the staircase leading to it.

Sebastien was no longer a child, but a charming lad of sixteen or seventeen, whose face was framed in chestnut hair, and whose blue eyes shot forth their juvenile flame, bright as the golden rays of dawning day.

"Here I am!" he joyously said to Pitou; "so let 's go."

Pitou looked at him with such great pleasure, mingled with astonishment, that Sebastien was obliged to repeat the invitation; but at the second call, he followed the youth.

At the gate he said to Sebastien: "Hold on! Thou must be told that I don't know whither we 're bound. It 's for thee to give the address."

"Be easy!" said Sebastien; while to the coachman he added: "Rue Coq Heron, number nine, the first coach-way from the Rue Plâtrière."

This address meant absolutely nothing to Pitou; but he entered the cab after Sebastien, without any remarks.

"My dear Pitou," said the lad, "if the person upon whom I am going to call is at home, I may remain an hour, or even more."

"That 's all right," said Pitou, opening his big mouth, and laughing merrily. "That calamity was foreseen. — Here, coachy! Hold on!"

They were just passing a bakery. The hack stopped. Pitou got out, bought a two-pound loaf, and returned to the cab.

A little farther on, Pitou stopped the carriage again, before a wineshop. He went in, purchased a bottle, and returned to Sebastien once more.

Presently he stopped the carriage for the third time, in front of a pork-shop, where he bought a quarter-pound of hogshead cheese.

"There!" he said to the driver, "now go to the Rue Coq Heron as fast as you please. I 've got all I want."

"Good!" said Sebastien. "I see through thy plans now, and shall be easy on thy account."

The hack trundled along the Rue Coq Heron, not stopping till it reached number nine.

As they approached the house, Sebastien manifested a feverish and increasing agitation. He stood up in the carriage, put his head out of the window, and called out to the driver, "Go ahead, coachman! hurry up!" though it must be admitted, to the credit of the driver and his two plugs, that this adjuration did not quicken their pace a bit.

However, as everything reaches its end, — the streamlet flowing into the brook, the brook into the river, the river into the ocean, — the cab reached Rue Coq Heron, as we said before, and stopped at number nine.

Without waiting for the coachman, Sebastien opened the door, embraced Pitou for the last time, jumped to the ground, rang sharply at the door, which was opened, asked the porter for Madame de Charny, and, before the porter could answer, rushed towards the little pavilion.

The porter, seeing him to be so handsome and well-dressed a youth, did not try to stop him; but, as the Countess was at home, he contented himself with fastening the gate, after assuring himself that nobody was following the boy, and wished to come in with him.

At the expiration of five minutes, — during which Pitou attacked the lump of head-cheese with his knife, held his uncorked bottle between his knees, and crunched, with his fine teeth, the soft bread and its crispy crust — the porter opened the carriage-door, hat in hand, and addressed these words to Pitou, which he had to repeat twice: "The Countess de Charny begs Captain Pitou to do her the honor of coming in, instead of waiting for Monsieur Sebastien in the cab."

Pitou, as we have said, had to hear the words twice; but at the second hearing he had no reason for misapprehending them, and so he was compelled, with a sigh, to swallow his mouthful, to restore — to the paper in which it had been wrapped — that part of the hogshead cheese which had been already cut off, and prop up his bottle in an angle of the cushions, in order that the wine should not be spilled.

Then, quite dumfounded by this adventure, he followed the porter; but his surprise was great when he saw Sebastien in the antechamber, in company with a beautiful woman, who pressed him to her side, as she extended the other hand to Pitou, and said: "Monsieur Pitou, you give me such great and unexpected joy, in bringing Sebastien to me, that I wish to thank you for it in person."

Pitou stared, Pitou stammered; but Pitou did not take the hand extended to him by the beautiful and unknown lady.

"Take her hand, and kiss it!" said Sebastien. "My mother permits it."

"Thy mother?" said Pitou; and Sebastien nodded affirmatively.

"Yes, his mother," said Andrée, her looks radiant with delight, — "his mother, to whom you have brought her boy, after nine months' absence; his mother, who never saw him but once before, and who, in the hope that you will bring him here again, will not keep her secret from you, although this secret would make a great deal of trouble, if it were known."

When anybody appealed to Pitou's affections or loyalty, the brave fellow could always answer without trouble or hesitation. "Oh, Madame!" he cried, seizing her hand and kissing it, "be tranquil! Your secret is here!" and drawing himself up, he laid his hand on his heart, with a certain air of dignity.

"Meanwhile, Monsieur Pitou," pursued the Countess, "my son says you have not lunched. Go into the dining-room; and while I talk alone with Sebastien, — you will accord me that happiness, will you not? — you shall be served, and make up for lost time."

Saluting Pitou, with such a look as she had never once bestowed upon the richest noblemen of the Courts of Louis the Fifteenth and Louis the Sixteenth, she drew Sebastien across the parlor and into her bedroom, leaving Pitou, already quite stunned, to await, in the eating-room, the fulfilment of the promise she had made him.

In a few minutes this promise was indeed fulfilled. Two cutlets, a cold fowl, and a pot of preserves were placed on the table, near a bottle of bordeaux, a Venetian goblet, — its glass as fine as lace, — and a pile of porcelain China plates.

Despite the elegance of the service, we dare not say that Pitou did not regret his two-pound loaf, his head-cheese, and his bottle of wine with the green seal.

As he was cutting up the pullet, after having absorbed the two cutlets, the door of the dining-room opened, and a young man appeared, as if about to go through it, into the parlor.

Pitou raised his head, and the young gentleman looked down, each recognizing the other, and uttering a slight sound. "Ange Pitou!" said one. "Monsieur Isidore!" said the other.

Pitou rose, his heart beating violently. The sight of this young gentleman recalled the saddest emotions Pitou had ever experienced.

As for Isidore, the sight of Pitou recalled to his mind nothing except the obligations which Catherine had told him she owed the brave fellow. Of the love which Pitou cherished towards Catherine, Isidore had not the faintest idea, — a love which Pitou had been strong enough to transform into devotion. Consequently, Isidore came straight to Pitou, in whom, in spite of his double epaulets and his uniform, Isidore could only see (such is the force of habit) the peasant from Haramont, the poacher of Wolf Heath, the farm-boy at Pisseleu.

"Ah, Monsieur Pitou, is it you?" he said. "I am enchanted to meet you, and offer you my thanks for the services you have rendered me."

"Monsieur," said Pitou, with a firm voice, although he felt a shiver through his body, "I rendered those services to Mademoiselle Catherine, and to her alone."

"Yes, up to the moment when you knew that I loved her; but from that moment I claimed part of your help.

As in transmitting our letters, and building that little house at Clouise Rock, you must have expended something—" and Isidore carried his hand to his pocket, as if thus to question Pitou's conscience; but Pitou checked him.

"Monsieur," said he, with that dignity which one was occasionally astonished to observe in him, "I give my services when I please, but I do not ask pay for them. I repeat to you, those services were rendered to Mademoiselle Catherine. She is my friend. If she believes that she owes me anything, she will arrange the debt with me; but you, Monsieur, you owe me nothing, for whatsoever I did was for Mademoiselle Catherine, and not for you. You need offer me nothing."

These words, and especially the tone in which they were spoken, impressed Isidore, who then noted, perhaps for the first time, that the man who spoke wore a captain's uniform and epaulets.

"Indeed, Monsieur Pitou," he insisted, bowing slightly, "I do owe you something, and I have something to offer you. I owe you my thanks, and I offer you my hand. I hope you will do me the favor to accept my thanks and to grasp my hand."

Isidore's reply was so high-toned, and the gesture which accompanied it so lofty, that Pitou was conquered, and extended his hand. The ends of his fingers touched Isidore's, just as the Countess appeared on the threshold of the door leading into the parlor.

"Monsieur Isidore," she said, "you asked for me, and here I am."

Isidore bowed to Pitou, and accepted the Countess's invitation to enter the parlor. As he was about to close the door, doubtless in order to be alone with the Countess, Andrée took hold of the door, which thus remained half-open. This was evidently her intention. Pitou could therefore hear whatever was said in the parlor. He noticed that the door at the opposite end of the parlor, leading into the bedroom, was also open; so that Sebastien, although invisible to Pitou, could hear, as well as Pitou himself, what took place between the Countess and the Viscount.

"You asked for me, Monsieur?" said the Countess to her brother-in-law. "May I learn to what I owe the honor of this visit?"

"Madame, I yesterday received news of Oliver. As in the other letters which I have received from him, he charged me to lay his remembrances at your feet. He does not yet know when he will return, but he would be glad to hear of your welfare, — whether you wish to send a letter through me, or simply to charge me with your compliments."

"Monsieur, I have not been able, until now, to answer the letter written me by Monsieur de Charny when he went áway, because I do not know where he is; but I will gladly profit by your good-will, to send him my compliments, as a respectful and submissive wife. To-morrow, if you will take a letter to Monsieur de Charny, I will hold that letter ready for your convenience."

"By all means, write your letter, Madame," said Isidore; "only, instead of coming for it to-morrow, I will do so in five or six days. I have to make a journey, which is absolutely necessary. How long it will last, I do not know; but as soon as I return, I will call upon you with my respects, and receive your commissions."

Isidore bowed to the Countess, who returned the salutation, and doubtless showed him another way out; for in retiring he did not pass through the eating-room, where Pitou, having brought the pullet to reason, as he had previously done with the two cutlets, began to attack the pot of sweetmeats.

This jar had been long ago conquered, and left as dry as the bottle, from which Pitou had squeezed the last drops of bordeaux, before the Countess reappeared, leading Sebastien.

It would have been difficult to recognize the prim Mademoiselle de Taverney, or the grave Countess de Charny, in the young mother, — her eyes sparkling with joy, her mouth lighted with an ineffable smile, — who stood leaning on her boy. Under the tears of a happiness hitherto unknown, her pale cheeks had taken on a rosy hue, which surprised Andrée herself; for maternal love, which is half a woman's existence, had re-entered her heart during the two hours passed with her child.

Once more she covered Sebastien's face with kisses. Then she restored him to Pitou, pressing the rough fist of the brave fellow between her white hands, which seemed like marble, softened and warmed.

On his side, Sebastien embraced Andrée with that ardor which he put into everything he did; and which had cooled only for an instant towards his mother, by reason of that imprudent exclamation, which Andrée could not keep back, when he talked to her about Gilbert, nearly a year before.

During his solitude, in College Louis le Grand, during his long walks in the private gardens, the sweet maternal phantom had often reappeared, and love had returned little by little to the child's heart; so that when Gilbert's letter reached him, permitting him to go to his mother for an hour or two, under Pitou's guidance, that letter gratified the most tender and secret desires of his heart.

It was Gilbert's delicacy which had retarded this interview. If he conducted Sebastien to her himself, he knew his presence would deprive her of half the happiness of seeing her son; and if he intrusted the matter to anybody but Pitou, — that good heart and innocent soul, — Gilbert knew he should compromise a secret not wholly his own.

Pitou took leave of the Countess without asking any questions, without even looking inquisitively about. Leading Sebastien, who half turned back, to exchange kisses with his mother, they regained the cab, where Pitou found his head-cheese safely wrapped in its paper, and his bottle of wine still ensconced in its corner.

In this experience, as in the journey from Villers Cotterets, nothing had happened to sadden Pitou.

In the evening Pitou worked in the Champ de Mars, where he went also the next day, and again on the days following. He received compliments from Monsieur Maillard, who recognized him, and from Monsieur Bailly, to whom he made himself known. He again met Élie and Hullin, two conquerors of the Bastille, like himself; and he saw, without envy, the medals they wore in their buttonholes, to which he and Billot had as much right as anybody in the world.

At last, when the famous day arrived, he took his place in the ranks with Billot, at the Gate Saint Denis, in the morning. From the ends of three different strings, hanging from hospitable windows, Pitou detached a ham, a loaf, and a bottle of wine.

He went near the high Altar of Patriotism, where he danced the farandole, holding an actress from the opera with one hand, and a Bernardine nun with the other. When the King entered, Pitou returned to his place; and he had the satisfaction of seeing himself represented by Lafayette in the oath-taking, which Pitou felt to be a great honor.

When the oaths were all taken, the guns fired, the flourish of trumpets over, and Lafayette, on his white horse, passed along the line of his dear comrades, Pitou had the great satisfaction of being recognized by his General, and getting one shake of the hand, out of the thirty or forty thousand which Lafayette distributed along his way.

After this, Pitou left the Champ de Mars with Billot. They stopped to see the games, illuminations, and fire-works on the Champs Élysées. They walked along the boulevards; and then, in order not to lose any of the diversions of the great day, instead of going to bed, as anybody else would have done, — whose legs would have fairly doubled up with weariness, — Pitou, who never knew what it was to be weary, came to the Bastille, where he found an unoccupied table in one corner, upon which he had ordered two loaves of bread, two bottles of wine, and a sausage.

He did not know, when Isidore announced an absence of several days, that Isidore would pass this time in Villers Cotterets. He did not know that, six days later, Catherine was brought to bed with a boy, that she left Clouise Rock in the night; that she arrived in Paris with Isidore on that feast-day morning; that she uttered a terrified cry, when she saw Pitou and Billot from her carriage window, at the Gate Saint Denis.

Not knowing these things, he had nothing to make him sad. On the contrary, he found delight in his labor at the Champ de Mars; in his meeting with Maillard, Bailly, Élie, and Hullin; in the farandole, where he danced with a figurante and a Bernardine sister; in his kind recognition by Lafayette, and the squeeze of the hand he had the honor of receiving from the General; and finally in the fireworks, the illuminations, the Bastille display, and this table spread with bread, sausage, and two bottles of wine.

The one thing which saddened Pitou was the sadness of Billot.

CHAPTER XXV.

THE RENDEZVOUS.

As we have seen, at the commencement of the preceding chapter, Pitou was resolved to be as gay as possible himself, and dissipate Billot's sadness; so, as we have said, Pitou was determined to talk to Billot.

After a moment of silence, during which he appeared to be laying in a supply of words, — as a rifleman, before beginning to shoot, provides himself with a store of cartridges, — Pitou broke the ice: "Tell me, Father Billot, who the Devil would have guessed, only a year and two days ago, when Mademoiselle Catherine gave me a louis, and cut the cords which bound my hands, — with this very knife, — hold on, here it is! — who would have expected, I say, that in only one year and two days so many events would turn up?"

"Nobody!" answered Billot, but without our Pitou's noticing what a terrible look shot from the farmer's eyes, when Catherine's name was mentioned.

Pitou waited, to see if Billot would not add a few syllables more, to the one solitary word wherewith he responded to the lad's long paragraph, which seemed to Pitou to be passably well turned.

Seeing that Billot maintained his silence, Pitou, like the rifleman already mentioned, reloaded his piece, and fired a second time.

"Say now, Father Billot, who would have said, when you ran after me over Ermonville Plain; when you almost broke Cadet all up, and made me do so too, as you overtook me, called my name, and compelled me to mount your crupper; when you changed horses at Dammartin, in order to get the quicker to Paris; when we reached Paris in time to see the barriers afire; when we were hustled in the Faubourg Villette, by the German fellers; when we met a procession shouting long life to Necker and Orleans; when you had the honor of carrying one staff of a platform, on which were the busts of those two great men, while I was trying to save Margot's life; when the Royal German Regiment fired upon us in the Square Vendôme, and the bust of Monsieur Necker tumbled on your head; when we escaped down the Rue Saint Honoré, calling, 'To arms! They are assassinating our brothers;' — who, I say, would then have supposed that we should capture the Bastille?"

"Nobody!" replied the old farmer, as laconically as before.

"The Devil!" said Pitou to himself, after waiting an instant. "It appears that this is all on one side. — Well, here goes for a third volley!"

Then he went on aloud: "Say, Father Billot, who would have believed, when we took the Bastille, that a year and a day afterwards I should be captain, and you a federal delegate; and that we should be supping together, the two of us, — me, especially, — under this fortress of leaves, planted just here, where the old fortress stood? Hey? Who would have believed it?"

"Nobody!" repeated Billot, with a more melancholy air than ever.

Pitou saw there was no way of making the farmer talk; but he consoled himself with the thought that he had not parted with the right to talk himself. He therefore kept on, leaving Billot the right to respond whenever it pleased him.

"When I remember, it is just a year since we entered the Hôtel de Ville; that you took Monsieur de Flesselles, — poor Flesselles, where is he now, and where is the Bastille? — that you took him by the collar; that you made him furnish you with powder, while I mounted guard at the door, — and, besides the powder, a note to Monsieur Delaunay; that after the powder was distributed, we quitted Monsieur Marat, who went to the Hôtel des Invalides, while we two came to the Bastille; that at the Bastille we found Monsieur Gonchon, — the Mirabeau of the People, as they called him — Do you know what has become of Monsieur Gonchon, Father Billot? Hey? Don't you know what has become of him?"

Billot this time contented himself with a negative shake of the head.

"You don't know?" continued Pitou. "Neither do I. Perhaps there has happened to him, what has happened to the Bastille, what has happened to Monsieur de Flesselles, — what will happen to us all," philosophically added Pitou: "Pulvis es et in pulverem reverteris, — Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return! — It was through the gateway which stood right there, but is there no longer, that you entered the Bastille, after making Monsieur Maillard write the famous billet, which I was to read to the people, if you did not reappear. There, where those old chains and handcuffs are, in that great hole which resembles a ditch, — that is where you met Monsieur Delaunay. Poor man, I can see him now, in his coat of unbleached linen, his three-cornered hat, with his red ribbon and his sword-cane! There is another, who has gone to find Flesselles!"

As Billot still maintained silence, Pitou kept on:

"Think of it! Why, Monsieur Delaunay showed you the old Bastille from bottom to top, while you studied it and measured it, — those walls, thirty feet thick at the base, and fifteen at the summit. Why, you climbed up one of the towers with him, and threatened to jump off with him, if he was n't very careful. To think, when you came down, that he showed you that piece of artillery, which, ten minutes afterward, would have sent me where Flesselles now is, — and poor Delaunay himself, — if I had n't found an angle of protection. Well, at last, after seeing all this, you said, — as if it were a matter of scaling a hayloft, a dovecote, or a windmill: 'Friends, let us take the Bastille!' And we did take it, that famous old Bastille, — took it so thoroughly, that to-day there is not one stone left on another; and here we are, sitting in the very place where it once stood, eating sausage and drinking burgundy, — sitting on the very spot where stood the tower called the Third Berthaudière, where Doctor Gilbert was shut up."

Still the farmer was silent, but Pitou continued his reflections: "What a singular affair it was! When I recall all that piece of work, all those shouts, those rumors, the noise — Hold on! Talking of noise, what 's going on over there? Say, Father Billot, something 's up! Somebody 's going by. Everybody's up! Everybody 's running! Come and see, with the rest of the world! Come, Father Billot, come on!"

Pitou passed his hand under Billot's arm, and started him up; and both went to the side whence the noise proceeded, — Pitou with curiosity, and Billot with complete indifference.

The noise was occasioned by one man, who had the rare faculty of raising a furor wherever he went.

In the midst of the noise was heard the cry, "Long live Mirabeau!" from a thousand vigorous throats, — the throats of men who are the last to change their opinions about leaders whom they have once fairly adopted.

It was indeed Mirabeau, who, with a woman on his arm, had come to visit the new Bastille. He was recognized, and this raised all the coil. The woman was veiled.

Anybody except Mirabeau would have been frightened at having such a crowd at his heels, especially as, amidst the glorifying voices, were heard some dull yet threatening cries, — such as followed the chariot of the Roman conqueror, when some one called out to him: "Cæsar, forget not thou art mortal."

Like a bird in the tempest, this man of storms seemed to belong in the midst of thunder and lightning. He walked through the tumult with a smiling face, with a calm eye and masterful gesture, still holding on his arm the unknown woman, who shivered before the breath of this terrible popularity. Doubtless, like Semele, the foolish creature had wished to see Jupiter; and here was his thunder, ready to consume her.

"Ah, Monsieur de Mirabeau!" said Pitou. "Here, it 's the Mirabeau of the Nobility. You recollect, Father Billot, it was just here that we saw Gonchon, the Mirabeau of the People, and I told you I did n't know how it was with the Mirabeau of the Nobility, but I found the Mirabeau of the People homely enough. Well, do you know, now that I 've seen both, I find one as ugly as the other? but this don't prevent me from showing my respect for so great a man."

Pitou stepped upon a chair, and from the chair to the table, hoisted his three-cornered hat on the point of his sword, and shouted: "Long live Mirabeau!"

Billot did not utter a sign of sympathy or antipathy.

He simply crossed his arms over his brawny breast, and murmured, in a melancholy tone: "They say he betrays the people!"

"Bah!" said Pitou. "They said as much of all the great men of antiquity, from Aristides to Cicero;" and with a full voice, more sonorous than before, he cheered for Mirabeau, till the illustrious orator disappeared, amidst a vortex of men, cries, and turmoil.

"That 's all right!" said Pitou, jumping down from his table. "I 'm very glad I 've seen Monsieur de Mirabeau. —Now let 's go and finish our second bottle, and get the better of our sausage!" and he led the farmer back to the table, where the remains of the repast, almost absorbed by Pitou alone, still awaited them. They found a third chair drawn up to their table; and a man was sitting in it, who appeared to be waiting for them.

Pitou looked at Billot, who looked at the Unknown.

True, this was a day of fraternization. Consequently, some familiarity was allowable among fellow-citizens; but in the opinion of Pitou, who had not yet finished the second bottle or devoured the whole sausage, this was a liberty almost as great as that taken with the Chevalier de Grammont, by an unknown gamester; only that person, whom Anthony Hamilton, the Count de Grammont's brother-in-law, called the Little Pumpkin, asked pardon of Grammont, for his great familiarity; whereas this Unknown asked pardon neither of Pitou nor Billot, but looked at them, on the contrary, with a humorous expression which seemed natural to him.

Billot was evidently in no mood to bear this look without explanation, for he walked quickly up to the Unknown; but before the farmer had time to open his mouth or make a gesture, the Unknown gave a Masonic sign, to which Billot at once responded.

The two men were not acquainted, it is true, but they were brothers. Besides, the Unknown, like Billot, wore the costume of a federal delegate; although, by certain peculiarities in that costume, Billot remembered that the man wearing it had been one of the group of strangers who came with Anacharsis Clootz, when they appeared at the festival, as deputies from the Human Race.

At this sign, made by the Unknown and recognized by Billot, the farmer and Pitou resumed their places. Billot even bowed his head, by way of salutation, while Pitou smiled graciously. As both seemed to question the Unknown by their looks, he was the first to speak.

"Brothers, you do not know me; but as for me, I know both of you."

Billot looked steadfastly at the Unknown; but the more outspoken Pitou said: "Bah! Do you then really know us?"

"I know thee, Captain Pitou; and I know thee, Farmer Billot."

"You 've hit it!" said Pitou.

"Why this gloomy air, Billot?" asked the stranger. "Is it because, having been a conqueror of the Bastille, and the first to pass through its portals, they have forgotten to hang a Fourteenth-of-July medal in thy buttonhole, and render thee such honors as have been this day paid to Maillard, Élie, and Hullin?"

Billot smiled, like a man misunderstood, and said: "Brother, if thou knowest me, thou must know that such a disappointment as that would not break my heart."

"Is it because, in the generosity of thy heart, thou didst try in vain to oppose the murder of Delaunay, Foulon, and Berthier?"

"I did what I could, and according to my strength, to prevent these crimes," said Billot. "More than once have I seen those victims in my dreams, but neither of them ever accused me of the crime of their taking-off."

"Is it because, on returning to thy farm, soon after the Fifth of October, thy granaries were found empty and thy fields fallow?"

"I'm rich," said Billot. "What matters the loss of a single harvest?"

The Unknown looked Billot full in the face, and asked: "Is it because thy daughter Catherine — ?"

"Silence!" said the farmer, grasping the Unknown's arm. "Don't talk about it!"

"Why not, — if I speak to thee in order to aid thy revenge?"

"That's a different matter!" said Billot, smiling and growing pale simultaneously.

Pitou forgot to eat and drink. He looked at this man, as one might gaze at a magician.

"Thy vengeance? How dost thou hope to accomplish it?" smilingly asked the Unknown. "Tell me! Is it by meanly killing one individual, as thou hast wished to do?"

Billot became livid, and Pitou felt a shiver run down his back.

"Or is it by pursuing his whole caste?"

"By pursuing them all," said Billot, "for the crime of one is the crime of all. As Monsieur Gilbert said to me, when I complained to him: 'Poor Billot! What has come to thee has already happened to a hundred thousand fathers! What would these young noblemen do, if they could n't lead astray the daughters of common folks, — or the old ones, if they could n't eat at the King's expense.' Doctor Gilbert is wise!"

"He told thee so, Gilbert?"

"Thou knowest him?"

The Unknown laughed and said: "I know everybody, as I do thee, — thee, Billot, the farmer of Pisseleu; as I know Pitou, captain of the Haramont National Guards; as I know the Viscount de Charny, Lord of Boursonnes; as I know Catherine."

"I have already bidden thee not pronounce that name, brother!"

"And why so?"

"Because there is no longer any Catherine."

"What has become of her?"

"She's dead!"

"No, she's not dead, Father Billot," cried Pitou, "for —"

Doubtless he would have added, "for I know where she is, and I see her every day;" but Billot repeated, in a voice which admitted no rejoinder: "She's dead!"

Pitou bowed. He understood. For others, Catherine might be alive; but to her father, she was dead.

"Ah!" said the Unknown, "if I were Diogenes, I should extinguish my lantern, for I believe I have found one man." Then he rose, and offered his hand to Billot, saying: "Brother, while this good fellow drinks his bottle and eats his sausage, come and take a turn with me."

"Willingly, for I begin to comprehend thy proposal."

Taking the arm of the Unknown, Billot added to Pitou: "Wait for me here! I'll come back!"

"Say, Father Billot," said Pitou, "if you're long away, I shall be bored; for I have only a half-bottle of wine left, a fragment of bread, and a bit of their famous sausage."

"All right, my brave Pitou," said the Unknown. "They know the measure of thy appetite, and they will bring something more, to make thee a patient waiter."

Sure enough. Hardly had the Unknown and Billot disappeared behind one of the walls of verdure, than another sausage, a second loaf, and a third bottle graced Pitou's table.

Though he did not understand what was going on, Pitou was anxious and surprised; but astonishment and anxiety, like every other emotion, made Pitou's stomach feel very hollow. He therefore felt, despite his astonishment and anxiety, an irresistible desire to do honor to the provisions brought him; and he was yielding to this desire with his accustomed ardor, when Billot returned quietly and alone, but with a joyful light in his face, and resumed his place at the table, opposite Pitou.

"Well now, what's the news?" he asked of the farmer.

"That thou wilt depart for home alone on the morrow, my boy."

"And you?"

"I? I shall remain here," said Billot.

CHAPTER XXVI.

THE LODGE IN RUE PLÂTRIÈRE.

If our readers wish, — a week having rolled away since the events just recorded, — if our readers wish, we say, to again meet some of the chief personages of our narrative, — personages who have not only played important rôles in the past, but will play these rôles in the future, — then our readers must place themselves with us, near the fountain in the Rue Plâtrière, wherein we used to see Gilbert, when he was a lodger at Rousseau's house, come and wet his dry bread.

Once near this fountain, let us watch and follow a man who will soon pass by, and whom we may recognize, not indeed any longer by his federal delegate's costume, — a costume which, after the departure from Paris of the hundred thousand provincial delegates, could not be worn without attracting greater attention to the wearer than our friend would desire, — but by the simpler costume, although quite as well known, of a well-to-do farmer, from the environs of the city.

Needless to tell the reader that this personage is no other than Billot, whom we may follow along the Rue Saint Honoré, past the gates of the Palais Royal, — which has resumed its nocturnal splendor since the return of Orleans, after his eight months' exile in London, — till the farmer takes the Rue Grenelle at his left, and turns unhesitatingly into the Rue Plâtrière.

As he reaches the fountain, where we are waiting for him, he pauses, hesitates; not that his heart fails him, — for those acquainted with the courageous farmer know perfectly well, that if he made up his mind to go to hell, he would go without a tremor, — but evidently because his information is imperfect.

Indeed, it is not difficult to see, — especially for us, who act as spies over his footsteps, — that he examines attentively every door, like a man who is bound to make no mistake.

Notwithstanding this careful examination, he goes nearly two-thirds the length of the street, without finding what he seeks. At that point the way is interrupted by wayfarers, gathered about a group of street musicians, one of whom sings, in a loud voice, a topical song on the events of the day, — a song which would not probably rouse any great interest, if one or two couplets, in each stanza, did not relieve the other verses, by their personal hits.

Among others was one song, called "The Riding School," which raised great merriment in the crowd. As the National Assembly occupied the building formerly used as a riding-school, not only were the different parties in the Assembly compared with the colors of the equine race, — whites and blacks, chestnuts and bays, — but different members of the Assembly were designated by epithets applicable to horses. Mirabeau was called the Petulant; Count Clermont Tonnerre was called the Skittish; Abbé Maury, the Balky; Thouret, the Bolter; Bailly, the Lucky.

Billot stopped an instant to listen to these attacks, more tart than witty, and then glided to the right, towards the houses, till he disappeared among the crowd.

He had possibly found what he sought, while amidst the crowd, for after thus leaving one side of the street, he did not return to the other.

Following Billot's footsteps, let us also see what the presence of the crowd now hides from us.

There is a low door, surmounted by three initials, traced in red chalk, which are doubtless the symbols of reunion for that night, and to be rubbed out to-morrow morning. These three letters are an L, a P, and a D.

This deep-set door seems like the entrance of a cave, from which you descend several steps into a gloomy lobby.

Doubtless the second direction confirmed the first; for after regarding these three letters with attention, — a sign insufficient for Billot, who could not read, it will be remembered, — the farmer went down the steps, counting them one by one as he did so, and boldly entered the passage-way at the bottom.

At the end of this passage a pale light trembled. In front of this light was seated a man, reading, or pretending to read, a newspaper.

At the noise of Billot's steps this man arose, placed one finger against his breast, and awaited the farmer's arrival.

Billot held out the corresponding finger, by way of reply, and then pressed it on his lips, like a padlock.

This was probably the countersign expected by the mysterious doorkeeper, for he pushed open a door at his right hand, a door entirely invisible when it was shut, and allowed Billot to see a steep and narrow staircase, which apparently plunged into the very earth.

Billot entered. Silently and swiftly the door closed behind him.

This time the farmer counted seventeen steps; and, in spite of the dumbness to which he was apparently condemned, he said, in a low voice: "Good! Here I am!"

A curtain hung before a doorway, a few paces in front of him. Passing to the right of this curtain he lifted it, and found himself in a large, circular, subterranean hall, where some fifty persons were already assembled.

Into this hall our readers descended fifteen or sixteen years ago, under the lead of Rousseau.

As in Rousseau's days, the walls were hung with red and white tapestry, into which were woven the compasses, square, and level.

A single lamp, hanging from the vaulted ceiling, threw a feeble light over the middle of the circle, and gave it a certain brightness; but this was insufficient to reach those who remained outside its circumference, not wishing to be recognized, perhaps.

A platform, accessible by four steps, was provided for speakers and candidates; and on this platform, in the part nearest the wall, was a solitary desk, and also an empty armchair, for the president.

In a few minutes the hall was so full, that it was almost impossible to move about. There were all sorts and conditions of men present, from the peasant to the prince. Each came in alone, as Billot had done. If they did not recognize the others, or were not recognized by them, the new-comers took their places as chance or convenience directed.

Each of these men wore, under his coat or overcoat, the Masonic apron, if he were simply a Mason, or the scarf of the Enlightened Ones, if he belonged to both bodies, — that is, had been initiated into the higher mysteries.

Only three men were without the latter insignia, and wore simply the Masonic apron. One of these was Billot. Another was a young man about twenty-two years old. The third was a man of forty-two, whose manners indicated him as belonging to the highest classes of society.

A few seconds after the last man had arrived, and without more ceremony than attended the entrance of the subordinate members of the association, a secret door opened, and the president appeared, wearing the insignia of the Grand Orient and of the Sublime Kophta.

Billot uttered a feeble cry of astonishment. This president, before whom all heads bowed, was no other than the federal delegate Billot had encountered at the Bastille.

The president slowly ascended the platform, and said, turning towards the assemblage: "Brothers, there are two things to be done to-day. I have to receive three new candidates. I have also to give an account of my work, from the day when I undertook it, until now; for this work becomes hourly more difficult, and it is your right to learn if I continue worthy of your confidence, and mine to learn if I still receive it. It is by receiving light from you, and imparting it to you in return, that I am able to march along in the gloomy and terrible work in which I am engaged. Now, let the chiefs of the order alone remain in the hall, while we proceed to the reception or rejection of the three applicants who come before us. When these three applicants have been either accepted or rejected, all the members may return to the meeting, from the first to the last; for it is in the presence of all, and not merely of the Supreme Circle, that I wish to report my conduct, and receive blame or praise."

At these words another door was opened, opposite the one which had already been disclosed. Through this second door could be seen extensive vaulted cellars, similar to the crypts of an ancient basilica. Like a procession of spectres, the crowd silently retreated beneath these arches, lighted here and there by copper lamps, whose light was just sufficient to "render darkness visible," — as the poet expresses it.

Three men only remained, — the three candidates, — who, as it chanced, were leaning against the wall, at equal distances from one another. All three looked at each other in astonishment; for then only did they learn who were to be the three heroes of the occasion.

At that moment the door by which the president had entered was again opened. Six masked men came in, and stood near the armchair, three on the right and three on the left.

"Numbers Two and Three will withdraw awhile," said the chairman. "Only the Supreme Chiefs are allowed to know the secrets which attend the acceptance or rejection of a brother Mason, who wishes to enter the higher order of the Enlightened."

The young man and the aristocratic-looking man retired to the corridor by which they first came in. Billot remained alone.

"Approach!" said the chairman, after an instant of silence, whose only purpose was to allow the two other candidates time to withdraw.

"What is thy name among the profane?" asked the president.

"François Billot."

"What is thy name among the elect?"

"Force."

"Where didst thou first see the light?"

"In the Friends of Truth Lodge, at Soissons."

"How old art thou?"

"Seven years;" and Billot made a sign indicating that he had been advanced to the grade of Master in the Masonic Order.

"Why dost thou desire to take a higher degree, and be received among us?"

"Because I have been told that this degree is one step nearer the universal light."

"Hast thou godparents?"

"Only the man who is now in front of me, who himself was the first to suggest my application;" and Billot looked straight at the presiding officer.

"What sentiments lead thee to desire to walk in the way which may be opened to thee?"

"Hatred of the mighty and love of equality."

"What will vouch for thy love of equality and hatred of the mighty?"

"The word of a man who has never broken that word."

"What has inspired in thee this love of equality?"

"The inferior condition in which I was born."

"What has led to this hatred of the mighty?"

"That is my secret, — a secret known to thee. Why dost thou wish me to repeat aloud, what I hesitate to say to myself?"

"Wilt thou walk, and wilt thou promise to persuade others to walk, in this way of equality, according to thy strength and ability?"

"Yes."

"According to thy strength and ability, wilt thou overturn every obstacle to the liberty of France and the emancipation of the world?"

"Yes."

"Art thou freed from prior engagements; or, if any engagements have been entered into, art thou ready to break them, if they involve aught contrary to the promises now made?"

"Yes."

The president turned towards the six masked men, and said: "Brothers, this is a true man. I, myself, invited him to become one of us. A great sorrow binds him to our cause, by the brotherhood of hate. He has already done much for the Revolution, and can do yet more. I can gladly vouch for him, for his past, his present, and his future."

"Let him be received!" said the six consulting voices, unanimously.

"Thou hearest?" said the president. "Art thou ready to take the oath?"

"Dictate the oath, and I will repeat it!" said Billot.

The chairman raised his hand, and slowly and solemnly said: "In the name of the crucified Son, swear to break all fleshly ties which now bind thee to father, mother, brothers, sisters, wife, kindred, friends, sweetheart, kings, benefactors, or any other being or beings to whom thou mayest have pledged, or shalt hereafter pledge, thy faith, obedience, gratitude, or service."

Billot repeated, with a voice as firm as the chairman's, the words which the latter had spoken.

"Now," said the president, "from this hour thou art freed from any so-called oath, made to the country and its laws. Swear also to reveal to the new chief, whom thou hast acknowledged, whatever thou hast seen or done, read or heard, learned or guessed, or shalt see, do, hear, read, learn, or guess, and to search out, as a spy, what is not apparent to the eye."

"I swear it!" repeated Billot.

"Swear to honor and respect poison, sword, and fire, as the promptest agents, sure and necessary, for purging the globe of all who try to debase truth, or snatch it from our hands."

"I swear it!"

"Swear to avoid Naples, Rome, Spain, and every country under the curse. Swear to flee from the temptation to reveal anything of what thou shalt see or hear in our meetings; for the lightning is not swifter to strike, than will be the invisible knife to find the traitor, wherever he may be hidden."

"I swear!"

"And now be thou Enlightened, in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost!"

A brother concealed in the shadow opened the door of the crypt, where the inferior members of the order were promenading, waiting for the triple reception to be over. The president made a sign to Billot, who went to join those with whom he was now affiliated, by the terrible oath he had taken.

"Number Two," said the chairman, in a loud voice, as soon as the door closed behind the new disciple.

The tapestry covering the lobby door was slowly pushed aside, and there entered the young man dressed in black. He let the tapestry fall behind him, and stopped on the threshold, waiting for the word which was to be spoken.

"Approach!" said the president, and the young man did so.

As we have already said, he was a young man of twenty or twenty-two years, who might have passed for a woman, so white and fine was his skin. His enormous and close-fitting cravat, which he alone wore at that epoch, might have suggested that the lightness and transparency of his skin was not principally caused by the nobility of his blood, but, on the contrary, that this whiteness arose from some unknown disease; for despite the great height of his cravat, his neck appeared relatively small. His forehead was low, and the top of his head appeared depressed. His hair, without being longer in front than it was the fashion to wear it, almost reached his eyes; and behind, it descended almost to his shoulders. There was an automatic rigidity about him, which made this young man, on the very threshold of life, appear like an envoy from the other world or a candidate for the tomb.

The president regarded him with some attention, before beginning the interrogation; but this look, of mixed astonishment and curiosity, did not make the young man lower his steady gaze. He waited.

"What is thy name among the profane?"

"Antoine Saint-Just."

"What is thy name among the elect?"

"Humility."

"Where didst thou first see the light?"

"In the lodge called Humanitarian, at Laon."

"What is thy age?"

"Five years;" and the candidate made a sign to show that he had reached the degree of Fellow Craft in Free Masonry.

"Why dost thou wish to take a step higher, and be received among us?"

"Because it is the instinct of man to aspire to the highest, and on the heights the air is purer and the light more brilliant."

"Hast thou some pattern before thy mind?"

"The Genevan Philosopher, the Man of Nature, the immortal Rousseau."

"Hast thou sponsors?"

"Yes."

"How many?"

"Two."

"Who are they?"

"Robespierre the elder and Robespierre the younger."

"With what sentiment seekest thou to enter the way which may open before thee?"

"With faith."

"Whither ought that way to lead France and the world?"

"France into greater liberty, and the whole world into enfranchisement."

"What wouldst thou give to lead France and the world to this end?"

"My life, which is all I own, having already given my property."

"Wilt thou walk, and persuade others about thee to walk, in this way of liberty and enfranchisement, according to the measure of thy strength and ability?"

"I will both walk in this way, and compel others to do so."

"According to thy strength and ability, wilt thou overturn every obstacle encountered on the road?"

"I will!"

"Art thou free from all entanglements; and if thou art under any engagements, contrary to the vows just made, wilt thou break those engagements?"

"I am free."

The chairman turned to the six masked men, saying: "Brothers, you have heard?"

"Yes," responded the six members of the Supreme Circle, all at once.

"Has he spoken the truth?"

"Yes," they again responded.

"Is it your opinion that he should be received?"

"Yes," they responded, for the last time.

"Art thou ready to take the oath?" demanded the chairman, of the candidate.

"I am ready," answered Saint-Just.

Word for word the president repeated the triple oath, which he had previously administered to Billot; and at each pause Saint-Just answered, with a firm and strident voice, "I swear!"

The oath taken, the same door opened, under the hand of an invisible brother, and Saint-Just retired, with the same stiff demeanor which characterized his entrance, leaving behind him not a tinge of doubt or regret.

The president waited till there was time to close the door of the crypt, and then called for Number Three.

A second time the tapestry was lifted, and the third applicant appeared.

As we said before, this was a man forty or forty-two years old, with a high color, a face almost pimpled, but breathing — despite these signs of vulgarity — an aristocratic air, mingled with a whiff of Anglomania, visible at first acquaintance.

His costume, although elegant, displayed something of the severity which was becoming fashionable in France, and the true source whereof was in the relations we had begun to have with America.

His step, without being really vacillating, was neither so firm as Billot's nor so stiff as Saint-Just's.

"Approach!"

The candidate obeyed.

"What is thy name among the profane?"

"Louis Philippe Joseph, Duke d'Orleans."

"What is thy name among the elect?"

"Equality."

"Where didst thou first see the light?"

"In Free Men's Lodge, Paris."

"What age art thou?"

"I have no longer any age," and the Duke made a Masonic sign, to show that he had been elevated to the dignity of the Croix Rose, or Rosy Cross.

"Why dost thou desire to be received among us?"

"Having lived always among the great, I desire now to live among men. Having lived always among enemies, I wish now to live among brethren."

"Hast thou sponsors?"

"I have two."

"How are they named?"

"Disgust and Hate!"

"With what special desire dost thou wish to enter the way which opens before thee?"

"The desire for vengeance."

"On whom?"

"On a man who has misunderstood me, a woman who has humiliated me."

"What art thou willing to give, in order to reach that end?"

"My fortune; more than my fortune, my life; more than my life, my honor."

"Art thou free from all other engagements; or if thou hast made any pledge, contrary to the promises now made, wilt thou break it?"

"Since yesterday, every other bond is broken."

"Do you hear, brothers?" said the chairman, again turning towards his masked associates.

"Yes."

"You know this man, who offers himself as a worker with us?"

"Yes."

"Knowing him, is it your mind that he be received into our ranks?"

"Yes, but he must take the oath."

"Knowest thou the oath which remains for thee to pronounce?" said the chairman to the Prince.

"No; but propose it to me, and I will take it, whatsoever it be."

"It is terrible, especially for thee."

"Not more terrible than the outrages I have received."

"So terrible, that, after having heard it, we declare thee free to depart, if thou doubtest, even at the last moment, thine ability to keep it, in all its rigor."

"Pronounce it!"

The president fixed his eyes on the candidate with a piercing look. As if to prepare the Duke gradually for the sanguinary pledge, he inverted the usual order of the paragraphs, beginning with the second instead of the first.

"Swear to honor steel, fire, and poison, as the surest agents, prompt and necessary, for purging the globe, by the death of those who seek to debase truth, and snatch it from us."

"I swear," said the Prince, in a firm voice.

"Swear to break all fleshly ties, which still bind thee to father, mother, brothers, sisters, wife, mistress, kindred, friends, kings, benefactors, or any other human being to whom thou mayest promise faith, obedience, gratitude, or service."

The Duke stood silent a moment, and cold sweat could be seen standing in pearls on his forehead.

"I have pronounced the oath to thee," said the president.

Instead of answering simply "I swear!" as he had done after the preceding paragraph, the Duke, as if to do away with any excuse for thereafter retracing his steps, repeated the whole oath, in a gloomy tone: "I swear to break all fleshly ties, which bind me to father, mother, brothers, sisters, wife, mistress, kindred, friends, kings, benefactors, and any other human being to whom I have promised, or may ever promise, faith, obedience, gratitude, or service."

After the third item of the oath, the president turned again to the masked men, who had been exchanging glances among themselves, so that their eyes could be seen, flashing through the openings in their masks.

Turning finally to the Prince he said : "Louis Philippe Joseph, from this hour thou art free from oaths made to country or law. Only, do not forget, if thou betrayest us, the lightning is not more sure in its blow, than will be the invisible and inevitable knife to find thy heart, wheresoever thou mayest be hidden. — Now, be thou Enlightened, in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost ! "

With his hand the chairman indicated the door into the crypt, which opened before the Duke.

Like a man relieved of a burden greater than he can bear, he passed his hand over his brow, breathed hard, and made an effort to move from his position.

"Ah," he cried, as he went into the crypt, "I shall at last be avenged."

CHAPTER XXVII.

THE ACCOUNT RENDERED.

LEFT by themselves, the chairman and the six masked men exchanged a few words in low tones.

Then Cagliostro called aloud: "Let all the brethren enter. I am ready to give the report I promised."

The door immediately opened, and the members of the association — who had been in the crypt, chatting in groups, or promenading in pairs — were admitted, and again filled their customary hall.

Hardly had the door closed behind the last member, than Cagliostro — like a man who knows the value of time, and is not willing to lose a second — held out his hand, and said in a loud voice: "Brothers, perhaps some of you assisted at the reunion which took place precisely twenty years ago, five miles from the borders of the Rhine, about two miles from the village of Danenfels, in one of the grottoes of Mount Thunder. If any of you were there present, will those venerable upholders of our great cause raise their hands, and say so."

Five or six hands were raised above the heads of the crowd, and five or six voices exclaimed, as the president had requested "I was there!"

"That is as it should be," said the speaker. "The others are dead, or dispersed over the face of the globe, doing the work of our brotherhood, — that holy work, which is for all humanity.

"Twenty years ago this work, which we are now to consider in its various episodes, had hardly begun. The day, which is now so bright, hardly reddened the east. The strongest gaze could not see the future, except through clouds, which the eyes of the elect alone could pierce.

"At that reunion I explained the miracle by which death — which is nothing, for any man, but forgetfulness of time's revolutions and passing events — exists not for me; for during the past twenty centuries I have been thirty-two times laid in the tomb, in the different bodily and transitory forms which my immortal soul has inherited, without that soul's losing consciousness, or reaching that state of forgetfulness which, as I have told you, is the only real death. Through all these ages I have followed the development of the Word of Jesus the Christ, the Anointed One, and seen nations pass slowly but surely from slavery to serfdom, and from servitude to that ambition which precedes liberty.

"As the stars of night begin to shine in the sky before the sun has fully set, so we have successively seen various European communities strive for liberty, — such communities as Rome, Venice, Florence, Switzerland, Genoa, Pisa, Lucca, Arezzo. Those cities of sunshine, where flowers open so quickly, where fruits ripen so early, have made, one after the other, a series of republican experiments, whereof only two or three survive to our day, and still brave the league of kings.

"But all these republics have been tainted with some innate sin. Some were aristocratic, some oligarchical, some despotic. Genoa, for example, one of the few which at present survive, is given over to the aristocratic idea. Within her own walls, her subjects are indeed equal citizens; but they consider themselves noblemen everywhere else. The Swiss have democratic institutions; but their small cantons, hidden among their mountains, can offer neither precedent nor aid to the human race.

"The great need is this, — a great country, which shall not merely receive the free impulsion, but impart it to others, — an immense machine, which shall entangle all Europe, — a flaming planet, which shall enlighten the world."

An approbative murmur ran through the assemblage; and Cagliostro continued, like one inspired: "I interrogate God, the creator of all things, the source of all progress, and I see his finger pointing me to France. France has been Catholic since the Second Century, national since the Eleventh, and a unit since the Sixteenth. The Lord himself, through his successors in the papal chair, has called France his eldest daughter, — undoubtedly indicating her right, in supreme moments of devotion, to offer herself on the cross of humanity, as did the Christ himself. Having tried all forms of despotic government, — feudal, lordly, monarchical, aristocratic, — France long ago appeared the most ripe for submission to our influences; and so we decided, — guided by a celestial ray, as the Israelites were led by a column of fire, — that France should first be liberated.

"Cast your eyes over the France of twenty years ago, and you will see that there was great audacity, or else sublime faith, in such an undertaking. Twenty years ago France, in the debilitated hands of Louis Fifteenth, was still the France of Louis Fourteenth, — that is, a great aristocratic kingdom, where all rights belonged to the nobles, and all privileges to the rich. At the head of the state was a man who represented at once the highest and lowest elements, the greatest and the smallest, God and the people. With a word this man could raise men to wealth or reduce them to poverty, could make them happy or miserable, could release them or imprison them, sentence them to life or death. This man, Louis Fifteenth, had three grandsons, three little princes, to inherit his throne.

"Fate so willed it that his successor, Louis Sixteenth, was not only designed by primogeniture for this position, but by the public voice also, — so far as there was any public voice at that time. He was said to be good, just, honest, unselfish, well educated, — almost a philosopher. In order to put an end forever to the disastrous wars which had been lighted in Europe, by the fatal succession of Charles the Second, the wife chosen for this man was the daughter of Maria Theresa. The two great nations, which were then the counterweights of Europe, — France, on the shores of the Atlantic, and Austria, on the shores of the Black Sea, — would thus be indissolubly united. This was well calculated by Maria Theresa, the brainiest political head in Europe.

"At that time, leaning on Austria, Italy, and Spain, France was about entering upon an untried but desired reign; and that was the time we selected, not to make France the first kingdom among many, but to make the French people the first among many nations.

"The sole question was, who would enter this lion's den? What Christian Theseus, guided by the torch of faith, would find his way through the twistings and turnings of this great labyrinth, and confront the royal Minotaur. Upon whom should this task devolve? Upon me, I answered. As some ardent spirits, with restless organizations, wished to know how long a time it would take for me to accomplish the first part of my work, which I divided into three periods, I demanded twenty years. They exclaimed at this. Do you understand?

For twenty centuries these men had been slaves or serfs, and they cried out in dismay when I asked for twenty years in which to make them free men!"

Cagliostro looked around upon his auditors, among whom his last words had provoked some ironical smiles.

Then he went on: "Finally the brethren granted me the twenty years asked for. I then gave them our notable device, Lilia pedibus destrue, and set to work, inviting all others to help me."

The Enlightened Ones, even if they did not all understand Latin, knew that this motto referred to the fleur-de-lis, the royal lilies of France, always to be found on the banners, shields, and arms of the Bourbon dynasty; and that the words might be translated thus: "Trample the lilies under foot!" or, more figuratively, thus: "Pluck up the lilies by their roots!" The idea involved was the destruction of French royalty; and for that end this secret order existed, with its awful annihilistic oaths.

Cagliostro went on: "I came to France amidst the shadows of triumphal arches. From Strasbourg to Paris, laurels and roses made a pathway of flowers and foliage. Everybody was shouting for long life to the Dauphiness, the future Queen of France. The hopes of the kingdom hung upon the fruitfulness of this saving marriage.

"Well, I do not arrogate to myself the glory of initiating all the stirring events which have since transpired, or the merit of their results. God was with me, and he permitted me to see his hand divine, holding the reins of his flaming chariot. God be praised! Some stones I have removed from the road. Rivers I have bridged, precipices I have levelled; and the holy chariot rolls over them, — that is all.

"Now, brethren, see what has been accomplished in twenty years.

"The Parliaments have been broken up.

"Louis Fifteenth, called the Well Beloved, died in the midst of general mistrust.

"The Queen, after being seven years barren, brought into the world children, whose legitimacy is disputed. At the time of the Dauphin's birth, her character was openly assailed; and as a wife, she was dishonored by the affair of the Diamond Necklace.

"The present King, bearing the sacred title of Louis the Long Desired, having the kingdom to sustain, but being as impotent in politics as in love, rushed from one Utopian scheme into another, till he reached bankruptcy, and changed from minister to minister, till he reached Monsieur de Calonne.

"The Assembly of Notables convened, and decreed the recognition of the States General, — the rank and file of the community. The States General, elected by universal suffrage, transformed themselves into the National Assembly. The Nobility and the Clergy were overborne therein by the Third Estate.

"The Bastille was captured. The foreign, hireling troops were driven from Paris to Versailles.

"The night of the Fourth of August showed the Aristocrats the end of their Old Nobility. The Fifth and Sixth of October showed to King and Queen the end of their Ancient Royalty. The Fourteenth of July, of the next year, displayed to the world the Unity of France.

"The other Royal Princes have lost their popularity, by emigration; and Monsieur has lost his, by the trial and condemnation of Favras.

"Finally, the Constitution has been adopted by oath, on the Altar of Patriotism, the President of the National Assembly occupying a throne equal to the King's, — the Law and the Nation being seated side by side. Listening Europe, silent and attentive, bends toward us. They tremble, who do not applaud.

"Brothers, has France become what I predicted, a mill to feed Europe, a sun to illumine the world?"

"Yes, yes, yes!" cried every voice.

"Now then, brothers," continued Cagliostro, "do you believe the work so far advanced that it can be left to itself? The Constitution is sacredly accepted; but do you believe we can trust the royal oath?"

"No, no!" shouted everybody.

"Then we must enter upon the second Revolutionary period of the great democratic work we have all undertaken.

"In your eyes, as in mine, — so I joyfully perceive, — the Federation of 1790 was not the end, but only a breathing-place on the road. Very well! A halt has been called, rest has been enjoyed; but the Court has set itself to work, to bring about a counter-revolution. Let our loins be girded about also, and let our lights be burning for the journey.

"Undoubtedly, for timid hearts, there will be anxious hours, moments of misgiving. Often the ray which lights our path will seem ready to die out altogether. The guiding Hand will seem to forsake us. More than once, in the long lane still before us, our party will seem compromised, — almost lost, — through some unforeseen accident, some fortuitous occurrence. Everything will seem to put us in the wrong, — unfavorable circumstances, the victory of our enemies, the ingratitude of our fellow-citizens. Many will ask themselves, — and those the most conscientious of our number, — after so much real effort, and so little apparent effect, if they are not on the wrong road, and engaged in a bad scheme.

"No, brethren, no! At this very hour, I tell you, no; and I would my word might sound eternally in your ears, — as a trumpet-blast in times of triumph, as a tocsin of alarm in the midst of defeat. No! I say.

"Popular leaders have a holy mission, which they must accomplish, providentially or fatally. The Lord who guides them has his own mysterious ways, not revealed to our eyes, save in the splendor of their accomplishment. Often clouds and darkness are round about him, and hide him from our eyes, and we believe him absent. Often a principle recoils, and seems beaten backward; when, on the contrary, it is like some old knight, in a tournament of the Middle Ages, who takes a step rearward, till he can put his lance in rest, and then rushes more fiercely upon his adversary.

"Brothers, brothers!. The end we seek is a beacon on a high mountain. A score of times, along the road, earthly catastrophes will cause us to lose sight of the beacon, and believe it extinguished. Then the weak will murmur, complain, pause, and say: 'We have no guide. We are marching in the night. Let us stay where we are. Why are we so misguided?' The strong will continue in the way, smiling and confident. Soon the beacon-light will reappear, only to vanish and reappear again, — each time more clearly defined and brilliant, as we near the goal.

"Thus fighting, persevering, believing, the world's chosen ones will at last arrive at the saving lighthouse, whose brightness must one day enlighten, not merely France, but all races.

"Let us swear, brethren, for ourselves and our descendants, — for perchance the eternal principle may require the service of several generations, — let us swear, for ourselves and for them, not to stop until we establish, in all the earth, the Christ's holy motto, of which a third only has been partly won : Liberty, Equality, Fraternity."

Cagliostro's words were followed by a burst of applause ; but, in the midst of bravos and cheers, a few words were heard, from a sharp and cutting voice, which fell upon the general enthusiasm like drops of icy water, from the side of a wet rock, falling upon a feverish forehead.

"Yes, we will swear," said the strident voice ; "but first explain what these three words mean to thee, that we, thy plain apostles, may be able to explain them in the same way."

Cagliostro's piercing glance alighted, like the reflection from a mirror, on the pale face of the Deputy from Arras, — Robespierre.

"So be it!" said Cagliostro. "Listen, Maximilian!"

Then, raising voice and hand at the same time, so as to be heard by the crowd, he added : "Listen, all of you!"

CHAPTER XXVIII.

LIBERTY ! EQUALITY ! FRATERNITY !

THERE came over the assemblage a solemn silence, which measured the importance attached to what was to be said.

"Yes, you have the right to demand of me a definition of Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity, and I will give it.

"Let us begin with Liberty. First of all, brethren, do not confound Liberty with Independence, for they are not two sisters, resembling each other, but two rivals, who hate each other. Nearly all races living among the mountains are independent; but I do not know of one nation, except the Swiss, which is truly free. Nobody will deny that the Calabrians, the Corsicans, the Scotch are independent; but no one dare call them free. If the Calabrian's whims are interfered with, or the Corsican's honor, or the Scot's interests, then the Calabrian, as he can have no recourse to law, — because there is no real law among an oppressed people, — the Calabrian appeals to his poniard, the Corsican to his stiletto, the Scotchman to his dirk. He strikes, his enemy falls, and the assassin is avenged. The mountain is there, to offer him an asylum; and in default of that liberty, vainly invoked by the dwellers in cities, he finds independence in deep caverns, dense forests, high cliffs, — that is, the independence of the fox, the antelope, and the eagle; but the eagle, antelope, and fox — unmoved, indifferent, unchangeable spectators of the great human drama, unrolling itself before their eyes, — are animals dependent upon instinct and destined for solitude.

"The early civilizations, antique and (we might say) maternal, the civilizations of India, Egypt, Etruria, Asia Minor, Greece, and Latium, uniting their science, religion, art, and poetry into one cluster of lights, which they held aloft, over the world, in order to illuminate its cradle, and be a beacon-light for the development of modern civilization, — these ancient civilizations, I say, still left the foxes in their holes, the antelopes on their cliffs, the eagles in their eyries.

"For these creatures also time passed, but they took no note of it. The sciences flourished, but with the eagle there was no progressive step. Nations rose, matured, and declined, but the fox knew nothing of these changes. Why? Because Providence has limited the circle of the faculties of these creatures to the instinct of self-preservation; whereas God has given to man the knowledge of good and evil, an appreciation of justice and injustice, a horror of isolation, and a fondness for society.

"This is why mankind — created as solitary as the fox, as wild as the antelope, as isolated as the eagle — soon united into families, which were afterwards welded into tribes, till the tribes became nations. As I tell you, brethren, the individual who isolates himself, acquires only the right of Independence; while men, who unite together, have a right to Liberty."

Cagliostro then took up, one after the other, the three watchwords of the Enlightened.

LIBERTY.

"Liberty is not a primitive substance, like gold. It is a flower, a fruit, an art, — yes, a product. It needs cultivation for its unfolding and growth.

"Liberty is the right of every one to work for his own benefit, his own interest, his own satisfaction, his own well-being, his own glory, his own amusement, — so long as he does not wound the interests of others. Liberty involves a partial relinquishment of individual independence, for the increase of the general fund of liberty, which each may equally share in turn.

"Liberty is even more than all this. It involves an obligation, taken before the world, not to confine the accumulated enlightenment, progress, privileges, — already won, — to the selfish circle of one community, one nation, one race, but, on the contrary, to cast them abroad with full hands, whether as individuals or as society, whenever a poor individual or an indigent community asks the privilege of sharing these treasures. Do not fear the exhaustion of this treasure, for Liberty has the divine privilege of multiplying by its very prodigality, like that fountain of great waters which supplies the earth, and whose fulness at its source is in proportion to the abundance of its discharge.

"Thus you see what Liberty is, — celestial manna, to which every one has an equal right, and which the chosen people, for whom it falls, should share with all others who ask for their part of it. Such is Liberty, as I understand it."

Without deigning a direct reply to the man who had questioned him, Cagliostro added · "Now let us pass to Equality."

A great murmur of approbation rose to the vaulted ceiling, embracing the orator with the caress of popularity, — a caress very sweet to the pride of man, if not to his heart; but like one accustomed to such ovations he hastily raised his hand to restore silence.

"Brothers," said he, "the hour passes; time is precious. Any minute of lost time may accrue to the profit of the enemies of our holy cause, to dig a pit beneath our feet, or to place some obstacle in our path.

"Let me now define Equality, as I have already defined Liberty."

At these words there were loud cries of hush! followed by a profound silence, in the midst whereof Cagliostro's voice rose clear, sonorous, and distinct, as he went on with his exposition.

"Brethren, I will not do you the injustice to suppose that a single one among you is misled by that seductive word, even for an instant, into a belief in an equality of matter or intelligence. No, you know very well that any such equality is repugnant to true philosophy, and that Nature herself cuts short this question, by placing the hyssop beside the oak, the valley beside the mountain, the rivulet beside the river, the lake beside the ocean, stupidity beside genius. All the decrees in the world cannot lower, by a single cubit, Chimborazo, the Himalayas, or Mont Blanc. No decree of any human assembly can put out the light which burns on the forehead of Homer, Dante, or Shakespeare. No one can rationally cherish the idea that the equality sanctioned by law can be material and personal, — that from the moment when such an edict was inscribed on the tables of the Constitution, the generations would possess the proportions of Goliath, the valor of the Cid, or the genius of Voltaire. No, both individually and collectively, we perfectly understand that the question which we agitate is, purely and simply, social and political Equality. Now, brothers, what is this Equality?"

The speaker then proceeded to define the second most important principle.

EQUALITY!

"Equality is the abolition of all transmitted privileges, save as they are transmitted through natural aptitude and ability. It involves free access to all employments, all grades, all ranks. It means that the recompense should be according to merit, genius, virtue, and not be awarded as the perquisite of caste, family, or race.

"Thus the throne, supposing there should still be a throne, will be only an exalted position, accessible to the most worthy; while those of lesser worth will occupy secondary positions, but still according to merit; and if their present acquirements are adequate, whether they are kings, ministers, councillors, generals, judges, nobody will care from what point they started. Thus royalty or magistracy, the monarch's throne or the president's chair, will no longer be the hereditary perquisite of a family, but come by election. For council, for war, for judicial offices, there will be no longer any question of class privilege, but of aptitude. In the arts, in science, in letters, rank will no longer be determined by favor, partiality, and patronage, but by general agreement and generous rivalry. This is true social Equality.

"In proportion to the increase of education, — and education should not only be gratuitous, and brought to everybody's door, but enforced upon all, — ideas would grow, and equality would rise with them. Instead of staying with its feet in the mud, Equality should soar to the highest summits. A great nation, like France, ought to recognize only the equality which raises, not that which abases. Equality which abases is not that of a Titan, but of a bandit. It is no longer the Caucasian couch of Prometheus, but the narrow bed of Procrustes. — There you have the true Equality."

Such a definition could not fail to command full assent, in an association of men possessing exalted minds and ambitious hearts, each of whom — apart from a few rare and modest exceptions — naturally looked upon his neighbor as a convenient step in his own future elevation. The cheers, plaudits, and stamping testified that all present at that moment accepted Equality — in theory, at any rate — as it was understood by the puissant genius of the singular chief whom they had chosen; albeit there were some in that assemblage, who were ready to show, as soon as they could do so practically, that they adopted Equality in a fashion quite different from that held and taught by Cagliostro.

Cagliostro, becoming more glowing and more ecstatic, as the subject grew upon him, again commanded silence, as he had done before, and continued his speech, in a voice wherein it was impossible to observe the least weariness or detect the slightest hesitation.

"Brothers, we come now to the third word in our motto, a word which men will be a long time in understanding, and which, for that very reason, the highest civilization places last. Brethren, that word is Fraternity."

Then he entered upon his third division.

FRATERNITY !

"Fraternity ! A grand word, if properly understood ! A sublime word, if rightly explained ! God forbid my declaring that he must have a bad heart, who, having imperfectly measured the height of this word, accepts it in any narrow way, and applies it only to the inhabitants of a single village, the citizens of one town, or the subjects of one kingdom. No, brethren, such an one is only poor in intelligence. Let us pity such ignorant minds, and teach them to shake off their leaden sandals of mediocrity, plume their wings, and rise far above all low ideas.

"When Satan wished to tempt Jesus, he transported him to the highest mountain in the world, — from whose summit the Tempter could show the Redeemer all the kingdoms of the earth, — not to a tower in Nazareth, whence he could see only a few poor Galilean villages. Brothers, it is not one city, it is not even one kingdom, to which Fraternity must be applied. The world must learn it.

"Brothers, the time will come when this word which we now consider sacred, — the word country, — and that other word which appears holy to us, — nationality, — will vanish like some theatric scenes, which are only lowered provisionally, while the scene-shifters and machinists behind are preparing their infinite distances, their immeasurable horizons. Brethren, the day will come when those who have conquered earth and sea will conquer fire and air. The flaming coursers of the sky will be harnessed, not only to thought but to matter; and the winds, which are to-day but the undisciplined couriers of the tempest, will become the intelligent and docile messengers of civilization.

"Brothers, a day will finally come, when all nations — thanks to terrestrial and aerial intercommunication, before which kings will be powerless — will understand that they are bound together, each to the others, by the solidarity of past trials, — when the people will understand that kings who have put weapons into their hands, wherewith to destroy each other, were urging them on, not to glory, as they pretended, but to fratricide, and that a full account must be rendered to posterity, for every drop of blood drawn from the least member of the great human family.

"Then, brethren, you will see a magnificent panorama, unrolled before the face of the Lord. Every imaginary frontier will disappear. Every artificial boundary will be laid low. Rivers will be no hindrance, mountains no obstacle. People will clasp hands across the rivers; and on the highest peak will be erected an altar, the altar of Fraternity.

"Brothers, brothers, brothers! Therein, I tell you, lies the true apostolic brotherhood. The Christ did not die for the rescue of Jews alone, but to redeem all the nations of the earth. 'Go and teach all nations!' was his command. Do not make these three words, Liberty, Equality, Fraternity, the motto of France alone. Inscribe them on the banner of humanity, as the motto for the world.

"And now go forth, brethren. Your task is great, — so grand, through whatever valley of blood and tears you may pass, that your descendants will envy the holy mission which you accomplish. Be like the Crusaders, who were always most numerous in roads leading to saintly places, and did not pause, even when they saw, along the route, the whitening bones of their fathers.

"Courage, then, ye apostles! Courage, ye pilgrims! Courage, ye soldiers! Apostles, convert all men! Pilgrims, march on! Soldiers, fight the good fight!"

Cagliostro paused, but he had barely ceased speaking when he was interrupted by applause and enthusiastic cries. Thrice the plaudits were hushed, and three times were they renewed, echoing through the crypt like a subterranean storm.

The six masked men bowed before him, one after the other, kissing his hand, and then retired.

Then each brother, bowing in turn before the platform, — from which, like another Peter the Hermit, this new apostle had preached the Crusade of Liberty, — passed out, repeating the fatal motto: Lilia pedibus destrue!

With the last brother's departure the lamp went out.

Cagliostro remained alone, buried in the bowels of the earth, lost in silence and darkness, — like those gods of India, into whose mysteries he professed to have been initiated two thousand years before.

CHAPTER XXIX.

WOMEN AND FLOWERS.

SEVERAL months after the events just recounted, towards the end of March, 1791, a carriage, going rapidly along the road from Argenteuil to Besons, made a detour a half-league from the city, drove towards the Château Marais, through the gate which opened before it, and stopped in the inner courtyard, near the lower steps of the piazza.

The clock on the front of the building indicated eight o'clock in the morning.

An old servant, who seemed to be impatiently awaiting the arrival of the carriage, hurried towards it, and opened the door for a man clad entirely in black, who rushed up the steps of the house.

"Ah, Monsieur Gilbert," said the valet, "you are here at last."

"What is the matter with him, my poor Teisch?" asked the Doctor.

"Alas, Monsieur, you will see," said the servant.

Going before the Doctor, he led the way across the billiard-room, where the lamps, probably lighted at a late hour of the night, were still burning, and then through the dining-room, where the table, covered with flowers, empty bottles, fruits, and pastry, gave evidence of a supper prolonged far beyond the usual hours.

Gilbert glanced sorrowfully over this scene of disorder, which proved how badly his own prescriptions had been followed. Then shrugging his shoulders with a sigh, he ascended the staircase which led to Mirabeau's chamber, situated up one flight, on the main story.

"Monsieur, here is Doctor Gilbert," said the domestic, taking a step into the room.

"How, the Doctor?" said Mirabeau. "No need to send after him, for such a piece of foolishness as this."

"Foolishness?" murmured poor Teisch. "Judge for yourself, Monsieur."

"Oh Doctor," said Mirabeau, raising himself up in his bed, "believe me, I regret that they should trouble you without consulting me."

"First of all, it is never a trouble for me to have an excuse for seeing you. You know I only practise medicine for my friends, and that I belong entirely to them. Let us see what has happened, — and, above all, no secrets from the Faculty! — Teisch, draw the curtains and open the windows."

This order being obeyed, daylight flooded Mirabeau's chamber, even reaching its corners, and the Doctor could see the change which had come over the whole appearance of the celebrated orator, since he examined him a month or two previous.

"Ah —!" said Gilbert, in spite of himself.

"Yes," said Mirabeau, "I am changed, am I not? I'll tell you how it happens."

Gilbert smiled sadly; but as an intelligent physician, he always learned what he could from his patients, and let it pass, even if he knew they were telling him lies.

"You know," continued Mirabeau, "what question was debated yesterday?"

"Yes, something about mines."

"That's a question not yet well understood or weighed. The interests of the proprietors and the Government are not sufficiently distinct. Besides, my intimate friend De la Marck is much interested in the question. Half his fortune depends upon it. His purse, dear Doctor, has always been mine, and I am bound to him in gratitude. I have spoken, — or, rather, I have assailed the outposts, — five times. At the last attack I put my enemies to rout, though I remained nearly on my back. On returning home, therefore, I wished to celebrate the victory, so I had a few friends to supper. We laughed and joked till three this morning, and then went to bed. At five o'clock I was taken with horrible pains inside, and cried like a fool. Teisch was frightened, like a poltroon, and sent after you. Well, you 're wiser than I. There 's my pulse, and there 's my tongue. I suffer like the damned. Pull me through, if you can. As for me, — well, I promise you I won't meddle with such matters any more."

Gilbert was too skilful a physician not to see, without consulting tongue or pulse, the gravity of Mirabeau's situation. The sick man was at the point of suffocation, hardly able to breathe. His face was swollen by the stagnation of blood in the lungs. He complained of cold feet and hands, and from time to time the violence of his pain drew from him a moan or a groan.

The Doctor wished, however, to confirm his opinion, already well defined, by an examination of the pulse. The pulse was convulsive and intermittent.

"Well, my dear Count, we shall not say Good-bye to you this heat, but I am barely in time;" and he drew his instrument-case from his pocket, with that calm rapidity which belongs to true genius.

"Ah, you 're going to bleed me?"

"At once."

"In the right arm, or left?"

"Neither. Your lungs are already engorged. I shall bleed your foot, while Teisch must go to Argenteuil Village for mustard and cantharides, so that we can apply poultices. — Take my cab, Teisch."

"The Devil," said Mirabeau. "At that rate, I should say it was time."

Without answering, Gilbert proceeded at once to the operation, and very soon some thick, black blood, which seemed to hesitate for an instant, oozed from the sufferer's foot. The relief was instantaneous.

"Morbleu!" said Mirabeau, breathing more easily. "Certainly, Doctor, you 're a great man."

"And you 're a great fool, Count, to risk a life, so precious to France and your friends, for a few hours of false pleasure."

Mirabeau smiled sadly, almost ironically. "Bah! my dear Doctor. You exaggerate the feeling of France and my friends towards myself."

"On my honor," smilingly said Gilbert, "great men always complain of the ingratitude of other men, when, in reality, they themselves are the ingrates. Be seriously ill, and to-morrow you will have all Paris at your windows. Die to-morrow, and you will have all France for your pall-bearers."

"Do you know that 's very consoling?" laughingly responded Mirabeau.

"It is precisely because you can see the gratitude, without risking your life, that I say to you, seriously, — you need a great demonstration to reinvigorate you, morally and mentally. In two hours let me take you back to Paris. Then let me tell a commissioner, at the first street corner, and you 'll see."

"You believe that I 'm strong enough to be transported to Paris?"

"This very day, — yes! — How do you feel?"

"I breathe better, my head is clearer, and the mist before my eyes has disappeared; but I suffer internally all the time."

"Oh, that 's an affair for the plasters, my dear Count. The bleeding has done its work. Now the plasters must do theirs. — Hold on! Here 's Teisch."

Teisch brought with him the ingredients demanded. In another quarter-hour relief came, as predicted by the Doctor.

"Now I 'll give you an hour to rest, and then take you away."

"Doctor," said Mirabeau, smiling, "will you not permit me to stay here till evening, and to appoint a rendezvous with you, at my mansion in Rue Chaussée d'Antin, at eleven o'clock?"

Gilbert looked at Mirabeau. The sick man could see that the physician clearly divined the cause of this postponement.

"What else can I do," said Mirabeau, "when I have a visit to receive?"

"My dear Count, I saw the flowers on the table in your dining-room. It was not merely a friendly supper which you gave yesterday!"

"You know I can't get on without flowers. That 's my folly!"

"Yes, but the flowers were not alone."

"Oh, Lord! If flowers are a necessity with me, why, I must abide by the fatal consequences of that beautiful necessity."

"Count, Count, you are killing yourself!" said Gilbert.

"Acknowledge, Doctor, that this will at least be a charming suicide."

"Count, I sha'n't quit you all day long!"

"Doctor, I have given my word. Would you make me break it?"

"You will be in Paris to-night?"

"I tell you that I will expect you at eleven, in my little mansion on the Rue Chaussée d'Antin. — Have you seen it?"

"Not yet!"

"It's a purchase I made from Julie, Talma's wife. — Indeed, I begin to feel well, Doctor."

"That is to say, you want me to be off!"

"Oh, — as to that —"

"Well, you're doing very well. This is my quarter at the Tuileries, remember."

"Ah, so! You'll see the Queen," said Mirabeau, his face darkening.

"Probably! Have you any message for her?"

Mirabeau smiled bitterly. "I should not take such a liberty, Doctor. Don't even tell her you've seen me."

"Why so?"

"Because she'll ask you if I've saved the monarchy, as I promised; and you'll have to say no. Besides," added Mirabeau, with a nervous smile, "it's as much her fault as mine."

"You do not wish me to tell her how you have overworked, and how your struggle in the Assembly is killing you?"

Mirabeau reflected. "Yes, tell her that! Make me out more sick than I am, if you please."

"Why so?"

"Oh, nothing, — say for curiosity's sake, — so that you'll have something to tell me."

"All right!"

"You promise me, Doctor?"

"I promise you!"

"And you'll repeat to me what she says?"

"Her very words!"

"Well, good-by, Doctor. A thousand thanks!" and he extended his hand to Gilbert, whose searching look seemed to embarrass him.

"By the way," said the invalid, "won't you prescribe for me before you go?"

"Oh yes," said Gilbert, "I'll prescribe some hot drinks, — well diluted, — of chiccory or borage, a simple diet, and above all — "

"Well, above all — ?"

"No nurses, at least not one under fifty! You understand, Count?"

"Doctor," said Mirabeau, laughing, "rather than fail in following your prescription, I'll take two nurses, each twenty-five years old."

At the door Gilbert met Teisch. The poor fellow had tears in his eyes, as he said: "Oh, Monsieur, why do you go away?"

"I go away because I'm driven," said Gilbert, smiling.

"And all on account of that woman!" murmured the old man, "all on account of that woman, who looks like the Queen. A man who has so much genius, as they say! My God, how can he be such an ass!"

Thus concluding, he opened the door for Gilbert, who, with a preoccupied mind, entered his cab, saying to himself: "What did he mean, about a woman who looks like the Queen?"

He grasped Teisch's arm, as if to question him; but only said, in a low tone: "What am I doing? This is Mirabeau's secret, not mine. — To Paris, coachman!"

CHAPTER XXX.

WHAT THE KING SAID; WHAT THE QUEEN SAID.

GILBERT scrupulously fulfilled the double promise made to Mirabeau. On his return to Paris the Doctor met Camille Desmoulins, — the living newspaper, the incarnate gazette of the times. To him Gilbert announced the illness of Mirabeau, which he intentionally represented as graver than it was at the moment, but not more so than it would become, if Mirabeau indulged in any fresh imprudence.

Then Gilbert went to the Tuileries, and communicated the news to the King. The King only said: "Ah, poor Count! Has he lost his appetite?"

"Yes, Sire," responded Gilbert.

"Then it's a grave case!" said the King; and straightway he began to talk of other matters.

Leaving the King, Gilbert went to see the Queen, and repeated to her what he had told the King.

The daughter of Maria Theresa knitted her high forehead, and she said: "Why did n't this malady overtake him on the morning of the day when he made his fine speech on the tricolored flag?"

Then she added, as if repentant for letting such an expression of hatred for the sign of French nationality escape her in Gilbert's presence: "Never mind that! It would be a great misfortune for France, and for ourselves, if this indisposition should increase."

"I believe I have already had the honor of telling the Queen that it is more than an indisposition, — that it is a malady."

"Of which you will make yourself master?" said the Queen.

"I shall do my best, Madame, but I cannot answer for it."

"Doctor, I shall count on you, — you understand that? — to bring me the news about Monsieur de Mirabeau;" and then she also talked of other matters.

That evening, at the appointed hour, Gilbert ascended the stairs in Mirabeau's small city mansion.

Mirabeau was lying on an extension chair, and expecting him; but as he had been kept waiting several minutes in the parlor, under the pretext of notifying the Count of his presence, the Doctor glanced about him as he entered the bedroom, and his eyes were attracted by a cashmere scarf, carelessly left on an armchair.

To turn Gilbert's attention, or else because he attached great importance to the first words exchanged with the Doctor, Mirabeau said: "Ah, it 's you! I have found out that part of your promise is already fulfilled. All Paris knows that I 'm ill; and for two hours poor Teisch has n't rested ten minutes from telling the news to my friends, who have come to inquire if I am any better. So much for your first promise! Have you been as faithful with the second?"

"What do you mean?" smilingly asked Gilbert.

"You know well enough!"

Gilbert shrugged his shoulders, as a sign of negation.

"Have you been to the Tuileries?"

"Yes."

"Did you see the King?"

"Yes."

"Did you see the Queen?"

"Yes."

"And you told them they would n't be bothered with me much longer?"

"I told them how ill you were."

"And what did they say?"

"The King asked if you had lost your appetite."

"And when you answered affirmatively —?"

"He pitied you very sincerely."

"Oh that good King! On the day of his death he 'll say to his friends, as did Leonidas of old: 'I sup with Pluto to-night!' — But the Queen?"

"The Queen pitied you, and inquired about you with interest."

"In what terms, Doctor?" asked Mirabeau, who evidently attached a very great value to Doctor Gilbert's next response.

"Oh, in kind terms!"

"You gave me your word of honor that you would repeat to me exactly what she told you."

"Oh, I can't recall it, word for word."

"Doctor, you have n't forgotten a syllable!"

"I swear to you —"

"Doctor, I have your word! Do you wish me to regard you as faithless?"

"You are importunate, Count."

"I 'm precisely that!"

"You wish me absolutely to repeat the Queen's words?"

"Word for word."

"Well, she said this malady ought to have taken hold of you the morning before you appeared on the tribune, to defend the national tricolor."

Gilbert wished to see what influence the Queen had over Mirabeau. The latter bounded from his chair, as if he had been brought into contact with a voltaic pile.

"Oh, the ingratitude of crowned heads!" he murmured. "That one speech, then, was sufficient to make them forget a civil list of twenty-five millions for the King, and her own dower of four millions. She does n't know, that woman, — that Queen can't see, — that by one such move I regained the popularity I had lost on her account. A fault! She forgets, moreover, that I proposed the adjournment of the reunion of Avignon with France, to satisfy the King's religious scruples. A fault! She forgets, during my presidency of the Jacobin Club, — a presidency of three months, which used up ten years of my life, — that I defended the law which confined membership in the National Guard to actual citizens. A fault! She forgets that in the Assembly's discussion over the law as to priestly oaths, I demanded that this law should not apply to oaths connected with the confessional. A fault!"

Gilbert listened with some surprise, as Mirabeau went on: "Oh, these faults, these faults! I've paid in full for them all. However, it was n't my faults which upset me; for there are some epochs, singular and abnormal, when men do not fall by the errors they commit. One day, — for them also, — I supported a question of justice, of humanity. There was an attack made upon the King's aunts, because they had emigrated, and a law against emigration was proposed, and I said: 'If you make a law against emigration, I swear I 'll never obey it;' and this project was rejected unanimously. Well, what my defeats never could effect, my victory has accomplished. They called me Dictator. They made me go upon the rostrum in anger, — the worst thing an orator can do. I triumphed a second time, but it was in attacking the Jacobins. Then the Jacobins swore my death, — the fools! Duport, Lameth, Barnave, — none of them could see, that in killing me, they gave the dictatorship of their clique to Robespierre. Me, whom they should have guarded as the apple of their eye, they voted down by a stupid majority. They have made me sweat great drops of blood. They have made me drink the bitter cup to its dregs. They have crowned me with thorns, put a reed in my hands, — yes, crucified me! Happy is he who submits to this Passion, as the Christ did, for humanity's sake!"

With increasing admiration for the man before him, Gilbert listened.

"The tricolored flag! Can't they see it is their only refuge, — that if they can loyally and publicly seat themselves in its shadow, that shadow may yet save them? But the Queen does n't care to be saved. She wants to be avenged; and therefore she indulges in no reasonable ideas. The means which I propose as being the only efficacious ones, she most repulses, — namely, moderation, fairness, feasibility, which are always right. I wished to save two things at once, royalty and liberty. It was a thankless combat, in which I fought single-handed, while I was abandoned, — and against what? If against men, that would be nothing; if against tigers, that would be nothing; if against lions, it would be nothing; but to fight against an element, against the powers of nature, — against the sea, against the mounting waves, against the inflowing tide! Yesterday the water came up to my ankles. To-day it reaches my knees. To-morrow it will be up to my waist, and the next day it will be over my head."

Turning towards the Doctor he added: "Doctor, I must be frank with you. Chagrin first seized me, and then disgust. I dreamed of being an arbitrator between the Revolution and the monarchy. I believed I could gain the ascendancy, as a man, over the Queen; and, as a man, if some fine day she should venture imprudently into the stream, and lose her footing, I thought I could throw myself into the water, and rescue her. But no! she did not seriously wish my help. She wished to compromise me, make me unpopular, ruin me, annihilate me, — render me powerless for either good or evil. — So, Doctor, what I had better do, as I 've already suggested, is to die in season, — to lie down artistically, like a classic athlete, gracefully yielding my throat to the knife, giving up the ghost in good form."

Then Mirabeau fell back upon his great chair exhausted, and bit his pillow with all his might.

Gilbert now knew what he wished, — namely, wherein lay the life or death of Mirabeau.

"Count," he asked, "what should you say, if to-morrow the King should send to inquire after you?"

The invalid made a movement of his shoulders, as much as to say, "That would be all one to me."

"The King, — or the Queen?"

"What?" said Mirabeau, half rising.

"I said, the King or Queen," repeated Gilbert.

Mirabeau raised himself on his two fists, like a crouching lion, saying, as he tried to read Gilbert's heart: "She won't do it!"

"But if she should?"

"You believe she would so far condescend?"

"I believe nothing; I only suppose, I presume."

"So be it," said Mirabeau. "I 'll wait till to-morrow night."

"What do you mean?"

"Take my words in their plain sense, Doctor, and don't see in them anything else: I 'll wait till to-morrow night."

"And to-morrow night?"

"Well, by to-morrow night, if she sends to inquire, — if, for instance, Weber comes, then I 'm in the wrong; but if, on the contrary, he comes not, — oh! well, then, — why, you 're in the wrong, Doctor, and I 'm in the right."

"So be it, — to-morrow night. Till then, my dear Demosthenes, take plenty of rest, calmness, and tranquillity."

"I will not quit my long chair."

"And that scarf?" Gilbert pointed to the object which met his eyes on first entering the chamber.

Mirabeau smiled, and said: "Word of honor!"

"Good!" said Gilbert, as he left the room. "Try to pass a peaceable night, and I 'll answer for the rest."

Teisch was waiting at the door.

"Well, my brave Teisch," said the Doctor, "thy master is going to get better."

The old servant shook his head sorrowfully.

"How? Thou doubtest my word?"

"I doubt everything, Monsieur Doctor, so long as his evil genius is near him," said Teisch, heaving a sigh, and letting Gilbert pass down the narrow staircase.

In the corner of one of the landing-places Gilbert saw a veiled figure waiting, and asked: "Who is that woman?"

"It is she," responded Teisch.

"Who is she?"

"The woman who looks like the Queen."

For the second time Gilbert was struck with the same idea, in hearing the same phrase. He took two steps, as if to follow the phantom, but paused, saying to himself, "Impossible!" and continued on his way, leaving the old servant wondering that such a learned man as the Doctor should not undertake to conjure away the demon, who, in Teisch's profound conviction, was an envoy straight from Hell.

Mirabeau passed a comfortable night. The next day, at an early hour, he summoned Teisch, and made him open the windows, in order to breathe the morning air. The only thing which troubled the old servant, was the feverish impatience to which the invalid was evidently a prey.

When, being interrogated by his master, Teisch had replied that it was hardly eight o'clock, Mirabeau would not believe it, and made Teisch bring his watch, so that he could see for himself. Then he laid the watch on the table beside his couch.

Presently he said to the old man: "Teisch, you will take your station below, in Jean's place, who will attend to me to-day."

"Oh, my God, have I been so unfortunate as to displease Monsieur?"

"On the contrary, my good Teisch," kindly said Mirabeau, "it is because I can confide only in thee, that to-day I want thee at the door. To every comer thou wilt say that I'm better, but yet not able to see people. Only, if anybody comes on the part of the —" Mirabeau paused, and then resumed: "Only if anybody comes from the palace, if they should send from the Tuileries, thou wilt have the messenger come up, — understand me! — no matter what the pretext, the messenger must not go away, without my talking with him. Thou seest, my good Teisch, that in sending thee farther away, I am raising thee to the post of my confidant."

Teisch kissed Mirabeau's hand, saying: "Oh Monsieur, if you would only will to live!" and then went out.

"Parbleu!" said Mirabeau, as he watched the servant withdraw, "that 's just the difficulty."

At ten o'clock Mirabeau rose, and dressed himself with unwonted care. Jean shaved him and dressed his hair, and then pushed his armchair up to the window, from which he could see into the street.

At each blow on the knocker, at each vibration of the bell, his anxious face might have been seen, by anybody in front of the house, peering from behind the lifted curtain, and looking searchingly along the street. Then the curtain would fall, to be raised again at the next ring of the bell or blow of the knocker, — and so on, over and over again.

At two Teisch came up, followed by a lackey. Mirabeau's heart beat violently. The lackey wore no livery. Mirabeau's first idea was that this fellow out of livery came from the Queen, but was so dressed, in order not to compromise the woman who sent him; but Mirabeau was mistaken.

"From Doctor Gilbert," said Teisch.

"Ah!" said Mirabeau, paling as if he were twenty-five, — when he waited for a message from Madame de Monnier, and saw instead a courier from his uncle, the bailiff.

"Monsieur," said Teisch, "as the boy comes from Doctor Gilbert, and is the bearer of a letter for you, I thought it right to make him an exception to your orders."

"And thou hast done well," said the Count. Then he said to the lackey, "The letter!"

Teisch took it in his hand, and presented it to the Count.

Opening it, Mirabeau found it contained only these few words:

Let me know how you are. I shall be with you by eleven to-night. I hope your first word will be that I was right, and that you were wrong. GILBERT.

"Tell your master that you found me up," said Mirabeau to the lackey, "and that I expect him to-night." Then he added, to Teisch: "See that this boy goes away satisfied!"

Teisch made a sign that he understood, and took the messenger away.

One hour followed another. The bell seldom ceased to vibrate or the hammer to sound. All Paris called on Mirabeau. In the street were groups of men, who, hearing news which did not quite correspond with the statements in the papers, were incredulous as to Teisch's reassuring bulletins, and compelled carriages to turn off to the right or left, through the side streets, so that the noise of the wheels might not disturb the illustrious invalid.

Towards five o'clock Teisch judged it proper once more to make his appearance in Mirabeau's chamber, in order to tell him this fact

"Ah, my poor Teisch," said Mirabeau, "the sight of thee made me believe there was something better for me to hear."

"What better news?" asked the surprised Teisch. "I did not suppose I could announce anything better than such a proof of love."

"Thou art right!" said Mirabeau, "and I spoke ungratefully."

As soon as Teisch had closed the door, Mirabeau opened his window, stepped out upon the balcony, and made a sign of thanks to the brave fellows who had constituted themselves the guardians of his repose.

They recognized him, and shouts of "Long live Mirabeau" could be heard from one end of Rue Chaussée d'Antin to the other.

Of what did Mirabeau think at this unexpected homage, which, under other circumstances, would have made his heart bound with joy? He thought of that haughty woman, who did not disquiet herself about him, and his eye searched beyond the groups pressing about the mansion, to see if he could not discern some lackey in blue livery, coming from the boulevards; but he re-entered his chamber with a wounded heart. The shadows began to fall, and he had seen nothing.

The evening passed along like the day. Mirabeau's impatience was changed to bitter despondency. His heart no longer beat with hope, when he heard the bell or the knocker.

At eleven the door opened, and Teisch announced Doctor Gilbert, who entered smiling, but was alarmed at the expression in Mirabeau's face. That face was a faithful mirror of the upheavals of the heart.

Gilbert's mind misgave him. "Has no one come?" he asked.

"From where?" said Mirabeau.

"You know very well what I mean."

"Me? No, on my honor!"

"From the palace, — from her, — in the Queen's name?"

"Nobody in the world, my dear Doctor. Nobody has come!"

"Impossible!" said Gilbert.

Mirabeau shrugged his shoulders. "Oh you innocent man!" he said. Then he asked, seizing Gilbert's hand with a convulsive movement: "Do you wish me to tell you what you have been doing to-day, Doctor?"

"I? I've done pretty much what I do every day."

"No, for every day you do not go to the palace, and to-day you have been there. Every day you do not see the Queen, but to-day you have seen her. Every day you do not allow yourself to advise her, but to-day you have done so."

"Well, go on!" said Gilbert.

"Oh Doctor, I can see what took place, — and hear, as well as if I had been there."

"Well, Monsieur Second Sight, what did happen, and what was said?"

"You presented yourself at the Tuileries to-day, at one o'clock. You asked to speak with the Queen, and you did speak with her. You told her that my condition grew rather worse, and suggested to her that it would be kind in her as Queen, kind in her as a woman, to send and inquire for me, if not because she was solicitous about my welfare, at least for policy's sake. She discussed the matter with you, appeared convinced by your reasoning, and dismissed you, saying that she would send and inquire. Happy and satisfied you came away, depending on the royal word; while she remained haughty and bitter, smiling at your credulity, which forgets that a royal word pledges nothing. — On the faith of an honorable man, Doctor," and Mirabeau looked Gilbert full in the face, "is n't this about so?"

"Truly, if you had been there, my dear Count, you could scarcely have seen and heard better."

"Blunderers!" said Mirabeau, bitterly. "As I've told you, they never know enough to do the proper thing. The royal livery, entering my mansion to-day, in the midst of that crowd before my door and under my windows, shouting long life to me, would have redounded to the royal interest, with a whole year of popularity."

Shaking his head, Mirabeau put his hand quickly to his eyes, and Gilbert was surprised to see him wipe away a tear.

"What 's the matter, Count?"

"With me? Nothing. Is there any news from the National Assembly, from the Cordelier or the Jacobin clubs? Has Robespierre drizzled out a new speech, or has Marat vomited a new pamphlet?"

"How long is it since you ate anything?" asked Gilbert.

"Not since two o'clock in the afternoon."

"In that case you had better take a bath, my dear Count."

"That 's an excellent idea of yours, Doctor. — Jean, a bath!"

"Here, Monsieur?"

"No, no, — one side, in my toilet-room."

Ten minutes later Mirabeau was having his bath, and, as usual, Teisch was showing Gilbert out.

Mirabeau raised himself in his tub, in order to follow Gilbert with his eyes. When he was out of sight Mirabeau bent his ear, to hear the sound of his steps. He remained quiet till he heard the house door open and shut, and then rang violently.

"Jean, set the table in my room, and ask Olivia if she will do me the favor to sup with me." As the lackey was going out to obey, Mirabeau cried: "Some flowers, — above all, some flowers. I adore flowers."

At four in the morning Doctor Gilbert was awakened by a violent pull at the bell. "Ah," he said, jumping out of bed, "I 'm sure Mirabeau 's worse!"

He was not mistaken. After Mirabeau's supper had been served, and his table covered with flowers, he ordered Teisch to go to bed, and also sent Jean away.

Then he had all the doors fastened, except one leading into the room of that unknown woman, whom Teisch called Mirabeau's evil genius.

Neither of the two servants went to bed, although the younger, Jean, fell asleep in his armchair in the antechamber. Teisch was on the alert.

At quarter of four a loud blow was heard on the small table bell. Both servants hurried to the chamber, but the doors were locked.

Then they bethought themselves to go to the unknown woman's apartment, and reach their master's chamber through her bedroom.

Lying backward, and half fainting, Mirabeau was holding this woman in his arms, to prevent her from summoning help; while she, in fright, was ringing the little bell on the table, not being able to reach the bellrope hanging by the chimney. Seeing the servants, she begged them to help both herself and Mirabeau, who was suffocating her in his convulsive writhing, and looked like Death in disguise, dragging her to the tomb.

Thanks to the united efforts of the servants, the arms of the deathstruck man were unclasped. She retreated, weeping, to her own room, while Mirabeau fell back on his extension chair.

Jean ran to find Doctor Gilbert, while Teisch gave all his attention to the master.

Gilbert took neither the time to have his horse harnessed, nor to call a cab. As Rue Saint Honoré is not far from the Rue Chaussée d'Antin, he followed Jean, and in ten minutes they were at Mirabeau's house.

Teisch was waiting below, in the vestibule.

"What is it this time, my friend?" asked Gilbert.

"Ah Monsieur," said the old servant, "that woman,— always that woman, — and those cursed flowers. Go and see, Monsieur, go and see!"

At that instant something like a sob was heard. Gilbert sprang upstairs. On the last steps a door next to Mirabeau's opened, and a woman, clad in a white chamber-gown, suddenly appeared, falling at the Doctor's feet.

"Oh Gilbert, Gilbert," she said, clasping her hands across her breast, "in the name of Heaven, save him!"

"Nicole!" cried Gilbert, "Nicole! You wretch, it 's you, is it?"

"Save him! Save him!" cried Nicole.

Gilbert paused an instant, engrossed with a terrible idea.

"Oh!" he murmured. "Beausire distributing pamphlets against him, and Nicole his mistress! He is indeed lost, for beneath all this is Cagliostro!" and he rushed into Mirabeau's apartment, knowing there was not an instant to lose.

CHAPTER XXXI.

LONG LIVE MIRABEAU!

MIRABEAU was on his bed. He had regained consciousness. The fragments of his supper, the dishes, the flowers were there, accusing witnesses, like the dregs of poison, found in the bottom of a goblet, beside a suicide's deathbed.

Gilbert advanced quickly towards him, and breathed more freely as he said: "Ah, it 's not so bad as I feared!"

Mirabeau smiled. "You think so, Doctor?" he said, shaking his head, like a man who thinks he knows his own condition quite as well as his physician knows it, who often tries to deceive himself, in order the better to deceive others.

This time Gilbert did not content himself with an external diagnosis. He tested the pulse; the pulse was lively and high. He inspected the tongue; the tongue was coated and bilious. He inquired into the condition of the head; the head was heavy and aching. A chill pervaded the lower extremities.

All at once the spasms, experienced by the sick man two days previous, reappeared, reaching in turn the shoulder-blade, the collar-bone, and the diaphragm. The pulse, which, as we said, had been lively and high, now became intermittent and spasmodic.

Gilbert ordered the same remedies which had produced the previous convalescence.

Unfortunately, at the end of fifteen minutes, — either because he had not strength to bear such powerful remedies, or because he did not wish to be cured, — the invalid complained of so much suffering in the poulticed regions, that it became necessary to remove the mustard plasters. The improvement, which had been evident while the poultices were at work, immediately ceased.

It is not our intention to follow the phases of this terrible illness in all their details; only, a rumor that morning ran throughout the city, that the sick man was in a more serious condition than on the evening before. There had been a relapse, it was said; and a relapse meant death.

Then it was really possible to judge what a gigantic place one man could occupy in the heart of a nation. All Paris was moved, as in times when a general calamity menaces both the whole community and individuals. All day long, as had been the case the evening before, the street was barred and guarded by men of the people, in order that the noise of passing vehicles might not disturb the sick man. Hour after hour the groups, assembled beneath the windows, asked for news. Bulletins were sent out, which in an instant circulated from Rue Chaussée d'Antin to the ends of Paris. The door was besieged by a crowd of citizens of all conditions and opinions, as if each party, however opposed to the others, would lose something in losing Mirabeau. During this time the friends, relatives, and particular acquaintances of the great orator filled the courtyard, vestibule, and lower rooms, without having the least idea that they were in the way.

Meanwhile very few words were exchanged between Mirabeau and Doctor Gilbert.

"Decidedly, you mean to die," said the Doctor.

"What 's the good of living?" answered Mirabeau.

Recalling the engagements Mirabeau had entered into with the Queen, and her ingratitude, Gilbert insisted no longer, promising himself to do his duty as a physician to the very end, but knowing that he was no deity, to struggle against the inevitable.

On the evening of the first day after the relapse, the Jacobins sent for information as to the health of their ex-president, and Barnave headed the deputation. It had been proposed to send the two Lameths with Barnave, but they declined the appointment.

When Mirabeau was informed of this circumstance, he said: "Oh well, I knew they were cowards, but I did n't suppose they were idiots."

For twenty-four hours Doctor Gilbert did not quit Mirabeau an instant. On Wednesday evening, towards eleven o'clock, the invalid was so comfortable that Gilbert consented to go into the next chamber, and take a few hours of rest. Before doing so he ordered that he should be called at the slightest appearance of any bad symptoms.

At daybreak he awoke. Nobody had roused him from sleep, yet he arose anxiously. It seemed to him impossible that there should have been so sustained an improvement without one drawback.

In fact, when the Doctor came down, Teisch told him, with eyes and voice full of tears, that Mirabeau was very ill, but had forbidden them, whatever his sufferings might be, to rouse his physician.

Sure enough, the sick man had suffered cruelly. His pulse was in an alarming condition. The pains had become ferocious. Both his suffocation and convulsions had returned.

Several times, — and this Teisch had attributed to the beginning of delirium, — the sick man had pronounced the Queen's name. "Ingrates!" he had said. "They have n't once sent to inquire after me!" Then, as if talking to himself, he had added: "I wonder what she'll say, when she learns that I 'm dead, — to-morrow or next day."

Gilbert thought everything depended upon the impending crisis. He proposed to fight the malady vigorously, and ordered an application of leeches to the breast; but as if they had been accomplices of the dying man, the leeches took hold badly, and the Doctor had to resort to musk pills and a second bleeding in the foot.

This attack lasted eight hours. During this eight hours Gilbert fought with death, — like an expert duellist, so to speak, parrying each thrust, repaying each attack with others, but sometimes getting touched himself. At the expiration of eight hours the fever abated, and death beat a retreat; but the enemy left the imprint of his claw on the invalid's visage, like a tiger who flees, only to return.

Gilbert stood beside the bed, with his arms crossed, while this terrible struggle took place. He was too far advanced in the secrets of his art to cherish any hope, or even to entertain a doubt as to the result. Mirabeau was doomed. In the body lying before Gilbert's eyes, despite a remnant of life, it was impossible to see the living Mirabeau.

From that moment, by a strange coincidence, yet with one accord, as if struck by the same idea, Gilbert and Mirabeau began to talk about the latter as one who had been, but had ceased to be.

From that moment also Mirabeau's physiognomy took on a solemn character, which belongs peculiarly to the agony of great men. His voice became slow, grave, almost prophetic. There was something purer, profounder, broader in his words; while in his sentiments there was something more affecting, more unselfish, more sublime.

It was announced to him that a young man, who had never seen him but once, and would not explain who he was, insisted upon coming in. Mirabeau turned towards Gilbert, as if to ask permission to receive this young man.

Gilbert understood. "Let him come in!" he said to Teisch.

Teisch opened the door. A young man of nineteen or twenty appeared on the threshold, entered slowly, kneeled before Mirabeau's bed, took his hand, and kissed it with sobs.

Mirabeau seemed to search his memory for some vague remembrance of the young man. "Ah," he said suddenly, "I recognize you! You are the young man from Argenteuil."

"God be praised!" said the youth; "that is all I could ask;" and, rising, he withdrew, with both hands pressed over his eyes.

Several seconds later Teisch came in with a note, which the youth had written in the antechamber. It contained these simple words:

When I kissed the hand of M. de Mirabeau at Argenteuil, I told him that I was ready to die for him.

I wish to keep my word.

Yesterday I read, in an English paper, that the transfusion of blood proved successful in London, in a case similar to that of our illustrious invalid.

If a transfusion of blood should be thought useful, in order to save M. de Mirabeau, I offer mine, which is young and pure. MARNAIS.

In reading these lines, Mirabeau could not keep back his tears. He ordered them to bring back the youth; but, as if wishing to escape the gratitude he so well merited, Marnais had gone away, leaving his double address, both in Paris and at Argenteuil.

A few minutes later, Mirabeau consented to receive everybody: his friends, Monsieur de la Marck and Monsieur Frochot; his sister, Madame du Saillant; his niece, Madame d'Aragon.

He however refused to see any physician except Gilbert, and said, when the latter insisted: "No, Doctor. You have had all the annoyances of my malady. If you heal me, you shall have all the credit of the cure."

From time to time he wished to know who had inquired for news of his condition; and though he did not ask outright, "Has the Queen sent anybody from the palace?" Gilbert divined, by the dying man's sigh, — when the end of the list was reached, — that the one name he wished to find therein was the very one he could not find.

Then, without speaking about the King or Queen, — Mirabeau was not yet near enough to death to do that, — he began to discourse with wonderful eloquence about general politics, and to talk particularly of the course he should pursue towards England, if he were prime minister. It was especially with Pitt he would like to contend, man to man.

"Oh, that Pitt!" he cried. "He 's a great man for preparations. He governs rather by what he threatens, than by what he performs. If I had lived, I should have taken him down with mortification!"

Sometimes a clamor rose to the windows, — a sorrowful cry of "Long life to Mirabeau," sent up by the populace, a cry which resembled a prayer, — wailing, rather than hopeful.

Then Mirabeau listened, and had the window opened, that this compensating sound might reach him, and partly repay him for his sufferings. For several seconds he remained with hands and ears bent forward, drinking in and absorbing each sound. Then he murmured: "Oh, the good people, — calumniated, injured, misunderstood, like myself, — it would be more just if it were they who forgot me, and she who rewarded me."

Night came. Gilbert would not quit his patient, but had the extension chair pushed near the bed, and lay down at its foot.

Mirabeau did not object to this. Now that he was sure of death, he no longer seemed afraid of his physician.

As soon as daylight appeared he bade them open the windows.

"My dear Doctor," said the sick man to Gilbert, "to-day I shall die. When one has reached my condition, he has only to perfume himself, and be crowned with flowers, in order to fall, agreeably as possible, into that sleep which knows no waking. Have I your permission to do as I wish?"

Gilbert made a sign to indicate that Mirabeau was entirely his own master. Then the Count called his servants:

"Jean," said he, "get me the finest flowers you can find, while Teisch will take pains to make me look as handsome as possible."

Before going out Jean seemed to wait for permission from Gilbert, who nodded his head in the affirmative.

As to Teisch, who had himself been ill the night before, he began to shave his master and dress his hair.

"By the way, thou wast ill thyself yesterday, my poor Teisch," said Mirabeau. "How is it to-day?"

"Oh, very well, my dear master," said the honest old servant, "and I wish you were in my place!"

Mirabeau laughed. "As for me," he said, "as worthless as thy life seems to thee, I do not wish thee to be in my place."

At this moment a cannon-shot was heard. Whence came it? Nobody knew.

Mirabeau started. "Oh!" said he, sitting up, "have they already begun the obsequies of Achilles?"

Hardly had Jean told the crowd around the mansion, — when they rushed up to him for news about the illustrious invalid, — that he was in search of flowers, than men ran up the street crying out, "Flowers for Mirabeau." All doors opened, and all offered what they could, whether from their apartments or their conservatories, so that in less than fifteen minutes the house was filled with flowers most rare.

By nine o'clock Mirabeau's chamber was transformed into a veritable garden. At that moment Teisch finished his master's toilet.

"My dear Doctor," said Mirabeau, "I ask for a single quarter-hour, in order to make my adieux to some one who must quit the house before me. If anybody wishes to insult that person, I commend her to your protection."

Gilbert understood. "Well, I will leave you alone," he said.

"Yes; but you will wait in the side room? When this person has gone away, you will not leave me again till I am dead?"

Gilbert nodded assent.

"Give me your word," said Mirabeau.

Gilbert stammered as he did so. This stoic was surprised to find himself in tears, for he believed that he had become immovable, through the force of his materialistic science and philosophy.

He went towards the door. Mirabeau stopped him.

"Before going," he said, "open my secretary, and bring me a small casket you will find there."

Gilbert did as Mirabeau desired. The casket was heavy. Gilbert surmised that it was full of gold. Mirabeau made a sign for him to put it on the table, and then extended his hand.

"You will have the goodness to send Jean to me," he said. — "Jean, you understand, not Teisch. It tires me to call or ring."

Gilbert withdrew. Jean was waiting in the next chamber; and as Gilbert came out, the servant went in. Behind Jean, Gilbert heard the door fastened with a bolt.

The next half-hour Gilbert employed in giving the news from the sick-room to the people thronging the lower part of the house. This news was disheartening, for he did not conceal from them the fact that Mirabeau would not probably live through the day.

A carriage stopped in front of the outer door. For an instant Gilbert had an idea it was a carriage from the Court, which, out of respect, had been allowed to drive up to the porch, despite the general prohibition.

He ran to the window. It would be such a consolation for the dying man to know that the Queen remembered him.

It was a simple hired carriage, however, for which Jean had been sent. The Doctor guessed what it meant. Indeed, five minutes afterward, Jean ushered out a lady, wrapped in a large mantle. This woman entered the cab. Before this cab, without asking who the woman was, the crowd respectfully divided.

Jean returned to the house. An instant later the door of Mirabeau's chamber re-opened, and the feeble voice of the invalid was heard asking for the Doctor. Gilbert ran to his side.

"Hold!" said Mirabeau. "Put this casket back in its place, my dear Doctor." Then he added, as Gilbert appeared astonished at finding the casket as heavy as it had been before: "Yes, is n't it odd? Where the Devil has all this disinterestedness been hiding itself so long?"

In returning to the bed Gilbert found on the floor an embroidered handkerchief, trimmed with lace. It was wet with tears.

"Ah!" he said to Mirabeau, "she took nothing away, but she has left something behind."

Mirabeau took the handkerchief, and, noticing its dampness, pressed it to his brow.

"Oh," murmured he, "it is only she who has no heart!"

He fell back on his bed, with his eyes closed; so that one might have supposed him dead or in a swoon, but for the rattle in his chest, which indicated that he was only on the road to death.

CHAPTER XXXII.

FLEE ! FLEE ! FLEE !

THEREAFTER the few hours remaining to Mirabeau were one prolonged agony. None the less Gilbert kept his promise, and remained at his bedside till the last sigh.

However painful, there is always much instruction, for the physician and philosopher, in the spectacle of that last struggle between matter and spirit. The greater the genius, the more interesting is it to study the combat of that genius with death, though it must end in death's victory.

Moreover, in the sight of this great man dying, the Doctor found another cause for sombre reflections. Why should Mirabeau die, this man of athletic temperament and Herculean constitution?

Was it not because he had put forth his hand to sustain a crumbling monarchy? Was it not because he had for an instant pressed the hand of that unfortunate woman, Marie Antoinette?

Had not Cagliostro predicted such a death as lying in wait for Mirabeau? Those two singular beings whom Gilbert had encountered, — one killing the reputation, and the other the health of the great orator of France, after he became the main support of the monarchy, — were they not new proofs that every obstacle was to be crushed, even the Bastille itself, if it came in Cagliostro's way, — or rather, in the way of the ideas he represented?

While Gilbert was plunged in such speculations, Mirabeau made a movement and opened his eyes. He was returning to life, through the gateway of pain.

He tried to speak, but the effort was futile. Far from appearing greatly affected by this new incident, as soon as he was sure that his tongue was mute, he smiled, and tried to express through the eyes his sentiment of obligation towards Gilbert, and towards all others whose care kept him company in that supreme and last stage of the journey whose end was death.

Then a solitary idea seemed to fill his mind. Gilbert alone could guess what it was, and did so.

The sick man could not understand how long the state of unconsciousness had lasted, out of which he had now emerged. Had it lasted an hour? Had it lasted a day? During that hour, or day, had the Queen sent for news of his condition?

The registry was brought up from the door, in which every caller had inscribed his name, whether sent as a messenger, or coming on his own account.

No name, known as being in the circle of royal intimacy, denoted even a disguised solicitude in that quarter. Jean and Teisch were summoned and questioned; but neither valet nor usher had come from the royal household, or even from the Tuileries.

It was evident that Mirabeau was making a supreme effort to speak a few words, — an effort like that ascribed to Crœsus's son, who, seeing his father menaced with death, was able to break the bonds which chained his tongue, and cry out: "Soldier, slay not Crœsus!"

Mirabeau succeeded. "Oh!" he cried, "do they not know that when I am dead they will be lost? I bear with me the monarchy's mourning, and on my tomb the factions will share its tatters."

Gilbert darted to the invalid's bedside. Like a skilful physician he cherished hope so long as there was life. Besides, he would use all the resources of his art, if only to persuade those eloquent lips to speak a few more words.

He took a spoon, and poured into it a few drops of that greenish liquid, a vial of which he had once given Mirabeau, — only this time he did not dilute it with brandy, — and placed it at the mouth of the sick man, who said, smiling: "Oh, dear Doctor, if you want that life-giving liquor to have any effect on me, give me a spoonful, if not all there is in the vial."

"How so?" asked Gilbert, looking inquiringly at Mirabeau.

"Did you believe that I, the pre-eminent abuser of every good gift, could have such a treasure in my hands without abusing it? Not I! I had that liquid analyzed, my dear Æsculapius. I learned that it contained the root of Indian hemp; and then I took it, not only by drops, but by the spoonful, — not for the sake of life, but for the sake of the visions it brought me."

"Unhappy man!" whispered Gilbert. "I little thought I was furnishing you poison."

"Sweet poison, Doctor, thanks to which I have doubled, quadrupled, the last hours of my life, — yes, multiplied them by the hundred. Thanks to that liquid, though I die at forty-two, I have lived a century, and have possessed in imagination, what evaded me in reality, — strength, riches, love. Oh Doctor, Doctor, don't repent this gift, but congratulate yourself over it. God only gave me actual existence, — a life sorrowful, poor, botched, wretched, worthless, — a loan, which man is expected to render up with usury. Doctor, I do not know that I owe God thanks for such a life; but I owe you thanks for your poison. Fill up the spoon, Doctor, and give it me once more."

Gilbert did as Mirabeau demanded, and gave him the medicine, which he relished as something delicious.

After a few silent seconds he said, as if, at the approach of eternity, the dying man was permitted to lift the veil of futurity: "Ah Doctor, happy those who die in this year 1791. They have seen the Revolution, with its face serene and resplendent. Up to this day, no revolution so great has cost so little blood; because heretofore it has been a revolution of minds only; but the time is coming when it will take hold of facts and things. Perhaps you fancy they will regret me, down there at the Tuileries. No! My death will relieve them of an embarrassing bargain. With me, they would have been obliged to govern in a certain way, and I was therefore no longer a support, but an obstacle. She apologized to her brother on my account. She wrote that Mirabeau believed he was advising her, and did not see that she was amusing herself at his expense! Oh, that 's why I wished that woman was my mistress, and not merely my Queen. What a splendid part to sustain in history, Doctor, — that of a man who sustained with one hand the aged monarchy, and youthful liberty with the other, and forced them to march with equal step towards the same end, the welfare of the people, and respect for royalty."

He paused, and then went on: "Perhaps this was a possibility, perhaps it was a vision; but I had a conviction that I alone could realize this vision. What pains me, Doctor, is not that I die, but that I die so incomplete, having undertaken a work, but knowing I cannot carry out that work. Who will glorify my mission, if that mission is abortive, beheaded, maimed? What will be known about me, Doctor, is exactly what were better not known, — that is, my unregulated, foolish, vagabond life. What will be read of my writings, except my 'Letters to Sophia,' my 'Erotica Biblion,' my 'Prussian Monarchy,' and other obscene books and pamphlets? I shall be reproached with having bargained with the Crown, — reproached because nothing came out of this compact, as it should. My work will be but an unformed fœtus, a monster without a head. Dying at forty-two, I shall be judged as if I had lived a whole human lifetime, as if I had not disappeared in the midst of a tempest, as if I had been marching over a good solid road, paved with laws, ordinances, and regulations, instead of stumbling ceaselessly in chaos, and over an abyss. Doctor, to whom can I bequeath, not my dilapidated fortune, — that matters little, since I have no children, — but to whom can I bequeath my calumniated memory, a memory which should one day be a heritage honorable to France, Europe, the world?"

"Why then are you in such haste to die?" sorrowfully responded Gilbert.

"Oh, there are moments when I ask that question of myself, — as you ask it. Listen to this! I can do nothing without her, and she will have none of me. I pledged myself like a fool. I swore fidelity like an idiot, always submissive to those invisible wings in my brain which bore away my heart; while she swore to nothing, promised nothing. So, Doctor, all is for the best; and if you'll promise me one thing, not a single regret will trouble me during the few hours I have to live."

"In Heaven's name, what can I promise you, my own dear friend?"

"Well, promise me, if my exit from life is too hard, too painful, — promise me, not only as a physician, but also as a man, and yet more as a philosopher, — promise to help me on the way."

"Why do you ask me such a thing?"

"Ah, I 'll tell you. Though I feel that death is here, I also feel that life remains strong within me. I pass away, not as one dying, but I die alive, dear Doctor, and the last step will be hard to take."

The Doctor bent his face near the invalid's. "I have promised not to leave you, my friend. If God, — and I still hope this is not so, — if God has condemned you to death, — well, in that awful moment, leave it to my tender care to accomplish all I have to do. If death is here, I shall be here also."

It was evident the invalid only waited for this promise. "I thank you!" he murmured, and then his head fell back on the pillow.

This time, despite that hopefulness which it is the duty of a physician to instil into the mind of a sick man, even to the last drop, Gilbert could no longer doubt the end. For a few minutes the strong dose of hasheesh, which Mirabeau had taken, — like the shocks of an electric battery, — had restored to the sick man, together with his speech, that play of the muscles, — that vitality of thought, so to speak, — which accompanies speech; but when he ceased to talk, the muscles drooped, that brain-life vanished, and the death-marks, imprinted on his face ever since the last crisis, now appeared more deeply graven than ever.

For three hours his icy hand rested in Gilbert's. During these three hours, — from four o'clock till seven, — his agony was quieted. He was so calm, that all the world might have been allowed to visit him. You might have believed him asleep.

Towards eight, however, Gilbert felt the cold hand tremble in his own. This motion was so violent that it could not be mistaken. " Now comes the hour of struggle, now begins the last agony," said Gilbert to himself.

The forehead of the dying man was covered with perspiration. His eyes re-opened, and shone brightly. He made a motion, which indicated his wish to drink. They hastened to offer him water, wine, orangeade ; but he shook his head. These were not what he wished.

Then he motioned for them to bring him a quill, ink, and paper. They obeyed him, in order that no thought of his might be lost, whether it was the sentiment of a great genius, or only the words of delirium.

He took the quill, and traced these words with a firm hand : To die, to sleep, — the words of Hamlet, in his great soliloquy upon life and death.

Gilbert seemed not to understand. Mirabeau dropped the quill, grasped his chest with both hands, as if he would tear it open, uttered a few inarticulate syllables, took up the quill again, and wrote, with a superhuman effort, as if commanding the pain to stand still an instant : " These pains have become grinding, insupportable. Must a man be left on the rack for hours, perhaps for days, when a few drops of opium will spare him this torture ? "

The Doctor hesitated. Yes, as he had said to Mirabeau, — in this agonizing moment, he was there, face to face with death ; but he was there to fight against death, not to be its second in the duel.

The distress became more and more violent. The sick man straightened himself out, distorted his hands, gnawed his pillow.

At last he broke the paralytic bonds, and suddenly exclaimed : " Oh, these doctors, these doctors ! Gilbert, are you not my physician and my friend ? Have n't you promised to spare me the agony of such a death? Will you make me regret having trusted you? Gilbert, I appeal to your friendship, I appeal to your honor!" and with a sigh, a groan, a scream of pain, he fell back on his pillow.

Gilbert sighed in his turn, and offered his hand to Mirabeau. "You are right, my friend. You shall have what you wish."

He took the quill to write a prescription, which was for a strong dose of the syrup of diacodium, in a glass of distilled water; but hardly had he written the last word, when Mirabeau raised himself on his bed, and put out his hand for the quill, which Gilbert hastened to give him.

Then with a cramped hand, already clinched in death, he inscribed on the paper these words, in writing scarcely legible, "Flee! Flee! Flee!"

He tried to sign it, but could hardly trace the first four letters of his name, and extended his convulsive arm towards Gilbert. "For her!" he whispered; and again fell on his pillow, — motionless, breathless, sightless.

He was dead!

Gilbert approached the bed, looked into the face, felt the pulse, placed his hand over the heart. Then, turning to the spectators of this trying scene, he said: "Gentlemen, Mirabeau no longer suffers."

Pressing a last kiss on the forehead of the dead man, he took the paper, whose destination he alone knew, folded it religiously, placed it in his breast-pocket, and went out, thinking that he had no right to detain the message an instant longer than the time required for conveying the advice of the illustrious dead from the Chaussée d'Antin to the Tuileries.

A few seconds after the Doctor left the death-chamber, there arose a great clamor in the street. The rumor of Mirabeau's death had begun to spread.

Soon came a sculptor, sent by Gilbert, in order that an image of the great orator, at the very moment when he was vanquished by death, might be preserved for posterity.

A few minutes of eternity had already given back to the fleshly mask that serenity reflected on Mirabeau's features by a powerful soul, in quitting the body it had animated.

Mirabeau was not dead. He seemed asleep, and his slumber was full of life and smiling dreams.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

THE OBSEQUIES.

GRIEF was wide-spread, universal. In an instant it spread from centre to circumference, from Rue Chaussée d'Antin to the barriers of Paris.

The populace raised a tremendous clamor. Then they took it upon themselves to see that the city showed proper respect for the dead. They ran to the theatres, tore down the placards, and closed the doors. A ball was in progress that evening, in a mansion in Rue Chaussée d'Antin. The populace invaded the house, dispersed the dancers, and broke the musicians' instruments.

The bereavement was announced to the National Assembly by its President. Barrère immediately ascended the rostrum. He moved that, with the official proceedings of that sorrowful day, should be recorded testimonials of the Assembly's regret at the loss of such a great man; and insisted, in the name of the Nation, that an invitation be given to all the members of the Assembly to attend the funeral.

On the next day, April 3, the Department of Paris presented itself to the National Assembly, and demanded and obtained a vote that the Church of Saint Genevieve be constituted a Pantheon, consecrated to the sepulture of distinguished men, and that Mirabeau should be buried there first of all.

Here let us put on record the magnificent decree of the Assembly. Even in such books as this, — which politicians esteem frivolous, because stories teach history in a form not quite so heavy as that employed by the historians,—it is well, we say, to meet such grand decrees as often as possible, no matter where we find them, provided they come within reach of the public eye,—decrees drawn out by the admiration or respect of a nation.

Here is the decree, as originally voted:

THE NATIONAL ASSEMBLY DECREES:

Article First.

The new edifice of Saint Genevieve shall be set apart for the reception of the ashes of illustrious men, dating from the epoch of French liberty.

Article Second.

The Legislative Body alone shall decide upon whom this honor shall be bestowed.

Article Third.

Honoré Riquetti Mirabeau is judged worthy of this honor.

Article Fourth.

No Legislature shall hereafter award this honor to its own deceased members; but such propositions must be referred to the Legislature following.

Article Fifth.

Exceptions in favor of those great men who died before the Revolution can only be made by the Legislative Body.

Article Sixth.

The administration of the Department of Paris shall be charged with promptly putting the edifice of Saint Genevieve into proper condition to fulfil its new destination, and on its front shall be graven these words:

TO HER GREAT MEN, BY A GRATEFUL NATION.

Article Seventh.

While the new Church of Saint Genevieve is being prepared for the purpose, the body of Riquetti Mirabeau shall be laid beside the remains of Descartes, in the basement of the Church of Saint Genevieve.

The Pantheon was subsequently made the object of several decrees, which are here cited side by side, — or rather one after the other, — but without comment.

A decree was passed February 20, 1806. In the First Section it is provided that the Church of Saint Denis shall be the burial-place of the emperors. In the Second Section are the following articles:

Article Seventh.

The Church of Saint Genevieve shall be completed and used for public worship, conformably to the intentions of its founder, under the invocation of Saint Genevieve, the Patron Saint of Paris.

Article Eighth.

It shall also continue to serve the purpose to which it was dedicated by the Assembly of 1791, and shall be consecrated to the burial of great dignitaries, distinguished officers of the Empire and the Crown, of Senators, of the chief officers of the Legion of Honor, and — by virtue of our special decrees — of other citizens, who by a career of arms, statesmanship, or literature, render eminent service to their country; their bodies to be embalmed and buried in the church.

Article Ninth.

The slabs now kept in the Museum of French Monuments shall be transported to this church, and there be arranged in the order of their respective centuries.

Article Tenth.

The Metropolitan Chapter of the Church of Notre Dame, increased by six members, shall have charge of the services at the Church of Saint Genevieve. The guardianship of that church shall be specially confided to an archpriest (or dean), chosen by the canons.

Article Eleventh.

There shall be solemn official services on January 3, the Feast of Saint Genevieve ; on August 15, the Feast of Saint Napoleon, and the Anniversary of the conclusion of the Concordat (legally restoring public worship to France); on All Souls Day ; on the First Sunday in December, the anniversary of the Emperor's Coronation and of the Battle of Austerlitz ; and whenever there shall be burials, in pursuance of the present decree. No other public religious services shall be held in this church, except with our approbation.

On December 12, 1821, another order was issued :

LOUIS (THE EIGHTEENTH) BY THE GRACE OF GOD, KING OF FRANCE AND NAVARRE, TO ALL WHOM IT MAY CONCERN — GREETING :

The church which our grandfather, Louis the Fifteenth, began to build, under the invocation of Saint Genevieve, is happily finished. Though it has not yet received all the ornaments which will complete its splendor, it is nevertheless in a condition to permit the celebration of divine service. In order, therefore, not to longer retard the accomplishment of the founder's intentions, and to re-establish, conformably to his views and our own, the worship of the Patron Saint, whose aid our good City of Paris has been accustomed to implore in all times of need ; and in accordance with the report of our Minister of Internal Affairs, we have ordained and do ordain as follows :

Article First.

The new church, founded by King Louis Fifteenth, in honor of Saint Genevieve, the Patron Saint of Paris, shall be forever consecrated to divine worship, under the invocation of that saint. To this end the church is placed at the disposition of the Archbishop of Paris, who will have it provisionally served by ecclesiastics whom he may appoint.

Article Second.

There shall be subsequent provisions in regard to regular and perpetual services in this church, and the nature of those services.

Signed: LOUIS.

Countersigned: SIMÉON.

On August 20, 1830, another ordinance was passed :

Considering that national justice and the honor of France require that illustrious men, who have deserved well of their country, — by contributing to its honor and glory, — should receive, after their death, open testimonials of public recognition and esteem ; considering also, for the attainment of this end, that the laws setting apart the Pantheon for such a purpose, should be vigorously renewed, — we have ordained, and do ordain, as follows :

Article First.

The Pantheon shall be restored to its former legalized uses. The remains of illustrious men, who have deserved well of their country, shall be buried in this church. The inscription shall be restored on its front, —

TO HER GREAT MEN, BY A GRATEFUL NATION.

Article Second.

Measures shall be taken to determine upon what conditions and in what form this testimonial of national gratitude shall be bestowed in the name of the country. A commission shall be immediately appointed, to prepare a draft of a law to this effect.

Article Third.

The decree of February 20, 1806, and the ordinance of December 12, 1821, are repealed.

Signed: LOUIS PHILIPPE.

Countersigned: GUIZOT.

On December 6, 1851, another decree was issued :

THE PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC,

in view of the law of April 4/10, 1791, of the decree of February 20, 1806, of the ordinance of December 12, 1821, of August 26, 1830, decrees as follows :

Article First.

The old Church of Saint Genevieve is restored to public worship, conformably to the intentions of its founder, under the invocation of Saint Genevieve, the Protectress of Paris. Measures shall ultimately be taken for regulating the permanent exercise of Catholic worship in this church.

Article Second.

The ordinance of August 26, 1830, is repealed.

Article Third.

The Minister of Public Instruction and Worship, and the Minister of Public Works, are entrusted, — so far as this duty comes under their respective jurisdictions, — with the execution of this decree, which shall be inserted in the Bulletin of Laws.

Signed: LOUIS NAPOLEON.

Countersigned: FORTOUL.

Returning to the thread of our narrative, on the next day, at four in the afternoon, the National Assembly left the Riding School, in a body, and proceeded to Mirabeau's mansion, where they were awaited by the director of the Department of Paris, by all the cabinet ministers, and by more than a hundred thousand other persons; but among these hundred thousand, not one specially represented the Queen.

The procession took up its line of march. At the head was Lafayette, as the general in command of the National Guard of the Kingdom.

Then came the President of the National Assembly, Tronchet, royally surrounded by a dozen ushers, wearing their insignia of office.

Next came the cabinet ministers; and next, the members of the Assembly, without distinction of party, Sieyès giving his arm to Charles de Lameth.

After the Assembly came the members of the Jacobin Club, like a second National Assembly. They were especially noticeable for their grief, which was probably quite as ostentatious as it was real. The Club had voted to wear mourning for eight days; and Robespierre, too poor to afford the expense of a new coat, wore a hired garment, as he had done when in mourning for Benjamin Franklin.

Following the Jacobins came the entire population of Paris, hedged in between two lines of National Guardsmen, amounting to over thirty thousand men.

Funeral music, in which were two instruments, until then unknown, — the trombone and the tamtam, — marked step for this immense crowd.

It was eight o'clock by the time the procession arrived at Saint Eustache. The funeral eulogy was pronounced by Cérutti. At his last word ten thousand National Guards, who were inside the church, discharged their muskets at one instant. The populace, who had not expected this discharge, set up a great outcry. The commotion was so violent that not a tile remained unbroken. For an instant it seemed as if the arch of the temple was falling, and that the church would serve as a tomb for both the living and the dead.

The procession resumed its march, with torches. The night-shades had descended, and not only invaded the streets through which the mourners passed, but permeated most of the hearts passing through them.

The death of Mirabeau was indeed a political eclipse. Mirabeau dead, who knew into what path France might enter? The skilful tamer was no longer there to guide the mettlesome coursers called Ambition and Hate. It was felt that he carried away with him something which in future the Assembly would greatly miss, — the spirit of peace, watching in the midst of war, and goodness of heart, hidden beneath a fiery nature.

All the world was the loser by his death. The Royalists had no longer a spur, nor the Revolutionists a bridle. Henceforth the chariot would roll more rapidly, and the descent be sharper. Who could tell whither it was rolling, — towards victory or towards an abyss?

The Pantheon was not reached till midnight.

In that procession one man only was lacking, — Pétion. Why had Pétion remained away? He gave a reason to two of his friends, who next day reproached him for his absence. He said that he had read a plan for an Anti-Revolutionary conspiracy, written in Mirabeau's hand.

Three years afterward, on a gloomy autumn day, no longer in the hall at the Riding School, but in the hall of the Tuileries, the Convention, — after having killed the King, after having killed the Queen, after having killed the Girondists, after having killed the members of the Cordelier Club, after having killed the Jacobins, after having killed the ultra Republicans, after having killed itself, — having nothing living left to kill, began to kill off the dead.

With savage joy the Convention declared that it had been deceived in the judgment given in Mirabeau's honor, as, in its eyes, his genius could not atone for his corruption. A new decree was therefore enacted, excluding Mirabeau from the Pantheon.

On the threshold of that temple an usher published the decree, which declared Mirabeau unfit to share the burial-place of Rousseau and Descartes, and ordered the guardian of the church to deliver up the great orator's body.

Thus a voice, more terrible than the one to be heard in the Valley of Jehoshaphat, cried out, before its time: "Pantheon, give up thy dead!"

The Pantheon obeyed. Mirabeau's corpse was delivered to the usher, who, as he himself declared, "removed the aforesaid coffin, and placed it in the common burial-place;" and this common burial-ground was Clamart, the cemetery for criminals.

Doubtless to render this punishment more terrible, — a punishment which pushed its inquisition beyond death's door, — this removal was accomplished by night, and without an escort; and the coffin was again buried, but this time in solitude, without any indication of the place of interment, — without cross, stone, or inscription.

Later, however, an old gravedigger, — questioned by one of those inquisitive spirits, who are anxious to know what others ignore, — led him, one evening, across the desolate graveyard, stopped at the centre of the enclosure, and said, stamping his foot, "It is here!"

Then he repeated, as the curious visitor asked for more proof: "It is here! I can answer for it, for I helped lower it into the grave; and I nearly tumbled in after it, the confounded leaden coffin was so heavy."

This man was Nodier, — Charles Nodier. One day he conducted me also to Clamart, stamped his foot in the same place, and said to me, in his turn: "It is here!"

For more than fifty years have successive generations passed the unknown tomb of Mirabeau. Is this not a sufficiently long expiation for a contestable offence, which belonged rather to Mirabeau's enemies than to Mirabeau himself? Will it not be time, at the first opportunity, to dig up that impure soil, in which he rests, till we find this leaden coffin, which weighed down the poor gravedigger's arms so wofully, and which may be recognized as belonging to the man proscribed from the Pantheon?

Perhaps Mirabeau did not deserve the Pantheon; but this is sure, — many repose, and will repose, in Christian earth, who deserve, more than he, to be denied the rites of sepulture.

O France! either outside of consecrated ground, or in the Pantheon, let Mirabeau have a tomb! and let it have his name for its single epitaph, his bust for its only ornament, with the future for his sole judge.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

THE MESSENGER.

On the morning of April 2, an hour or so before Mirabeau breathed his last, a naval officer, wearing his uniform as captain of a ship, came along the Rue Saint Honoré, and turned towards the Tuileries, passing through Rue Saint Louis and Rue Échelle.

At the end of the Stable Courtyard he turned to the right, climbed over the chains which separated the stables from the interior courtyard, returned the salute of the sentinel who presented arms, and entered the Swiss Courtyard.

Like a man to whom the way is familiar, he then went up a small staircase, used by the servants, which, through a long and winding corridor, communicated with the King's private office.

On perceiving him the valet uttered a cry of surprise, almost of joy; but the new-comer placed his fingers on his lips, as he said: "Monsieur Hue, can the King receive me soon?"

"The King is with General Lafayette, to whom he is giving his orders for the day; but as soon as the General leaves —"

"You will announce me?"

"Oh, that's hardly necessary! His Majesty expects you, and yesterday evening gave orders for you to be admitted as soon as you arrived."

At that moment they heard the small bell jingle in the King's office.

"There!" said the valet. "Probably the King is ringing, in order to inquire about you."

"Go in, Monsieur Hue, and lose no time, — if, indeed, the King is free, and can see me."

The valet opened the door, and almost instantly announced the visitor, — a proof that the King was alone. Charny entered quickly, and with respectful earnestness approached the King, who was saying: "Let him come in! Let him come in! I have been waiting for him ever since yesterday."

"Sire," said the Count, "I am a few hours behindhand, as it appears; but I hope your Majesty will pardon me, when you learn the reasons of my tardiness."

"Come, come, Monsieur de Charny. I was waiting impatiently for you, it is true; but to begin with, I agree with you, that only an important matter could make your journey less rapid than it might have been. You are here, and you are welcome!" and he offered the Count his hand, which the Count kissed respectfully.

"Sire," said Charny, as he observed the King's impatience, "I received your orders day before yesterday, in the night, and I started from Montmédy yesterday morning, at three o'clock."

"How did you travel?"

"By postchaise."

"That explains the few hours of delay," said the King, smiling.

"Sire, I came at full speed, — at such a rate that I should have been here by ten or eleven last night, and perhaps sooner, if I had taken the direct route; but I wished to inform myself as to the chances, good or bad, of the route chosen by your Majesty. I wanted to know which posts were well furnished with horses, and the reverse. Above all, I wished to know how much time, to a minute, — or even a second, — would be required in travelling from Montmédy to Paris, and consequently from Paris to Montmédy. I noted every point, and am therefore, in a measure, able to answer for everything."

"Bravo, Monsieur de Charny! You 're an admirable helper. However, let me begin by telling you how we are situated here. Then you can tell me how it is with you out there."

"Oh, Sire, if I may judge by what I have heard, things here are going very badly."

"They have reached such a point that I am a prisoner in the Tuileries, my dear Count! As I just now said to that dear Monsieur Lafayette, my jailer, I would rather be King of Metz than of France. — But happily, you 're here!"

"Your Majesty did me the honor of saying you would post me as to the run of affairs."

"Yes, in two words. You have heard of the flight of my aunts?"

"As all the world has heard of it, Sire, but not the details."

"Oh Lord, it 's very simple. You know the Assembly allows us only sworn priests, who have taken the oaths of allegiance to the Constitution. Well, those poor women were frightened at the approach of Easter. They believed it would be at the peril of their souls, if they should confess to a Constitutional priest; and by my advice — I acknowledge it — they went to Rome. There was no law to prevent the trip, and there was no reason to fear lest two poor old ladies should strengthen the party of absentees. Narbonne had entire charge of their departure, but I do not know how he managed. The whole affair was discovered, however, and one night they had a visit, — of the same sort as ours, on that dreadful Fifth of October, — at Bellevue, on the very evening of their departure. Fortunately they went out by one door, just as the mob arrived at the other. You will understand, — there was not a carriage to be had. Three were to have been in waiting, according to agreement. They had to go afoot as far as Meudon. There, at last, they found carriages, and were soon on their journey. Three hours later there was a great rumpus throughout Paris. Those who intended to prevent their departure found the nest warm, but empty. The journals were all ablaze the next day. Marat declared they had carried off millions. Desmoulins said they had carried off the Dauphin. There was no truth in all this. The poor ladies had three or four hundred thousand francs in their purses, and they were bothered enough over that, without having charge of a child, whose presence would certainly have betrayed them; and the proof of this is, that they were themselves recognized, first at Moret, where they were allowed to pass on, and then at Arnay le Duc, where they were stopped. They made me write to the Assembly, asking permission for them to continue their journey. Despite that letter, the Assembly discussed the point all day. Finally my aunts were authorized to continue their journey, but on condition that the committee prepare a law against future emigration."

"Yes," said Charny, "but I believe, after Mirabeau's magnificent speech, the Assembly rejected that law."

"Undoubtedly it was rejected; but side by side with this petty triumph was a great humiliation. When they saw what a disturbance was created by the departure of these poor old ladies, some devoted friends, — and more such friends remain to me than I had supposed, — some devoted friends, about fifty gentlemen, hurried to the Tuileries, to offer me their lives. It was immediately noised abroad that a conspiracy for carrying me away had been brought to light. Lafayette was hurried off to the Faubourg Saint Antoine, under the pretext that there was a row near the ruins of the Bastille. Furious at being duped, he returned to the Tuileries, which he entered sword in hand, with bayonets paraded in front of him, and arrested and disarmed our poor friends. Pistols and knives were found on some of them. Each had taken any weapon readiest to his hand. Good! That day will be entered in history under a new name. It will be called the Day of the Poniard Knights."

"Oh Sire, Sire, in what terrible times we live!" said Charny, shaking his head.

"But listen! — Every year we drive to Saint Cloud, — an agreeable as well as a customary diversion. Well, day before yesterday we ordered the carriages. When we went down to the courtyard, we found fifteen hundred people around those carriages. We took our seats in them, but it was impossible to drive on. The people grabbed the horses' bridles, and declared that I meant to run away, but should n't. After an hour of wasted effort, we had to come back. The Queen cried with vexation."

"But was n't Lafayette there to compel the populace to respect your Majesty?"

"Lafayette? Do you know what he did? He had them sound the tocsin on Saint Roch. He ran to the Hôtel de Ville, to ask for the red flag, in order to declare the country in danger. — The country in danger, because the King and Queen were going to Saint Cloud! — Do you know who refused him the red flag, and even snatched it from his hands, — for he already held it? Danton!

Then he pretended that Danton had sold himself to me, — that Danton received from me a hundred thousand francs a month. — That 's where we stand, my dear Count, without counting Mirabeau, who is dying, — who is perhaps dead, at this very hour."

"All the more reason for making haste, Sire."

"That 's what we 're going to do. Tell me what you decided over there with Bouillé. Everything is strong there, I hope. That little affair at Nancy furnished an occasion for increasing his command, and putting fresh troops at his disposal."

"Yes, Sire; but unhappily the arrangements of the Minister of War ran counter to ours. He has withdrawn the regiment of Saxon hussars, and refuses to send the Swiss regiments. It was with great difficulty Bouillé retained the regiment of Bouillon infantry at the Montmédy fortress."

"The War Minister suspects, then?"

"No, Sire. It was only a coincidence; but no matter! In such enterprises, we must take the chances of fire and accident; but if an enterprise is well conducted, there are always ninety chances of success out of a hundred."

"Well then, as that is so, let us return to our own affairs."

"Sire, your Majesty is still determined to follow the route through Châlons, Saint Menehould, Clermont, Varennes, and Stenay, — although that route is at least twenty leagues longer than the others, and there is no post-agency at Varennes?"

"I have already explained to Bouillé my motives for preferring that road."

"Yes, Sire, and he transmitted to us your Majesty's orders on this subject. It is in accordance with these orders that I have marked out the route, bush by bush, stone by stone. The chart should be in your Majesty's hands."

"And it is a model of clearness, my dear Count. I know the route about as well as if I had taken the trip myself."

"Well, Sire, here is the information gained from my last journey, to be added to the rest."

"Speak, Monsieur de Charny, and I will listen; and for greater clearness, here is the map, prepared by yourself."

As he spoke, the King drew from a portfolio this map, which he spread on the table. This map was not engraved, but drawn by hand. As Charny had said, not a tree, not a rock was missing, and the map was the result of eight months' labor. Charny and the King bent over this chart.

"Sire," said Charny, "the real danger for your Majesty begins at Saint Menehould, and ceases at Stenay. It is over those eighteen leagues that we should spread our detachments."

"Could they not come yet nearer to Paris, Monsieur de Charny, — as far as Châlons, for example?"

"Sire, it would be difficult. Châlons is too strong a town for anything efficacious to be accomplished there for your Majesty's safety, by forty, fifty, or even a hundred men, if that safety should be endangered. Besides, Bouillé can be responsible for nothing, after leaving Saint Menehould. The best he can do — and he bade me discuss this with your Majesty — is to place his first detachment at Sommevelle Bridge. — You see, Sire, here it is, on the map, — the first post-station beyond Châlons;" and Charny pointed out with his finger the place in question.

"So," said the King, "in ten or twelve hours we should be at Châlons. In how many hours did you make your whole ninety leagues?"

"Sire, in thirty-six hours."

"But that was in a light vehicle, and you had with you only one servant."

"Sire, I lost three hours on the journey, in examining the neighborhood of Varennes, to see where relays of horses had best be placed, — whether this side of the town, towards Saint Menehould, or the other side, towards Dun. We will revert to that again presently. Those three lost hours will compensate for the weight of your coach. My opinion is, that the King could go from Paris to Montmédy in thirty-five or thirty-six hours."

"And what did you decide about the relays at Varennes? That 's the important point. We must be sure not to miss our horses."

"Yes, Sire; and my opinion is that the relays should be stationed beyond the town, on the side towards Dun."

"On what do you base that opinion?"

"On the situation of the town, Sire."

"Describe the locality, Count."

"Sire, it is easily done. I have passed through Varennes five or six times, since I left Paris, and yesterday I remained there over noon, — three hours. Varennes is a small town of sixteen hundred inhabitants, divided into two distinct parts, called the Upper and Lower Villages, separated by the River Aire, and connected only by the bridge which spans the river. If your Majesty will follow me on the map — There, Sire, there it is, near the Argonne Forest, on the very edge of it! — See?"

"Yes, here I am," said the King. "The highway makes a tremendous elbow, in the forest, so as to reach Clermont."

"Even so, Sire."

"But all this does not show me why you would place our relays beyond Varennes, rather than this side of it."

"Wait, Sire. The bridge, which leads from one village to the other, is commanded by a high tower. This tower, the old tower of a tollhouse, is situated in a gloomy, dark, narrow place. The least obstacle would obstruct the way. As there is some risk to be run, better take the chances of getting over this bridge, with the horses and postilions from Clermont, rather than change horses five hundred paces this side of that bridge, which, if the King should be recognized, could be guarded and defended, — if a simple alarm was given, — by three or four men."

"That is sensible," said the King, "though in case of any difficulty, you will be there."

"That will be at once my duty and honor, if the King judges me so worthy."

The King again offered his hand to Charny, and said: "So Bouillé has already marked the sections, and chosen the men who are to dot the way."

"With your approbation, — yes, Sire."

"Has he given you a memorandum on this subject?"

Charny drew out a folded paper, and presented it respectfully to the King. The King unfolded it and read:

The opinion of the Marquis de Bouillé is, that the military detachments should not go beyond Saint Menehould, on the Paris side. If, however, the King insists that they should be sent as far as Sommevelle Bridge, I would station, as follows, the forces destined to serve as his escort:

1. At Sommevelle Bridge, forty hussars from the Lauzun Regiment, commanded by Choiseul, with Lieutenant Boudet under his orders.

2. At Saint Menehould, thirty dragoons from the Royal Regiment, commanded by Captain Dandoins.

3. At Clermont, a hundred dragoons from Monsieur's Regiment, and forty from the Royal, commanded by Charles de Damas.

4. At Varennes, sixty hussars from Lauzun s Regiment, commanded by Rohrig, Jules (not Louis) de Bouillé, and Raigecourt.

5. At Dun, a hundred hussars from Lauzun's Regiment, commanded by Captain Deslon.

6. At Mouzay, fifty horsemen from the Royal German, commanded by Captain Guntzer.

7. Lastly, at Stenay, the Royal German Regiment, under its lieutenant-colonel, Baron de Mandell.

After reading this memorandum the King said: "This appears to me very well; but as these detachments must be stationed in the villages or cities two or three days beforehand, what pretext can be given for their presence?"

"Sire, the pretext is provided for. They will be ordered to act as escorts for messengers bringing a large sum of money, sent by the Minister of War to the army in the north."

"Then all is provided for," said the King, with evident satisfaction.

Charny bowed.

"And speaking of a remittance of money," said the King, "do you know whether Bouillé received the million I sent him?"

"Yes, Sire. Only, your Majesty knows this million was in assignats, and those bonds are now twenty per cent below par." These notes had just been placed in the financial market.

"And could you discount them at that rate?"

"Sire, a faithful subject of your Majesty was glad to be able to take them, for his own use, at a hundred thousand crowns, — that is, without discount."

The King looked at Charny. "And the rest, Count?"

"The rest were discounted for Louis de Bouillé, by his father's banker, Monsieur Perregaux, who gave him the amount in letters of exchange on the Bethmanns of Frankfort, who have already accepted this credit. Money will be forthcoming, at the proper time."

"Thanks, Monsieur," said King Louis. "Meanwhile, you must tell me the name of this loyal servant, who has perhaps compromised his fortune, in order to furnish this hundred thousand crowns to Bouillé."

"Sire, this faithful servant is rich, and consequently claims no merit for what he has done."

"Never mind, Monsieur, the King wishes to know his name."

"Sire," responded Charny, "the sole condition he placed upon this service to your Majesty, was that he might remain unknown."

"Then you know him?"

"I know him, Sire."

"Monsieur de Charny," said the King, with that soulful dignity which he occasionally displayed, "here is a ring, which is very precious to me." He drew a plain gold ring from his finger. "I took this from the hand of my dying father, as I kissed that hand, cold in death. Therein lies its value, for it has no other; but to a heart able to understand me, this ring will become more precious than a diamond of the first water. Repeat to this faithful friend what I tell you, and give him this ring, in my name."

A couple of tears escaped from Charny's eyes. His breast swelled and palpitated. He knelt on one knee, to receive the ring from the King's hands.

At that moment the door was opened, without announcement. The King turned quickly, for this was an infraction of the royal etiquette, and was considered a great insult, if not excused by a great necessity.

It was the Queen. The Queen was pale, and held a paper in her hand; but at the sight of the kneeling Count, kissing the King's ring, and putting it on his own finger, she dropped the paper, and uttered a cry of astonishment.

Charny rose, and respectfully saluted the Queen, who stammered between her teeth: "Monsieur de Charny! — Monsieur de Charny! — here! — with the King! — at the Tuileries — ?" and then she added to herself: "And I did not know it!"

There was such sorrow in the poor Queen's eyes, that Charny, who divined the end of her sentence, though he could not hear it, took two steps towards her.

"I have just arrived," he said, "and was about asking permission to present my homage to your Majesty."

The blood rose to the Queen's cheeks. It was a long time since she had heard Charny's voice, and longer still since she had heard, in that voice, the sweet intonation which he gave to these few words.

She extended both hands, as if to go to him; but almost instantly she recovered herself, and placed one hand on her heart, which was doubtless beating violently.

Charny saw all, understood all. Although it has required many lines, in which to describe and explain these sensations, they all developed themselves in the little time it took the King to pick up the paper which had escaped from the Queen's grasp, and which a current of air — caused by the opening of the door while the window also was open — had blown to the end of the room.

The King read what was written on the paper, but without understanding it; so he asked: "What do these three words mean, — flee! flee! flee! — and this fragment of a signature?"

"Sire," responded the Queen, "they mean that Mirabeau died ten minutes ago, and sends us this dying counsel."

"Madame," said the King, "this counsel shall be followed, for it is good, and the time has now come for putting it into execution."

Turning to Charny he continued: "You can follow the Queen to her apartments, and tell her all."

The Queen raised herself, looked alternately at Charny and the King, and then said: "Come with me, Monsieur."

She went out precipitately; for she felt it would be impossible, if she remained an instant longer, to conceal the conflicting emotions within her heart.

Charny bowed again to the King, and followed Marie Antoinette.

CHAPTER XXXV.

THE PROMISE.

THE Queen regained her own apartments, and fell upon a sofa, making a sign for Charny to close the door behind him.

Fortunately the boudoir which they entered was deserted, Doctor Gilbert having requested the privilege of speaking to the Queen without witnesses, in order to tell her what had happened, and to give her Mirabeau's last words.

Hardly was she seated when her too full heart overflowed, and she sobbed pitifully.

These sobs were so genuine and so deep, that they went to the bottom of Charny's heart, and stirred up the remnants of his passion.

We say the remnants of his passion, because such a passion, as we have seen quicken and glow and burn in the heart of this man, is never wholly extinguished, unless there comes to it one of those terrible shocks which make love give place to hate.

Charny was in such a strange situation as only those can appreciate who have been in similar situations. He had an old and a new passion on his hands at the same time; and there is a certain English poet who says something about being "off with the old love, before we are on with the new."

He had learned to love Andrée with all the fire of his heart, yet he loved the Queen with all the pity of his soul.

At each laceration of her poor love, a laceration caused by egotism, — that is, by the excess of that love, — he had, so to speak, felt his heart bleed for the woman; and each time, understanding this egotism, like all to whom a past amour has become a burden, he was not strong enough to excuse it.

Whenever this genuine grief burst forth in his presence, without recriminations and reproaches, he measured the depth of the Queen's love. He recalled what human prejudices, what social duties, this woman had despised for his sake. Bending over this abyss, he could not prevent himself from dropping a regretful tear and a consoling word.

When, however, reproaches mingled with her sobs, and recriminations found expression on her lips, he immediately remembered the tyranny of her passion, her absolute will, — the royal despotism which was always mixed with her sentiments of tenderness and the outcome of her passion, — then Charny straightened himself against this tyranny, armed himself against this despotism, entered into combat with this will. He mentally compared Andrée's sweet and unalterable face with the Queen's; and he gave the preference to that statue, all ice as he believed it to be, rather than to this passionate image, always ready to launch the lightnings of her love, her jealousy, or her pride.

On this occasion the Queen wept without speaking. It was more than a year since she had seen Charny. Faithful to the promise he had made the King, during all this time the Count had concealed himself from nearly everybody.

For an unprecedented time, therefore, the Queen had remained in the densest ignorance concerning the welfare — yes, and the whereabouts — of one who had been so closely allied to her, during the two or three years preceding, that she then fancied it quite impossible to separate one heart from the other, without breaking both.

Yet, as we know, Charny had left her, without even telling her his destination. There was this one consolation, however, — she knew him to be employed in the King's service, and in such a way that she could say to herself: "In working for the King, he works also for me; and so he is forced to think of me, even if he wishes to forget me."

It was a feeble consolation to know that his remembrance reached her on the rebound, when for a long time it had belonged to her directly and alone.

Meeting Charny again, at a moment when she least expected to see him, finding him with the King on his return, almost on the same spot where she saw him on the day of his sudden departure, all the sorrows which had stung her soul during the Count's long absence — all the thoughts which had tormented her heart, all the tears which had burned her eyes — rushed back upon her in one tumultuous flood, inundating her cheeks, and filling her bosom with all the anguish she fondly believed to be vanished, all the sorrows she had tried to relegate to the past.

She wept for the sake of weeping. Her tears must stifle her, if they could not find egress.

She wept without speaking a word. Was it from joy? Was it from sorrow? From both, perhaps; for every powerful emotion takes the form of tears.

Also without speaking, and therefore with more love than respect, Charny approached the Queen, drew from her face one of the hands which covered it, and pressed his lips to that hand.

"Madame, I am happy and proud to tell you there has not been an hour, since the day when I took leave of you, when I was not busy in your behalf."

"Oh Charny, Charny, there was a time when you would have been less busy in my behalf, but would have thought of me much more."

"Madame, I was charged with a grave responsibility. This responsibility imposed upon me the most absolute silence, till my mission should be completed. This completion has been achieved only to-day. To-day I can see you again, I can talk with you; whereas, until to-day, I could not even write."

"You have given a beautiful example of loyalty, Oliver," dolefully said the Queen; "and I regret but one thing, — that you were only able to do this at the expense of another sentiment."

"Madame, permit me, since I have the King's permission, to inform you what has been done for your safety."

"Oh Charny, Charny, have you nothing more pressing to say to me?"

She pressed the Count's hand tenderly, and gave him such a look as would once have made him devote his life to her, — a life he was still ready to sacrifice for her, though not perhaps to consecrate it to her desires.

As she thus regarded him, she noticed that he was not a dusty traveller, just descended from a postchaise, but an elegant courtier, who shows his devotion by adherence to the rules of etiquette. His toilet was so complete, that even this fastidious Queen could find no fault; and yet the woman was evidently dissatisfied therewith.

"When did you arrive?" she asked.

"I have just arrived, Madame."

"And you come —?"

"From Montmédy."

"Then you have travelled over half the breadth of France?"

"I have travelled ninety leagues since yesterday morning."

"On horseback, or by carriage?"

"By postchaise."

"How is it, after so long a journey, — excuse my questions, Charny! — that you are as well brushed, polished, and combed, as one of Lafayette's aides, coming from headquarters? Was the news you brought of so little importance?"

"Very important, on the contrary, Madame; but I thought if I came to the courtyard of the Tuileries in a postchaise, covered with mud or dust, I should arouse curiosity. The King has told me, within the hour, how narrowly you are all watched; and when I heard this, I congratulated myself on having taken the precaution to come afoot and in my uniform, like a simple officer returning to Court, after an absence of a week or two."

The Queen squeezed Charny's hand convulsively. One could see that a last question rankled in her mind, and that she had more difficulty in formulating that question, than was demanded by its apparent importance. She decided upon another form of interrogation, and said, with a stifled voice: "Ah, yes! I forgot you had a lodging-place in Paris!"

Charny started. Not until then did he see the object of all these questions.

"Me, a lodging in Paris? And where may it be, Madame?"

The Queen made an effort. "In the Rue Coq Heron. Is n't that where the Countess lives?"

Charny was ready to kick, like a horse, who feels the spur in the living wound; but there was such hesitation in the Queen's voice, such an expression of grief, that he pitied her sufferings, — she, so proud and self-controlled, — and would not let her discover the emotion which overcame him.

With an accent of profound sorrow, not entirely caused by the Queen's suffering, he said: "I believe I had the honor of telling you, before my departure, that the mansion of Madame de Charny is not mine. I went to the rooms of my brother, Viscount Isidore, and there changed my clothes."

The Queen uttered a joyful cry, and sank upon her knees, pressing her lips to Charny's hand. With equal rapidity he grasped her under the arms and raised her, crying, as he did so: "Oh Madame, what are you doing?"

"I thank you, Oliver," she said, in so mild a voice that Charny felt the tears come into his own eyes.

"Thank me? My God, and for what?"

"For what? You ask me for what? For giving me the one completely joyful moment I have had since your departure. My God! I know this is insensate folly, — this jealousy, — but it is worthy of pity. You also were jealous at one time, Charny; but you have forgotten it now. Oh, these men! When they are jealous, they are happy, for they can fight with their rivals, — kill and be killed; but women can only weep, even when they know how useless, how dangerous are their tears; for we know very well that our tears, instead of attracting toward us those for whom they are shed, drive them farther away. This is the vertigo of love. It sees the abyss, and plunges into it, instead of drawing farther away. Thank you once more, Oliver. You see, I am joyous, and weep no longer."

Indeed, the Queen tried to laugh; but as if, through her sorrows, she had forgotten how to be merry, her laughter had so doleful and grieved an accent that the Count was startled. "Oh my God," he murmured, "can it be that she has suffered so much?"

Marie Antoinette clasped her hands as she said: "Thanks be to thee, oh Lord! for in the day when he understands my sorrow, he will not have strength enough to wholly cease loving me."

Charny felt himself on a declivity, where he would soon find it impossible to maintain his equilibrium. He made an effort to sweep backwards, as skaters do, even at the risk of breaking the ice over which they glide.

"Madame," he said, "will you not allow me to harvest the fruit of this long absence, by explaining what I have been so happy in doing for you?"

"Ah Charny," responded the Queen, "I like better something else, as I told you just now; but you are right. The woman must not too long forget that she is a queen. Speak on, Monsieur Ambassador. The woman has already obtained all she had any right to expect, and the Queen listens."

Then Charny told her all: how he had been sent to Monsieur de Bouillé; how young Count Louis had last year come to Paris; how Charny himself had surveyed the route, bush by bush, by which the Queen was to flee; how, finally, he had come to tell the King there was no longer any material reason why the project should not be put into immediate execution.

The Queen heard Charny with great attention, and also with profound appreciation. It seemed impossible that simple devotion should go so far. Love, passionate and anxious love, alone could anticipate such obstacles, and invent the methods for surmounting them.

She therefore heard him through. When he had finished, she said, regarding him with an expression of supreme tenderness: "You will then be very happy in saving me?"

"What? Can you ask me that? Why, it is the dream of my ambition; and if I succeed, it will be the glory of my life!"

"I should be more pleased if it were simply the recompense of your love," said the Queen, sadly. "Never mind! You warmly desire that this great work of rescuing the King, the Queen, and the Dauphin of France should be accomplished by yourself, do you not?"

"I await but your assent, to devote my existence to this end!"

"Yes! and I understand, my friend, that this devotion ought to be free from all outside entanglements, all material affection. It is impossible that my husband and children should be rescued by a hand which dare not extend itself towards them, to sustain them, if they should slip on that road which we are to travel together. To you I commend their lives and mine, my brother; but in your turn, have pity on me, will you not?"

"Pity on you, Madame?" said Charny.

"Yes! In such moments, when I need all my strength, all my courage, all my presence of mind, you would not, — it is a foolish idea, perhaps, but how can I help it! for there are people who dare not venture forth in the night, for fear of spectres, which, when day comes, they know do not exist, — you would not wish me to be lost perhaps, for want of one promise, one little word? You would not —?"

Charny interrupted the Queen. "Madame, I desire the safety of your Majesty. I desire the welfare of France. I desire to finish the task which I have begun. I acknowledge I should be in despair, if I could not make so feeble a sacrifice. I swear to you not to see Madame de Charny again, save by your Majesty's permission."

Saluting the Queen, coolly but respectfully, he withdrew; although the Queen, chilled by the tone in which he spoke these words, tried to detain him.

Hardly had Charny shut the door behind him, than she stretched out her arms and cried pitifully: "Oh, how glad I should be if it were myself he had sworn not to see, if he only loved me as he loves her!"

CHAPTER XXXVI.

SECOND SIGHT.

On the following Nineteenth of June, about eight in the morning, Gilbert was walking with long steps to and fro in his lodgings in Rue Saint Honoré, and now and then going to the window, to lean out, like a man impatiently expecting somebody who does not come.

In his hand he held a paper, folded square, through which you could see the impression of the writing and seals on the other side. Doubtless this was a very important paper, for twice or thrice, during these anxious minutes, Gilbert unfolded it, read it, unfolded it anew, reperused it, and refolded it, only to reopen and refold it again.

At last the noise of a carriage was heard, stopping at the door, and he ran again to the window; but he was too late. Whoever had come in the carriage, had already entered the passage-way.

Gilbert apparently had no doubt of the identity of this personage; for, pushing open the door of the antechamber, he called out: "Bastien, open the door for Count Charny, who is waiting."

Again he unfolded the paper, which he had so often perused, when Bastien announced, not Count Charny, but Baron Zannone.

This name was just then so far from Gilbert's thoughts that he started, as if lightning had flashed before his eyes and heralded the thunder. Hastily he refolded the paper, concealing it in his coat-pocket. "Cagliostro!" he repeated, astonished at the announcement.

"Oh Lord, yes, myself, my dear Gilbert," said the visitor. "It was n't I whom you expected, — I know that, very well, — it was Charny; but Charny is busy, — I will presently tell you about what, — so that he won't be here for half an hour. Knowing that, faith, I said to myself: 'Seeing I 'm in his vicinity, I 'll run in on Doctor Gilbert an instant.' Though unexpected, I hope I 'm none the less welcome."

"Dear master, you know that at all hours, by day or night, two doors are always open to you here, — the door of the house and the door of the heart."

"Thanks, Gilbert. Some day I also may be able to prove how much I love you. When that day comes, the proof will not be wanting. Meanwhile, let us gossip."

"About what?" asked Gilbert, smiling, for the advent of Cagliostro always preluded some new and astounding development.

"About what? Why, the fashionable topic, — the King's near departure."

Gilbert felt himself shivering from head to foot, though the smile did not disappear from his lips for an instant; and, thanks to his will-power, if he could not prevent the sweat from rolling up to the roots of his hair, he could keep the pallor from his cheeks.

"As we shall have some time to talk the matter over, I 'll sit down," said Cagliostro, suiting the action to the word.

The first feeling of terror being past, Gilbert reflected that very likely Cagliostro was there by accident, but that his coming was also providential. Having no secrets from Gilbert, undoubtedly Cagliostro would tell him all he knew about the royal departure he had come to talk about.

"Well," said Cagliostro, seeing Gilbert waiting, "it 's arranged for to-morrow, is it?"

"Dearest master," said Gilbert, "you know I always let you talk on to the end. Even if you err, there is always something for me to learn, not only from your set speeches, but from your slightest word."

"And in what have I been mistaken, up to date? Was I mistaken in predicting the death of Favras? Yet up to the decisive moment, I did all I could to prevent his death! Was I wrong in declaring the King was intriguing against Mirabeau, and that Mirabeau would not be appointed cabinet-minister? Was I mistaken in saying that Robespierre would rebuild the scaffold of Charles the First, and Bonaparte the throne of Charlemagne? As to this last point, you cannot yet accuse me of mistakes, since the times are not yet ripe; and part of these events belong to the end of this century, and part to the beginning of the next. Nevertheless, to-day, my dear Gilbert, when I tell you that the King proposes to flee to-morrow night, you know it is true, — you, better than anybody else, because you are one of the agents for this flight."

"If that is so," said Gilbert, "you hardly expect me to avow it, I suppose."

"And what do I want of your avowal? You very well know that I 'm not only the living one, but the knowing one."

"If you are the knowing one," said Gilbert, "you know the Queen yesterday said to Monsieur de Montmorin, in reference to the refusal of Madame Elizabeth to attend the festival on Corpus Christi Day, that she was much troubled because Madame Elizabeth would not go to Saint Germain l'Auxerrois with them, and thought Elizabeth might sacrifice her opinions a little for the King's sake. Now if the Queen should go with the King to Saint Germain Church on that day, they cannot leave that night, — certainly not for a long journey."

"Yes! but I also know," responded Cagliostro, "that a great philosopher says that words are given men to conceal their thoughts. Now God is not so partial as to bestow a gift so precious upon men alone."

"My dear master," said Gilbert, trying to remain on the plane of pleasantry, "you know the story of the incredulous apostle, who — "

"Who began to believe, when the Messiah showed him his hands, his feet, and his side. Well, my dear Gilbert, the Queen is accustomed to all life's elegancies, and is not willing to be discommoded during her travels, which will last thirty-five or thirty-six hours, if Charny's calculation is accurate; so she has ordered from Desbrosses, — whose shop is on the street called Our Lady of Victory, — a charming dressing-case, finished in silver-gilt, and said to be destined for her sister, the Archduchess Christine, the governor's lady, in the Netherlands. This dressing-case, only completed yesterday morning, was carried home last night to the Tuileries. There! — so much for the hands! Next, they will go in a travelling coach, spacious and commodious, — one which will readily hold six persons. This was ordered of Louis, the nobby coachmaker, who lives on the Champs Élysées, by Charny, who is with him at this very moment, paying him one hundred and twenty-five louis, — half the sum agreed upon. The coach was tried for one drive, yesterday, with four horses, and worked perfectly well; so that Charny's report was most favorable. Well, there are the feet, you doubting Thomas! Lastly, Montmorin, without knowing what he was signing, signed a passport for the Baroness de Korff, her two children, her two chambermaids, her steward, and her three lackeys. Well, Madame de Korff is Madame de Tourzel, governess of the two royal children of France, — Madame Royale and my Lord the Dauphin. Her two chambermaids are the Queen and Madame Elizabeth. Her steward is the King. Her three lackeys, who will precede and accompany the carriage, dressed as couriers, are Isidore de Charny, Monsieur de Malden, and Monsieur de Valory. The passport is the paper which you were holding when I came in, and which you folded and hid in your pocket, when you saw me." Then Cagliostro repeated, word for word, as if he had been reading it, the contents of this passport:

IN THE KING'S NAME:

You are commanded to pass the Baroness de Korff, with her two children, one woman, a valet, and three lackeys.

MONTMORIN,
Minister of Foreign Affairs.

Then Cagliostro smilingly added: "There! So much for the wounded side of the Messiah, you unbelieving disciple! Am I well informed, my dear Gilbert?"

"Yes, apart from a little contradiction between your former descriptive words and your version of the aforesaid passport."

"How so?"

"You said that Madame Elizabeth and the Queen were to represent Madame de Korff's two chambermaids, but in the passport there appears to be only one such woman."

"So? Well, this is how it is. On arriving at Bondy, Madame de Tourzel, who expects to go through to Montmédy, will be asked to leave the carriage. Charny, a devoted man, who can be depended upon, will take her place, so as to keep his nose at the carriage window, in case of need, and fire off the two pistols he has in his pocket, if necessary. Then the Queen will become Madame de Korff; and as there will be but one other woman in the coach, Madame Elizabeth, — except Madame Royale, who is reckoned, of course, as one of the children, — it would be useless to have two chambermaids on the passport. — Perhaps you would like other details. So be it! The details are at your service! The departure was to have been on the First of June. Monsieur de Bouillé fully expected it. On this subject he even wrote the King a curious letter, in which he invited him, — urged him, — to come at once, because the soldiers were being corrupted day by day; and if his soldiers were allowed to take the Constitutional oath, he would not answer for them. By this word corrupted, he meant," added Cagliostro, in his jesting mood, "that the soldiers are beginning to understand that a choice is offered them between a monarchy, which has sacrificed the people to the nobility for three centuries, — the private to the officer, — and a Constitution, which proclaims equality before the law, and makes promotion the recompense of merit and courage; and that this ungrateful army has a sneaking fondness for the Constitution. Alas! Neither the coach nor the dressing-case was quite done, and so it was impossible to start on the First; which was a great misfortune, as, since the First, the army has been corrupted more and more, and the soldiers of the regular army have taken the oath to support the Constitution. Then the departure was set down for the Eighth; but Bouillé received the intimation of this date so tardily, that it was now his turn to reply that he was not ready.

Next, with one accord, the Twelfth was decided upon. They preferred the Eleventh; but a very Democratic woman — one, moreover, who is the sweetheart of Monsieur de Gouvion, one of Lafayette's aides, — Madame de Rochereul, if you wish to know her name, — was engaged in the household service, for the Dauphin; and they feared lest she should see something, and report (as poor Mirabeau once expressed it) some concealed pot kept a' boiling in some corner of the palace, after the fashion of kings. On the Twelfth the King bethought himself that it was only six days before he should touch another quarter's payment of his government income, — six millions. Pest! You will agree that this was worth waiting six days for, my dear Gilbert. Besides, Leopold, the grand temporizer, — the very Fabius of kings, — had promised that by the Fifteenth, fifteen thousand Austrians should occupy the approaches to Arlon. Heavens, you understand! It is n't the good-will of these good kings which fails them, but they have various little affairs of their own to arrange. Austria has just devoured Liege and Brabant, and is digesting both the city and province; and Austria is like a boa-constrictor, — while it digests, it sleeps. The Empress Catherine, of Russia, has been fighting that kinglet, Gustavus the Third, — to whom she has granted a truce, in order to give him time to receive the Queen of France, when she descends from her travelling carriage, at Aix, in Savoy. During this time Catherine is whetting her teeth on Turkey, and gnawing the bones of Poland; for she likes the lion's marrow, this worthy empress. Philosophic Prussia and philanthropic England are just changing their skins, so that the one seasonably ranges over the borders of the Rhine, and the other over the North Sea. Be easy! Having once tasted human flesh, like Diomed's horses, these kings don't care to eat anything else, if we don't interrupt their delicate feasts. Briefly, this departure was fixed for Sunday the Nineteenth, at midnight. Then, on the Eighteenth, a new despatch was sent, postponing it till Monday, the Twentieth, at the same hour, — that is, to-morrow night, — an arrangement which may have its inconveniences, as Bouillé has already given orders to all his detachments, and has not countermanded them. — Be on your guard, my dear Gilbert, be on your guard! All this changing wearies the soldiers, and sets people a' thinking."

"Count," said Gilbert, "I will not dissemble with you. All you have said is true! And I dissimulate the less, because it was not my private opinion that the King had better go away, — certainly not that he should quit France; but now acknowledge frankly, in view of his personal danger, in view of personal danger to the Queen and their children, if the King is not allowed to remain as a king, a man, a husband, a father, is he not authorized to flee?"

"Well, will you let me tell you something, my dear Gilbert? It is not as a father, not as a husband, not as a man, that Louis the Sixteenth flees from France. Neither is it because of the famous Fifth and Sixth of October. No! By his father, from whom he inherits everything, he is a Bourbon, and the Bourbons know how to face danger. He leaves France because of the Constitution, which is being modelled after that of the United States of America, by the National Assembly, without reflecting that such a model, shaped for a republic, but applied to a monarchy, does not leave the King enough breathable air. He quits France on account of the famous affair over the Knights of the Poniard, wherein your friend Lafayette dealt irreverently with royalty and its faithful adherents. The King goes away because of that famous Saint Cloud affair, when he wished to assert his liberty, and the people meant to show him that he was a prisoner. Now Gilbert, you are honestly, frankly, loyally a Constitutional Royalist, and believe in that pleasant and consoling Utopia, a monarchy tempered by liberty; so you ought to know one thing, — namely, that kings, in imitation of God, whose representatives on earth they pretend to be, have one religion, the religion of Royalty. Not only are their persons sacred, having been rubbed down with holy oil at Rheims, but their dwellings are sacred, their servants are sacred. Their palace is a temple, whereinto one must enter only in prayer. Their servants are priests, to whom one should speak only on the knee. One must not touch a king, under pain of death. Their attendants must not be touched, under pain of excommunication. Now on the day when they prevented King Louis from going to Saint Cloud, somebody laid hands on his royal person. When the Knights of the Poniard were expelled from the Tuileries, the King's servants were profaned. This is what the King can't abide. This is his idea of the Abomination of Desolation, set up in the Most Holy Place, as predicted by Daniel the Prophet. That's why he recalled Charny from Montmédy. That's why the King, who refused to let himself be spirited away by Favras, or to escape with his aunts, consents to flee to-morrow, with Montmorin's passport, — who did not know for whom he signed that passport, — under the name of Durand, and in the dress of a servant; only, as kings are kings to the end of the chapter, he bade them not forget to pack in his trunks the red robe, embroidered with gold, which he wore at Cherbourg."

While Cagliostro was talking, Gilbert regarded him earnestly, as if he would dive to the bottom of his thoughts.

This was useless. No human gaze could pierce the mask of raillery wherewith this disciple of Althotas always covered his face. Gilbert therefore decided to question him openly.

"Count, all that you have said is true. I repeat it! Nevertheless, why do you come to me with all this? In what capacity do you present yourself to me? Come you as an open enemy, to warn me of your opposition? Come you as a friend, to proffer help?"

"First, my dear Gilbert," was the affectionate reply, "I come, as a teacher might come to a pupil, to warn him that he is espousing the wrong cause, in attaching himself to a falling ruin, to a crumbling edifice, to a dying principle called Monarchy. Such men are not men of the past, nor even of the present. They are men of the future. Abandon that in which thou believest not, for that in which we do believe. Do not leave the substance and follow the shadow. If not an active soldier in the Revolution, be a looker-on, and do not cumber the road. Mirabeau was a giant; but even Mirabeau had to go down before the great work."

"Count," said Gilbert, "I will reply to that appeal, whenever the King, who relies upon me, is in safety. Louis the Sixteenth has made me his confidant, his auxiliary, — his accomplice, if you will, — in the work he has undertaken. I have accepted the trust, and I will fulfil it to the end, with heart open and eyes shut. I am a physician, my dear Count. Before all else, I consider the physical health of my patient. Now then, you must answer in your turn. In your mysterious projects, in your shady combinations, is it necessary for this flight to succeed or fail? If you wish it to fail, it is useless for us to contend. Bid us not to go, and we will remain, bow our heads, and await the stroke."

"Brother," said Cagliostro, "if, impelled by God, who has mapped out my way, I should find it necessary to smite those whom thy heart loves or thy genius protects, I should certainly remain in the shadow, and ask only one favor of the Superhuman Power whom I obey, — to leave thee in ignorance whence came the blow. No, if I do not come as a friend, — for I cannot be the friend of kings, I who have been their victim, — I do not come as an enemy. Nay, I come with the scales in hand, to tell thee I have weighed the last Bourbon in the balances, and found him wanting; but I have forecast his destiny, and do not believe his death will affect the health of our cause. Like Pythagoras, I scarcely recognize the right to dispose of the life, even of the last-created insect; and God forbid that I should thoughtlessly lay my hand on man, the king of creation. — I come here, not merely to say, however, that I will remain neutral, but to ask if my aid is needed, which hereby I proffer."

Once more Gilbert tried to read Cagliostro's heart.

"Good!" continued the Count, resuming his tone of raillery, "what a skeptic you are. See here now! As a man of letters, don't you know the story of the lance of Achilles, which could both wound and heal? That lance I possess. The woman who once passed for the Queen, in the thickets of Versailles, might she not also pass for the Queen in the apartments of the Tuileries, or on some road the opposite of that taken by the real fugitive? What I propose is not to be despised, my dear Gilbert."

"Be frank to the end, and tell me why you make us this offer?"

"Oh, it 's very simple, my dear Doctor. In order that the King may quit France, and leave us to proclaim a republic."

"A republic!" said the astonished Gilbert.

"Why not?"

"My dear Count, I look France all over, from south to north, from east to west, and I don't see a single Republican!"

"To begin with, you are mistaken, for I can see three, — Pétion, Camille Desmoulins, and your humble servant. Those you can see, as well as I can; but I can see many others, whom you do not see, but whom you will see, when it is time for them to appear. Then rely upon me to make a theatrical display that will astonish you. Only, I desire that the accompanying accidents in the transformation shall not be too grave; for accidents always recoil on the machinist."

Gilbert reflected an instant. Then he extended his hand to Cagliostro, and said: "Count, if it concerned only myself, if it concerned only my life, if it concerned only my honor, reputation, memory, I would at once accept your offer; but this matter concerns a kingdom, a king, a queen, a dynasty, a monarchy, and I cannot make any compact for them. Remain neutral, my dear Count! That's all I ask!"

Cagliostro smiled. "Yes, I understand, — I'm the Necklace Man! Well, my dear Gilbert, the despised Necklace Man is going to give you some exceedingly good counsel."

"Silence!" said Gilbert. "Somebody rings!"

"What matters it? You know very well who is ringing. It's Monsieur de Charny. The counsel I would give you, he also may hear with profit. Enter, Count, enter!"

Charny appeared at the door. Seeing a stranger, when he expected to find Gilbert alone, he stopped hesitatingly and anxiously.

"This counsel," continued Cagliostro, "is this: Distrust dressing-cases too rich, carriages too heavy, and likenesses too striking. Adieu, Gilbert! Adieu, Count! and — to employ the formula of those to whom I wish a prosperous journey, as I do to yourselves — God have you in his holy keeping!"

Saluting Gilbert amicably and the Count courteously, Cagliostro withdrew, followed by the anxious eye of his host, and the questioning glance of the visitor.

"Who is that man, Doctor?" asked Charny, when the noise of the retreating steps had died away on the staircase.

"One of my friends," said Gilbert, "a man who knows all, but who came to give me his word not to betray us."

"And you call him — ?"

"Baron Zannone."

"That 's queer," replied Charny. "I don't know that name, and yet I seem to know that face. — Have you the passport, Doctor?"

"Here it is, Count!"

Charny took the passport, unfolded it, and was so completely absorbed in attending to this important piece of paper, that he appeared to forget the Baron Zannone, — at least, momentarily.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

THE EVENING OF THE TWENTIETH OF JUNE.

MEANWHILE, let us see what happened on the Twentieth of June, in the evening, from nine o'clock till midnight, in various parts of the capital.

Not without reason was Madame de Rochereul mistrusted. Although her duties ceased on the Eleventh, she contrived, being already suspicious, to find some excuse for returning to the palace; and she noticed, albeit the Queen's jewel-caskets were in their accustomed places, that her diamonds were there no longer. In fact, they had been confided, by Marie Antoinette, to her barber, Leonard, who was also to depart on the night of the Twentieth, a few hours in advance of his august mistress, with Monsieur de Choiseul, commanding the first detachment of soldiers, stationed at Sommevelle Bridge. Choiseul was also to have charge of the relays for Varennes, consisting of six good horses, which were now at his residence in Rue Artois, where he awaited the last orders of the King and Queen.

It was perhaps a little indiscreet to embarrass Choiseul with Master Leonard, and a little imprudent for the Queen to take a hairdresser with her; but what artist, in a strange land, could undertake to build those admirable coiffures, which Leonard so jauntily reared for her? What would you have? When a barber is a man of genius, he is not to be dispensed with lightly.

The Dauphin's chambermaid suspected that the departure was fixed for Monday, the Twentieth, at eleven in the evening, and she gave due notice thereof, not only to her lover, Monsieur de Gouvion, who was Lafayette's aide, but also to Bailly, the head of the city government.

After going to the King, for a free talk over this denunciation, Lafayette only shrugged his shoulders.

Bailly did better. While Lafayette became as blind as an astronomer, Bailly became as chivalrous as any knight, and even sent Madame de Rochereul's letter to the Queen.

Gouvion, being directly influenced by his sweetheart, alone retained his more intense suspicions. At her suggestion, under the pretext of a social military reunion, he brought together, at his lodgings, a dozen officers of the National Guard. Five or six of them he placed on the watch, at different entrances of the palace; while he charged himself, assisted by five battalion officers, with the oversight of the doors leading to the suite of rooms occupied by Monsieur de Villequier, to which his attention had been specially called.

About the same hour, at number nine in Rue Coq Heron, in a parlor with which we are familiar, — seated on a lounge where we have seen her before, — was a young woman, apparently calm as well as beautiful, but profoundly moved in the depths of her heart. She was conversing with a young man twenty-three or twenty-four years old, who was standing in front of her. He was armed with a hunting-knife, and wore a courier's suit, — a buff jacket, and pantaloons tight as his skin, terminating in a pair of boots turned down at the top. In his hand he held a round laced hat.

The young woman appeared to be insisting upon something to which the young man objected.

"Once more, Viscount," she said, "why has he not been near me, during the two months and a half since his return to Paris?"

"Several times since his return, Madame, my brother has charged me to bring him news of yourself."

"I know it, and I am duly grateful to him, — as to yourself, Viscount; but, on the eve of a new departure, it seems to me he might himself come and say farewell."

"Undoubtedly this was not possible, for he entrusts me with this duty."

"And this journey which you undertake, will it be long?"

"I do not know, Madame."

"I say you, because, by your costume, I must think you also are to go."

"In all probability, Madame, I shall be away from Paris by midnight."

"Do you accompany your brother, or do you go in an opposite direction?"

"I believe, Madame, we are to follow the same road."

"Will you tell him that you have seen me?"

"Yes, Madame; for — judging by the solicitude which he evinced in sending me to you, and his repeated instructions not to rejoin him till I had seen you — he would not pardon me, if I forgot his commission."

The young woman brushed a tear from her eye, heaved a sigh, and said, after reflecting an instant: "Viscount, you are a gentleman, and will comprehend the import of the demand I make upon you. Answer me, as you would if I were truly your sister, — as you would answer before God. In this journey which he undertakes, will Monsieur de Charny incur serious danger?"

"Who can say, Madame," replied Isidore, trying to evade the question, "where there is danger, and where there is no danger, in the age in which we live? If on that Fifth of October, in the morning, our poor brother George had been asked if he thought there was any danger, he would have said No. The next day he was lying, pale and inanimate, across the Queen's doorway. Danger, Madame, in the age wherein we live, rises out of the earth, and one finds himself face to face with death, without knowing whence it comes or who has summoned it."

Andrée grew pale, as she said: "Then he runs the peril of death! Is it not so, Viscount?"

"I did not say so, Madame."

"No! but you thought so!"

"I think, Madame, if you have anything important to say to my brother, the enterprise upon which he is venturing — like myself — is sufficiently grave for you to entrust me, either in writing or by the living voice, with the transmission of your desires."

"Very well, Viscount, I will only ask for five minutes," said Andrée, rising.

With her customary slow and cool step the Countess entered her bedroom, shutting the door behind her.

As she left the parlor, the young man looked anxiously at his watch.

"Nine o'clock and a quarter," he said to himself, "and the King expects us at half-past. Fortunately, it 's only a step from here to the Tuileries." The Countess did not even take as much time as she had named, and at the expiration of a few seconds she re-entered, holding in her hand a sealed letter. "Viscount," she said solemnly, "to your honor I confide this letter."

Isidore extended his hand to receive it. "Wait," said Andrée, "and understand well what I say to you. If your brother, if the Count, accomplishes his undertaking without accident, there is nothing different to say to him from what I have already told you, — to give him my sympathy with his loyalty, my respect for his devotion, my admiration for his character. — If he should be wounded —" Andrée's voice changed slightly. "If he is wounded grievously, you will ask him to accord me the privilege of going to him. If he should grant me that favor, you will send a messenger, who can tell me where I can surely find my husband, and I will go to him at once. — If he is wounded unto death," — and here Andrée's voice almost broke with emotion, — "you may give him this letter. If no longer able to read it himself, you may read it to him; for before his death I wish him to know what this letter contains. On your faith as a gentleman, you will do what I desire, Viscount?"

With equal emotion Isidore again extended his hand, as he said: "On my honor, Madame."

"Then take this letter, and go, Viscount!"

Isidore took the letter, kissed the Countess's hand, and went away.

"Oh!" cried Andrée, falling upon her sofa, "if he should die, I want him at least to know that I loved him."

At the same moment when Isidore left the Countess, and placed the letter in his breast-pocket, beside another letter, — whose address he read by the light of the reflector which was lighted at the corner of Rue Coquillière, — two other men, clad exactly like himself, also approached a designated place of reunion, by different passages, — that is, the Queen's boudoir, into which our readers have already been introduced. One of the two men followed the gallery of the Louvre, along the side of the river pier, — that gallery which is to-day a picture museum, — at the end whereof he found Weber waiting for him. The other ascended the narrow staircase, which we saw Charny use, on his first return from Montmédy. As this man's coadjutor had been waited for at the end of the Louvre, by Weber, the Queen's chamberlain, so this second comer was waited for at the head of the staircase, by François Hue, the King's chamberlain. Both were introduced to the boudoir almost at the same time, but by different doors. The first comer was Monsieur de Valory. A few seconds after, a second door opened, and with astonishment Valory saw his own counterpart enter the room. Taking it for granted they were summoned for the same purpose, the two officers saluted each other, and drew nearer together.

At that moment a third door opened, and the Viscount appeared. He was the third courier, though as yet unacquainted with the other two.

Isidore was the only one of the three who knew why they were assembled, and what task lay before them. He would undoubtedly have been ready to answer any questions addressed to him by his two future comrades, when the door opened anew, and the King appeared.

"Gentlemen," said King Louis, addressing Malden and Valory, "pardon me for having disposed of you without your permission, but I hold you to be faithful servitors of royalty, since you both formerly belonged to my bodyguard. I asked you both to call on a tailor, whose address I gave you, in order that each should have a courier's suit made for him, and then to come to the Tuileries to-night, at half-past nine. Your presence proves that you are willing to accept the mission with which I may charge you, whatever it may be."

The two former guardsmen bowed, and Valory said:

"Sire, your Majesty well knows that he has no need to ask his gentlemen for permission to dispose of their devotion, their courage, and their lives."

"Sire," said Malden, "my colleague has responded for me, in responding for himself; and I presume he speaks for our third companion."

"Your third companion, gentlemen, — whose acquaintance I commend to you, for it is a good acquaintance to make, — is Viscount Isidore de Charny, whose brother was killed at Versailles, in defending the Queen's portal. We are accustomed to the devotion of the men of his family; but however familiar their sacrifices have become, we are nevertheless thoroughly grateful for them."

"From what the King says, doubtless the Viscount knows the purpose of our meeting, although we are ignorant of it, and have hastened hither to learn it."

"Gentlemen," replied the King, "you are not ignorant that I am virtually a prisoner, — a prisoner of the Commander of the National Guard, a prisoner of the President of the Assembly, a prisoner of the Mayor of Paris, a prisoner of the populace, — in a word, everybody's prisoner. Well, gentlemen, I have counted on you to aid me in shaking off this humiliation, and regaining my liberty. My fate, with that of the Queen and our children, is in your hands. All is ready for us to hasten our departure to-night; only you must help us to get away."

"Sire, give your orders!" said the three young men.

"We cannot all go out together, — you can well understand that, gentlemen. Our rendezvous is to be at the corner of Rue Saint Nicaise, where Count Charny will await us with a hired carriage. Viscount, you will take charge of the Queen, and answer to the name of Melchior. Malden, you will have the care of Madame Elizabeth and Madame Royale, and will be called Jean. You, Valory, will take charge of Madame de Tourzel — or Korff, as she will be called — and the Dauphin, and your name will be François. Do not forget your new names, my friends, and remain here for further instructions."

In turn the King offered his hand to each of the three young men, and went out, leaving three men all ready to die for him.

Meanwhile Choiseul, who had declared to the King, the night before, in Bouillé's behalf, that it would be impossible to postpone the flight later than midnight of the Twentieth, — and that Bouillé would start by four o'clock on the morning of the Twenty-first, if he received no contrary advice, and take all his detachments to Dun, Stenay, and Montmédy, — Choiseul, as we have before said, was at his home in the Rue Artois, whither he had come to get the last orders from Court. As it was already nine o'clock, he began to despair, when the only servant whom he had retained, and who believed him on the point of departure for Metz, came to say that a man wanted to speak with him, in the Queen's name.

Choiseul ordered him to be shown in. A man entered, wearing an enormous topcoat, and a round hat, slouched over his eyes.

"Ah, it's you, Leonard! I have been waiting for you very impatiently."

"If you have been kept waiting, it is n't my fault, but the Queen's, who told me only ten minutes ago, that I was to come here."

"She told you nothing else?" asked the Duke.

"Yes, indeed, Monsieur. She entrusted me with all her diamonds, and told me to bring you this letter."

"Hand it over, then!" said the Duke, with some impatience; for he was not altogether pleased with the immense importance enjoyed by the pretentious personage who brought him the royal despatch.

The letter was long, and full of directions. It announced that they would leave at midnight, advised Choiseul to start at once, and renewedly begged him to take Leonard along, who had received orders, as the Queen added, to obey Choiseul as he would obey herself; and she underlined the following words: I hereby renew this order!

The Duke looked at Leonard, who was waiting with manifest anxiety. The barber looked very grotesque, under an enormous hat, and lost in an immense overcoat, with large capes.

"Now get your wits together," said the Duke. "What did the Queen say to you?"

"I can repeat it, word for word, Monsieur."

"Go on! I'm listening."

"She sent for me three-quarters of an hour ago, Monsieur."

"Good."

"She said, in a low tone —"

"Her Majesty was not alone, then?"

"No, Monsieur. The King was talking with Madame Elizabeth, in the alcove of the window. Monsieur the Dauphin and Madame Royale were playing together. As to the Queen, she was leaning wearily against the mantel-piece."

"Go on, Leonard, go on!"

"The Queen said to me, in a low voice: 'Leonard, I can depend upon you?' — Says I: 'Ah Madame, dispose of me as you please. Your Majesty knows that I am devoted to her, body and soul.' — 'Take these diamonds,' says she, 'and bury them in your pockets. Take this letter, and carry it to Rue Artois, to the Duke de Choiseul, and deliver it only to himself. If he is n't at home, you will find him with the Duchess de Grammont.' — Then, as I was coming away, to obey the Queen's orders, her Majesty called me back. 'Put on a broad-brimmed hat,' says she, 'and a big riding-coat, in order not to be recognized, my dear Leonard; and obey Monsieur de Choiseul as you would me.' — Then I returned to my lodgings, took a riding-coat and hat belonging to my brother, and here I am."

"So the Queen instructed you to obey me as you would herself?"

"Those were truly the august words of her Majesty, Monsieur."

"I am glad you recollect her verbal instructions. Anyway, here 's the same order, in writing, and as I must burn the letter, read it first!" and Choiseul offered the paper to the barber, who read it aloud:

I have given orders to my hairdresser, Leonard, to obey you as he would myself. I hereby renew this order!

"You understand, do you not?" said the Duke.

"Yes, Monsieur! but you may well believe that her Majesty's spoken order would be sufficient."

"Never mind that!" said the Duke, as he burned the letter.

At that instant the Duke's servant returned to say that the carriage was ready.

"Come, my dear Leonard!" said the Duke.

"What? Am I to come? And the diamonds?"

"You 'll take them with you."

"And where?"

"Where I take you."

"And where do you take me?"

"Some leagues away, and you have a special commission to fulfil."

"Impossible, Monsieur!"

"Why impossible? Did n't the Queen bid you obey me as herself?"

"That 's true; but how can I do it? I left the key in the door of our lodgings. When my brother goes home, he won't find his riding-coat or his hat. Not seeing me return, he won't know where I am. And then there 's Madame de l'Aage, whose hair I 've promised to dress, and who waits for me. As a proof of this, Monsieur, my cabriolet and my servant are in the courtyard of the Tuileries."

"Come, come, my dear Leonard, what would you have?" laughingly said Choiseul. "Your brother must buy another hat and another riding-coat. You must barber Madame de l'Aage some other day. Not seeing you return, your lackey will unharness your horse, and take him back to the stable. Meantime, our team is harnessed, and we must be off."

Without paying further attention to Leonard's complaints and regrets, the Duke made the disconsolate barber get into the cabriolet, and then set off, at a fast trot, towards the Little Villette Barrier.

The Duke had hardly passed the last houses of Little Villette, when a group of five men, coming into Rue Saint Honoré from the Jacobin Club, directed their steps towards the Palais Royal, remarking, as they sauntered along, upon the deep tranquillity of the night.

These five persons were Danton, Fréron, Chénier, Legendre, and Desmoulins, who himself relates the incident.

As they reached the end of Rue Échelle, Desmoulins said, glancing towards the Tuileries: "Faith, does n't it seem to you to-night that Paris is as tranquil as if she were forsaken? During our whole walk, not a solitary patrol have we encountered."

"That's because measures have been taken to leave the road clear for the King," said Fréron.

"How, — the road clear for the King?" asked Danton.

"Undoubtedly," said Fréron, "he starts to-night."

"Go along with your joking!" said Legendre.

"It may be a joke," replied Fréron, "but I have been so notified in a letter."

"A letter announcing the flight of the King? A letter signed?"

"No, an anonymous letter. I have it with me. — Here, read!"

The five Patriots approached a hack, which was standing at the head of Rue Saint Nicaise, and by the light of its lantern they read the following lines:

Citizen Fréron is informed that to-night Monsieur Capet, the Austrian Woman, and their two whelps will quit Paris, to join General Bouillé, the slaughterer of Nancy, who awaits them on the frontier.

"Hold on!" said Desmoulins. "Monsieur Capet! That's a good name! Henceforth I'll call him Monsieur Capet, instead of Louis Sixteenth."

"And there will be only one fault to find," said Chénier, "that the family name of Louis Sixteenth is not Capet, but Bourbon."

"Bah! Who cares?" said Desmoulins. "Two or three pedants, like Chénier, perhaps! Is n't that so, Legendre, — is n't Capet a good name?"

"Meanwhile," said Danton, "what if the letter speaks the truth, and this is really the night when the whole royal gang is to decamp?"

"As we 're here, at the Tuileries, let us see about it!" and the five Patriots amused themselves by walking around the palace.

In returning towards Rue Saint Nicaise, they perceived Lafayette and his staff going into the Tuileries.

"Faith!" said Danton. "Why, there 's Blondinet, coming to help put the royal family to bed. Our duty is done, and his begins. Good-night, gentlemen! Who comes with me, towards Rue Paon?"

"I!" said Legendre.

The group separated into two parties. Danton and Legendre crossed the Carrousel Square, while Chénier, Fréron, and Camille Desmoulins disappeared around the corner of Rue Rohan, into Rue Saint Honoré.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

THE DEPARTURE.

At eleven in the evening, at the very time when Madame Tourzel and Madame Brunier, after having undressed and put Madame Royale and the Dauphin to bed, woke them up again, and dressed them in their travelling clothes, — to the great mortification of the Dauphin, who wished to put on his usual masculine attire, and obstinately refused the girlish garments, — the Queen and Madame Elizabeth received Lafayette and his two aides, Gouvion and Romeuf.

This visit was specially disquieting, on account of their suspicions of Madame de Rochereul.

In the evening the Queen and Madame Elizabeth went out, for a promenade in the Bois de Boulogne, — the park beyond the termination of the Champs Élysées, the other side of the point where now stands the great Triumphal Arch erected by Napoleon. Lafayette asked the Queen if the drive had been pleasant; only he added that she was wrong to be out so late, as he feared the evening fogs might not be good for her.

"Fogs in a June evening?" said the Queen, smiling; "but truly, unless made purposely to conceal our flight, I don't know where we should find them. I say, to conceal our flight; for I suppose the rumor still spreads that we are about running away."

"The truth is, Madame," said Lafayette, "there is more talk than ever about your departure, and I have been notified that it is to take place to-night."

"Ah!" said the Queen, "I wager you learned that piece of news from Monsieur de Gouvion?"

"And why from me, your Majesty?" asked the young officer, blushing.

"Well, because I believe you have constant intercourse with the palace. Now here is Monsieur Romeuf, who has no such intercourse; and I 'm sure he 'll be answerable for us."

"And I should not deserve any great credit, Madame," responded the young aide, "inasmuch as the King gave the Assembly his word of honor not to quit Paris."

This time it was the Queen's turn to blush, and they subsequently chatted about other matters. At half-past eleven Lafayette and his two aides took leave of the King and Queen.

Thereafter Gouvion, ill-satisfied, returned to his room in the palace, where he found his friends on the watch; but instead of relieving them from duty, he urged them to redouble their vigilance.

As to Lafayette, he went to the Hôtel de Ville, to tranquillize Bailly about the King's intentions, if Bailly had any misgivings.

As soon as Lafayette had left them, the Queen and Madame Elizabeth called upon their attendants for the customary toilet services; after which, at the regular hour, everybody was dismissed.

Then the Queen and Madame Elizabeth helped each other to dress. Their gowns were extremely simple. Their bonnets were very large, with wide borders, which wholly hid their faces.

When they were dressed the King came in. He had a gray coat, and wore one of those bag (or pudding) periwigs, named after Jean Jacques Rousseau. He also wore short breeches, gray stockings, and buckled shoes.

Now and then, for a week, Hue, the King's valet, clothed in a costume exactly like the King's, had gone in and out the entrance of the apartments belonging to Monsieur de Villequier, — who had emigrated six months before, — and so into Carrousel Square, the great courtyard of the Tuileries, and thence to the Rue Saint Nicaise, which was not far away. This precaution had been taken so that people should become accustomed to seeing a man, dressed in this fashion, going about the neighborhood, and not be specially attracted by the King's appearance, when his turn should come to pass that way.

The three couriers were brought from the Queen's boudoir, where they had waited for the hour to arrive, and taken into the parlor in the suite occupied by Madame Royale, where she and the Dauphin were.

In anticipation of the flight, this suite, adjoining Villequier's former apartments, had been thus occupied since the Eleventh of the month; and on the Thirteenth the King took possession of the keys of the vacated rooms.

Once inside of Villequier's old apartments, there would be no great difficulty in getting outside the palace. These rooms were supposed to be deserted; and as it was not known that the King had taken the keys, this point was ordinarily not guarded.

Moreover, after it struck eleven, the sentinels in the courtyards were accustomed to see a great many different people go out together. These were mostly royal attendants, who did not sleep in the palace, but returned to their own lodgings, when their duties for the day were over.

In Madame Royale's parlor the royal family completed their arrangements for the journey.

Isidore de Charny, who had surveyed the road with his brother, and knew all the difficult and dangerous places, would ride ahead, and notify the postilions, so that changing horses might cause no needless delay.

Malden and Valory would be on the rear outside seat, and pay the postilions thirty sous apiece. The ordinary price was twenty-five, but five were to be added, on account of the weight of the carriage. If the postilions made good time, they would receive large gratuities for drink-money. No postilion would receive over forty sous from them, however, the King alone paying a crown.

The elder Charny, Count Oliver, would be inside the carriage, prepared for all emergencies. He would be well armed, as would be also the three couriers. For each of them there would be a brace of pistols in the carriage.

By paying the postilions extra, and driving moderately fast, it was calculated that in thirteen hours the party would be at Châlons.

All the arrangements had been agreed upon between Count Oliver de Charny and the Duke de Choiseul. They were repeated several times to the three young gentlemen, in order that each should become fully acquainted with his functions.

Viscount Isidore de Charny would ride on ahead, and order the horses. Malden and Valory, on the rear outside seat, would pay for them. If anything needed to be said, the Count would do the talking from his place inside, putting his head through the coach window. Each one promised to adhere to his part of the programme.

Then the candles were blown out, and the party cautiously went into the Villequier apartments. Midnight sounded, as they passed from Madame Royale's suite into the other. The Count de Charny must have been at his post more than an hour already.

Feeling his way along, the King found the door leading into the corridor. He was about inserting the key, when the Queen checked him with a hush!

They listened. They could hear laughter and steps in the corridor outside. Something extraordinary was taking place out there. Madame de Tourzel, who lived constantly in the palace, and whose presence in the corridor, even at that hour, could surprise nobody, volunteered to go back and round the apartments to the other side, and ascertain the source of those chuckles and noisy steps.

They waited motionless, — almost breathless. The greater the silence, the easier it was to perceive the corridor was occupied by several persons.

Madame de Tourzel returned. She had recognized Gouvion, and noticed several uniforms.

It was obviously inexpedient to enter the corridor, and so leave the building, through the Villequier suite, unless there was some other outlet than the one already selected; only they had no light to aid their search.

A night-lamp was burning in Madame Royale's chamber, and Madame Elizabeth went there, to relight the candle which had been blown out. By the light of this candle the little band of fugitives tried to find some other place of egress from the Villequier rooms.

For some time their search was fruitless, and more than fifteen minutes were lost. At last they discovered a small staircase, which led to an isolated room in the lower story. This chamber had belonged to Monsieur de Villequier's servant, and had a door which connected it with the servants' entrance.

This door was locked. The King tried all the keys on his ring, but not one of them would fit. Isidore tried to push back the bolt with the point of his hunting-knife, but the bolt resisted. To be sure they had found an outlet, yet they were shut in the great palace as tightly as ever.

The King took the candle from Madame Elizabeth's hands. Leaving the rest in obscurity, he went upstairs to his own bedroom, by the secret staircase, whence he could easily reach his workshop. There he took a bunch of picks of different forms, some of them quite odd, and then came down again.

Before rejoining the group, waiting for him with so much anxiety, he had decided which pick to try. This picklock easily entered into the keyhole, grated as it turned, caught the bolt, and twice let it slip; but the third time he pressed the pick so hard that the bolt flew back, after several seconds of careful effort. The latch yielded, the door opened, and everybody breathed more freely.

Louis turned to the Queen with a triumphant air. "Hey, Madame?" he said; "is n't this really worth knowing?"

"Yes, Monsieur," said the Queen, laughing; "and truly I never said it was bad to be a locksmith, only that it was better to be a king."

Meanwhile it was necessary to arrange the order of their departure. Madame Elizabeth went out first, conducting Madame Royale. At twenty paces distant they were followed by Madame de Tourzel, with the Dauphin. Between the two groups walked Monsieur de Malden, ready to give help to either party.

These first beads detached from the royal chaplet — these poor children, watched by love from behind, and depending upon that love which followed them with its keen eyes — went timidly out, on tiptoe, entered the circle of light formed by the street-lamp, shining above the palace door which opened into the courtyard, and passed the sentinel quietly and unnoticed.

"Good!" said Madame Elizabeth, "there's one bad place over!"

At the wicket, which led into the Carrousel Square, they met a sentinel, whose line of march directly crossed their path. Seeing them, he paused.

"Aunty," said Madame Royale, pressing Madame Elizabeth's hand, "we are lost! That man knows us!"

"Never mind, my child," said Madame Elizabeth, "we shall certainly be lost if we hesitate!" and so they continued on their way.

When they were within four steps of the sentinel, he turned his back upon them, so they could pass by.

Did this man really know them? Did he know what illustrious fugitives he allowed to pass? The ladies were fully convinced that he did, and bestowed a thousand benedictions upon their unknown preserver, in the midst of their flight.

On the other side of the wicket they could see Charny's anxious face. The Count was wrapped in a great box-coat, and wore a round oil-cloth hat. "Thank God," he said, "you are here at last! But the King, the Queen!"

"They are following us," replied Madame Elizabeth.

"Come on!" said Charny; and he rapidly led the way to a hired carriage, stationed on Rue Saint Nicaise.

Another carriage had taken its stand beside the first, as if to play the spy.

"Well, comrade," said the driver of this second carriage, seeing Charny come along with this little party, "it seems there 's a fare!"

"Ay, ay, comrade!" replied Charny. Then he whispered to the bodyguard: "Malden, take that cab, and go straight to Gate Saint Martin. You 'll have no difficulty in recognizing the coach which is there waiting for us."

Malden understood, and jumped into the carriage, while Charny said aloud to the strange hackman: "A load for thee also. To the Opera-house, — quick!"

The Opera-house evidently meant Saint Martin's Gate.

The coachman supposed Malden to be some footman, going to meet his master at the play, and drove away without any further observation, except a few words which related to his pecuniary interest in the price of the trip.

"You know it 's past midnight, my friend!"

"Oh yes! Go ahead, and be easy!"

As at this period lackeys were often more generous than their masters, the coachman drove off with no further remarks.

Hardly had this carriage turned the corner into Rue Rohan, than there came, at an ordinary gait, — through the same wicket which had given passage to Madame Royale and Madame Elizabeth, Madame de Tourzel and the Dauphin, — a man dressed like a clerk, leaving his office after a long and hard day's work. This good man wore a gray coat. His hat was tipped over his nose and he carried his hands in his pocket.

It was the King. He was followed by Valory. During his walk, one of the King's shoe-buckles became detached. He went on without noticing it, but Valory picked it up.

Charny came several steps towards them, having recognized Valory, — who followed the King, — but not the King himself.

Charny was one of those to whom a king is always the King. He heaved a sigh of sadness, almost of shame, as he murmured: "This way, Sire!" adding, in a lower voice, to Valory: "And the Queen?"

"The Queen is following us, with your brother Isidore."

"Very well! Take the shortest cut, and wait for us at the Gate Saint Martin. I will take a longer way. The place of meeting is by the great coach which is waiting there for us."

Valory hurried from Rue Saint Nicaise to Rue Saint Honoré, then into Rue Richelieu, Victory Square, and Rue Bourbon Villeneuve, which led diagonally from this Square to Saint Martin's Gate.

Meantime the royal party waited for the Queen. A half-hour passed. We will not try to depict the anxiety of the fugitives.

Charny, upon whom rested the weight of responsibility, was almost crazy. He wished to return to the palace, and make inquiries; but the King held him back.

The little Dauphin wept, and cried aloud for his dear mamma. Neither his sister, his aunt, nor his governess could comfort him.

Their terror increased when they saw General Lafayette's carriage, accompanied by torchbearers, return that way, and drive into Carrousel Square.

This is what had happened. At the door of the courtyard the Viscount gave his arm to the Queen, and wished to turn to the left; but she stopped him.

"Where are you going?" she asked.

"To the corner of Rue Saint Nicaise, where my brother expects us."

"Is it on the riverside?" asked her Majesty.

"No, Madame."

"Well, it's at the wicket on the riverside, opposite the quay, where your brother is to wait."

Isidore tried to insist; but the Queen (who had been misled, perhaps, by the similarity of sound between the word quay[1] and the last syllable of Nicaise), appeared so sure of what she said, that he began to misdoubt his own memory.

"Before God, Madame," he exclaimed, "be very careful. An error now would be fatal!"

"To the riverside!" repeated the Queen. "I certainly heard something said about the quay."

"Then let us go to the riverside, Madame, for it is only on the other side of the palace; but if we do not find the carriage there, we will at once go to Rue Saint Nicaise, shall we not?"

"Yes, yes; but let us keep on now!"

The Queen led her cavalier through the three courtyards, separated, at that time, by thick walls, and opening from one to another through narrow passages, close to the palace buildings, each opening being protected with a chain and guarded by a sentinel.

One by one these openings were passed by Isidore and the Queen, who had to climb over the chains; but not a sentinel offered to bar their progress. Why should anybody fancy that this young woman, dressed like an attendant in some respectable mansion, and leaning on the arm of a handsome young fellow, in the livery of the Prince de Condé, — and climbing with agility over those great chains, — was the Queen of France?

They reached the waterside, and found the pier deserted.

"Then the carriage must be on the farther side of the river!" said the Queen.

[1] It will be remembered that though quay is sometimes pronounced like key in English, it is never so pronounced in French, but always has the long sound of a, — like kay.

Isidore wished to retrace their steps; but she persisted, as if seized by a sort of hallucination: "No, no! This way!" and she urged Isidore to go farther on, towards Royal Bridge.

They crossed this bridge, and found the quay and the other bank of the Seine, the left, just as deserted as the right bank, on the side of the Tuileries.

"Let us look into yonder street!" said the Queen; and she forced Isidore to try Rue Bac. At the end of a hundred steps she acknowledged to herself she must be mistaken, and stood still, panting for breath, for her strength began to give out.

"Well, Madame, do you still insist?"

"No! It all depends upon you! Take me where you will!"

"In Heaven's name, have courage!" said Isidore.

"It's not courage I lack, but strength," said Marie Antoinette. Turning her steps backward she added: "Oh Lord, oh Lord! it seems to me I shall never recover my breath!"

Isidore knew that in such an emergency breath was as necessary to the Queen's safety as it is to a fawn pursued by the hounds; so he paused.

"Breathe, Madame. We have time enough. I will answer for my brother. He 'll wait until daylight, if need be."

"You believe he loves me, then?" cried she, quickly and imprudently, pressing against her breast the young Viscount's arm, upon which she leaned.

"I believe that his life, like mine, belongs to you, Madame; and the sentiment of love, which belongs to us both, amounts to adoration in him."

"Thanks!" said the Queen. "You relieve me, and I breathe again. — Come, let us on!"

With feverish haste she resumed her walk. They re-crossed the bridge, and retraced the road already taken; only, in place of re-entering the other courtyards of the Tuileries, Isidore passed through the wicket of Carrousel Square, which they crossed. Until midnight this immense square was usually filled with hackney carriages, and movable stalls for the sale of small wares; but now it was almost deserted and correspondingly gloomy.

They could hear, however, a great noise of rolling wheels and clattering hoofs. When they reached the wicket opposite Rue Échelle, it was evident that the horses and carriage whose hoofs and wheels they had heard were coming that way. A light was already visible, proceeding doubtless from the torches which kept the carriage company.

Isidore wished to go back, but the Queen insisted upon going forward. Isidore threw himself under the wicket, in order to protect her, just as the heads of the torch-bearers' horses appeared at the opposite entrance. He pushed her into the darkest recess along the wall, and stationed himself in front of her; but even this dark recess was instantly flooded with light from the torches.

In the midst of the cavalcade, half reclining in his carriage, wearing his elegant uniform as General of the National Guard, might be seen Lafayette.

At the moment when this carriage passed by, Isidore felt a strong arm — enforced with will-power, if not with physical strength — push him aside. This arm was the strong left arm of the Queen.

In her right hand she carried a small bamboo cane, with a gilt knob, such as women generally carried at that epoch. With this she rapped the carriage-wheels, saying: "Go thy way, jailer! I 'm outside of thy prison!"

"What are you doing, Madame?" whispered Isidore. "To what are you exposing yourself?"

"I am revenging myself!" responded Marie Antoinette. "One would risk anything for that!"

As soon as the last torch had passed by them, she ran out of her retreat, as radiant as a goddess and joyful as a child.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

A QUESTION OF ETIQUETTE.

THE Queen had not taken ten steps beyond the wicket, when a man wearing a huge boxcoat, his face hidden by an oil-cloth hat, grasped her peremptorily by the arm, and hurried her towards a hack, stationed at the corner of Rue Saint Nicaise.

This man was the elder Charny. The hack was one in which the rest of the royal family had been waiting half an hour. They expected to see the Queen perplexed, disheartened, hysterical, but here she came, laughing and joyous. The dangers she had run, the fatigue she had incurred, the errors she had committed, the time she had lost, the delay she had caused, — all these were forgotten, in the rap of the cane which she had given the wheels of Lafayette's carriage, and which seemed to her almost as if she had bestowed the blow upon himself.

Ten paces away from the hack, a servant was holding a horse by the bridle. Charny had no sooner pointed the animal out to Isidore than Isidore sprang upon his back, and was off at full speed. He was to ride in advance as far as Bondy, and see that relays of horses were in readiness.

Seeing him depart, the Queen threw after him several words of gratitude, which he could not hear.

"Come, Madame, come," said Charny, with that firmness, mingled with respect, which really strong men know how to assume in great emergencies, "there is not a second to lose!"

The Queen entered the carriage, where were already the King, Madame Elizabeth, Madame Royale, the Dauphin, and Madame de Tourzel, — that is, five persons. She sat in the rear seat, and took the Dauphin on her knees. Next her sat the King. Madame Elizabeth, Madame Royale, and Madame de Tourzel sat facing them.

Charny closed the door, mounted to the driver's seat; and to put spies on the wrong scent, if any were lurking thereabouts, he turned the horses, drove up Rue Saint Honoré, entered the boulevards at the Madeleine Church, and followed the line of the boulevards around, till the curve brought them, in this roundabout way, to the Gate Saint Martin.

There, on a byroad outside the gate, leading to a place known as the Common Sewer, they found in waiting the unusually large coach, which had been built expressly for the royal flight.

The byway was deserted. Charny leaped to the ground and opened the door of the hack he had been driving. The door of the coach, which was to serve them for their journey, was already open. Malden and Valory, who had reached the place an hour or so earlier, stood by the steps, on either side.

In an instant the six persons who had come in the hack were standing in the road. Then Charny drove the hack, which was no longer needed, to the lower side of the way, managed to upset it into a ditch, and then returned to the large coach, to which he attached the extra horses.

First the King entered, then the Queen, then Madame Elizabeth. After their aunt, came the two children; and after them, Madame de Tourzel.

Malden mounted behind the coach, while Valory sat with Charny, on the driver's seat. The coach was now furnished with four horses. A click of the tongue made them start off at a trot, the director urging them to full speed. The quarter-hour after one rang from Saint Lawrence's Church.

It required an hour to go as far as Bondy. The fresh horses were waiting in the stable, with their harnesses on their backs, ready to be hitched to the coach. Isidore was on hand, near the horses.

On the other side of the road stood a hired cabriolet, attached to two posthorses. In this cabriolet were two chambermaids, belonging to the service of the Dauphin and Madame Royale. They had expected to find a livery hack at Bondy; but not finding one there, they arranged with the master of this cabriolet, who sold it to them for a thousand francs.

The master, well-pleased with his bargain, — and doubtless wishing to see who might be the persons who were such idiots as to give a thousand francs for such an old rattletrap, — was waiting and drinking in the posthouse. He saw the King's coach arrive, directed by Charny, who jumped down and approached the carriage window.

Under his coachman's coat he wore his uniform; and his hat was in the box, under the seat. It had been arranged between the King, Queen, and Charny, that the latter should take a seat inside the coach at Bondy, in place of Madame de Tourzel, who would return alone to Paris.

Unfortunately they had forgotten to consult Madame de Tourzel about this arrangement. The King submitted the question to her. Despite her heartfelt devotion to the royal family in other matters, Madame de Tourzel was a worthy disciple and appendage of old Madame de Noailles on all questions of etiquette, — a perfect dragon on this subject.

She therefore replied: "Sire, my duty is to watch over the royal children of France, and not quit them for an instant. Unless I have an express order from your Majesty, — an order which would, however, be unprecedented, — I shall not leave them."

The Queen shook with impatience. A double reason made her wish to have Charny in the coach. As Queen, she saw in him her protector. As a woman, she found in him her delight.

"Dear Madame de Tourzel," said her Majesty, "we are as grateful to you as possible; but you are uncomfortable, and you have an exaggerated sense of your duty. Remain here at Bondy, for the present, and wherever we may be, you shall rejoin us later."

"Madame," responded Madame de Tourzel, "if the King so orders, I am ready to leave the carriage, and to remain in the middle of the highway, if necessary; but only an order from his Majesty will make me willing, not merely to fail in my duty, but to renounce my rights."

"Sire," said the Queen, "Sire!" but Louis dared not decide so grave a question. He sought for some expedient, some loophole of escape, some subterfuge.

"Monsieur de Charny," he said, "can you not remain on the box?"

"I can do whatever the King wishes," said Charny; "only, I must either wear my official uniform, — and during the past year I have been frequently seen on this route, wearing the same uniform, and everybody will recognize me; or else I must wear this boxcoat, and coachman's oil-cloth hat; and the latter dress is a little too ordinary for so elegant a carriage."

"Come inside, Monsieur de Charny, come in," said the Queen. "I will take the Dauphin on my knees. Madame Elizabeth will take little Maria Theresa on hers, and we shall get along very well. We shall be somewhat crowded, that 's all."

Charny awaited the decision of the King, who said: "Impossible, my dear! Think of it! We have ninety leagues to travel!"

Madame de Tourzel stood up, ready to obey the King's orders, and get out, if the King so decided; but the King dared not give this order, — so important, among Court people, seem the most trifling prejudices.

"Charny," said the King to the Count, "can't you take your brother Isidore's place, and travel in advance, to order the horses?"

"As I have already assured your Majesty, I am ready to do anything; only I beg your Majesty to remember, the posthorses are usually ordered by a courier, not by a naval captain. This novelty would astonish the postmasters at the stations, and might lead to serious difficulties."

"That 's true!" said the King.

"Oh my God, my God," said the Queen, overflowing with impatience. Then she added, turning to Charny: "Arrange it as you please, Count, but I don't wish you to leave us."

"That is also my wish, Madame," said Charny, "but I can see only one way of avoiding it."

"Which way? Speak quick!" said the Queen.

"It is this, — that instead of entering the carriage, instead of mounting the box, instead of travelling as a courier, I should follow you along, in the plain dress of a man who travels by post. Go on, Madame, and before you have made ten leagues, I shall be not more than five hundred paces behind your carriage."

"Then you will go back to Paris?"

"Undoubtedly, Madame; but as far as Châlons, your Majesty has nothing to fear, and before you reach Châlons, I 'll be with you again."

"But how will you get back to Paris?"

"On the horse which my brother has been riding. The animal is an excellent roadster, and has had time to breathe. In less than half an hour I shall be in Paris."

"And then?"

"Then, Madame, I shall put on suitable clothing, hire a posthorse, and ride with a free stirrup, until I overtake you."

"Is there no other way?" said Marie Antoinette, in despair.

"Good Lord, I see no other!" said the King.

"Then no time is to be lost," said Charny. "We 're ready. Here Jean, François, — to your places. Ride ahead, Melchior! Postilions, to your horses!"

Madame de Tourzel then reseated herself in triumph, and the coach started off at a gallop, followed by the cabriolet.

This all-important discussion made them forget to give Isidore, Valory, and Malden the loaded pistols, which were packed away in their case, inside the coach.

Meanwhile, how were things going in Paris, whither Charny was riding so fast?

A wigmaker named Buseby, living in Rue Bourbon, had been passing the evening at the Tuileries, with a friend who was there on guard. This friend had heard the officers talking of the flight, which some people were so sure had been projected for that night. He told the wigmaker about it; and the wigmaker could not drive from his mind the notion that this project was real, and that the royal flight, so long the subject of gossip, was to be put into execution that night.

Returning home, he told his wife what he had learned at the Tuileries; but she treated the whole affair as a dream. Her ridicule so quieted her husband's suspicions, that he finally undressed himself and went to bed.

Once in bed, however, his former convictions returned upon him, and before long became so strong that he could not resist them. He sprang out of bed, redressed himself, and visited the apartments of one of his friends, named Hucher, who was not only a baker, but also a sapper in the Théatin Battalion.

To him the wigmaker reported all he had heard at the Tuileries, and imparted his fears in such a lively fashion to the baker, — as to the flight of the royal family, — that the baker not only shared his neighbor's apprehensions, but grasped them more ardently. He even jumped out of bed, and, without taking time to put on anything but his drawers, went out into the street, rapped at the doors, and roused some thirty of his neighbors.

This was at fifteen minutes past midnight, and just after the Queen encountered Lafayette at the wicket of the Tuileries.

The citizens who were awakened by the wigmaker Buseby and the baker Hucher decided that they would put on their uniforms as members of the National Guard, and then call upon General Lafayette, to let him know what was going on.

This resolution was at once put into execution. Lafayette lived on Rue Saint Honoré, in the Noailles Mansion, near the Feuillant Terrace. The Patriots put themselves in motion, and were there by half-past twelve.

After assisting the King to retire, after notifying Bailly that the King was safe abed, after paying a visit to Monsieur Emmery, a member of the National Assembly, — after doing all this, the General had come home, and was preparing to undress.

At that moment there was a loud knock at the door of the Noailles Mansion. Lafayette sent his valet to see what was the matter. The valet soon returned, saying that some twenty-five or thirty citizens wished to see the General instantly, in an affair of the utmost importance.

At that period the General was accustomed to hold a reception at any hour when it happened to be necessary. Moreover, an affair which had disturbed twenty-five or thirty citizens might turn out of some importance; so he ordered his nocturnal visitors to be introduced. The General had only to slip on his coat, which he had just thrown off, to be in proper reception costume.

Messieurs Buseby and Hucher, for themselves and in behalf of their companions, made known their fears; Buseby basing his apprehensions on what he had gleaned at the Tuileries, — the others, on what they had daily heard in all quarters.

The General could only laugh at their fears. As he was a good fellow and a great talker, he told them whence these rumors had come; how they had been spread abroad by Madame de Rochereul and Monsieur de Gouvion; how, to reassure himself, the General had seen the King go to bed, — as his visitors might see himself go to bed, if they would remain a few minutes longer. As this conversation failed to reassure them, Lafayette added that he would make his own head answerable for the King, and for all the royal family.

After this assurance it was impossible to show any suspicion; so the citizens contented themselves with asking Lafayette for the watchword, so that no one could molest them on their way home. Lafayette could not refuse them this favor, and gave them the word accordingly.

Armed with this watchword they resolved to visit the Riding School, to learn if there was anything new in that quarter, and also the palace courtyards, to ascertain if anything extraordinary was happening there.

From this trip they returned along Rue Saint-Honoré, and had reached Rue Échelle, when a horseman, at full speed, suddenly rode into their midst. In such a night, everything was eventful; so they crossed their muskets, and called upon the cavalier to halt.

He did so, and asked: "What do you want?"

"We want to know where you 're going," said the National Guardsmen.

"I 'm going to the Tuileries."

"What are you going to do at the Tuileries?"

"Render my account to the King, of a commission he has given me."

"At this hour?"

"Certainly, at this very hour!"

One of these astute fellows made a sign to the others, to let him speak, and said: "But at this hour the King 's abed and asleep."

"Yes," answered the rider, "but he can wake up."

"If you have business with the King, you must have the watchword," said the same man who had spoken before.

"That would be no reason, if I had come from the frontier, far away, instead of coming from a place only three leagues from here, and if I had parted from the King a month ago, instead of two hours."

"True," said the National Guardsmen.

"Then you saw the King two hours ago?" continued the first questioner.

"Yes."

"You spoke with him?"

"Yes."

"What was he doing two hours ago?"

"He was only waiting for General Lafayette to go out, in order to go to sleep."

"Then of course you have the watchword?"

"Certainly. The General, knowing that I must re-enter the Tuileries about one or two o'clock in the morning, gave me the watchword, so that I might not be delayed."

"And that watchword?"

"Paris and Poitiers."

"That 's all right," said the guardsmen. "Happy return, comrade. Tell the King you found us watching at his palace gate, so that he might not run away."

They stood aside to let the cavalier pass, as he responded, "I will not fail to do so;" and, pricking his horse with both spurs, he shot through the wicket of the Tuileries, where he disappeared from their sight.

"Had we better wait till he comes out of the Tuileries, and so learn if he saw the King?" said one of the wise citizens.

"If he lodges in the Tuileries, we shall have to wait till to-morrow!" said another.

"True," said the first; "and, my faith, if Lafayette 's abed, and the King 's abed, let 's take our turn in going to bed; and so, Hurrah for the Nation!"

The twenty-five or thirty Patriots repeated the cry in chorus: "Hurrah for the Nation!" and then went home to their little beds, happy and proud at having heard, from Lafayette's own mouth, that he had no fear of the King's quitting Paris.

CHAPTER XL.

ON THE ROAD.

We have seen the four horses start from Bondy at a vigorous trot, drawing the coach which bore the King and his family. Let us follow their journey in all its details, as we followed the details of their escape from Paris. The events were so important, and exercised so fatal an influence over the royal destiny, that the least accident on the route seems worthy of our curiosity or interest.

Day broke at about three in the morning. They changed horses at Meaux. The King was hungry, and began to break into their provisions. These provisions consisted of cold veal, which had been placed by Charny in the carriage wine-box, along with some bread, and four bottles of champagne, — not very sparkling.

As there were neither knives nor forks, the King summoned Jean. Jean, it will be remembered, was Monsieur de Malden's travelling name. Malden drew near.

"Jean," said the King, "lend me your hunting-knife, to cut this veal with."

Jean drew the knife from its sheath, and offered it to the King. During this transaction the Queen leaned out of the window and gazed backward, doubtless to see if Charny was not on the road.

"Won't you take something, Malden?" whispered the King.

"No, Sire," responded Malden, in tones equally low, "I need nothing."

"Don't let yourself or your companions discommode themselves unnecessarily," said the King. Then he added, speaking to the Queen, who was still looking out of the window: "A penny for your thoughts, Madame?"

"Mine? Oh, I was thinking of Lafayette," said the Queen, trying to smile. "He is probably not very comfortable, about this time." Then she said to Valory, who in his turn drew nearer the coach: "François, it seems to me that everything goes very well, and that we should be detained before this time, if we are likely to be detained at all. Our departure could not have been noticed."

"That is more than probable, Madame," responded Valory, "for I have observed no suspicious movements anywhere. Courage, Madame, all will yet be well."

"All ready!" cried the postilions. Malden and Valory remounted their seats, and the carriage drove on.

Towards eight o'clock in the morning they reached the bottom of a long hill. On both sides of the road stretched a lovely wood, where the birds were singing. The trees were illuminated by the first rays of a rare June day, piercing the foliage like golden arrows.

The postilions checked their horses. The two footmen came down from their seats.

"Jean," said the King, "stop the carriage, and open the door. I want to walk, and I believe the children and the Queen won't be sorry for a little diversion afoot."

Malden made a sign, and the postilions halted. The door was opened. The King, Queen, Madame Elizabeth, and the two children stepped out. Madame de Tourzel alone remained inside, being too ill to do otherwise.

In an instant the whole royal colony dispersed itself over the highway. The Dauphin began to chase butterflies, and Madame Royale to gather flowers. Madame Elizabeth took the King's arm, while the Queen walked on alone.

Seeing this family, thus scattered along the road, — the beautiful children running and playing; the sister smiling into the face of the brother, on whose arm she leaned; that beautiful and pensive woman, now and then looking backward; the whole scene lighted by the beautiful sun of a June morning, with the forest throwing its transparent shadows half across the road! — beholding this scene, one would have said this was a happy family, returning to their château, to resume the course of a peaceable and regular life, not a queen and king, fleeing from a throne, to which they would soon be restored, but only to be led thereafter to the scaffold.

It is true that an accident was soon to bring trouble into this serene picture, trouble arising from the different passions lying in the hearts of several personages of our narrative.

Suddenly the Queen stopped, as if her feet had taken root in the earth. A horseman appeared a quarter-league or so away, enveloped in a cloud of dust, raised by his horse's feet. Marie Antoinette dared not say, "There is Charny!" but a little cry escaped from her bosom, as she exclaimed: "Ah! News from Paris!"

Everybody turned, except the Dauphin. That happy child had just caught the butterfly he had been chasing, and cared little for the news from Paris.

The King, somewhat near-sighted, drew out a small lorgnette from his pocket, and said: "Hey? I do believe it 's Charny!"

"Yes, Sire, it is he," said the Queen.

"Let us keep on," said the King. "He'll soon overtake us, and we've no time to waste."

The Queen dared not say that undoubtedly the news brought by the Count must be worth waiting for. However, it was a delay of only a few seconds, as the horseman was coming at full speed.

As he drew nearer, he regarded the scene with great attention, and appeared unable to understand why that gigantic vehicle had spilled its passengers all over the road. At last he reached them, just as the coach attained the summit of the hill, where it halted.

It was indeed Charny, as had been conjectured by the Queen's heart and the King's glass. He wore a close, green riding-coat, with a rolling collar, a hat with a broad band and steel buckle, a white vest, tight breeches, and large military boots, which came up to his knees.

His complexion, usually a dull white, was flushed by his ride, and the jets of heat which reddened his cheeks shone even in his eyeballs. There was something of the air of a conqueror in his powerful breathing and dilated nostrils. The Queen had never seen him so handsome, and she heaved a profound sigh. He dismounted, and bowed to the King. Then he turned and saluted the Queen.

The whole group gathered about him, except the two guards, who remained discreetly aloof. "Approach, gentlemen, approach," said the King. "Monsieur de Charny's tidings concern everybody."

"To begin with, Sire, all goes well," said Charny, "and at two this morning, nobody suspected your flight."

Everybody breathed more freely. Then the questions multiplied.

Charny related how he had returned to Paris; how he had encountered, in Rue Échelle, the patrol of Patriots; how they had catechised him; how he left them convinced that the King was abed and asleep.

Once inside the Tuileries, he had found everything as calm as on ordinary days. He went up to his room, changed his dress, came down again through the King's corridor, made sure that nobody suspected the escape of the royal family, — not even Monsieur Gouvion, who, finding that his sentinels, stationed in line around the royal apartments, were of no use, broke their ranks, and sent home the battalion officers.

Then Charny again mounted his horse, which had been held in the courtyard by one of the night watchmen. Thinking he should hardly be able to procure, at that hour, a nag at the posthouse in Paris, he set out for Bondy on the same horse he had so long been riding, whose feet were already used up; but he reached Bondy, and that was the one thing needful. There the Count had obtained a fresh horse, and continued his journey. Nothing disquieting had occurred on the road.

The Queen extended her hand to Charny. Such good news merited such a favor. He kissed that hand respectfully. Why did she grow pallid? Was it for joy, because Charny had pressed her hand?

They re-entered the carriage. The carriage started. Charny galloped beside the window.

At the next station they found the horses ready; only there was no saddle-horse for Charny. Isidore had not ordered a saddle-horse, not knowing that his brother would need one.

It was now arranged that Charny should not escort the royal coach, but simply follow it; although it was understood that he should keep near enough for the Queen to see him, if she put her head out of the window, and so that he could exchange a few words with the illustrious travellers, whenever they changed horses.

Charny obtained a fresh horse at Montmirail. He believed the coach was fifteen minutes ahead of him, when suddenly, as he turned the corner of a street, his horse ran his nose against the coach, which was standing still, and against the guards, who were trying to mend a broken trace.

The Count dismounted, put his head into the carriage, to advise the King to keep out of sight, and the Queen not to be uneasy. Then he opened a box wherein had been placed all the implements and materials which accident might render necessary. He found a pair of traces, one of which he took to replace the one broken.

The two guards profited by this opportunity to ask for their pistols; but the King seriously opposed their request. To the suggestion that there might be some attempt to detain him, the King responded that under no circumstances could he allow blood to be shed for him.

At last the trace was replaced and the box closed. The guards returned to their seats and Charny to his saddle, and the coach set forward. They had lost a half-hour, however, and that, too, when the loss of a minute was irreparable.

In two hours they were at Châlons. "If we reach Châlons without being detained, all will go well." So the King had said. Here they were at Châlons. Their progress had not been checked, and they changed horses once more.

The King showed himself for an instant. Among the groups around the carriage were two men who looked at him steadfastly. Suddenly one of the two withdrew and disappeared. The other came nearer the carriage.

"Sire," said he, in a low voice, "don't let yourself be seen in this way, or you will be lost." Then he called aloud to the postilions: "Hurry up, lazy bones! Is this the way you serve smart travellers, who pay thirty sous a head?" and he set himself to work, helping the postilions. This man was the superintendent of the post.

At last horses were harnessed, and the postilions were in their saddles. The first postilion tried to start up the horses, but they both fell down. Under the strokes of the whip, they struggled to their feet, and the carriage started, when the second postilion's horses also fell, with him underneath.

Charny, who was silently waiting, pulled the postilion from under the horses, though the fellow's boots were left behind.

"Oh Monsieur," said Charny, addressing the superintendent, of whose devoted loyalty he knew nothing, "what sort of horses are you giving us?"

"The best in the stable," was the reply.

However, the horses were so tangled in their traces that the more the postilions tried to relieve them, the worse things became.

Charny took hold of the traces and exclaimed: "Here, let us unharness, and then begin again. We shall get through all the sooner."

The superintendent again set himself to work, almost weeping with chagrin.

Meanwhile, the man who had disappeared from the stables ran to the Mayor's residence, to announce that at that very moment the King, and the whole royal family, were getting a relay of horses at the post, and to beg the Mayor to order their detention.

Fortunately the Mayor was not much of a Republican, and did not care to take upon himself such a responsibility. In place of promising to do what was demanded, he asked for all sorts of explanations, to see if the story was correct; and finally, when he could not help himself, he came to the posthouse, just as the coach was disappearing around the corner.

Nevertheless, twenty minutes had been sacrificed. There was some alarm in the royal carriage. Those horses, falling down one after the other, without apparent cause, recalled to the Queen's mind the four candles which went out, one after another, — without being touched by a human hand, — the first night she spent in the Tuileries, after the dreadful Sixth of October, nearly two years before.

However, as they drove through the gates of the town, the King, the Queen, and Madame Elizabeth exclaimed all together: "We are safe!" but a hundred paces farther on a man hurried up, put his head in at the window, and said to the illustrious travellers: "Your plans are badly arranged; you will be arrested."

The Queen screamed softly. The man threw himself to one side, and disappeared in a grove. Luckily it was not more than four leagues to Sommevelle Bridge, where they were to find Choiseul and his forty hussars; but it was already three o'clock in the afternoon, and they were nearly four hours late.

CHAPTER XLI.

FATALITY !

It will be remembered that the Duke de Choiseul was riding by post, with Leonard the barber, who was in despair at leaving a chamber door unlocked, at carrying off his brother's riding-coat, and at breaking his promise to dress Madame de l'Aage's hair.

What consoled poor Leonard was Choiseul's positive promise that he was only taking him two or three leagues (six or nine miles) from home, in order to give the barber a special commission from the Queen, and that he would then be set at liberty.

At Bondy, when he felt the vehicle coming to a stop, Leonard felt relieved, and made himself ready to get out; but the Duke checked him, saying: "This is n't the place."

Horses had been ordered in advance. In a very few seconds they were harnessed, and the carriage was off like a dart.

"But, Monsieur," said poor Leonard, "where then are we going?"

"Provided you start back by to-morrow morning, what matters anything else?"

"That is, if I can only be at the Tuileries by ten, to dress the Queen's hair —"

"That 's all you want?"

"Undoubtedly! Only, if I could be there sooner, it would n't be a bad idea, so that I could pacify my brother, and explain to Madame de l'Aage that it was n't my fault, breaking my word."

"If that 's all, be easy, my dear Leonard; all will be for the best," responded Choiseul.

Leonard therefore had no reason for believing that the Duke meant to abduct him altogether, and became tranquil, — at least for a while; but at Claye, seeing them put fresh horses to the carriage, while nothing was said about stopping, the unlucky fellow exclaimed: "Oh Monsieur, are we going to the end of the world?"

"Listen, Leonard!" then said the Duke, with a serious expression. "I am not taking you to some mansion in the neighborhood of Paris, but to the frontier."

Leonard uttered a groan, placed his hands on his knees, and looked at the Duke in alarm. "To the — the — frontier?" he stammered.

"Yes, my dear Leonard. I expect to find there, with my regiment, a letter of the highest importance for the Queen. Not being able to deliver it myself, it was necessary for me to have some one with me who would safely do so for me. I begged her to name somebody. She chose you, as being one whose devotion made him most worthy of such a trust."

"Oh Monsieur, surely, if I'm worthy of the Queen's confidence — ! But how shall I get back to Paris. I 'm in pumps, with white silk stockings and silk shortclothes. I have neither a change of linen, nor money."

The good fellow absolutely forgot that he had two millions' worth of the Queen's diamonds in his pocket.

"Don't be troubled, my dear friend," said the Duke. "I have in the carriage everything you need, — boots, clothing, linen, money, — and you will lack for nothing."

"Doubtless, Monsieur, with you I shall want for nothing; but my poor brother, whose overcoat and hat I have taken! and that poor Madame de l'Aage, whose hair is never dressed by anybody except myself. My God! my God! How will all this come out?"

"For the best, my dear Leonard. At least, I hope so."

They sped along like the wind. Choiseul had ordered his courier to prepare two beds and a supper at Montmirail, where they were to pass the night; and on reaching that point they found the beds ready and supper served.

Aside from his brother's coat and hat, aside from compulsorily breaking his word with Madame de l'Aage, Leonard was partly consoled. Now and then he let an expression of contentment escape him, from which it was easy to see that his pride was flattered by his being selected as the commissioner for so important a despatch as this apparently was to be.

After supper the two travellers went to bed, the Duke having ordered the carriage to be in readiness at four o'clock. Fifteen minutes before that hour they were to knock at his door and rouse him, in case he was asleep.

At three Choiseul had hardly closed his eyes, when from his chamber, which was immediately above the entrance gate, he heard the rumble of a carriage, accompanied by those cracks of the whip wherewith the postilions announced the advent of fresh arrivals.

To jump from his bed and run to the window, was the work of an instant with Choiseul.

A cabriolet was at the door. Two men stepped out of it, clothed in the costume of the National Guard, and imperatively demanded horses. Who were these National Guardsmen? What were they after at three in the morning? Why were they so much in a hurry about their horses?

Choiseul called his servant, and ordered him to have their own horses harnessed. Then he roused Leonard. Both travellers had lain down with their clothes on, and were therefore ready in an instant. When they came down, both carriages were ready. Choiseul told the postilion to let the guardsmen's carriage go first; only he must follow after, so as not for a moment to lose sight of it.

Then Choiseul examined the pistols, which he had placed in the carriage pockets, and renewed the priming, thereby causing Leonard grave misgivings.

They travelled thus a league or a league and a half; but between Étoges and Chaintry the cabriolet took a crossroad, going in the direction of Jalons and Épernay. The two guardsmen were only two good citizens, who had come from Ferté, and were returning homeward. With a more contented mind Choiseul pursued his journey. At ten they drove through Châlons. At eleven they reached Sommevelle Bridge.

There Choiseul inquired for his hussars, but they had not arrived. Stopping at the posthouse, he asked for a chamber, and there put on his uniform. Leonard observed all these preparations with lively anxiety, and his sighing accompaniment touched the Duke's heart. At last he said to him: "Leonard, it is time to let you know the truth."

"What? The truth?" said Leonard, going from one surprise to another. "Don't I know the truth already?"

"You know part of it, and I 'll tell you the rest."

Leonard clasped his hands and the Duke proceeded: "You are devoted to your employers, are n't you, my dear Leonard?"

"For life and death!"

"Well, in two hours they will be here."

"My God ! Is it possible ?" cried the poor fellow.

"Yes, here, with the children and Madame Elizabeth. You know what dangers they have run ?"

Leonard bowed his assent.

"You know what perils they still run ?"

Leonard lifted his eyes heavenward.

"Well, in two hours they will be safe !"

Leonard could not answer. He shed hot tears. Then he began to stammer: "In two hours ? — here ? — Are you sure of that ?"

"Yes, in two hours. They left the Tuileries at eleven o'clock last night, or soon after. At midday they were due at Châlons. Allowing them an hour and a half to do the remaining four leagues, they will be here two hours later. Let us order dinner. I expect here a detachment of hussars, commanded by Monsieur de Goguelat. We will make the dinner last as long as possible."

"Oh Monsieur," interrupted Leonard, "I am not hungry."

"Never mind that ! Make a valiant effort, and you can eat."

"Yes, Monsieur !"

"We must spin out the dinner as long as we can, so as to have a pretext for remaining here. — Eh ! Hold on ! There 's the trumpet of the hussars, now !"

Indeed, at that instant they could not only hear the trumpet, but the hoof-beats. Another moment, and Goguelat entered the chamber, and handed Choiseul a packet from Monsieur de Bouillé. This packet contained six blank orders, bearing each the royal signature, besides a duplicate of the King's formal order to all officers in the army, whatever their grade or priority of service, to obey the Duke for the present.

Choiseul had the horses picketed, distributed bread and wine to the hussars, and then sat down to dine.

The news brought by Goguelat was not good. Everywhere on his road he had found the people in an effervescent state. It was more than a year since a rumor of the King's intended departure had circulated, not only in Paris, but in the provinces, and the detachments of different military bodies, stationed at Saint Menehould and Varennes, were infected with the suspicion. He had even heard the alarm-bell sounding in one village along his route.

All this was quite enough to cut off Choiseul's own appetite. After an hour passed at table, he rose, as the clock sounded the half-hour after noon; and, leaving the command of the detachment to Monsieur Boudet, he walked up the street, to a height near the entrance of Sommevelle Bridge, whence he could have a good view over half a league of the road. He could see no sign of either courier or coach; but this was not surprising. Allowing for trifling detentions, he did not expect the courier before an hour or so later, and the King a half-hour after the courier.

Time rolled on, and still nothing was to be seen or heard on the road, — at least, nothing like what the Duke was looking for.

Every five minutes Choiseul drew out his watch; and each time he did so, Leonard said: "Oh, they 're not coming. My poor mistress! my poor mistress! Some ill-luck has overtaken them!"

By his despair the poor fellow added to Choiseul's disquiet.

At half-past two, at three, at half-past three, — still no courier, no coach! It will be remembered, though Choiseul was not aware of it, that the King did not really leave Châlons till three o'clock; so it was no wonder he was not at Sommevelle Bridge by four.

While Choiseul was thus watching and waiting at the turn of the road, Fatality was busy at that point, preparing an event which was to have great influence in the drama we are describing. Fatality — we repeat the word — had so willed it, that a few days earlier the peasantry on the ground belonging to Madame d'Elbœuf, ground situated near Sommevelle Bridge, had refused payment of certain proprietary rights. Then they were threatened with military compulsion; but the Federation at Paris had borne its fruits, and the peasants in the neighboring towns had promised to assist the Elbœuf peasants with arms, if these threats were put into execution.

Seeing these hussars arrive at the station, the peasantry imagined they had come with hostile intent. Messengers were at once sent from Sommevelle Bridge to the neighboring villages, and by three o'clock the tocsin of alarm began to sound throughout that section of country.

Hearing the alarm, Choiseul returned to the posthouse. There he found Lieutenant Boudet, very uneasy. Deep threats had been uttered against the hussars, who belonged to one of the most detested corps in the army. The peasants defied them, and sang, under their very noses, this improvised ditty:

Les hussards sont des gueux ;
Mais nous nous moquons d'eux !

a couplet which may be thus translated:

The hussars are beggars tall ;
But we mock them, one and all !

Other people, better-informed or farther-sighted, began to whisper it about that the hussars were not there to meddle with the Elbœuf farmers, but to meet the King and Queen.

Such was the outlook when four o'clock rung out, without bringing either courier or news.

Choiseul decided to wait for a while longer. However, he had the horses harnessed to his carriage, and took charge of Leonard's precious diamonds; but started Leonard himself towards Varennes, bidding him see Monsieur Dandoins at Saint Menehould, Monsieur Damas at Clermont, and Jules de Bouillé (not Louis, his brother) at Varennes, and explain to them the whole situation.

In order to calm the furor which was increasing about him, Choiseul declared that the hussars were not there, as was supposed by many, to proceed against Madame Elbœuf's peasants, but to act as escort for a treasure, which the War Minister was sending to the army.

This word treasure, being susceptible of two meanings, while it calmed the irritability on one side, confirmed the suspicions on the other. The King and Queen were a treasure, and this was certainly the treasure expected by Choiseul and the hussars.

In the course of fifteen minutes, Choiseul and his soldiers were so crowded and pushed, that he knew he could not long hold the position without disturbance; and that if the royal travellers should unhappily come while things were at such a pass, he would be almost powerless to protect them, with only his forty hussars.

His orders were, to see that the King's coach was allowed to continue its journey without obstruction. Instead of such a protection, his presence would now become an obstacle. The best thing to be done, even in case of the King's arrival, was to take the soldiers away. In fact, their departure would leave the road clear. Only he must find a pretext for this departure.

The post-superintendent was in the midst of five or six hundred inquisitive people, who needed only an imprudent word to become the Duke's enemies. The superintendent was looking on, like the others, with his arms crossed; only he stood very near the Duke, who said to him: "Monsieur, are you aware that about this time a large sum of money is on its way to Metz?"

"This very morning," responded the superintendent, "the stage carried a hundred thousand crowns, escorted by two policemen."

"Indeed?" said Choiseul, almost stunned by the partiality with which fate was serving him.

"Parbleu!" said a gendarme, "that 's true, for I and Robin acted as guards."

Choiseul turned quietly to Goguelat and said: "Well, if the Minister of War prefers that method of convoy, there 's no reason for our staying here, and I think we had better retire. Hussars, bridle your horses!"

The hussars, who were also anxious, asked nothing better than such an order. In an instant the horses were bridled, and the hussars in the saddle. They ranged themselves in line. Choiseul passed along the line, threw a glance towards the Châlons road, and said, with a sigh: "Forward, hussars. Break into fours, and move on!"

They rode over the Sommevelle Bridge, with their trumpets blowing, as the clock sounded half-past five.

Two hundred paces from the village, Choiseul took a crossroad, in order to avoid Saint Menehould, where it was said there was much agitation.

At this moment Isidore de Charny, lashing and spurring a horse, which had already required two hours to ride four leagues, arrived at the posthouse. While changing horses he inquired if a detachment of hussars had been there, and learned that the detachment had ridden away only a quarter-hour before, by the Saint Menehould road. He ordered horses to be in readiness for the royal coach, and hoping to overtake Choiseul, and stop his retreat, galloped away on a fresh horse.

As we have seen, Choiseul left the direct road to Saint Menehould, and took the crossroad, at the very instant when the Viscount rode up to the posthouse at Sommevelle Bridge; and as the Viscount rode directly towards Saint Menehould, he did not succeed in overtaking the Duke.

CHAPTER XLII.

FATALITY ! !

TEN minutes after Isidore de Charny's departure, the royal coach arrived. As Choiseul had foreseen, the lookers-on had dispersed.

The elder Charny, Count Oliver, knowing that the first detachment of troops was to be here, at Sommevelle Bridge, had not supposed it might become necessary for him to remain behind. He galloped up to the carriage door, and urged on the postilions, who seemed to have received particular orders to drive at a slow trot.

When they reached Sommevelle Bridge, seeing neither the expected hussars nor the Duke, the King became anxious, and thrust his head out of the window.

"By your leave, Sire," said Charny, "don't let yourself be seen, and I 'll go and get what information I can."

Then the Count went into the posthouse. Five minutes later he reappeared, having learned all, and repeated the whole story to the King, who at once surmised that it was for the express purpose of allaying public irritation, and leaving the road clear, that Choiseul had gone away, and taken the hussars with him.

The important thing now was to get once more under way, and push on to Saint Menehould. Unquestionably Choiseul was bound for Saint Menehould, and in that town they would find him, with his hussars re-enforced by the dragoons.

At the moment of departure Charny came to the window, and asked: "What are the Queen's orders? Shall I push on ahead, or shall I follow behind?"

"Don't forsake me," said the Queen.

Charny bowed in his saddle, and cantered near her window.

Meanwhile Isidore was riding in advance; but he could not understand the solitude of the road, which was laid out in a line so straight, that from certain points he could see a league or a league and a half before him. He spurred his horse uneasily forward, thus getting farther and farther away from the coach; for he feared lest the citizens at Saint Menehould might take umbrage at the prolonged stay there of Dandoins's dragoons, as the Sommevelle populace had at the detention of Choiseul's hussars.

Isidore was not mistaken. The first thing noticeable at Saint Menehould was the great number of National Guardsmen walking about the streets, — the first he had encountered since leaving Paris. The whole town seemed to be in motion, and he could hear a drum beating on the farther side of the village.

The Viscount trotted coolly along the streets, without appearing disturbed, the least in the world, by the commotion about him. Crossing the Grand Square he drew rein at the posthouse. As he crossed the square, however, he noted a dozen dragoons seated on a bench, and wearing fatigue-caps. A few steps from them, at a window on the lower floor, he saw the Marquis Dandoins, also wearing a fatigue-cap, and holding his riding-whip in his hand.

Isidore passed by without a pause, as if he did not see Dandoins. He presumed that Dandoins, knowing that Isidore was to wear the costume of one of the royal couriers, would recognize him, and that consequently no farther sign would be needful.

At the door of the posthouse was a young man about twenty-eight years old, clad in a dressing-gown, and wearing his hair cut after the fashion shown in the portrait of Titus, the Roman emperor, — as was the custom with the Revolutionist Patriots of that epoch, — and with whiskers encompassing his face and reaching his neck.

Isidore looked for somebody to whom he might speak. "What do you wish, Monsieur?" said the black-whiskered young man.

"To speak to the post-superintendent," said Isidore.

"He is absent just now, Monsieur; but I am his son, Jean Baptiste Drouet. If I can fill his place, say what you wish."

These three words, Jean Baptiste Drouet, the young man emphasized, as if he foresaw that these words, or rather these names, were destined to hold a fatally celebrated place in history.

"I wish for six posthorses, for two carriages which are coming after me."

Drouet nodded, as much as to say the courier could have what he wished, and walked out of the house into the courtyard, calling out: "Halloo, postilions, — six horses for two carriages, and a nag for the courier!"

At that moment the Marquis Dandoins entered hurriedly. "Monsieur," he said to Isidore, "you precede the royal coach, do you not?"

"Yes, Monsieur, and I 'm greatly astonished at seeing you — you and your men — still wearing fatigue-caps."

"We have not been forbidden to do so, Monsieur, nor forewarned of any approaching duty. Besides, there are threatening demonstrations all around us. They are trying to demoralize my men. What ought to be done?"

"As the King comes this way, watch the carriage, and take counsel of circumstances. Ride on a half-hour after the royal family has passed, and serve as rear guard."

Interrupting himself suddenly, Isidore exclaimed: "Silence! Somebody is playing the spy! Perhaps we have been overheard. Go to your squadron, and use every effort to keep your men up to their duty."

Drouet was indeed at the door of the kitchen, in which this conversation had taken place.

Dandoins withdrew. At the same moment the cracking of whips was heard. The royal coach crossed the square, and stopped in front of the posthouse. At this unusual noise the bystanders formed themselves into groups around the coach.

Dandoins, who had it in his heart to explain to the King why it was that he and his men were found at rest, instead of under arms, rushed up to the window, fatigue-cap in hand, and, with every possible mark of respect, offered his apologies to the royal family. In answering him, the King several times showed his head at the window.

Foot in stirrup, Isidore was standing near Drouet, who observed the carriage with deep attention. The summer before he had attended the great Federation at Paris. He had therefore seen the King, and now believed that he recognized him.

That morning Drouet had received a large sum in assignats, the paper money then issued by the Government. He had examined these bills, stamped with the King's likeness, one after the other, to see if any of them were counterfeit. The King's face therefore remained very distinct in Drouet's memory, and seemed to cry out: "This man before thee is the King!"

He drew an assignat from his pocket, and murmured: "Decidedly, it 's his very self!"

Isidore rode around to the other side of the coach, where his brother was standing in front of the window, partly for the purpose of screening from observation the Queen, who was leaning against it. Isidore hastily whispered to his brother: "The King has been recognized. Hasten the departure of the coach, and take heed of that great brown fellow over there. He 's the son of the post-superintendent. He it is who has recognized the King. His name is Jean Baptiste Drouet."

"All right," said Oliver de Charny, "I 'll watch. Now, be off, my brother."

Isidore was off like a shot, to order the relay of horses at Clermont.

Hardly was he at the end of the village street, before the postilions — stimulated by the persistence of Malden and Valory, and the promise of an extra crown — had all in readiness, and departed at a round trot.

The Count did not lose sight of Drouet. Drouet had not budged; only, he had been speaking in a low tone to one of the hostlers.

Charny rode up to him and said: "Monsieur, was no horse ordered for me?"

"Oh yes," answered Drouet, "but there are no more horses."

"How? No more horses? What then about that horse they are saddling yonder in the courtyard?"

"That 's mine!"

"Can't you let me have him? I 'll pay whatever you say."

"Impossible, Monsieur. It 's getting late, and there 's a trip which must be made."

To insist would be to increase Drouet's suspicions. To attempt taking the horse by force, would be to compromise everything.

Moreover, Charny thought of a way out of the difficulty. He went to Monsieur Dandoins, who had been looking after the coach till it turned the street corner. Feeling a hand on his shoulder, Dandoins faced about.

"Hush!" said Oliver. "It 's I, Count de Charny. There is n't a horse left for me at the posthouse. Dismount one of your dragoons, and let me have his horse. I must follow the King and the Queen. I alone know where to find Choiseul's relays, and if I 'm not on hand, the King will be bothered at Varennes."

"Count," responded Dandoins, "it is n't one of my men's horses that I 'll give you, but my own."

"I accept the offer. The safety of the King, and the whole royal family, hangs upon the least accident. The better the horse, the better their chances."

Both men walked through the streets, towards the Marquis's lodgings; but before doing so, Charny charged a sergeant to watch Drouet.

Unfortunately the Marquis's abiding-place was five hundred paces from the square. By the time the horses were saddled, fifteen minutes at least had been lost. We say the horses, because Dandoins meant to put himself also on horseback, in order to obey the royal wishes, by following after his Majesty, and constituting his men a rear guard.

Suddenly it seemed to Charny that he heard these words, mingled with other distant cries: "The King! The Queen!"

He hurried out of the house, requesting Dandoins to bring his horse to the square.

The whole village was in tumult. Hardly had Charny and Dandoins quitted the square, a few minutes earlier, when Drouet exclaimed, as if he had waited for that moment, in order to spread the news: "That coach, which just went along, — that 's the King's. The King, the Queen, and the royal children of France are in that carriage."

Then Drouet threw himself on his horse. Several friends tried to stop him. "Where 's he going? What 's to be done? What 's his plan?"

To these questions he whisperingly replied: "The colonel of these dragoons is over there. There was no way of stopping the King here, without a collision which might turn out badly for us. What I can't do here, I can do at Clermont. Keep back the dragoons; that 's all I ask."

So saying, he galloped on after the King. Thus it was noised about that the King and Queen were in the coach which had just driven through the village; and the tumult spread so rapidly that it reached Charny's keen ears.

At these cries the Mayor and other municipal officers ran to the spot, and the Mayor ordered the dragoons to retire to their barracks till eight o'clock.

Charny learned all there was to know, — that the King had been recognized, and Drouet had ridden away. He stamped impatiently.

At that moment Dandoins rejoined him. As soon as he perceived him, Charny called out, from afar: "The horses, the horses!"

"They 're bringing them here now," said Dandoins.

"Have they put the pistols in my holsters?"

"Yes."

"Are they ready for use?"

"I attended to that myself."

"Good! Now all depends on the speed of your beast. I must overtake a man who is fifteen minutes ahead of me, and kill him!"

"What? You mean to kill him?"

"Yes! If I don't kill him, all is lost!"

"Mordieu! Let us go ahead with the horses, then."

"Don't concern yourself about me. Attend to your dragoons, who are being demoralized to the point of revolt. See there! The Mayor is haranguing them! You also have no time to lose. Go! Go!"

At that instant the orderly came up with the two horses. Without stopping to notice which was which, Charny sprang upon the back of the horse nearest him, snatched the bridle from the orderly, gathered the reins into his hand, used his spurs on both sides, and was off at full gallop, in Drouet's tracks, but without catching the last words which Dandoins hurled after him; albeit those last words, which the wind carried away, were of vast importance: "You have taken the horse I was to ride, instead of the one intended for you, and the pistols in the holsters are not loaded!"

CHAPTER XLIII.

FATALITY ! ! !

MEANWHILE the royal coach, preceded by Isidore, was flying along the road from Saint Menehould to Clermont. Daylight was fading, as we have said. Eight o'clock had sounded, and the coach entered Argonne Forest, through which ran the highway.

The elder Charny had been unable to warn the Queen of the awkward circumstances which had held him back, inasmuch as the royal carriage drove away from Saint Menehould before Drouet told Charny that he could not have a horse.

As they left the village the Queen noticed that her cavalier was no longer at the carriage window, but she had no excuse, either for retarding the journey or questioning the postilions. Once she thought she could see a horseman galloping a long way off; but this horseman was soon lost in the growing shadows of night.

During this time, — for, in order to make clear the events of this awful journey, we are obliged to go quickly from one actor therein to another, — during this time, while Isidore was riding a quarter-league ahead of the royal coach, while that coach was on the way from Saint Menehould to Clermont, and entering the woods of Argonne, while Drouet was riding in hot haste after the coach, and while the elder Charny was rushing after Drouet, — while all these events were simultaneously moving on, the Marquis Dandoins rejoined his soldiers, after Charny's departure, and sounded the call to saddle; but when the soldiers tried to set out, all the people were crowding the streets, and the horses could not go a step forward.

Amidst that crowd were three hundred National Guardsmen, in their uniforms, with their muskets in hand. To risk a combat, — sure to be severe, — would be to ruin the King. Better to remain where they were, and, by so doing, keep all these people where they were.

Dandoins held a parley, and asked the ringleaders what they wanted, what they expected. He demanded the reason of these hostile menaces.

During this time the King reached Clermont, and there found Monsieur Damas, with his one hundred and forty dragoons.

If Dandoins had commanded a hundred and forty dragoons, like Damas, the Marquis might have been able to effect something; but he had only thirty. What could thirty dragoons do, against three or four thousand men? Talk, debate! and this is precisely what Dandoins did.

At half-past nine the royal coach — which Isidore preceded only by a few hundred paces, so fast did the postilions ride — neared Clermont. It had only taken seventy-five minutes to traverse the four leagues which separate one village from the other.

Up to a certain point, this explained Charny's absence to the Queen. He would surely overtake them while they changed horses.

Before they entered the village, Damas lay in waiting for the royal coach, having been forewarned by Leonard. He recognized the courier's livery, and stopped Isidore.

"Pardon, Monsieur, but are you not the forerunner of the King?"

"And you, Monsieur," said Isidore, "are perhaps Charles de Damas?"

"Yes, Monsieur."

"Very well, Monsieur, I am indeed the King's fore-runner. Assemble your dragoons, and escort his Majesty's coach."

"Monsieur," was the Count's reply, "there is the breath of insurrection in the air, and I 'm forced to own that I can't answer for my dragoons, if they recognize the King. All I can promise is, to close up the road behind him, after the royal coach goes by."

"Do your best, Monsieur," said Isidore. "Here is the King!" and he pointed to the oncoming coach amidst the darkness, its course being discernible by the sparks of fire which flew beneath the horses' feet.

As for Isidore, it was his duty to hurry forward and order the relays. In five minutes he stopped at the posthouse. Damas arrived at almost the same moment, with five or six dragoons.

Next came the royal coach, which followed hard upon Isidore's heels, before he had time to remount. This coach, without being a magnificent affair, was nevertheless remarkable, and many people began to assemble in front of the post-superintendent's house. Damas stood before the carriage door, as if unacquainted with the illustrious travellers; but as neither King nor Queen could resist the desire to learn the latest intelligence, the King beckoned to Damas on one side; while on the other, the Queen beckoned to Isidore.

"It is you, Monsieur de Damas?" asked the King.

"Yes, Sire."

"Why are not your dragoons here, under arms?"

"Sire, your Majesty is five hours behind time. My squadron was in saddle by four this afternoon. I held the men in place as long as possible; but the whole village began to get into a turmoil. Even my dragoons began to be upset by conflicting conjectures. If a fermentation should occur before your Majesty's transit, the alarm-bell would be sounded, and your road barred. So I kept only a dozen men on horseback, and sent the others to their lodgings; but I kept the trumpeters with me, so as to be able to call the men to horse, at the first alarm. Your Majesty can see that my plan has worked well, for the way is comparatively clear."

"Very well, Monsieur," replied the King, "you have behaved like a prudent man. As soon as I am gone, let your men mount, and follow a quarter-league or so after the carriage."

"Sire," said the Queen, "hear what Monsieur Isidore has to say."

"What is it?" asked the King, with a certain display of impatience.

"He says that you were recognized by the post-superintendent's son, at Saint Menehould; that he is sure of it; that he saw the young man with an assignat in hand, studying your engraved picture thereon, and comparing it with yourself; that his brother the Count, being informed of this by Isidore himself, remained behind; and that undoubtedly something serious is taking place at this very moment, as we have seen nothing of Count Oliver since then."

"If we have been recognized, the greater reason for haste, Madame. — Monsieur Isidore, hurry up the postilions, and then ride on ahead."

Isidore's horse being ready, he sprang into the saddle, and cried to the postilions: "The road to Varennes!"

The two bodyguards, Malden and Valory, repeated the order, as they climbed to their places: "To Varennes!"

Damas stepped backward, bowing respectfully to the King, and the postilions whipped up their horses. The coach was ready, and in the twinkling of an eye it was off, with the rapidity of lightning. As they left the village they met a sergeant of hussars, who was just entering it.

For an instant Damas thought of following the royal coach, with the few men who were then at his disposal; but the King had given contrary orders, and he believed it his duty to obey those orders, — the more so, as the commotion began to spread through the town. The citizens were running from house to house. The windows were open, and one could see heads and lights moving about in the houses. Damas sought to prevent but one thing, the sounding of the alarm-bell; so he ran to the church, to guard the door.

Besides, at any moment Dandoins might arrive, and re-enforce Damas with thirty men.

Presently things began to grow calmer; so at the end of fifteen minutes Damas returned to the public square, where he found his chief of squadron, Monsieur de Noirville, to whom he gave instructions about the ride, commanding him to put the men under arms.

At that moment somebody came to notify Damas that a dragoon subaltern, sent by Dandoins, was waiting for Damas at his lodging.

This officer came to say that it would be better not to wait for either Dandoins or his dragoons, Dandoins being detained in their municipality by the inhabitants of Saint Menehould; and that besides this, — as Damas already knew, — Drouet had started, at full speed, to follow the royal coach, though he had not probably overtaken it, as he had not been seen at Clermont.

This was the condition of things, and Damas had barely heard the report given by this subaltern, belonging to the Royal Regiment, when an orderly was announced from the other direction, — from the hussars belonging to the Lauzun Regiment.

This orderly had been sent by officers commanding the troops at Varennes, our friends Monsieur Jules de Bouillé and Monsieur de Raigecourt. Anxiously seeing the hours drag by, without the arrival of any one connected with the royal flight, these brave young gentlemen had at last determined to send this messenger to Damas, to ascertain if anything had been heard from the King.

Damas was glad to be able to ask the orderly this question : " In what condition did you leave affairs at Varennes ? "

" Perfectly tranquil," said the orderly.

" Where are the hussars ? "

" At their barracks, with their horses all saddled."

" Have you met no vehicles on your trip hither ? "

" Oh yes, — one carriage with four horses, and one with two."

It will be remembered that the female attendants of the Queen rode in the second carriage ; and though we have not always referred to their cabriolet, it was never far behind the royal coach.

Damas replied, therefore : " Those are the very carriages about which you have come to inquire. All then goes well."

Thereupon Damas returned to his station, and ordered the trumpets to sound the saddle-call. He meant to follow the King to Varennes, and give him armed assistance, if there was any need of it. In five minutes the trumpets sounded. All was going on very well, apart from the detention, at Saint Menehould, of the thirty soldiers under the command of Dandoins ; but having already his one hundred and forty dragoons, Damas could manage very well without this increase of numbers.

Let us return to the King's coach, which, in driving from Clermont, took the road to the left, and was rolling away towards Varennes, instead of following the right-hand road, leading to Verdun.

We have already explained the topography of the town of Varennes, which is divided into the Upper and Lower Villages. We have stated that it had been decided to change horses at the farther end of the town, on the side towards Dun; and that in order to reach that point, it was necessary to leave the main road leading to the bridge, and reach this bridge by another route, cross the river under the old tower arch, and so join Choiseul's relays on the farther side, where they were to be in waiting, under the direction of Jules de Bouillé and Raigecourt. As to Rohrig, a young officer only twenty years old, entire confidence had not been placed in him, and he still believed the military had been sent thither to guard the army funds.

After their arrival at this difficult point, it will be recalled, Charny was to guide the royal coach through the labyrinth of byways. Charny had spent a fortnight in Varennes, carefully studying and mapping out the entire route. There was not a milestone he did not know, not a lane wherewith he was not familiar.

Unhappily Charny was not on hand. The Queen's anxiety was doubled. Under such circumstances, Charny's failure to rejoin the royal party must be due to some serious accident.

As they drew nearer to Varennes, the King also grew uneasy. Depending upon Charny, he had not brought with him his map of the town.

Then the night was absolutely dark, lighted by the stars alone, — one of those nights when it is easy to go astray, even in well-known localities, — to say nothing of the blind roads in a strange village.

Isidore's orders, received directly from his brother, required him to stop at the entrance of the village. There the elder Charny would change horses, and resume the direction of the journey.

Like the Queen, — more so, perhaps, — Isidore was worried about his brother's absence. The one remaining hope was that either Jules de Bouillé or Raigecourt would grow impatient, come to meet the King, and wait for him on this side of the village. In the two or three days they had spent there, these young men must have become acquainted with the town, and could easily serve as guides.

On arriving at the bottom of the hill, and seeing two or three scattered lights which showed the village to be near, Isidore halted irresolutely, and looked about him, trying to see into the obscurity. He could discern nothing definite.

Then he called softly, and afterwards more loudly, the names of Bouillé and Raigecourt, in case they should be thereabouts. Nobody responded. He could hear the rumble of the coach, a quarter-league away, which sounded like distant thunder, coming nearer and nearer.

An idea came to Isidore. Perhaps those two gentlemen were lying concealed in the edge of the woods, which stretched along the left side of the highway; so he entered the forest, and looked about. Nobody was to be seen.

There was now nothing to do but wait, and he waited. In five minutes the royal coach reached the place where Isidore was watching. Both the King and Queen thrust their heads out at opposite sides of the carriage, and both said, at the same time: "You have n't seen your brother, the Count?"

"Sire," answered Isidore, "I have n't seen him; and as he is not here, it must be that he has met with some serious accident, in his pursuit of that rascally Drouet."

The Queen groaned.

"What is to be done?" asked the King. Then he said to the two bodyguards, Malden and Valory, who had sprung to the ground: "Are you acquainted with the place, gentlemen?"

As nobody was acquainted with the place, the answer was in the negative.

"Sire," said Isidore, "all is silent, and consequently all is probably safe. If your Majesty will be pleased to wait here ten minutes, I will enter the city, and try to get some information about Bouillé and Raigecourt, or at least about Monsieur de Choiseul's relays. Your Majesty cannot recall the name of the tavern where the horses were to be stationed?"

"Alas, no! I have known it, but I have forgotten it. Never mind! Go just the same. Meantime, we also will try to find out something or other."

Isidore galloped off towards the Lower Village, and soon disappeared behind the first houses.

CHAPTER XLIV.

JEAN BAPTISTE DROUET.

THE King's remark, about getting advice where they were, was explained by the presence of two or three houses, the advanced sentinels of the Upper Village, which were situated on the right side of the road.

In one of these houses, the nearest, somebody was on the alert, as could be seen by the light which fell athwart the half-open doorway.

The Queen left the carriage, took Malden's arm, and went towards this house. At their approach the door was shut, but not quick enough to prevent Malden, who perceived the intentions of the master of the house to be inhospitable, from springing forward and checking the door before the bolt had slipped into its socket. Under Malden's pressure the door reopened, although there was an attempt to close it tight.

Behind the door, trying hard to shut it, was a man fifty years old, with slippered feet and bare knees, and wearing a nightshirt. It was not without a natural surprise, as one may well understand, that the man in the nightshirt felt himself driven back into his own house, and saw his door pushed open by an unknown man, behind whom stood a woman.

The man in the nightshirt trembled, as he threw a rapid glance at the Queen, whose face was illuminated by the candle he held in his hand. "What do you wish, Monsieur?" he asked Malden.

"Monsieur," responded the bodyguard, "we are unacquainted with Varennes, and beg you to point out the road to Stenay."

"If I knew the way," replied the unknown man, "and if I gave you the information, what if I were ruined for giving you the information?"

"Ah Monsieur," said Malden, "even if you ran some risk in rendering us this service, you are too courteous not to oblige a woman, who finds herself in a perilous position."

"Monsieur," responded the man in the nightshirt, "the person behind you is no woman." Then he whispered in Malden's ear: "It 's the Queen."

"Monsieur?"

"I recognize her."

The Queen, who heard or guessed what was spoken, drew Monsieur de Malden backward, as she said: "Before going a step farther, notify the King that I am discovered."

In another second Malden had obeyed this command. "Indeed?" said the King. "Then beg the man to come and speak to me."

Malden returned to the house, and said, thinking dissimulation useless: "The King desires to confer with you, Monsieur."

The man sighed, kicked off his slippers, and walked towards the carriage with naked feet, so as to make less noise.

"Your name, Monsieur?" asked the King, first of all.

"Préfontaine, Sire," responded the man, hesitating.

"Who are you?"

"A Major in the cavalry, and a Knight of the Royal and Military Order of Saint Louis."

"In your double quality of Major, and Knight of Saint Louis, Monsieur, you have twice taken an oath of fidelity to me. It is therefore your bounden duty to aid me in my present embarrassment."

"Certainly," responded the Major; "but I beg your Majesty to make haste, lest I should be seen."

"Monsieur, if somebody sees you, so much the better!" said Malden. "You will never have a finer occasion to show your loyalty."

The Major, who was not apparently of the same mind, almost groaned. The Queen shrugged her shoulders contemptuously, and tapped her foot impatiently.

The King made her a sign, as he said to the Major: "Have you by any chance heard of some horses waiting for a carriage, and have you seen some hussars, who were to be stationed in your village yesterday?"

"Yes, Sire. Both horses and hussars are on the other side of the town, — the horses at the tavern called the Grand Monarch, the hussars at the barracks."

"Thanks, Monsieur. Now return to your house. Nobody has seen you, and nothing will happen to you."

"Sire — !"

Without listening longer, the King took the Queen's hand, to help her into the coach, and said to the body-guards, who were waiting for orders: "Gentlemen, to your places, and drive to the Grand Monarch."

The two officers remounted their seats, and called out to the postilions: "To the Grand Monarch."

At that instant a spectral horse shot from the woods, and cut diagonally across the road, as his fantastical rider shouted: "Postilions, not another step!"

"Why not?" asked the astonished postilions.

"Because you are carrying the King, who is running away; but in the name of the Nation, I order you not to budge."

The postilions, who had already made a movement to drive on, at once paused, and murmured: "The King!"

Louis the Sixteenth saw that the crucial moment had come, and cried out: "Who are you, Monsieur, to give such orders here?"

"A simple citizen! Only I represent the law, and I speak in the name of the Nation. — Postilions, for the second time I order you not to move! You know me well enough! I'm Jean Baptiste Drouet, son of the post-superintendent at Saint Menehould."

"Oh, the wretch!" cried the two guards, springing from their seats, and drawing their hunting-knives. "It's he!" but before they had touched the ground, Drouet was riding rapidly along the streets towards the Lower Village.

"Ah Charny, Charny, what has happened to you?" murmured the Queen; and she fell back in the carriage, almost indifferent to what was taking place.

What had happened to Charny, and why had he allowed Drouet to escape him? Fatality, — always Fatality!

Dandoins's horse was a good roadster, but Drouet had an advantage of almost twenty minutes over the Count. This twenty minutes it was necessary to regain. Charny struck his spurs into his horse's flanks, and away bounded the animal at full speed, with smoking nostrils.

On the other side, Drouet, without even knowing that he was pursued, was speeding away with all his might; but he had only a posthorse, whereas Charny's horse was a thoroughbred. The result was that Charny had gained a third of the distance, by the time he had ridden a league. Then Drouet noticed that he was pursued, and redoubled his efforts to escape from the rider who threatened to overtake him.

At the end of a second league Charny continued to gain at the same rate, and Drouet often looked behind, with increasing anxiety.

Drouet had started so unexpectedly, that he was weaponless. The young Patriot feared not death, as he afterwards proved; but if he were checked in his course, he feared the King would get away; and he also feared lest this splendid occasion for immortalizing his own name should forever escape him.

There were still two leagues to cover before he could reach Clermont; but it was evident that he would be overtaken at the end of the next league, — the third since his departure from Saint Menehould. Just then, to stimulate his ardor, Drouet scented the royal coach in front of him. We say scented, for it was already half-past nine, and though these were the longest days of the year, night had fallen; so Drouet redoubled the cuts of his whip and the digs of his spurs. They were only three-quarters of a league from Clermont, but Charny was not two hundred yards behind. Undoubtedly, — for Drouet knew there were no posthorses, — undoubtedly the King was to keep on to Verdun. Drouet began to despair. Before overtaking the King, he would be himself overtaken.

A half-league from Clermont he heard the gallop of Charny's horse, hard upon his own, and the neighs of Charny's horse responded to those of his own nag. It was necessary to give up the pursuit, or decide to face his adversary; but, as we have said, Drouet had no arms wherewith to encounter his pursuer.

Suddenly, when Charny was only fifty paces behind, Drouet met the postilions, returning to Saint Menehould with the detached horses, which Drouet recognized as those which had taken the King's carriages to Clermont.

"Ah, it 's you, is it?" he said. "The road to Verdun, is n't it?"

"What is it about the road to Verdun?" asked the postilions.

"I mean to say that the carriages which you drove are now on the road to Verdun;" and he rode by them, urging his horse to a last effort.

"No!" cried the postilions, "the road to Varennes!"

Drouet uttered a joyful cry. He was saved, and the King was lost! If the King had followed the straight road to Verdun, Drouet would have been obliged to follow straight on by the same line, the regular highway from Saint Menehould to Verdun; but the King had chosen to go from Clermont to Varennes, and the road to Varennes made an acute angle to the left. Drouet therefore at once made for Argonne Forest, wherein he knew every twist and turn; for by cutting thus across the woods, he could gain fifteen minutes on the King, besides having the obscurity of the forest for his protection.

Charny, who knew the general topography of the country almost as well as Drouet, saw that Drouet was escaping him, and uttered a cry of anger. Almost simultaneously with Drouet he urged his horse into the narrow margin which separated the highway from the woods, shouting, "Stop, stop!"

Drouet did not care to respond. He leaned over his horse's head, stimulating him with spurs, whip, and voice. If he could reach the wood, that was all he wanted. He would be safe! He reached the wood; but he was within ten steps of Charny, who drew a pistol, aimed at Drouet, and shouted: "Halt, or you 're a dead man!"

Drouet bent himself lower on his horse's neck, and urged him on. Charny pulled the trigger, but the sparks of fire, as the flint struck the steel, only served to momentarily brighten the darkness.

Furious at this failure, Charny hurled the recreant pistol at Drouet, and drew a second, throwing himself into the woods, in the fugitive's train. Again he fired, through an interval between the trees; but this pistol failed, like the first.

Then he remembered that when he hurried away from Saint Menehould, at full gallop, Monsieur Dandoins had called out something which he could not understand.

"Ah!" thought Charny, "I see how it is! I took the wrong horse, and probably he called out to me that the pistols in these holsters were not loaded. Never mind! I 'll overhaul that rascal, and strangle him with my own hands, if necessary!" and he resumed his pursuit of the flying shadow, which could barely be discerned in the obscurity.

Hardly had he gone a hundred yards in the forest, with which he was not much acquainted, when his horse stumbled in a ravine. Charny rolled head over heels, extricated himself, jumped into the saddle again; but Drouet had disappeared.

This is how Drouet eluded Charny. This is how Drouet was able to cross the highway at Varennes, like a threatening phantom, bidding the postilions conduct the King no farther.

The postilions halted, because Drouet adjured them in the name of the Nation, which had begun to be more powerful than the name of the King.

Hardly had Drouet ridden on towards the Lower Village, when, instead of the gallop of a retreating horse, the royal party could hear the gallop of one coming nearer and nearer; and presently Isidore reappeared, by the same street through which Drouet had gone away.

His information was the same as that furnished by Monsieur de Préfontaine. Choiseul's horses, under the charge of Jules de Bouillé and young Raigecourt, were at the other end of the town, at the Grand Monarch. The third officer, Rohrig, was at the barracks, with his hussars. A waiter at an eating-house, who was just shutting up his establishment for the night, had given Isidore these details.

Instead of bringing joy to the illustrious travellers, as he had hoped, Isidore found them in a deep stupor. Préfontaine was in lamentations, and the two body-guards seemed to be threatening something or somebody invisible and unknown. Isidore therefore paused in the midst of his recital, and asked: "What has happened, gentlemen?"

"Did n't you see a man in the street, — a man who passed you at a gallop?"

"Yes, Sire," said Isidore.

"Well, that man was Drouet!" said the King.

"Drouet?" cried Isidore, with a deep throb in his heart. "Then my brother is dead!"

The Queen uttered a cry, and buried her face in her hands.

CHAPTER XLV.

THE TOLLGATE TOWER AT VARENNES BRIDGE.

THERE was an instant of inexpressible depression among the unfortunate travellers, thus detained on the highway, and menaced with perils unknown, but terrible.

Isidore was the first to rally. "Sire," said he, "dead or living, let us not think of my brother; let us think of your Majesty. There is not an instant to lose. The postilions know the way to the Grand Monarch. — Hurry up! To the Grand Monarch!"

The postilions did not stir.

"Can't you hear?" asked Isidore.

"To be sure we can!"

"Well, why don't you start?"

"Because Monsieur Drouet forbade."

"How? Drouet forbade? So! When the King commands and Drouet forbids, you obey Drouet?"

"We obey the Nation."

"Come, gentlemen!" said Isidore to his two companions. "There are moments when a man's life counts for nothing. Let each of you select his man. I'll take care of this one. Then we'll drive ourselves."

So speaking, he grasped the postilion nearest to him by the collar, and pricked the fellow's breast with the point of his hunting-knife.

The Queen saw the three blades glitter, and screamed out: "Mercy, gentlemen, mercy!" Then she added, to the postilions: "My friends, fifty louis on the spot, to be divided among you three, and a yearly pension of five hundred francs apiece, if you save the King."

Either because they were frightened by the demonstrations of the three young men, or because they were attracted by the royal offer, the postilions started up their horses, and resumed the journey.

Monsieur de Préfontaine retreated to his house and barred the door.

Isidore galloped in front of the coach. He wished to go through the Upper Village, and cross the bridge. After passing through the town and crossing the bridge, five minutes would bring them to the Grand Monarch.

The coach was driven at full speed down the slope, towards the Lower Village; but when they reached the archway, which opened upon the bridge and ran beneath the tower, they could see that one half of the tollgate was shut. They opened this flap of the gate, and found that two or three wagons obstructed the way.

"Help me, gentlemen!" said Isidore, dismounting, and taking hold of these wagons.

At that moment were heard the first drumtaps and the first strokes of the tocsin. Drouet had done his work!

"Wretch!" cried Isidore, grinding his teeth, "if I ever find thee —"

By a tremendous effort he pushed one wagon aside, while Malden and Valory did as much for another. The third still rested crosswise on the bridge.

"Now for the last!" said Isidore, as the coach came part way through the arch.

Suddenly, between the stakes of the third wagon, were thrust the guns of four or five muskets.

"Not one step, or you 're dead, gentlemen!" said a voice.

"Gentlemen, gentlemen," said the King, putting out his head, "don't try to force a passage!—I command you!"

The two officers and Isidore took a backward step, while the King asked: "What is wanted with us?"

At the same time a cry of distress was heard in the coach. Besides the men who intercepted the carriage in front, others had glided in behind it, and several musket-barrels were thrust in at the windows. One of these was aimed at the Queen's breast. Isidore saw the danger, sprang forward, grasped the muzzle, and pulled it aside.

"Fire, fire!" cried several voices. One man obeyed the popular cry, but fortunately his gun missed fire.

Isidore raised his arm, and was about stabbing the fellow with his hunting-knife, when the Queen stayed his arm.

"Ah Madame!" cried Isidore, furiously. "In the name of Heaven, let me finish this scoundrel!"

"No!" said the Queen. "Sheathe your knife! Do you hear?"

Isidore half obeyed. He let his knife fall to his side, but did not restore it to his belt, while he murmured: "Ah! If I encounter that Drouet—"

"As to him," whispered the Queen, pressing Isidore's arm with peculiar force, "as to him, I leave him to you!"

"Now, gentlemen," repeated the King, "what do you want?"

"We wish to see your passports," replied two or three voices.

"Our passports? So be it!" said the King. "Bring the town authorities, and we will show our passports."

"On my word, these are great goings-on," cried the man whose gun had miscarried, thrusting his head into the King's face; but the two bodyguards threw themselves upon him, and knocked him down. In the tussle his gun went off, but the bullet hit nobody.

"Halloo there!" cried a voice. "Who fired?"

The man who was being crushed under the feet of the two guardsmen groaned, and cried for help. Five or six other armed men ran to his relief. The guardsmen drew their hunting-knives, and prepared for a fight. The King and Queen made useless efforts to check the onslaught; but the fight was about to begin, — terrible, ferocious, mortal.

At that moment two men threw themselves into the midst of the contest. One wore his uniform as a National Guardsman, and the other was girded with the tricolored scarf. The man wearing the tricolored scarf was Monsieur Sausse, the town-solicitor. The man in uniform was Hannonet, the commander of the local National Guards. Behind them might be seen a half-hundred muskets, glittering in the light of two or three torches.

The King understood that in these two men lay his help, or at least his safety; so he said: "Gentlemen, I am willing to confide to you both myself and my companions; but pray defend us from the brutality of these fellows." As he spoke he pointed to the men armed with muskets.

"Lower your arms, gentlemen!" cried Hannonet. The men grumblingly obeyed.

"You will excuse us, Monsieur," said the town-solicitor, addressing the King, "but it is noised about that you are his Majesty, Louis the Sixteenth, running away from France; and it is our duty to ascertain if this is true."

"Ascertain if it 's true!" cried Isidore. "If that coach contains the King, you should be at his royal feet. On the contrary, if this coach contains only a private person, by what right do you stop it?"

"Monsieur," said Sausse, still speaking to the King, "I address myself to you. Will you do me the honor of answering?"

"Sire," whispered Isidore, "try to gain time. Damas and his dragoons are on the road, and must get here soon."

"You are right!" said the King to Isidore; and then he continued, speaking to Sausse: "If our passports are all right, Monsieur, shall we be allowed to pursue our journey?"

"Undoubtedly," replied Sausse.

"Well, Baroness," said the King to Madame de Tourzel, "have the goodness to hunt up your passport, and give it to these gentlemen."

Madame de Tourzel understood what the King meant by that phrase, hunt up your passport; and so she began to search in all those places where she was sure it was not to be found.

"There!" said an impatient voice, full of menace, "you see, very well, that none of these folks have a passport."

"Indeed, we have one, gentlemen; but not knowing that it would really be demanded, the Baroness de Korff does not at this moment remember exactly where she put it."

A sort of howl went up from the crowd, indicating that they were not the dupes of this subterfuge.

"There is a very simple way out of all this bother," said Sausse. "Postilions, drive the coach to my store. The gentlemen and ladies can enter my house, and there everything can be cleared up. — Drive on, postilions!

Gentlemen of the National Guard, escort the coach, if you please."

This invitation too much resembled a command, for anybody to venture upon its contradiction. Besides, resistance would probably have been useless, if attempted. The alarm-bell continued ringing, the drum beating, and the crowd around the carriage grew larger every instant. The coach was soon in motion.

"Oh Damas, Damas!" murmured the King, "if you'll only come before we reach that cursed house!"

The Queen said nothing; but she thought of Charny, stifled her sighs, and kept back her tears.

They reached Sausse's store, but they heard nothing from Damas.

What had happened, on his side, to prevent that gentleman, on whose devotion the King had so securely counted, from fulfilling the orders which he had received and the promises he had made?

We will tell you, in two words, in order to bring out of its obscurity every point in this lugubrious story, concerning which Michelet has written as follows:

The history of that tragic moment, when the King was arrested, has always been imperfectly known. The principal historians of the trip to Varennes knew nothing about it, except from hearsay. The two Bouillés, father and son, were not there. Choiseul and Goguelat did not arrive till an hour after the fatal moment. Deslon came still later.

We left Damas, just as he had ordered the call to saddle, by the trumpeters, whom he had kept with him for greater security.

When the first trumpet-blast sounded he took some money from the drawer of his desk, and in so doing he drew out several papers, which he neither wished to leave behind him nor to take with him. He was thus occupied when the chamber door opened, and several town officials appeared on the threshold.

One of them approached the Count, who asked, surprised at this unexpected visit, what they desired, and so changed his position as to conceal a brace of pistols, lying on the chimneypiece.

"Monsieur," politely but firmly responded the visitors, "we wish to know why you are going away at this hour."

Damas was amazed that these men should ask such a question of a superior officer in the King's army; but he answered: "It is very simple, Monsieur! I go away at this hour, because such are my orders."

"Where do you go, Monsieur Colonel?" insisted the questioner.

Damas was more and more astonished. "Where do I go? To begin with, I don't know; but if I did know, I should n't tell you."

The municipal deputies exchanged glances and encouraging gestures, and the one who had before spoken continued the conversation with Damas.

"Monsieur, it is the wish of the Clermont town council that you should remain here till to-morrow morning, and not leave this evening."

Colonel Damas smiled contemptuously, as a military man can smile, when he is asked, either through ignorance or with a view to his intimidation, to do anything incompatible with martial law. "Ah!" said he. "So the town council wishes me to stay here till to-morrow morning?"

"Yes!"

"Well, Monsieur, say to the council that I supremely regret refusing their wish; but no law, that I ever heard of, authorizes the municipal authorities of Clermont to impede the march of troops. As for me, I receive orders only from my military superior, and there 's his order for my departure."

As he spoke he extended the order towards the town deputies. The nearest man took the paper, and showed it to his companions; while Damas grasped the pistols which lay behind him on the mantelpiece, where they had been hidden from sight by his intervening form.

After examining the paper, with his colleagues, the councillor, who had before spoken, again said to Damas: "Monsieur, the more precise this order, the more it is our duty to oppose it; for undoubtedly it commands something which, in the interests of France, ought not to be done. In the name of the Nation, I announce that you are hereby placed under arrest."

"And I, gentlemen," said the Colonel, — displaying his pistols and covering with them the two councillors nearest him, — "I announce my immediate and positive departure."

Not expecting this armed threat, a natural sentiment of fear made them hastily retreat from the pathway of Damas, who sprang across the threshold, ran through the antechamber, double-locked the door after him, hastened down the staircase, found his horse at the door, jumped on his back, and rode at breakneck speed to the square, where his regiment was mustered. He said to Floirac, one of the officers whom he saw already in his saddle: "We must get out of here as we can, but the important thing is that the King is safe."

Ignorant of Drouet's mission from Saint Menehould, knowing only the insurrection at Clermont, Damas believed the King was safe, if he passed Clermont, as he had done already, and could reach Varennes, where were stationed Choiseul's relays, and Lauzun's hussars, commanded by Jules de Bouillé and Raigecourt.

Nevertheless, by way of precaution, he said to the regimental quarter-master, who had come to the square among the first, with his subordinate assistants and the dragoons from his lodgings: "Monsieur Remy, ride on! Take the road to Varennes, and ride like all-possessed. Overtake the carriages which passed through here a little while ago. You 'll answer to me with your head."

Using both spurs, off went the quarter-master, with his assistants and four dragoons; but when they reached the fork of the roads, they took the wrong direction and went astray. Everything turned out fatally on that most fatal night!

Meantime the cavalry formed slowly in the square at Clermont. The councillors, whom Damas had locked up, easily escaped, by forcing the door. They stirred up the populace and the National Guards, who came together more quickly and in better order than the dragoons. Whatever movement Damas made, he found himself cheek by jowl with three or four muskets, aimed straight at him, and this did not render him less anxious.

He saw that his soldiers were indifferent, and rode down the ranks, trying to rally their devotion to the King; but they shook their heads. Although the dragoons were not all assembled, he judged it high time to be on the move, and gave the order to ride forward; but nobody budged.

Meanwhile the town officials were saying: "Dragoons, your officers are traitors. They are leading you to butchery. The dragoons are the true Patriots. Huzza for the dragoons!"

As for the National Guards and the populace, they shouted: "Hurrah for the Nation!"

As Damas had given the order for departure in a low voice, he at first supposed the command had not been heard; but as he faced about, he saw the dragoons in the second rank jumping from their saddles and fraternizing with the people.

Seeing there was nothing to be hoped from such men, he called his officers to him by a glance of his eye, and said: "These troopers betray their King. I call upon you as soldiers, as gentlemen! Whoever is on my side will follow me. — On, to Varennes!"

Striking his spurs into his horse's flanks he flashed through the crowd, followed by Floirac and three officers. These three officers, or rather sub-officers, were Adjutant Foucq, and Sergeants Saint-Charles and La Potterie. Five or six loyal dragoons also left the ranks, and followed Damas.

A few bullets, sent after the heroic fugitives, were so many bullets thrown away.

Thus we see why Colonel Damas and his dragoons were not on hand to defend the King, when he was arrested in the archway of the old tollbridge tower at Varennes, and forced to leave his coach and go into the house of the town solicitor, Monsieur Sausse.

CHAPTER XLVI.

SAUSSE'S RESIDENCE.

The house occupied by Monsieur Sausse — at least, as much of it as could be seen by the illustrious prisoners and their companions in misfortune — consisted of a grocery, at the end whereof appeared the dining-room, beyond a glass door, through which, when seated at the table, the grocer's family could see any customers who might enter the store, their entrance being also advertised by a little bell, set swinging by the opening of a low door, with a clear opening upper half, like those still used in provincial stores, whose proprietors, either out of calculation or humility, seem to feel they have no right to entirely screen themselves from the gaze of passers-by.

In one corner of the grocery was a wooden staircase, which led by broad angles to the main story of the house.

This main story was made up of two rooms. The first, an annex of the store, was full of packages piled up from the floor, of candles hanging from the ceiling, of sugar-loaves ranged along the shelves. These sugar cones were wrapped in dark blue papers, with their caps a little tipsy, where the wrappers had been opened to show the fineness and whiteness of the crystalline sugar-peak within. The other room, the one over the dining-room, was the chamber of the proprietor of the establishment, who had been roused by Drouet, and whose room showed traces of the disorder occasioned by this sudden awakening.

Madame Sausse, half-dressed, came out of the bedroom, crossed the storeroom, and appeared at the head of the staircase, just as several persons passed through the doorway from the street into the store, — first the Queen, then the King, then the royal children, and finally Madame Elizabeth and Madame de Tourzel.

Preceding these travellers, the town-solicitor had already entered his shop. More than a hundred persons had accompanied the coach, and now remained outside Monsieur Sausse's dwelling, which was situated on a small square.

"Well, well! What now?" said the King, as he entered.

"Well, Monsieur," answered Sausse, "there has been some talk about a passport. If the lady who calls herself the mistress of the carriage will produce her passport, I will take it to the townhouse, where the council is in session, to see if it's all right."

Come what would, the passport given by Madame de Korff to Charny, and by the Count to the Queen, was entirely regular; so the King made a sign for his wife to give up the passport.

She drew the precious paper from her pocket, and placed it in the hands of Monsieur Sausse, who charged his wife to do the honors of the house to his mysterious guests, and went at once to the townhouse.

The spirits engaged in this municipal conference were decidedly warm, for Drouet assisted at their deliberations. When Sausse came in with the passport, curiosity took the form of silence; for each one present knew the travellers had been conducted to Sausse's house.

He laid the passport on the table in front of the Mayor. As we have already given the tenor of this passport, the reader knows there was nothing in it to make a reperusal needful.

After reading it, the Mayor said: "Gentlemen, the passport is perfectly good."

"Good?" repeated eight or ten astonished voices, while as many hands were outstretched to take the precious and mysterious document.

"Unquestionably good," said the Mayor, "for the King's signature is there!" and he pushed the passport towards the extended hands, which were at once laid upon it; but Drouet almost snatched it from the others, as he exclaimed: "Signed by the King, is it? May-be; but is it signed by the National Assembly?"

"Yes!" said one of his neighbors, who read the passport at the same time as Drouet, by the light of the candle, "for there is the signature of a member of the proper committee."

"Agreed!" replied Drouet; "but is it the President's? Besides," persisted the young Patriot, "that is n't really the question. These travellers are not a Russian lady named Korff, her children, her steward, her two companions, and three servants! These travellers are the King, the Queen, the Dauphin, Madame Royale, Madame Elizabeth, some other great lady belonging to the palace, and three couriers, — in fact, the whole royal family! Will you, or will you not, let the royal family leave France?"

The question was thus placed in its proper aspect; but this aspect only served to make it the more difficult for the poor officials of a third-rate town like Varennes to dispose of it.

As they discussed the matter, and their deliberations threatened to continue very late, the solicitor resolved to leave the council to its legal meditations, and return home.

He found the travellers still standing in the shop. Madame Sausse had urged them to go upstairs into her chamber, or at least to be seated in the shop, and have something to eat; but they had rejected all these kindnesses. It seemed to the travellers that by installing themselves fairly in the house, or even by sitting down and accepting the proffered hospitality, they would be making some concessions to those who had arrested them, and give up their intended route, — the object of their fondest desires. All their faculties were held in suspense, so to speak, till the return of the master of the house, who would report the decision of the town officials on the important matter of the passport.

Suddenly they saw him threading his way through the crowd outside, and making an effort to reach the house.

The King advanced three steps to meet him, and asked, with an anxiety he vainly tried to conceal, but which made itself apparent in spite of his efforts: "Well, well, — the passport?"

"The passport," was Sausse's response, "has given rise to a grave debate, which is still going on at the townhouse."

"Why so?" demanded Louis Sixteenth. "Do they perhaps doubt its validity?"

"No; but they doubt if it is in the hands of the true Madame de Korff; for it is noised abroad that really we have the pleasure of receiving the King and his family within our walls."

Louis hesitated a moment, and then answered, suddenly determining the proper part to take: "Well, Monsieur, I am the King. This is the Queen. These are our children. I beg of you to treat us with that respect which the French people have always shown towards their sovereigns."

As we have said, the upper half of the street door remained open, and a large number of inquisitive folks were gathered about the doorway. The King's words were therefore heard, not only by those inside, but by those outside.

Even if the King had pronounced these words with dignity, this dignity ill corresponded with his gray coat, his dimity vest, his gray breeches and stockings, and the little Rousseau wig which he wore. Think of finding the King of France in such a disguise!

The Queen felt the impression produced on the multitude, and the blood mounted to her face as she said: "Let us accept Madame Sausse's kindness, and go upstairs."

Monsieur Sausse took a lamp and walked towards the stairway, to show his illustrious guests the way.

Meanwhile the news had spread on the wings of the wind, through all the streets of the town, that it was really the King who had come to Varennes, and that the avowal had come from his own mouth.

One man rushed excitedly into the townhouse, and cried: "Gentlemen, the arrested travellers, at Sausse's house, are really the King and royal family! I have just heard so, from the King's own mouth."

"Ah ha, gentlemen, what did I tell you?" cried Drouet.

At the same time they could hear the noise in the streets. The drum continued to beat, and the alarm-bell to ring.

Now how did it happen that all this hubbub did not sooner attract towards the centre of the town, and consequently nearer the fugitives, our young friends Raigecourt and Bouillé, with the hussars stationed beyond Lower Varennes, solely on the King's account.

By the way, this Monsieur de Bouillé, whose name appears so often in connection with the unfortunate royal journey, was Jules de Bouillé, and not Louis de Bouillé, his brother, who has already figured in this narrative, and who found his way to the Royal Forge, first in his proper person, introduced by Lafayette, and then in the disguise of a locksmith's journeyman.

Now let us see why Jules de Bouillé and Monsieur de Raigecourt did not come loyally to the King's relief.

At nine in the evening these two young officers had just entered the Grand Monarch Tavern, when they heard the roll of a carriage. Both were in the basement parlor, and ran to the window.

The vehicle was a simple cabriolet, and the two gentlemen therefore held themselves ready to order out their fresh horses, if there was need of it; only they soon perceived the traveller not to be the King, but a grotesque personage, covered with a broad-brimmed hat, and muffled in an enormous coat.

They had taken a step backward, when the traveller called to them: "Say, gentlemen, is n't one of you the Chevalier Jules de Bouillé?"

The Chevalier paused in his retreat, and answered: "Yes, Monsieur, it is I."

"In that case," said the man in the topcoat and the broad-brimmed hat, "I have many things to tell you."

"Monsieur," replied Jules, "I am ready to hear them, although I have n't the honor of your acquaintance; but if you will take the trouble to leave the cabriolet, and come into the inn, we will soon get acquainted."

"Willingly, Monsieur Chevalier, willingly!" cried the man in the big coat, as he sprang from the carriage without touching the steps, and hurriedly ran into the tavern.

The Chevalier noticed that the new-comer appeared somewhat flurried, when he presently said: "Ah, Monsieur de Bouillé, you will let me have the horses which are here, won't you?"

"How? The horses I have here?" So replied Jules, flurried in his turn.

"Yes, yes! You 'll let me have 'em! You need keep nothing from me. I 'm in it! I know all about it!"

"Monsieur, allow me to say that surprise forbids my answering," replied Jules, "and that I don't understand a word of what you 're talking about."

"I repeat to you, that I know all," persisted the traveller. "The King left Paris last night, but there is no likelihood that he can complete his trip. So I have already warned Colonel Damas, but he is out of the question. His regiment of dragoons mutinied, and there was a great commotion in Clermont. Why, I could hardly get through the place, — I, who speak to you."

"But you who are talking to me," said Jules, impatiently, "who are you, anyhow?"

"I 'm Leonard, the Queen's hairdresser. What? You don't know me? Just imagine it, now! Without my leave the Duke spirited me away, — Choiseul, I mean. I was at first carrying the Queen's diamonds, and Madame Elizabeth's; and when I think, Monsieur, that my brother, whose hat and overcoat I have on, does n't know what has become of me; and that poor Madame de l'Aage expected me to dress her hair yesterday, and is still waiting for me! Oh Lord, oh Lord! What a long story this is!"

Leonard walked up and down the inn parlor with long strides, lifting his hands desperately to the ceiling.

Jules began to understand. "So you 're Monsieur Leonard!" he said.

"Certainly, I 'm Leonard," replied the traveller, — waiving, after the fashion of great men, the title of Monsieur, conferred upon him by Bouillé. "Well, now you know me, you 'll let me have the horses, won't you?"

"Monsieur Leonard," replied Jules, obstinately remanding the illustrious barber to the class of ordinary mortals, "the horses I have are for the King, and no one shall use them except the King."

"But when I tell you, Monsieur, the King won't probably come this way —"

"That is very well, Monsieur Leonard; but the King may come this way; and if he should come, without finding the horses, and I should tell him I had given them to you, perhaps he would respond that I must pay for my bad reasoning."

"Bad reasoning?" said Leonard. "Why, do you suppose, in the extreme situation where we find ourselves, the King would blame me for taking his horses?"

The Chevalier could not suppress a smile. "I don't pretend that the King would blame you for taking the horses; but cock-sure he 'd find me blameworthy, for letting you have those horses."

"Ah, the Devil! I had n't faced the question from that point of view! Then you refuse me the horses, Monsieur?"

"Positively!"

Leonard sighed. "At least," he presently said, returning to the attack, "you 'll help me to get others?"

"As to that, my dear Monsieur Leonard, I ask nothing better."

In fact, Leonard was a very embarrassing guest. Not only did he talk loud, but he emphasized his words with most expressive pantomime; and this pantomime, thanks to the flapping brims of his big hat and the lappels of his enormous coat, took on a ridiculous appearance, whose absurdity could not but reflect somewhat upon his interlocutors.

Jules therefore made haste to rid himself of Leonard. He sent for the landlord of the inn, and begged him to find some horses, which would take Leonard as far as Dun. This done, he abandoned Leonard to his fate, telling him (what was true enough) that he must go elsewhere and learn the news.

The two officers, Bouillé and Raigecourt, returned to the Upper Village, passed through it, and rode a quarter of a league beyond it, on the Paris road; but they neither saw nor heard anything, and so they began to take their turn in thinking that the King, already eight or ten hours late, would not come, and finally they returned to the Lower Village and Grand Monarch.

Leonard had just departed. Eleven o'clock sounded.

Already disquieted by what they had heard from the royal hairdresser, at about quarter-past nine they sent an orderly to Clermont. This was the orderly who met the royal coach as it was leaving Clermont, and whom we heard in his chat with Colonel Damas.

The two young officers at the Grand Monarch waited till midnight. At midnight they lay down with their clothes on.

Half an hour later they were awakened by the alarm-bell, by drumming and shouting. Putting their heads out of the tavern window they could see the town in a hubbub, and people running, or rather scurrying, towards the townhouse. Many armed men were rushing in the same direction, towards the Upper Village, some with muskets, and some with double-barrelled guns; while others only bore swords, sabres, and pistols.

The two young gentlemen ran to the stable and ordered out the King's horses, which they felt bound to retain at all hazards; and for better protection they took these horses outside the village, so that the King would find them, if he succeeded in passing so far through the town. Then they went back after their own horses, which they had kept near the King's, guarded by some postilions.

All this going and coming roused some suspicion, and in order to leave the tavern with their horses, they had to face a combat, wherein two or three shots were fired at them.

In the midst of howls and threats they learned that the King had been recognized, and taken to the town-solicitor's.

Then they took counsel as to what they had better do. Ought they to rejoin the hussars, and try to rescue the King? Ought they to ride on, and try to warn the Marquis de Bouillé, whom they were pretty sure to find, if not at Dun, certainly at Stenay?

Dun was only five leagues from Varennes. Stenay was eight leagues off. In ninety minutes they could be at Dun, and in two hours at Stenay. Then they could immediately march back on Varennes, with the small section of soldiers commanded by the elder Bouillé.

They chose the latter course; and at a half-hour after midnight, just as the royal party decided to enter Solicitor Sausse's chamber, our young men decided to leave the relays of horses they had so carefully guarded, and set off for Dun, at a grand gallop.

Thus it was that this succor, upon which he so surely relied, failed to reach the King.

CHAPTER XLVII.

THE COUNSEL OF DESPERATION.

We may recall the situation in which Choiseul found himself, as commander of the first military station at Sommevelle Bridge. Seeing the rebellion on the increase about him, and wishing to avoid a collision, he did not wait any longer for the royal carriages, but said, carelessly, that the military funds had been carried by already; and then he straightway set out for Varennes.

In order not to pass through Saint Menehould, which was already in a ferment, — as we may remember, — he took a crossroad, taking care, however, to ride slowly, before quitting the highway, in order to give the King's advance courier time to overtake him; but the courier had not overtaken him at Orbeval, where he entered the side road; though Isidore (who was acting as courier) passed by the fork of the Orbeval road soon after Choiseul had taken it.

The Duke firmly believed the King had been detained by some unforeseen event. If he was happily mistaken in this surmise, and the King was still on the road, his Majesty would find Dandoins at Saint Menehould, and Damas at Clermont.

We have seen, however, what happened to Captain Dandoins at Saint Menehould, where he was detained by the town officials, and to Colonel Damas at Clermont, who was compelled to effect his escape almost alone; but what is well known to us — looking down on that painful day from the height of sixty years, in the middle of the Nineteenth Century, with our eyes bent upon each separate actor in the great drama — was hidden from Choiseul by the cloud of doubt in which he was enfolded.

By taking the crossroad to Orbeval, towards night Choiseul reached the woods of Varennes, at the very moment when Charny was bewildered in another part of the forest, in his fruitless pursuit of Drouet.

At the last village on the borders of the forest — Neuville Bridge — Choiseul was obliged to lose a half-hour, waiting for a guide. During this delay he could hear the alarm-bells ringing in the neighboring villages, and the four hussars, constituting his rear guard, were arrested by the peasantry. Seasonably warned of this occurrence, Choiseul had only to make one rapid onslaught upon the group, and the four hussars were again free; but soon the tocsin began to ring more furiously than ever, and without a pause.

The crossroad through the forest was extremely difficult, and often dangerous. Either by design or unintentionally, the guide misled the little company. Frequently the hussars were compelled to proceed afoot, in order to ascend or descend some precipitous hill. Sometimes the path was so narrow that they had to march in single file. One hussar fell over a precipice, and as his shouts for help showed that he was not dead, his comrades naturally refused to abandon him. In the work of rescuing him three-quarters of an hour were lost; and these three-quarters of an hour included precisely the minutes when the King was forced to leave his carriage in the town of Varennes, and take refuge in Sausse's store.

At a half-hour after midnight, as Jules de Bouillé and Raigecourt were fleeing along the road to Dun, Choiseul, with his forty hussars, appeared at the other end of the village, coming from the crossway through the woods.

At the end of the bridge he was greeted by a vigorous "Who goes there?" which came from a partisan member of the National Guard.

"France! The Lauzun Hussars!" was Choiseul's reply.

"You can't pass!" said the sentinel, and he shouted the call to arms.

At the same moment there was a great commotion among the populace. Through the thickening night masses of armed men could be seen; and in the glare of torches, and of candles beaming from every window, muskets were visible, glittering along the streets.

Not knowing what all this meant, nor what had happened, Choiseul wished first to reconnoitre. He began by demanding to be put in communication with the detachment of soldiers stationed at Varennes. This demand led to long debate; but finally it was decided to accede to his request.

While they were coming to this decision, and putting it into execution, Choiseul could see the National Guards utilizing their time in preparations for defence, putting up a barricade of broken branches, and bringing to bear two small cannon upon his forty men.

Just as the marksman had fulfilled his task, the detachment of hussars arrived from the station on foot. They knew nothing, except what they had been told, — that the King had been arrested and taken to the town-house. As to themselves, they had been surprised by the populace, and compelled to dismount, and did not know what had become of their companions.

As they finished these explanations, Choiseul thought he could see a small troop of horsemen advancing through the darkness, and at the same time he heard the challenge, "Who goes there?"

"France," replied a voice.

"What regiment?"

"The dragoons of Monsieur's Regiment."

At these words a gunshot was heard, fired by a National Guardsman.

"Good!" whispered Choiseul to a subordinate officer near him. "There 's Damas, with his dragoons."

Without waiting to hear more, Choiseul broke away from two men who were clinging to his bridle, and who shouted to him that it was his duty to obey the town officials, and nobody else. He ordered an attack, took by surprise those who tried to stop him, forced a passage through the crowd, and found his way, followed by his men, into the lighted streets, swarming with people.

As he approached Sausse's residence Choiseul saw the royal coach, standing unharnessed; and presently he came into a small square, where a numerous guard was stationed before an unpretentious house.

In order not to bring his troops into contact with the inhabitants, he rode straight on to the barracks, whose location he well knew. The barracks were empty, but he placed his forty hussars therein.

As Choiseul was leaving the barracks he was stopped by two men, coming from the townhouse, and summoned to report to the town officials; but as his hussars were still within hearing, he shook off these two men, with the reply that he would come to the townhouse when he had leisure, and called aloud to the sentinel to admit nobody.

Two or three grooms remained in the barracks. Choiseul interrogated them, and thus learned that the hussars there stationed, not knowing what had become of their chiefs, had followed the crowd who came after them, and were drinking with their captors, all over the village.

At this news Choiseul was somewhat dismayed. His force was reduced to forty men, whose horses had achieved more than twenty leagues that day. Men and horses were alike exhausted. There was therefore no time for dallying.

First he inspected the pistols, to see if they were loaded. Then he made a speech to the hussars in German, who, not understanding a word of French, knew little of what had been taking place around them at Varennes. He told them that the King, Queen, and whole royal family had been arrested, and that it was the duty of the Lauzun Hussars to rescue these august personages from the hands of those who held them as prisoners, and would perhaps put them to death.

The speech was short, but impassioned, and made a lively impression upon the hussars. Der Koenig! Die Koenigen! (the King! the Queen!) they repeated in astonishment, and in their own tongue.

Choiseul did not give them time to cool. He ordered them to draw their sabres, break into ranks by fours, and go at a rapid trot towards the house where he had noticed the guard, not doubting that the King was therein a prisoner.

Arriving there, — amidst the curses of the National Guards, but paying no attention to those curses, — he placed sentinels at the door, and dismounted, in order to enter the house.

As he crossed the threshold he felt a hand on his shoulder. Turning quickly he saw Charles de Damas, whose voice he had before recognized, answering the challenge of the National Guards. Perhaps he had partly counted on this auxiliary.

"Ah!" said Choiseul, "are you here in force?"

"I 'm alone, or almost alone," replied Damas.

"And why so?"

"My regiment refused to follow me, and I am here with only five or six men."

"What a misfortune! Never mind! I have forty hussars remaining. We must see what we can do with them."

The King was just then receiving a municipal deputation, with Monsieur Sausse at its head. This deputation had come to say to the King, that as the Varennes people were so very fortunate as to have their King among them, they had come to him for orders.

"My orders?" responded the King. "Have my carriages made ready, and I will leave at once."

Nobody knows what the precise response of the municipal officials would have been to this demand, for just then the gallop of Choiseul's horses was heard, and through the windows could be seen the hussars, standing in columns, with sabres in hand.

The Queen trembled, and a joyful ray shone in her eyes. "We are saved!" she murmured in Madame Elizabeth's ear.

"God grant it!" replied this lamblike offspring of royalty, who referred everything to God, — good or ill, hope or despair.

The King drew himself up and listened. The town officials looked anxiously at each other.

At this instant a great noise was heard in the antechamber, which was guarded by peasants armed with scythes. Some words were exchanged, followed by a brief struggle. Then Choiseul appeared in the doorway, bareheaded, and with his sword drawn. Over Choiseul's shoulder could be seen the pale but resolute countenance of Damas.

There was a threatening expression in the look of these two officers, which scattered the town deputies, leaving a clear space between the new-comers and the royal prisoners.

As the cavalry officers entered, the interior of the chamber presented the following tableau. In the centre of the room was a table, whereon stood an open bottle of wine, some wineglasses, and some bread. The royal pair stood, listening to the town deputies. Near the window were Madame Elizabeth and Madame Royale, — the former, however, very near the Queen. On the bed, half exhausted, slept the little Dauphin, overcome with weariness. At his side was seated Madame de Tourzel, her head buried in her hands; and behind her were Madame Brunier and Madame de Neuville. Then there were the two bodyguards, Malden and Valory, and Isidore de Charny, — all three broken down by sadness and fatigue, — sitting in the shadows, and half reclining on their chairs.

Perceiving Choiseul the Queen crossed the room to clasp his hand. "Ah, Monsieur de Choiseul, is it you? You are most welcome!"

"Alas, Madame, it seems I come too late," said the Duke.

"Never mind that, if you come in good company!"

"Ah, Madame, on the contrary, we are almost alone. Dandoins has been forcibly detained, with his soldiers, at the townhouse in Saint Menehould; and Colonel Damas has been abandoned by his men."

The Queen shook her head sorrowfully.

"But, where is the Chevalier Jules de Bouillé? Where is Monsieur de Raigecourt?" and as he spoke, Choiseul looked carefully about him.

Meanwhile the King drew near. "I have not seen those gentlemen," he said.

"Sire," said Damas, "I pledge you my word of honor, that they must have been killed under the wheels of your coach."

"What will you do?" asked the King.

"Save your Majesty, at all hazards! Give your orders!" said Damas.

"I have forty hussars," said Choiseul. "They have ridden twenty hard leagues to-day, but they will be able to go on as far as Dun."

"But how about ourselves?" asked the King.

"Listen, Sire," said the Duke, "for this is all that I can propose. I have forty hussars, as I told you. Seven shall dismount. You shall mount one of the horses, holding the Dauphin in your arms. The Queen will take a second horse, Madame Elizabeth a third, Madame Royale a fourth, while Madame de Tourzel, and the other ladies, Neuville and Brunier, — whom you do not wish to abandon, — will take the other three horses. We will surround you with the three and thirty hussars still mounted. With a few cuts of our sabres we will let in the daylight, and thus have a chance of safety. — Think well, Sire, and speedily; for this is a measure to be adopted at once, if at all; for in an hour, in half an hour, — yes, in fifteen minutes, perhaps, — my hussars will be won to the other side."

Choiseul paused, awaiting the King's response. The Queen appeared to like this project, and fixed her eyes on her husband, anxiously questioning him with her gaze.

He, on the contrary, seemed to avoid the Queen's glance, and the influence it exerted over him.

At last he said, looking Choiseul full in the face: "Yes, I know very well that this is one way of rescue; but can you promise me that a gunshot may not kill my son, my daughter, my wife, or my sister, in this unequal squabble of thirty-three men with seven or eight hundred?"

"Sire, if such a misfortune should come to them, and come because you yielded to my counsel, there would be only one thing to do, — slay myself before your Majesty's eyes."

"Very well, then!" said Louis. "Instead of letting ourselves be carried away by such extreme projects, let us reason coolly about our situation."

The Queen sighed, and took two or three steps backward. In this movement, whereby she did not conceal her regret, she saw Isidore go to the window, — attracted by a noise in the street, and always in hopes that any disturbance was caused by the arrival of his brother. She exchanged two or three whispered words with Isidore, and he hurried out of the room.

The King continued talking, without apparently noticing what took place between Isidore and the Queen.

"The town officials do not refuse to let me go away. They only ask me to wait till daybreak. I will not speak of Count Oliver de Charny, who is so deeply devoted to us, and of whom we have no intelligence; but there are Jules de Bouillé and Raigecourt. They went away from here some ten minutes after our arrival, to notify the Marquis de Bouillé, and have him come with his troops, who are certainly in readiness. If I were alone, I would follow your advice, and leave at once; but my wife, my two children, my sister, and these ladies! It is impossible to risk so much with so small a force as yours, — and even more hussars would have to dismount, for I would not leave my three bodyguards here."

The King drew out his watch. "It is already three o'clock. Young Bouillé rode away at half-past twelve. His father certainly had troops stationed here and there on the road. By this time the first detachments have been notified by the Chevalier, and will be here one after the other. It is only eight leagues from here to Stenay. In two or two and a half hours a man on horseback could easily cover this ground. He will run across these detachments all right. In five or six hours the Marquis de Bouillé will be here in person; and then — without peril to my family, without any violence — we can quit Varennes, and continue our journey."

Choiseul recognized the logic of this reasoning; and yet his instinct told him there were certain moments when one must not hearken to logic.

He turned to the Queen, and his glance seemed to beseech her for different commands, or at least that she would persuade the King to revoke the decision just pronounced; but she shook her head. "I will take nothing on myself," she said. "It is the King who commands. My duty is to obey. Besides, I am of the King's opinion, that Bouillé will come."

Choiseul retreated several steps, taking with him Damas, with whom he wished to arrange some concerted method of action, and he also made a sign to Malden and Valory to come and take their part in the consultation.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

POOR CATHERINE!

THE chamber is not greatly changed in its aspect. As Madame Royale has not been able to overcome her weariness, Madame Elizabeth and Madame de Tourzel have put her to bed beside her brother, and she is now asleep. Madame Elizabeth sits beside the bed, resting her head against one of its corners.

The Queen, rigid with anger, stands near the mantelpiece, looking alternately at the King, who is seated on a bale of merchandise, — brought into the sparsely furnished chamber from the adjoining storeroom, — and at the officers, who are deliberating near the door.

An old woman, an octogenarian, is on her knees by the children's bedside, as if she were before an altar. This is the grandmother of the town-solicitor. Struck by the beauty of the two children, and the Queen's imposing air, she has fallen upon her knees, and is praying in whispers, her face bathed in tears.

What is the burden of her prayer? Is it that God will pardon these two angels, or that these two angels may pardon mankind?

Sausse and the other officials have retired, promising the King that horses shall at once be put to his coach; but the Queen's look shows that she puts no dependence whatever upon this promise.

This makes Choiseul say to Damas, to Floirac, and to Foucq, who are with him on one side of the room, — as well as Malden and Valory, the two bodyguards: "Gentlemen, we must not rely upon the feigned tranquillity of the King and Queen. The question is not utterly desperate, but let us see exactly how we stand."

The other officers make a motion for Choiseul to proceed, as they are listening attentively.

"It is probable that by this time the Marquis de Bouillé is notified, and that he will arrive here by five or six in the morning; for he was to be between Dun and Stenay, with a detachment from the Royal German Regiment. It is even possible for his advance guard to be here a half-hour earlier, for under such circumstances everything possible ought to be done; but we must not forget that we are surrounded by four or five thousand antagonists, and that the moment when Bouillé's troops make their appearance will be a moment of great danger and of ungovernable turmoil. Our enemies will insist upon getting the King out of Varennes. They will try to make him mount a horse and ride back to Clermont. His life will be menaced, and perhaps attempted. This danger need last only for an instant, gentlemen; for as soon as the barrier is forced, and the hussars are fairly in the town, the rout will be complete. We shall only be compelled to hold our own for about nine minutes, and there are nine of us. As things are arranged here, we may hope they will be able to kill no more than one of us a minute; consequently there will be time enough."

His hearers contented themselves with nodding assent. This proposal was made with perfect simplicity, and accepted with equal simplicity; yet it meant devotion to the death.

Choiseul continued: "Well, gentlemen, here is what I think ought to be done. At the first shot heard, at the first outcry round about us, we must go into the adjoining storeroom. All the people who happen to be there we must kill, and then take possession of the staircase and the windows. There are three windows. Three of us must defend them. The other six must make a stand at the staircase, which is so easy of defence, being built with broad landings, that one man alone can face five or six assailants. The bodies of those whom we have already killed may serve as a rampart against our living enemies. I 'll wager, a hundred to one, that the troops will be masters of the village before the last one of us is done for; and if we all perish, the place we shall occupy in history will hereafter be a full reward for our devotion."

These young gentlemen grasped one another's hands, like Spartans before a battle. Then each selected his post. The two bodyguards, with Isidore de Charny, — whose place was kept for him, though he was absent from the consultation, — were to guard the three windows, opening upon the street. The Duke was to be at the bottom of the staircase. Behind him was to be Damas; and then Floirac, Foucq, and the two subordinate dragoon officers, who had remained faithful to Damas, and had taken part in the conference.

Hardly had these arrangements been agreed upon, when a bustle was heard in the street.

This arose from the visit of a second municipal deputation, composed of Sausse, — who naturally appeared to be a prime element in every deputation, — Commander Hannonet, of the National Guard, and three or four other municipal officers.

They were duly announced, and the King, believing they had come to say his horses might be harnessed, ordered the admission of the deputation.

They entered. The young officers — who were on the lookout for every gesture, every sign, every motion — thought they could perceive some hesitation in Sausse's manner, and a set expression in Hannonet's face, which boded no good to the royal travellers.

At the same time Isidore came upstairs, spoke two words to the Queen, and hastily ran down again.

The Queen took a step backward, with pale cheeks, and leaned against the bedstead, where her children were lying. As for the King, he questioned the town envoys with his eyes, and waited for them to speak; but they bowed to the King, without saying a word.

Louis pretended to misunderstand their intentions, and said: "Gentlemen, the French people are only misled, for their attachment to their rulers is genuine. Weary with the continual outrages which I have endured in my capital, I have decided to retire to my most remote provinces, where still burns the sacred flame of loyalty. There I am sure to find the ancient love of my people for their sovereigns."

The envoys bowed anew, and the King continued: "I am ready to give proof of my confidence in my people. I will take an escort, half made up of National Guardsmen, and half of regular troops of the line, and they shall accompany me to Montmédy, whither I have made up my mind to retire. Consequently I beg you to choose half of my escort from among your men, and have horses at once put to my carriage."

There was a momentary silence. Sausse was probably waiting for Hannonet to begin, while the captain was waiting for Sausse. At last Hannonet bowed and said: "Sire, it would be very pleasant if I could obey your Majesty's commands; but there is, in the Constitution, an article which forbids the King's departure from the kingdom, and forbids loyal Frenchmen from aiding him in so doing."

The King trembled, and Hannonet continued, with a gesture of supplication to the King to hear him through: "Consequently, the town of Varennes has decided, before permitting the King to go farther away, that a courier shall be sent to Paris, and that we will wait till we hear from the National Assembly."

The King felt great drops of sweat on his brow, while the Queen bit her pale lips impatiently, and Madame Elizabeth lifted her eyes and hands devoutly to Heaven.

"Indeed, gentlemen!" said the King, with a certain dignity, which came to him when he was pushed to the wall. "Am I no longer master of my own movements, to go whither I please? In that case, I am more a slave than the least of my subjects!"

"Sire," replied the captain of the National Guards, "you are always the master; only all men — kings, as well as ordinary citizens — are bound by their oaths. You have taken an oath. Be the first to fulfil that oath, Sire, and obey the laws. It will not only be a grand example to set, but a noble duty to discharge."

During this conversation the Duke glanced interrogatively at the Queen; and receiving an affirmative answer to his mute question, he went downstairs.

The King well understood that if he submitted to this rebellion, on the part of a village council, — and from his point of view it was a rebellion, — his cause was lost.

Besides, he recognized the same Revolutionary spirit, which Mirabeau had wished to subdue in the provinces, and which had already raised its venomous crest before the royal footsteps in Paris, on July 14, 1789, when the Bastille was taken; on October 5 and 6, 1789, when the royal family were assaulted in their palace at Versailles, and dragged to Paris; on April 18, 1791, when the King had made a trial of his liberty, by attempting to drive to Saint Cloud, and had been hindered from doing so by the populace.

"Gentlemen," said he, "this is simply violence; but I am not so isolated as it might appear. Before this door I have forty faithful men; and in the neighborhood of your Varennes, I have ten thousand other soldiers. I command you to have my horses harnessed. You hear me, — this is my wish and my command."

The Queen came to his side and whispered: "Good, Sire, good! Let us risk our lives, but let us never sacrifice our dignity."

"And what will be the result, if we refuse to obey your Majesty?" said the commander.

"The result will be that I shall be compelled to resort to force, and you will be responsible for the blood which I have refused to shed, and which, in this event, will be shed by yourselves."

"Very well! So be it, Sire! Try to summon your hussars, and I will summon the National Guards!" and Hannonet went down into the street.

The royal pair looked at each other in dismay. Perhaps neither of them dared risk such a crisis.

Just then Madame Sausse, the solicitor's wife, entered. Pushing aside the old grandmother, who was in prayer at the bedside, she walked up to the Queen and said, with the rudeness and freedom of a woman of the people: "So, Madame, you 're really the Queen, are you?"

The Queen turned, and said, her pride wounded by such familiar questioning: "Oh yes! At least, I believed so an hour ago."

"Well, if you 're the Queen," went on Madame Sausse, unconcernedly, — "they give you and your good man twenty-five millions a year for keeping your throne. The place is a good one, it seems to me, and well salaried. What do you want to quit it for ?"

The Queen uttered a grievous cry, and turned to the King. "Oh Monsieur, — anything, anything, anything else, rather than such indignities !"

Taking the Dauphin, half-asleep, from his bed, she ran to the window and opened it, saying to the King : "Monsieur, let us show ourselves to the people, and see if they are wholly poisoned towards us. If they are, let us appeal to the soldiery, and encourage them with voice and gesture. They at least merit so much, when they are willing to die for us."

The King followed his wife mechanically, and appeared with her on the balcony.

The whole square, into which King Louis and Marie Antoinette looked, presented a lively spectacle.

Half of Choiseul's hussars were on foot, and the others on horseback. Those on foot were lost, swallowed up amidst groups of citizens, whom they allowed to take their horses away in various directions. These hussars were already won to the National cause. Those on horseback seemed submissive to Choiseul, who was haranguing them in German; but they showed their colonel that half their companions had deserted.

Standing apart was Isidore, his hunting-knife in hand, — seemingly a stranger to all this hubbub, — waiting for a man, like a hunter on the watch for his game.

The King, the King, resounded from five hundred throats, as the royal family appeared on the balcony, — the Queen, as has been said already, holding the Dauphin in her arms.

If Louis the Sixteenth had been clad royally, or even in military garb, if he had wielded sceptre or sword, if he had spoken in loud and impressive tones, his voice would have sounded to the people, even at that epoch, like the voice of God, or at least the voice of one sent from Heaven; and perhaps he would have gained that influence over the people which he hoped for; but at break of day, in the slanting twilight, which disfigures the greatest beauty, his appearance was against him. He was dressed like a servant, in his gray coat. His beard was three days old. His hair was not powdered, and he wore that ignoble little periwig, which we have before mentioned. He was pale with fatigue. His dull eye expressed no sentiment, either of tyranny or paternity, as he alternately lisped these few words: "Gentlemen! my children!" It was not such a sight as either the friends or enemies of royalty wished to see on that balcony.

As it was, when Choiseul called out, "Long live the King!" and Isidore responded, "Long live the King!" such was still the prestige of royalty, that, despite his aspect, — which so poorly corresponded with the popular idea of the chief of a great kingdom, — several voices repeated, "Long live the King!"

In response came a shout from the chief of the National Guardsmen, which met a far different greeting, and found a powerful echo: "Hurrah for the Nation!" Under such conditions this cry meant rebellion, and the royal pair could see that this cry was at once taken up by a party of hussars.

Marie Antoinette uttered a cry of rage. Pressing the Dauphin to her breast, — that poor child, ignorant of the importance of the events transpiring about him, — she leaned over the balcony, gnashing her teeth, and hissing at the crowd this one word: "Wretches!"

It was heard by a few, who responded with threats, and the square became one great scene of tumult and noise.

In sheer desperation Choiseul wished to kill himself, but he made a last effort. "Hussars, rally, for honor's sake, and save the King!"

At that instant, amidst a score of armed men, a new actor appeared on the scene. This was Drouet, coming from the townhouse, where he had persuaded the officials to decide upon hindering the King's journey.

Marching up to Choiseul he cried: "So you mean to carry off the King? Very well! but one thing I tell you, you 'll bear him away a corpse!"

Choiseul advanced upon Drouet, with his drawn sword; but the commander of the National Guards was at hand, and said to the Duke: "A step farther, and I 'll kill you!"

At these words another man came forward, before the menacing groups could hinder him. It was Isidore de Charny. The man for whom he had been lying in wait was this very man, — Drouet.

"Back, back!" cried Isidore, pushing aside the crowd with the breastplate of his horse. "That man belongs to me!" Knife in hand, he rushed upon Drouet.

At that moment two simultaneous shots were heard, — from a pistol and from a musket. The pistol-ball flattened itself on Isidore's collar-bone. The musket-ball pierced his breast. The two shots were so near him that the unfortunate fellow was literally wrapped in a billow of flame and a cloud of smoke.

They saw him raise his arms, and heard him say: "Poor Catherine!"

Then, dropping his knife, he fell across his horse's crupper, and thence rolled to the ground.

The Queen uttered a startled cry. She let the Dauphin slip from her arms, and then fell backward, not seeing a new horseman who came at full speed from the direction of Dun, and entered, so to speak, the wake traced in the middle of the crowd by poor Isidore's onslaught

The King left the balcony after the Queen, and closed the window.

It was not a few hussars on foot, but the whole crowd who now shouted: Hurrah for the Nation! Among that crowd only a score of hussars, still on horseback, remained faithful to the last, — the forlorn hope of royalty in distress.

The Queen threw herself into a chair, her head in her hands, thinking how she had seen Isidore fall at her feet and die for her sake, as she had before seen his brother George.

Suddenly the door opened, and a great noise compelled her to look up. What passed through the womanly and queenly heart in that instant, we will not try to describe.

Oliver de Charny, pale and bloody from his brother's last embrace, stood in the doorway.

As to the King, he was as one crushed to the earth.

CHAPTER XLIX.

CHARNY.

THE room was filled with National Guardsmen, and other outsiders led thither by curiosity.

The Queen's first impulse was to throw herself in front of Charny, wipe away, with her handkerchief, the blood wherewith he was covered, and utter those consoling words which go straight from heart to heart; but she restrained this impulse, and only dared rise from her seat, and extend her arms towards him, as she murmured, "Oliver!"

Calm and sad, he made a sign to the outside spectators, as he said, in a firm yet soft voice: "Pardon me, gentlemen, but I must speak alone with their Majesties."

The National Guardsmen tried to say that they were there for exactly the opposite purpose, to prevent the King from having any communication with outsiders. Charny compressed his lips, frowned, and opened his riding-coat. In so doing he allowed a brace of pistols to be seen, and repeated, in tones softer than before, and yet more menacing: "Gentlemen, I have already had the honor of telling you that I must speak privately with the King and Queen."

As he spoke he made a sign for the intruders to clear out.

Hearing his voice, and animated by the control exercised over others by his control over himself, Damas, Malden, and Valory recovered their faltering energy.

Pushing themselves against the intruding guardsmen and the rest, these young officers compelled them to evacuate the chamber.

Then the Queen realized how useful such a man would have been in the King's coach, if exacting etiquette had not demanded that Madame de Tourzel should retain her place.

Looking around, to be sure that nobody was near the Queen except her faithful servants, Charny approached her Majesty, and said: "Madame, I am here. I have seventy hussars at the entrance of the village, upon whom I think I can depend. What are your commands with me?"

"Oh, my poor Charny!" said the Queen, in German. "First of all, what has happened to you?"

Charny made a motion to the Queen, to show that Malden was within hearing, and understood German.

"Alas, alas!" she continued in French, "losing sight of you, we believed you dead."

"Unhappily, Madame," answered Charny, with deep melancholy, "it is not I who am dead; it is my poor brother Isidore —" and he could not restrain a tear. "But my turn will come!" he presently added, in a low voice.

"Charny, Charny, I ask what has happened to you, and why you disappeared so strangely!" said the Queen; adding in a whisper, in German: "Oliver, you have not treated us well, — myself, in particular."

Charny bowed, as he replied: "I supposed that my brother had apprised your Majesty of the reason for my temporary absence from your side."

"Yes, I know. You pursued that man, that rascally Drouet, and for an instant we believed this pursuit had led you into some great misfortune."

"Indeed, a great misfortune did come to me. In spite of all my efforts, I could not overtake Drouet in season. A postilion, returning from Clermont, apprised Drouet that your Majesty's coach, which he believed on its way from Clermont to Verdun, had taken the road from Clermont to Varennes. Thereupon Drouet plunged into Argonne Forest. I fired at him with both pistols, but they were not loaded. I had mounted the wrong horse at Saint Menehould, taking the one intended for Monsieur Dandoins, instead of the one intended for myself. What shall we call it, Madame? Fatality? I nevertheless followed Drouet into the woods; but I was unacquainted with the paths, whereas he knew every footway. Then the darkness became every moment more dense, so that I could not see the fellow; though I pursued him, as one might pursue a ghost. So long as I could hear him I followed the sound, but the sound was soon hushed, and the spectre had vanished; so I found myself alone, in the middle of the forest, enshrouded in shadows. Oh Madame! I am a man, as you well know. Here and now I weep no longer; but in the middle of that forest, amidst the gross darkness, I shed tears of anger, and swore with rage."

The Queen offered him her hand, which he touched with trembling lips, as he bowed over it.

"Nobody answered my outcry," continued Charny. "I wandered all night, and towards daybreak found myself near the village of Gèves, on the road from Varennes to Dun. I reasoned with myself thus: Had you been lucky enough to elude Drouet, as he had eluded me? This was possible! In that case you had passed through Varennes, and it would be useless for me to do anything but hasten after you. Had you been arrested at Varennes? Then I was alone, and my devotion would be equally useless. I resolved finally to continue my journey towards Dun. Just before reaching that village I met Monsieur Deslon, with a hundred hussars. Deslon was uneasy. He had heard no news; only he had met Jules de Bouillé and Monsieur de Raigecourt, riding at full speed towards Stenay. Why had they not spoken to Deslon? Probably they distrusted him, though I knew Deslon to be a worthy and loyal gentleman. I at once surmised that your party had been arrested at Varennes, that Bouillé and Raigecourt had at once fled, in order to notify General Bouillé. All this I said to Deslon, and urged him to follow me with his hussars, which he at once did, leaving thirty of his men to guard the bridge over the Meuse. An hour later we were at Varennes, having gone four leagues in an hour. I wished at once to begin the attack, and go through all obstacles, to reach your Majesties. We found, however, barricade after barricade. To attack them would have been folly; so I tried a parley. An officer of the National Guards presented himself, and of him I asked permission to rejoin my hussars, who were in the city. This request was refused. I demanded permission to come and get orders from the King; and as they were preparing to refuse this second request, as they had the first, I put spurs to my horse, cleared the first barricade, and then the second. Guided by the noise, I came on at full gallop, and reached this square just as your Majesty was retreating from the balcony. — And now I await your Majesty's orders."

The Queen once more pressed Charny's hands in her own. Then turning to the King, still plunged in torpor, she said: "Sire, have you been hearing what has happened to your faithful servant, the Count?"

As the King answered not a word, she rose and went to his side, saying: "Sire, there is no time to waste. Unhappily, we have lost too much time already! Here is Monsieur de Charny, with seventy reliable men, as he believes, and he asks for your orders."

She added, as the King shook his head: "Sire, in Heaven's name, — your orders!" and as the Queen pleaded with her voice, Charny pleaded as eloquently with his eyes.

"My orders?" echoed the King. "I have no orders to give. I 'm a prisoner. Do whatever you think you can do!"

"Very well!" said the Queen. "That 's all we ask." Drawing Charny aside, she added: "You have carte blanche, — full powers. Do, as the King says, whatever you think can be done." Then she added, in a whisper: "But act quickly and vigorously, or we are lost."

"That is so, Madame," replied Charny. "Let me confer an instant with these gentlemen, and what we decide upon shall be at once put into execution."

Just then Choiseul entered, holding in his hand some papers, folded in a blood-stained handkerchief, which he offered to Charny, without an explanatory word.

The Count understood at once that these were the papers found on his brother. He extended his hand to receive the bloody heritage, raised the package to his lips, and kissed it.

The Queen could not repress a sob. Charny did not falter; but, placing the papers in his breast-pocket, he said: "Gentlemen, can you aid me in the last effort which I shall make?"

"We are ready to sacrifice our lives!" responded one and another of the young men.

"Do you think you can be answerable for a dozen men who remain faithful?"

"We number eight or nine of ourselves."

"Well, I have returned with seventy hussars. While I attack the barricades in front, you can make a diversion in the rear. Under cover of that diversion, I will force the barricades, and with our united forces we can penetrate as far as this spot, and carry off the King."

The only answer of the young noblemen was to offer Charny their hands.

Then he turned again to the Queen and said: "Madame, in one hour your Majesty will be free, or we shall be dead."

"Oh Count, Count! Don't speak that word! It savors of ill-luck!"

Oliver contented himself with a bow, in confirmation of his promise; and without noting the renewed shouts and fresh rumors which made themselves heard, and appeared to be invading the house, he marched towards the door; but as he put his hand on the latch, the door opened, and gave ingress to a new personage, who came to take part in this drama, already so complicated.

He was a man forty or forty-two years of age, with a gloomy and severe face. His collar was rolled back. His coat was unbuttoned. His eyes, red with fatigue, and his dusty clothing, showed that he also, pushed on by violent passion, had entered upon an implacable warfare. In his belt he wore a brace of pistols, and a sabre hung at his side.

Breathless, and almost voiceless, when he opened the door, he appeared only to find relief when he recognized the King and Queen. Then a smile of vengeance wreathed his face, and without troubling himself about the secondary personages, who were in the shadows of the room, he stood in the doorway, which he almost filled with his powerful frame, and exclaimed, raising his hand: "In the name of the National Assembly, you are my prisoners!"

By a swift movement Choiseul was in front of him, pistol in hand, and in his turn raised his arm, to blow out the brains of this new-comer, who appeared to surpass all his predecessors in insolence and revolution; but, with a movement equally rapid, the Queen grasped Choiseul's threatening hand, and said in a low voice: "Do not hasten our destruction, Monsieur. Be prudent! With all these interruptions we are gaining time, and General Bouillé cannot be far away."

"You are right, Madame," answered Choiseul; and he replaced his pistol in his breast.

The Queen glanced at Charny, astonished that he had not been the first to come forward in this new peril. Strangely enough, Charny seemed to avoid being seen by this intruder; and, to elude his observation, the Count had ensconced himself in the dimmest corner of the room. However, knowing Charny as well as she did, the Queen did not doubt that at the proper time he would emerge from both the shadow and the mystery.

CHAPTER L.

ONE ENEMY MORE.

THROUGH this entire scene, while Choiseul was menacing the man who spoke in the name of the National Assembly, this man apparently took no note of the fact that he barely escaped the peril of death.

He seemed occupied with some sentiment more powerful in his heart than the fear of death. His facial expression could not be mistaken. It was that of a hunter, who at last finds his prey in one den, — the lion, the lioness, and their cubs, which have devoured his only child.

At the word prisoners, which had roused Choiseul with a bound, the King raised himself, saying: "Prisoners? Prisoners in the name of the National Assembly? What are you talking about? I don't understand you."

"It is very simple, nevertheless, and quite easy to understand," replied the intruder. "Notwithstanding the oath you took not to leave France, you're fleeing from your country by night, — breaking your word, betraying the people, betraying the Nation, in such a way that the people are roused, and the Nation is calling her citizens to arms; and the Nation speaks to you, through the voice of one of the least of her subjects: Sire, in the name of the people, in the name of the Nation, in the name of the Assembly, you are my prisoner! for this voice is none the less powerful, because it comes from the lowly."

In the storeroom could be heard the sound of approbation, accompanied, or rather followed, by frantic bravos.

"Madame, Madame," murmured the Duke, in the Queen's ear, "do not forget it was yourself who checked me, and that you would not be subjected to such unparalleled insolence, if you had not shown your pity for this man a moment ago."

"All this is nothing, if we avenge ourselves!" whispered the Queen.

"Yes!" replied Choiseul; "but if we do not avenge ourselves —?"

The Queen groaned sadly and heavily; but Charny's hand was extended slowly over the Duke's shoulder, and touched the Queen's arm, so that she turned quickly.

"Let me talk and deal with that man!" hissed the Count, softly. "I know what to do with him!"

Meanwhile the King, stunned with this new blow, looked with astonishment upon this gloomy personage, who used such energetic language to a king, and spoke in the name, not of his Majesty Louis the Sixteenth, but of the Assembly and the Nation. With this surprise was mingled an element of curiosity, for it seemed to Louis that this was not the first time he had seen this man, though he could not recall where he had seen him. Finally the King said: "After all, what do you want with me? Speak!"

"Sire, I want you and your family not to take another step towards foreign parts."

"Doubtless you come with thousands of armed men, to oppose our journey?" said the King, who grew more dignified during this discussion.

"No, Sire, I am alone, or rather, there are only two of us, — one of General Lafayette's aides, and myself, — a plain peasant; only the Assembly has issued a decree, and counts on us to execute it, and this will be done."

"Give me the decree, that I may at least read it!" said the King.

"I have n't it, but my companion. My companion is sent by General Lafayette and the Assembly, to execute the orders of the Nation. As for me, I am sent by Mayor Bailly, and especially by myself, to watch my companion, and to blow his brains out, if he balks."

The Queen, the Duke, Damas, and the other listeners, looked on in amazement. They had heretofore seen the populace only in their fury or their humility, either in the attitude of petitioners or assassins; but now they saw, for the first time, a man of the people, standing upright, with his arms crossed, feeling his own power, and declaiming in behalf of popular rights.

Louis quickly understood that nothing was to be hoped from a man of this temperament, and wished to have done with him at once; so he asked: "Well, where is your comrade?"

"There, behind me!"

With these words the peasant stepped aside, leaving the doorway clear. Through its opening they could see a young man, clad in the uniform of a staff-officer, leaning against a window. He, also, was in great disorder; only this disorder arose not from his energy, but from dejection. His face was begrimed with tears, and he held a paper in his hand.

This was young Romeuf, Lafayette's junior aide, with whom — as our readers doubtless remember — we made them acquainted, at the time of young Louis de Bouillé's visit to Paris.

Romeuf, if we may recall his conversation with the young Royalist at that time, was a Patriot, a sincere Patriot; but during Lafayette's dictatorship the young fellow had been entrusted with the guardianship of the Queen, accompanying her Majesty whenever she left the palace. In this companionship, and in all his relations with her, he had shown a respectful delicacy, for which the Queen had several times expressed her gratitude.

On seeing him, therefore, it was natural for her to exclaim, in painful surprise: "Oh, is it you?" Then she added, with the sad moan of a woman who sees the failure of a power she had believed invincible: "Oh, I would never have believed it!"

"Well, well," said the elder envoy, smiling, "it appears I did well to come."

Romeuf advanced slowly, with downcast eyes, holding the decree in his hand; but the impatient King, without giving the young man time to present the paper, took a rapid step towards him, and snatched the decree from his grasp.

After reading it, he said: "There is no longer a king in France!"

Romeuf's comrade smiled, as much as to say, "I know that well enough!"

At the King's words the Queen made a movement, as if to question him.

"Listen, Madame!" he said. "Here is the decree which the Assembly has dared to vote;" and he read, with a voice tremulous with indignation, the following document:

The Assembly orders the Minister of the Interior to instantly send messengers into the various departments, with orders to all public functionaries, all National Guards, and all troops of the regular army, to arrest, or cause to be arrested, all persons who may be leaving the kingdom, and to prevent the exportation of all sorts of goods, — arms and ammunition, horses and carriages, and gold and silver, in any shape ; and in case these messengers overtake the King, any members of the royal family, or those who have aided and abetted their flight, then the aforesaid public functionaries, National Guards, and troops of the regular army, shall take all possible measures to arrest their flight, and prevent the continuance of their journey, and render an account thereof to the legislative body.

The Queen listened in a sort of torpor ; but when the King finished his reading, she tossed her head, as if to recover her spirits. "Impossible!" she exclaimed, at the same time holding out her hand for the fatal paper. "Let me see it!"

Meanwhile Romeuf's comrade reassured, with his smile, the National Guards, and other Varennes Patriots, who were a little disturbed by the Queen's word, impossible, although one and all had already learned the tenor of the decree.

"Oh, read, Madame, read!" said the King, bitterly, "if you are still in doubt. Read the decree, indicted and signed by the President of the National Assembly."

"And what man dares to write and sign such a decree?"

"A nobleman, Madame," replied the King, — "Alexander de Beauharnais,[1] a marquis!"

Is it not strange, — is it not a proof of the mysterious chain which links the past to the future, — that this de-

[1] This allusion is to the first husband of the Empress Josephine. He was the father of Hortense Beauharnais, who became the wife of Louis Bonaparte, and consequently the mother of Napoleon the Third. As Louis Napoleon was on the throne of France when this story was written, such allusions will account for the fact that Dumas first published it in Belgium, instead of France. The omission of certain allusions to the greater Bonaparte, in later Paris editions, — especially from the witty Preface written by Dumas, — would naturally arise from the continued reign of Louis Napoleon.

cree, which arrested the flight of the royal family, should bear a name, though then obscure, which would thereafter attach itself, in a glaring way, to the history of the beginning of the Nineteenth Century.

The Queen took the decree and read it, with contracted eyebrows and compressed lips.

Then the King took it again, and reperused it; after which he threw it on the bed, where were reposing the Dauphin and Madame Royale, insensible to the discussion which was deciding their fate.

At this slight action, the Queen, incapable of longer restraining herself, angrily seized the paper, crushed it in her hands, and threw it far from the bed, exclaiming as she did so: "Oh Monsieur, be careful! I don't wish my children to be contaminated by such a document!"

An immense clamor arose in the adjoining storeroom. The National Guardsmen who were there made a movement as if they were about to rush into the chamber occupied by the illustrious fugitives.

Lafayette's aide uttered a cry of terror.

His travelling companion uttered a cry of rage. "Ah," growled he between his teeth, "they insult the Assembly, they insult the Nation, they insult the people! Good!"

Then turning towards the men who crowded the other room, — armed with muskets, sabres, and scythes, and ready for a fight, — he called them to his aid.

There was a second movement to enter the chamber, — a movement which was the complement of the first, — and God only knows what would have been the result of this collision of angry men; but Charny — who had whispered to the Queen, at the beginning of the scene, the few words already reported, and, during the progress of affairs, had held himself entirely aloof — now came forward, and grasped the arm of the unknown

National Guardsman, at the moment when this belligerent intruder was drawing his sabre, and said to him: "A word, if you please, Monsieur Billot; I want to speak with you."

Billot, for it was he, let a cry of astonishment escape him, became pale as death, remained an instant irresolute, and finally said, pushing back his half-drawn sabre into its sheath: "Very well, so be it! I also have something to say to you, Monsieur de Charny."

Directing his steps to the door he added: "Citizens, give us room, if you please. I must have a private interview with this officer. But be easy, comrades!" he added in a lower voice, "for neither wolf, dam, nor whelps can escape. I 'm here, and will be responsible for all."

Although this man was as unknown to the others as he was to the King and his friends, Charny only excepted, the crowd felt that he had the right to give orders; and they accordingly backed downstairs, leaving the storeroom empty.

Moreover each man wanted to tell his friends below what was going on upstairs, and to advise the Patriots to keep better guard than ever.

Meanwhile Charny said to the Queen, in a low voice: "Monsieur de Romeuf is on your side, Madame. I leave you with him. Keep him as far off from us as possible."

This was the easier to do because, when he entered the other room, Charny closed the door, and setting his back against it, prevented anybody, even Billot himself, from going into the bedroom.

LA COMTESSE DE CHARNY.

CHAPTER I.

A PEASANT'S HATRED.

FINDING themselves face to face, the two men looked straight at each other, but the gaze of the nobleman did not make the farmer wince. Moreover it was Billot who first spoke.

"The Count has done me the honor to say he wishes to speak with me. I am ready to hear what he has to say."

"Billot," asked Charny, "how comes it that I meet you here, charged with such a vengeful mission? I supposed you were our friend, and a friend to other noblemen, as well as a good and faithful servant to the King."

"I was a good and faithful servant of the King. If not your friend, — an honor hardly allowable to a poor farmer like me, — I was at least your humble servant."

"Well, well?"

"Well, Monsieur, I am so no longer."

"I don't understand you, Billot!"

"Why do you seek to understand me, Monsieur? Do I demand the causes of your fidelity to the King, or of your devotion to the Queen? No! I take for granted you have your reasons for it, and, as you are an honest and true man, that your reasons are good, — or, at least, satisfactory to your own conscience. I have not your high rank, Count, I have not your knowledge; but you know me to be an honest and true man, — or have known me to be so. Take for granted then that, like yourself, I have my reasons, which, if not the best, are equally conscientious."

Charny was completely ignorant of the farmer's motives for hating the nobility or royalty; so he said: "Billot, I have known you, — and not so long ago either, — when you were far different from what you are now."

"Oh, certainly, I do not deny it," said Billot, with a bitter smile. "Yes, you have known me a different man from what I am now. I 'll tell you what I was. I was a true Patriot, devoted to two men and one object. The two men were the King and Doctor Gilbert. The one object was my country. One day the King's commissioners came, — and I own," said the farmer, shaking his head, "that this first disaffected me towards him, — well, one day the King's commissioners came to my farm. Half by force, half by their unexpected arrival, they took from me a casket, a precious trust which had been confided to me by Doctor Gilbert. As soon as I was at liberty, I started for Paris, where I arrived on the evening of the Thirteenth of July, 1789, in the very midst of the outbreak over the busts of Orleans and Necker. They were carrying these busts through the streets, and shouting their cheers for these two men. This could do the King no great harm; yet, all of a sudden, the King's soldiers charged upon us. I saw the poor devils falling around me, — fellows who had committed no other crime than shouting hurrah, for two men whom they probably knew little about, and cared less. Some fell with their heads laid open by sabre-cuts, others with their breasts riddled with bullets. I saw Monsieur de Lambesq, one of the King's friends, hunt down women and children, into the very Tuileries, who had not even shouted for Necker and Orleans; and under his horse's feet he trod an old man of seventy. This made me quarrel more and more with the King. The next day I went to the boarding-school of little Sebastien; and from this poor child I learned that his father was in the Bastille, under an order from the King, which had been solicited by a Court lady; and I continued to say to myself that, if the King was as good as they pretended, he had moments of awful ignorance, forgetfulness, and error in the midst of his goodness. Nay, more! I determined, as far as in me lay, to reform the faults committed by the King in his moments of error, ignorance, and forgetfulness; and I did all in my power to capture the Bastille. We did it, too, though not without some pains! The King's soldiers fired on us, killing nearly two hundred men; and this gave me new cause for not agreeing with the popular notion as to the King's wonderful goodness. However, the Bastille was taken. In one of its dungeons I found Monsieur Gilbert, for whom I had risked being killed twenty times; but all this I forgot in my joy at seeing him. Well, Monsieur Gilbert still declared that the King was good, that he was ignorant of the greater part of the wrongs done in his name, and that it was not with him I should be angry, but with his ministers. At that time everything Monsieur Gilbert said to me was like Gospel truth. I believed him. Seeing the Bastille destroyed, Gilbert set at liberty, and Pitou and myself safe and sound, I forgot the shots in Rue Saint Honoré, the attacks on the populace at the Tuileries, the one hundred and fifty or two hundred men killed by the Prince of Saxe's bagpipe, as they called it. I forgot even the imprisonment of Doctor Gilbert, on the simple request of a Court lady. — But pardon, Monsieur," said Billot, interrupting himself, "all this does n't concern you, and you did n't ask for an interview with me to listen to all the parrotings of a poor uneducated peasant, — you, a noble lord and a learned man."

Billot made a motion as if about to unlock the door into the chamber where the King was, but Charny stopped him.

Charny had two reasons for so doing. First, it might not be unimportant, in such a situation, to ascertain the causes of Billot's enmity; and second, he should be gaining time. So he said: "No! tell me all, my dear Billot. You know the friendship we have had for you, — my poor brothers and myself, and what you say interests me in the highest degree."

At those three words, my poor brothers, Billot smiled bitterly.

"Very well, Monsieur Count, I will gratify you, — and I regret that your two brothers — especially one of them, Monsieur Isidore — are not here to listen."

Billot pronounced these words, your two brothers, and one of them, Monsieur Isidore, with so singular an emphasis, that Charny perceived the sad emotions which this beloved brother's name awakened in the farmer's heart; but without answering Billot, who was evidently ignorant of the misfortunes of the brother whose presence he desired, Charny made a sign for him to go on; and Billot did so.

"When the King set out for Paris I could only see in him a father returning to the midst of his children. I marched with Doctor Gilbert near the royal carriage, making a rampart with my body against any attack, and shouting lustily for the King. This was his first trip, when all about him, — before him, behind him, in the street, under the feet of his horses and the wheels of his carriage, — there were benedictions and flowers. On our arrival at the Hôtel de Ville, it was noticeable that the King wore no longer a white cockade, but that he had not yet put on the tricolored cockade; so the crowd shouted, Cockade! Cockade! I took off the one on my hat, and offered it to him. He thanked me, and put it on his own hat, amidst the cheers of the multitude. I was intoxicated with joy, at seeing my cockade in the King's hat. Louder than all others I shouted the King's name. I became so enthusiastic for this good King, that I stayed in Paris. My crops were ripe, and needed my presence; but bah! What mattered the crops? I was rich enough to lose a whole harvest, and if my presence was of any use to this good King, — the Father of his People and the Restorer of French Liberty, as we were idiots enough to call him in those days, — why, it was certainly better for me to stay in Paris than to go back to Pisseleu. My harvest, which I had confided to Catherine's care, was ruined! — It appears that Catherine had something else to attend to besides the crops. — But don't let us talk about that! — Well, they began to say that the King did n't willingly accept the Revolution; that he acted under force and constraint; that it was not the tricolored cockade he wished to wear on his hat, but the white cockade. Those who said such things were partly slanderers, as was proved at the banquet held by the royal bodyguards, where the Queen put on neither the tricolored cockade nor the white cockade, — neither the National cockade nor the French, — but wore the cockade of her brother, the Emperor Joseph the Second, — now dead and gone, — the Austrian cockade, the black cockade. Well, I acknowledge that my doubts recommenced; but Monsieur Gilbert told me it was not the King who did this, but the Queen, — that the Queen was only a woman, and we must be indulgent towards women. I believed him so truly, that when the mob came from Paris to Versailles to attack the palace, — although at the bottom of my heart I believed the assailants of the palace were not wholly in the wrong, — I sided with its defenders; so much so, that I was the first to run and rouse Lafayette, — who was asleep, poor dear man, as if he were at church, — and whom I brought to the palace in the nick of time, to save the King. Ah! On that day I saw Madame Elizabeth embrace Lafayette. I saw the Queen offer him her hand to kiss. I heard the King call Lafayette his friend; and I said to myself that Gilbert was perhaps right. Certainly it was not fear which led a king, a queen, and a royal princess to make such demonstrations; and even if they did not share Lafayette's opinions, and only valued his usefulness to themselves in a perilous moment, three such royal personages would not stoop to falsehood. Then I begin to pity the poor Queen, who was only imprudent, and the poor King, who was only feeble. However, I let them return to Paris without me. — Me? Oh, I was busy at Versailles, — you know about what, Monsieur de Charny."

Charny only sighed.

"They say the King's second trip was not quite so gay as the first. In place of blessings, they say there were curses. Instead of vivas there were death-cries. Instead of bouquets, thrown under the hoofs of the horses and the carriage wheels, there were severed heads, carried on pikes. I did n't see these things, for I was still at Versailles. All this time I was leaving my farm without a master! Bah! I was rich enough, even if I had lost the harvest of 1789, to lose another for 1790! But one fine morning came Pitou, to tell me that I was on the point of losing something no father is rich enough to lose, — my daughter."

Charny started. Billot looked at him sternly, and continued: "I must tell you that only a league from my farm, at Boursonnes, lived a noble family, — a family of great lords, a family powerfully rich. This family was composed of three brothers. When they were children, and came often from Boursonnes to Villers Cotterets, the younger brothers almost always honored me by stopping at the farm. They said they had never drunk such good milk as my cows gave, nor eaten such good bread as Mother Billot's. Sometimes they would add, — and I, poor fool! believed they said this to repay me for my hospitality, — sometimes they added, they had never seen such a beautiful child as my little Catherine. Well, I was grateful to them for drinking my milk, eating my bread, and thinking my Catherine pretty. Well, why not? If I could trust the King, who is half German, on his mother's side, I could easily trust these boys. So when the second son — who had been a long time away from the neighborhood, and who was called George — was killed at Versailles, at the Queen's threshold, on that dreadful October night, while bravely doing his duty as a gentleman, — God knows how the same blow which killed him, wounded me. Ah, Monsieur, his brother saw me, — his elder brother, who had seldom been to my house, — not because he was too proud, — I do him that justice, — but because he had gone away from home earlier than his brother George. — I say he saw me on my knees before the dead body, pouring out hot tears, as George had poured out his blood. Ah, I can see him now, — there, at the bottom of that little courtyard, mouldy and damp, whither I carried him in my arms, in order that his body should not be mutilated, — poor young man! — like the bodies of his companions, Varicourt and Huttes. I had almost as much blood on my clothes as you have on yours. Oh, he was a charming boy, when I used to see him on his gray nag, going to school at Villers Cotterets, with his basket in hand. Certainly, if I were thinking only of him, I believe I could weep as you do, Monsieur; but I think of the other one, and I mourn no longer."

"The other one? What do you mean?" asked Charny.

"Wait!" said Billot. "We shall come to that soon enough. — Pitou came to Paris, and spoke to me two words, which proved that it was not my harvest merely that was endangered, but my child, — that it was my happiness, not my fortune, which ran the risk of destruction. I left the King in Paris. If he was acting in good faith, as Monsieur Gilbert said, all things would work together for the best, whether I was there or not; and so I returned to my farm. At first I feared Catherine was in danger of death. She had delirium, a cerebral fever, — what did I know about it? The condition in which I found her made me uneasy, — the more so, because Doctor Raynal forbade my entering the chamber till she was better. Think of it! A despairing father, forbidden to enter his daughter's sick-room. I believed I had a right to listen at her door. I did listen! I then learned that she had caught the brain fever, that she had been almost crazy, because her lover had left her. I also had been away a whole year; but instead of being sick because her father was away, she had smiled over my absence. Why not? Did n't my absence leave the coast clear for seeing her lover? — Catherine regained her health, but not her happiness. One month, two months, three months, six months passed away, without a single ray of gayety brightening that face, which I watched so constantly. One morning I saw her smile, and I trembled. Was her lover coming back? Was this why she smiled? Even so! The next day a shepherd, who had seen him pass by that morning, told me of it. I made no doubt that by the evening of that very day the lover would come to my home, — or, rather, to Catherine's. When evening came on, I loaded my double-barrelled gun, and put myself on the watch."

"You did that, Billot?" said Charny.

"Why not?" said Billot. "I place myself in ambush in order to kill the wild boar who roots up my potatoes, the wolf who devours my lambs, the fox who steals my chickens; and why not put myself into ambush, in order to kill the man who comes to rob me of my peace of mind, the lover who comes to dishonor my daughter?"

"But at the decisive moment your heart failed you, did it not?" said the Count, quickly.

"No, not the heart, but the eye and hand. A trace of blood showed that I had not entirely failed; only, you understand," added Billot, with increasing bitterness, "that between a father and lover, my daughter did not hesitate. When I entered Catherine's chamber, Catherine had vanished."

"And you have not seen her since?" asked Charny.

"No!" responded Billot. "Why should I see her again? She well knows that if I see her I shall kill her."

Charny shrank back, as he noted, with feelings of admiration mixed with terror, the powerful nature standing before him.

"I set myself to work on my farm," continued Billot. "What mattered my personal unhappiness, so long as France was happy? Was n't the King walking bravely in the Revolutionary road? Did n't he take part in the great Federal Feast? It was good to see once more that good King, to whom I had given my tricolored cockade on the Sixteenth of July, and whom I had helped to rescue on the Fifth of October! What happiness it must be for him to see all Frenchmen united on the Champ de Mars, pledging themselves, as one man, to their common country! When I saw this grand sight, I forgot all else for a moment, even Catherine. — No! That 's false! A father never forgets his daughter. — The King took the oath in his turn. It seemed to me that he took it very clumsily, and swore with lip-service. He certainly took the oath in his seat, instead of swearing at the Patriot Altar, as others did. But, nonsense! He swore, and that was the main thing! An oath is an oath. It is not the place of its ceremonial which makes it sacred. When an honest man takes an oath, he keeps it; and the King had taken his oath! When I once more returned to Villers Cotterets, having no longer a daughter, I occupied myself with politics; and then I began to consider how, the winter before, the King had been willing to be abducted by the Marquis de Favras, — as it was said, — although the scheme was soon strangled. Later I heard how the King wished to leave France with his aunts, though this project also failed; and how he tried to drive to Saint Cloud, intending to go from there to Rouen, though the people kept him at home. All these things I heard, but I did not credit them. Had I not seen him, with my own eyes, raise his hand, and take the oath of national allegiance, on the Champ de Mars? Could I believe that a king, having taken an oath in presence of three hundred thousand citizens, would hold it less sacred than oaths taken by common men? It was not likely. Well, day before yesterday, I went to market, at Meaux, and I was very much astonished when, in the morning, — for I must tell you that I slept at the station-agent's, a good friend of mine, with whom I had finished a large sale of grain. Well, as I was saying, I was very much astonished when, in a coach which stopped to get fresh horses, I saw and recognized the King, Queen, and Dauphin. I could n't be mistaken, for I was accustomed to see them, — and in a carriage, too. Why, on that Sixteenth of July I had accompanied them from Versailles to Paris. — Then I heard one of their men, dressed in yellow, give the order to drive to Châlons. The voice struck me. I turned and recognized whom? The man who had stolen Catherine, — a noble gentleman, who was now doing duty as a lackey, running before the King's carriage."

As he spoke these words, Billot looked hard at the Count, to see if he understood that this concerned his brother Isidore; but Charny wiped away, with his handkerchief, the sweat which ran down his forehead, and held his peace.

Billot went on: "I wished to follow him, but he was too far off already. He was armed, and I was not; he was on horseback, and I was afoot. For an instant I ground my teeth over the idea that the King was escaping from France, and the ravisher escaping from me. I said to myself that I also had taken an oath of allegiance, — to the Nation; and though the King was breaking his word, I would not break mine. It was only three in the morning, and I was only a few leagues from Paris. On my good horse, this was only an affair of two hours. I would see Monsieur Bailly about it, — an honest man, who, as it seemed to me, would be ready to side with those who keep their oaths, and against those who break them. This point settled, in order to lose no time, I begged my friend, the post-agent at Meaux, — without telling him what I was going to do, you understand, — to lend me his uniform as a member of the National Guard, and also his sabre and pistols. I also asked for the best horse in his stable, and instead of starting at a trot for Villers Cotterets, I started at a headlong gallop for Paris. My faith! I arrived just as they had discovered the King's flight, though nobody knew which way he had gone. Romeuf had been sent on the Valenciennes road, by Lafayette. See, now, how much there is in Chance! At the barrier he was arrested, but he persuaded them to send him to the National Assembly, which he entered just as Bailly, informed by myself, was giving more precise details of the royal journey. It was only necessary to prepare a properly written order, and change the route. The thing was done in an instant. Romeuf was started on the Châlons road, and I received an order to accompany him, — a mission which I fulfilled, as you see. Now however," added Billot, with a gloomy air, "I have overtaken the King, who has deceived me as a Frenchman, and I am satisfied that he will not escape me! It remains for me to overtake, at the appointed time, the man who has deceived me as a father; and he also will not escape me!"

"Alas, my dear Billot," said Charny, with a sigh, "you deceive yourself."

"How so?"

"I mean that the unhappy brother of whom you speak, towards whom you now feel so bitterly, has escaped you."

"He has fled?" cried Billot, with an indescribable expression of rage.

"No! but he is dead!"

"Dead?" cried Billot, trembling in spite of himself, and wiping his forehead, which was instantaneously covered with perspiration.

"Dead! and this blood, which you see on me, — and which you rightly compared just now to that with which you were covered in that little courtyard at Versailles, — this blood is his. If you doubt me, go downstairs, my dear Billot, and you will find his body lying in a little courtyard, — very like the one at Versailles, — where Isidore has been struck down in defence of the same cause which led to the blow which killed our brother George."

Billot looked at Charny, who spoke in a soft voice, while great tears rolled down his cheeks, and the farmer's eyes were hollow and his face dark. Suddenly he exclaimed: "Ah! There is then some justice in Heaven!" Then, as he hurried out of the room, he added: "Count, I believe your words; but no matter, I must myself see that justice has been done."

Charny saw him go down the stairs, stifling a sigh and wiping his eyes. Then, knowing he had no time to lose, Charny returned to the other chamber, went straight to the Queen's side, and asked softly: "Monsieur de Romeuf?"

"He is on our side," replied the Queen.

"So much the better," said Charny, "for there is nothing to hope from the other side."

"What is to be done?" asked the Queen.

"Gain time, till Bouillé arrives."

"Will he come?"

"Yes, for I am going after him."

"Oh Oliver, Oliver! The streets are blockaded. You are watched. You cannot get through, for you will be massacred."

Smilingly, but without speaking, Charny opened a window which looked out upon the garden, gave a last hopeful look towards the King, bowed to the Queen, and leaped down to the earth, fifteen feet below.

The Queen uttered a cry of terror, and hid her face in her hands; but the young gentlemen ran to the window, and responded to the Queen's affrighted cry with one of joy. Charny had scaled the garden wall, and disappeared on the farther side.

It was time. At that instant Billot reappeared in the doorway.

CHAPTER II.

THE MARQUIS DE BOUILLÉ.

DURING these hours of agony, let us see what happened to the Marquis de Bouillé, who was expected so impatiently at Varennes, and on whom rested the last hopes of the royal family.

At nine in the evening — that is, at the very hour when the fugitives were entering Clermont — the Marquis left Stenay with his son Louis, and rode towards Dun, in order to be nearer the King.

When within a quarter-league of that village, fearing his presence might rouse unfavorable comments, the Marquis called a halt, and he and his companion established themselves in a ravine near the roadside, keeping their horses behind them.

There they waited. It was the hour when, in all probability, the royal courier would make his appearance.

Under such circumstances minutes seem like hours, and hours like centuries.

With an indifference which the impatient listeners would fain have regulated by the beating of their own hearts, the clocks slowly sounded the hours, — ten, eleven, midnight, one, two, three.

Between two and three daylight began to break. During these six hours of waiting, the least noise which reached the ears of the listeners brought with it hope, if the sound drew nearer, or disappointment, if it receded.

By daybreak the two watchmen grew desperate. The Marquis felt sure that some mischance had occurred, but as he was ignorant what it could be, he decided upon a return to Stenay, in order to be at the centre of his command, where he might provide against accidents, as far as possible.

They therefore remounted their horses, and slowly retraced their steps towards Stenay. They were hardly a quarter-league from that town when Louis, looking behind him, saw a cloud of dust, raised by the gallop of several horses.

Father and son stopped and waited. As the new-comers came nearer, the watchers thought they could recognize the riders. At last there was no longer any doubt. The new-comers were Jules de Bouillé and Raigecourt.

It was now nearly four o'clock. The couple trotted out in front of the new-comers. As the riders met, each tongue in one company asked the same question, and each of the new arrivals made the same answer.

"What has happened?"

"The King has been arrested at Varennes!"

The news was terrible, — the more so, because the two youths, stationed at the extremity of the town, in the Grand Monarch Tavern, suddenly finding themselves in the midst of rebellion, had been obliged to escape by forcing their way through the crowd, and without being able to bring any definite information.

Terrible as was this vague information, it did not destroy every vestige of hope. Like all superior officers, who rely upon absolute discipline, the Marquis believed his orders had been fully executed, and did not dream of any obstacles on the military side. If the King had reached Varennes, then the different military detachments, which had been ordered to close in behind the King's progress, must also be at Varennes.

These detachments consisted of the forty hussars of Lauzun's Regiment, commanded by Choiseul; thirty dragoons at Saint Menehould, commanded by Dandoins; one hundred and forty dragoons at Clermont, commanded by Damas; sixty hussars at Varennes, commanded by Jules de Bouillé and Raigecourt, with whom these young men had not been able to communicate, on account of their own hasty departure, but who remained, in the absence of his superiors, under Rohrig's command.

True, no great confidence had been reposed in Rohrig, who was only twenty years old; but he would receive orders from his immediate superiors, Choiseul, Dandoins, or Damas, and join his men with those who came to the royal succor.

At that hour, therefore, according to the Marquis's reckoning, the King must have about him between one hundred and sixty and one hundred and eighty dragoons and a hundred hussars. Surely these would be equal to quelling an insurrection in a little town of sixteen or eighteen hundred inhabitants.

We have seen how events put all the Marquis's strategic calculations out of joint. Moreover a serious blow was soon to smite his sense of security.

While Jules and Raigecourt were telling their story to the General, they saw another rider coming towards them at full gallop. This meant more news. All eyes were turned upon him, and he was recognized as Rohrig.

The Marquis pushed towards him, for he was in one of those moods when one is not slow to see the weight of wrath fall even upon the innocent.

"What 's the meaning of this?" cried the General. "Why have you left your post?"

"Your pardon, General," replied Rohrig, "but I come by order of Colonel Damas."

"Then Damas is at Varennes, with his dragoons?"

"Colonel Damas is at Varennes, — not with his dragoons, General, but only with one officer, an adjutant, and two or three privates."

"And the others?"

"The others refused to march."

"And Dandoins, and his dragoons?"

"They are detained as prisoners by the town authorities of Saint Menehould."

"But surely," cried the General, "Choiseul is at Varennes, with his hussars and yours?"

"Choiseul's hussars have gone over to the popular side, and now hurrah for the Nation. As for mine, they are shut up in their barracks, guarded by the Varennes National Guards."

"And you did n't put yourself at their head? You did n't charge upon these riffraff? You did n't rally to the King's support?"

"My General forgets that I had no such orders, that Monsieur Jules and Monsieur Raigecourt were my chiefs, and that I was completely ignorant that his Majesty was expected at Varennes."

"That 's true!" said Jules and Raigecourt, in a breath, speaking in the interests of truth.

"When I heard the first noise of the outbreak," continued young Lieutenant Rohrig, "I went down into the street to ascertain what it all meant. I learned that about fifteen minutes earlier a coach had been stopped, said to contain the King and royal family, and that the persons inside had been taken to the town-solicitor's house. I went at once to the town-solicitor's. There were crowds of armed men in the streets. The drum was beating and the alarm-bell ringing. In the midst of this tumult I felt a touch on my shoulder.

I turned and saw Colonel Damas, with a riding-coat over his uniform. He asked if I was the lieutenant in command of the hussars at Varennes. 'Yes, my Colonel,' I replied. — 'You know me?' he asked. — 'You are Colonel Charles de Damas.' — Thereupon he ordered me to mount without losing a second, ride towards Dun and Stenay, till I met the Marquis de Bouillé, and tell him that Dandoins and his dragoons were prisoners at Saint Menehould, that his men had refused to obey, that Choiseul's hussars threatened to espouse the popular side, and that the only hope of the King and royal family, under arrest in that house, lay in the Marquis. Under such orders I supposed I had no right to raise any objections, but, on the contrary, that it was my duty to obey blindly. I mounted my horse, rode like the wind, and here I am."

"And Damas told you nothing else?"

"Yes, indeed! He told me they would make every effort to gain time, in order to give you, my General, time for reaching Varennes."

"Well, well!" said the Marquis, with a sigh, "I see that everybody has acted for the best. Now we must do our best!" Then he added, to his son Louis: "I will stay here. These gentlemen will carry my orders here and there. To begin with, the detachments from Mouza and Dun must at once set out for Varennes, guard the passage over the Meuse River, and begin the attack. — Rohrig, bear this order from me, and tell them they will soon be reinforced."

The young man to whom this order was addressed saluted the General, and started in the direction of Dun, to have it executed.

The General continued: "Raigecourt, head off the Swiss Regiment from Castella, which is on the march to Stenay. As soon as you find them, explain the urgency of the situation, and give them my order to double their speed. — Away with you!"

After seeing Raigecourt ride off in the opposite direction from that taken by Rohrig, as fast as his tired horse would permit, the Marquis turned towards his second son. "Jules, change horses at Stenay, and be off for Montmédy. Let Klinglin start towards Dun with his regiment of Nassau Infantry, which is at Montmédy, and report personally at Stenay. Be off, now!"

Jules saluted and was off in a flash.

Then the General turned towards his eldest son. "Louis, the Royal Germans are at Stenay, are they not?"

"Yes, father!"

"They received my orders to be all ready to ride at daybreak?"

"I myself gave this order to their colonel."

"Bring me that regiment. I will wait for it, here in the road. Perhaps somebody will come along with fresh news. The Royal Germans are true blue, are n't they?"

"Yes, father."

"Very well, then, the Royal Germans will suffice. With them we will march on Varennes. — Go!"

Count Louis was off in his turn. In ten minutes he reappeared, for the distance was very short. "The Royal Germans are following me," he said to the General.

"They were ready for duty, then?"

"No! To my great amazement, they were not. The commander could not have understood me, when I gave him your orders yesterday, for I found him abed; but he at once rose, and promised to go himself to the barracks and hasten the preparations. Fearing you would be anxious, I came back to tell you the cause of this delay."

"You think he will be here soon?"

"The commander said he would come straight after me."

They waited ten minutes, fifteen minutes, twenty minutes; but nobody came.

The General looked impatiently at his son, who said, in reply to this look, "I 'll ride back again, father!" and putting his horse at full gallop, he went back into Stenay.

Long as the interval had seemed to the Marquis's impatience, the commander had not used it profitably. Only a few men were ready. The young officer complained bitterly, repeated the General's orders, and on the commander's positive promise that in five minutes his soldiers should be outside the town, Louis returned to his father.

As he left the town, he observed that the gate, through which he was riding for the fourth time, was now held by the National Guards.

The Bouillés waited this time five, ten, fifteen minutes, and still nobody came; and the Marquis felt as if every minute lost was a year taken from the lives of the royal prisoners.

Presently they saw a cabriolet coming along the road from Dun. It was Leonard's cabriolet, for he was still pursuing his journey, but with increasing worriment.

The General stopped him; but the farther Leonard came from Paris, the more the image of his brother, — whose hat and overcoat he still wore, — and of Madame de l'Aage, who waited for him to dress her hair, and had never been barbered by anybody else, — passed and repassed before his mind, till these remembrances reduced him to such a state of mental chaos, that the Marquis could get nothing out of him that savored of common sense. Indeed, having left Varennes before the King's detention, Leonard had little news to tell.

This incident served to allay the General's impatience for a few minutes; but at length, when nearly an hour had rolled away since the first orders were sent to the Royal Germans, he requested his son to ride into Stenay for the third time, and not to return without the troops.

Louis started at a furious pace. On arriving at the public square his anger was augmented. Only fifty men were in their saddles. He began by taking these fifty men, and stationing them at the gate, so as to be sure and keep it free for egress and ingress. Then he rode back to the General, who was still waiting, and assured him that this time the commander and soldiers were certainly at his heels, and so he believed; but not till ten minutes afterward, when Louis was about to ride into the town for the fourth time, did they see the head of the advancing regiment.

Under other circumstances the General would have had the commander arrested by his own men; but at such a moment he feared lest this should disaffect both officers and soldiers; so he contented himself with reproaching the commander for his tardiness, and then harangued the soldiers. He told them what an honorable task was reserved for them, — that not only the liberty, but perhaps the life of the King and royal family, depended upon them. He promised new honors to the officers and additional recompense to the soldiers; and, to begin with, he distributed four hundred louis to the privates.

This speech, ending with such a peroration, produced the effect he desired. There was a tremendous shout for the King, and then the Royal Germans started for Varennes at a rapid trot.

At Dun they found, guarding the Meuse River, a detachment of thirty men, left by Deslon, when he left Dun with Charny. The Royal Germans united with these thirty men, and kept on their way.

They had eight long leagues to cover, and the road was full of hills and valleys, so the troops could not ride as rapidly as they wished. Moreover it was necessary to keep the soldiers fresh enough to sustain an attack or make a charge. They felt as if they were advancing into an enemy's country. Right and left, alarms were ringing in the villages. In advance of them they could hear something like a fusillade. Still they kept on.

At Grange au Bois they saw a hatless horseman, bending over his saddle, tearing down the road, and apparently making signals of distress. The soldiers hurried on, and horseman and regiment drew nearer and nearer together.

This horseman was Charny. "To the King! to the King, gentlemen!" he shouted, as soon as he could be heard, at the same time waving his hand.

"To the King! Long live the King!" shouted soldiers and officers in reply.

Charny took his place in the ranks, and in four words explained the situation. When he left Varennes the King was still there; so all was not yet lost.

The horses were already weary, but the men kept well their speed; for the beasts had been crammed with oats, and the men had been warmed to a white heat by Bouillé's speech and golden louis. The regiment therefore tore on like a hurricane, with shouts of loyalty.

At Crépy they met a priest, — a Constitutional priest. Seeing the troops rushing towards Varennes, he said: "Go on! Go on! Luckily you'll be too late!"

Louis de Bouillé overheard him, and rode upon him, with drawn sabre.

"Youngster, what are you at?" cried his father.

The young man understood full well that to attack an unarmed man, and an ecclesiastic to boot, was a double crime; but he took one foot out of his stirrup, and gave the priest a smart kick in the stomach.

"You'll be too late!" repeated the priest, as he rolled over in the dust.

On they went, cursing this prophet of evil, but drawing nearer and nearer to the distant gunshots. Deslon and his seventy hussars were having a skirmish with an equal number of National Guards. The Royal Germans charged upon the guards, dispersed them, and passed on. From Deslon they learned that the King had left Varennes at eight o'clock that morning. Bouillé consulted his watch, and found it now lacked only five minutes of nine.

So be it! All hope was not lost. They could not now think of going through the village, over barricades; so they must make a detour, turning to the left. To go to the right was impossible, on account of the lay of the land and the condition of the soil. By the left they must cross the river. Charny assured them it was fordable; so they left Varennes on the right, and rode into the open fields. However numerous the escort which accompanied the royal coach, the Royal Germans meant to attack it on the Clermont road, and either liberate the King, or be killed in the attempt.

About two-thirds of the length of the circuit they came to the river. Charny urged his horse into the water. The Bouillés followed. After them came the other officers, and then the privates. The stream was almost hidden beneath so many horses and uniforms. In ten minutes the ford was crossed, and the passage through the cool running water had refreshed both the horses and their masters. Then they resumed their ride towards Clermont, like birds on the wing.

Suddenly Charny, who preceded the troops some twenty paces, paused, and uttered a cry. He was on the edge of a deeply embanked canal, whose opening was on a level with the grass. Though he had drawn it on his topographical maps, Charny had completely forgotten this canal, which extended several leagues, and everywhere presented the same difficulties as at this point. If they could not cross it here, neither could they cross it anywhere else.

Charny set the example, and urged his horse down into the water. Though the canal was too deep to ford, the Count's horse swam vigorously for the opposite side; only the bank was so steep and slippery that the Count's horse could not get any hold upon it with his iron hoofs. Three or four times Charny tried to climb up; but he failed, despite his skill as a horseman. After several desperate, intelligent, and almost human efforts, the horse each time trying in vain to gain a solid foothold for his forefeet, he finally slipped backwards into the water, snorting painfully, and almost falling upon his rider.

Charny knew that what could not be accomplished by his horse, a thoroughbred animal, with a rider of acknowledged ability, could certainly not be accomplished by the four hundred horses and men of the squadron.

The experiment was a failure. Fate was too strong. The King and Queen were lost. If Charny could not save them, there was only one duty more, — to perish with them.

He made one last effort, useless like the others, to reach the turf above. In the midst of this effort he stuck his sabre, halfway up the blade, into the clay which formed the steep bank of the canal. This sabre made a foot-hold, — useless for a horse, but serviceable for a man.

Abandoning his stirrups and bridle, Charny let his horse fall riderless into the fatal water. Then the Count swam towards his sabre, grasped it, pulled himself up, and, after several unsuccessful efforts, finally scrambled over upon the grass above.

Then he looked back. On the other side of the canal he could see Bouillé and his son, weeping with anger, and the soldiers gloomy and spiritless; for they all knew, after seeing Charny's losing struggle before their very eyes, how useless it would be for them to try to cross this impassable canal.

The General wrung his hands in despair, — he, whose enterprises had always succeeded, whose actions had heretofore been always crowned with such success as to give birth, in the army, to the proverb: "Lucky as Bouillé."

"Oh, gentlemen," he cried, in dolorous tones, "never call me lucky again."

"No, General," cried Charny, from the other bank; "but pray be tranquil. I will say you have done all any man could do, and when I tell them that, I shall be believed. — Adieu, General!"

Across the fields, on foot, covered with mud, dripping with water, disarmed of his sabre, which remained in the clayey bank of the canal, — his pistols useless, because the powder was wet, — Charny took up his course, and soon disappeared amidst groups of trees, standing here and there along the way, like advance sentinels of the forest. He soon reached the road by which the royal prisoners were sure to pass. He had but to follow it, in order to rejoin them.

Before doing so he turned for the last time, and saw Bouillé and his troops still standing on the edge of that cursed canal. Despite the impossibility of going forward, they could not make up their minds to beat a retreat.

Charny made them a last sign, turned a corner, and soon vanished altogether. For his guidance there was a tremendous noise, made up of the outcries, clamors, threats, jeers, and maledictions of ten thousand men.

CHAPTER III.

THE DEPARTURE.

Our readers know that the King had departed from Varennes; but it remains for us to say more or less about that departure and the journey, during which we shall see fulfilled the destiny of several faithful adherents and last friends, whom fate and devotion grouped about the dying monarchy.

Let us return to the house of Monsieur Sausse, the town-solicitor at Varennes.

As has already been stated, hardly had Charny's feet touched the soil, after he lowered himself from the window, than the door reopened, and Billot appeared on the threshold.

His face was gloomy. His eyes, overhung by brows weighty with thought, were deep and penetrating. He passed in review all the personages of the drama there being enacted, but only two seemed worthy of note within the circle of his observation.

Charny's flight was obvious enough; for the Count was no longer there, and Damas was closing the window. Leaning forward, Billot fancied he saw the fugitive clear the garden wall.

Some sort of a compact had been concluded between Monsieur Romeuf and the Queen, — a compact in which Romeuf would pledge himself to remain neutral. At least, so it seemed to Billot.

Behind Billot, the adjoining storeroom was again filled with the same sort of people whom the farmer's gesture had expelled, before his private interview with Charny in that very room, — men of the people, armed with muskets, scythes, and sabres. These men seemed instinctively drawn, as by magnetic influence, to obey this man as their chief, — a plebeian like themselves, in whom they discerned a democratic patriotism equal to their own, or — perhaps we ought to say — a hatred equal to theirs.

Billot looked about him. As his eye encountered the glances of these armed men, he saw that he could count upon their aid, in case it should become necessary to resort to violence.

"Well," he said to Romeuf, "have they decided to go?"

The Queen cast upon Billot one of her side glances, which would have pulverized those imprudent people upon whom they fell, if she could have infused into those glances the power of Jove's thunderbolts. Without any reply, she sat firmly down, grasping the arms of her chair as if she would weld herself to it.

"The King asks for a little delay," said Romeuf, "as nobody has slept all night, and their Majesties are overcome with fatigue."

"Monsieur de Romeuf," replied Billot, "you know very well it is not because their Majesties are tired, that they ask for delay, but because they hope the Marquis de Bouillé will arrive during that delay. Let their Majesties beware," added Billot, with emphasis, "for if they refuse to come of their own free will, they will be dragged by the feet to their coach."

"Wretch!" exclaimed Damas, rushing towards Billot, with his sword bare; but Billot only turned and folded his arms. He had no need to defend himself; for in a second eight or ten men rushed in from the other room, and Damas found himself confronted by as many different weapons.

The King saw that it needed only a word or a gesture, and both bodyguards, Choiseul, Damas, and the two or three other officers who were near him, would be slaughtered; so he said: "All right! Harness the horses, and we 'll go."

Madame Brunier, one of the Queen's ladies, screamed and fainted. This scream wakened the two children, and the Dauphin began to cry.

"Ah Monsieur!" said the Queen, addressing Billot, "have you no children, that you are so cruel to a mother?"

Billot trembled, but he said, with a bitter smile: "No, Madame, I have none." Then he added, to the King: "No need to harness the horses. They are already harnessed."

"Ah, well! Let them drive up!"

"The coach is at the door."

The King went to the window, and saw the coach was indeed ready; though he had not heard it drive up, in consequence of the great noise in the street. The people could see the King through the glass. Then a formidable outcry, or rather, a formidable menace, arose from the multitude. The King grew pale.

Choiseul approached the Queen and asked: "What are her Majesty's orders? Myself and comrades would prefer to die, rather than see what we must see."

"Do you believe Monsieur de Charny is safe?" asked the Queen, in a hasty whisper.

"Oh, as to that, I am sure of it," replied Choiseul.

"Well then, let us go; but in the name of Heaven,

— I ask it more for your sakes than ours, — do not leave us, — either you or your friends."

The King understood the fear which possessed the Queen, and said: "Assuredly, Monsieur de Choiseul and Monsieur de Damas are to accompany us; but I do not see their horses."

"That 's true!" said Romeuf to Billot, "we have no right to prevent these gentlemen from following the King and Queen."

"These gentlemen may follow the King and Queen as they can," said Billot. "Our orders relate to the transportation of the King and Queen, and nothing was said about these gentlemen."

"But I declare," said the King, with more firmness than might have been expected of him, "I declare that I will not go, unless these gentlemen have their horses."

"What do you say to that?" said Billot, turning to the men who occupied the other room. "The King won't go, unless these gents have their horses!" The men burst into a laugh.

"I will go and get them," said Romeuf; but Choiseul stepped in front of him and said, barring Romeuf's way: "Do not leave their Majesties. Your commission gives you some power over the populace, and it is incumbent upon your honor not to see a hair of their Majesties' heads injured."

Romeuf stopped. Billot shrugged his shoulders, and said: "All right! I 'll go myself." At the door he turned, and said with frowning brows: "I shall be obeyed, sha'n't I?"

"Oh, be easy!" replied the men, with another burst of laughter, which indicated, in case of resistance, that they would attend to the matter without pity.

Indeed, such was their irritation, that these fellows were certainly ready to use force against the royal family, and fire upon any one of them who should try to escape.

Billot did not take the trouble to return to the chamber. One of the men was near the window, watching what took place in the street. Presently he said: "There are the horses! Now let 's be off!"

"Let 's be off!" repeated his comrades, with an emphasis which admitted no discussion.

The King walked first. Choiseul followed, giving his arm to the Queen. Next came Damas, giving his arm to Madame Elizabeth. Then came Madame de Tourzel and the two children. Around them, forming a group, were the other members of this faithful little company.

As the envoy of the National Assembly, and consequently endowed with a certain sacredness of character, it was Romeuf's particular duty to protect the royal party; but it must be said that Romeuf had abundant need to protect himself. It was rumored abroad that not only had he executed the Assembly's orders very mildly, but that by his inertia, if not actively, he had favored the escape of one of their Majesties' most devoted adherents, who had hastened to General Bouillé, with a command to come at once to the royal relief. The result was, that while Billot's conduct was glorified by the populace, who were disposed to recognize him as their leader, Romeuf, when he reached the street, heard about him cries of Aristocrat! and Traitor! accompanied by threats.

The royal party entered their carriages, in the same order they had followed in descending the staircase. The two bodyguards took their accustomed places on the seats outside.

On their way downstairs Valory had approached the King and said: "Sire, my comrade and myself have a favor to ask of your Majesty."

"What is it, gentlemen?" the King had replied, astonished that he could dispense any favor whatever.

"Sire, as we have no longer the happiness to serve you in any military capacity, we ask the favor of holding places near you as your domestics."

"My domestics, young gentlemen?" cried the King. "Impossible!"

Valory bowed: "Sire," said he, "in the situation in which your Majesty finds yourself, it is our opinion that such a position would be honorable to princes of the blood royal, and all the more so for poor gentlemen like ourselves."

"Well, gentlemen, so be it!" said the King, with tears in his eyes. "Remain, and never forsake us!"

This is why these two young men, making a reality of their livery, and their acquired functions as couriers, took their places on the upper seat, as Choiseul closed the door of the coach.

"Gentlemen," said the King, "I give you positive orders to take me to Montmédy. — Postilions, — to Montmédy!" but a single voice, an immense voice, — the voice not of one community, but of ten communities together, — shouted: "To Paris! To Paris!"

Then, after a moment of silence, Billot pointed with his sabre in the direction to be followed, and said: "Postilions, to Clermont!"

The coach began to move in obedience to that order, but Louis the Sixteenth leaned out to speak a last word of protest: "I call you all to witness that I am constrained by violence."

Overcome by this last effort of will, which surpassed any he had previously made, the unhappy King sank back into the coach, between the Queen and Madame Elizabeth, while the carriage continued on its way. At the end of five minutes, before they had travelled two hundred steps, great cries were heard behind. On account of the positions which they occupied, and partly from their temperaments, the Queen was the first to thrust her head outside the curtain; but almost instantly she drew her head inside again, covering her eyes with both hands. "Oh, ill-fortune betides us! They have assassinated Choiseul!"

The King made a movement, but both his wife and sister held him back, and he sank down between them again. Besides, the coach just then turned a street-corner, and it was impossible to see more than twenty rods away.

This is what had happened. At Sausse's door Choiseul and Damas mounted their horses; but Romeuf's horse had disappeared, though it had been brought from the stables with the others. Romeuf, Floirac, and Adjutant Foucq therefore followed afoot, hoping either that some of the still faithful troopers would offer their own steeds, or that some horses might be found which had been abandoned by their masters, — faithless hussars and dragoons, who were busy fraternizing with the populace, and drinking the health of the Nation; but they had not walked fifteen rods when Choiseul, from his place beside the coach, saw that Romeuf, Floirac, and Foucq were in danger of being swallowed up, separated, suffocated in the crowd. Choiseul halted an instant, and let the coach pass on. Judging that Romeuf, by virtue of the mission wherewith he was charged, could be of most use to the royal family, and yet was in equal danger with his companions, he shouted to his servant, James Brisack, who was somewhere in the crowd: "My second horse for Monsieur de Romeuf!"

Hardly were the words spoken, when the mob surrounded him, shouting: "It 's the Duke! It 's Choiseul! It 's one of them as wanted to steal the King! Death to the Aristocrat! Death to the traitor!"

In such popular tumults we know with what rapidity the blow follows the word. Wrenched from his saddle, Choiseul fell backward, head over heels, and was swallowed in that terrible gulf, — the multitude, — out of which, in that epoch of mortal passion, a man could emerge only in lacerated pieces.

As he fell five men rushed to his rescue, — Damas, Floirac, Romeuf, Foucq, and James Brisack, — the Duke's special servant, — from whose hands the bridle which he held had been snatched, so that, his hands being thus freed, he could devote them to his master's service.

There was an instant of awful contest, — like one of those combats of antiquity, or among the Arabs of our own day, — around the bleeding bodies of the wounded and dead.

Contrary to all probabilities, but luckily for him, Choiseul was neither killed nor wounded; or rather, considering the dangerous weapons borne by the mob, his wounds were slight. With his musket-barrel, a gendarme parried a scythe sweep, destined for the Duke. A second cut was parried by James Brisack, with a stick snatched from another assailant's hand. The stick was cut in twain like a reed, but the blow was turned aside, and so wounded only the Duke's horse.

Then Adjutant Foucq shouted: "Dragoons, to the rescue!" Several soldiers ran forward at this cry. Ashamed to let the man be massacred who was their commander, they soon cleared a pathway to his side.

Romeuf sprang in front of them, crying: "In the name of the National Assembly, whose commissioner I am, and of General Lafayette, by whom I am deputed, take these gentlemen at once to the townhouse."

As these two names, Lafayette and the National Assembly, were then enjoying their greatest popularity, Romeuf's words produced their intended effect.

"To the townhouse! To the townhouse!" shouted many voices.

A determined effort was made by right-minded men, and soon Choiseul and his companions found themselves dragged towards the townhouse.

It required an hour and a half to reach there; and each minute of the ninety was a menace or foretaste of death. The slightest opening in the protective circle around the prisoners at once gave passage to the blade of a sabre, the point of a scythe, or the prongs of a pitchfork.

At last they reached the townhouse. Only one town official remained there, and he was completely upset by the responsibility laid upon him. By way of discharging that responsibility, he ordered Choiseul, Damas, and Floirac to be locked up, under the supervision of National Guardsmen. As Romeuf declared he would not quit Choiseul, who, for Romeuf's sake, had exposed himself to all that had happened, the official ordered him to the lockup, with the other three.

At a sign from the Duke, his servant, who was of too little consequence to receive much attention, vanished. His first care — let us not forget that James Brisack was a groom — was to look after the horses. He learned that some of them, almost safe and sound, were in a tavern, guarded by several hostlers. Reassured on this point he entered the eating-room, asked for some tea, a quill, and some ink, and wrote to Madame de Choiseul and Madame de Grammont, to assure them of the welfare of their son and nephew, who — in all human probability — was safe the moment he became a prisoner.

Poor James Brisack was far ahead of time in announcing this news. To be sure Choiseul was a prisoner. To be sure he was in the lockup. To be sure he was under the guard of the rural militia; but they forgot to station sentinels at the wicket of the cell, and through these loopholes the prisoners were several times fired upon, so that they were obliged to take refuge in the farthest corners. This precarious situation lasted twenty-four hours, during which Romeuf, with praiseworthy devotion, refused to quit his companions.

At last, however, the National Guards arrived from Verdun, and Romeuf had the three prisoners placed in their keeping; but he would not leave them till he received from the officers, who were to guard his friends, their solemn promise not to forsake the prisoners till they were safe in the custody of the High Court at Paris.

As to poor Isidore de Charny, his body was dragged to the house of a weaver, where he was shrouded by unfamiliar but pious hands, — less happy in this than his brother George, who at least received the last offices from the fraternal hands of the Count, and from the friendly hands of Gilbert and Billot.

Then Billot was a devoted and respectful friend of the family. We have seen how this friendship, devotion, and respect had changed into hatred, — a hatred as implacable as that friendship, devotion, and respect had been profound.

CHAPTER IV.

VIA DOLOROSA : STATION ONE.

As the terrible transit of Jesus, from the Mount of Olives to the Cross, is known as the Via Dolorosa, or Sorrowful Way, we may designate by that name the painful journey of the royal family to Paris, with each chapter as a station on that wearisome road.

Alas! Louis the Sixteenth and Marie Antoinette had also their Calvary! In their terrible suffering, — their passion, if we may apply to these human beings a word bearing a special and sacred significance, — were they expiating the accumulated faults of an overbearing monarchy, as Jesus the Christ atoned for the sins of a world? This is a problem not solved by the past, but perhaps the future will reveal its lesson.

The royal party advanced slowly, for the horses could only move as fast as the escort. This escort was largely made up of men, armed — as we have before said — with pitchforks, guns, scythes, sabres, pikes, and flails; but there were also large numbers of women and children, — the women often holding their children aloft, so that they could see the spectacle of a king carried by force to his capital city, a sight they were unlikely ever to behold again.

In the midst of this multitude, which flowed over the road, into the fields on both sides, was the King's big coach, followed by the cabriolet containing the ladies Brunier and Neuville, — the smaller vehicle tagging after the larger, like a shallop following a big ship into the jaws of perdition, amidst furious seas threatening to engulf them both.

From time to time some unexpected circumstance increased the fury of the storm, — if we may be permitted to follow out this metaphor. The outcries, menaces, and imprecations redoubled. The human waves were agitated like the sea, now rising into mountains, now sinking again. Sometimes this sea seemed to completely absorb the ship whose prow could hardly breast its way through the waves, and with it the victims which the vessel carried, and the frail shallop which followed in its wake.

They reached Clermont without seeing the terrible escort diminish, though the distance was about four leagues. Those men in it, whose occupations recalled them to their homes, were replaced by others who ran in from neighboring villages along the route, and who wished to enjoy the spectacle whereof the others were weary.

Among all the captives transported in this perambulatory prison two were particularly exposed to the anger of the crowd, and made the butt of its gibes and assaults. These two were the unfortunate guards, Malden and Valory, who were on the large outside seat. Every instant, — and this was one way of striking at the royal family, whose persons were held inviolable by an order from the National Assembly, — every instant bayonets were pointed at their bodies. Sometimes a scythe — which seemed like the legendary scythe of old Death himself — was lifted above their heads ; or a spear, gliding like a perfidious serpent between the two men, would strike the living flesh with its sharp tooth, and then as rapidly retreat, with its point wet and red, satisfied to show its master that the thrust had not failed of its sanguinary purpose.

All at once they were surprised to see, pushing his way through the crowd, a man hatless and unarmed, and with his clothes covered with mud. After respectfully saluting the King and Queen, he grasped the side of the coach, and drew himself up into the outside seat, between the two bodyguards.

The Queen uttered a cry of mingled fear, joy, and grief. She recognized Charny. Her fear arose from seeing him do such an audacious thing, for it was almost a miracle that he was able to gain so perilous a position without receiving a single wound. Her joy arose from her happiness in seeing that he had escaped the unknown dangers which he must have encountered in his flight that morning, — dangers which seemed all the greater, because, without being able to specialize any one of them, her imagination fancied him the victim of all. Yet she was sad, for she knew that Charny's return, in such a condition and alone, bade them renounce all hope of succor from General Bouillé.

The crowd, astonished at this man's audacity, seemed to respect him the more on that account.

Hearing the noise around the carriage, Billot, who was on horseback at the head of the escort, turned and recognized Charny, and said to himself: "Ah! I 'm glad nothing has happened to him; but woe to the foolhardy man who makes another such attempt, for he is sure to pay for both."

They arrived at Saint Menehould about two o'clock on that June afternoon.

The deprivation of sleep on the night of their departure from Paris, and the exertions and emotions of the night at Varennes, had powerfully affected all the party, but especially the Dauphin; and by the time they reached Saint Menehould, the poor child was in a very feverish condition. The King therefore commanded a halt.

Unhappily, of all the villages scattered along the route, Saint Menehould was the most enraged towards that unhappy family, thus held in captivity. No attention was paid to the King's order; but contradictory orders were given by Billot, that fresh horses should immediately be attached to the carriage, and Billot was obeyed.

The Dauphin wept, and asked, amidst his sobs: "Why don't they undress me, and put me in my nice bed, when I'm so ill?"

The Queen could not withstand these complaints, and her pride was broken down. She raised in her arms the weeping and shivering prince, and said, as she showed him to the people: "Ah, gentlemen, for the sake of this poor child, let us stop!" but the horses were already hitched to the coach, and Billot gave the command "Forward!" which was repeated by the populace.

As the farmer rode by the window, to once more take his place at the head of the escort, the Queen addressed him: "Ah, Monsieur! I repeat, — it is evident you have no children."

"And I repeat to you in my turn, Madame," said Billot, with gloomy look and voice, "that I have had one, but I have her no longer."

"Do what you will," said the Queen, "since you are the stronger; but have a care! for there are no voices crying louder for Heaven's vengeance than the voices of little children."

Again the procession started. The journey through the village of Saint Menehould was most painful. The excitement roused by the sight of Drouet, to whose exertions the arrest of the prisoners was due, would have been a pointed lesson for those prisoners, if kings were capable of learning anything; but in these popular outcries Louis the Sixteenth and Marie Antoinette could see only blind fury. In these Patriots, convinced that they were saving France, the King and Queen could see only rebels against lawful government.

The King was utterly cast down. The sweat of wrath and shame ran down the Queen's forehead. Madame Elizabeth, that heavenly angel astray on the earth, prayed in a low voice, — not for herself, but for her brother, her sister-in-law, her nephew, her niece, and all the people. In her prayer this saintly woman could not separate those whom she regarded as victims from those whom she looked upon as executioners, and in the same invocation she laid them all at the feet of her Lord.

At the entrance of Saint Menehould, the flood, which had covered all the plain like an inundation, could not force itself into the narrow streets, but surged out on both sides of the village. As the halt at Saint Menehould was only long enough, however, for a change of horses, the crowds came together again at the farther end of the town, and once more the human waves beat against the royal coach.

The King had been led to believe, — and this belief had perhaps impelled him forward in a wrong direction, — the King had been led to believe that the spirit of Paris alone was badly misguided, and he counted on provincial loyalty; yet here was the rural spirit, not only disappointing him, but turning pitilessly against him. These good country people had surprised Choiseul at Sommevelle Bridge, imprisoned Dandoins at Saint Menehould, driven Damas from Clermont by force of arms, and murdered Isidore under the King's own eyes. Everybody was stirred up to prevent his flight, even the priest whom Louis de Bouillé had overturned with the toe of his boot, in the highway; though of this exploit the King was ignorant, for it had occurred during the ride of General Bouillé's troopers, and Charny was the only man in the present company who could know anything about that little occurrence.

It would have seemed still worse to the King, if he could have seen what was going on in various villages and cities, when they heard the news of his arrest. In an instant the whole population was roused. Women carried in their arms their babes in swaddling-clothes. Mothers led by the hand children old enough to walk. Men armed themselves. Whatever weapons they could lay their hands upon, they suspended around their bodies, or carried on their shoulders. They came with a resolution, — not to serve as the King's escort, but to kill the King; that King who, in a certain time of harvest, — a harvest more sorrowful than that in poor Champagne, on the very edge of Châlons, which was so poverty-stricken, that, in their vulgar but expressive language, the people began to call the province lousy Champagne! — the King who, in that time of trouble, sent for their harvest, that it might be trodden under the feet of the horses of pillaging pandours and thieving hussars. Three angels protected the royal carriage, — the poor little Dauphin, ill and fretful in his mother's lap; Madame Royale, who, glowing with the beauty which accompanies the sandy complexion, stood upright at the carriage window, looking upon everything with a steadfast but surprised gaze; and finally Madame Elizabeth, already twenty-seven years old, whose purity of heart and body wreathed about her forehead an aureole of purest youth.

When they saw all this, the Queen bending over her sick boy, and the King so broken down, the anger of these men's wrath abated, and sought some other object of attack. They jeered at the guards, sneered at and insulted those noble and devoted hearts, — calling them cowards and traitors.

Upon the heads of the multitude, mostly bare, and heated by the bad wine of the taverns, poured the rays of a June sun, making a rainbow of flame on the cloud of chalky dust, raised by the immense rabble as it passed along.

Two anecdotes are recounted by Michelet, the poetic and picturesque historian, who even names the two heroes, as the dignity of his recital permits him to do. These anecdotes may illustrate our point.

What would the King, who was still under an illusion, have said, had he known that a man went from Mézières, with his gun on his shoulder, and walked sixty leagues in three days, on purpose to kill the King, when he returned to Paris? Yet when this man reached Paris, and saw the King, so poor, so unhappy, so humiliated, he shook his head, and renounced his project.

What would the King have said, if he had known about a certain young carpenter, who — not doubting, after the King's flight, that he would be immediately brought to trial and condemned — left the farthest border of Burgundy, and hurried along the roads, in order to be present at that trial and condemnation? On his way a master carpenter made him understand that it would take much longer time than he supposed, and urged him to remain and work with him. The young carpenter did stay with the old master, and married his daughter.

What Louis the Sixteenth did see was perhaps more significant, but no less awful; for we have shown how a triple buckler of innocence shielded him from wrath, but turned it against his attendants.

As they left Saint Menehould, when they were perhaps half a league (or a mile and a half) from the village, an old gentleman came galloping across the fields on horseback. He was a chevalier of the Order of Saint Louis, and wore its cross in his buttonhole. For a moment the crowd supposed the man had come out of simple curiosity, and made way for him. Hat in hand the old nobleman approached the carriage, saluting the King and Queen, and calling them by their royal titles; but the populace had begun to discover where genuine force and real majesty resided, and were indignant at this bestowal of empty honors upon the prisoners, — honors due to the Nation only, — and so they began to growl and threaten.

The King had learned to understand these growls. He had heard them at Varennes, and now divined their signification.

"Monsieur," he said to the old Knight of Saint Louis, "the Queen and myself are deeply touched by this mark of devotion, which you bestow upon us in this public manner; but in God's name go away, for your life is insecure!"

"My life is my King's," said the old nobleman, "and the last day of my life will be the more beautiful, if I die for my King!"

When these words were overheard, the growling grew louder.

"Retire, Monsieur, retire!" said the King. Then he added, leaning out of the carriage: "My friends, give place, I beseech you, to Monsieur de Dampierre!"

Those who were nearest, and heard the King's appeal, tried to stand aside, and make room for the Chevalier; but unfortunately, a little farther off, both horse and rider found themselves uncomfortably crowded. The old nobleman used bridle and spur to excite his horse, but the crowd was so compact as to be hardly able to control its own movements. Several terrified women screamed, a child bawled with fright, the men doubled their fists, and the old gentleman shook his whip at them all. Then the menaces changed to roars, and the wrath of the populace rose like a lion's. Monsieur de Dampierre was already on the edge of the human forest. He pricked his horse on both sides, and the animal bravely leaped the ditch, and started across the fields at a gallop. At that moment the old gentlemen turned. Doffing his hat he shouted, "God save the King!" — a last honor to his sovereign, but an insult to the populace.

A gunshot was heard. Pulling a pistol from his holster, Dampierre returned shot for shot. Then everybody who had a loaded musket fired on the deluded man. His horse fell, riddled with bullets. Was the owner wounded by this frightful discharge? No one knew. The multitude rushed like an avalanche towards the side where man and horse had fallen, fifty paces from the royal coach. Then followed one of those tumults, such as sometimes arise around corpses, — disorderly movements, a formless chaos, a sea of cries and shouts. Suddenly, on the end of a pike they saw rising a head, crowned with white hair. It was the unfortunate Dampierre's.

The Queen screamed, and sank back into the coach.

"Monsters! Cannibals! Assassins!" shouted Charny.

"Hold your tongue, Monsieur!" said Billot, "or I can't answer for your safety."

"So be it!" said Charny. "I 'm weary of life!

What worse can happen to me than to my poor brother?"

"Your brother," replied Billot, "was guilty, and you are not."

Charny made a motion to leap from his seat; but the two bodyguards held him back, and twenty weapons were thrust towards him.

"Friends," said Billot, with his strong and impressive tones, "whatever he does or says, this man," and he pointed to Charny, "I forbid you to harm a hair of his head. I must answer for him to his wife!"

"To his wife!" murmured the Queen, trembling as if one of the bayonets which threatened Charny had pierced her heart. "To his wife! And why so?"

Why? Billot could not himself have answered the question. He had invoked the name and face of Charny's wife, knowing how powerful are such domestic words over crowds of people, — made up, take them for all in all, of fathers and husbands.

CHAPTER V.

VIA DOLOROSA : STATION TWO.

THEY arrived late at Châlons. The coach drove into the courtyard of the superintendent's house, for couriers had been sent ahead to prepare lodgings. The courtyard was filled with National Guardsmen and newsmongers. It was necessary to make spectators stand aside, before the King could step out of his carriage. First he alighted. Then came the Queen, carrying the Dauphin in her arms; then Madame Elizabeth and Madame Royale, and finally Madame de Tourzel.

The instant Louis Sixteenth set foot on the stairs leading into the house a musket was discharged, and the bullet whistled by the King's ears. Was it fired with the intention of regicide, or was it a simple accident?

"Well," said the King, turning around with much coolness, "some awkward fellow let his gun go off!" Then he added, in a louder voice: "Take care, gentlemen, or we may have an accident!"

Without hindrance, Charny and the two bodyguards followed the royal prisoners, and entered the house behind them.

Apart from the unlucky gunshot, it already seemed to the Queen that she was in a milder atmosphere. At the door, when the tumultuous procession paused in its march, the shouts were stilled. A sort of compassionate murmur was heard when the royal family descended from their coach. When the prisoners reached the main story of the mansion, they found dinner served as sumptuously as possible under the circumstances, and with an elegance which made them look at each other in astonishment.

Two servants were in attendance, but Charny claimed for himself and the two bodyguards the privilege of serving the table. This humble position, which otherwise might appear singular, would enable the Count to stay at the King's side, be always at his door, and so hold himself ready for any emergency.

The Queen comprehended all this; but she did not turn towards him, or reward him with a gesture, a glance, or a single word. That saying of Billot's, "I must answer for him to his wife," was muttering like an incipient storm in the depths of Marie Antoinette's heart. Charny, whom she expected to carry away from France, — whom she hoped would be expatriated with her, — Charny must now return with her to Paris, and again meet Andrée.

On his side, Charny was ignorant of what was passing in the Queen's heart. He had forgotten he had ever heard these words. Besides, he began to entertain hopeful views of the present situation.

As we know, Charny had spent much time in exploring the route from Paris to Montmédy, and had thoroughly fulfilled his duty as advance agent. He therefore understood the spirit of this village. Châlons was an old town, where there was little business, — a town inhabited by retired tradesmen, noblemen, capitalists, people holding Royalist opinions.

One consequence of this was, that hardly were the august guests seated at dinner, when their host, the legal Intendant of the Department, entered, bowing respectfully to the Queen, who, expecting nothing agreeable, looked at him suspiciously, till he said: "Madame, there are some maidens of our village of Châlons, who beg the privilege of proffering some flowers to your Majesty."

Much surprised, the Queen turned to Madame Elizabeth and then to the King. "Flowers?" she said.

"Madame," replied the kind Intendant, "if the time is ill-chosen, or the request is too audacious, I will tell these girls not to come upstairs."

"Oh, no, no, Monsieur, but quite the opposite!" said the Queen. "Maidens? Flowers? Bring them right in!"

Then the Intendant withdrew; and in a moment a dozen girls, from fourteen to sixteen years old, appeared in the antechamber, and stopped before the open door.

"Come in, come in, my children!" cried the Queen, extending her arms.

One of the maidens — speaking not only for her companions, but for their families also, and for the whole town — had learned a beautiful little speech, which she was ready to repeat; but the Queen's welcome, her open arms, and the emotion displayed by the whole royal family so drove the address out of the poor girl's head, that it was lost in the general grief. She could find only tears, instead of the appointed words; and when she spoke, it was but to utter the commonplace sentiment: "Oh, your Majesty, what a misfortune!"

The Queen accepted the bouquet, and embraced the young girl.

While this was going on, Charny bent over the King's ear, and whispered: "Sire, perhaps something may be turned to our account in this place. All may not be lost. If your Majesty will grant me an hour's leave of absence, I'll go about the village, and afterwards render you an account of what I have seen and heard, and perhaps accomplished."

"Go, Monsieur," said the King, "but be prudent. If any misfortune happens to you, I shall never be able to console myself! Alas! It is enough that there should already be two deaths in one family!"

"Sire," responded Charny, "my life is the King's, as were the lives of my brothers!"

He left the room, but as he did so he dried a tear. It needed the presence of the royal family to make this man, with a heart so tender and true, appear as stoical as he pretended to be. When alone with himself, he was face to face with his sorrow.

"Poor Isidore!" he murmured, and pressed his hand on his breast, to see if his coat-pocket still contained the papers which Choiseul had brought to Charny from his brother's dead body, and which the Count meant to read, at the first feasible opportunity, as religiously as he would read a dying will and testament.

Behind the maidens, whom Madame Royale embraced as sisters, came their parents, who — as we have before said — were mostly old noblemen, and worthy citizens of the middle class. They entered modestly, humbly asking the privilege of paying their respects to their unhappy sovereigns. The King rose as they appeared; and in her sweetest tones the Queen bade them enter.

Were they at Châlons, or were they at Versailles? Was it possible that only a few hours had elapsed since the royal prisoners saw the unfortunate Monsieur de Dampierre torn in pieces under their very eyes?

In half an hour Charny came back. The Queen had seen him go out, and now noted his return; but the most piercing eye would have found it impossible to see in her face any indication of the effect of his exit and entrance upon her heart.

"Well?" said the King, leaning towards Charny's side.

"Well, Sire, all is for the best. The Châlons National Guards are willing to take your Majesty to Montmédy on the morrow."

"Then you have decided upon some plan?"

"Yes, Sire, with the principal leaders. To-morrow, before your departure, the King will demand the privilege of attending Mass. They cannot well refuse this request, as it is Corpus Christi Day. The coach will await the King at the church door. As he comes out to enter the coach, cheers for the King will resound; and amidst these cheers, the King will give orders to face about and drive towards Montmédy."

"Good!" said Louis. "Thanks, Monsieur de Charny. If nothing is changed before to-morrow, we will do as you say. — But go and get some repose, you and your companions, for you must need it even more than we do."

As may be easily understood, the reception of the maidens, the brave noblemen, and the good citizens did not last far into the night; and at nine the royal family retired.

When they entered their suite of chambers, the sight of a sentinel, stationed at the door, reminded both King and Queen that they were still prisoners, although the sentinel respectfully presented arms. By the precision with which he offered this homage to royalty, even though in captivity, the King saw that the sentinel was an old soldier; and so he asked: "Where have you served, my friend?"

"In the French Guards, Sire," responded the man.

"Then I am not surprised at seeing you here!" replied the King, in a dry tone; for Louis Sixteenth could not forget that on July 13, 1789, — at the time of the destruction of the Bastille nearly two years before, — the French Guards deserted to the popular side.

The royal couple entered their chambers, but this sentinel was at the very door of their bedroom.

An hour later, when relieved from guard, this sentinel asked for an interview with the chief of the escort. This chief was Billot. He was at supper in the street, with the men who had come thither from different towns along the route, and trying to persuade them to remain until the morrow; but the greater part of these volunteers, having seen what they came to see, — the King, — preferred to keep the feast of Corpus Christi in their own villages. Billot made an effort to retain them, because the Aristocratic disposition of the town worried him; but the brave rustics responded: "If we don't go home, who will celebrate the festival of the good Lord to-morrow, and hang the flags on our houses?"

This discussion was interrupted by the arrival of the sentinel, with whom Billot held a lively conversation. Then Billot sent after Drouet, and the conversation, animated and full of gestures, was renewed in a low voice. As a result of the consultation, Billot and Drouet went to the house of the post-superintendent, who was a friend of Drouet, — whose father, it will be remembered, held the same office at Saint Menehould. The post-superintendent at once saddled two horses, and in ten minutes Billot was galloping over the road to Rheims, and Drouet over the road towards Vitry le Français.

By daybreak hardly six hundred men belonging to the escort remained in Châlons; and those were the fiercest or the most exhausted, who had passed the night in the streets, on bundles of straw furnished them for that purpose. By the quivering rays of the first morning light, they could see a dozen men in uniforms, going into the Intendant's house (where the King was) from which they soon hurried out again.

Some of Villeroy's troops had been stationed at Châlons. A dozen of these gentlemen were still in the village, and it was they who had come to get Charny's orders. His orders were that they should put on their uniforms, and be at the church door on horseback, when the King came from Mass; and they went away to prepare for this duty.

As we have said, many of the peasants, who had helped to form the royal escort the evening before, did not go away immediately, because they were so worn out; but in the morning they counted the leagues. Some were ten leagues (nearly thirty miles) and some were even fifteen leagues from home; so one or two hundred set out at once, in spite of the opposition of their comrades. The faithful Patriots were therefore reduced to some four hundred or four hundred and fifty men, at the most.

Charny could count on an equal number of National Guardsmen, still devoted to the King, without reckoning the Royal Guards and the other officers, who were to form a sort of sacred battalion, ready to set a brave example of exposure to every kind of danger. Besides, as we know, the town was Aristocratic.

At six in the morning, those inhabitants most zealous for the Royalist cause were standing in the courtyard of the Intendant's house. Charny and his guards were in their midst, also in waiting.

The King rose at seven o'clock, and made known his intention of attending Mass. Search was made for Drouet and Billot, to make known the King's wish, but neither of them was to be found. Nothing was therefore in the way of the accomplishment of the royal desire. Charny went up to the King's room, and announced the absence of the two popular chiefs. In this the King rejoiced, but Charny shook his head. Though he did not know much about Drouet, he knew Billot thoroughly.

However, all the auguries proved favorable. The streets were full of people, but it was easy to see that they were sympathetic. As long as the shutters of the royal chambers were closed, the crowd circulated with quiet steps and little noise, in order not to disturb the sleep of the prisoners. They even raised their eyes and hands pitifully to Heaven. So numerous were these friendly watchers, that the four or five hundred peasants from the adjacent country, who had persisted in not returning to their own villages, seemed lost in their midst.

When the windows swung open in the chambers of the august pair, cries of "God save the King" and "God save the Queen" resounded with such energy that, without any interchange of thoughts on the subject, both Louis and Marie Antoinette appeared on their respective balconies. Then the cries became unanimous, and once more the two victims of destiny were confirmed in their illusions.

Said the King to his wife, speaking from one balcony to the other: "All seems to be going very well!" She lifted her eyes to Heaven, but did not respond.

At that moment a few strokes on the bell announced that the church was open. At the same time Charny rapped lightly on the chamber door. "All right," responded the King, "I am ready!"

Charny hastily glanced at his Majesty. He was calm and almost firm. He had suffered much, and through the force of suffering one might have said he had lost his irresolution.

The coach was at the door. The royal family entered it, surrounded by a crowd not much smaller than on the evening before; only, instead of insulting the prisoners, this crowd asked for a word or a look, and thought themselves happy if they could but touch the flaps of the King's coat, and were proud if they could kiss the hem of the Queen's skirts.

The three officers took their usual places on the outside seats. The coachman received orders to drive to the church, and he obeyed without a word. Indeed, who was there to give contrary orders, the two chiefs being still absent? Charny looked searchingly in every direction, but could see nothing of Billot or Drouet.

The peasantry took their usual place around the carriage, but the number of National Guards increased every moment, coming around each street corner by companies. When they reached the church Charny estimated that he had some six-hundred men at his disposal.

Places were reserved for the royal family, under a sort of canopy, and although it was only eight o'clock, the priests at once began the Mass. Perceiving this, Charny feared nothing but delay; for delay might prove fatal to their reviving hopes. He even warned the celebrant that it was absolutely essential that the Mass should not last over fifteen minutes.

"I understand," rejoined the priest, "and I pray God to accord to their Majesties a prosperous journey."

The Mass lasted precisely the time indicated, but twenty times Charny drew out his watch. The King could hardly conceal his impatience. The Queen, on her knees between the two children, leaned her head on the cushion of the prayer-desk. Madame Elizabeth, calm and serene as an alabaster Madonna, — either because she was ignorant of the latest project, or had already commended her own and her brother's lives to God's holy keeping, — gave no sign of impatience.

At last, turning to the congregation, the priest pronounced the closing sacramental words, — which indeed originally gave the name of Mass to this important service of the Roman Catholic Church, — Ite, missa est! (Go, it is done!); and descending from the altar, pyx in hand, he blessed, as he passed by, the royal family, who bowed, and responded a low Amen, to the desire formulated in the heart of the priest. With his disappearance into the sacristy the service was over.

Then they walked towards the door. All who had come to hear the Mass with them bent the knee as the royal family passed along. Their lips moved without speaking a word, but it was easy to conjecture for what those mute lips were praying.

At the door they found ten or a dozen guards on horseback. The Royalist escort began to assume colossal proportions. It was very evident, however, that the peasants, with their burly obstinacy, with their rude weapons, less mortal, perhaps, than those of the National Guards, but more terrible to the sight, — a third of them being armed with muskets, and the rest with knives and scythes, — it was evident that these peasants would be able, in a decisive moment, to turn the scale, by throwing their fatal weight into the balance.

It was not therefore without some fear that Charny leaned towards the King, to ask his orders, and said at the same time, by way of encouragement, "Let us move on, Sire!"

The King was decided. He leaned out of the carriage and said, addressing those nearest the window: "Gentlemen, yesterday, at Varennes, I was treated with violence. I gave orders to drive to Montmédy, but by force I was dragged towards a rebellious capital; but yesterday I was in the midst of rebels, whereas to-day I am among loyal subjects, and I repeat my order of yesterday! — To Montmédy, gentlemen."

"To Montmédy!" cried Charny. "To Montmédy!" repeated the guardsmen of Villeroy's company. "To Montmédy!" repeated every National Guardsman belonging in Châlons. Then there went up a general chorus: "God save the King! Long live the King!"

The carriage turned the corner of the street, and started to retrace its way over the road by which it had come the evening before.

Charny kept his eye on the peasantry from the outside villages. It seemed to him, in the absence of Drouet and Billot, that these rough peasants were commanded by the same French Guardsman who had been on duty at the King's door on the night previous. Every movement this man observed silently, but with a gloomy look which indicated that he did not greatly relish the proceedings. His peasant followers shared this man's anxious dissatisfaction; but they allowed the National Guardsmen (who, it will be remembered, were here on the royal side) to go on in front, while the peasants massed themselves together, forming a rear guard as alarming as it was strong.

In the first ranks of this rear guard marched men with pikes, pitchforks, and scythes. One hundred and fifty men followed them, armed with guns. This manœuvre, as well executed as it would have been by troops accustomed to such exercises, made Charny restless; but he had no excuse for opposing it, nor could he even ask an explanation, under such circumstances.

The explanation, however, came soon enough. As they advanced towards the town gate, it seemed as if they could hear — despite the shouts and bustle which accompanied the coach, and the noise made by the carriage itself — a dull and distant sound, which slowly increased in volume.

Suddenly Charny grew pale. Touching the knee of the bodyguard next him he said: "All is lost!"

"Why so?" asked the bodyguard.

"Don't you know that noise?"

"The drum-beat? What then?"

"Well, you 'll see!" said Charny.

At that instant they turned a corner, into a square where two roads met, — one leading from Rheims, and the other from Vitry le Français. Through these two streets, with drums beating and flags waving, advanced two large companies of National Guards, one numbering some eighteen hundred, and the other from twenty-five hundred to three thousand. Each of these companies was commanded by a man on horseback. One of these was Billot; the other was Drouet. Charny needed only to note the direction followed by each troop, in order to understand everything. The absence of Drouet and Billot, heretofore inexplicable, was now explained but too clearly. Forewarned of the blow planned at Châlons, they had undoubtedly started off suddenly, one to hasten the approach of the National Guards from Rheims, and the other to call out the National Guards at Vitry le Français. Their measures being well concerted, both companies arrived at the same time. They ordered their men to halt in the square, which was thus entirely closed up. Without any other demonstration, the order was given to load their guns.

The royal party paused. The King put his head out of the window. He saw Charny with his face pale and his teeth clinched.

"What is it?" asked the King.

"Our enemies have obtained reinforcements. They are there, facing us, with their guns loaded. Moreover, in the rear of the Châlons Guards, who are our friends, are those terrible peasants, with their guns also loaded."

"What do you think of it, Monsieur de Charny?"

"I think we are between two fires. That will not prevent our pressing on, if you say the word, Sire; but how far your Majesty would go, I dare not say."

"Very well, let us go back!" said the King.

"Your Majesty has so decided?"

"Already too much blood has been spilled for me, blood which I mourn with bitter tears. I do not wish a drop more should be shed. — We will return, I say."

At these words the two young fellows on the outside seats jumped down to the doors, and the Villeroy Guards ran up. These brave and ambitious military men asked nothing better than to have a fight with the common people; but the King repeated his order, more positively than before.

"Gentlemen," said Charny, in a high and imperative voice, "let us return! The King so commands." Himself grasping the bridle of one horse, he had the heavy coach turned square about.

At the gate leading towards Paris, the Châlons National Guards, being no longer of any use, gave up their places to the peasants, and to the National Guards from Vitry and Rheims.

"Do you think I have done right, Madame?" asked Louis of Marie Antoinette.

"Yes, Monsieur," responded she; "but I think Monsieur de Charny obeyed you very readily."

So speaking, she fell into a gloomy revery, which had little to do with the situation in which they found themselves, terrible as it seemed.

CHAPTER VI.

VIA DOLOROSA : STATION THREE.

THE coach was following sadly the road to Paris, under the supervision of the two forbidding men who compelled the royal party to retrace their steps, when between Épernay and Dormans, Charny — thanks to his stature, as well as the elevation of the seat which he occupied — saw another carriage coming from Paris at full gallop, drawn by four posthorses.

Charny immediately guessed that this carriage was bringing some grave news, or contained some important personage. When this carriage met the advance guard of the escort, two or three words were exchanged, and then the ranks were opened, and the advance men respectfully presented arms. The King's carriage halted, and loud cries were heard, myriad voices repeating at the same time : " Hurrah for the National Assembly ! " The arriving carriage then continued on its way, till it was abreast of the royal coach, when three men, two of whom were completely unknown to the august prisoners, descended from it.

The third had hardly shown his head at the window when the Queen murmured in her husband's ear : " Monsieur de Latour Maubourg, the tool of Lafayette ! " Then she added, with a dubious shake of the head : " This presages no good for us ! "

The eldest of the three men came forward, and brutally pulled opened the door of the royal carriage, as he said: "I'm Pétion; and here are Barnave and Latour Maubourg, who are sent, like myself, on the part of the National Assembly, to serve as your escort, and see that the anger of the people does n't make them take the law into their own hands. Squeeze up a little, and make room for us."

The Queen shot upon the Chartres Deputy and his two companions one of those disdainful glances which sometimes fell from the lofty pride of the daughter of Maria Theresa. Latour Maubourg, a courteous gentleman of the Lafayette school, could not endure this look; so he said: "Their Majesties are already crowded in this coach. As for me, I'll go in the second carriage."

"Ride where you please," said Pétion. "As for me, my place is in this coach, with the King and Queen!" and thus speaking, he stepped into their carriage.

In the rear seat were the King, Queen, and Madame Elizabeth. Pétion looked from one to the other. Then he said to Madame Elizabeth: "Excuse me, Madame, but, as representative of the Assembly, the place of honor belongs to me. Be kind enough to rise and take the front seat."

"What a speech!" murmured the Queen.

"Monsieur!" said the King.

"Certainly!" said Pétion. "Come, Madame, get up, and give me your place."

Madame Elizabeth rose and yielded her place, making a sign of resignation to her sister-in-law and brother.

Meanwhile Maubourg slipped away, and asked a place with the two ladies in their cabriolet; but he did so with more courtesy than Pétion vouchsafed to the royal family. Barnave remained outside, hesitating to jam into a carriage already uncomfortably crowded with seven persons.

"Well, Barnave," said Pétion, "are n't you coming?"

"But where can you put me?" said Barnave, somewhat embarrassed.

"Would you like my place?" asked the Queen, sharply.

"I thank you, Madame," responded Barnave, feeling wounded, "but the other seat is good enough for me."

Madame Elizabeth drew Madame Royale nearer to herself, while the Queen took the Dauphin on her knees. In this way they made room on the front seat, and Barnave found himself face to face with the Queen, and knee to knee.

"Now we 're ready, so go ahead!" said Pétion, without asking the King's permission ; and the procession moved on once more, amidst cheers for the National Assembly.

In the personality of Barnave and Pétion, the People now rode in the royal chariot, for they had won their right so to do on the Fourteenth of July and the Fifth and Sixth of October.

There was a moment of silence, which each of the travellers gave to self-examination, — except Pétion, who was so encased in rudeness as to seem indifferent to everybody. Let us take the opportunity to say a few words about the personages now brought more intimately upon the scene.

Jerome Pétion, often called Villeneuve, was a man of about thirty-two, with vigorous traits of character. His sole merit lay in the elevation, purity, and integrity of his political principles. He was born at Chartres, where he was admitted to practice as an advocate, and then sent to Paris as a Deputy to the National Assembly, in 1789. He was destined in a few months to be elected Mayor of Paris, and to enjoy a popularity which eclipsed that of either Bailly or Lafayette ; and it was subsequently his fate to die in the woods of Bordeaux, perhaps devoured by wolves. His friends called him the Honest Pétion. He and Camille Desmoulins were already Republicans, when nobody else in France as yet proclaimed those principles.

Pierre Joseph Marie Barnave was born at Grenoble, and was now hardly thirty years old. Being elected to the National Assembly, he at once acquired a great reputation and wide-spread popularity, by entering the lists with Mirabeau, when the reputation and popularity of the Deputy from Aix were waning. All the enemies of the great orator, — and Mirabeau rejoiced in the usual privilege of men of genius, that of making an enemy of mediocrity, — Mirabeau's enemies were sure to be Barnave's friends, and they sustained him, encouraged him, stimulated him, in the stormy fights which accompanied the last days of the illustrious tribune.

He was — we speak of Barnave — a young man of hardly thirty at this period, and did not appear over twenty-five, with his blue eyes, his large mouth, his sharp voice, and his upturned nose. In person he was elegant. Aggressive and a duellist, he seemed like some young military captain in the garb of a tradesman. His aspect was cool, hard, and sinister; but he was better than his looks indicated. He belonged to the party of Royal Constitutionalists.

While he was taking his place in the forward seat, opposite the Queen, the King said: "Gentlemen, I begin at once by telling you, it was never my intention to quit the kingdom."

Barnave, half seated, stopped, and looked at the King. "Are you speaking the truth, Sire?" he asked. "If so, that assertion may save France!" and then he sat down.

Now something strange passed between that man, a middle-class citizen from a small provincial city, and that woman, descended from one of the greatest dynasties in the world, and occupying half of one of its grandest thrones. Each tried to read the other's heart, not like two enemies, trying to discover state secrets, but like a man and woman, probing the mysteries of passionate love.

Whence came to Barnave's heart this surprising sentiment, which the piercing eye of Marie Antoinette discovered after a few minutes of study? This is what we are going to tell, bringing to light one of those heart-tablets which belong to the secret legends of history, but outweigh a legion of the official documents which refer to the great crises of destiny.

Barnave was ambitious to be, in all things, the successor and heir of Mirabeau. In his own mind, the mantle of the great orator had already fallen upon his shoulders. One point, however, was not yet scored. In the eyes of all — though we know how little there was in the prevalent opinion — Mirabeau had the reputation of being specially honored by the confidence of the King and the good-will of the Queen. The single audience, which took place at the palace of Saint Cloud, was exaggerated into several secret conferences, in which Mirabeau's presumption was represented as reaching the point of audacity, and the condescension of the Queen as amounting to feebleness; for at that day it was the fashion, not only to slander poor Marie Antoinette, but also to believe such calumnies.

Now Barnave's ambition was to be in all things Mirabeau's successor; and on this account he had procured his nomination as one of the three commissioners sent to meet the King. Being so appointed, he came hither with the self-assurance of a man who knows that he has power to inspire hatred, even if he lacks the talent to make himself loved.

Nearly all this the Queen was able to read, with a glance of her feminine eye; and she divined one thing more, — the actual preoccupation of Barnave with herself. Five or six times in the space of the first quarter-hour while Barnave was face to face with her, the young Deputy examined, with scrupulous attention, the three men who were on the rear outside seat of the coach; and after each glance his look became harder and more hostile towards the Queen. The fact was, Barnave knew that one of these three men — but which, he was not sure — was Charny, and public gossip gave Charny the credit of being the Queen's absolute lover.

So much the Queen surmised, and from the moment of this surmise she was stronger; for she now knew the flaw in her adversary's coat of mail, and she had only to strike home when she chose.

"Monsieur," she said, addressing the King, "you heard what the man said who directs our journey?"

"On what subject, Madame?" asked the King.

"In regard to Monsieur de Charny."

Barnave trembled; and this tremor did not escape the notice of the Queen, whose knee was in contact with his.

"Did n't he declare," said the King, "that he took upon himself the responsibility of the Count's life?"

"Precisely, Monsieur; and he added, that he must answer for him to the Countess."

Barnave half closed his eyes, but listened so as not to lose a syllable of what the Queen was saying.

"What then?" asked the King.

"Well, Monsieur, the Count's wife is my old friend, Andrée de Taverney. Don't you think it will be well, on our return to Paris, if I give leave of absence to Monsieur de Charny, so that he may comfort his wife? He has run great risks. His youngest brother was killed in our defence. I think that to ask a continuation of his services in the royal household, Sire, would be a cruel separation of a loving pair."

Barnave breathed hard and reopened his eyes.

"You are right, Madame," responded the King; "though, to tell the truth, I doubt if Charny will accept this dismission."

"In that case, Sire," said the Queen, "we shall all of us have done our duty, — we in offering him leave of absence, and Charny in refusing it."

As by some magnetic influence the Queen turned aside Barnave's irritation; and at the same time his generous heart accused himself of injustice towards this woman, and he felt ashamed as he looked her in the face. Hitherto Barnave had held his head high and insolent, like a magistrate before a culprit, whom he has the right to judge and condemn; but now that culprit, responding to his mental accusation, which she could not have guessed, spoke a word which was the outcome either of innocence or regret; and why not of innocence?

"We should do this all the more," continued the Queen, "because we did not mean to carry Monsieur de Charny forever with us; and, as for me, I supposed him to be quiet in Paris, when I suddenly saw him appear at the door of our coach."

"True," said the King; "and that shows you that the Count has no need to be stimulated in the performance of what he believes to be his duty."

She was innocent, — there was no doubt of it! Oh how glad Barnave would have been to ask pardon of the Queen, for his evil thoughts about the woman.

Should he speak to the Queen? He dared not. Wait till the Queen first spoke to him? But the Queen, satisfied with the effect produced by the few words already spoken, said nothing more.

Barnave had become amiable, almost humble. With a look he implored her regard; but she appeared to take no notice of him.

This young man was in a nervously ecstatic condition, when, to attract the notice of an indifferent woman, he would have undertaken the twelve labors of Hercules, at the risk of being overcome by the first.

He begged the Supreme Being, — in 1791 they no longer asked anything of God, — he begged the Supreme Being to send him some occasion for drawing towards himself the notice of this royal icicle, when suddenly — as if the Supreme Being had heard this silent prayer which had been raised to him — a poor priest, who was waiting on the side of the road for a chance of seeing the august prisoners, raised his suppliant hands and tear-filled eyes to Heaven, and exclaimed: "Sire, God watch over your Majesty!"

It was some time since the rabble had found any pretext for wrath, or any object to vent it upon. No similar occasion had presented itself since they had torn in pieces the old Chevalier of Saint Louis, whose head was still borne in the procession, on the end of a pike. Another such occasion now offered itself, and they earnestly seized it.

To the old priest's gesture, and the blessing he invoked, the rabble responded by hooting. In an instant they threw themselves on the priest, and before Barnave came out of his revery, the priest was thrown down, and was likely to be slashed into pieces, when the frightened Queen cried out to Barnave: "Oh Monsieur, don't you see what they 're doing?"

Barnave raised his head, glanced at the human ocean wherein the poor priest had almost disappeared, and which was surging in tumultuous and growling waves about the coach.

Seeing what was the matter he exclaimed : "You wretches!" and threw himself so violently against the door that it flew open, and he would have tumbled out, if by one of the customary prompt movements of Madame Elizabeth's heart, she had not caught him by the flap of his coat.

"You tigers!" he went on. "You're no longer Frenchmen! Have the French people, once so brave, become assassins?"

To us this apostrophe may seem somewhat pretentious, but it was in accordance with the taste of the times. Besides, Barnave represented the National Assembly. By his voice the supreme power of the State was speaking. The rabble recoiled and the old priest was saved.

He rose, saying: "You have done well to save me, young man; an old man will pray for you!" and making the sign of the cross, he went away.

The rabble let him pass, controlled by Barnave's gesture and look, for the Deputy seemed like a statue of Law and Order.

When the old man was far away, the young Deputy reseated himself naturally and contentedly, — not with the air of a man who knows that he has saved another man's life.

"I thank you, Monsieur!" said the Queen; and these few words thrilled Barnave through and through.

Beyond contradiction, during all the long period in which we have kept company with the unhappy Marie Antoinette, she was never more touching than now, though she had been more beautiful. Instead of being enthroned as a Queen, she was now enthroned as a mother.

On her left was the Dauphin, a charming child with blond hair, who had moved, with all the carelessness of his age, from the lap of his mother to the knees of the virtuous Pétion, who was still sufficiently human to play with the child's curly locks.

At her right was her daughter, Madame Royale, who seemed like a portrait of her mother in the flower of her youth and beauty.

Marie Antoinette herself, instead of a crown of royal gold, wore a crown of misery's thorns. Above her black eyes and white forehead, in the midst of her magnificent blond hair, glistened a few silvery threads, which had come prematurely, and which spoke more eloquently to the heart of the young Deputy than the most plaintive verbal appeal could have done. He contemplated this royal grace, and was ready to fall on his knees before this waning Majesty, when the young Dauphin uttered a cry of pain.

The child had annoyed the virtuous Pétion with some little act of playfulness, which Pétion thought proper to punish by a vigorous pull of the boy's ear.

The King grew red with anger, and the Queen grew white with mortification. She extended her arms, and took the little fellow from Pétion's knees; and as Barnave started to do the same thing, the Dauphin was lifted by their four arms, and being drawn towards Barnave, found himself on that gentleman's knees.

Marie Antoinette wished to draw the child into her own lap again, but the little fellow said, "No, I am very comfortable here!" and as Barnave, who saw the Queen's purpose, separated his arms to let her carry it into execution, she — was it through the coquetry of the mother or the seductiveness of the woman? — left the young prince where he was.

At that moment there was an indescribable feeling in Barnave's heart. He was both proud and happy, all at once.

The child began to play with Barnave's shirt-frill, then with his belt, and finally with the buttons on the coat of his uniform as Deputy.

These buttons specially attracted the boy, for they bore a graven device. The Dauphin read the letters, one after the other; and then, putting them together, he made out these four words: Live free, or die.

"What does that mean, Monsieur?" he asked.

Barnave hesitated how to reply; but Pétion explained it: "That means, little chap, that the French people have sworn never to have another master. Do you understand that?"

"Pétion!" cried Barnave.

"Well," replied Pétion, as naturally as possible, "explain the device otherwise, if it has any other meaning."

Barnave was silent. That device, which last evening seemed sublime to him, appeared cruel in their present situation; but he took the Dauphin's hand, and kissed it respectfully.

The Queen wiped away a furtive tear, which had crept from her heart to her eyelids.

The coach, the scene of this strange little drama, — simple to the point of juvenility, — continued to roll along, amidst the growling of the crowd, — bearing to their deaths six of the eight persons it contained.

Presently they reached Dormans.

CHAPTER VII.

VIA DOLOROSA : STATION FOUR.

At Dormans nothing had been prepared for the reception of the royal family, who were therefore forced to stop at an inn.

Either by the order of Pétion, whom the reticence of the royal couple had deeply wounded during the journey, or else because the tavern was really full, there were only three attics in which the august prisoners could install themselves.

As they dismounted, Charny, according to his custom, wished to approach the King and Queen, and receive their orders; but by a glance the Queen indicated to him that he was to remain aloof. Without knowing the cause of this unspoken command, the Count hastened to obey.

It was Pétion who first entered the inn, and took upon himself the duties of quarter-master. He did not give himself the trouble of coming out again, but left it for one of the servants to announce to the royal family that their rooms were in readiness.

Barnave was greatly embarrassed. He was dying with anxiety to get out next, and so offer his arm to the Queen; but he feared lest the woman who had formerly jeered at etiquette, in the person of Madame de Noailles, might also laugh at him; so Barnave relinquished his purpose, and only waited.

First the King left the coach, leaning on the arms of his two bodyguards, Malden and Valory. As has been already stated, Charny stood apart, at a sign from Marie Antoinette.

Then the Queen stepped out, and extended her arms to take the Dauphin ; but as if the poor child had an intuitive sense of the benefit his mother might derive from such tact and flattery, he said : "No, I want to stay with my friend Barnave."

Marie Antoinette nodded assent, accompanied by a pleasant smile. Barnave waited for Madame Elizabeth and Madame Royale to alight ; and then he followed them, still holding the Dauphin.

Madame de Tourzel came next, hoping to reclaim her royal pupil from the plebeian hands which held him ; but a new sign from the Queen calmed the aristocratic ardor of the governess of France's royal children.

The Queen mounted the winding and slippery stairs, leaning on her husband's arm. At the main story she paused, supposing that twenty stairs must be far enough ; but the waiter cried, "Higher, higher !" and on this adjuration she continued to ascend.

Barnave's forehead perspired with shame. "What, higher ?" he asked.

"Yes," said the waiter. "On this story are only the dining-room, and the apartments for the gentlemen from the National Assembly."

Barnave's eyes gleamed with anger. Pétion had reserved the main apartments on the second story for himself and colleagues, and had relegated the royal family to the third, or upper story. However, the young Deputy said nothing ; but, dreading the Queen's first movement, when she should see the mansard chambers, — destined for herself and her family by Pétion, — when he reached the upper staircase, Barnave set the child down on the landing.

"Madame, Madame!" cried the little prince to his mother, "my friend Barnave is going away."

"He does well," said the Queen, laughingly, as she glanced at their new apartments.

As we have said, in this suite there were only three small rooms, connected together.

The Queen took possession of the first, with Madame Royale. The second was taken by Madame Elizabeth, for herself, the Dauphin, and Madame de Tourzel. The third — which was little more than a closet, with a side door opening upon the stairway — was left for the King.

As Louis was tired he wished to lie down a few minutes, while waiting for supper; but the bed was so short, that he was presently obliged to get up again. Opening the door, he called for a chair. Malden and Valory were already at their post on the staircase. Malden, who was nearest the door, went down, took a chair from the dining-room, and brought it up to the King. There was already one wooden chair in his closet; so Louis arranged the second chair, brought him by Malden, in such a way as to make the bed long enough to accommodate his height.

"Oh Sire!" said Malden, clasping his hands and sadly shaking his head, "can you manage to pass the night in this way?"

"Certainly, Monsieur," said the King. Then he added: "If the cries which reach my ears about my people are true, how many of my subjects would rejoice even in this closet, with its bedstead and two chairs!" and he stretched himself on this improvised couch, a prelude to the long days of privation in the Temple, where he was afterwards imprisoned.

An instant later somebody came to say that supper was spread for their Majesties. The King went downstairs, and saw that the table was laid for six.

"Why are there six plates?" he asked.

The waiter replied: "There is one for the King, one for the Queen, one for Madame Elizabeth, one for Madame Royale, one for Monseigneur the Dauphin, and one for Monsieur Pétion."

"And why not one for Monsieur Barnave and one for Monsieur Latour Maubourg?" asked the King, sarcastically.

"So there were, Sire," replied the waiter; "but Monsieur Barnave ordered them taken away."

"And left Monsieur Pétion's?"

"Monsieur Pétion so insisted."

Just then the more than grave face — the austere face — of the Chartres Deputy appeared, framed in the doorway. The King seemed not to notice him, and said to the waiter: "I never go to the table, except with my family. We eat only together, or with those whom we invite. Otherwise we never sit down."

"I was well aware," said Pétion, "that his Majesty had forgotten the first article of the Declaration of Human Rights; but I supposed he might pretend to remember it."

The King pretended not to hear Pétion, as he had pretended not to see him, and, with a movement of his eyes and brow, ordered the waiter to lift the covers. The waiter obeyed, and Pétion went away in a furious mood.

"Monsieur de Malden," said the King, "shut the door, so that we may be alone, if possible."

Malden also obeyed, and Pétion heard the door close behind him. So the King really had a family dinner, the two bodyguards serving him, as was now their custom.

As to Charny, he did not appear. If no longer the Queen's cavalier, he was still her slave; but there were moments when his passive obedience grieved her woman's heart, and during the supper she impatiently looked for him; for she wished, after obeying her momentarily, that he would begin to disobey.

As supper ended, and the King pushed back his chair, to rise from the table, the door opened, and the waiter came in to beg their Majesties, in the name of Monsieur Barnave, to occupy his apartments on the main floor, in place of their own attics.

Louis and Marie Antoinette looked at each other. Should they stand upon their dignity, and repel the courtesy of one, in order to resent the impertinence of the other? Perhaps this was in the King's mind; but the Dauphin ran into the parlor, calling: "Where is my friend Barnave?"

The Queen followed her boy, and the King followed his wife; but Barnave was not in the parlor. Thence she went into the bedrooms, and found there were three, as in the attic above. Though not elegantly furnished, they were comfortable. To be sure, the candles burned in copper candelabra, but there were plenty of them.

Two or three times during the day's journey the Queen expressed her delight as they passed beautiful flower-gardens. Now she found her chamber embellished with the most beautiful blossoms of summer, while at the same time the open windows permitted the too pungent odors to escape. Muslin curtains, across the openings of the windows, shielded the fair prisoner from all indiscreet eyes.

It was Barnave who had taken all this care. She sighed, the poor Queen; for six years earlier it was Charny who attended to all these little matters in her behalf. However, Barnave had delicacy enough not to present himself for thanks. This also was precisely like Charny. How was it that a petty country lawyer could be as delicate and devoted in his attentions, as the most distinguished and elegant gentleman of her Court? In all this there was much to make any woman dream, even if that woman was a queen; and Marie Antoinette did dream over this mystery, during a considerable part of the night.

Meanwhile, what had become of Count Charny? As we have seen, he quietly withdrew at a sign from the Queen, and did not reappear. Although duty enchained him to the steps of Louis Sixteenth and Marie Antoinette, Charny was rejoiced at his dismissal by the Queen, — not even asking the cause of it, — because it gave him some time for solitude and reflection. Throughout the last three days he had lived at lightning speed. He had lived outside of himself, so to speak, — lived so entirely for others, that he was not sorry to drop their burdens awhile, and think of his own sorrows.

He was a gentleman of the old school, and the head of his family. He adored his brothers, to whom he was rather a father than an elder brother.

At George's death the Count's grief had been very great; but at least he had been able to kneel over George's dead body, in that small and dark courtyard at Versailles, and expend his grief in tears; and then there remained to him his second brother, to whom his entire affection was transferred, — Isidore, who had become dearer to him than before, if that were possible, during the months of Oliver's absence at Metz, — and preceding his final departure with the King, — when the younger man had acted as a go-between for the Count and Andrée.

Though we cannot fully explain the mystery, we have tried to show how certain hearts grow warmer, instead of colder, when they are separated, as if absence furnished fresh material for memory to dwell upon. Even a certain English poet has said: "Absence makes the heart grow fonder."

The less Charny saw of Andrée the more he thought about her; and to think more and more of Andrée, was to love her.

Indeed, when he was near Andrée, when he saw Andrée, it seemed to him purely and simply as if he were near a statue of ice, who would melt at the least touch of the rays of love's amorous sunshine, and who retired into the shade, as if fearful lest the sun should find her out. When they met he was brought into contact with her cool and moderate gestures, with her grave and careful reticence, with her voiceless and veiled look. Behind her gestures, behind her words, behind her glances he did not penetrate, — or, to speak more accurately, he caught a glimpse of nothing. Her whole personality seemed white, pale, and dull as alabaster, and as cold and impenetrable.

Except at rare intervals of animation, brought about by painful situations, it was thus Andrée always appeared during their latter interviews, and especially in the interview he had with that unhappy woman, in her pavilion in Rue Coq Heron, the evening when she recovered and again lost her son; though of her relation to Sebastien, her husband was utterly ignorant.

When away from her, distance produced its usual effect, and lent "enchantment to the view," by softening the more glaring colors and smoothing the sharper edges. Then Andrée's languid and frigid motions seemed to him more vivacious. Then her calm and subdued voice became sonorous as a bell. Then her quiet and shy glances gave place to a passionate and kindling flame, which shot from beneath her long lashes. Then it seemed as if an interior fire illuminated the soul of this statue, through whose alabaster flesh he could see the circling blood and palpitating heart.

It was in these moments of solitude that Andrée became indeed and in truth the Queen's rival in Charny's heart. In the feverish obscurity of night Charny would behold the walls of his chamber open and the tapestry recede; and then he would behold this transparent statue, — the flame in her soul radiating light all around her, — approach his bed with extended arms, whispering lips, and an eye moist with love. Then Charny also would extend his arms; then he would speak to the sweet vision; then he would try to press the phantom to his heart; but, alas! the phantom always escaped him; he embraced only vacancy, and sank from his elusive dream into the sad and cold reality.

Isidore had become more dear to Charny than ever George had been; and, as we know, the Count had not even the melancholy joy of weeping over Isidore's dead body, as he had over George's. Both, one after the other, had died for that fateful woman, — for that monarchical cause, so full of pitfalls. For the same woman, and into a similar abyss, Charny must certainly fall in his turn.

For two days since the death of his brother, since their last interview, which left his garments stained with Isidore's blood, and his lips warm with the victim's last sigh, since the hour when Choiseul placed in the Count's hands the papers discovered on Isidore's body, Charny had hardly found a moment in which he could give way to his personal grief.

The Queen's gesture, which bade him remain away from her, he had welcomed as a favor, and accepted with joy. Thereafter he searched for some corner, some nook, some retreat, where he could be near the royal door, ready to aid the royal family at the first appeal, the first outcry, and nevertheless be alone with his sorrow, in privacy with his tears.

Now he found an attic room, situated at the top of the staircase, where we saw Malden and Valory on duty. Once there, alone and shut away from the world, — seated before a table, lighted by one of those copper lamps, with three burners, which are still to be found in old country-houses, — he drew from his pocket those blood-stained papers, his sole relics of his brother.

With his forehead in his hands, and his eyes fixed on these letters, containing the thoughts of him who was no more, Charny took no note of time, while the overflowing and silent tears fell from his cheeks to the table.

At last he sighed, raised his head, took up one letter, and opened it. It was from poor Catherine. For several months Charny had suspected his brother's relations to the farmer's daughter; and Billot had related to the Count further details thereof, in their interview at Varennes; but it was not till after listening to the farmer's recital that he gave to the affair the importance it deserved, and allowed it to influence his mind.

This interest was increased by the perusal of this letter. Therein he saw how the title of mistress had been rendered sacred by the title of mother; and in the simple terms by which Catherine acknowledged her love, he could see that the whole life of the woman must expiate the fault of the girl.

A second letter he opened, and then a third. In each there were the same plans for the future, the same hopes of happiness, the same maternal joys, the same loving fears, the same griefs, the same regrets.

In the midst of these letters Charny suddenly came upon one whose handwriting impressed him strangely. It was Andrée's writing, for she herself had written the superscription. To this letter a square folded paper was attached by a waxen seal, which bore Isidore's coat of arms. This letter, in Andrée's writing, — addressed to Charny, yet found among Isidore's papers, — appeared to the Count so singular, that he began by opening the annexed billet, before opening the letter itself.

This billet was written in pencil, probably on some tavern table, while they were saddling a horse, and contained the following lines:

This letter is not addressed to me, but to my brother, Count Oliver. It is written by his wife, the Countess.

If anything happens to me, whoever finds this paper is requested to send it to my brother, or else return it to the Countess.

I received it from her with the following instructions:

If in the enterprise in which we are engaged the Count is successful, and no mishap befalls him, the letter is to be returned to the Countess.

If he is grievously wounded, but not unto death, he is to be requested to grant his wife the favor of letting her come to him.

Finally, if he is wounded unto death, this letter is to be given him; and if he cannot read it himself, it is to be read to him, in order that he may know, before he dies, the secret it contains.

If her letter is sent to my brother Oliver, undoubtedly he will receive this note at the same time, and he will act in regard to these three requests as his sense of delicacy may dictate.

I commend to his care poor Catherine Billot, who lives in the town of Ville d'Avray, with my babe.

ISIDORE DE CHARNY.

At first the Count appeared entirely absorbed in the perusal of his brother's letter. His tears, which had been dried for a moment, began once more to roll down his cheeks in abundance. Then he once more turned his misty eyes to Madame de Charny's letter. After a long look he carried it to his lips, and pressed it against his heart, as if thus it might communicate the secret it contained. Then he again read — once, twice, thrice — the requests Isidore's note contained, and said, in a low voice, shaking his head: "I have no right to open this letter, but I will supplicate her to let me read it."

As if to encourage himself in this resolution, impossible to a heart less loyal than his, he repeated his words: "No, I will not read it!"

Indeed he did not read it; but daylight surprised him sitting at the same table, devouring with his gaze the superscription on that letter, damp with his breath, so often had he pressed it to his lips.

Suddenly, amidst the noise in the tavern announcing preparations for departure, he heard Malden's voice calling him.

"I am here!" responded the Count; and pressing poor Isidore's papers once more into his coat-pocket, he again kissed the unopened letter, placed it near his heart, and hastened down the stairs.

On the way he met Barnave, who was asking how fared the Queen, and bidding Valory get her orders as to the hour of departure. It was easy to see that Barnave had not been abed, and had slept no more than Charny himself.

The two men saluted each other, and Charny must surely have noted the jealous light in Barnave's eyes, while the Deputy inquired about the Queen's health, if he had been able to think of anything except that letter, against which his heart was beating.

CHAPTER VIII.

VIA DOLOROSA : STATION FIVE.

WHEN they again entered their carriage the King and Queen saw with surprise that only the population of the town were there to witness their departure, and only cavalry to accompany the royal coach.

Here was another attention from Barnave. He remembered that the day before, being forced to travel so far and at such a slow rate of speed, the Queen had greatly suffered from heat, dust, and insects, and also from the multitude, who had menaced the royal guards, and ill-treated those faithful adherents who came to bestow upon royalty a last salutation; so he pretended to have received warning of an invasion, — that General Bouillé was about re-entering France with fifty thousand Austrians; and that to contend against this danger every man would be needed who had a musket, a scythe, a pike, or any other weapon. Thereupon the rabble, hearing this appeal, started back towards their own homes.

There was at that era in France a deep-seated hatred of foreigners, a hatred so powerful that it even overbore the hatred these men had vowed towards the King and Queen, — especially towards the Queen, whose greatest crime lay in the fact that she was foreign-born.

Marie Antoinette guessed from whom this blessed relief had emanated. We say blessed relief, for the word is not too strong; and she thanked Barnave with a grateful glance.

As she resumed her place in the coach she looked for Charny. He was already on his outside seat; only, instead of sitting in the middle, as on the previous day, between the two bodyguards, he now insisted upon giving this position to Monsieur de Malden, which was somewhat less exposed than the one previously occupied by that faithful gentleman.

In truth Charny really hoped that some wound would give him an excuse for opening his Countess's letter, which still burned against his heart. He did not see that the Queen was trying to catch his eye; but she heaved a deep sigh, which Barnave noted.

Anxious to learn the cause of this sigh, the young Deputy paused on the carriage steps, and said: "Madame, I yesterday noticed that you were much discommoded in the coach. One person less will give you more elbow-room. If you wish it, I will ride in the other carriage, with Monsieur de Latour Maubourg, or I can accompany you on horseback."

Although he made this offer, Barnave would have given half the remnant of his days — and not many remained to him — to have the offer refused; and it was refused.

"No!" said the Queen, quickly, "stay with us!" and the Dauphin exclaimed, extending his little hands, in order to draw the young Deputy towards himself: "My friend Barnave! My friend Barnave! I won't have thee go away from us."

Barnave was radiant, as he took his former place in the coach. Hardly was he seated when the Dauphin, of his own accord, slipped from his mother's lap to Barnave's knees. As she let him do so, she kissed the little fellow on both cheeks.

The warm trace of her lips was imprinted on the child's velvety cheek. Barnave watched this trace of maternal love, as Tantalus might have looked at the forbidden fruit suspended above his head.

"Madame," he said to the Queen, "will your Majesty deign to accord me the privilege of embracing the august prince, who, guided by the infallible instinct of childhood, has called me his friend?"

The Queen smilingly assented. Then Barnave's lips glued themselves with such ardor to the spot where the Queen's lips had rested, that the child uttered a little cry of annoyance.

Nothing of all this byplay was lost upon the Queen. Perhaps she had slept no better than Barnave and Charny; perhaps the animation which lighted her eyes was caused by the fever which burned within; but her lips were covered with a warm purple, her cheeks with a rosy tint almost imperceptible, transforming her into a dangerous siren, capable, with a single hair from her beautiful head, of drawing her deluded worshippers into an unfathomable and seething whirlpool.

Thanks to Barnave's precautions the carriage rolled along at the rate of two leagues (nearly six miles) an hour.

At Château Thierry they stopped for dinner. The mansion where they halted was by a river, on a charming site, and belonged to a rich woman who traded in wood, and who had not really expected that her house would be so honored. Nevertheless, the evening before, learning that the royal family was to pass through Château Thierry, she had sent one of her clerks, on horseback, to offer the Assembly Delegates, and also the King and Queen, the hospitalities of her home; and the invitation was graciously accepted.

As soon as the carriage stopped, a respectful concourse of attendants indicated to the august prisoners a very different reception from that to which they had been subjected the night before, at the inn in Dormans. The King, the Queen, Madame Elizabeth, Madame de Tourzel, and the two children were conducted into separate chambers, where every preparation had been made, so that each could make as careful a toilet as fastidiousness might prompt.

Not since her departure from Paris had the Queen found anything like this thoughtfulness. Her most delicate womanly habits were anticipated by this refined attention; and as Marie Antoinette began to appreciate such attentions, she asked for her kind hostess, that she might thank the lady.

Soon a woman of forty years, but still blooming, and dressed with extreme simplicity, presented herself. She had been thoughtful enough not to intrude upon her guests.

"You are the mistress of the mansion, Madame?" asked the Queen.

"Oh Madame!" cried this excellent woman, melting into tears, "wherever her Majesty deigns to stop, in whatever house is honored by her presence, — wherever the Queen may be, — the Queen is always the sole mistress."

Marie Antoinette looked about the chamber, to see if they were quite alone. Sure that nobody else could see or hear her, she took the lady's hand, drew her towards herself, and said, while she embraced her as a friend: "If you care for our peace of mind, and have any regard for your own safety, calm yourself and moderate your expressions of grief; for if the cause of your tears is perceived, they might be very harmful to you. You must understand that if any misfortune should happen to you, it would increase our troubles. Perhaps we may meet again. Restrain yourself, and think of me as a friend, to whom our meeting to-day is both precious and rare."

From the narrative of one of the bodyguards, who aided in the royal flight and was the King's companion, we copy these very words, spoken by Marie Antoinette.

After dinner they again set forth. The heat increased. Seeing that Madame Elizabeth, overcome with fatigue, had several times let her head fall upon her bosom, in spite of all she could do to keep awake, the King insisted that she should take the more comfortable back seat as far as Meaux, where they were to sleep; but only at his express order would Madame Elizabeth consent.

Pétion heard all this conversation without proffering his place. Purple with shame, Barnave hid his face in his hands, but through the openings of his fingers he could see the Queen's melancholy smile.

At the end of an hour's journey Madame Elizabeth's weariness became so uncontrollable that she suddenly fell asleep, so entirely losing consciousness that her angelic head, after nodding right and left, ended by reposing on Pétion's shoulder.

This is what enabled the Deputy from Chartres to say, in his unpublished account of the trip, that this saintly creature, Madame Elizabeth, became amorous towards him, and yielded to her natural disposition, by laying her head on his shoulder.

About four in the afternoon they arrived at Meaux, and stopped in front of the Bishop's palace, where Bossuet, the author of the "Discourse on Universal History," once lived, and where he died eighty-seven years before.

The palace was occupied by a sworn Constitutional Bishop. Later we shall see in what sort of fashion he received the royal family.

The Queen was at once struck with the sombre aspect of the building which they entered. Nowhere else could be found a palace, royal or religious, whose melancholy aspect would render it more worthy to hide the bitter misery which now sought an asylum for the night. It was not like Versailles, where the grandeur is magnificent. The grandeur of the palace at Meaux lay in its simplicity. A wide slope, paved with brick, led to the living-apartments, which opened into a garden, planted almost on the ramparts which form the foundation of the city. This garden was overshadowed by the church tower, entirely mantled with ivy. Thence, by an alley bordered with holly, you could reach the room which was once the study of the eloquent Bishop of Meaux, whence, from time to time, came those warning utterances which presaged the downfall of monarchies.

The Queen cast her eyes on this lugubrious building, and finding it harmonious with her mental condition, she looked about for some arm upon which she could lean, while visiting that part of the palace.

No one was near except Barnave. She smiled and said : "Give me your arm, Monsieur, and have the goodness to serve as my guide in this old palace. I dare not venture alone. I should be afraid of again hearing that grand voice, which once made Christendom tremble at the cry : Madame is dying ! Madame is dead !"

Barnave approached hastily, and offered his arm to the Queen, his pleasure mingled with respect ; but the Queen looked around, for Charny's absence disturbed her.

Barnave, who saw everything, noticed this look. "Does the Queen desire anything ?" he asked.

"Yes ! I wish to know where the King may be."

"He is doing Monsieur Pétion the honor to receive him, and they are conversing," replied Barnave.

The Queen appeared satisfied. Then, as if she needed to snatch herself out of selfish thoughts, she said, "Come, Monsieur!" and led Barnave through the apartments of the old part of the palace, — almost fleeing, as if she were following a shadow, outlined by her imagination, and dared look neither before nor behind. In the bedroom of the great preacher she paused, almost out of breath. By chance she found herself in front of a woman's portrait. Raising her eyes mechanically she read on the frame the name, Madame Henriette, and trembled.

Barnave felt this tremor, without understanding it. "Is your Majesty in pain?" he asked.

"No! — but that portrait! — Madame Henriette!"

Barnave conjectured what was passing in the poor woman's mind, and said: "Yes, Madame Henriette, — Madame Henriette of England; not the widow of the unfortunate Charles the First, but their daughter, the wife of that careless Philippe d'Orleans, — not the Henriette who thought she should die of cold in the Louvre, but the Henriette who died of poison at Saint Cloud, and who sent her ring to Bossuet on her deathbed." After a moment's hesitation he added: "I should like it better if this were the portrait of the other."

"And why so?"

"Because there are some lips which alone dare give certain counsels, — above all, lips which are closed in death."

"Can you not tell me, Monsieur, what counsel would come to me from the lips of the widow of Charles the First?"

"If your Majesty so commands, I will try."

"Do so!" said the Queen.

"This is what those lips would say," said Barnave: "'Oh my sister, do you not perceive the resemblance between us? I came from France, as you came from Austria. To the English people I was a foreigner, as you are a stranger to the French. I might have given my erring husband good advice; but I either kept silence, or gave him bad counsel. In place of trying to unite him to his people, and his people to him, I incited him to war. I advised him to march against London with the Protestant Irish. Not only did I carry on a correspondence with England's enemies, but twice I went to France, in order to bring foreign troops into his kingdom. At last — ' "

Barnave paused. "Go on!" said the Queen, her forehead frowning and her lips compressed.

"Why continue, Madame?" said the young orator, sorrowfully shaking his head. "You know well enough the end of that crimson history!"

"Yes! and I will go on, and tell you what Madame Henriette's portrait says to me, so that you can inform me if I am mistaken: 'At last the Scotch betrayed and gave up their King. Charles the First was arrested as he was about crossing the channel to France. A tailor apprehended him. A butcher led him to prison. A wagoner purged the judicial chamber, which should have judged him. A beer-seller presided at the court of justice which tried him; and that nothing odious might be omitted from the trial, — and from the revision of that iniquitous judgment, carried before the presiding justice, who confirmed all such English decisions, — a masked executioner beheaded the royal victim.' — That is what Madame Henriette's portrait would say to me! My God! I know all this as well as anybody. Yes, I know more, — that nothing is wanting in this fatal parallel. We have our beer-seller; only they call him Santerre, instead of Cromwell. We have our butcher; only, instead of Harrison, they call him — what? — Legendre, I believe. We have our teamster; only, in place of calling him Pridge, they call him — Oh, as to him, well I don't know even his name, he is so small a creature, — nor you either, I 'm sure; but ask him his name, and he 'll tell you! I mean the fellow who directs our escort, — a peasant, a villain, a clodhopper! — Well, there you hear what Queen Henriette says to me!"

"And what is your answer?"

"I answer her thus: 'Poor dear Princess. This is not advice which you give me. This is the doom of history which you recall. Well, the history is done! Now I wait for counsel.'"

"Oh Madame, as to good counsel," said Barnave, "if you would not decline following it, not only the dead, but the living, would gladly furnish it."

"Dead or alive, let those who ought to speak, do so. Who dare say that the advice will not be followed, if it is good?"

"Ah Madame! The dead and the living can give you only the same advice!"

"Which is — ?"

"To make yourself loved by the people!"

"And is it so easy to make one's self loved by your people?"

"Ah Madame, the people are more yours than mine; and the proof is, that when you first came to France the populace adored you."

"Oh Monsieur, you speak of a very fragile thing!"

"Madame, Madame!" said Barnave, "if I, an unknown man, emerging from my obscurity, have been able to achieve some popularity, how easy it will be for you to retain it, or to regain it! No," continued Barnave, growing more animated, "your cause, the cause of the monarchy, — the most holy and noble of causes, — to whom have you confided it? What arms and what voices have defended it? Oh, what blindness to the signs of the times! What forgetfulness of the genius of France! Bear with me, who have desired the opportunity of being with you now, for this very purpose; — for at last I see you, at last I speak to you. How many times, my God! have I been at the point of speaking to you, to offer you my advice, my devotion, my — "

"Silence!" said the Queen. "Somebody is coming! We will talk of this again, Monsieur Barnave. I shall be ready to receive you again, listen to you, and perhaps heed your counsels."

"Oh Madame, Madame!" cried Barnave, in a transport of satisfaction.

"Silence!" repeated the Queen.

"Your Majesty is served, and the table is prepared," said the servant, whose footsteps they had heard, as he appeared on the threshold.

They entered the dining-room. The King came from another room, where he had been talking with Pétion, while the Queen was talking with Barnave; and his Majesty appeared much excited.

The two bodyguards were in attendance, claiming the usual privilege of serving their Majesties. Charny stood a little farther off, in the embrasure of the window.

The King looked about him; and profiting by a moment when he was alone with his family, the two guards, and the Count, he said to these gentlemen: "After supper I must confer with you. If you please, you will then follow me to my rooms." The three officers bowed.

Dinner began as usual; but although this time it was served in the palace of one of the chief bishoprics of the kingdom, the tables were as poorly spread that evening at Meaux, as they had been well spread that morning at Château Thierry.

The King, who always had a good appetite, ate heartily, in spite of the poor fare. The Queen only ate two fresh eggs.

All day the Dauphin, who was somewhat ill, had been asking for strawberries; but the poor child was no longer with those who anticipated his least desires. The attendants whom he asked for strawberries all replied that there were none, or that none could be found; yet, along the road, he had seen the rugged peasant children eating whole handfuls of strawberries, which they had culled in the woods. He even envied these healthy children, with light hair and rosy cheeks, who had no need to ask for strawberries, but could pluck them for themselves, whenever they pleased, and knew in which glades the berries were to be gathered, as little birds know in what fields rapeseed and hempseed abound.

This desire, which she had not been able to gratify, troubled the Queen; so that when he refused what was set before him, and asked again for strawberries, the tears came into the eyes of this powerless mother.

Looking about for some one to whom she could speak about it, she saw Charny, silent, upright, and motionless. She beckoned to him once, — twice; but, absorbed in thought, he did not notice her signs.

At last, in tones hoarse with emotion, she called him by his full name and title.

Charny started, as if emerging from a dream, and made a movement to go towards the Queen.

At that moment the door opened, and Barnave appeared with a plate of strawberries in his hand.

"The Queen will excuse me," he said, "for entering in this way, and the King will be so good as to pardon me, I hope; but several times during the day I have heard the Dauphin ask for strawberries, and finding this plateful on the Bishop's table, I have taken it for him."

Meanwhile Charny made the circuit of the table and was approaching the Queen; but she did not give him time to come very near.

"Thanks, Count," she said, "but Monsieur Barnave has anticipated my wishes, and I need nothing more."

Charny bowed and returned to his place, without a word.

"Thank you, my dear Barnave," said the young Dauphin.

"Monsieur Barnave," said the King, "our dinner is not very good; but if you will share it with us, you will give pleasure to both the Queen and myself."

"Sire," said Barnave, "an invitation from the King is a command. Where does it please your Majesty I should sit?"

"Between the Queen and the Dauphin," said the King.

Barnave took his seat, beside himself with pride and passion.

Charny looked upon this scene without a shiver of jealousy running through his heart and veins; only, as he saw this poor butterfly burning his wings at the royal flame, he said to himself: "Another man lost! Too bad, for he is worth more than the others." Then relapsing into his constant meditation he thought: "That letter, that letter! What can there be in that letter?"

CHAPTER IX.

CALVARY.

After supper the three officers, who had been requested to do so, went up to the King's chamber.

Madame Royale, the Dauphin, and Madame de Tourzel were in their own rooms. The Queen, the King, and Madame Elizabeth were in attendance.

As soon as the young gentlemen entered, the King said: "Monsieur de Charny, do me the favor of fastening the door, so that nobody can come in and disturb us. — I have something of the highest importance to communicate. Yesterday, gentlemen, at Dormans, Monsieur Pétion proposed to me that you should escape in disguise. To this the Queen and myself were both opposed, for fear the proposition was a snare, and they only wished to tempt you away from us, in order to assassinate you, or else give you up to some provincial military commission, which would condemn you to be shot, without the possibility of appeal. We therefore, the Queen and I, took it upon ourselves to reject this proposition; but to-day Monsieur Pétion returns to the charge, pledging his honor as a Deputy in its support; so I think it right to make you acquainted with what he fears and what he proposes."

"Sire," interrupted Charny, "before your Majesty goes any farther, — and I speak not only in my own name, for I feel sure that I interpret the sentiments of my brother officers also, — before going any farther, will the King promise us one favor?"

"Gentlemen, your devotion to the Queen and myself has endangered your lives during the last three days. For these three days you have been repeatedly threatened with the most cruel deaths. You have shared the shame into which we are plunged, the insults which cover us. Gentlemen, you have not only the right to ask a favor, but you have only to make known your wishes, to ensure their immediate fulfilment, if not beyond the power of the Queen and myself."

"Well, Sire," said Charny, "we humbly but urgently ask your Majesty, whatever may be the propositions made by the Deputies on our behalf, to leave us at liberty to accept or refuse these propositions."

"Gentlemen," said the King, "I give you my word to exert no pressure over your wills in this matter. Whatever you desire, shall be done."

"Then we will gratefully listen to you, Sire," replied Charny.

The Queen looked at him in astonishment. She remarked in him a growing indifference, which she could not reconcile with his obstinate decision not to withdraw an instant from what he considered his duty. However, she said nothing, but let the King continue the conversation.

"With this liberty of choice left entirely to yourselves, here is Pétion's proposal, in almost his own words. From the moment of our arrival in Paris, he says, there will be no security for the three officers accompanying me; for neither himself, Barnave, nor Latour Maubourg can agree to save them from deadly peril, and their blood will depend upon the caprice of the people."

Charny looked at his two companions. A smile of contempt was on their lips. "Well, Sire, and what then?" he asked.

"This is what Pétion proposes. He proposes to procure for you three uniforms as National Guardsmen, to have the doors of this palace left open to-night, and so give each of you liberty to escape."

Charny again consulted his companions, but the same smile was his answer.

"Sire," he said, again addressing the King, "our days have been consecrated to your Majesties; and as you have deigned to accept our homage, it will be easier for us to die for you than to be separated from you. Do us the favor to treat us to-morrow as you did yesterday. But of all your Court, of all your army, of all your guards, there remain to you three faithful hearts. Do not take from them the sole glory to which they aspire, — faithfulness to the end."

"Very well, gentlemen, we accept," said the Queen; "only, you will understand that henceforth all must be in common between us. You are no longer our servants; you are our friends, brothers. I do not ask you to give me your names, for I know them; but," and as she spoke she drew her tablets from her pocket, "give the names of your mothers, brothers, and sisters. We may be so unhappy as to lose you, without being ourselves ruined. Then it will be my task to apprise these loved ones of our mutual grief, and at the same time aid them in bearing their sorrows, by any means in my power. Go on, Monsieur de Malden, go on, Monsieur de Valory! Speak boldly! In case of death, — and we are all so close to the reality that we ought not to recoil at the word, — who are your relatives, who are the friends you would specially commend to our devout remembrance and lasting gratitude?"

Malden mentioned his mother, an infirm old lady, living on a small estate in the neighborhood of Blois.

Valory mentioned his sister, a young orphan, at school in a convent at Soissons.

Certainly, no hearts could be stronger or more full of courage than those of these two young men; yet as the Queen wrote down the addresses of Madame de Malden and Mademoiselle de Valory, both the bodyguards made ineffectual efforts to restrain their tears. Even the Queen was forced to suspend her writing, in order to take out her handkerchief and dry her eyes; for she was easily moved by the thought of death.

When she had finished noting these addresses, she turned towards Charny. "Alas, Monsieur, I know that you have no near relatives to commend to our care. Your father and mother are both dead, and also your two brothers —" but here the Queen's voice failed.

Charny took up her word: "My two brothers had the happiness of suffering death for your Majesty, — yes, Madame; but the last brother left a poor babe, whom he commended to my care, in a sort of will which I found among his papers. He led a young girl astray from her family, from whom she can hardly expect pardon. So long as I live, neither she nor their babe shall want for anything needful; but as your Majesty has said, with most admirable courage, we are all face to face with death, and if I am struck down, the poor girl and her babe will be without resources. Madame, deign to inscribe on your tablets the name of a poor peasant-girl; and if, like my two brothers, I have the happiness to die for my august master and mistress, lower your generous eyes to the estate of Catherine Billot and her child, both of whom are to be found in the little village of Ville d'Avray."

Doubtless the picture of Charny, dying as his two brothers had died, was too much for Marie Antoinette's imagination; for she turned with a feeble cry, dropped her tablets, and tottered to an armchair.

The two bodyguards hurried towards her, while Charny picked up the royal tablets, wrote therein the name of Catherine Billot, and placed them on the chimneypiece.

The Queen made an effort and recovered herself. Then the young gentlemen, understanding that she ought to be alone, after such an outburst of emotion, ceremoniously withdrew, one after the other; but she extended her hand, saying: "Gentlemen, I hope you will not go away without kissing my hand."

The two bodyguards advanced in the same order as before, — Malden first, and then Valory.

Last came Charny. The Queen was tremulous, awaiting his kiss, for whose sake alone she had offered her hand to the other two officers; but hardly did the Count's lips touch that beautiful hand, for it seemed to him — with that letter of Andrée's on his heart — that he should be guilty of sacrilege in pressing the Queen's hand with his lips.

Marie Antoinette heaved a sigh which resembled a groan. Never had she realized, as in that abortive kiss, how the abyss between herself and her lover had been growing wider and wider day by day.

The next day, at the moment of departure, Latour Maubourg and Barnave — doubtless ignorant of what had taken place the evening before between the King and the three officers — renewed their proposal for the young men to dress themselves as National Guardsmen; but they refused, declaring that their places were on the seat of the royal coach, and that they should wear no other costume than that commanded by the King.

Then Barnave had boards fastened on each side of the upper seat, in order that two grenadiers might occupy these extra places, and protect, as far as possible, the King's obstinate servitors.

At ten o'clock they left Meaux. They were to re-enter Paris, from which they had been five days absent. Five days! What a bottomless pit had been dug during these five days!

Hardly had they driven a league from Meaux, before their cortege took on a more terrible aspect than ever.

The populace from the environs of the capital flowed into the ranks. Barnave wished the postilions to drive at a fast trot; but the Claye National Guards barred the road with their bayonets. To attempt a break through this dike would be indeed imprudent. The Queen saw the danger and begged the Deputies to do nothing to augment the anger of the rabble, for they could scent the coming wrath, and hear the mutterings of a formidable storm.

Soon the crowd was so great that the horses could hardly move at all. Never had the weather been so hot. It was no longer air they breathed, but fire.

The insolent curiosity of the people followed the King and Queen into the farthest corners of their coach, where they tried to find a refuge.

Men mounted the steps and pushed their heads inside the carriage. Some hoisted themselves upon the outside, while others straddled the horses.

It was a miracle that Charny and his two companions were not killed twenty times. The two grenadiers were not strong enough to parry every blow. They besought and even supplicated the rabble to desist, and even commanded submission in the name of the National Assembly; but their voices were lost amidst the tumult of shouts and vociferations.

An advance guard of more than two thousand men preceded the coach, while there was a rear guard of over four thousand.

As they drew nearer and nearer to Paris, it seemed as if the very air failed them, absorbed by the giant city.

The carriage moved on beneath the sun thirty-five degrees high, and amidst a cloud of dust, of which each atom was like a speck of pounded glass.

Twice or thrice the Queen sank back, declaring that she was suffocating. At Bourget the King became so pale that they feared he was ill. He asked for a glass of wine, for his heart began to fail him. To complete a sacred parallel, it was only necessary that some one should offer him, as was offered Jesus, a sponge soaked with gall and vinegar; and indeed the suggestion was made, but it was happily repelled.

At last they reached Villette. It took an hour for the crowd to spindle out sufficiently for them to go between the two rows of stone houses, whose whiteness so reflected the sun's rays as to double the heat.

Everywhere were men, women, and children. The eye could hardly measure such a crowd. The pavement was so thickly covered, that those who occupied it could not stir. The doors, windows, and roofs of the houses were filled with spectators. The trees bent beneath their weight of living fruit. All the people wore their hats; partly because this notice had been placarded all over Paris the previous evening:

WHOEVER SALUTES THE KING SHALL BE FLOGGED.

WHOEVER INSULTS HIM SHALL BE HANGED.

All this was so terrifying that the commissioners dared not pass through the street called Faubourg Saint Martin, which was full of encumbrances, and consequently of dangers, — a mournful street, a bloody street, a street celebrated for its records of assassination, as witness the terrible history of Berthier.

It was decided to enter the city by way of the Champs Élysées, thus compelling the procession to make the circuit of Paris by way of the outside boulevards.

This entailed three hours more of distress; and this distress was so insupportable that the Queen begged they might take the shorter cut, even though it were more perilous.

Twice she tried to lower the blinds; but twice the muttering of the crowd compelled her to raise them again.

At the barrier a large company of grenadiers surrounded the carriage. Several marched near the windows, almost obstructing those openings with their great fur hats.

At last, about six o'clock, an advance guard appeared at the end of the Monceau Gardens, dragging along three pieces of artillery, which rebounded with heavy jerks along the uneven pavement. This advance guard was composed of cavalry and infantry, but so mixed in among the people, that the soldiers found it almost impossible not to break their ranks. Those who perceived them hurried along towards the heights of the Champs Élysées.

This was the third time Louis the Sixteenth entered Paris by this fatal gateway. He came in that way the first time, after the fall of the Bastille; the second time, on that awful Sixth of October; the third time, — the present, — after the flight to Varennes.

All Paris, on learning that the procession was coming by the Neuilly Road, hurried to the Champs Élysées; so when the royal family reached the barrier, they could see, stretching far away from the gate, a vast sea of humanity, silent, gloomy, menacing, and as unrespecting as the sea, which would not ebb at the command of a crowned Canute.

More lugubrious than all else, if not more frightful, was a double hedge of National Guardsmen, extending away to the gateway of the Tuileries, and carrying their muskets reversed, as a sign of mourning.

It was indeed a day of mourning, of great mourning, — mourning for a dynasty of seven centuries. The coach, which rolled along slowly amidst all these people, was a funeral chariot, conveying royalty to its tomb.

On perceiving these long rows of National Guards, the soldiers who accompanied the coach waved their weapons, and shouted: "Hurrah for the Nation!" and this cry echoed all along the line, from the barrier to the Tuileries.

Then the immense human wave, lost under the trees, — spreading out as far as the streets of the Faubourg Roule on one side, and as far as the banks of the Seine on the other, — undulated with the cry, "Long live the Nation!"

From all France went up this shout of fraternity. Only one family, the family which wished to escape from France, was excluded from that fraternity.

It took an hour to go from the barrier to Louis Fifteenth Square. The horses bent beneath their loads, for each carried a stalwart grenadier.

Behind the coach, which still contained the King, Queen, Dauphin, Madame Royale, Madame Elizabeth, Madame de Tourzel, Pétion, and Barnave, came the cabriolet containing the Queen's two female attendants and Latour Maubourg. Behind this cabriolet was to be seen an open carriage, — shaded, however, with green boughs, — occupied by Drouet, who had arrested the King, and by Guillaume and Maugin, who had aided by main force in this arrest. Fatigue had driven them to adopt this method of locomotion.

Billot alone, as if the zeal of his vengeance were of bronze, remained on horseback, and seemed to dominate the whole occasion.

As they entered Louis Fifteenth Square (now called Place de la Concorde) the King noticed that somebody had bandaged the eyes of his grandfather's statue. "What is that intended to express?" Louis asked of Barnave.

"I 'm sure I don't know, Sire," responded the man to whom the question was addressed.

"I know," said Pétion. "It refers to the blindness of the monarchy."

During the journey — despite the escort, despite the commissioners, despite the placards which forbade any insult to the King, under pain of hanging — the rabble two or three times broke through the line of grenadiers, a feeble and powerless dike against an element to which God had forgotten to say, as to the sea, "Thus far shalt thou come, and no farther."

When this occurred, when the ranks of the grenadiers were broken through, the Queen suddenly saw two men appear at the carriage windows, with hideous and pitiless faces, — such men as only appear occasionally on the surface of society, as certain monsters only rise to the surface of the ocean in the midst of storms.

At first she was so affrighted by this apparition, that she again hastily closed one of the carriage windows.

"Why do you lower the glass?" cried ten furious voices.

"Look at my poor children," said the Queen, "and see what a state they are in!" and she wiped the sweat from their wet cheeks. "We are suffocating!" she added.

"Bah!" replied a voice. "That's nothing! Make yourself easy! We'll suffocate you in another fashion!" and a blow of the fist broke the glass into shivers.

Amidst this awful spectacle were a few episodes which must have consoled the royal pair, if they were accessible to expressions of good-will as readily as to its opposite.

Despite the placard which forbade any expression of respect to the King, Monsieur Guilhermy, a member of the Assembly, uncovered his head as the King passed by; and when they wished to force him to put on his hat, he threw it far away and exclaimed: "Who dares bring that back to me?"

At the entrance of the swinging bridge, leading to the palace gardens, they found Twenty Deputies who had been delegated to protect the royal prisoners.

Then came Lafayette and his staff. Lafayette approached the coach.

"Oh Monsieur," cried the Queen, as soon as she saw him, "save our bodyguards!"

This was not a needless request, for danger was at hand, and great danger, too.

Meantime a scene took place at the gates of the palace, which was not without its poetic side.

Five or six women, among the Queen's personal attendants, who had left the Tuileries after the royal flight, — believing the Queen had gone away forever, — now wished to re-enter the palace, in order to receive her properly.

"Be off!" cried the sentinels, presenting the points of their bayonets.

"Slaves of that Austrian woman," shouted the fish-wives, shaking their fists.

Beset by the bayonets of the guards, and braving the threats of the Dames from the Market-place, a sister of Madame Campan stepped forward and said: "Listen! Since the Queen was fifteen years old I have been in her personal service. She endowed me, and gave me my wedding outfit. I served her when she was powerful. Ought I to abandon her now, when she is miserable?"

"She's right," was the outcry. "Soldiers, let 'em pass!" and at that order, from rulers not to be gainsaid, the military ranks opened, and the women went into the palace; and soon after, the Queen could see them wave their handkerchiefs from the windows on the main floor.

Meanwhile the coach moved slowly on, driving before it a tide of people and a cloud of dust, as a ship pushes its way through the ocean waves and a cloud of foam; and the comparison is the more exact, because never were the victims of shipwreck threatened by a sea more agitated and turbulent than that which was preparing itself to swallow up this unhappy family when they reached the Tuileries, which they regarded as their haven of safety.

At last the carriage stopped. They had reached the steps of the Great Terrace.

"Oh gentlemen," again said the Queen, but this time addressing herself to Pétion and Barnave, "the bodyguards, the bodyguards!"

"You have no one in particular among these gentlemen, whom you would commend to our protection?" asked Barnave.

The Queen looked at him sharply, with surprised eyes, and said, "No one!" Then she insisted that the King and the children should get out of the carriage first.

The next ten minutes which rolled away were the most cruel of her life, — not excepting those when she was led to the scaffold.

She felt convinced, not that she should be assassinated, — death would be nothing, — but that she would be given to the mob for a plaything, or shut up in some prison, whence she could emerge only by the doorway of personal infamy and dishonor.

As she put her foot on the carriage steps, protected by the arch above her head, formed — by Barnave's order — of the muskets and bayonets of the National Guards, a flash of faintness through her brain made her believe she should fall to the ground; but as her eyes were about closing, in a last agonizing look, she saw, or thought she saw, in front of her, that terrible man, who, at Taverney Château, had so mysteriously raised for her the veil of the future; the man whom she had seen only once since that time, — on her return from Versailles, on that dreadful Sixth of October; that man, who only appeared when he predicted some great catastrophe, or at the hour when those great catastrophes were being fulfilled.

When she was sure her eyes did not deceive her, she closed them and uttered a cry. She could be strong in fighting against realities, but she fell powerless and inert before this sinister vision.

It seemed as if the earth fled from beneath her feet, that the crowd, the trees, the burning sky, the motionless palace, — all were in a whirlpool about her. Vigorous arms seized her, and she felt herself borne along amidst clamors and shouts. At that instant she thought she heard the voice of the bodyguards, trying to call upon themselves the anger of the populace, and thus turn it from the intended victim. She reopened her eyes an instant, and saw those unfortunate men torn from their seats on the coach. Pale and handsome as ever, Charny was fighting against ten men, — the martyr-light in his eyes, a disdainful smile on his lips. From Charny her glance turned upon a man who seemed to rise up in the midst of this cyclone, and with increased terror she now distinctly recognized the mysterious personage whom she had seen at Taverney and Sevres Bridge.

"You? you?" she cried, trying to repulse him with her rigid hands.

"Yes, I!" he whispered in her ear. "I have need of thee, to push the monarchy into its last abyss, and therefore I save thee."

This time it was more than she could bear. She uttered a shriek and fell in a dead swoon.

Meantime the rabble were trying to cut Charny, Malden, and Valory into pieces, while they carried Drouet and Billot in triumph on their shoulders.

CHAPTER X.

THE CHALICE.

When the Queen came to herself she saw that she was in her old bedroom in the Tuileries. Her two favorite waiting-women were at her side, — Madame de Misery and Madame Campan.

Her first inquiry was for the Dauphin. He was in his chamber, lying in his own bed, cared for by Madame de Tourzel, his governess, and by Madame Brunier, his chambermaid.

This assurance was not enough for the Queen. She arose at once, and ran into her son's apartment, though she was all in disorder.

The child had been wofully frightened, and had cried pitifully; but they had calmed his agony, and he was now asleep, although slight shudders disturbed his rest.

For a long time she leaned on a post of his bed, and looked at him fixedly through her tears.

The terrible words uttered by that fearful man seemed incessantly to reverberate in her ear: "I have need of thee, to push the monarchy into its last abyss, and therefore I save thee!" Was this true? Was it she who was urging the monarchy on to its destruction? It must be so, since her enemies, who kept vigilant watch over the monarchy, had confided to her this destructive task, because she could accomplish it better than themselves.

This abyss, towards which she was pushing the monarchy, would it close up again, after devouring the King, herself, and the throne? Must her two children be thrown into the gulf? In the religions of antiquity did childlike innocence disarm the vengeance of the gods? It is true that Jehovah refused Abraham's sacrifice of his son Isaac; but he afterward accepted the sacrifice of Jephthah's daughter.

These were gloomy meditations for a queen, — more gloomy for a mother.

At last she shook her head sadly, and returned, with slow steps, to her own room. There she noted the disorder in which she found herself. Her clothing was tumbled, and it was torn in many places. Her shoes had been pierced by the sharp stones of the rugged pavement over which she had been dragged. She was covered with dust. She asked for some other shoes and a bath.

Barnave had twice called to inquire after her welfare. Madame Campan looked at the Queen with surprise, as she announced this visit.

"You will thank him affectionately, Madame," said Marie Antoinette. Madame Campan was more and more amazed.

"We are under great obligations to that young man, Madame," added the Queen, condescending, though this was not her custom, to give her reasons.

"But I have thought, Madame," the attendant ventured to say, "that Monsieur Barnave was a demagogue, a man of the people, to whom any means seem good, if they only help him to gain his point."

"Any means offered by his talent? Yes, Madame, that is true. But now remember well what I tell you. A sentiment of pride, which I cannot blame, has made him approve everything which smooths the way to honor and glory for the class wherein he was born. There is no pardon for the nobility who cast themselves into the Revolution ; but if power returns to us, the pardon of Barnave is accorded beforehand. — Go, now, and try to find out something about Monsieur de Malden and Monsieur de Valory."

The Queen's heart added Charny's name to these two, but her lips refused to pronounce it.

Some one came to say that the Queen's bath was ready. During the brief interval which had elapsed since her visit to the Dauphin, sentinels had been stationed everywhere, even at the door of her toilet closet and bathroom. With difficulty she persuaded them to let the door be fastened while she bathed.

Here is what Prudhomme says about it, in his record of Revolutions in Paris :

Some good Patriots, in whom the sentiment of compassion is not so dead as that of royalty, have been anxious about the mental and physical condition of Louis Sixteenth and his family, after a journey so disastrous as that from Saint Menehould.

They may be reassured. The above-mentioned gentleman, on his return to his apartments Saturday evening, did not find himself more uncomfortable than after a fatiguing chase, — and perhaps less so. He ate his chicken as usual. The next day, after dinner, he played with his son.

As to the mother, she took a bath when she arrived. Her first orders were for some boots, taking care to show how those which she had worn during the journey were frayed into holes. Towards the officers stationed as her particular guardians, she conducted herself somewhat testily, and thought it ridiculous and indecent that they should leave open the doors of her bathroom and bedroom.

See how this Monster of Infamy ate a pullet as soon as he reached home, and played with his little son the very next day ! Behold this Sybarite, who absolutely took a bath after five days' journey in a carriage, and three nights in public houses. Behold this Prodigal, who asked for a change of shoes, because hers were worn into holes by her journey. Look upon this Messalina, who, thinking it indecent and ridiculous that she should be compelled to leave open the doors of her bathroom and bedroom, asked her guards for permission to close those doors.

Ah Monsieur Journalist, you appear very much like a man who eats chicken only on the four feastdays of the year, who has no children, who never takes a bath, and goes to his seat in the National Assembly with his shoes full of holes.

Risking all the scandal such a deed might occasion, the Queen took her bath, and obtained permission to shut her door; but the sentinel did not miss the opportunity of taunting Madame Campan as an Aristocrat, when she returned with such information as she had been able to gather, and entered the bathroom.

This news was not so painful as had been feared.

After they passed the barrier, on their way through the Champs Élysées, Charny and his two companions formed a plan. This plan was to draw upon themselves a portion of the dangers to which the royal family were exposed. To do this it was agreed that as soon as the coach came to a full stop, one officer should spring off towards the left and another towards the right, while he who sat in the middle should scramble towards the front. In this way the troop of assassins would divide, being forced to go in opposite directions, — following three different scents, after as many different quarries; and perhaps the way might thus be left clear for the King and Queen to enter the palace.

As has already been stated, the coach halted at the first pond, near the Grand Terrace of the palace. The would-be murderers were in such haste that they rushed in front of the horses, and two were badly hurt. For an instant the two grenadiers, still on the box, were able to protect the three officers; but the grenadiers were soon pulled to the ground, and this left the three officers defenceless.

This was their chosen opportunity. All three sprang rapidly away, but not so rapidly, nevertheless, as not to be able to capsize five or six men who were mounted on the wheels and steps, for the very purpose of tearing the brave officers down. Thus, as had been anticipated, the wrath of the people was scattered in three directions.

Hardly had Malden touched the ground, when he found himself under the axes of two sappers. Both axes were lifted, and only waiting for a chance to strike him, without injuring anybody else. By a violent and rapid movement he was able to push away some men who were holding him by the collar, so that for a second he stood alone.

Then he crossed his arms and said, "Strike!" One of the two axes remained uplifted. The victim's courage paralyzed the assassin. The other axe fell, thirsting for Malden's blood; but as it fell it encountered a musket-barrel, which turned it aside, so that only the edge grazed Malden's throat, giving him but a slight wound.

Then he lowered his head and ran towards the by-standers, who drew back to let him pass; and a few steps farther on he was received by a group of officers who, in order to save him, shoved him the other side of the row of National Guards, who were forming, for the royal prisoners, a covered pathway from the coach to the palace. At that moment General Lafayette perceived Malden.

Urging his horse towards him, the General seized him by the collar, and pulled him against his stirrups, so as to shield Malden, in some degree, by the General's popularity; but Malden, recognizing him, cried out: "Let me alone, Monsieur! Attend to the royal family, and leave me to these cutthroats." In fact Lafayette did release him; for seeing a man who was trying to carry off the Queen, he rushed to that man's side.

Malden was knocked down by some, and helped up by others. Some attacked him, while others defended him. Covered with bruises and bleeding wounds, he at last reached the gateway of the palace. There an officer, seeing that he was almost overcome, seized him by the collar, jerked him along, and exclaimed: "It 's too bad to have such a wretch die in this easy way. Some special punishment should be invented for scoundrels of this sort. Leave him to me. I 'll see to him!"

So he continued to insult Monsieur de Malden, saying, "Come along, you jack! Come here! You 'll settle this affair with me!" till at last he drew him into a dark corner, when he said: "Save yourself, Monsieur, and forgive the ruse which enabled me to get you out of the hands of those wretches." Then Malden ran up the steps of the palace, and disappeared.

Somewhat similar were Valory's experiences. He received severe wounds in the head; but at the moment when a score of bayonets, a score of sabres, and a score of daggers were raised to put an end to his defenceless existence, Pétion threw himself forward, and repulsed the assassins with all the vigor he possessed.

"In the name of the National Assembly," he cried, "I declare you unworthy the name of Frenchmen, if you do not instantly get out of the way, and let this man alone. I am Pétion!"

Under a somewhat rude exterior Pétion concealed great honesty and a loyal and courageous heart. Thus speaking, he seemed so noble in the eyes of these assassins that they went away, and left Valory in his hands.

Then Pétion helped him, supported him, — for, exhausted with the blows he had received, Valory was hardly able to stand upright, — conducted him as far as the line of National Guards, and confided him to the hands of Pétion's aide, Matthew Dumas, who promised to answer for Valory with his head, and protected him till they were safe in the palace.

Just then Pétion heard Barnave's voice, calling for help, as he found himself unable to defend Charny single-handed.

The Count was seized by a score of arms, and dragged along in the dirt; but he recovered his feet, wrenched a bayonet from a gun, and ploughed his way through the crowd about him; yet he would have been soon overcome in this unequal struggle, if first Barnave and then Pétion had not come to his relief.

The Queen listened to this report while in her bath. Campan, who brought a portion of these facts, could give positive information only about Malden and Valory, who had been seen in the palace, battered and blood-stained, but, on the whole, without serious wounds.

As to Charny, nothing certain was known about him, except that he had been saved by Barnave and Pétion, for he had not been seen to enter the palace.

When Madame Campan reported this last fact, such a mortal pallor overspread the Queen's face that her attendant, believing that this change was owing to fear lest some great misfortune had happened to the Count, exclaimed: "Her Majesty need not despair of Charny's safety because he has not been seen in the palace. The Queen is aware that Madame de Charny lives in Paris, and perhaps the Count has found a place of security with his wife."

This was the very idea which had occurred to Marie Antoinette, and made her turn so frightfully pale. She came out of her bath, crying: "Dress me, Campan, dress me quick. It is absolutely necessary that I should know what has become of the Count."

"Which Count?" asked Madame de Misery, who just then entered the room.

"Charny!" said the Queen.

"He is in her Majesty's antechamber, and solicits the honor of a brief interview."

"Ah!" murmured the Queen. "Then he has kept his word!"

The two ladies looked at their mistress, not knowing what the Queen meant to say. Trembling, and incapable of pronouncing a word, she made a sign for them to hurry.

Never was toilet more rapid. Marie Antoinette contented herself with having her hair simply twisted into a knot, after her head had been washed in perfumed water, to cleanse it from the dust. She slipped a loose muslin robe over her chemise, returned to her reception-room, and, white as the gown she wore, ordered Charny's admission.

CHAPTER XI.

THE THRUST OF THE LANCE.

A FEW seconds thereafter the chamberlain announced Monsieur de Charny, who stood framed in the doorway, and lightened by the golden reflection of a ray of the setting sun.

Like the Queen, he had employed the time since his return to the palace in effacing the traces of his long journey, and of the terrible combat he had encountered on his arrival.

He had put on his old uniform, — that is, his costume as captain of a frigate, with red lapels and lace ruffles.

This was the very style of costume he had worn on a certain day when he met the Queen and Andrée de Taverney in Palace Royal Square, whence he afterwards conducted them to a cab, and attended them home to Versailles.

Never had he appeared so elegant, so calm, so handsome; and the Queen could hardly believe, as she looked upon him, that this was the same man who had been in imminent peril of being torn into pieces by the rabble, an hour before.

"Oh Monsieur," she cried, "they must have told you how anxious I was on your account, and that I sent out for intelligence of you."

"Yes, Madame," said Charny, bowing; "and, believe me, I did not go to my own apartments till after I was assured, through your ladies, that you were safe and well."

"They say you owe your life to Pétion and Barnave. Is this true? and am I therefore under a new obligation to Barnave?"

"It is true, Madame; and I owe double thanks to Monsieur Barnave, for being in no haste to leave me. Even after I was safe in my chamber, he was so kind as to tell me, in the course of our conversation, that you spoke of my welfare during our homeward journey."

"Of your welfare, Count? and in what way?"

"In telling the King of the anxiety you felt sure your old friend Andrée must feel on account of my absence. — I am far from agreeing with you, Madame, as to the liveliness of her anxiety. However —" Here he paused, for the Queen, already so pale, grew livid.

"However —?" repeated the Queen.

"However, without accepting, in all its generosity, the leave of absence which your Majesty proposed offering me, yet now that I am assured of the safety of the King, of yourself, and of your august children, it would be agreeable to me if I could in person report my condition to the Countess."

The Queen pressed her left hand over her heart, as if she wished to assure herself that she was not deathstruck by the blow thus received, and in a voice choking and parched she said: "That is indeed but fair, Monsieur; only I ask myself why you have waited so long before discharging this duty."

"The Queen forgets that I pledged my word not to see the Countess again without the royal permission."

"And you come here to ask for that permission?"

"Yes, Madame! and I beg your Majesty to grant it."

"With which permission, in your present ardor to once more see Madame de Charny, you might possibly dispense! Is it not so?"

"I consider the Queen unjust at my expense," replied Charny. "When I left Paris I supposed I was leaving it for a long time, if not forever. It was not my fault, as your Majesty will remember, that I did not lay down my life at Varennes, like my brother, or have my body torn asunder along the road, or in the Tuileries Gardens, like Monsieur de Dampierre. During the journey I did all that lay in my power to make our scheme a success. If it had been my good fortune to conduct your Majesty beyond the frontier, or to have the honor of dying, I should have died or become an exile, and never have seen the Countess again; but, I repeat to your Majesty, on my return to Paris, if I am not permitted to give any information about myself to the lady who bears my name, — and you know how she chances to bear it, Madame! — it will be indeed a mark of indifference; especially, as my brother Isidore is no longer here to take my place. If I am not mistaken, this was your Majesty's idea two days ago."

The Queen allowed her arm to glide slowly along the back of her lounge, and then followed this movement with an inclination of her shapely form, which brought her a little nearer to Charny, while she pathetically said: "You must love that woman very much, Monsieur, to so coolly cause me a similar heartache."

"Madame, it is hardly six years ago since you yourself, at a time when I fancied there existed for me only one woman on earth, — and she the one woman God had placed so high above me that I could not attain her level, — it is but six years since you imposed me upon Mademoiselle Andrée de Taverney as her husband, and gave her to me as a wife. During these six years my hand has but twice touched hers. Except when absolutely necessary, I have not addressed ten words to her, and our eyes have not met ten times. On my part, my life has been both occupied and filled, — filled with another passion, occupied with a thousand cares, a thousand tasks, a thousand contests, which make up a man's career. I have lived at Court. I have travelled great distances. With the clew confided to me by the King, I have been engaged in this gigantic intrigue, — tangled to me, — which fatality has now unravelled. I have counted neither the days, the months, nor the years. Time has passed all the more rapidly, because I have been so occupied with these passions, these cares, these intrigues, of which I speak. Not so has it been with Madame de Charny. Since she had the misfortune of leaving you, — undoubtedly because she had displeased you, — she has lived alone, in her pavilion in Rue Coq Heron. This solitude, this isolation, this abandonment, she has endured without complaint, for her heart, being exempt from love's passion, has not felt the need of the same affection that other women feel; but she might not perhaps accept without complaint my neglect of the simplest attentions, the commonest courtesies."

"My God, Monsieur, you are certainly much concerned with what the Countess does or does not think of you, — whether she sees you or not! Before taking all this trouble, it might be well to ascertain if she thought of you when you went away, or thinks of you now, on your return."

"Whether or not she thinks of me on my return, I do not know; but I am sure my Countess did think of me when I went away."

"Then you saw her before you went away?"

"Already I have had the honor of telling your Majesty that I have given the Queen my word not to see my wife!"

"Then she wrote you?"

Charny was silent; but Marie Antoinette exclaimed: "Come, Monsieur, she did write you! Why not acknowledge it?"

"She entrusted my brother Isidore with a letter for me."

"And you have read that letter? What did she say to you? What could she write? Yet she swore to me — Speak! Answer at once! In that letter she said to you —? Speak out! Can't you see I'm boiling over!"

"I cannot repeat to your Majesty what the Countess said in her letter. I have n't read it!"

"You tore it up?" said the joyous Queen. "You threw it into the fire without reading it? Charny, Charny, if you did that, you are the most faithful of men; and I am wrong to complain, for I have lost nothing."

She extended both arms to draw him to herself; but Charny remained where he was, and said: "I did not tear it or burn it!"

"Then why did n't you read it?" asked the Queen, sinking into her chair.

"The letter was not to be given me by my brother, unless I was mortally wounded. Alas! It was not I who was marked for death, but he. When he was dead, some one brought me his papers. Among them was this letter from the Countess, with this memorandum attached to it. — Here, Madame —!"

As he spoke Charny handed the Queen the note written by Isidore's hand, and which he had affixed to the Countess's letter. Marie Antoinette received it with trembling fingers, and struck her bell.

During the interview we are recording, night had come on; so she exclaimed: "Lights, instantly!"

The chamberlain went out, and a moment of stillness ensued, during which no other sound was to be heard save the Queen's irregular breathing and the tumultuous pulsation of her heart.

The chamberlain returned with two girandoles, which he placed on the mantel. The Queen barely allowed him time to retire; and as soon as he had withdrawn, and closed the door, she approached the mantel with the note in her hand.

Twice she looked at the paper without seeing anything. "Oh," she muttered, "it is n't paper! It 's flame!"

Passing her hand over her eyes, as if to restore the faculty of sight, which she seemed to have lost, she tapped her foot impatiently and exclaimed: "My God! My God!"

At last, by sheer force of will, her hand ceased trembling, and she regained her clearness of sight. In hoarse tones, wholly unlike her usual voice, she began the note:

This letter is not addressed to me, but to my brother, Count Oliver. It is written by his wife, the Countess.

The Queen here paused a few seconds, and then resumed:

If anything happens to me, whoever finds this paper is requested to send it to my brother Oliver, or else return it to the Countess.

Again the reader paused and shook her head, and then went on reading:

I received it from her with the following instructions.

"Ah, let us see the instructions," muttered the Queen, as again she rubbed her hand over her eyes.

If in the enterprise in which we are engaged the Count is successful, and no mishap befalls him, this letter is to be returned to the Countess.

The Queen's voice became more and more tremulous as she read; but she persevered.

If he is grievously wounded, but not unto death, he is to grant his wife the favor of letting her come to him.

"Oh, all is too plain!" stammered the Queen; and then she continued, in an unintelligible voice:

Finally, if he is wounded unto death, this letter is to be given him; and if he cannot read it himself, it is to be read to him, in order that he may know, before he dies, the secret it contains.

"Well, do you still deny it?" asked Marie Antoinette, covering the Count with her flaming gaze.

"Deny what?"

"Deny what? Oh, my God! — deny that she loves you!"

"What, I? The Countess loves me? What are you saying, Madame?" cried Charny, in his turn.

"Miserable woman that I am, I speak the truth."

"The Countess loves me? Impossible!"

"And why? Do I not love you myself?"

"But in six years, if the Countess loved me, she would have told me so, or let me find it out!"

The moment was at hand when poor Marie Antoinette, suffering so much, felt that she must sink under this suffering, which was like a dagger buried in her heart.

"No!" she cried, "no! She would let you see nothing, she would say nothing; but if she said nothing, if she let you discover nothing, it was because she knew she could not be really your wife."

"The Countess could not be really my wife?" repeated Oliver.

"No! because, as she knew very well," continued the Queen, more and more crazed with her personal grief, "there is between you a secret which must kill your affection."

"A secret which must kill our affection?"

"Because she knew very well you would despise her the moment she uttered it."

"I — despise my Countess?"

"Unless one does not despise a young girl who is a wife without marriage, a mother without a husband."

It was now Charny's turn to grow pale as death, and lean on the armchair nearest him, as he said: "Madame, Madame, you have either said too much or too little, and I have the right to demand an explanation."

"An explanation, Monsieur? An explanation from me, the Queen?"

"Yes, Madame, I demand it!"

At that moment the door opened. "What is wanted?" asked the indignant Queen.

"Your Majesty has heretofore declared that you were always at home to Doctor Gilbert."

"Well?"

"The Doctor claims the honor of presenting his humble respects to your Majesty," said the attendant.

"Doctor Gilbert!" said the Queen. "Are you positive it is Doctor Gilbert?"

"Yes, Madame!"

"Let him enter, then, — let him enter!" said the Queen.

Turning to Charny she added, raising her voice: "You wish for some explanation in regard to Madame de Charny. Wait! Ask that explanation of Doctor Gilbert, who is better able than anybody else to give it."

Meanwhile Gilbert entered. He heard Marie Antoinette's words, and remained upright and motionless on the threshold.

As to the Queen, throwing his brother's note to Charny, she took several steps towards her toilet-room; but with a more rapid step Charny passed in front of her, barred the way, and grasped her wrist, as he said: "Pardon me, Madame, but this explanation must be made in your presence."

"Monsieur," said she, with feverish eyes, and between her set teeth, "I fear you forget that I am the Queen."

"You 're an ungrateful woman, who calumniates her friend. You 're a jealous woman, who slanders another woman, — the wife of a man who, in the last three days, has risked his life for you twenty times, — the wife of Count de Charny. It is here, in the presence of one who has insulted, who has defamed her, that justice shall be rendered. Sit you down, and listen!"

"Well, so be it!" said the Queen. — "Monsieur Gilbert," she continued, with a forced laugh, "you hear what the Count wishes."

"Monsieur Gilbert," said Charny, in a dignified and courteous tone, "you hear the Queen's commands."

Gilbert came forward, and looked sorrowfully at Marie Antoinette. "Oh Madame, Madame!" he murmured.

Then he added, turning to Charny: "Monsieur, what I have to say redounds to the glory of a woman and the shame of a man. A wretch, a peasant, a worm of the earth, loved Mademoiselle de Taverney. One day he chanced to find her unprotected and in a swoon. Without respect for her youth, her beauty, her innocence, the wretch took advantage of her situation, and thus it was that this young girl became a wife without a husband, a mother without marriage. Madame de Charny is a martyr!"

Charny wiped the sweat from his brow as he said: "I thank you, Monsieur Gilbert." Then he added, to the Queen: "Madame, I was not aware that Mademoiselle de Taverney had been so unhappy. I was ignorant that she was so good. Otherwise, I beg you to believe, I should have fallen at her feet six years ago; and then I should not have adored her as she deserves."

Bowing to the stupefied Queen, Charny went away, without that unhappy lady's daring to make a motion to detain him; but he heard the sad cry which she uttered as she saw the door shut between them.

Then she realized that on that door, as above the gate of hell, the hand of the demon of jealousy had just written that awful sentence, which signifies that hope is forever left behind:

LASCIATE OGNI SPERANZA.

CHAPTER XII.

DATE LILIA : RING IN THE LILIES.

LET us see how it had fared with Andrée, while the scene just described was taking place between Charny and the Queen, wherein a long series of heart-troubles came to an abrupt termination.

For us, already acquainted with the state of her heart, it is easy to imagine how Andrée suffered on account of Isidore's departure.

Conjecturing that the project in which the brothers were engaged was the royal flight, she trembled equally at the thought of its success or failure.

If the project succeeded, she knew enough of Charny's devotion to the royal family, to be sure he would not forsake them in exile. If the enterprise failed, she knew Oliver's courage would make him fight against all obstacles whatsoever, as long as there was any hope, and even when all hope was lost.

From the moment when Isidore took his leave of her, the Countess's eye was constantly open for any glimmer of light, and her ear to catch the slightest rumor.

The next day, in common with all other Parisians, she learned that the King and his family had flown from Paris during that Monday night. No accident had signalized this abrupt departure.

That Charny was an important factor in this flight she had no doubt, and he was going farther and farther away from her. She heaved a deep sigh, and fell upon her knees to pray for their successful journey.

For two days Paris remained mute and echoless. On the morning of the third day a startling report ran through the city. The King had been arrested at Varennes. There were no details. Apart from this one thunder-clap, there was no noise. Beyond this one flash of lightning, all was night. The King had been arrested at Varennes, and that was all!

Andrée did not even know where Varennes was located. This little town, so fatally celebrated ever since, — whose very name became a terror to royalty, — at that time shared the obscurity which enshrouded, and still enshrouds, ten thousand French communities, which are just as unimportant and unknown as this one.

Andrée opened her geographical dictionary and read:

Varennes, in Argonne; chief town in the district; 1607 inhabitants.

Then she studied a map, and located Varennes, — placed in the middle of a triangle between Stenay, Verdun, and Châlons, on the edge of Argonne Forest, and on the banks of a little river. It was on this obscure spot that France now concentrated its attention. There were enshrined the thoughts, hopes, and fears of a nation.

Little by little, in the track of this stupendous news, came secondary information; as at sunrise, after the grand total has been drawn from its chaos by the flooding light, the details come into view, one by one. For Andrée, these details were of vast importance.

It was said that the Marquis de Bouillé had pursued the arrested party, attacked the escort, and had been driven back after a fierce fight, leaving the royal family in the hands of the victorious Patriots. Charny must have taken part in this combat; and if so he would have been the last to retire from the fight, even if he did not perish on the field of battle.

Presently it was said that one of three guardsmen who accompanied the King had been killed. Then the name came to light; only it was not known which Charny was killed, the Count or Viscount, Isidore or Oliver. It was a Charny, and nobody could say more. During two days, while that question was undecided, Andrée's heart endured inexpressible agonies.

At last the return of the royal party was announced for Saturday, June 26. The august prisoners had slept at Meaux. Calculating time and space, in the ordinary way of travel, the King would reach Paris before noon; and if he returned to the Tuileries by the most direct route, he would re-enter Paris through the Faubourg Saint Martin.

By eleven o'clock — veiled, and wearing a very plain dress — Andrée was at the barrier. There she waited four hours, — till three o'clock.

At that hour the first billows of the multitudinous human sea, driving everything before it, announced that the King would make the circuit of Paris, and enter the city proper by the barrier at the end of the Champs Élysées Avenue.

There was the whole city to cross, and Andrée must go afoot; for nobody dared drive a carriage through the dense crowd which everywhere filled the principal streets. Never had the Boulevards been so obstructed since the capture of the Bastille, nearly two years before.

Andrée did not hesitate, but took her way to the Champs Élysées, where she arrived among the first. There she waited three more hours, — three mortal hours, — till it was between six and seven o'clock.

At last the procession appeared, if procession it can be called. We have already learned the order and circumstances of the march.

Andrée saw the coach pass by; and she uttered a cry of great joy, for she recognized Charny on the outside seat.

Another cry responded, which sounded like the echo of her own; only it was a cry of despair. Andrée turned towards the side whence came this cry. A young girl was supported by the arms of three or four kind-hearted persons, who were trying to give her relief. She appeared a prey to the most violent despair.

Perhaps Andrée would have given more efficient attention to this girl, had she not heard, on all sides, muttered imprecations against the three men on the outside seat of the royal coach. On them was launched the wrath of the populace. These three were the scapegoats of royalty's great treason, and would undoubtedly be torn into pieces as soon as the carriage reached its destination.

One of these three scapegoats was Charny. Andrée resolved to do all she could to enter the gardens of the Tuileries. To do that she must circumnavigate the multitude, and return by the waterside, — that is, by Conference Pier, — and get into the garden, if such a thing were possible, by way of the Tuileries Pier. She went through the Rue Chaillot, and by a smaller cross-street, she reached the riverside.

By dint of many experiments, and at the risk of being crushed twenty times over, she reached the gateway; but there was such a jam about the place where the carriage stopped, that she could not dream of getting into the front ranks.

From the terrace nearest the water Andrée thought she could look over the heads of the crowd. To be sure, the distance was too great for her to distinguish the details or learn anything definite. Never mind! It was better to be able to hear a little and see a little, than to be able to see and hear nothing at all.

She accordingly ascended the terrace on the side towards the Seine. Thence she could indeed see the royal coach, and the seats on the top of it. She could see Charny and the two bodyguards. Little did Charny suspect that, a hundred rods away, there was a heart beating violently for him. Doubtless — so she believed — he had at that moment not a single thought for Andrée. He was thinking only of the Queen, and forgot his own safety in watching over hers. Oh, if Andrée had but known that Charny was at that very instant pressing her letter against his heart, and mentally offering to her his last sigh, for he supposed the next moment he might breathe his last breath!

At last the coach halted, amidst hooting, howling, and shouting. In an instant there was a tremendous noise, a great hubbub, and a mighty tumult about that coach. Bayonets, pikes, and swords were raised. One seemed to be looking upon a rye-field of iron, bending before a storm.

The three men whom Andrée was watching were precipitated from their seats, and vanished, as if they had tumbled into a gulf. Then there was such an eddy amidst the multitude, that the rear ranks crowded backward, and were jammed against the stone abutment of the terrace.

Andrée was now enveloped in a cloud of agony. She could see nothing, hear nothing. With palpitating breath and extended arms she threw a few inarticulate sounds into the midst of this terrible concert, made up of maledictions, blasphemies, and death-cries.

Then she could no longer take note of what was going on about her. The earth was in a whirl, the sky turned red, and a murmur, like that of the sea, surged in her ears. It was the blood mounting from her heart to her head, and overwhelming the brain. Then she fell down, half swooning, but knowing that she must be alive, because she suffered.

A refreshing coolness brought Andrée to herself. One woman was pressing to Andrée's forehead a handkerchief wet with water from the river; while another was compelling her to inhale the pungency from a vial of salts. She recognized the second of these two women as the one whom she had seen sinking at the barrier, as Andrée was sinking now; but Andrée did not know that they were instinctively drawn together by unknown ties, which bound the sadness of that young girl to her own.

Returning to herself, Andrée's first question was: "Are they dead?"

Compassion is intelligent. Those who were near Andrée understood that she was agitated by her thoughts of those three men, whom she had just seen so cruelly endangered.

"No, they are saved!" was the response.

"All three?" she asked.

"All three, — yes."

"God be praised! — Where are they?"

"They say they 're in the palace."

"In the palace? Thanks!"

Rising, and shaking her head, her gaze still somewhat wild, Andrée left the garden by the gateway leading to the waterside, in order to re-enter it again by the wicket leading into the Louvre Palace, adjoining the Tuileries. She thought, with reason, that the crowd would be less compact on that side. In fact the Rue Orties was nearly empty.

Crossing an angle of Carrousel Square she entered the Princes Courtyard, and looked for the porter. This man knew the Countess, having seen her go in and out of the palace during a day or two after the royal return from Versailles, in the autumn of 1789. Then he saw her go out one day, never to return again, — the day when she was pursued by Sebastien, and took the boy away in her carriage.

The porter consented to go after information. By the interior corridors he could speedily reach the heart of the palace. He learned that the three officers were all right. Monsieur de Charny, safe and sound, had first retired to his chamber; but fifteen minutes later he came out again, wearing his uniform as a marine officer, and reported himself to the Queen, in whose apartments he must be at that moment.

Andrée offered a reward to the man who brought her this good news; and then, stunned and trembling, she asked for a glass of water. Ah! Charny was at least safe!

After again thanking the kind-hearted porter, Andrée wended her way to her home in Rue Coq Heron. Once within its protection, she fell, not into an armchair or upon a sofa, but upon her prayer-stool.

It was not a verbal prayer she offered. There are times when our gratitude towards God is so great that words fail us, — when the hands, the eyes, the whole body, the whole heart, and the whole soul are raised to God.

She was absorbed in this happy ecstasy when she heard the door open. Slowly she turned, not understanding why any earthly noise should summon her from so deep a revery. There stood Andrée's chambermaid, looking for her mistress, who was almost lost in the obscurity of the room.

Behind the chambermaid was a shadow, whose outlines were undecided in the darkness; but Andrée's instinct at once gave to that shadow distinct outlines and a name, even before the chambermaid had time to announce the Count, Andrée's legal husband.

Andrée tried to rise from her knees, but her strength failed. Her knees fell again upon the cushion. Half facing around, she rested her arm on the slope of her priedieu, murmuring: "The Count, the Count!" Though he stood there before her eyes she could not believe him present.

Unable to speak she nodded for him to come in. The chambermaid stood aside to let Charny pass, and then shut the door. Charny and his Countess were alone.

"They told me you had come in, Madame. Am I indiscreet in following you so closely?"

"No!" replied Andrée, in tremulous tones, "no! You are welcome, Monsieur. I was so anxious that I have been out to learn what was taking place."

"You have been out? How long?"

"Since morning, Monsieur. First I went to the Saint Martin Barrier and then to the end of the Champs Élysées. There I saw — I saw —" She hesitated! — "I saw the royal family. — I saw you, and I was reassured, — at least momentarily; but everybody was alarmed on your account, when the time should come to leave the royal coach. Then I returned to the Tuileries Gardens. Ah! then I thought I should die."

"Yes!" said Charny, "the press was great. You were crowded, almost stifled! — I can understand —!"

"No, no!" said Andrée, shaking her head. "Oh no, it was n't that! At last I made inquiries, I heard of your safety. Then I came home, and — as you see, I am on my knees. I have been praying, — I — thanking God!"

"As you are on your knees, Madame, as you are in communion with God, do not rise without remembering in your petitions my poor brother!"

"Monsieur Isidore? Then it was indeed he! Unfortunate boy!" and as she spoke, she let her head fall upon her hands.

Charny took a few paces forward, and looked, with a profound expression of tender melancholy, upon this pure woman, as she prayed. There were also in his gaze elements of sympathy, pity, and gentleness, and something like repressed desire. Had not the Queen told him — or rather had she not allowed the strange revelation to escape her — that Andrée loved him?

Her prayer finished, the Countess turned towards him, and said:

"And so Isidore is dead?"

"Dead, Madame, — dead, like poor George; and he died for the same cause, and in the fulfilment of similar duties."

"And amidst the great sorrow which you must have felt over your brother's death, you have found time to think of me, Monsieur?" said Andrée, in such feeble tones that her words could hardly be understood.

Fortunately Charny listened with both heart and ears. "Madame," he said, "did you not charge my brother with an errand for me?"

"Monsieur!" stammered Andrée, partly raising herself, and regarding the Count with anxiety.

"Did you not give him a letter to my address?"

"Monsieur!" repeated Andrée, with quivering voice.

"After poor Isidore's death, his papers were handed to me, Madame, and your letter was among those papers."

"And you read it?" cried she, hiding her face in both hands.

"Madame, I was not to know the contents of that letter unless I was mortally wounded; and, as you see, I am safe and sound."

"And the letter—?"

"Is here and intact, Madame, just as you gave it to Isidore."

"Oh!" murmured Andrée, as she received the letter, "what you have done is either very kind or very cruel."

Charny extended his arms, and clasped Andrée's hand in both of his. She made a movement to withdraw her hand; but as Charny persisted, saying, "By your leave, Madame!" she heaved a sigh, almost of dread; but, powerless against her own heart, she left her tremulous and moist hand in his.

Embarrassed, not knowing which way to look, she was unable to escape Charny's ardent gaze, which was fixed on herself; and she could not withdraw, leaning, as she still was, against her priedieu.

At last she said: "I understand, Monsieur, and you have come to return me that letter?"

"For that, Madame, and for something else. — I have to ask your pardon, my Countess."

Andrée was thrilled to the core of her heart. This was the first time, so far as she could remember, that Charny had ever given her this title, without preluding it with the word Madame, or some more formal prefix. Then his voice pronounced the phrase, my Countess, with an inflection of infinite kindness.

At last she said: "My pardon, Monsieur? On what account, may I ask?"

"For the manner in which I have behaved towards you during the last six years!"

She looked at him in unfeigned surprise. "Have I ever complained, Monsieur?"

"No, Madame, — because you are an angel!"

In spite of herself her eyes grew dim, and she felt tears on her eyelids.

"You are weeping, Andrée?"

"Oh!" she exclaimed, bursting into tears, "forgive me, Monsieur, but I am not used to hearing you talk to me in this way. Ah, my God, my God!"

With an effort she rose to her feet, and then sank upon a lounge, burying her face in her hands. Presently she lowered her hands and said, shaking her head mournfully: "Indeed, I am but a foolish woman —!"

Then she paused suddenly. While her eyes were hidden, Charny had fallen upon his knees before her. "What? You on your knees, — at my feet?" she said.

"Did I not say I had come to ask your pardon?"

"At my knees, — at my feet?" she repeated, like one who could not believe her eyes.

"Andrée, you have taken away your hand!" and again Charny offered his hand to the young wife; but she recoiled, with an expression which resembled fear, as she asked: "What does this mean?"

"Andrée!" said Charny, in his softest tones, "it means that I love you."

She pressed a hand upon her heart and uttered a cry. Then she sprang to her feet, as if moved by an unseen spring. Pressing her temples between her hands she echoed his words: "He loves me! He loves me! Oh, but it 's impossible!"

"Say it may be impossible for you to love me, but do not say it is impossible for me to love you."

She looked down upon Charny, as if to ascertain if he were speaking the truth. The Count's great black eyes spoke far more eloquently than his tongue. If she doubted his words, she could not doubt his face.

"Oh my God, my God!" she moaned, "was ever in this world a creature so unhappy as myself?"

"Andrée, say you love me! or, if you cannot say you love me, at least say you do not hate me."

"I?—hate you?" and her eyes, usually so calm, so limpid, so serene, flashed with unwonted light. "Oh Monsieur, you would indeed be unjust, if you mistook for dislike the sentiment you rouse in me."

"If not antipathy and not love, what then is this sentiment, Andrée?"

"It is not love, because I have no right to love you. Did you not hear me just now cry aloud, before God, that I was the unhappiest woman on earth?"

"And why may you not love me, when I love you so much,—with all the strength of my nature?"

"That is what I do not wish to tell you! That is what I cannot, dare not tell you!" answered Andrée, wringing her hands.

Charny's voice grew softer and softer, as he said: "But what if this which you dare not, cannot, will not say, had already been told me by another?"

Andrée laid both hands on Charny's shoulders as she uttered a startled groan.

"What if I knew it all?" continued Charny.

"Oh God!"

"And what if I found you all the nobler, all the worthier, because of your misfortune? What if it is my knowledge of this which decided me to come and say that I love you?"

"If you have done this, Monsieur, you are the noblest and most generous of men."

"I love you, Andrée! I love you! I love you!" repeated Charny.

"Oh my God!" said she, lifting her hands to Heaven,

"I did not know there could be so much joy for me in the world."

"But now it is your turn, Andrée! Say that you love me!"

"Oh no, I dare not!" said Andrée; "but read that letter, which was to have been given you on your death-bed!" and she offered the Count the letter he had brought her.

While she covered her face with both hands, Charny broke the seal of that letter. As he read the first lines he uttered a cry. Then he removed Andrée's hands from her eyes, and at the same time folded her to his heart, as he passionately exclaimed: "Saintly creature! So thou hast loved me ever since our first meeting, six years ago. How ought I to love thee, to make thee forget all thy sufferings."

"My God!" murmured Andrée, bending like a reed under the weight of so much happiness, "if this is a dream, never let me awake from it, or I shall die in the waking!"

So let us forget those who are so happy, while we tell of others, who still suffer, who struggle, who hate; and perhaps the evil destiny of Charny and Andrée will also pass them by.

CHAPTER XIII.

A LITTLE SHADOW AFTER THE SUNSHINE.

On July 16, 1791, some twenty days after the events just described, two new personages whom we have till now delayed making known to our readers, in order that they might be presented in their most important period, are writing at the same table, in a little parlor opening on the fourth flat of the Hotel Britannique, situated on the Rue Guénégaud.

The little parlor is connected by one door with a modest dining-room, wherein may be seen the movables usually found in furnished lodgings, while another door opens into a chamber, where stand twin bedsteads.

The two writers are of opposite sexes, and each merits particular mention.

The man appears to be about sixty. He is tall and spare, and has the air of being both austere and impassioned. The straight lines of his face bespeak the calm and serious thinker, in whom upright and stern mental qualities dominate the imaginative fancies.

The woman would hardly be credited with years more than thirty or thirty-two, although in reality she is already over thirty-six. By a certain elasticity of the blood, by certain brilliant hues in her complexion, it is easy to see that she comes from plebeian stock. She has charming eyes, of that variable tint which takes on different shades of gray, green, and blue, — eyes which are at once mild and firm. Her mouth is large, but graced with rosy lips and white teeth. Both chin and nose are uptilted a trifle. Her hands are beautiful, as well as strong. Her form is undulating, womanly, and even voluptuous. Her throat is marvellous in outline, and she has the hips of the Syracusan Venus.

This man is Jean Marie Roland de la Plâtière, born in 1732, at Villefranche, near Lyons. The woman is Manon Jeanne Phlipon, born at Paris, in 1754. They have been married about eleven years, — that is, since 1780.

We have said that this woman arose from the people, as is proven by her names. Her baptismal names, Manon Jeanne, and her family name, Phlipon, alike indicate her origin. The daughter of an engraver, she worked at the same trade till the age of twenty-five, when she married Roland, who was two and twenty years her senior. Then she became a copyist, translator, compiler. Such works as one on Pyrotechnics, another on the Manufacture of Wool, and a Dictionary of Manufactures, absorbed the freshest years of her rich nature in crude and uncongenial labor; while her life remained free from error, almost from passion, — not through barrenness of heart, but through purity of soul.

In her relations to her husband, filial respect displaced womanly passion. Her affection was a species of chaste worship, outside of conjugal affinity, which often led her to quit her day's work at an early hour (though to do this she had afterwards to encroach upon the small hours of the night) in order to prepare a toothsome repast for the old man, whose enfeebled stomach could only bear certain peculiar kinds of food.

In 1789 Madame Roland was living an obscure and laborious life in the provinces. Her husband lived in the close, or purview, called Plâtière, from which he derived his surname. This court was situated at Villefranche, near Lyons, where they lived when both were roused by the cannons of the Bastille.

At this sound all that was grand, patriotic, saintly, and French awoke in the heart of this noble woman. France was no longer a kingdom; it was the Nation. It was not simply a country where people lived; it was Fatherland.

Then came the great Federation of 1790, in Paris, which was preceded, as may be remembered, by the lesser Federation at Lyons.

Jeanne Phlipon had been reared in her father's house on the Quai Horloge, along the bank of the Seine, near the Palace of Justice. From her girlhood's window, as she gazed upon the blue sky, she could see the sun rise, and follow its course as far as the end of the Champs Élysées, where it seemed to sink into a hillock of green and leafy trees. She also saw arise that other sun, at three in the morning, on the heights of Fourvières, — a sun far more luminous, more absorbing, which men call Liberty. At the period of the Lyons Federation her observation embraced the whole of that grand reunion of citizens; and her heart was plunged into an ocean of fraternity, whence she emerged like Achilles, invulnerable except in one spot. It was in this spot that Cupid wounded her, though she did not fall a helpless victim before his attack.

On the evening of that glorious day, thoroughly enthusiastic over what she had seen, with the feeling of the poet as well as the historian, she penned a description of the Federative Festival. This account she sent to her friend Champagneux, editor-in-chief of "The Lyons Journal." Astonished, dazzled, awe-struck with this blazing recital, he published it in his paper; and the next day, instead of the usual edition of twelve or fifteen hundred copies, this journal had to print sixty thousand.

In two words let us explain how it was that her poetic imagination and womanly heart embraced politics with such ardor. It was because Jeanne Phlipon, treated like an engraver's apprentice by her father, — it was because Madame Roland, treated like a secretary by her husband, — found, alike in the paternal home and the matrimonial residence, only the severer side of life. Madame Roland, through whose hands had never passed a frivolous book, found her greatest recreation, her supreme pastime, in such works as the "Official Report of the Electors of 1789" and the "Story of the Capture of the Bastille."

As to Roland, he was in himself an example of how chance or fate, through some apparently unimportant occurrence, may bring about immense changes in the career of a man or the existence of an empire.

He was the youngest of five brothers. They wished to make a priest of him, but he preferred to remain a man. At the age of nineteen he left the paternal mansion, on foot, alone, and without money. Traversing France he went to Nantes, took service with a shipowner, and was ordered to go to India. When the time came for his departure, at the very hour when he was due aboard the ship, he began to spit blood, and the physician straightway forbade his going to sea.

Had Cromwell sailed for America, instead of remaining in England, — detained by order of Charles the First, — mayhap the scaffold of Whitehall would never have been reared. If Roland had sailed for the Indies, perhaps the Tenth of August would never have found its historic place.

Unable to fulfil his agreement with the merchant,

Roland left Nantes and went to Rouen, where one of his relatives, upon whom he called, recognized the ability of the young man, and obtained him a position as Inspector of Manufactures.

Henceforth Roland's life became one of constant study and labor. Economy was his muse, and Commerce his inspiring god. He travelled, he edited the writings of others, he wrote essays on the breeding of sheep and on theories of mechanism. He wrote Letters from Sicily, from Italy, from Malta. He wrote also "The French Financier," and other works before alluded to, — which were copied by his wife, whom he espoused, as we have already stated, in 1780.

Four years afterward he went with her to England. On their return he sent her to Paris, to ask for a patent of nobility and solicit an appointment as Inspector at Lyons, instead of Rouen. As far as the appointment was concerned, her mission was a success. As to the letters of nobility, they were not granted. So Roland went to Lyons, where he belonged to the popular ranks in spite of himself, — whereto he was also impelled by his instincts and convictions.

When the Revolution broke out he was exercising his functions as Inspector of Commerce and Manufactures for the Lyons District; and at the dawn of this new and regenerating period, he and his wife felt germinating in their hearts that beautiful plant called Enthusiasm, with its leaves of gold and its diamond flower.

We have seen how Madame Roland wrote her account of the Lyons Federation; how the journal publishing it had to print sixty thousand copies; and how each National Guardsman, returning to his native village, town, or city, carried with him a portion of Madame Roland's heart.

As the journal did not name the author, and as the article itself was not signed, everybody was free to think that it was Liberty herself who came down to earth, and dictated to some unknown prophet the story of the festival, — as the angel dictated to Saint John the Revelation bearing his name.

The Rolands were full of faith, full of confidence, full of hope. They were living in a circle of friends, — Champagneux, Bosc, Lanthenas, and perhaps two or three others, — when this circle was enlarged by a new friend.

Lanthenas, who lived on very familiar terms with the Rolands, — passing days, weeks, months in their home, — one evening brought with him one of those Electors whose Official Report Madame Roland had so much admired.

This new-comer was Bancal des Issarts. He was a man thirty-nine years old, — handsome, unostentatious, noble, tender, and religious, without intellectual brilliancy, but with a generous heart and a loving soul. He had been a notary, but had given up his business in order to devote himself wholly to politics and philosophy.

At the end of a week spent in the Roland home, the new guest, their host, and Lanthenas agreed so well, — the group formed such a harmonious trinity in their devotion to country, their love of liberty, and their respect for all things holy, — that the three men resolved never to separate, but to live together and bear the expense in common. Especially when Bancal left them for a season was the need of this reunion peculiarly felt. Thus did Roland write :

Come, my friend. Why do you delay ? You have seen our free and open way of living and acting. It is not at my age that a man changes, whose life has never varied. We preach Patriotism. We elevate the soul. Lanthenas does duty as physician ; and my wife is the sick-nurse of the district ; while you and I, — well, we manage the business of the society.

The union of these three well-to-do gentlemen furnished something like a small fortune. Lanthenas had some twenty thousand francs, Roland had sixty thousand, and Bancal a hundred thousand.

Roland fulfilled his mission as an apostle. In his rounds as Inspector he catechised the peasants of the countryside. An excellent pedestrian, this pilgrim of humanity, staff in hand, went north and south, east and west, everywhere sowing the new word of life, the fertile grain of liberty, — on the right and left, before and behind him.

Simple, eloquent, passionate, under his cool exterior, Bancal was truly a helper, a disciple, a second self for Roland. The notion never entered the head of the future colleague of Clavière and Dumouriez that Bancal might fall in love with his wife, and that she might reciprocate this sentiment. During five or six years had not Lanthenas, young man as he was, remained near this chaste, industrious, sober, pure woman, like a brother near his sister? Was not Jeanne, Madame Roland, a very statue of Force and Virtue?

Roland was therefore very happy when Bancal answered the billet just cited, with an affectionate letter full of tender allegiance. Roland received this letter while he was at Lyons, and immediately sent it to Plâtière, where his wife was.

Do not read what I say! Read Michelet, if you would have a clear analysis of that admirable woman whom we call Madame Roland!

She received that letter on one of those hot days when electricity courses through the air, when the coldest hearts are animated, when marble itself sees visions and quivers with dream-life. It was already autumn, and yet a heavy storm was muttering in the sky.

Since the day when she first saw Bancal, new emotions had been awakened in the heart of this chaste woman. That heart opened, like the chalice of a flower, and gave out its perfume. A sweet song, like that of some bird in the deepest forest, was warbling in her ear. One could see that it was springtime in her fancy, and that she could now see beyond the mist — which heretofore had obstructed her view — those unknown fields, where the hand of the powerful machinist, whom we call Deity, was preparing a new outlook into life, full of odorous thickets, refreshing cascades, shady grassplots, and vistas of sunshine.

She had never really known love's passion; but, like all women, she divined its nature. She understood the peril. Smiling through her tears, she went straight to her desk. Without hesitation, without circumlocution, she wrote to Bancal, exposing to him — poor wounded Chlorinda as she was — the flaw in her armor, avowing her sentiments, yet with the same breath killing the hope to which this avowal must give birth.

Bancal understood. No longer did he talk of rejoining their family, but went to England, where he remained two years.

Such hearts as these belong to classic antiquity. After all the tumults and passions of which we have been the mutual witnesses, it has seemed to me well to let my readers repose awhile in the shadow of such pure and refreshing beauty, strength, and virtue.

Let it not be said that we represent Madame Roland as otherwise than she really was, — chaste in her father's workshop, chaste in the chamber of her elderly spouse, chaste by the cradle of her child. At an hour when one does not lie, standing face to face with the guillotine, she wrote: "I have always commanded my passions, and no woman ever lived freer from sensuality than myself."

Coldness must not be credited with the merit of her chastity. No! The epoch in which she lived was an epoch of hatred, I know; but it was also an epoch of love.

France set the example. This poor captive, long imprisoned, long in fetters, had shaken off her chains, and been restored to liberty. Like Marie Stuart, when she came from her prison-house, France wished to kiss the lips of all creation, and inspire it with her breath, that it might bring forth liberty for her country and independence for the world.

All these women loved holily, all these men loved ardently, — Lucile and Camille Desmoulins, Danton and his Louise, Mademoiselle de Kéralio and Robert, Sophie and Condorcet, Vergniaud and Mademoiselle Candeille. There was not one, even the cynical and sarcastic Robespierre, cutting and cold as the knife of the guillotine, who did not feel his heart throb before the hearthstone of love. Robespierre loved the daughter of his landlord, the carpenter, whose acquaintance we shall hereafter make.

Love is the one great virtue of the heart. Though the love we refer to was less pure, — that must be acknowledged! — yet was it not as genuine as the love of Madame Tallien, as the love of Madame de Beauharnais, as the love of Madame de Genlis, — as the affection of all lovers whose whispered consolations illuminated the pale faces of their dying friends, even on the scaffold?

At that happy epoch all the world was in love; and love must be taken in all its senses. Some loved ideals, and others loved matter. These loved their country, and those the human race. The need of love had been growing ever since Rousseau's time. One might have supposed it was necessary to hasten after love before it had flown, — that as they drew nearer the tomb, the gulf, the abyss, each heart palpitated with an unknown emotion, passionate and devouring. It seemed as if each bosom inhaled its breath from the universal fireside, whereon all affections were merged in one universal love.

We have wandered far from the old husband and the young wife, writing in the fourth story of the Hotel Britannique. To them let us return anon.

CHAPTER XIV.

THE FIRST REPUBLICANS.

On February 20, 1791, Roland was sent from Lyons to Paris, as a special Deputy, to plead the cause of twenty thousand famished laborers.

He had been over four months in Paris when the startling events occurred at Varennes, — events which had such an influence over our personages, and over the destiny of France, that we have felt it our duty to devote many chapters to this subject.

In the interval between the royal return, June 26, and the date of the events now to be recorded, July 16, a great many things had come to light.

Everybody shouted, "The King is saved!" Everybody ran after the King. Everybody assisted in bringing him back to Paris; but when the King had returned, when once more the King was in Paris, when once more the King was in the Tuileries, — why, nobody knew what to do with him.

Everybody had an opinion. Opinions blew from all points of the compass, like the wind in a gale. Ill fares the ship at sea in such a storm!

On June 21, when the King's flight became known, the Cordelier Club issued a notice, signed by Legendre, the French butcher, whom the Queen (in her conversation with Barnave) referred to as a copy of the English butcher, Harrison.

For an epigram the placard bore the following stanza:

Si, parmi les Français, il se trouvait un traître,
Qui regrettât les rois et qui voulût un maître,
Que le perfide meure au milieu des tourments,
Et que sa cendre soit abandonnée aux vents.

This epigram may be almost literally translated into English as follows:

If, among the French people, there liveth a traitor,
Who regretteth our kings and who wisheth a master,
May the false-hearted die amidst torments of mind,
And his ashes be scattered on wings of the wind.

Although written by Voltaire, these verses are not remarkably well rhymed; but they neatly expressed the ideas of those who issued the notice, and also lent a literary flavor to the placard.

This poster declared that all the members of the Cordelier Club had sworn to stab any tyrant who dared attack the country, liberty, or the Constitution.

As to Marat, who always marched on alone, — and who offered, as the excuse for his isolation, that turkeys train in flocks, while the eagle lives in solitude, — Marat proposed a dictatorship, as may be seen by the following paragraph in his journal:

Take a worthy Frenchman, some good Patriot, — take a citizen who, ever since the beginning of the Revolution, has shown the most intelligence, the most zeal, fidelity, and disinterestedness, — take such a one for a leader, without further delay, or the Revolutionary cause is lost!

All of which meant, Take Marat!

As to Prudhomme, he proposed neither a new man nor a new government; yet he abominated the old dynasty, in the person of Louis Sixteenth and his descendants. Hear him:

On the next day but one the Dauphin was taken out for the air, on the terrace of the Tuileries, which looks out upon the river. Whenever they saw a sizable group of citizens a hireling grenadier took the child in his arms, and seated him on the stone parapet of the terrace; and the royal puppet, faithful to his morning's instructions, threw kisses to the populace. This was done to curry favor for his papa and mamma. Several spectators were cowardly enough to shout "Hurrah for the Dauphin!"

Citizens, be on your guard against such cajoleries from a Court which only fawns upon the people and grovels before them, when not itself the stronger.

After these paragraphs came certain historic citations:

It was on January 27, 1649, that the English Parliament condemned Charles the First to have his head cut off, for having tried to extend the royal prerogatives, and for maintaining the encroachments of his father, James the First. It was on January 30 that he expiated his misdeeds, — almost legalized by usage, and sustained by a numerous party; but the people made themselves heard, and Parliament declared the King a fugitive, traitor, and public enemy, and Charles Stuart was beheaded in front of the banquet-room of Whitehall Palace.

Bravo, Citizen Prudhomme! You are certainly not behindhand; and on January 21, 1793, when Louis Sixteenth takes his turn at decapitation, you may well claim the initiative step, having suggested this example as early as June 27, 1791.

It is true that Monsieur Prudhomme, — who must not be confounded with our witty friend Monnier, for the former was an honest man, though a fool, — it is true that Monsieur Prudhomme later became a Royalist and a Conservative, and published his "History of the Crimes Committed during the Revolution." What a good thing is conscience!

"The Iron Mouth" was more outspoken. No hypocrisy, no words of double meaning, no perfidy. It was Bonneville who edited it, — young Bonneville, — faithful, fearless, and admirably foolish fellow, who erred in regard to common affairs, but was never mistaken in great matters. It was published, this "Iron Mouth," in the Rue Ancienne Comédie, near the Odéon, two steps from the meeting-place of the Cordelier Club. This is what it said:

By the Constitutional oath the infamous word king has been effaced. No more kings for us! No more man-eaters! Often has the name been changed heretofore, but the thing has been retained. Now let us have no Regent, no Dictator, no Protector, no Orleans, no Lafayette. I like neither the son of Philippe d'Orleans, who to-day mounts guard at the Tuileries, nor his father, who is never seen at the Assembly, but who may constantly be seen on the Feuillant Terrace, at the gate of the palace. Must a nation be always under tutelage? Let our departments unite, and declare that they will have neither tyrants nor monarchs, neither protector nor regent, nor any such ghosts of royalty, — whose shadow is as fateful to the public weal as is the cursed Indian Upas to those who come beneath its shade.

It is not enough to pronounce the word Republic! Venice was a republic, but full of tyranny. What is needed is a National Commonwealth, a National Government. Call together the people in the light of the blessed sunshine. Proclaim to them Law as the only sovereign. Swear that Law alone shall reign. There is not a friend of liberty on earth who will not repeat that oath!

As to Camille Desmoulins, he mounted a chair in the gardens of the Palace Royal, the usual scene of his oratorical exploits, and said: "Gentlemen, it will be a misfortune if this faithless man is brought back to us. What shall we do with him? He comes like Thersites, to shed the great tear of which Homer speaks. If he is brought back, I make a motion that he be three days exposed to public ridicule, with a red handkerchief on his head, and then conducted to the frontier by easy stages."

Let us own, of all the propositions offered, that this one, from that terrible fellow called Camille Desmoulins, was not the silliest.

One more word, to picture the general sentiment. It is Dumont who speaks, a Genevese, pensioned by England, and therefore not to be suspected of partiality towards France.

> The people seem inspired with supreme wisdom. We are rid of a great embarrassment; but if the King has cleared out, the Nation remains. It is easy enough to get on with a kingless nation, but not with a nationless King.

Among all these utterances we can see that the word republic was not yet spoken, except by Bonneville. Neither Brissot nor Danton nor Robespierre — not even Pétion himself — dared utter that word. It frightened the Cordeliers, and was beneath the notice of the Jacobins.

On July 13 Robespierre said, on the platform: "I am neither a Republican nor a Monarchist."

If Robespierre had been driven to the wall, he would have been greatly embarrassed to say what he was.

Well, everybody was in just about that condition, except Bonneville, — and also except that lady who, sitting opposite her husband, on the fourth floor in the Rue Guénégaud, was busily engaged in copying a political protest. On June 22, the Wednesday after the royal flight, she wrote:

Sentiments of republicanism, of indignation against Louis the Sixteenth, and of hatred of kings in general, are breathed on all sides.

This sentiment, as we see, the sentiment of republicanism, was in every heart, but the word republic was spoken by few lips. Above all, the Assembly was hostile thereto.

It is the great misfortune of assemblies and parliaments to come to a stop as soon as they are elected, — to no longer take note of events, no longer march on with the national spirit. They do not follow whither the people lead, and yet they claim to still represent the people.

This is what the Assembly said:

The customs of France are not Republican.

The Assembly had a tussle with Monsieur de la Palisse, and in our opinion got the better of that illustrious truth-teller. What was to give Republican manners and habits and customs to France? The monarchy? No, the monarchy was not so stupid. The monarchy wanted obedience, servility, corruption, and the monarchy therefore cultivated the fashions of corruption, servility, and obedience. First get your Republic, and Republican manners will come in good time.

There was one moment when the proclamation of a republic would have been very easy; and that was when the King was on the wing, taking the Dauphin along with him. Instead of being pursued and brought back, the royal fugitives should have been furnished with the best horses from the post-stables, and with vigorous postilions, with whips in their hands and spurs on their boots. Then the courtiers should have been driven away after the King, and the priests after the courtiers; and the door should have been shut behind them. Even Lafayette, who sometimes had flashes of sense, though he rarely had ideas, enjoyed one of these flashes.

At six in the morning of June 21 somebody came to inform Lafayette that the royal family had run away. It required all the pains in the world to wake him up, for he generally slept that historic "sleep of the just" for which he had already been reproached at Versailles.

"Gone? Impossible! Why, I left Gouvion leaning sleepily against the door of their bedrooms." So spake the General.

Forthwith he left his bed, dressed himself, and went downstairs. At the door he met Bailly, who was Mayor of Paris, and Beauharnais, the President of the Assembly. Bailly's face was as yellow and his nose as long as ever. Beauharnais was in consternation.

Curious, was it not, that Josephine's first husband, whose death, on the scaffold, left the way clear for his widow to ascend the throne as Napoleon's wife, should have felt such consternation over the flight of Louis the Sixteenth?

"What a misfortune," cried Bailly, "that the Assembly is not yet in session!"

"Yes," said Beauharnais, "a great misfortune!"

"Wait a bit!" said Lafayette. "Is he really gone?"

"Alas, yes!" responded the two astute statesmen, simultaneously.

"Why alas?" asked Lafayette.

"What? Can't you understand?" cried Bailly. "Why, he'll come back with Prussians, Austrians, and all the Court fugitives at his heels; because he'll force us into civil war or foreign war."

"Then," said Lafayette, hardly convinced, "you think that the public welfare demands the return of the King?"

"Yes!" was the united reply of Mayor Bailly and President Beauharnais.

"In that case we must send after him," said Lafayette; and he wrote the following order:

The enemies of our country having abducted the King, the National Guards are ordered to arrest them.

Take notice that all the politics of 1791, and the entire aim of the National Assembly, turned upon this one point: as the King was a French necessity, and must be brought back, it must not be said that he had escaped of his own accord, but that he had been abducted by his enemies.

However, Lafayette was not convinced; so he sent Romeuf on the royal track, with instructions not to be too much in a hurry. The young aide would have taken the road opposite to the King's, so as not to overtake him. Indeed he did start the wrong way, but unfortunately Billot was on the right track.

When the Assembly heard the news it was terrified. Indeed, on his departure the King had left a menacing letter, and it was perfectly evident that he had gone over to the national enemies, with whom he would return, and try to bring France to reason. On the other hand the Royalists raised their heads and lifted their voices. One of them, Suleau, wrote as follows:

All who wish to be included in the amnesty which we offer our enemies in the name of the Prince de Condé, may inscribe their names in our office, between now and the month of August. We have fifteen hundred registers for the accommodation of the public.

One of the most frightened citizens was Robespierre. The session of the Assembly being suspended from three till half-past five, he ran to Pétion. The weak man sought the support of the strong.

According to Robespierre, Lafayette was but an accomplice of the Court. He was agitated over nothing less than a prospective Saint Bartholomew Massacre among the Deputies. "I shall be one of the first to suffer," he said. "I have not over twenty-four hours to live."

Pétion's character, on the contrary, was calm and lymphatic, and he saw things differently. He replied: "Oh, now we know the King so well, we can act accordingly."

Brissot came in, — one of the most progressive men of that epoch, and a writer for "The Patriot." He exclaimed to his friends: "A new journal is to be founded, of which I 'm to be the editor."

"What is it?"

When he explained that it was to be called "The Republican," Robespierre made a grimace and said: "I wish you would explain to me what a republic is."

They were there, in Pétion's apartments, when the two Rolands came to see their friend. The husband was austere and resolute, as always. The wife, with her beautiful, sparkling, and speaking eyes, was calm and jubilant, rather than dismayed. They had come from home, and had seen the notice issued by the Cordeliers. Like the Cordeliers, the Rolands did not believe a king was of the least earthly importance to a nation.

The courage of this husband and wife restored Robespierre's. He returned to the session of the Assembly as an observer, ready to profit by any turn of affairs, as the fox watches the terrier from his hiding-place. Towards nine o'clock in the evening he found that the tendency of the members was towards sentimentalism, that they were preaching fraternity; and that, to join example to theory, they would soon adjourn in a body to the Jacobin Club, with whom they had been on bad terms, — the Deputies even calling the Jacobins a band of assassins.

Robespierre slipped from his bench, crawled towards the door, squirmed through it without being noticed, ran to the old chapel where the Jacobins were assembled, mounted the platform, denounced the King, denounced the cabinet, denounced Bailly, denounced Lafayette, denounced the entire Assembly, repeated his fable of the morning, described an imaginary Saint Bartholomew's Day, and finished by laying his existence upon the altar of Patriotism.

When Robespierre spoke on his own account he always attained a certain standard of eloquence. At the very idea that the virtuous, the austere Robespierre was incurring any great danger, the audience sobbed. "If thou diest, we will die with thee!" cried a voice. "Yes, yes! All of us, all of us!" repeated a chorus of auditors. Some raised their hands to swear it. Some drew their swords, while others fell upon their knees, with their arms raised to Heaven. Everybody lifted his arms heavenward in those days. It was the fashion of the epoch. Look at David's picture of the Oath in the Tennis Court.

Madame Roland was there, not too well understanding how Robespierre was running any special danger; but she was a woman, and consequently accessible to emotion.

The excitement was great. She also was moved, as she herself acknowledges.

At that moment Danton entered the chapel. As his popularity was growing, it was for him to assail the wavering popularity of Lafayette.

Wherefore this general dislike of Lafayette? Perhaps because he was an honest man, and always the dupe of those who appealed to his generosity.

When the members of the Assembly were announced, when Lafayette and Lameth, two mortal enemies, entered the hall arm in arm, in order to set an example of fraternity, the cry was heard on all sides: "Danton to the platform! To the platform! Danton!"

Robespierre asked nothing better than to yield his place. Robespierre, as we have said, was a fox, and not a mastiff. He pursued the absent enemy, sprang upon him from behind, pinned his shoulders, gnawed his skull to the quick, but rarely attacked him face to face.

The tribune was vacant, waiting for Danton; only it was difficult for Danton to take the stand. If he was the only man able to assail Lafayette, Lafayette was perhaps the one man whom Danton dared not attack.

Why? Ah, we will tell you. There was much of Mirabeau in Danton, as there was much of Danton in Mirabeau. They had the same temperament, the same need of sensual pleasure, the same need of money; and they consequently offered the same facilities for corruption.

We are assured that, like Mirabeau, Danton received Court gold. When? By what means? How much? No one knew; but that he had received it, everybody was sure. At least, so it was said.

Here is the reality underlying all this talk. Danton had just sold to the ministry his position as Advocate to the King's Council, and it was said he received from the ministry four times as much as the office was really worth, or as appeared on the surface.

This was true; only the secret was between three persons: the seller, Danton; the buyer, Monsieur de Montmorin; the negotiator, Lafayette.

If Danton attacked Lafayette, the General might throw into Danton's face the whole story of this sale of an office for four times its value.

Any other man would have shrunk back. Danton, on the contrary, went straight on. He knew Lafayette, and how the generosity of his heart oft degenerated into asininity; in proof whereof we may recall his action in 1830, — forty years later.

Danton said to himself that Montmorin, the friend of Lafayette, — Montmorin, who had signed the King's passport, — was too much compromised at that moment for Lafayette to throw this new stone, which might prove a boomerang.

Danton ascended the platform. His speech was not long.

"Monsieur President, I accuse Lafayette. Let the traitor come here. Let two scaffolds be prepared, and I will consent to mount one of them, if he is not found worthy to mount the other."

The traitor did not come. He was there already. He heard the terrible accusation from Danton's mouth; but as Danton had foreseen, Lafayette was too generous to respond.

Lameth took this duty upon himself. Over Danton's stream of lava Lameth poured the lukewarm water of his ordinary pastorals, and preached fraternity.

Then came Sieyès, who also preached fraternity. Then Barnave preached fraternity.

These three popular orators finished by overpowering Danton's influence. The observers were glad Danton attacked Lafayette; but they were also glad that Lameth, Sieyès, and Barnave defended him; and when Lafayette and Danton left the Jacobin Club, it was Lafayette who was accompanied with torches and acclamations.

The Court party claimed a great victory in this ovation to Lafayette. The two great powers of the day had been beaten in the persons of their chiefs, — the Jacobins, in Robespierre, the Cordeliers, in Danton.

It is very evident that it will take another chapter to describe the protest which Madame Roland copied, as she sat face to face with her husband, in that little parlor on the fourth floor of the Hotel Britannique.

CHAPTER XV.

THE LOWER FLOOR OF THE TUILERIES.

Now we must learn the contents of the protest which Madame Roland was copying; but in order for the reader to become familiar with the situation, and see his way clearly through one of the darkest and most mysterious periods of the Revolution, let him go with us through the Tuileries, on the night of July 15, 1791.

Behind the door of a suite of apartments opening upon an obscure and deserted corridor, situated in the lower story of the palace, stands a woman "with an attent ear," and her hand on the key, who trembles at every step which rouses an echo in her neighborhood.

If we are ignorant who the woman is, it will be difficult for us to recognize her; for not only does darkness reign in this corridor in the daytime, but it is now night, and, either accidentally or intentionally, the wick of the one argand lamp, which burns near by, is turned down so far as to be nearly extinguished.

Moreover, the second room in the suite is the only one lighted, and it is against the door of the first room the woman stands listening and trembling.

Who is the woman who thus watches? Marie Antoinette! For whom doth she wait? Barnave!

Oh, superb daughter of Maria Theresa, who could have conjectured, on the day when you were consecrated as Queen of France, that there would come a time, when, concealed behind the door of your chambermaid's rooms, trembling with fear and hope, you would await the arrival of a petty lawyer from Grenoble, — you, who so often disappointed Mirabeau, and deigned to receive but one visit from him?

Let there be no mistake, however. It is political interest which leads the Queen to thus await Barnave. In that suspended breath, in those nervous movements, in that hand which freezes to the key, the heart counts for nothing; pride only is concerned.

We say pride; for it is evident, despite the thousand persecutions of which the King and Queen have been the butt since their return, inasmuch as their lives are now safe, all questions are summed up in these few words: Shall the Varennes fugitives lose the rest of their power, or shall they reconquer the power already lost?

On that fatal evening when Charny quitted the Tuileries, nevermore to return, the Queen's heart ceased to throb with any tender sentiment. During several days she remained indifferent to everything, even to insults; but little by little she perceived that two traits in her powerful organization were still alive, pride and hatred, and she came to herself in order to hate and be avenged.

Not revenge on Charny did she seek, nor did she hate Andrée. When she thought of them, it was herself whom the Queen despised, and on herself she would be revenged; for she was too truthful not to see that on her side were all the wrongs, and on theirs all the devotion.

If she could have hated them, she would have been happy. What she did hate, from the bottom of her heart, was the populace, who had laid hands on her, as if she were an ordinary fugitive from justice, — the people who pursued her with insults, covered her with shame, filled her with disgust. Yes, she hated the people who once called her Madame Deficit and Madame Veto, who now called her that Austrian woman, and who, in the future, were to call her the Widow Capet; and if ever she could be avenged, she meant to be.

Now that which summoned Barnave to her on July 15, 1791, at nine in the evening, — while Madame Roland, in that little parlor on the fourth floor of the Hotel Britannique, was copying that protest of whose contents we are still in ignorance, — was perhaps impotency and despair; but it was possibly also that divine recompense which we call Vengeance.

The situation was grave. Thanks to Lafayette and the National Assembly, the first blow had been parried with the shield of the Constitution. The King had not fled! Oh, no! He had been abducted, — that was all!

We must not however forget the bulletin issued by the Cordelier Club; we must not forget Marat's proposal for a dictatorship; we must not forget the petty diatribe of Citizen Prudhomme, about the Dauphin's outing on the terrace; we must not forget the whimsical utterances of Bonneville; we must not forget the suggestion that the King should be carried back to the frontier as a public curiosity; we must not forget the clever axiom of the Genevese Dumont; and we must not forget the establishment of a new journal, which Brissot was to control, and which was to be called "The Republican."

Would you like to see the prospectus of that journal? It is short, but explicit. It was written in English, by Thomas Paine, and then translated into French, by a young officer who had fought in the American Revolution; and it was published over the signature, Duchâtelet.

How strange was the fatality which, from the four corners of the world, called together new enemies of the crumbling throne. Thomas Paine! What brought him hither, — that man who belonged to all countries, England, America, France, who had tried all trades, as manufacturer, schoolmaster, tax-gatherer, sailor, journalist? What he came for was to mingle his breath with the storm which whistled pitilessly over a dying flame.

Here is the prospectus of "The Republican" of 1791, that journal which appeared, or was on the eve of publication at the very time when Robespierre was asking what a republic could be:

We have just proved that a king's absence is worth more than his presence. He deserted his throne, and this amounted to abdication. The Nation will never regain its confidence in the perjured runaway.

Was his flight the work of others, or himself? What matters that? Whether a knave or an idiot, he is equally unworthy of power. We are well rid of him, and he is free from us. He is now a simple individual, Louis de Bourbon. As for his safety, that is certain, for France will never dishonor herself; but royalty is finished. What is an office worth, when left to the chance of birth, and liable to be filled by an idiot? It is a cipher, a nonentity.

One may understand the effect produced by such a bulletin, pasted on the walls of Paris. Malouet, the Constitutionalist, was amazed. Affrighted and out of breath he entered the National Assembly, denounced the prospectus, and demanded the arrest of its authors.

"So be it!" said Pétion; "but let us first read the prospectus."

Pétion, one of the few Republicans then converted in France, knew this prospectus perfectly well. Malouet, who denounced it, was reluctant to have it read. What if the Deputies should applaud it? and he was almost certain they would applaud it.

Two members of the Assembly, Chabroud and Chapelier, tried to repair the blunder of their colleague, by saying: "The press is free, and every one, wise or foolish, has a right to set forth his opinions. Let us pay no heed to the utterance of frenzy, but pass on to the business of the day!" and this the Assembly did; so let us talk no more about it.

Nevertheless, here was the hydra which menaced the monarchy. Cut off one head; and even as you push it aside, another stings you.

The conspiracy of Monsieur with Favras had not been forgotten, — the time when it was proposed to get the King out of the way and appoint Monsieur as Regent. Now nobody thought about Monsieur. He had fled at the same time as the King; only he was more lucky than his brother, and reached the frontier.

But the Duke d'Orleans still remained. He remained with his sworn friend, with the man who constantly urged him forward, — Laclos, the author of "Dangerous Entanglements."

There was in existence a decree concerning a regency, — a decree mouldering in the archives. Why not utilize that old decree?

In its issue of June 28 a certain journal offered the regency to Orleans. Apparently Louis Sixteenth no longer existed, as you see; although there was still the National Assembly. As there was no longer a king, why not offer the regency to Orleans? It may be readily understood that the Duke pretended to be astonished, and refused the offer.

Nevertheless, on the First of July, Laclos, on his own private authority, proclaimed the forfeiture of the throne, and the need of a regent. On July 3 Réal set forth the idea that the proper guardian of the young prince was Orleans. On the next day he made a demand, from the rostrum of the Jacobin Club, that the old decree, as to a regency, be reprinted and published. Unfortunately the Jacobins, although they did not yet know precisely where they stood, at least knew where they did not stand. They were not Orleanists, although both Orleans and Chartres belonged to their society. The regency of Orleans was rejected by the Jacobins.

One night sufficed for Laclos to regain his breath. If not the master of the Jacobins, he was at least master of his journal, and in that he proclaimed the regency of Orleans; and as the word protector had been profaned by Cromwell, the Regent, though he was to have all power, was to be called the moderator.

All this, as one may see, was a campaign against royalty, — a campaign wherein royalty, in itself powerless, had no other ally except the National Assembly; whereas the Jacobins constituted an assembly more influential and more dauntless than the National Assembly itself.

On July 8 — you see we are gradually coming nearer the end! — Pétion brought up the question of royal inviolability; making, however, a distinction between political inviolability and personal inviolability.

It was objected that if Louis the Sixteenth should be deposed, this action would embroil France with the kings of other nations.

"If other kings wish to fight us," responded Pétion, "by deposing Louis Sixteenth we shall deprive them of their most powerful ally; whereas, if we leave him on the throne, we give our enemies all the force which we restore to King Louis."

Brissot mounted the tribune in his turn, and went yet farther. He examined this question: Can the King be legally tried. "Later," he said, "in case of deposition, we will discuss what sort of government shall be substituted for royalty."

It is said that Brissot was superb. Madame Roland was at the session. Listen to what she wrote:

Not merely plaudits, but cries and transports were heard on all sides. Thrice the entire legislative body was constrained to rise. Arms were upraised, hats were waving in the air, and there was inexpressible enthusiasm. Perish forever those who witness and share such great outbreaks, and yet are willing to resume their chains!

It was not only decided that the King might be tried, if necessary, but the resolution was passed with great enthusiasm.

Imagine what a terrible echo these plaudits must have roused in the Tuileries!

In its turn the National Assembly could not avoid grappling with this formidable question.

The Constitutionalists, instead of shirking this debate, provoked it, feeling sure of a majority; but the majority of the Assembly was far from representing the majority of the Nation. What mattered that? Legislative bodies seldom worry themselves over such little anomalies. They enact laws, and the people upset them; and when the people defeat what the legislature has decreed, then you have a revolution.

On July 13 the public seats were filled with reliable fellows, introduced in advance by special tickets. These constituted what we should to-day call, in a theatre, the claque, or hired band of applauders. Outside the hall, the corridors were filled with Royalists. For this occasion the Poniard Knights again came to the front.

By request of a member the Tuileries Gardens were closed. Perhaps on that night the Queen waited for Barnave as impatiently as she did on the evening of July 15.

Nothing was decided on that day, however; only the report was read, as prepared by a committee. In this report it was said:

> The flight of the King is not a case provided for in the Constitution; but the royal inviolability is therein decreed.

That is, — the Constitution declared the King's royal person too sacred to be touched, but did not take into account the possibility of his running away.

The committee, therefore, regarding the King himself as beyond legislative jurisdiction, could only recommend the delivery to justice of the elder Bouillé, Charny, Madame de Tourzel, the young noblemen who acted as couriers, the attendants, and lackeys. Never was there a better illustration of the ingenious fable about great and little fishes. Let the net hold those who are not too strong to escape its meshes.

This question was debated far more zealously in the Jacobin Club than in the Assembly.

As it was not yet decided, Robespierre was still on the fence. He was neither a Republican nor a Monarchist. One could be as liberal under a king as with a senate.

He was a man who rarely compromised himself, this Robespierre; and yet we saw, at the end of the preceding chapter, what terrors gat hold upon him, even when he was not compromised.

There are some men, however, who have not so much precious prudence. Such men were Danton, the ex-advocate, and Legendre, the butcher, — a bulldog and a bear.

"The Assembly may absolve the King," said Danton; "but this judgment will be reversed by France, for France condemns him."

"The committee-men are fools!" said Legendre. "If they knew the spirit of the masses, they would return to reason. If I speak thus, it is for the committee's own good."

Such speeches roused the indignation of the Constitutionalists; but, unhappily for them, they did not form the majority among the Jacobins, as they did in the Assembly, and so they contented themselves by withdrawing from the club. They erred. It is always a mistake to quit one's place. "The absent are always in the wrong." There is also another old French proverb, full of good sense: "Who quits his place, loses it."

Not only did the Constitutionalists lose their places, but their places were speedily taken by popular deputations, bearing petitions against the committee. This was what took place at the Jacobin Club, where these new members were received with acclamations.

Meantime an address, which was bound to win for itself a certain importance in the events which followed, was prepared at the other end of Paris, in the Marais (or Swamp) district, by a club — or rather by a fraternal union — of men and women, called the Society of Minims, — a name suggested perhaps by the little fishes which abounded in that locality in those days.

This society was an appendage of the Cordelier Club, being also animated by the spirit of Danton. A young man of twenty-three or twenty-four years old, upon whom Danton had breathed his spirit, and who was animated by that breath, held the pen and prepared the address.

This young man was Jean Lambert Tallien. The address bore a formidable signature. It was signed, The People.

On July 14 the discussion was begun in the Assembly. This time it was impossible to keep the public out of the galleries, impossible also to fill up the corridors and avenues with Royalists and with the Poniard Knights, and impossible to close the Tuileries Gardens, — as on the former occasion.

The prologue had been acted before the claqueurs alone, but now the main drama must be represented before the real public; and it must be acknowledged that this public was unfavorably disposed towards royal favoritism, — so much so that Duport, so popular three months before, was heard in glum silence, when he proposed that the King's offence should bring disaster only to those who surrounded his Majesty.

However, Duport went on to the end, surprised that he could speak without rousing a single word or sign of approbation, — an unprecedented experience. He was one of a triad of stars, — Duport, Lameth, Barnave, — whose lights went out one by one, in the political firmament.

Robespierre next mounted the platform. Robespierre, the prudent man, who knew so well how to hide his tracks, what would he say? This orator, who not many days before had declared himself neither a Monarchist nor a Republican, what position would he now take? He did not distinctly state.

He said, with his sweetest acidity, that he was there to constitute himself the advocate of the highest humanity. He said that it seemed to him both unfair and cruel to smite only the weak; that he would not attack the King, inasmuch as the Assembly appeared to regard the King as inviolable, but he would defend Bouillé, Charny, Madame de Tourzel, the couriers, the lackeys, the attendants, and all others who had been forced to obey the King, by their dependent or subordinate positions.

The Assembly murmured during this speech. The galleries listened with great attention, not knowing whether to applaud or disapprove. At last they were able to see in the orator's words what was really there, a covert attack on royalty, and a satirical defence of courtiers and sycophants.

Then the galleries applauded Robespierre. The President tried to impose silence in the galleries.

Prieur de la Marne wished to bring the debate upon ground wholly free from subterfuges and paradoxes. He asked: "Citizens, what would you do, if the King were entirely out of the way, and somebody should come to you with the demand that he be reinstated in full power?"

This question was the more embarrassing, because it was so direct; but there are shameless times when nothing is embarrassing to reactionists and timeservers.

Desmeuniers replied, and appeared to sustain the cause of the Assembly, at the expense of the King. He said: "The Assembly is an all-powerful body; and in its power it has the right to suspend the royal prerogatives, and to maintain that suspension until the Constitution is completed and established."

That is, — as the King had not fled, but had been abducted, his power could only be suspended temporarily, because the Constitution was not yet completed; but when once the Constitution was finished, the King might again enter, with full rights, into the exercise of his royal functions.

"Finally," said the speaker, "if anybody asks me," — though nobody did ask him, — "if anybody asks me to give my explanation of the proposed decree, here is the project which I suggest: First — This suspension of the King's authority shall endure till the King accepts the Constitution. Second — If he does not accept it, the Assembly shall declare him deposed."

"Oh, be easy!" exclaimed Grégoire, without leaving his seat. "Not only will he accept it, but he 'll swear to anything you ask."

Desmeuniers would have been entirely right, if he had said "swear and accept, whatever you ask," instead of "accept and swear;" for kings promise much more readily than they perform.

The Assembly was about to seize this proposition on the wing; but Robespierre, without leaving his seat, threw out this word: "Be careful! Such a decree would be a decision, in advance, that the King is not to be tried."

Thus surprised in the very act of offending, the Assembly dared not vote this decree. A noise at the door of the hall also added to the embarrassment.

The noise came from a deputation of the Fraternal Society of Minims, bearing the proclamation inspired by Danton, prepared by Tallien, and signed by The People.

The Assembly revenged itself on the petitioners, by refusing to hear their address.

Barnave rose and said: "Let it not be read to-day, but hear it to-morrow; and do not let us be influenced by factious opinions. Let the Law hoist its ensign and display its signal, and we shall see a rally of all good citizens."

Reader, remember this speech! Reperuse these six words! Meditate upon that phrase: Let the Law hoist its signal! The phrase was uttered on July 14; but the massacre of July 17 is in that phrase.

Thus the Assembly was not content with merely tricking the people out of their mastery, which they believed they had obtained by the royal desertion, — or rather, let us say, by the treachery of the people's representative; but that Assembly must publicly surrender this mastery to Louis Sixteenth; and if the people reclaimed their rights, if they offered petitions, this only indicated a factious disposition, which would give the Assembly, that other representative of the people, an excuse for raising its flag.

What signified these words, Raise the signal of Law? They signified the proclamation of martial law, and the display of the red flag.

Indeed on the next day — July 15, the decisive day — the Assembly presented a formidable aspect. Nobody menaced the Assembly, but it had the air of being menaced. Lafayette was summoned to its aid; and Lafayette, — who had always come very near the people, without really knowing it, — Lafayette sent to the Assembly five thousand National Guardsmen, with whom, in order to stimulate the people, he took pains to mix a thousand pikes from the Saint Antoine district. The guns were the aristocracy of the National Guard, and the pikes represented the proletariat.

Convinced, like Barnave, that it was only needful to hoist the signal of Law, in order to bring to its support, not the people particularly, but Lafayette, as commander of the National Guard, and Bailly, the Mayor of Paris, the Assembly decided to bring matters to a crisis.

Although the Assembly had hardly been in existence two years, it already moved on like the later assemblies of 1829 and 1846. The leaders knew they had only to weary members and auditors with secondary discussions, and postpone to the end of the session the main question, in order to carry their point. Half of the session was wasted in listening to a military report on Department Affairs. Then they listened complacently to three or four members, who had a fashion of speaking in every special debate. Then, when the limits of discussion were reached, others were silent, while two speeches were delivered, one by Salles and the other by Barnave.

These two discourses were so convincing to the Assembly that Lafayette himself moved the closure of the debate, and the vote was taken in all serenity.

On that day the Assembly had nothing to fear. To use the slang of the times, because it is most significant, they had done the galleries. The Tuileries Gardens were closed. The police received their orders from the President. Lafayette sat in the Assembly, to move the previous question, and so cut off further debate. Bailly was in his place as the head of the city council. Everything was ready for the final stroke. Everywhere the authorities were under arms, and prepared to control the populace.

The populace, being in no condition for a contest, passed by the long array of pikes and bayonets, and betook themselves to their modern Mount Aventine, — that is, the Champ de Mars.

Note this! They did not rush to the Champ de Mars for rebellious purposes, as the Romans of old went to their Aventine, but because they hoped there to find the Patriot Altar, which, since the day before, — July 14, the Bastille anniversary, — the government had not found time to demolish, — prompt as governments usually are to pull down such patriotic structures.

There the crowd adopted a remonstrance, and sent it to the Assembly.

While this was going on, the Assembly voted, first, a preventive measure:

If the King breaks his oath, if he attacks or refuses to defend his people, he virtually abdicates his throne, becomes a simple citizen, and is personally responsible for all offences he commits after his abdication.

Secondly, a repressive measure was adopted:

Bouillé shall be prosecuted as the chief criminal; and all other persons who assisted in the King's abduction shall be prosecuted as secondary criminals.

At the moment when the Assembly was passing this vote, the crowd, having heard and signed their remonstrance, were returning to present it to the Assembly, which they found more strongly guarded than before. All the leaders of the Assembly were military men that day. The President of the Assembly was a young colonel, Charles Lameth. The Commander of the National Guard was Lafayette, a young general. Even our worthy astronomer, Bailly, had something the air of a warrior, amidst his bayonets and pikes, having knotted about his scientist's coat the tricolored sash, and adorned his pensive brow with the three-cornered cocked hat of the municipality. So well did he look in this guise that Madame Bailly mistook him for Lafayette, as (so they say) she had sometimes mistaken Lafayette for her husband.

The crowd talked. They felt so little hostility, that there was no reason why they should not talk. The result of their conference was, that deputies were permitted to confer with Robespierre and Pétion. You see how the popularity of these new names waxed, in proportion as the popularity of the old names waned, — of Duport, Barnave, Lameth, Lafayette, Bailly. The delegates, six in number, started for the Assembly with a great company at their heels. Duly notified, Pétion and Robespierre hastened to the avenue of the Feuillant Terrace, to meet these delegates, and receive their message.

Too late! The vote in the Assembly had been taken.

These two members of the Assembly, not being favorable to this vote, did not so state the matter to the popular delegates as to make them swallow it kindly; and so these deputies returned furious to those who had sent them.

The people had lost their game, while holding the best cards fortune ever put into the popular hand.

At once the populace were enraged. They spread themselves over the city, and began by making the managers close the theatres. When the theatres are closed, as a friend says about a similar occasion in 1830, it is like a black flag over all Paris.

The Operahouse resisted, having a garrison within. Lafayette, with his four thousand muskets and thousand pikes, asked nothing better than the privilege of repressing this growing outbreak; but the municipal authorities refused to give the proper orders.

Up to this time the Queen had kept the track of events; but now reports were suddenly cut off, and the next intelligence was lost in a night less black than the events themselves.

Barnave, whom she awaited with so much impatience, was to come and tell her what had taken place during the day. All the world felt the approach of an impending crisis.

The King, who with the Queen had been awaiting Barnave's arrival in the second room of Madame Campan's apartments, was notified of a visit from Doctor Gilbert, and, in order to give the more attention to his reports, had gone upstairs to his own rooms, to see Gilbert, leaving Barnave to the Queen.

Towards nine a step resounded along the corridor. A voice was heard exchanging a few words with the sentinel who guarded the hallway. Then a young man appeared in the corridor, clad as a lieutenant in the National Guards.

It was Barnave. The Queen, her heart palpitating as if that man were a cherished lover, unfastened the door; and Barnave, after looking carefully before and behind him, glided through the open flap of it.

The door was instantly shut, and before a word was spoken, the grating of the bolt could be heard in its socket.

CHAPTER XVI.

THE FIFTEENTH DAY OF JULY.

THE hearts of both were beating with equal violence, but under the impulse of very opposite sentiments. The Queen's heart was beating with hopes of vengeance; Barnave's heart was aflame with the desire for her love.

The Queen passed quickly into the inner room, — seeking for light, so to speak. She certainly did not fear either Barnave or his passion, for she well knew his love to be respectful and devoted; but with feminine instinct she fled from the darkness.

On entering this room she at once sat down. Barnave paused on the threshold, and surveyed the whole circumference of the little parlor, lighted only by two candles. He expected to find the King there; for the King had assisted at Barnave's two previous interviews with Marie Antoinette; but there was no third person present. For the first time since their promenade in the picture-gallery of the Archbishop's residence at Meaux, Barnave found himself tête-à-tête with the Queen. His hand involuntarily sought his heart, to suppress its beatings.

"Oh, Monsieur Barnave," said the Queen, after a moment of silence, "I have been expecting you for two hours."

At this reproach, made in a voice so soft that it ceased to be accusatory and became plaintive, Barnave's first impulse was to throw himself at the Queen's feet; but respect forbade this demonstration. The heart sometimes tells us that to fall on our knees at a woman's feet is to fail in proper respect.

"Alas, Madame, it is true," he said; "but I hope your Majesty is convinced that my tardiness is not in my will."

"Oh, yes!" said she, with a slight affirmative nod of the head. "I know your devotion to the monarchy."

"Above all, I am devoted to the Queen," said Barnave. "I wish your Majesty might be persuaded of that!"

"I doubt it not, Monsieur Barnave. — So you could not get here sooner?"

"I attempted to do so at seven o'clock, Madame; but it was too near the broad daylight, and I met — how dares such a man approach your palace? — I met Marat on the terrace."

"Marat?" said the Queen, as if trying to place the name in her memory. "Isn't he a newspaper man, who writes against us?"

"Who scribbles against all the world! — Yes. His viperous eye followed me till I disappeared through the grating of the Feuillant Terrace. I passed along, without even a glance at your windows. Happily, on Royal Bridge, whom should I meet but Saint-Prix."

"Saint-Prix? Who is he, — an actor?" said the Queen, with almost as much scorn as she had just shown towards Marat.

"Yes, Madame, an actor!" replied Barnave; "but why not? This is one of the characteristics of our epoch. Actors and journalists, — fellows of whose very existence kings were formerly ignorant, save when their lordships gave orders which the poor fellows were only too glad to obey, — journalists and actors have become citizens, having their share of influence, exercising wills of their own, acting according to their own inspiration, with power for good or ill, — important parts of the great social machine, wherein royalty is now but the superior wheel. — Saint-Prix took Marat's bad taste out of my mouth."

"How so?"

"Saint-Prix was in uniform. Knowing him very well, Madame, I spoke to him, and asked him where he was to be on guard. Fortunately he was to be here, in the palace. I knew I could trust his discretion; so I told him I was to have the honor of an audience with you."

"Oh, Monsieur Barnave!"

"Was it better to renounce the honor —" Barnave nearly said happiness, but he checked himself, and said honor — "of seeing you, and so leave you in ignorance of the important intelligence which I have to make known?"

"No, you did right, — if you think you can trust Saint-Prix."

"Madame, this is a critical moment," said Barnave, gravely, "as you may well believe. Those who remain faithful to you now are indeed true friends; for if to-morrow — and this point will be decided to-morrow — the Jacobins prevail over the Constitutionalists, your friends will be regarded as your accomplices. As you see, the legislative decrees only free you from punishment in order to strike your friends, who are called your accomplices."

"True!" replied the Queen; "but you were saying that Monsieur Saint-Prix —?"

"Saint-Prix told me that he should be on guard at the Tuileries from nine till eleven, that he would endeavor to get a post here on the ground floor, and thus your Majesty would have full two hours in which to give me your orders. Only he counselled me to wear my uniform as an officer in the National Guard; and I have followed his advice, as your Majesty sees."

"And you found Saint-Prix at his post?"

"Yes, Madame. — It cost him two theatre tickets to get this appointment from his sergeant. You see how easy a thing is corruption!" added Barnave, smiling.

"Marat — Saint-Prix — two theatre tickets!" repeated the Queen, glancing with a startled look into the abyss, wherefrom emerge those petty spindles which weave the destinies of kings in times of revolution.

"Oh, my God, yes!" said Barnave. "Strange, is it not, Madame? This is what the ancients called Fate, what philosophers call Chance, what believers call Providence."

The Queen drew a lock of her long hair over her beautiful neck, and looked at it sadly. At last she said: "That is what whitens my hair!"

Returning to Barnave, and the political side of the situation, — for a moment forgotten in contemplating the mysterious and picturesque side, — she said: "I think I have heard it said that we have won a victory in the Assembly."

"Yes, Madame, we have gained a victory in the Assembly; but we have suffered a defeat at the Jacobin Club."

"But I can't understand all this. — I thought the Jacobins were on your side, with Lameth and Duport, — that you held the Jacobins in your hand, and could do with them what you chose."

Barnave shook his head sorrowfully as he said: "It was so formerly; but a new spirit has come over the Jacobins."

"Orleans, — is it not?" asked the Queen.

"Yes, at present the peril comes from that quarter."

"The peril? I ask again, are we not put out of danger by to-day's vote?"

"It is best to understand the difficulty well, in order to face the situation. The vote of to-day was to this purport, — that if the King forfeited his oath, if he attacked or did not defend his people, he practically abdicated his throne, and so became a plain citizen, and accountable for any offences which he might commit subsequent to his abdication."

"Well," said the Queen, "the King will not go back on his oath; he will not attack his own subjects; and if they are attacked, the King will defend them."

"Yes, Madame! but by this vote a door is left open for extreme Revolutionists and Orleanists. The Assembly has not yet decided about the King. Some preventive measures have been voted, in case of a second desertion; but the first flight has been left out of the question. Do you know what was proposed at the Jacobin Club this evening, by Laclos, Orleans's tool?"

"Something terrible, no doubt. What wholesome measure could be proposed by the author of such a vulgar story as his?"

"He demanded that a petition should be circulated in Paris, and all over France, to compel the King's resignation. He would be answerable for at least ten million signatures."

"Ten million signatures!" cried the Queen. "My God! Are we so much hated, that ten millions of people wish to push us from the throne?"

"Oh, Madame! majorities are easily obtainable."

"And Laclos's motion was passed?"

"It raised a discussion. — Danton sustained it."

"Danton? Why, I thought Danton was with us.

Montmorin talked to me about some office, connected with the Crown Council, — either bought or sold, I forget which, — which secured the aid of this man for our side."

"Monsieur de Montmorin was mistaken, Madame. If Danton belongs to anybody, it is to Orleans."

"And did Robespierre speak? They say he is beginning to have great influence."

"Yes, Robespierre spoke. He did not sustain the Laclos petition, but simply advocated some address to the Jacobin societies scattered through the provinces."

"But it is necessary to have Robespierre, if he has acquired such importance."

"Nobody owns Robespierre, Madame. He stands by himself, — for an ideal, for a phantom, for Utopia, — for an ambition, perhaps."

"Well, as for his ambition, whatever it may be, we can gratify it. — Suppose he wishes for wealth —?"

"He does not care to be rich."

"To be a cabinet-minister, then —?"

"Perhaps he wishes to be more than a cabinet-minister."

The Queen looked at Barnave almost in dread. Presently she said: "It seems to me that the royal ministry is the most elevated station to which one of our subjects may aspire."

"If Robespierre considers the King dethroned, he no longer regards himself as one of the King's subjects."

"To what then does his ambition point?" asked the amazed Queen.

"There are certain times, Madame, when men dream of new titles in politics, in place of old titles, which are effaced."

"Yes, I can understand that Orleans might dream of being Regent, for his birth entitles him to such high functions ; but Robespierre, a pettifogger from the provinces — ! "

She forgot that Barnave also was an attorney from the provinces. Barnave remained motionless, either because the blow glided over him without touching his sensibility, or else because he had the courage to take the blow and make no sign.

" Marius and Cromwell rose from the ranks of the people," he said.

" Marius ? Cromwell ? — Alas, when I heard those names in my childhood, I little thought that one day they would return to my ear with so fatal a sound ! But we are all this time drifting away from the facts which demand our present appreciation. — Robespierre, you tell me, was opposed to the Laclos proposal, supported by Danton."

" Yes ! but at that moment a flood of people came into the meeting, ordinary kickers from the Palace Royal, — a band of snarling women, brought in to support Laclos ; and not only was his resolution passed, but it was decided that to-morrow forenoon, at eleven o'clock, the Jacobins would come together to hear the resolution read, which is then to be carried to the Champ de Mars, and there laid on the Patriot Altar, for the reception of signatures, and sent to all the societies in the provinces, for more signatures."

" And this petition, who is to prepare it ? "

" Danton, Laclos, and Brissot."

" Three enemies ? "

" Yes, Madame ! "

" But — my God ! — what are our friends, the Constitutionalists, doing about it ? "

" Ah, there it is ! Well, Madame, they have decided that to-morrow they will win or lose all."

"But the Constitutionalists cannot remain with the Jacobins, surely?"

"Your admirable penetration in regard to men and things enables you to see the situation precisely as it is. — Yes, led by Duport and Lameth, your friends at once separated themselves from your enemies. They set up the Feuillants in opposition to the Jacobins."

"What is meant by the Feuillants? Excuse me! for really, I know next to nothing. There are so many new names and new things in our political language, that every other word rouses a question in my mind."

"Madame, the old Feuillant Convent is a large building near the Riding School, — almost leaning against the Assembly Hall; and this convent gives its name, as you know, to a terrace belonging to the Tuileries."

"And who will belong to this new club?"

"Lafayette, — that is, the National Guard, — and Bailly, — that is to say, the municipality."

"Lafayette? You think you can count on Lafayette?"

"I believe he is sincerely devoted to the King."

"Devoted to the King? — Yes, as a woodchopper is devoted to the oak, which he means to fell to its very roots! Bailly? — Well, I have no cause of complaint against him. I might say even more; for when that woman, Rochereul, guessed at our departure, he sent her denunciation to me! — But Lafayette —? "

"Your Majesty may have had occasion to test him."

"Yes, that 's true!" said the Queen, with a mournful retrospect in her thoughts. "At Versailles! — Well, this new club, — let us hear more about it. What will the Feuillants do? What do they propose to do? What strength have they?"

"They have enormous strength, because, as I told your Majesty just now, they have at their disposal the National Guards, the city authorities, and the majority of the National Assembly, who voted with us. Who are left with the Jacobins? Perhaps five or six Deputies, — Robespierre, Pétion, Laclos, Orleans, — heterogeneous elements, which can only stir up the herd of new members and the outsiders, — a band of snarlers, who make lots of noise, but have no influence."

"God grant it! But what does the Assembly mean to do?"

"The Assembly means to sharply admonish the Mayor of Paris on his leniency and hesitation to-day. The result will be that Goodman Bailly will go on straight; for he belongs to the clock family, and only needs to be wound up, and properly set, to run on time."

At that instant a clock was heard striking the quarter before eleven, and they also heard the warning cough of the sentinel.

"Yes, yes," murmured Barnave, "I know! it's time for me to retire; and yet it seems as if I had a thousand things to say to your Majesty."

"And I, Monsieur Barnave," said the Queen, "I can only make you one response, — that I am grateful to you, — to you and your friends, — on account of the dangers to which you have been exposed on my account."

"Madame," said Barnave, "this risk is a game in which I have everything to gain, whether I conquer or am conquered, — if, whatever the result, the Queen will repay me with a smile."

"Alas, Monsieur, I hardly know what a smile is like! but you are doing so much for us, that I will try to recall the time when I was happy, and I promise that my first smile shall be yours."

Barnave bowed and retired backward, with his hand on his heart.

"Monsieur," said the Queen, "when shall I see you again?"

Barnave began to calculate. "To-morrow there will be the petition, and the second vote in the Assembly. The next day will come the explosion, and the provisional repression. — On Sunday evening, Madame, I will try to come and tell you what has taken place in the Champ de Mars!" and then he went out.

Pensively the Queen went upstairs to her husband, whom she found equally thoughtful. Doctor Gilbert had just left him, and had told him much the same things which Barnave had told the Queen. The royal couple had only to exchange glances to know that on both sides the outlook was equally gloomy.

The King had just written a letter. Without a word he presented it to the Queen for her perusal.

This paper gave to Monsieur the power to solicit, in the name of the King of France, the intervention of the Emperor of Austria and the King of Prussia.

"Monsieur has done me much harm," said the Queen. "Monsieur still hates me, and will do me all the mischief he can; but if he has the King's confidence, he shall have mine also!"

Taking the quill, she heroically wrote her signature beside the King's.

CHAPTER XVII.

WHEREIN WE AT LAST REACH THAT PROTEST WHICH MADAME ROLAND WAS COPYING.

We trust the conversation of the Queen with Barnave has given our readers an accurate idea of the attitude of all parties on July 15, 1791.

The New Jacobins had pushed their way into the place of the old.

The Old Jacobins had formed a new club, called the Feuillant.

The Cordeliers, represented by Danton, Camille Desmoulins, and Legendre, had united with the New Jacobins.

The Assembly, being filled with Royalists and Constitutionalists, had decided to maintain the King, at any price.

The people were resolved to have the King deposed by any feasible means, but they were willing first to employ protest and petition.

Meantime, what happened during the night and day intervening between Barnave's interview with the Queen, under the kind protection of the actor, Saint-Prix, and the moment when we at last return to Madame Roland's apartments, — that is, during the night of July 15 and the day following?

This we will relate in a few words.

While this conversation was going on between Barnave and Marie Antoinette, three men were seated around a table, with paper, quills, and ink in front of them, — three men appointed by the Jacobins to prepare the petition. These three men were Danton, Laclos, and Brissot.

Danton was not the man for this kind of work. All his life, made up of action and pleasure, he always waited impatiently for the end of every committee-meeting in which he took part.

After a few moments he took himself away, leaving Brissot and Laclos to arrange the petition as they chose.

Laclos saw him go out, and followed him with his eyes till Danton disappeared, and with his ears till he heard the door shut.

This double action of the senses appeared to draw Laclos momentarily from that make-believe sleepiness under which he disguised his indefatigable activity. Then he buried himself again in his armchair, and let the quill fall from his hand, saying, as he did so: "Faith, my dear Brissot, draw this up as you think best. As for me, — well, I decline! — Ah! if it was only a bad book, as they say at Court, — a successor of my 'Dangerous Entanglements,' — I might undertake it; but a petition! — a petition makes me tired!" he added, yawning as if he would dislocate his jaw.

On the contrary, Brissot was just the man for this sort of composition. Convinced that he could draft it better than anybody else, he accepted the duty thus devolving upon him, through Danton's absence and the request of Laclos. The latter closed his eyes, and settled himself more comfortably into his armchair, as if he felt like taking a nap; while really he was prepared to weigh each phrase, each letter, in order to insert a loophole for the regency of his Prince, if he saw any possible chance for it.

As fast as Brissot wrote a phrase he read it aloud, and Laclos approved it by a slight nod of his head, and a muffled grunt of assent.

In outlining the situation Brissot enumerated the following points:

First. The hypocritical or timid silence of the Assembly, which either did not dare or did not wish to enact anything relating to the King.

Second. The virtual abdication of Louis the Sixteenth, by his flight, when the Assembly voted his suspension from office, and caused him to be pursued and arrested. As acknowledged kings are never suspended, arrested, or pursued, if Louis the Sixteenth was suspended, pursued, and arrested, this shows that he is no longer King.

Third. The necessity of providing for his replacement.

"Good, good!" said Laclos, when he heard this last word. Then the Duke's secretary continued, as Brissot was about writing something else: "Hold on! It seems to me that after those three words, for his replacement, something ought to be added, — something which will rally timid souls to our side. All men have n't burned their ships behind them, as we have."

"Perhaps so," said Brissot. "What shall it be?"

"Oh, it 's for you, rather than me, to decide that, my dear Brissot. — I should add — let me see — "

Laclos pretended to search for a phrase, which really had been long formulated in his brain, and was only waiting for the right time, in order to pop out.

"Well," he said at last, "after the words provide for his replacement, I would add, by all Constitutional means."

Observe and admire, oh ye politicians, ye past, present, and future framers of petitions, protests, and law-drafts!

It was a very little thing, the addition of these few inoffensive words, was it not?

Well, you shall see — that is, if those of my readers who are so happy as not to be politicians wish to see — whither these four words, by all Constitutional means, might lead.

All Constitutional means for providing a substitute for the King would reduce the problem to a single word. That single word was regency.

In the absence of both Monsieur and Artois, the two brothers of Louis the Sixteenth and uncles of the Dauphin, — depopularized by their emigration from France, — who would succeed to the regency? Orleans!

This innocent little phrase, slipped into a petition drawn up in the name of the people, would really make the people ask, or appear to ask, that Orleans should be appointed Regent, during the minority of the Dauphin, who was as yet only five or six years old.

This Orleans, whom we have met at the Lodge of Enlightened Ones, and elsewhere, — who, for a season, had been exiled to England by Lafayette, — was a distant cousin of Louis Sixteenth, his great-great-grandfather having been the only brother of Louis the Fourteenth, who was the great-great-great-grandfather of Louis the Sixteenth. There were no direct male descendants of either Louis Fourteenth or Louis Fifteenth, except Louis Sixteenth, his brothers Provence and Artois, and his little son, the Dauphin. If Louis Sixteenth were deposed, and his brothers were out of the country and unpopular, then the nearest legitimate relative of the Dauphin on the spot (the illegitimate uncle, Narbonne, being of course left out of the question) would be Orleans, a cousin several times removed.

All this the astute Laclos had in mind. As being the nearest resident relative, Orleans alone would have a Constitutional right to the regency, and this is what Laclos hoped for his ducal patron.

A beautiful institution, this politics, is it not? Only it takes time to see things clearly, when managed by men of such force as Monsieur de Laclos.

To this addition to his phrase Brissot raised no objection: perhaps because he did not discover the mine hidden in those five words, ready to explode at the proper time; perhaps because he did not see the serpent in the grass of that addition, whose hissing crest would be reared at the crucial moment; perhaps because, knowing the risk he would run as the writer of this petition, he was not sorry to provide a loophole of escape. So Brissot said to his colleague: "Indeed, that will rally some Constitutionalists to our support. The idea is a good one, Monsieur de Laclos."

The rest of the petition was in accord with the sentiments it was meant to convey.

The next day, July 16, Pétion, Brissot, Danton, Camille Desmoulins, and Laclos went to the Jacobin Club, and carried the petition. The hall was empty, or nearly so.

Everybody had gone to the Feuillant Club. Barnave was not mistaken. The desertion was complete.

Pétion forthwith hurried to the Feuillant Club. What did he find there? Barnave, Duport, and Lameth, preparing a circular address to the provincial Jacobin societies, announcing to them that the Jacobin Club no longer existed, but had been transformed into the Feuillant Club, under the title, — Association of Friends of the Constitution.

Thus the Jacobin society, which had cost so much pains to establish, and which spread like a network over all France, ceased to be a moving power, paralyzed by hesitation. Who was to be obeyed, who was to be trusted, — the Old Jacobins or the New?

Meantime an Anti-Revolutionary stratagem was preparing; and the people, who no longer had any proper representation, — sleeping, as they did, on their faith in their chosen watchmen, — would awake to find themselves pinioned and garrotted.

The storm must be met. Everybody must draw up a statement for himself, and send it to the province where he thought it would do the most good.

As the special Deputy from Lyons, Roland had great influence in the second capital of the kingdom. Before going to the Champ de Mars, where — in default of the Jacobins, who were not to be found there — Danton was to have the petition signed by the populace, he went to Roland's lodgings, explained the situation to him and his wife, and persuaded them to send, without delay, a protest to the Lyons people, — a protest which Roland himself was to prepare for that purpose. It was hoped that the Lyonese would join hands with the people of Paris, and make a similar and simultaneous protest.

This was the document, drawn up by her husband, which Madame Roland was copying.

As to Danton, he went to rejoin his friends in the Champ de Mars. When he arrived a great debate was going on.

In the middle of the vast arena was the Patriot Altar. It had been erected for the Festival of July 14, two days before, — the second anniversary of the taking of the Bastille, — and still remained there, a skeleton of the past.

This altar was like the one built for the Federation of 1790, the year before. It was a large platform, with stairs on four sides, corresponding to the four cardinal points of the compass. Over this altar was a picture, representing the glorification of Voltaire, which had been celebrated July 12, only four days before. Over the picture was the placard of the Cordeliers, cited in a previous chapter, and containing the oath of Brutus, written by Voltaire.

The discussion, in progress when Danton appeared, concerned the five words introduced into the petition by Laclos. They were being passed by without notice, when a man, who appeared by his dress and manners to belong to the plebeian classes, brusquely interrupted the reader, with a freedom amounting to violence.

"Stop!" he said. "The people are being deceived!"

"How so?" asked the reader.

"By those words, by all Constitutional means. You would replace King with Regent. You would restore royalty, and we've had enough of it already."

"No more kings! No more royalty!" shouted most of the listeners.

What a singular thing! Here were the Old Jacobins apparently taking part with royalty! This is what they said: "Be on your guard, gentlemen! That cry, no more kings, no more royalty, means the beginning of a republic; and we are not ripe for a republic."

"No, we are not ripe!" said the man of the people. "That's so! But give us one or two more sunny weeks like Varennes, and we'll ripen fast enough."

"Acclamation! Let us vote a petition by acclamation!"

So shouted one voice; and the cry was cordially taken up by those who had already shouted: "No more royalty! No more kings!"

It was necessary to appeal to a hand vote, without a ballot. The unknown man put the question: "Let those who will no longer recognize Louis Sixteenth, or any other king, raise their hands."

Such a powerful majority raised their hands that there was no need even to call for the negative vote.

"That is well," said the speaker. "To-morrow, Sunday, July 17, all Paris will be here to sign this resolution. I, Billot, will see that due notice is given."

By the utterance of this name, Billot, everybody recognized the formidable farmer who, accompanied by Lafayette's aide, had arrested the King at Varennes, and haled him back to Paris.

Thus, at one step, the boldest of the Cordeliers and the Jacobins were outstripped; and by whom? By a man of the people, — that is, by the instinct of the masses. As Camille Desmoulins, Danton, Brissot, and Pétion declared that, in their opinion, such an act could not be accomplished by the Parisian populace without raising a storm, it was deemed important to at once obtain permission, from the Hôtel de Ville, for the gathering appointed by Billot for the next day.

"So be it!" said Billot. "Get it! and if you can't get it peaceably, I'll exact it."

Desmoulins and Brissot were deputed to attend to this matter.

Bailly was absent, but they found the Mayor's First Assistant. He would not take it upon himself, either to refuse or give the authorization, but contented himself with a verbal endorsement of the petition; so Brissot and Desmoulins quitted the City Hall, feeling that this was sufficient license for their purpose.

Upon their heels, the First Syndic sent a messenger to warn the National Assembly of the march thus to be stolen upon them, under their very eaves.

The Assembly was thus caught in its own trap. The Assembly had as yet voted nothing in relation to the present status of the fugitive Louis, who had been deprived of his royal titles, overtaken at Varennes, and brought back to the Tuileries, where he had been held as a prisoner since June 26.

No time was to be lost. Desmeuniers, with all the appearance of an enemy of the royal family, presented the draft of a decree, conceived in the following terms :

> The suspension of the Executive Power shall continue until the Constitution is presented to the King and accepted by him.

This decree, proposed at seven o'clock, in the evening of July 16, was adopted at eight, by an immense majority.

This would of course render the popular petition inoperative ; as, by the Assembly's vote, the King, suspended only till he accepted the Constitution, would become, by that simple act of acceptance, just as much of a king as he ever was before. Whoever demanded the removal of a king Constitutionally maintained by the Assembly, as long as the King showed himself disposed to accede to the legal conditions, would of course be in open rebellion ; and as the situation was grave, such rebels must be pursued with all the means which the law placed at the disposition of its agents.

That evening there was a meeting of the Mayor and Municipal Council, at the Hôtel de Ville. The session began at half-past nine. By ten it had been decided that on the next day, Sunday, July 17, by eight in the morning, the Assembly's decree should be printed, and affixed to all the walls of the city ; and that it should also be proclaimed, in all the crossroads of Paris, with sound of trumpet, by the official criers of the city, under an armed escort.

An hour after this decision was reached, it was known to the Old Jacobins. They felt very weak. The desertion of the greater part of their numbers to the Feuillants had left the Jacobins isolated and without strength. They yielded.

Santerre, the man from the Faubourg Saint Antoine, the popular brewer of the Bastille neighborhood, — who was eventually to succeed Lafayette in his office, — took upon himself, in the name of the Jacobins, to go to the Champ de Mars, and withdraw the petition already started by them, and prepared by Brissot and Laclos.

The Cordeliers showed themselves more prudent. Danton declared that he must pass the next day at Fontenay by the Woods, where his father-in-law, the lemonade-seller, had a little country-house. Legendre promised to join him there, with Desmoulins and Fréron.

The Rolands received a little billet, warning them that it would be useless to send their protest to Lyons. Everything had either failed or been postponed.

It was nearly midnight, and Madame Roland had just finished her copy of the protest, when this little note came from Danton, which it was quite impossible to comprehend.

Just about this time two men, who were taking their third bottle of fifteen-sou wine at a table in the back room of a wineshop in Gros Caillou, hit upon a strange project.

One of these men was a barber, and the other a military pensioner.

"Ah, what droll notions you have, Lajariette," said the invalid pensioner, with a vulgarly stupid laugh.

"Here's the idea, Father Rémy," replied the barber. "You see it, don't you? Before daylight we 'll go to the Champ de Mars. We 'll rip up a plank from the Patriot Altar, slip underneath it, and replace the plank. Then with a big gimlet, an auger, we 'll bore holes in the plank. A crowd of young and pretty citizenesses will go upon that platform to-morrow, to sign that petition, — and, on my word, through the holes — "

The obscene and vacant laugh of the pensioner redoubled. Evidently he was already gazing, in imagination, through the holes in the altar platform.

The barber did not laugh so heartily. The honorable and aristocratic corporation to which he belonged found its business ruined by the plebeian turn of the tide. The emigration had been a loss to artistic hairdressers; and from what we have seen of the Queen's coiffures, we know that elaborate hairdressing was an art at that epoch. As we were saying, the aristocratic emigration had deprived these artists of their best trade. Moreover, Talma had acted the part of Titus, in Racine's "Bérénice," and his way of dressing his hair had given birth to a new fashion, which consisted of wearing the hair short and without powder.

In general, therefore, barbers were Royalists. Read Prudhomme, and you will see that a hairdresser cut his throat in despair, on the day of the King's execution.

So these two men thought it would be a good trick to play on those silly Patriotesses (as they were called by the grand ladies who still stayed in France) to peep under their petticoats; and Master Lajariette counted on certain prospective erotic souvenirs, wherewith to enliven his morning gossip for a month to come.

The notion of such a lark had come to him while drinking with his jocose old friend, who, when it was suggested to him, felt a tingle through his nerves, — even through the old leg he had left on the field at the battle of Fontenoy, and which the state had generously replaced with a wooden limb.

As a result of their deliberations the two boon companions called for a fourth bottle of wine, which the landlord speedily supplied. They were about opening it, when the old pensioner broached an idea of his own. This was to get a little keg, to empty the wine into the keg (instead of into their glasses) along with two other bottles, to momentarily restrain their thirst, and then to carry the keg with them to the field of action.

The pensioner backed up his proposition with the axiom that it is very warm work, gazing up into the air.

The barber condescended to smile; and as the publican now suggested to the guests that it was useless for them to remain in his shop if they did not wish to drink any more, our two foxes bargained with him for a keg and an auger, pocketed the auger, and put the three bottles of wine into the keg. When midnight sounded, under cover of the darkness, they directed their steps towards the Champ de Mars, and pried up the plank. Then they couched themselves softly on the dirt under the platform, with the keg between them, and soon fell asleep.

CHAPTER XVIII.

THE PETITION.

THERE are certain times when the people, after a cumulative series of excitements, rise like the sea, wave on wave, and need a grand cataclysm, which shall compel a return to their normal boundaries, as the ocean sinks back into the bed provided for it by bountiful nature. So was it with the Parisian populace during that fortnight of July, when so many events brought them to the boiling point.

On Sunday, July 10, there was to have been a procession in honor of Voltaire; but the bad weather prevented the festival from being carried out as projected, and the procession only went as far as the Charenton Barrier, where the crowd stayed all day.

On Monday, July 11, the weather was clear. The escort again put itself in motion, and traversed Paris, amidst an immense concourse of people, halting before the house where the author of the "Philosophical Dictionary" and "La Pucelle" had died, in order to enable his adopted daughter, Madame Villette, and the Calas family to put flowers on the casket, which was also honored with a chorus by artists from the opera.

On Wednesday, July 13, there was a great celebration at the church of Notre Dame, and a composition called "The Taking of the Bastille" was performed by a large orchestra.

Thursday, July 14, was the first anniversary of the Great Federation of 1790, and there was a pilgrimage to the Patriot Altar. Three-fourths of the population of Paris were in the Champ de Mars, and their heads were almost turned with Hurrahs for the Nation, and the sight of the universal illumination, in the midst whereof the Tuileries Palace seemed like a tomb, gloomy and mute.

On Friday, July 15, the reactionary vote was taken in the Assembly, protected by Lafayette's four thousand bayonets and thousand pikes.

The proposed petition was also prepared for the crowd. The theatres were closed; and there were rumors and disturbances during the entire evening and a part of the night.

Finally, on Saturday, July 16, there occurred the desertion of the Jacobins to the Feuillant Club. Violent scenes took place on the New Bridge, where the police belabored Fréron, and arrested an Englishman and an Italian teacher named Rotondo. On that day came also the outbreak in the Champ de Mars, when Billot exposed the mischievous phrase slipped into the petition by Laclos. A popular vote demanded the forfeiture of his throne by Louis Sixteenth; and an arrangement was made for receiving signatures to a petition on the day following.

The night of July 16 is agitated, dark, and full of tumult. The ringleaders of the Old Jacobins and the Cordeliers keep out of sight, having some hints as to the plans of their adversaries; but conscientious and innocent men of this progressive party agree to reunite, whatever may happen, and carry on the enterprise already begun.

Others are on the watch, with sentiments less honest and less philanthropic. These are the hateful men, swarming around every great social commotion, who love riots, tumults, and the scent of blood; as vultures and tigers love armies which destroy one another, and so keep up the supply of corpses.

There is Marat, in his subterranean lair, alone with his mania, — Marat, who always believes himself the object of threats and persecutions, or pretends so to believe. He lives in the shadows, like beasts of prey and birds of night. Out of those shadows, as from the caves of Trophonius or Delphos, come every morning those sinister oracles which are spread over the pages of Marat's journal, called "The People's Friend."

For several days this journal has been tinted with blood. Since the King's return it has proposed, as the only safeguard of the rights and interests of the people, an absolute dictatorship and a general massacre. According to Marat's dictum, it is necessary to annihilate the Assembly and hang the authorities.

Then, by way of variety in the proceedings, as throat-cutting and hanging are not sufficient, he proposes to saw off hands, to cut off thumbs, to bury people alive, or impale them on knives. It is high time for Marat's physician to come to his employer's relief, according to his custom, and say: "Your writing is red with blood, Marat. I must let a little of it out of you with my lancet."

You remember Verrière, that abominable hunchback, that formidable dwarf, with his long arms and long legs, whom we saw at the very beginning of this narration, at work on October 5 and 6, 1789, and who thereafter retreated into his obscurity? Well, on July 16, 1790, he reappears, and is seen like a vision of the Apocalypse, — as Michelet expresses it, — mounted on Death's white horse, down whose sides dangle his long legs, his huge feet, and his big knees. Like a harpy of misfortune, he pauses at each street corner, at each crossroad, and warns the populace to be on hand the next day, at the Champ de Mars.

Fournier, who enters our story for the first time, and whom they call Fournier the American, — not because he was born in America, for he comes from Auvergne, but because he has been a slave-driver in Saint Domingo, — Fournier is on hand. Ruined and soured by unsuccessful lawsuits, he is exasperated by the apathy with which the National Assembly has treated the twenty successive petitions he has sent to it. It is very easily explained, his ill-success; so he thinks. The wirepullers of the Assembly are planters, like the Lameths, or the friends of planters, like Barnave and Duport. Fournier is bound to be revenged on the first occasion; and he keeps his word, — this man with the traits of a brute in his intellect, and the grin of a hyena on his face.

Now then, we have before us the situation during the night of July 16.

The King and Queen are anxiously waiting at the Tuileries. Barnave has promised them a victory over the people. He does not say what the triumph will be, or how it is to be brought about. What matters it to them? They do not regard the means, if the efforts are for their advantage. Only, the King desires this triumph because it will ameliorate the condition of royalty; whereas the Queen sees in it the beginning of vengeance; and, in her mind, it is quite permissible to be avenged on those who have made royalty suffer so much.

The Assembly, depending upon one of the apparent majorities which satisfy such bodies, waits somewhat tranquilly. Its measures are taken. Whatever happens, the law is on its side. If the game proves a losing one, and there is need of it, the Assembly can conjure with that supreme phrase, the public safety.

Lafayette waits without fear. He has his National Guards, as yet devoted to him; and among these guards is a corps of nine thousand men, composed of old soldiers, regular guardsmen, and enrolled volunteers. This corps belongs rather to the army than the city. It is under pay, moreover, which the National Guards, as a rule, are not. It is therefore nicknamed the Hireling Guard. If there is to be any terrible work to-morrow, this is the body to execute it.

Bailly and the other municipal officers are also in anxious expectation. After a life spent entirely in his study and in scientific inquiry, Bailly finds himself suddenly pushed forward into politics and public assemblies. Admonished yesterday, by the Assembly, for his weakness on the evening of July 15, he sleeps to-night with his head pillowed upon a treatise on martial law, which the next day he can rigorously enforce, if any necessity for it arrives.

The Old Jacobins are also in anxious expectation, but their demoralization is complete. Robespierre is in hiding. Laclos sulks, having seen his interpolated phrase detected and ousted. Pétion, Buzot, and Brissot are all prepared for some escape, in case to-morrow proves a hard day. Santerre, who is to go to the Champ de Mars at eleven in the morning, to withdraw the Danton-and-Brissot petition, may carry some news with him.

The Cordeliers have given up the struggle. Danton, as we have said, is at Fontenay, with his wife's father. Legendre, Fréron, and Camille Desmoulins are to rejoin him there. The other Cordeliers can do nothing without a head.

Ignorant of all this, the populace will go to the Champ de Mars to sign the petition. They will shout for the Nation. They will dance around the Patriot Altar, and sing the famous Ça ira of 1790.

Between 1790 and 1791 the reaction has dug a great pit. This pit must be filled with the dead bodies of the Seventeenth of July.

Whatever is to happen, the day dawns magnificently. By four o'clock all the pedlers, who live by small industries and dwell in beehives, those Bohemians who burrow in all great cities, — sellers of chocolate, gingerbread, cakes, and sweetmeats, — begin to wend their way towards the Patriot Altar, which stands solitary, in the middle of the Champ de Mars, like a grand and lonesome catafalque.

A painter, standing twenty paces from the riverside, is making a careful sketch of this altar.

At half-past four perhaps a hundred and fifty persons may be counted on the Champ de Mars.

Those who rise with the sun are generally those who sleep poorly; and, for the most part, those who sleep poorly (I speak of ordinary men and women) are those who sup poorly, or not at all.

When one has no supper and little sleep, he is apt to be in bad humor at four in the morning. There are, therefore, among those one hundred and fifty early risers now gathered about the Patriot Altar, some fellows ill-favored and in bad humor.

Suddenly a woman, a lemonade-seller, standing on the steps of the altar, screams. The point of an auger has pierced her shoe. She calls for help, and everybody runs to her. The plank is bored with holes, for which nobody can see any cause or reason; but the presence of that auger, whose point penetrated the lemonade-vender's shoe, indicates the presence of one or more men beneath the platform, whereon the altar stands.

What are they doing there? They are spoken to. They are summoned to respond, to state their intentions, to come out, to show themselves. No response.

The sketcher, above referred to, leaves his stool, drops his canvas, and runs to Gros Caillou for the guard. The guard cannot see, in a woman's being pricked in the foot, any sufficient reason for disturbing himself, refuses to do anything about it, and sends the painter away dissatisfied. When he returns, the general exasperation overflows. All crowd about the Patriot Altar, — some three hundred persons. They lift the plank and look into the cavity beneath.

There they find two very shame-faced men, — our barber and our old pensioner. The barber, who feels that the auger may be a proof of his guilt, throws it away as far as he can, but he forgets about the wine-keg. They are taken by their collars, forced to come out upon the platform, and interrogated as to their intentions. As they hesitate, they are dragged before a police inspector.

Again questioned they acknowledge why they were hiding under the platform. The commissioner regards this as an unimportant and harmless joke, and liberates the two men; but at the gate they are met by the laundresses from Gros Caillou, with their beetles in their hands, which they use for beating the garments that they wash in the river, whither they are perhaps bound at that early hour.

The laundresses of Gros Caillou, it appears, are very ticklish in regard to female honor; so these irritated Dianas fall, with great blows of their beetles, upon these modern Actæons, these Peeping Toms.

At that moment a man comes along on the run. Under the Patriot Altar has been found a keg of powder. The two culprits must have been there, not for the sake of boring holes through which they could look upward, as they had pretended, but in order to blow up the assembled Patriots.

It is only needful to draw out the bung from the keg, in order to know that it contains, or has contained, cheap wine, and not powder. Even if the keg contains gunpowder, a little reflection would show that if the two conspirators fired that keg, they would be themselves blown up first, and more thoroughly, than any of the Patriots. These considerations should prove the two jokers innocent of any serious crime; but there are times when nobody reflects, when nobody weighs the evidence, — times when nobody wishes to know the truth, or reflect upon the consequences of an action.

In an instant the squall becomes a storm. A group of strange men come upon the scene. Whence come they? Nobody knows. Whence came the men who killed Foulon, Berthier, Flesselles, thus aggravating the horrors of October, 1789? Out of the shades, whither they returned when their work of death was over.

These new-comers seize upon the unlucky pensioner and the poor barber. Both are thrown down. Pierced by dagger-thrusts, one of them, the pensioner, cannot rise. The other, the hairdresser, is dragged to a lamp-post. In a few seconds the cord is about his neck, and he is hoisted into the air. At the height of ten feet the weight of his body breaks the cord. Still alive, he falls to the ground. Raising himself an instant, he sees his comrade's head on the end of a pike. How happens it that a pike is always ready, just on the instant? At this sight he utters a scream and then swoons. Now his head is cut off, or rather hacked off, and a second pike is forthwith in readiness to receive this bloody trophy.

It is immediately felt that these two heads must promenade through Paris with a popular escort, and the head-bearers go singing up Rue Grenelle, followed by a hundred roughs like themselves.

At nine o'clock the municipal officers, with the accompaniment of ushers and trumpets, are proclaiming, in Palace Royal Square, the decree of the Assembly, and the protective penalties which will follow any transgression of that decree, when these ruffians, from the Champ de Mars, come pouring into the square, through the Rue Saint Thomas by the Louvre.

This is an admirable buttress for the position taken by the city government. However harsh the repressive measures threatened, they cannot reach the height of the crime just committed.

The members of the Assembly begin to gather. From Palace Royal Square to the Riding School is but a short distance, and the report of the rabble's proceedings has but to take a single bound, in order to set the legislative hall into confusion; only the victims of lawlessness are no longer merely a barber and an old pensioner, punished beyond all reason for a prank worthy of college boys. They are represented as two good citizens, the friends of public order, who have been slaughtered for advising the Revolutionists to respect the laws.

At once Regnault de Saint Jean d'Angély springs to the rostrum, and says: "Citizens, I call for martial law. I ask the Assembly that all those who encourage resistance among the people, whether by individual or collective publications, shall be declared guilty of the crime lèse-nation, — treason against France."

The Assembly rises almost in a body; and, in accordance with Angély's proposal, declares all shall be regarded as public criminals who individually or collectively, by writings or publications, urge the people to disregard the votes of the Assembly.

This is practically to pronounce the innocent petitioners, in the Champ de Mars, guilty of treason; and this is precisely what is intended by the vote.

Robespierre is on the watch in one corner of the Assembly. He hears the vote proclaimed, and at once hurries to the Jacobin Club, to give notice of what has been done.

The hall is deserted. Not over twenty-five or thirty members are wandering about in the old convent.

Santerre is there, however, awaiting the commands of his superiors. He is at once sent to the Champ de Mars, to warn the petitioners of approaching danger. There he finds two or three hundred people on the altar platform, signing the Jacobin petition prepared by Brissot, with Laclos's Royalist clause eliminated by popular vote.

The hero of the day before, Billot, is the centre of this movement. He cannot sign for himself; but he tells them his name, and his hand is guided, so that he inscribes his signature among the first.

Santerre ascends the platform, and announces that the Assembly declares all those to be in open rebellion who demand the dethronement of the King; and he further adds that he is the envoy from the Jacobins, sent to withdraw the Jacobin petition prepared by Brissot.

Billot comes down three steps, and faces the afterwards celebrated brewer. These two men looking at each other, each taking the other's measure, are types of the two material forces moving the Nation at this period, — Paris and the Provinces.

They recognize each other as true brothers, for they fought together at the Bastille two years ago.

"Very well," says Billot, "the Jacobins can have their petition back again, but we 'll make another."

"And that other petition," says Santerre, "needs only to be brought to me, in the Faubourg Saint Antoine, and I 'll not only sign it myself, but I 'll have it signed by all my hands." And he offers his coarse hand to Billot, who grasps it cordially.

At the sight of this powerful alliance, which unites city and country, there is loud applause.

Billot returns the old petition to Santerre, who at once takes himself off, making gestures of assent and comfort, which the people do not misunderstand. Besides, Santerre is already well known.

"It seems," says Billot, "that the Jacobins are afraid. Being cowards, they have the right to withdraw their document. So be it! But we, — we are not afraid, and we have the right to make another petition."

"Yes, yes!" cry several voices. "Another petition! Here! To-morrow!"

"And why not to-day?" asks Billot. "To-morrow? Who knows what may happen by to-morrow?"

"Yes, yes, yes!" cry several voices. "To-day! Right off!"

A group of noteworthy people forms around Billot. Strength has the virtue of the magnet, and draws others to itself.

This group is composed of delegates from the Cordeliers and the Amateur Jacobins. Either because they are more venturesome than their leaders, or not so well informed, these Revolutionists have come to the Champ de Mars in the teeth of counter-orders from their chiefs.

These persons for the most part bear names as yet unknown, but in one way or another they are soon to become celebrated.

There are Robert, Mademoiselle de Kéralio, the Rolands.

There is Brune, a typesetter, who is one day to become Marshal of France.

There is Hébert, a public writer, who is the future editor of that scurrilous journal called "Father Duchêne."

There is Chaumette, a journalist and medical student.

There is Sergent, a copperplate engraver, who is sometime to be the brother-in-law of Marceau, and also the manager of the famous Festivals of Reason.

There is Fabre d'Églantine, author of "The Epistolary Intrigue."

There is Henriot, the Master of the Guillotine.

There is Maillard, the dreaded sheriff of the Châtelet Court, of whom we have lost sight since that Sixth of October, but whom we may meet again on the Second of September.

There are Isabey the father and Isabey the son, — the latter the only one of the actors in the scene which we are describing, who will be alive and fresh to repeat its story sixty or seventy years hence, in 1855, at the age of eighty-eight.

"Now! Right off!" cry all those who are present; and a shout of applause goes up from the Champ de Mars.

"Who will wield the quill?" asks a voice.

"Me, you, everybody!" cries Billot. "This must be truly the people's petition."

One Patriot leaves the place at full speed. He is on the search for writing materials. While waiting for his return, the bystanders take hold of hands. They begin to dance the farandole, and sing the famous Ça ira.

In ten minutes the Patriot returns with the writing materials. For fear there should not be enough he brings a pint of ink, a whole package of quills, and five or six quires of paper.

Robert takes the pen. Mademoiselle de Kéralio, Madame Roland, and Monsieur Roland dictate by turns, while Robert writes the following petition:

PETITION TO THE NATIONAL ASSEMBLY.

Written on the Patriot Altar,

July 17, 1791.

REPRESENTATIVES OF THE NATION: You are near the end of your labors. Soon your successors, chosen by the people, will come and take your places, but without encountering the obstacles placed in your way by the Deputies of the two privileged orders, — the clergy and the nobility, — who are necessarily the enemies of the sacred principles of equality.

A great crime has been committed.

Louis Sixteenth fled. He unworthily abandoned his post of duty. The country was within a finger s breadth of anarchy. Certain citizens arrested the King at Varennes, and brought him back to Paris. The people of the capital request you to decide nothing hastily as to the fate of the royal culprit, but to wait for some expression of opinion from the eighty-two other departments of the Nation.

You differ in opinions. A cloud of addresses will come to the Assembly. All sections of the country will simultaneously demand that Louis shall be tried. You, gentlemen, have already prejudged him innocent, and beyond the reach of law, by declaring, in your vote of July 16, that the Constitutional Charter shall be presented to him for his adherence, as soon as that Constitution is finished.

Legislators! This is not the desire of the people, and we think that your greatest glory — your duty — consists in being the organ of the public will.

Undoubtedly, gentlemen, you have been constrained to this action by a crowd of refractory Deputies, who have beforehand recorded their antagonism to the Constitution ; but, gentlemen, — representatives of a generous and trusting people, — remember that two hundred and ninety Reactionists are not the voice of the whole National Assembly, and that the decree is null and void in its form and basis : inadequate in its basis, because contrary to the will of the true sovereigns; erroneous in form, because carried through by two hundred and ninety unqualified persons.

These considerations, all relating to the common weal, and growing out of an imperative desire to avoid anarchy, — to which we shall be exposed by any want of harmony between the people and those who represent them, — justify us in demanding, in the name of all France, that you reconsider your decree of July 16, in reference to the King ; that you regard the offence of Louis the Sixteenth as proven, and himself as having abdicated his throne ; that you accept this abdication, and convoke a new legislative body, to proceed in a truly Constitutional manner to judge the King, and replace him with a new Executive Administration.

The petition being prepared, silence is called for. At that summons all noise ceases and all heads are bared. In a loud voice Robert reads the lines, already placed before the eyes of our readers.

They meet the wishes of all. No objection is raised ; but, on the contrary, unanimous applause breaks out as soon as the last phrase is read.

Now the petition is to be signed, — not only by two or three hundred people, but by perhaps ten thousand ; for through all the entrances to the Champ de Mars crowds are pouring in, and it is evident that in an hour more than fifty thousand persons will surround the Patriot Altar.

Those who have prepared the petition are the first to sign it, and then they pass the quill to their neighbors. In a few seconds the whole page is covered with signatures, and so leaves of blank paper are distributed, of the same shape as that whereon the petition is written. These extra sheets are numbered in order, so as to be added to the original sheet.

After these leaves are distributed the people first begin to sign, laying the paper on the posts which form the four angles of the Patriot Altar. Then they write on the steps, on their knees, on the crowns of their hats, on anything upon which they can lay the petition.

In accordance with the orders of the Assembly, sent to Lafayette, — to whom has also been reported, not the petition then being signed, but the morning's assassination, — the first troops now arrive on the Champ de Mars; but such is the preoccupation of the crowd, on account of the petition, that they hardly pay any attention to the troops; yet what is about to take place is of vast importance.

CHAPTER XIX.

THE RED FLAG.

THESE troops are headed by one of Lafayette's aides. Which one? His name is unknown. Lafayette always had so many aides, that history loses itself among them.

Whoever he is, a gunshot comes from the hillside, and strikes the young man; but the wound is not dangerous, and as this is a solitary shot, the soldiers disdain to notice it.

A similar scene takes place at Gros Caillou, where Lafayette appears with three thousand men and some fieldpieces.

Fournier is there, at the head of a band of miscreants, — doubtless the same who have just assassinated the barber and the one-legged pensioner, — and they are putting up a barricade; but Lafayette marches upon this barricade, and demolishes it.

Through the wheel-spokes of a wagon, while this is going on, Fournier fires his musket at Lafayette; but fortunately the gun misses fire. The barricade is carried and demolished, and Fournier is seized and brought before Lafayette.

"Who is this man?" he asks.

"He 's the fellow who fired upon you; though it was a flash in the pan."

"Let him alone, and he 'll get himself hanged in some other way."

Fournier does not get himself hanged. He disappears temporarily from sight, to reappear at the September massacres next year.

Lafayette reaches the Champ de Mars. They are signing the petition, and the most perfect tranquillity reigns. This tranquillity is so great that Madame de Condorcet is there, promenading, with her infant, a year old.

Lafayette advances as far as the Patriot Altar. He inquires what is going on, and they show him the petition. The petitioners also agree to go about their usual business as soon as the petition is signed. He can see in this nothing reprehensible, and withdraws with his soldiers.

But if the shot which wounds Lafayette's aide, and the flint which misses fire on himself, have not made loud reports in the Champ de Mars, they have roused a tremendous echo in the Assembly. It must not be forgotten that the Assembly is looking for a Royalist opportunity, and that some very slight event may bring that opportunity.

"Lafayette is wounded! One of his aides is killed! There is slaughter in the Champ de Mars!"

Such are the reports which find currency throughout Paris, and which the Assembly officially transmits to the Hôtel de Ville; but the City Hall is already disturbed by what is going on at the Champ de Mars, and sends thither three municipal officers, Jacques, Hardy, and Renaud.

As they stand on the elevation of the Patriot Altar the signers of the petition see advancing towards them this new procession, which arrives from the waterside, for the Seine flows by one side of the field. A deputation of signers is sent to meet the procession.

The three city officials, who have come on purpose to see what is going on, go straight to the Patriot Altar; but instead of finding, as they expect, a factious crowd, irritated, threatening, and turbulent, they see only well-behaved citizens, some walking about in groups, others signing the petition, others dancing the farandole and singing the Ça ira.

The crowd is quiet, but perhaps the petition is rebellious. The officials ask to have it read to them.

The petition is read to them, from the first line to the last; and as has happened once before, this reading is followed by cheers and unanimous acclamations.

"Gentlemen," say the municipal officers, "we are charmed to note your orderly disposition. We have been told there was some disturbance here, but we have been deceived. We shall not fail to report what we have seen, to speak of the tranquillity which reigns in the Champ de Mars. So far from impeding the signing of your petition, we will protect your work with the public force, in case anybody tries to hinder you. If we were not engaged in official duties, we would sign the petition ourselves; and if you doubt our good intentions, we will remain here with you as hostages, till every signature is affixed to your paper."

This spirit of the petition must then be the general spirit, since the city officials themselves would gladly sign it, did not their position as office-holders forbid.

This adhesion of three men — whose advance the signers have defiantly awaited, regarding them as enemies, — encourages the petitioners.

In the foolish scuffle which has taken place between the populace and the National Guard, two fellows have been arrested. As commonly happens under similar circumstances, the two prisoners are perfectly innocent; so the leaders among the petitioners demand that these two men be set at liberty.

"We cannot take that burden upon ourselves," respond the city delegates; "but name your commissioners. They shall go with us to the Hôtel de Ville, and justice will be done."

A dozen commissioners are accordingly appointed. Billot, being unanimously chosen to take part in this duty, takes his way towards the city, accompanied by his colleagues and the three public officials.

On their arrival at the Place de Grève, in front of the City Hall, the commissioners are surprised to find the square so full of soldiers that it requires some pains to get through this forest of bayonets.

Billot is their guide, for it will be remembered that he is well acquainted with the Hôtel de Ville, which we have heretofore seen him enter more than once, with our friend Pitou.

At the door of the Council Hall the three officials ask the twelve commissioners to wait an instant, and then they open the door, enter, and do not reappear.

A whole hour the commissioners wait. No news! Impatiently Billot stamps his feet and frowns.

Suddenly the door opens. The whole municipal corporation appears, with Bailly at its head.

Bailly is very pale. Being pre-eminently a mathematician, he has a nice sense of justice and injustice. He feels himself urged on to a mistaken course of action; but the orders of the Assembly are before him, and Bailly will fulfil them to the letter.

Billot walks straight up to him, and says, in that firm tone with which our readers are already familiar: "Monsieur Mayor, we have been waiting for you over an hour."

"Who are you, and what have you to say to me?" asks Bailly.

"Who am I?" answers Billot. "I 'm astonished you should ask such a question, Monsieur Bailly. Those who go to the left evidently don't recognize those who turn to the right. — I 'm Billot!"

Bailly starts. That name recalls to his mind the man who was one of the first to enter the Bastille; the man who aided in the protection of the City Hall, in those dreadful days when Foulon and Berthier were assassinated; the man who marched by the window of the royal carriage, the first time the King was brought from Versailles; the man who, on that occasion, affixed the tricolored cockade to Louis Sixteenth's hat; the man who roused Lafayette on that awful October night; the man who brought the King back from Varennes.

"As to what I have to say," continues Billot, "I have this to say, that we are sent here by an assemblage of people in the Champ de Mars."

"And what do these people ask?"

"They ask that you keep the promise made by your three messengers, by setting free two citizens unjustly accused, and for whose innocence we vouch."

"Well," responds Bailly, trying to pass along, "do you suppose we can rely upon such pledges?"

"And why not?"

"Because they are made by seditious fellows."

The commissioners look at one another in astonishment. Billot scowls and says: "Seditious fellows? So we are rebels, are we?"

"Yes," says Bailly, "very seditious fellows! and I 'm on my way now to the Champ de Mars, to restore good order."

Billot shrugs his shoulders and laughs, — such a rough laugh as sounds like a threat, when coming from certain lips.

"Restore order in the Champ de Mars?" he says. "Why, your friend Lafayette has been there and gone away again; and your three delegates have been there, and they will tell you that the Champ de Mars is more quiet than the Hôtel de Ville!"

Just then the captain of a central company in the Bonne Nouvelle Battalion runs in, all excited.

"Where 's the Mayor?" he asks.

Billot stands aside, so that Bailly can be seen, as he answers: "Here I am!"

"To arms, Monsieur Mayor, to arms!" shouts the captain. "There 's fighting in the Champ de Mars, where fifty thousand scoundrels are preparing to march against the National Assembly."

Hardly are the words out of his mouth when Billot's heavy hand weighs on his shoulder, as the farmer asks: "Who says so?"

"Who says so? The Assembly!"

"Then the Assembly lies!" answers Billot.

"Monsieur!" says the captain, drawing his sword.

"The Assembly lies!" repeats Billot, grasping the sword, partly by the hilt and partly by the blade, and wrenching it from the captain's hands.

"Enough, enough, gentlemen!" says Bailly. "We will go and see for ourselves. Monsieur Billot, I beg you to return the captain's sword; and if you have any influence over those who have sent you here, go back to them, and ask them to disperse."

"To disperse?" cries Billot. "Let us see about that! The right of petition is guaranteed by law, and until the decree is annulled, nobody has any right — not even a mayor or the Commander of the National Guard — to hinder citizens from expressing their wishes. You 're going to the Champ de Mars? We 'll precede you, Monsieur Mayor!"

Those who surround the actors in this scene wait but for an order — a word or a gesture — from Bailly, to arrest Billot; but Bailly feels that the voice which speaks so loudly and firmly is the voice of the people. He makes a sign to let Billot and the commissioners pass by unmolested.

As they descend to the square a large red flag, suspended from one of the windows of the City Hall behind them, shakes out its bloody folds in the first breezes of a storm which overspreads the sky.

Unhappily this storm does not last many minutes. There is thunder, but no rain, and this but increases the heat of the day, and permeates the air with a little more electricity.

By the time Billot and the eleven other commissioners reach the Champ de Mars, the multitude has increased by nearly one-third. As nearly as the number of people in that immense basin can be estimated, there must be about sixty thousand souls. These sixty thousand men and women are on the slope which surrounds the Patriot Altar, and on the platform and steps of the altar itself.

Billot and his colleagues appear. This causes immense commotion. From all points the people rush towards them and press about them. Have the two innocent citizens been released? What is the Mayor's response?

The two citizens have not been released, and the Mayor has given no answer about them, except to say that the petitioners are a set of seditious fellows.

At this title the seditious fellows laugh good-naturedly, and they all resume their places, their promenades, their occupations.

During all this time they continue to sign the petition. Already four or five thousand signatures are counted. Before evening they may reckon on fifty thousand. The Assembly will feel obliged to yield before such startling unanimity.

Suddenly a citizen comes running, out of breath. Not only, like the commissioners, has he seen the red flag flying from the City Hall windows, but he has also heard the joyful shouts with which the National Guards have greeted the announcement that they are to march on the Champ de Mars. Those guards have loaded their guns; and that being done, a municipal officer has gone from rank to rank, whispering to the leaders.

Then the whole mass of National Guardsmen, with Bailly and other municipal officials at the head, has put itself in motion, to come to the Champ de Mars.

The man who brings these details has hastened on ahead, in order to announce this sinister intelligence to the Patriots; but there reigns such peace, such harmony, such fraternity over the immense field, consecrated by the Federation of the preceding year, that citizens who are there, exercising a right recognized by the Constitution, cannot believe themselves to be thus menaced. They prefer to think the messenger mistaken.

They continue to sign the petition. The singing and dancing is redoubled.

However, they begin to hear the roll of a drum. The sound draws nearer. Then the petitioners begin to look about them and grow anxious. Among those standing on the slopes arises a great murmur, and they point to the approaching bayonets, which glitter like a waving field of steel.

The members of different Patriotic societies come together, and many propose to retire; but from the Patriot

Altar Billot calls aloud: "Brothers, what are we doing? Why this fear? Either the proclamation of martial law is directed against us, or it is not. If not aimed at us, why should we avoid it? If aimed at us, it will be made known to us. We shall be notified by public summons, and then it will be time enough to run away."

"Yes, yes!" is heard on all sides, "we are within the limits of the law. Let's wait for the summons. It must be three times read, — the Riot Act! Let's stay where we are."

Everybody remains. At that instant the beat of the drum draws very near, and detachments of the National Guards appear at the three entrances of the Champ de Mars.

A third of the armed mass appears at the opening near the Military Academy. Another third is seen through an opening a little lower down. The other third appears at the opening opposite the Chaillot Heights. On that side the troops cross the wooden bridge, and advance with the red flag at their head and Bailly in the ranks; only their red flag is an almost invisible ensign, which does not especially attract the eyes of the crowd to that detachment.

This is what the petitioners, gathered in the Champ de Mars, now see. Meanwhile, what do the new-comers see?

They see a vast plain, filled with inoffensive promenaders, and in the midst of this plain the Patriot Altar, a gigantic structure, on a platform which is accessible (as we have already said) by four wide staircases, over which four battalions could mount in solid ranks.

From this platform rise, like a pyramid, the steps leading to the smaller platform, crowned by the Patriot Altar, shaded by a beautiful palm. Each step, from the lowest to the highest, serves as a bench, which holds a greater or less number of spectators, according to its capacity. This human pyramid is bright with animation.

The National Guards from Marais and from the Faubourg Saint Antoine, four thousand men or more, with their artillery, enter by the opening at the southern angle of the Military School, and range themselves in front of that building.

Lafayette has little confidence in the men of Marais and the Faubourgs, which constitute the democratic part of his army; so he has added to their numbers a battalion of hired soldiery.

These hirelings are the modern Pretorian Guard. They are composed, as we have said, of old soldiers, of members of the disbanded French Guard, of excited Lafayettites, who, knowing that their deity has been fired upon, wish to avenge this crime, which, in their opinion, is a greater offence than that of high treason against the Nation, which the King has committed.

The Hireling Guards come from the side near Gros Caillou, brilliant, formidable, and menacing. Entering the middle of the Champ de Mars, they find themselves at once in front of the Patriot Altar.

The third body, coming from the wooden bridge, preceded by the shabby red flag of which we have spoken, is composed of the National Guard Reserves, with which are mingled a hundred dragoons and a band of barbers, privileged to carry swords, and armed to the teeth.

Through the same openings by which the National Guards enter, come also several squadrons of cavalry. They raise the dust, scarcely laid by the short rain, which for a moment seemed like a harbinger of peace; and this dust shuts off from the spectators their view of the impending drama, which can only be seen through a murky veil, or through rents in the sandy cloud.

What is thus partly seen by spectators, through a veil or through the rents, we will try to describe.

There is first the crowd, thrown into living eddies by the cavalry, whose horses are driven at full speed around this vast circus. The crowd, completely shut in by the circle of iron, seeks a refuge at the foot of the Patriot Altar, as at the threshold of an inviolable sanctuary.

Then from the waterside is heard a single gunshot, and the smoke of a vigorous fusillade rises towards the sky.

Bailly is received by shouts from the boys who cover the slopes of Grenelle. In the midst of these outcries a shot is heard. A ball whistles behind the Mayor's head, and slightly wounds a dragoon. Bailly orders his men to fire, but to fire into the air, simply to frighten the crowd; but hardly has the echo died away when another fusillade responds. This fusillade comes from the Hireling Guards.

Upon whom, upon what, do they fire? On that inoffensive crowd surrounding the Patriot Altar.

A scream of fright follows the discharge; and now is seen a rare spectacle, which is to be more common in the future, — the people fleeing in all directions, leaving behind them motionless corpses, and wounded bodies weltering in their blood. Amidst the smoke and dust the enraged cavalry are in pursuit of the fugitives.

The Champ de Mars presents a deplorable aspect. Everywhere are injured women and children.

As always happens under similar circumstances, the luxury of blood, the frenzy of carnage, spreads far and wide. The artillery is placed in position, and the gunners make ready to fire. Lafayette has barely time to ride to the spot, and put himself and his horse before a cannon's mouth.

After a headlong and blind rush hither and thither, the doomed rabble instinctively throws itself into the ranks of the National Guards from the Marais and the Faubourg Saint Antoine. These guards open their ranks to receive the fugitives. The wind having blown the smoke in the faces of these friendly soldiers, they have not seen what has really taken place, and fancy the fugitives are actuated by fear alone. When the smoke is dissipated, they are horrified to behold a heap of dead bodies and the earth stained with blood.

At that instant comes an aide at full gallop, with orders for the National Guards from the Faubourg Saint Antoine and the Marais to march on and sweep the place, so as to effect a junction with the other two military detachments; but these democratic troops propose, on the contrary, to defy the aide, and the troopers who are charging upon the populace. The aide and the cavalry alike recoil before these Patriotic bayonets. All the people who have fled to that side find impregnable security.

In an instant the great field is evacuated. There remain in it only the bodies of men, women, and children, killed or wounded by the terrible discharge of the Hireling Guard, and the unhappy fugitives cut down by the dragoons or trampled under the feet of their horses.

In the very heat of this carnage, undaunted by the fall of the dead and the cries of the wounded, beneath the discharges of musketry and under the mouths of the cannon, a few Patriots gather up the papers containing the signatures to their petition; and even as the men have found a refuge in the ranks of the Marais and Saint Antoine National Guards, so these signatures, in all probability, find a secure asylum in the house of Santerre.

Who gave that unfortunate order to fire? No one knows. That is one of the historic mysteries which remain unexplained, despite the most conscientious investigations. Neither chivalrous Lafayette nor honest Bailly loved bloodshed; and yet this blood, crying from the ground, pursued them to the end of their days. From that moment their popularity was lost.

How many victims remained on that field of carnage? Nobody knows. Some underrated the number, in order to lessen the responsibility of the Mayor and the Commanding General; while others overrated it, so as to increase the popular ire.

When night came, these corpses were thrown into the Seine. The Seine, a blind accomplice, carried them to the ocean, wherein they were swallowed up.

All in vain were Bailly and Lafayette not only absolved from guilt, but felicitated by the Assembly. Vainly did the Constitutionalist journals proclaim this day's work a triumph of law. The triumph was blasted with mildew and branded with shame, as should be every day of disaster, wherein rulers slay those who are not in arms against lawful authority; for such executions are only assassinations.

The people, who generally give things their proper names, called this pretended triumph the Massacre of the Champ de Mars.

CHAPTER XX.

AFTER THE MASSACRE.

LET us return to Paris, and see what is going on there. Paris heard the noise of the fusillade, and shuddered. Paris did not quite know which party was right and which party was wrong; but Paris felt that she had received a wound, and that her blood flowed from this wound.

Robespierre stayed at the Jacobin Club, like a commander in his fortress. There he was really strong; but that popular citadel had been ripped open, and everybody could enter through the breach left by Barnave, Duport, and Lameth, in their withdrawal.

The Jacobin sent one of their own number to learn the true state of things.

As to their neighbors of the Feuillant Club, they had no need to send out for the news. They were kept informed, hour by hour, minute by minute, of what was transpiring. Their own game was being played, and so far they were the gainers.

The Jacobin messenger returned in about ten minutes. He had met some of the fugitives, and they had hurled at him this horrible information: "Lafayette and Bailly are slaughtering the people."

Everybody had not heard Bailly's cry of woe, everybody had not seen Lafayette fearlessly throw himself directly in front of the loaded cannon.

The messenger at once hurried back to the old convent, and his cries frightened the small number of zealous members — not over thirty or forty — still remaining there.

They comprehended that it was upon themselves, the Jacobins, that the Feuillants would try to throw the responsibility of the first provocation. Had not the first petition come from the Jacobins? To be sure, it had been withdrawn; but the second petition — which had not been withdrawn — was evidently the offspring of the first. No wonder the Jacobins were frightened.

That white face, that phantom of virtue, that shadow of Rousseau's philosophy, called Robespierre, was no longer merely pale, but livid. The prudent Deputy from Arras tried to slip away, but could not. He was forced to remain and take his stand. His choice was inspired by fear.

The Jacobins declared their disavowal of the false, or falsified, publications attributed to them, and were ready to swear anew their fidelity to the Constitution, and their willingness to obey the decrees of the National Assembly.

Hardly had this declaration been made when, through the corridors of the old Jacobin convent, resounded a great noise from the street. This noise was made up of laughter, jeers, yells, threats, and songs.

The Jacobins pricked up their ears, and hoped the noise would pass them by, and keep on to the Palace Royal, which Orleans occupied. No! The noise ceased, and the rabble came to a halt in front of the low and gloomy convent portal, which opened upon the Rue Saint Honoré.

To add to the terror which already reigned within, somebody called out: "Those are the Hireling Guards, returning from the slaughter of the Champ de Mars. They mean to demolish us with cannon-shot."

Fortunately some soldiers had been placed at the entrance, as a matter of precaution. They closed and secured all the openings into the old place, so as to prevent this troop, furious and drunk with the blood already spilled, from being tempted into a fresh onslaught.

One by one the Jacobins and spectators went away. This evacuation did not take long, for even when the hall was first opened, there were present barely thirty or forty members; and the galleries did not afterward contain over a hundred spectators.

Among the last was Madame Roland, who was everywhere that day. She relates how one Jacobin, when the rumor spread that the Hireling Guards were about to invade the hall, lost his head to such an extent that he climbed into the seats reserved for women. She, Madame Roland, made him ashamed of his alarm, and he returned to the floor, where he belonged.

As we have said, actors and spectators, one after the other, shied through the half-open door.

Robespierre went out in his turn. Should he go to the right or the left? He must turn to the left, if he wished to go to his own place; for, as is well known, he then lived at the farther end of the Marais; but in that case he must make his way through the ranks of the Hireling Guards. He preferred to go towards the Faubourg Saint Honoré, and ask an asylum with Pétion, who dwelt in that quarter; so he turned to the right.

Robespierre was very anxious to remain unnoticed, but how could he do so, with that olive coat, plain to the extreme limit of civic plainness, — for the short and striped coat did not come in till a later period; with the spectacles, which testified that burning the midnight candle had aged the worthy Patriot's eyes earlier than usual; with that stealthy step, like that of the weasel and the fox?

Hardly had he taken twenty steps in the street before two or three persons said, one to another: "Robespierre! — See, Robespierre! — That 's Robespierre!"

Women paused and clasped their hands. Women liked Robespierre, who, in his speeches, took great pains to lay stress upon sentimentalism.

"How, that dear Monsieur Robespierre? Is that he?"

"Yes!"

"Where is he?"

"There, there! — See? — That little man, — slender and well powdered, — walking along by the wall. He tries to hide, because he 's so modest!"

Really our Robespierre did not hide himself through modesty, but through fear; but who dared suggest that the virtuous and incorruptible Robespierre, the tribune of the people, tried to conceal himself out of cowardice?

One man stuck his head under Robespierre's nose, to make sure it was he. Robespierre pulled his hat over his eyes, not knowing why he was so closely inspected. The man recognized him and cried out: "Huzza for Robespierre!"

Robespierre would have preferred having to do with an enemy, rather than with such a friend.

"Robespierre!" cried another bystander, still more fanatical. "Long live Robespierre! If we must needs have a king, why not Robespierre?"

Oh sublime Shakespeare! "Cæsar is dead, that his assassin might be Cæsar!"

If any man ever cursed his popularity, it was Robespierre at that moment. A great circle of people gathered about him, and it was even proposed to carry him along in triumph. Under his glasses he peeped in terror from right to left, trying to detect some open door or dark alley into which he could flee, and be out of sight.

Just then he felt himself grasped by the arm, and pulled violently aside, while a voice whispered, with a friendly accent: "Come!"

Robespierre yielded to the impulsion, and let himself be hurried on. Presently he heard a door shut behind him, and found himself in a joiner's shop.

This joiner was a man from forty-two to forty-five years old. Near him was his wife. In a room at the end of the shop were two girls, one sixteen and the other eighteen years of age, who were preparing the family supper.

Robespierre was very pale, and seemed on the verge of fainting.

"Leonora," said the joiner, "a glass of water!" Leonora, the carpenter's eldest daughter, approached timidly, with a glass of water in her hand. Perhaps the lips of the austere tribune touched the fingers of Mademoiselle Duplay; for Robespierre was now, for the first time, in the house of the carpenter of that name.

While Madame Roland, who knows Robespierre's peril and exaggerates it, is on a bootless errand to the Marais district, to offer him a shelter with herself and husband, let us forsake Robespierre, who is secure with the excellent Duplay family, — which he will one day make his own, — in order to enter the Tuileries, in the track of Doctor Gilbert.

Again the Queen is in expectation; but it is not Barnave for whom she waits; nor is she in the lower apartments of Madame Campan, but in her own rooms. Moreover, she is not standing, with her hand on the door-latch, but seated in an armchair, her head in her hand.

She is waiting for Weber, whom she has sent to the Champ de Mars, and who has witnessed the whole scene from the heights of Chaillot.

In order to be fair towards the Queen, — and better understand that hatred towards the French, for which she has been so greatly blamed, — inasmuch as we have recounted her sufferings during the journey from Varennes, let us also relate what she endured after her return. A historian may be partial; but we are only romancers, and partiality is not permitted to the romancer.

The King and Queen having been arrested, the people had but one idea, — that having once fled, they would flee a second time, and that the second time they would gain the frontier. There was a popular notion that the Queen was a clever sorceress, like Medea, who might fly from her window, in a car drawn by two griffins. Such ideas were not only current among the common people, but they found credence among the officers set to guard Marie Antoinette.

Gouvion, who had let her slip through his fingers at the time of the escape to Varennes, — and whose mistress, a guardian of the wardrobe, then warned Mayor Bailly of the intended departure, — declared that he would not be responsible for the result, if any other woman except Madame de Rochereul (this, it will be remembered, was the name of the lady of the wardrobe) had the right to enter the Queen's apartments. He therefore placed at the bottom of the stairs, leading to the royal apartments, a portrait of Madame de Rochereul, in order that sentinels might detect any other woman who attempted to ascend to the Queen's rooms.

Being informed of this order, the Queen went at once to the King and complained of the insult. The King could not believe it, and sent downstairs to inquire into the matter; but he found the report to be true.

Then the King appealed to Lafayette, and demanded the removal of that portrait. The portrait was removed, and the Queen's usual attendants resumed their service; but in place of this humiliating order, another precaution was instituted, equally offensive. The battalion officers were regularly stationed in the parlor called the Grand Cabinet, adjoining the Queen's bedroom, and they were ordered to keep the door always open, so that they could have an eye on the royal family.

One day the King ventured to shut this door. Immediately an officer reopened it. A moment afterwards the King closed it again; but it was opened anew, and the officer said: "Sire, it is useless for you to shut this door; for as often as you shut it, I shall reopen it. Such are my instructions."

The door remained open. The only favor officially obtainable was this, — that while the Queen was dressing and undressing, the door might be closed against the framework, without being entirely shut. As soon as she was dressed or abed, the door was again set wide open.

This tyranny was so intolerable, that the Queen conceived the idea of placing her attendant's bed near her own, so that it should stand between her Majesty and the door; and this bed, furnished with curtains and rolling on castors, made a sort of screen, behind which she could dress and undress.

One night, seeing that the chambermaid was asleep and the Queen wide awake, the sentinel profited by Madame Campan's somnolence to enter the room, and draw near the Queen's bedside.

The Queen met his approach with that haughty air which she knew how to assume when anybody failed in proper respect; but this courageous fellow, who had no idea of showing her any disrespect, was not disturbed by her haughtiness, and looked at her with an unmistakable expression of pity, as he said: "On my honor, Madame, now that I find you alone, I wish to give you some advice!" and at once, without caring to know whether the Queen did or did not wish to hear him, he unfolded to her what he should do, were he in her place.

The Queen had noted his intrusion with anger; but, reassured by his tone of good-nature, she let him go on, and finally listened to him with profound melancholy.

During the interview the attendant awoke. Seeing a man near the Queen's bed, she screamed, and wished to summon help; but the Queen checked her, saying: "No, Campan. Let me listen to what this gentleman says. Monsieur is a good Frenchman. Though he is deceived, like so many others, as to our intentions, his observations betray a genuine attachment to royalty." So the officer went on to the end, telling the Queen all he wished to say.

Before the Varennes journey Marie Antoinette had not a gray hair. During the night following the scene between Charny and herself, which we have before described, her hair became almost white. Perceiving this sorrowful change she smiled bitterly, and cut off a lock to send to Madame de Lamballe, then in London, with the following words:

Blanched by sorrow!

We saw her waiting for Barnave, and we know his hopes; but he had great difficulty in leading her to share these hopes.

Marie Antoinette feared all scenes of violence. Hitherto these occurrences had always worked against her, as witness the capture of the Bastille, those dreadful October days, and the arrest at Varennes.

The fatal discharge in the Champ de Mars was heard as far as the Tuileries, and the Queen's heart was profoundly disturbed over it. Taking it all together, the Varennes affair was a great lesson to her. Until then the Revolution had seemed to her to mean no more than one of Pitt's English schemes, or one of Orleans's intrigues. She had believed Paris misled by a few demagogues, and she spoke, as did the King, about "our faithful provinces." Now she had seen the provinces, and found them more revolutionary than Paris.

The Assembly was too old, too decrepit, too much in its dotage to faithfully keep the engagements which Barnave had made in its behalf. Besides, was not its term of existence nearly over? The embraces of the dying are not always safe and wholesome.

The Queen was waiting with great anxiety for Weber, as already stated. The door opened. She turned her eyes quickly to that side; but instead of the portly Austrian form of her foster-brother, she saw the stern and cold face of Doctor Gilbert.

She did not much like this Royalist, with his Constitutionalist theories so plainly mapped out, and regarded him as little better than a Republican. Although she felt much respect for him, she would not have sent for him in any crisis, either physical or moral; but when he was in her presence, she submitted to his influence.

When she saw him enter she trembled, for she had not seen him since she listened to his scathing rebuke, the evening of her return from Varennes. "It is you, Doctor?" she said.

Gilbert bowed as he replied: "Yes, Madame, it is I. I know that you are expecting Weber; but the news which he will bring you I bring you also, and more accurately. He was on the side beyond the Seine, where there was no slaughter; while I, on the other hand, was on the field, this side of the river, where the slaughter took place"

"Slaughter? What has happened, Monsieur?"

"A great misfortune, Madame. The Court party has triumphed."

"The Court party has triumphed? You call that a misfortune, Monsieur Gilbert?"

"Yes, because the victory has been won by terrible means, which will weaken the victors, and perhaps lay them low, beside the defeated party."

"But what has happened?"

"Lafayette and Bailly have fired on the populace, and in such a way that henceforth they can serve you no longer."

"Why so?"

"Because their popularity is gone."

"And what were the people doing upon whom they fired?"

"They were signing a petition asking for the removal."

"The removal of whom?"

"Of the King."

"And you think it was wrong to fire on them after that?" asked the Queen, her eyes aflame.

"I think it would have been better to convince than to shoot them."

"Convince them of what?"

"Of the King's sincerity."

"But the King is sincere!"

"Pardon, Madame! Three days ago I was with the King. I spent a whole evening trying to make him understand that his real enemies are his two royal brothers, Condé, and the other fugitives from the kingdom. On my knees I supplicated the King to break all relations with them, and honestly adopt the Constitution, with a proviso that two or three articles should be changed, whose performance would be practically impossible. The King was convinced, — at least so I believed, — and had the kindness to promise me that all should be over between himself and those refugees. Hardly was my back turned, Madame, when the King signed, and had you also sign, a letter for his brother, Monsieur, in which he gave him full powers to treat with the Emperor of Austria and the King of Prussia."

The Queen blushed, like a child detected in an act of disobedience; but a child, thus detected, would have bowed its head; whereas she, on the contrary, straightway recovered herself.

"Do our enemies have spies even in the King's study?"

"Yes, Madame," replied Gilbert, coolly, "and this is what makes every false step so perilous on the King's part."

"But, Monsieur, the letter was entirely written by the King's own hand. After being signed by myself, it was folded and sealed by the King, and then given to the messenger whose business it was to deliver it."

"True, Madame!"

"Was that messenger arrested?"

"The letter was read."

"Are we then surrounded by traitors?"

"All men are not Charnys!"

"What do you mean?"

"Alas, Madame, I mean that one of the fatal auguries which presage the destruction of kings is the alienation of their friends, who should be bound to their fortunes by hoops of steel."

"I have not sent Monsieur de Charny away," bitterly replied the Queen. "Charny withdrew of his own accord. When kings are unfortunate, there are no bonds strong enough to keep friends by royalty's side."

Gilbert looked at the Queen, and softly shook his head.

"Do not calumniate Monsieur de Charny, Madame, or the blood of his brothers will cry out from the tomb, that the Queen of France is ungrateful."

"Monsieur!" exclaimed Marie Antoinette.

"You know very well that I speak the truth, Madame! You know well enough that, whenever real danger betides you, Charny will be at his post, and that his post will be one of danger."

The Queen lowered her head; but presently she said, with much impatience: "You did not come to talk to me about Charny, I suppose?"

"No, Madame! but ideas, like events, are bound together by invisible threads; and those are suddenly brought into the daylight, which were better left hidden in the heart's obscurity. — No, I came to speak to the Queen. Pardon me if, in my temper, I have spoken to the woman; but I am ready to atone for my error."

"And what then do you wish to say to the Queen, Monsieur?"

"I wish to place before her eyes the situation both of France and Europe. This is what I wish to say: Madame, you are playing a game in which the happiness or misery of the world lies in your hands. In that frightful October of two years ago you lost the first game of the rubber. Just now — at least so it seems in the eyes of your courtiers — you have won the second game. Now you are to begin the third game, which is called the rub. If you lose, away go your stakes, — throne, liberty, and perhaps life."

The Queen drew herself up proudly. "Monsieur, do you think we would recoil through cowardice?"

"I know the King is brave; he is a descendant of Henry the Fourth. I know the Queen's heroism, for she is the daughter of Maria Theresa. I only seek, therefore, to reach them through their convictions. Unhappily, I doubt if I can ever arouse in the heart of my King or Queen the conviction which is in my own."

"Why take so much trouble, Monsieur, if you deem it useless?"

"To discharge my duty, Madame. When one lives in such tempestuous times as ours, do you fancy it is pleasant to be continually compelled to say to one's self: This effort also will be unfruitful, but I will discharge my duty?"

The Queen looked Gilbert straight in the eyes. "First of all, Monsieur, do you think it may be yet possible to save the King?"

"I so believe!"

"And royalty also?"

"As I hope!"

"Well, Monsieur," said the Queen, with a sad, deep sigh, "you are happier than I. Both are lost, — as I believe, — and I contend with Fate, only for the sake of satisfying my conscience."

"Yes, Madame, I can well understand that, because you desire a despotic sovereignty and an absolute monarch. You are like a miser, who will not sacrifice a part of his fortune for the sake of safety, even when he comes in sight of the shore, which will repay him more than he loses by shipwreck. He clings fast to his treasures, till drawn down by their deadly weight. You also will drown through your tenacity, hampered by baubles you strive to retain. Take advantage of the tempest. Throw the past to the winds, and swim towards the future!"

"To throw aside the past would be to break faith with all the kings of Europe."

"Yes! but that means an alliance with the French people."

"Frenchmen are our enemies!"

"Because you have taught them to distrust you."

"The French people cannot successfully fight against a European coalition."

"Let them have at their head a king who unreservedly adheres to the Constitution, and the French can conquer all Europe."

"It would require a million of men to do that!"

"Europe is not to be conquered with a million soldiers, Madame, but Europe may be conquered with a single idea. Plant along the Rhine and on the Alps the tricolored flag, with this motto, Death to Tyrants! Liberty to the Nations! and Europe will be conquered."

"Truly, Monsieur, there are times when I am tempted to believe the wisest men insane."

"Ah Madame, Madame! can you not see what France has become in the sight of all other nations? Whatever the crimes of individuals, whatever local excesses may be committed, these do not stain the white robe of France, nor soil her pure hands. France is the virgin Goddess of Liberty. The whole world loves her. From the Low

Countries of the north, from the Rhine, from sunny Italy, millions of voices invoke her aid. She has only to set her feet beyond her own frontier, to find the nations kneeling before her. When France comes with her hands full of liberty, she is no longer a single nation; she becomes the type of immutable justice, of eternal reason and right. Oh Madame, Madame! profit by the fact that France has not yet reached the point of violence; for if you wait too long, these hands, now extended fraternally to the world, will be turned upon herself. Belgium, Germany, Italy now follow each movement of France with looks of love and joy. Belgium says to France, Come! Germany exclaims, I await thee! Italy says to her, Save me! In the far north an unknown hand has written, in the Council of Gustavus of Sweden, No war with France! Besides, not one of the kings, whom you would call to your help, is ready for war. Two empires hate us profoundly. When I say two empires, I should rather say an empress and a minister, — Catherine the Second of Russia and Pitt of England; but they are powerless against us, — at least for the present. Catherine the Second holds Turkey under one claw and Poland under the other. She will need two or three years in which to subdue the one and devour the other. She urges the Germans against us, and offers them France. She makes your brother Leopold ashamed of his supineness. She calls his attention to the invasion of Holland by the King of Prussia, simply to avenge an affront to his sister. She says, Russia says, March on! but Leopold marches not. Pitt is swallowing India, and at this moment he is like a boa-constrictor, suffering from laborious indigestion. If we wait till he is all over it, he will attack us, not so much through a direct foreign war, as by encouraging civil war in France. I know you stand in mortal dread of this Pitt. I know you acknowledge that you never speak of him without experiencing a death-shudder. Do you wish for some means of smiting his heart? Make France a republic with a king. Instead of that, what are you doing, Madame? What is your friend the Princess Lamballe doing? She tells England, where she represents you, that the great ambition of France is to have a Charter, something like the Great Charter, the Magna Charta of England; that the French Revolution, bridled and ridden by the King, has passed its crisis and suffers a reaction. What does Pitt respond to her advances? That he will not suffer France to become a republic, that he will save the monarchy; but all the caresses, all the arguments, all the prayers of Lamballe cannot make him promise to save the monarch, for he hates that monarch. Is it not this very monarch, Louis Sixteenth, — a Constitutional king, a philosophic king, — who has disputed Pitt's claim to India, and helped the American colonies to wrench themselves from under the British yoke? For Louis Sixteenth, Pitt desires but one thing, — that history shall paint him as the companion portrait of Charles the First."

"Monsieur, Monsieur!" cried the startled Queen, "who has disclosed to you all these things?"

"The same men who tell me the contents of your Majesty's letters."

"Then we have no longer a thought which belongs solely to ourselves?"

"I have already told you, Madame, that the kings of Europe are entangled in an invisible network, against which it is useless to contend. Do not resist, Madame! Put yourself at the head of the ideas you now try to hold back, and then this network will become your defensive armor. Those who now hate you will become your defenders. Invisible daggers, which now threaten you, will be turned, not into pruning-hooks, but into swords, ready to smite your enemies."

"You forget, Monsieur, that those whom you call our enemies are kings, — our brothers."

"Ah Madame! Once call the French people your children, and you will see of how little account are brothers, in politics and diplomacy. Besides, can't you see that all these kings and princes are marked with a fatal seal, the stamp of madness? Let us begin with your brother Leopold, worn out at forty-two, in his Tuscan seraglio, transported to Vienna, trying to rally his moribund faculties with the murderous excitements he prepares for himself. Look at Frederick of Prussia. Look at Gustavus of Sweden. One died and the other will die without posterity; for it is well known to everybody, that the present heir of Sweden's throne is the son of Monk, and not of King Gustave. Look at Portugal's King, with his three hundred nuns. Look at the King of Saxony, with his three hundred and fifty-four bastards. Look at Catherine, the Pasiphae of the North, for whom the bull of classic story would not suffice, and who has three armies from which she chooses her lovers. — Oh Madame, Madame! can't you see that all these kings and all these queens are marching into a gulf, into an abyss, into suicide, and that if you wish, — you, — instead of marching with them into suicide, into a ravine, into the gulf of desolation, you may march into a world-wide empire, a universal monarchy?"

"Why don't you say all this to the King?" asked the disquieted Queen.

"Indeed I have, Madame; but, like yourself, he has evil geniuses, who undo all that I have done." Then he added, with deep melancholy: "You tired out Mirabeau, you are wearying Barnave; and you 'll use me as you used them, and that 's all it amounts to!"

"Monsieur Gilbert," said the Queen, "wait here for me. — I wish to see the King a moment, and then I 'll come back."

Gilbert bowed; and the Queen went out by the door leading to the King's rooms.

The Doctor waited ten minutes, fifteen minutes, half an hour. At last a door opened; but it was one opposite to that by which the Queen had made her exit.

An usher entered. After looking carefully about him on all sides he came towards Gilbert, made a Masonic sign, gave him a letter, and went away again. Gilbert opened the letter and read:

Thou art wasting thy time, Gilbert. At this very moment the Queen and King are listening to Breteuil, who comes from Vienna, and brings with him this advice: "Treat Barnave like Mirabeau. Gain time by swearing to support the Constitution, and by executing it to the letter, so as to show its impracticability. France will cool off and get weary. The French are feather-brained. They will take up with some new fad, and Liberty will go its way; or if Liberty is not forgotten, a year will be gained, and in a year we shall be ready for war."

Gilbert, let those two fools slide, who are still derisively called King and Queen, and betake thyself forthwith to the hospital at Gros Caillou. There thou wilt find a dying man, — not so sick as Marie Antoinette and Louis, perchance; but thou mayest perhaps save him, whereas they cannot be saved, and may pull thee after themselves in their downfall.

The letter had no signature, but Gilbert recognized Cagliostro's writing. At that instant Madame Campan entered, by the private doorway, and handed Gilbert a note, which read as follows:

The King begs Doctor Gilbert to put in writing the policy which he has suggested to the Queen.

Detained by an important affair, the Queen regrets that she cannot see Doctor Gilbert again soon, and it will be useless for him to wait for her longer.

Gilbert read the note, meditated a moment, and muttered, shaking his head: "The idiots!"

"Have you no word to send to their Majesties, Monsieur?" asked Madame Campan.

Gilbert gave her the unsigned letter which he had just received. "There is my answer," he said, and left the room.

CHAPTER XXI.

NO MORE MASTERS! NO MORE MISTRESSES!

BEFORE following Gilbert to the hospital at Gros Caillou, where his services are needed for the unknown patient commended to his care by Cagliostro, let us take a leap of some weeks ahead, and get a last peep at the Assembly, which is about to dissolve, after accepting the Constitution, whereon depends the retention of Louis the Sixteenth upon his throne; and let us see what the Court has gained by that fatal victory of July 17, which will cost Bailly his head two years hence.

Then we may return to the chief persons of our narrative, of whom we have partly lost sight, carried away by the political vortex, which compels us to place under the eyes of our readers the great popular street disturbances, where individuals disappear, giving place to the masses.

We saw the danger incurred by Robespierre; and we know how he escaped — thanks to the intervention of Carpenter Duplay — the triumph brought upon him by his wellnigh fatal popularity.

While Robespierre was supping quietly, in the little dining-room opening upon the courtyard, with the husband, wife, and their two daughters, his friends were very anxious about him, having been informed of the perils to which he had been exposed.

Madame Roland was especially anxious. This devoted creature forgot that she had been seen and recognized at the Patriot Altar, and ran the same risk as all the other Patriots who had taken part in drawing up that obnoxious petition. She began by bringing to her own lodgings Robert and Mademoiselle Kéralio; and when it was known, that same night, that the Assembly was preparing an accusation against Robespierre, Madame Roland sought his home at the extremity of the Marais District, in order to warn him. Not finding him there she came back along the Théatin Quay, to Buzot's house.

Buzot was one of Madame Roland's admirers. She knew her great influence over him. This was why she applied to him. Buzot immediately passed the word on to Grégoire. If Robespierre's name was attacked by anybody in the Feuillant Club, Grégoire was to defend him. If the attack was made in the Assembly, Buzot was to be the defender. This was the more praiseworthy in Buzot, because he was no worshipper of Robespierre.

Grégoire was on hand at the meeting of the Feuillants, and Buzot was at the Assembly; but in neither place was there any attempt to accuse Robespierre. Deputies and Feuillants were alike disconcerted by their victory, and in consternation over the sanguinary step which had been taken in behalf of the Royalists.

Instead of any attack upon individuals, one was made upon the clubs in general. One member of the Assembly demanded their immediate closure. For a few minutes it seemed as if this measure would be carried unanimously, but Duport and Lafayette opposed it. To abolish clubs would be to abolish the Feuillant Club, as well as the Jacobin and Cordelier. Lafayette and Duport had not yet outgrown their delusion as to the power which the Feuillant Club might become in their hands. They believed that the Feuillants would take the place of the Jacobins, and that through this immense organization they could control the mind of all France.

The next day the Assembly received the reports from the Mayor of Paris and the Commander of the National Guard. All hands were agreed upon deceiving themselves, and so the comedy was not difficult to play.

Both Mayor and Commander referred to the great disorder in the city, which they had been obliged to repress. They spoke of the morning assassinations and the afternoon gunshots, two events which bore no special relation to each other. They spoke of the danger which threatened the King, the Assembly, and society in general, — dangers which they, better than anybody else, knew had never existed.

The Assembly thanked Lafayette and Bailly for an energy they had never thought of putting forth, and congratulated them over a victory which both deplored from the depths of their hearts. Thanks were also rendered to Heaven, that with "one fell swoop" the insurrection and the insurgents had alike been annihilated.

Listening to these felicitations, one might have believed the Revolution all over. The Revolution was just beginning!

While this was going on, the Old Jacobins, judging the next day by the evening before, imagined themselves attacked, pursued, tracked, and prepared to gain pardon for their real importance, by an assumption of feigned humility.

Although still trembling at the proposal that he should be King in place of Louis Sixteenth, Robespierre proposed an address, in the name of the absent as well as the present members of his club.

In this address he warmly thanked the Assembly for its generous efforts, wisdom, firmness, and vigilance, its impartial and incorruptible justice.

How the Feuillants regained their courage! No wonder they believed themselves all-powerful, when they beheld this humiliation of their opponents. For a time they believed themselves not only masters of Paris, but of France.

Alas! The Feuillants did not understand the situation. In separating themselves from the Jacobins the Feuillants became simply a second Assembly, the duplicate, the reflection, the echo of the chief and real Assembly. The likeness between the two associations was seen even in this, that membership in each depended upon the payment of taxes, active citizenship, and registration on the voting list.

The people now had two chambers of middle-class representatives instead of one; but this was not at all what was desired. The call was for a popular chamber, one which was not the ally, but the opponent, of the National Assembly, a society which would not aid in royalty's reconstruction, but would force it onward to destruction.

The Feuillants did not meet the public demand, so the public abandoned the Feuillants during their short transfer; for their popularity was lost when they crossed the street, from one old convent to the other, though the two meeting-places were so near together.

In July there were four hundred prominent political societies. Of these four hundred societies, three hundred were affiliated equally with the Feuillants and Jacobins, while one hundred adhered to the Jacobins alone. Between July and September six hundred new societies were established, whereof only one hundred corresponded with the Feuillants.

In proportion as the Feuillants waned, the Jacobins renewed their youth, under the leadership of Robespierre, who began to be the most popular man in France. Cagliostro's prediction to Gilbert, in regard to the petty lawyer from Arras, was being accomplished. He was likely to be the death of royalty. Perhaps we shall see as faithfully fulfilled what Cagliostro said about the little Corsican from Ajaccio, who was to build anew the throne of Charlemagne.

Meantime the hour sounded for the end of the National Assembly. True it tolled slowly, as for an old man, with whom life consumes itself drop by drop and goes out spark by spark.

After voting three thousand laws, the Assembly at last finished its revision of the Constitution.

This Constitution was an iron cage, wherein — almost in spite of the Assembly, and without its own conscious knowledge — the King was tightly enclosed. The bars of the cage were gilded; but after all, however thick the gold-plating, these bars could not disguise their true intent.

The royal will had indeed become impotent. It was now a wheel which had its impetus from outside, instead of imparting a momentum of its own. All the King's power of resistance was reduced to his veto, which could delay for three years any measures not satisfactory to him. Thus certain wheels might come to a dead stop, through their own inability to put themselves in motion. Apart from this restrictive power of inertia, the monarchism, built up by two such mighty sovereigns as Henry the Fourth and Louis the Fourteenth, was now reduced to a condition of majestic inutility.

Meanwhile the day drew nigh when the King was to take his oath in support of the Constitution.

England and the titled refugees wrote to the King:

Perish, if necessary; but do not degrade yourself by this oath.

Barnave seconded the advice given by the King's brother-in-law, Leopold, — the successor of his brother Joseph on the Austrian throne, — who wrote as follows:

Take the oath! and let him keep it who can.

At last King Louis decided the question for himself, in this language:

I confess I do not see, in the Constitution, sufficient bonds of unity and action; but as opinions differ on this subject, I will consent to let experience be the sole judge.

It remained to be decided where the Constitution should be presented to the King for his acceptance, — at the Tuileries or at the Assembly. The King cut short the discussion by announcing that he would take the oath to support the Constitution in the very place where that Constitution had been adopted, the Assembly Hall. The day fixed by the King was September 13.

The Assembly received this communication with unanimous plaudits. The King would come to the Assembly! In a spurt of enthusiasm Lafayette rose and demanded a general amnesty for all against whom accusations were pending, on account of their participation in the King's flight to Varennes. This amnesty was voted by acclamation.

Thus the cloud which had momentarily darkened the sky for Charny and Andrée was dissipated almost as soon as it gathered.

A deputation of sixty members was appointed to thank the King for his letter. The Keeper of the Seals hastened to prepare the King for this deputation.

The same morning a decree was passed abolishing the Order of the Holy Ghost, four centuries old, but authorizing the King alone to wear its decoration, which had been an emblem of the highest nobility. The deputation found the King ornamented only with the cross of Saint Louis. As he noted the effect produced on the Deputies by the absence of the blue ribbon, the King said: "Gentlemen, you have to-day abolished the Order of the Holy Ghost, yet allowing its decorations to be used by myself alone; but as such insignia have no value in my eyes, except as a means of communicating pleasure and dignity to others, henceforth I shall consider it abolished for myself, as well as for all others."

The Queen, the Dauphin, and Madame Royale were standing near the entrance. The Queen was pale. Her teeth were clinched, and she trembled all over. Madame Royale, already passionate, irritable, and haughty, seemed chiefly impressed with her humiliations, past, present, and anticipatory. The Dauphin, careless as any child, seemed like the one living being in that group of marble, by the cheerfulness and vivacity he imparted to the scene.

As to the King, he said to Montmorin, several days before: "I know very well that I am ruined. Whatever is attempted for royalty in the future must be done for my boy."

His Majesty responded with apparent sincerity to the address of the deputation. At the conclusion he turned to the royal family, and added: "Here are my wife and children, who share my sentiments."

Yes, wife and children shared his real sentiments; for when the deputation retired, and the King followed them with an uneasy and the Queen with a spiteful glance, the royal pair approached each other, and Marie Antoinette said, shaking her head, and laying her hand, cold and white as marble, on the King's arm: "These fellows want no more sovereigns. They are demolishing the monarchy stone by stone, and with those stones they will build us a sepulchre!"

She was mistaken, poor woman! When her time came she was laid on a bier with paupers, and not even allowed to have her own grave. She was not however mistaken in believing the last days of the royal prerogatives had come.

Monsieur de Malouet was President of the Assembly, a Royalist of the purest blood. However, he thought himself obliged to put before the Assembly the question whether the members should stand or be seated while the King was taking the oath.

"Seated! Seated!" was the cry on all sides.

"And the King?" asked Malouet.

"Standing, with head uncovered!" said a voice.

The whole Assembly was startled. That single voice was clear, strong, and vibratory. It sounded like the will of the people, and as if it were uttered by only one voice in order that it might be heard the better.

The President grew pale. Who spoke those words? Came they from the floor of the hall or from the galleries? It mattered not! They contained such power that the President was forced to reply. "Gentlemen, there are no circumstances in which the National Assembly does not recognize the King as chief, when he is present. If the King takes the oath standing, I request the Assembly to listen in the same attitude."

Again the unknown voice made itself heard. "I have to propose an amendment which will satisfy everybody. Let us ordain that Monsieur de Malouet, and anybody else who prefers that posture, may listen to the King on their knees; but let us vote on the proposition already before us."

The proposition was set aside.

It was on the very day after this discussion that the King was to take his oath. The hall was full. The galleries were crammed with spectators. At noon the King was announced.

The King spoke standing. The Assembly listened standing. His speech being made, they all signed the Constitution, and then everybody sat down.

Then the President — it was Thouret, on this occasion — rose to make his address; but after the first two or three sentences, seeing that the King did not rise, Thouret sat down again.

This action provoked some applause in the galleries. As these plaudits were several times renewed, the King could not help growing pale. He drew his handkerchief from his pocket, and wiped the sweat from his brow.

The Queen was present at the session, in a special seat. She could bear no more, but rose and went out, slamming the door, and returned to the palace. She entered her apartments without a single word, even to her intimate friends. Since Charny was no longer near, her heart absorbed gall, even if she did not send it forth.

The King came home half an hour later, and immediately asked for the Queen. They told him where she was, and an usher wished to show him the way; but Louis sent the usher away by a sign, opened the doors himself, and suddenly appeared on the threshold of the room where he found the Queen. He was so pallid, so cast down, and the perspiration streamed in such great drops from his face, that when the Queen perceived it she rose and uttered a cry. "Oh Sire, what has happened?"

Without answering, the King threw himself into an armchair and burst into tears. "Oh Madame, Madame! Why did you go to the session to-day? Was it necessary for you to be a witness of my humiliation? Was it for this that I brought you to France, under the pretext of making you its Queen?"

Such an outburst on the part of Louis was as distressing as it was rare. The Queen could not bear it. Running to his side, she fell on her knees before him. At that moment Madame Campan entered. Stretching her arms towards her attendant, the Queen cried: "Oh, leave us, Campan, leave us!"

Madame Campan was not deceived as to the sentiment which made the Queen send her away. She respectfully withdrew; but standing behind the door, she could hear the royal pair for a long time in conversation, interrupted by sobs.

At last the sobs grew calmer and the speakers became silent. In half an hour the door reopened, and the Queen called Madame Campan, and said to her: "Campan, take upon yourself the duty of delivering this letter to Monsieur de Malden. It is addressed to my brother Leopold. Malden will leave at once for Vienna. This letter must be there in advance of the report of what happened at the Assembly to-day. If he needs two or three hundred louis, give them to him, and I will repay you."

Madame Campan took the letter and went out. Two hours later Malden was on his way to Vienna.

Worst of all, it was necessary for the royal family to smile affably, and put on a joyous air.

During all the rest of the day the palace overflowed with a prodigious crowd. In the evening the whole city sparkled with illuminations. The King and Queen were invited to drive in the Champs Élysées, escorted by the aides and chief officers of the Parisian National Guards.

As soon as they appeared, shouts for the King and Queen were heard on all sides; but in an interval, when these huzzas ceased and the carriage halted, a ferocious-looking man of the people, standing with folded arms near the carriage steps, said to her: "Don't believe them! Hurrah for the Nation!"

The carriage went slowly on again; but the man of the people laid his hand on the window and walked along beside the carriage. As often as the shouts were renewed for the King and Queen, this man repeated, in the same strident voice: "Don't believe that! Hurrah for the Nation!"

After the Queen returned she could hear this speech throbbing incessantly in her heart, like a hammer, smiting her senses with the regularity of hatred and obstinacy.

Special performances were held in the different theatres, — first at the Operahouse, then at the Comédie Française, then at the Italian Theatre. At the Operahouse and at the Comédie Française, everything was arranged for the occasion, and the King and Queen were received with unanimous acclamations; but when there was an effort to take the same precautions at the Italian, it was too late. All the seats in the parterre (parquet or pit) had been bought in a lump. It was at once understood that at the Italian Theatre things would not be as smooth as they had been at the Operahouse and the Comédie Française, and that there might be a disturbance in the evening.

Fear became certainty when it was seen how the pit was occupied. Danton, Camille Desmoulins, Legendre, and Santerre occupied front seats. When the Queen entered the royal box (which, as usual in European theatres, was large, and situated in the centre of the main balcony) the boxes and balconies tried to applaud, but the pit hissed.

The Queen looked down with terror into the boiling crater below and in front of her. As through an atmosphere of flame she could see eyes full of anger and indignation; yet not one man did she know by sight. Indeed, she had scarcely heard their names.

Trying to hide her annoyance by a smile, she asked: "My God, what have I ever done to them, that they should detest me so?"

Suddenly her glance was arrested by the terrifying sight of a man standing by one of the columns which supported the gallery. That man was gazing at her with painful determination. It was the man whom she had seen at Taverney Château when she first entered France, at Sevres Bridge on her return from Versailles, in the Tuileries Gardens on the return from Varennes. It was the unknown man, whose words were menaces and whose actions were fearsome mysteries. When her eyes had once rested on this man, she could not turn them aside. He exercised over her the fascination of the serpent over the dove.

The play began. By an effort the Queen broke the charm, and turned her head so as to look at the stage. They were acting "Unforeseen Events," a now forgotten comic opera in three acts, by Grétry, which had been a dozen years before the public.

Despite every effort made by Marie Antoinette to distract her attention from that mysterious man, she could not avoid turning her awestruck gaze in that direction, as if attracted towards him by a magnetic influence stronger than her own will. The man was always in the same place, immovable and sardonic, mocking. It was a painful, penetrating, and fatal spell which he exercised over her. What the nightmare is to the sleeper, was this cataleptic influence over one awake and watching.

Besides, a sort of electricity floated through the whole theatre. The opposing influences, though now held in abeyance, could not fail to explode, like two storm-clouds in August, coming from opposite extremes of the horizon, and hurling themselves at each other with lightning and thunder.

At last an occasion presented itself. Madame Dugazon, that charming woman who gave her name to a certain line of girlish and motherly parts in which she excelled, had a duet to sing with the tenor, and in that duet occurred this line:

Oh, how I love my mistress!

The courageous creature advanced to the front of the stage, raised her eyes and her hands respectfully towards the Queen, and uttered this fatal provocation.

The Queen saw that the tempest was upon them. Involuntarily her eyes sought the man at the gallery pillar. She thought she saw him make a sign of command, which was obeyed by all the occupants of the parterre.

As with one awful voice the pittites yelled: "No more masters! No more mistresses! Liberty!"

To this yell the galleries and boxes responded: "Long life to the King! Hurrah for the Queen! May they live forever, our noble Master and Mistress!"

"No more masters! No more mistresses! Liberty! Liberty!! Liberty!!!" were the answering shouts which arose from the pit.

In this second declaration of war the gauntlet was thrown down and accepted, and the fight began. The Queen screamed and shut her eyes. She had not even force enough left to look at the Unknown, who seemed like the Demon of Disorder, the Spirit of Destruction.

At that instant officers of the National Guard surrounded her, making a living rampart with their bodies, and led her out of the theatre; but into the corridors the yells followed her: "No more masters! No more mistresses! No more kings! No more queens!"

She was carried fainting to her carriage, and this was the last time she ever attended a theatre.

On September 30 the Constitution-making Assembly, through President Thouret, declared that having fulfilled its duties, its sessions were ended.

In a few lines here are the results of its work: the complete disorganization of the monarchy; the organization of the popular strength; the destruction of all special aristocratic and ecclesiastical privileges; the issue of twelve hundred millions of francs in assignats, or national paper currency, and the pledge of the national property for the payment of these obligations; the recognition of religious freedom; the suppression of the monastic orders; the abolition of secret imprisonment; the establishment of equality in official duties; the discontinuance of interior excise taxes; the formation of the National Guard; and finally, the adoption of the Constitution and the submission of the King thereto.

Sorrowful forebodings would have indeed been needed to make the King and Queen of France believe they had more reason to fear the new Assembly, which was about to convene, than the old one, which was just dissolved.

CHAPTER XXII.

BARNAVE'S FAREWELL.

On October 2, that is to say, two days after the dissolution of the Constitutional Assembly, at the hour when he was accustomed to see the Queen, Barnave was introduced, — no longer into Madame Campan's rooms, on the entrance floor, but into the room called the Great Cabinet.

On the evening of the day when the King swore allegiance to the Constitution, Lafayette's aides, and the other sentinels, disappeared from the interior of the palace; and if the King was not restored to power, he was at least restored to freedom. This was some consolation for the humiliation of which he had so bitterly complained to the Queen.

Though he did not undergo the formality of a solemn reception, yet Barnave was no longer subjected to the precautions formerly considered essential whenever he visited the Tuileries.

He was very pale and very sad. This pallor and sadness impressed the Queen. She received him standing; though she knew the young advocate's respect for her, and felt sure that, even if she sat down, he would not repeat the discourtesy of President Thouret, who took his seat when he saw that the King did not rise to listen to the official address.

"Well, Monsieur Barnave, you are doubtless contented, now that the King has followed your advice and sworn to support the Constitution."

"It is very kind of the Queen to say that the King has followed my advice. If this had not also been the advice of the Emperor Leopold and Prince Kaunitz, perhaps his Majesty would have hesitated more over this act, — the only one, however, which could save the King, if the King can —"

Barnave paused; but, grappling the question before her with that courage — we might call it audacity — which was a trait in her character, the Queen took up Barnave's word and said: "If the King can be saved! Is n't that what you mean?"

"God forbid that I should be the prophet of such evils, Madame! but in leaving Paris, in going away forever from the Queen, I would neither depress his Majesty's hopes, nor yet leave him too many illusions."

"You are leaving Paris, Monsieur? You are going away from me?"

"The labors of the Assembly, of which I was a member, are finished, and as that Assembly has decided that none of its own members are eligible to the Legislature which is to come, I have no longer any reason for staying in Paris."

"Not even the motive of being useful to us, Monsieur Barnave?"

Barnave smiled gloomily. "Not even that motive, Madame; for henceforth, dating from day before yesterday, I can no longer be useful to you."

"Oh Monsieur! you presume too little on your own merits."

"Alas, no, Madame! I examine myself, and find only feebleness. I weigh myself in the balances, and am found wanting. What gave me force, which I begged the monarchy to use as a lever, was my influence in the Assembly, my leadership among the Jacobins, — my laboriously acquired popularity; but the Assembly is dissolved, the Jacobins are transformed into the Feuillants, and I greatly fear the Feuillants sacrificed their last trump when they separated from the Jacobins. — Finally, Madame, my popularity — " Barnave smiled more sorrowfully than before — " my popularity is lost."

The Queen looked at Barnave, and a strange light, like a flash of triumph, shone in her eyes, as she said: "Well then, you see, Monsieur, that popularity is very short-lived."

Barnave sighed, and the Queen saw that she had been guilty of one of those little cruelties habitual with her.

Indeed, if Barnave had lost his popularity, if a few months had brought about this result, if he had been forced to bow his head under Robespierre's dictation, whose was the fault? Was it not the fault of that fatal monarchy, which dragged everything it touched into the destruction to which it was hastening, — to that terrible destiny which transformed Marie Antoinette, as it had transformed Mary Stuart, into a death-angel, whose presence dooms to the grave all those to whom he once appears?

She tried to retrace her steps, well knowing that it was generous in Barnave to respond by a simple sigh, when he might have asked in thundering words: "For whom have I sacrificed my popularity, Madame, if not for you?" and so she said to him: "But you will not really go away, Monsieur Barnave?"

"I will certainly remain, if the Queen so commands. I will remain, as a soldier remains under his flag, that he may guard it in battle, even though he has received his discharge. But if I remain, do you know what will happen? Instead of being feeble, I shall become a traitor."

"How so, Monsieur?" said the Queen, slightly offended. "Explain yourself! I don't understand you!"

"Will the Queen permit me to bring her face to face, not merely with her present situation, but with that in which she will soon find herself?"

"Do so, Monsieur! I am accustomed to looking down this precipice, and if I were easily afflicted with dizziness, I should long ago have fallen over it."

"Perhaps the Queen regards the retiring Assembly as hostile."

"Let us distinguish, Monsieur Barnave. In that Assembly I have some friends; but you cannot deny that the majority of its members are hostile to royalty."

"Madame, that Assembly was never guilty of but one act of hostility towards the King and yourself; and that was when the decree was passed that none of its members could take part in the coming Legislature."

"I don't understand you, Monsieur. Explain that to me!" said the Queen, with an incredulous smile.

"It is very plain. The old Assembly has snatched the buckler from the arms of your friends."

"And also, as it seems to me, the sword from the hands of our enemies."

"Alas, Madame, you deceive yourself! This blow comes from Robespierre, and is as terrible as every blow from that man's hand. First of all, in the new Assembly, you will be brought face to face with the unknown. In the Constitutional Assembly you knew what you were fighting, and with whom. With this Legislative Assembly you must begin all over again. Mark this well, Madame! In proposing that none of us should be eligible for re-election, Robespierre meant to put before France this alternative, — of electing to the legislative body either our superiors or else our inferiors in rank. Now above us, there is nobody left. The aristocratic emigration has disorganized everything; and even if the nobles were left among us, it is not from among the nobility the people would choose their representatives. The choice must then be from those below us, and there the people must find their new Deputies. Thus the whole Assembly will be democratic. There will be some shades of color in the democracy, that is all."

One could see, by the Queen's face, that she was following Barnave's demonstration with profound attention, and that in proportion as she understood him she was alarmed.

"For three or four days these Deputies have been flowing into Paris, and I have seen some of them, — particularly those sent from Bordeaux. Almost all of them are men without reputation, who are hastening to make themselves a name; and they are all the more in a hurry because they are so young. Apart from Condorcet, Brissot, and some others, the oldest among them is not over thirty. This onslaught of youth will drive out mature age and dethrone tradition. No more white hair in the Assembly! but a new France, with black hair!"

"And you believe, Monsieur, we have more to fear from those who come than from those who take their departure?"

"Yes, Madame! for the coming legislators are armed with instructions to make war on priests and nobles! As to the King, no orders have yet been issued in regard to him, but we shall see. If he will rest content with retaining executive power, perhaps the past may be pardoned —"

"How?" interrupted the Queen. "How? The past pardoned? But it will be for the King to pardon, I take it?"

"Yes, certainly; but that is exactly what is no longer understood, Madame. The new-comers — and of this, unhappily, you will soon have abundant proof — will not even keep up the hypocritical conventionalities of their predecessors. To them, — so I have it from a Deputy named Vergniaud, one of my associates from the Gironde, — to them the King seems like an enemy."

"An enemy?" said the astonished Queen.

"Yes, Madame, an enemy. That is to say, voluntarily or involuntarily, he is the watchword of all the Nation's enemies, foreign or domestic. Yes, it must be acknowledged that these new-comers are not all in the wrong; although they think they have discovered a new truth, when their only merit is in crying from the housetops what heretofore your warmest enemies only dared say with bated breath."

"An enemy?" repeated the Queen, — "the King the enemy of his people? Oh, Monsieur Barnave, that is something which you can never make me believe, for you can never make me understand it!"

"Nevertheless it is the truth, Madame! He is an enemy by temperament, an enemy by force of hereditary training! Three days ago he accepted the Constitution, did he not?"

"Yes, indeed!"

"On his return to the palace his Majesty was almost ill with anger, and that evening he wrote to the Emperor."

"But how do you suppose we can possibly bear such humiliations?"

"You cannot avoid seeing the truth! The King is our enemy, — fatally our enemy. He is a voluntary enemy; for, having been educated by Monsieur de la Vauguyon, the leader of the Jesuit party, the King places his heart in the hands of priests, who are national enemies. He is also an involuntary enemy, because he is the compulsory chief of the Anti-Revolutionary party. Even if he never quits Paris, his heart is at Coblentz with the emigrants, in the Vendée with the priests, in Vienna or Prussia, with his allies, Leopold and Frederick. The King himself does nothing, — I admit that he does nothing, Madame," said Barnave, sorrowfully; "but in default of the King's personal activity his name is used. In the cottage, in the school, in the château, the Royalists talk of the poor King, the good King, the saintly King, till there are threats of a revolt against the Revolution, — a revolt growing out of pity."

"Is it really you, Monsieur Barnave, who are saying such things to me? And yet, were you not the first to pity us?"

"Oh yes, Madame, I pitied you. Yes, I still pity you, and sincerely; but there is this difference between myself and those of whom I speak, — that they pity you to your ruin, whereas my pity would lead me to save you."

"But, Monsieur, among those new-comers, who are to wage a war of extermination against us, — if your representation must be credited, — has any definite plan been agreed upon in advance?"

"No, Madame, and as yet I can hear only of certain vague schemes, — such as the suppression of the title Majesty at the opening of the session, and the use of a plain armchair at the right of the presiding officer, instead of a throne."

"Do you see in this anything worse than what Monsieur Thouret did, — seating himself because the King was seated?"

"It is certainly a step ahead, not a step backward. — What is still worse for you, Madame, is that Lafayette and Bailly will be superseded."

"Oh, as to those men," said the Queen, quickly, "I don't regret them!"

"And you are wrong, Madame! Bailly and Lafayette are your friends."

The Queen smiled bitterly.

"Your friends, Madame, — perhaps your last friends! Keep them! If they have any popularity left, use it but make haste. Their popularity is fast slipping away, like my own."

"After all, Monsieur, you show me the volcano, you lead me to its crater, you tell me of its depths; but you show me no way of avoiding it."

Barnave remained mute for an instant. Then he heaved a sigh, and murmured: "Ah, Madame! why were you arrested on the way to Montmédy?"

"Good!" said the Queen. "Then even you, Monsieur Barnave, approve our Varennes expedition?"

"I did not approve it, Madame; and the situation in which you find yourself to-day is the natural result of that journey; but when I see the fatal consequences of that flight, I deplore its failure."

"So that to-day, you, Monsieur Barnave, a member of the National Assembly, — delegated by that Assembly, with Pétion and Latour Maubourg, to bring back the King and Queen to Paris, — you regret that the royal family did not one and all escape safely to a foreign land?"

"Let us understand each other well, Madame. He who regrets the result is not a member of the National Assembly, is not the colleague of Pétion and Latour Maubourg, but only poor Barnave, who is no longer anything but your humble servitor, ready to give his life for you, which is all he has now left in the wide world to give."

"Thanks, Monsieur," said the Queen. "The accent with which you make this offer shows you to be a man of your word; but I trust it will never be needful to exact of you such devotion."

"So much the worse for me, Madame!" modestly replied Barnave.

"How? So much the worse?"

"Yes. Taking one downfall with another, I would rather fall in combat, than endure what will happen to me; but in the depths of Dauphiny, where I shall be useless to you, I can only pray for the young and beautiful wife, for the tender and devoted mother, rather than for the Queen. The errors of the past have determined your future. You count on foreign aid, which will not arrive, or will come too late. The Jacobins will grasp the controlling power, either in the Assembly or outside of it. Your friends will quit France, flying from persecution. Those who remain will be arrested, imprisoned. I shall be among those, for I will not flee. Then I shall be tried, condemned. Perhaps my obscure death will be as useless to you as it will be unknown; but if a report of that death perchance reaches you, you will look upon me only as one of your unfortunate helpers, and you will forget the hours when I hoped I might really help you."

"Monsieur Barnave," said the Queen, with great dignity, "I am wholly ignorant what future Fate may have in store for us, — the King and myself; but this I know, that the names of all who have helped us are carefully inscribed in our memories, and that whatever happens to them, whether good or evil fortune, will not be unknown to us. — Meanwhile, Monsieur Barnave, can we do anything for you now?"

"Much, — you personally, Madame. You can prove to me that I have not been a man wholly without value in your eyes."

"And how can I do that?"

Barnave knelt and said: "By giving me your hand to kiss, Madame."

A tear mounted as far as Marie Antoinette's dry eyelashes. She extended to the young man her cold white hand, which (with only a year's interval) was thus touched by the most eloquent lips in the Assembly, those of both Mirabeau and Barnave.

Barnave barely swept those fingers with his lips. If he once pressed his mouth to that beautiful marble hand, it was easy to see that the infatuated fellow feared he should lack the power to detach them again.

Then he arose and said: "Madame, I lack the pride which would enable me to say with Mirabeau, the monarchy is saved; but this I may say to you: If the monarchy is lost, one will perish with it who can never forget the favor which the Queen has condescended to grant him."

Saluting the Queen, he went out. Marie Antoinette watched his sighing, and when the door closed behind him she said to herself: "Poor squeezed lemon! But little time was needed to reduce thee to an empty rind!"

CHAPTER XXIII.

THE BATTLEFIELD.

We have tried to describe the terrible events which took place at the Champ de Mars, on the afternoon of July 17, 1791. Having thus put before the eyes of our readers the drama then performed, in which Bailly and Lafayette were the principal actors, let us now try to depict the scene after the tragedy was over.

A sad spectacle smote the eyes of a young man, clad like an officer of the National Guard, as he came from the Rue Saint Honoré, crossed the river by Louis Fifteenth Bridge, and so reached the Champ de Mars by way of Rue Grenelle.

This spectacle, illuminated by the moon, — which had reached two-thirds of its crescent period, and was sailing among dense black clouds, wherein from time to time it was lost, — was indeed lugubrious to look upon.

The Champ de Mars wore the aspect of a battlefield, covered with the dead and wounded, in the midst of whom wandered, like so many ghosts, the men charged with the duty of throwing the dead into the Seine, and of carrying the wounded to the military hospital of Gros Caillou.

The young officer, whom we have followed from Rue Saint Honoré, paused at the entrance of the Champ de Mars, and clasped his hands with an expression of unconscious dread.

"Jesu God!" he murmured, "things were even worse than they told me!"

After watching for a few moments the extraordinary work which was going on, he approached two men, whom he saw carrying a corpse towards the river, and said to them: "Citizens, will you tell me what you are going to do with that man?"

"Follow us, and see!" answered the men; and the young officer did follow them.

When they reached the wooden bridge, the two men swung the body back and forth, as they counted one, two, three, and at the third word threw the man into the Seine.

The young officer uttered an exclamation of horror, and asked: "Citizens, what are you about?"

"You can see well enough!" responded the two men. "We are clearing the ground."

"And you have orders for doing this?"

"Apparently!"

"From whom?"

"The City!"

The young man uttered an oh of stupefaction.

After a moment of silence, while he returned with the bearers to the Champ de Mars, he added: "Have you already thrown many bodies into the Seine?"

"Five or six," responded both men.

"Excuse me, citizens," said the young man, "but I have a great interest in the question which I ask. Among those five or six bodies, was there one of a man forty-six or forty-eight years old, about five feet and five inches tall, — a stocky, vigorous man, half peasant, half tradesman?"

"My faith," said one of the men, "we only notice one thing, — whether the folks lying here are dead or alive. If dead, we throw 'em into the river. If they 're alive, we carry 'em to the Gros Caillou Hospital."

"Ah," said the young man, "I ask, because I have a good friend who has not returned where he belongs; and as I am told that he was here, or has been here part of the day, I 'm afraid he may be among the dead or wounded."

"Heavens!" said one of the bearers, shaking a corpse, over which the other held a lantern, "if he was here at all, probably he 's here still. If he did n't go home, he probably never will."

Shaking the body at his feet roughly, the city agent cried out: "Halloo! Dead or alive? If not dead, try and answer."

"Oh, as to this fellow, he 's dead fast enough," said the second bearer. "He has a ball in the middle of his breast."

"Then ho for the river!" said the first; and the two men lifted the corpse, and started again towards the wooden bridge.

"Citizens," said the officer, "you have no need of your lantern to throw this man into the water. Have the kindness to lend it to me an instant. While you 're making your trip, I 'll look for my friend."

The bearers consented, and the lantern was handed to the young officer, who carefully began his search, with an expression of countenance which indicated that the titles of respect, bestowed upon the dead or wounded man for whom he was searching, came not from his lips alone, but from his heart.

Ten or a dozen other men, likewise provided with helpful lanterns, were prosecuting a similar funereal investigation.

From time to time, amidst the silence, — for the awful solemnity of the scene, and the sight of the mute dead, seemed to extinguish the voices of the living, — from time to time, amidst the silence, a name was spoken in a tone so loud that it could be heard across the field. Sometimes a lament, a groan, a cry responded to that call; but oftener the only response was a mournful stillness.

After hesitating awhile, as if his voice were paralyzed by fear, the young officer followed the example of the others, and called out thrice: "Monsieur Billot! Monsieur Billot! Monsieur Billot!" but there was no response.

"He 's dead, for sure!" murmured the young man, wiping away with his sleeve the tears which streamed from his eyes. "Poor Father Billot!"

At that moment two other men passed by, carrying another corpse towards the river.

"Hey!" said the one who upheld the shoulders, and was therefore nearer the head, "I believe our body just heaved a sigh."

"Ugh!" said the other, laughing, "if we listened to all these fellows, there would n't be a dead man among 'em."

"Citizens!" said the young officer, "by your leave, let me see the man you 're carrying."

"Willingly, Monsieur Officer," said the men; and they laid the corpse on its back, so as to enable the young officer's lantern to shine more upon the face. He held the light near it and uttered an exclamation.

Despite the terrible wound which disfigured the body, the searcher thought he recognized the man for whom he was looking; but was he dead or alive?

The head of this man, who was already halfway towards a watery grave, had been laid open by a sabre. The wound, as we have already said, was frightful. Half the hairy flesh had been cut from the left side of the head, and hung over the cheek, leaving bare the skull.

The temporal artery had been severed, so that the whole body of the wounded or dead man was covered with blood. On the side of the cut he was unrecognizable. With a trembling hand the young man held the lantern on the other side, and then cried: "Oh citizens, it 's he! It 's the man I 'm looking for! It 's Monsieur Billot!"

"The Devil!" said the bearers. "Well, he 's somewhat damaged, your Monsieur Billot!"

"Did n't you say he sighed?"

"I thought I heard him!"

"Then do me a favor!" and as he spoke the young officer drew a half-crown from his pocket.

"What is it?" asked the bearer, filled with good-will at sight of this piece of money.

"Run to the river, and get some water in your hat."

"With pleasure!"

While this man ran to the riverside, the young officer took his place, and supported the wounded man.

In five minutes the man was back again.

"Throw some water in his face!" said the young man.

The bearer obeyed. He dipped his hand into his hat, as if it were a church basin, and shook the water over the wounded face.

"He shivers!" cried the young man, who still held the wounded man in his arms. "He ain't dead. Oh, dear Monsieur Billot, how lucky I came in time!"

"Faith, yes! it was lucky!" said the man. "Twenty rods more, and your friend would have come to himself in the fishing-nets at Saint Cloud."

"Sprinkle him again!"

The bearer did so. The wounded man shuddered and heaved a sigh.

"Well, well! decidedly he 's no dead man!" said the second bearer.

"Well, what are we going to do about it?" said the first.

"Help me to carry him to Rue Saint Honoré, to Monsieur Doctor Gilbert's, and you 'll be well paid!" said the young man.

"We can't!"

"Why?"

"Our orders are to throw the dead into the Seine, and take the wounded to the hospital at Gros Caillou. As this fellow pretends not to be dead, and we can't throw him into the river, we must take him to the hospital."

"Well, let 's take him to the hospital as soon as possible!" Looking about him, he added: "Where is the hospital?"

"Three hundred rods off, not far from the Military Academy."

"Then it 's over there?"

"Yes!"

"We have to go across the whole field!"

"And farther!"

"My God, have n't you a stretcher or a barrow?"

"Heavens, one can be found, I guess," responded the second bearer. "It 's like the water, — with a little silver —"

"That 's fair," said the young man, "you 've had nothing, have you? Hold on! There 's another little crownpiece. Find me a stretcher!"

In ten minutes a stretcher was ready. The wounded man was laid on the canvas. The two bearers bore it by the handles, and the funereal party took up its line of march towards the hospital at Gros Caillou, escorted by the young man, who carried the lantern and steadied the wounded man's head.

It was terrible, that nocturnal march over ground soaked with blood, among cold and rigid bodies, which were disturbed at every step, and among those who tried to raise themselves, and then fell back, begging for help.

At the end of a quarter-hour the party crossed the threshold of the hospital at Gros Caillou.

CHAPTER XXIV.

THE HOSPITAL AT GROS CAILLOU.

At that epoch the hospitals, especially military hospitals, were far from being organized as they are to-day. It is not therefore astonishing that disorder reigned in the hospital at Gros Caillou, and that this disorder stood in the way of proper surgical work.

The great demand was for a supply of beds. Mattresses belonging to the inhabitants of the neighboring streets had to be brought into requisition. These mattresses were laid on the floors, and even in the courtyard, and on each mattress was a wounded man, waiting for succor; but surgeons were lacking as well as mattresses, and were more difficult to find.

The officer — in whom our readers have of course recognized their friend Pitou — was able to procure a mattress, as he had obtained a stretcher, by the judicious use of a few more half-crowns; so that Billot was very comfortably lying in the courtyard of the hospital.

Wishing to make the best of his situation, Pitou had his wounded friend placed as near the entrance as possible, in order to intercept the first surgeon who went out or came in. He had a great mind to go through the wards, and compel some physician to help him, cost what it would; but he dared not quit the wounded man. He was afraid lest somebody should throw Billot on the pavement of the courtyard, under the pretext that he was already dead, — as, indeed, one might honestly think.

Pitou had been there an hour, and had stoutly appealed to the two or three surgeons who passed that way, though without winning them to his service, when he saw a man dressed in black, accompanied by two hospital attendants with lights, visiting the beds of agony, one after the other. The nearer this man clad in black came towards Pitou, the more sure the latter felt that he knew him. Soon his doubts ceased, and Pitou ventured to go a few steps towards him, away from the wounded man, and call to the surgeon, with all the strength of his lungs: "Hi! This way! Monsieur Gilbert! Here I am! Here! This way!"

The surgeon, who was indeed Doctor Gilbert, hastened towards him at the sound of this familiar voice.

"Ah, is it thou, Pitou?"

"Oh my God, yes, Monsieur Gilbert."

"Hast thou seen Billot?"

"He's here!" replied Pitou, pointing to the still motionless form beside him.

"Is he dead?" asked the Doctor.

"Alas, dear Monsieur Gilbert, I hope not; but I won't try to hide from you that he don't lack much of it."

Gilbert came near the mattress, and the attendants followed, so as to light up the face of the invalid.

"It's the head, Monsieur Gilbert, it's the head! Poor dear Monsieur Billot! His head is cut open, clear down to his jaw."

Gilbert examined the wound carefully, and said: "The truth is, it's a very serious matter." Then he added, turning to the two attendants: "I must have a separate room for this man, who is one of my friends."

The attendants conferred together, and then said: "There is no separate room, unless it's the laundry."

"Capital!" said Gilbert. "Just the thing. Take him into the laundry!"

They lifted the wounded man as gently as possible; but despite every precaution, a groan escaped him.

"Ah!" said Gilbert, "no cry of joy ever gave me equal pleasure with this groan. He lives! That 's the principal thing."

Billot was taken to the laundry, and placed on a bed belonging to one of the hospital servants. Then Gilbert began carefully to examine and dress the wounds.

The temporal artery had been cut, and from this had come an immense loss of blood. This loss of blood had led to insensibility; and this lessening of the heart's pulsations had checked the hemorrhage. Nature had profited by this cessation to form a clot of blood, and this closed up the wounded artery.

With admirable skill Gilbert first tied the artery with a silk thread. Then he washed the flesh and replaced it over the skull. The coolness of the water, and perhaps also some pain arising from the treatment, made Billot open his eyes; and he uttered a few muffled and disconnected words.

"There 's concussion of the brain," said Gilbert.

"But if he is n't dead, you can save him, can't you, Monsieur Gilbert?"

Gilbert smiled sadly. "I shall try; but thou must learn one thing, my dear Pitou, — that Nature is a much better surgeon than any of us."

Gilbert finished dressing the wound. After the hair was cut off as closely as possible, he brought the two edges of the wound together, secured them in place with bandages of diachylum plaster, and ordered the attendants to place the sick man in almost a sitting position, with his back, and not his head, propped up by the pillows.

It was only when all these duties had been attended to that Gilbert asked Pitou how it happened that he was in Paris; and how, being in Paris, he had managed to be just in the nick of time to rescue Billot.

The matter was very simple. After the disappearance of Catherine and the departure of the farmer, Mother Billot, whom we have never represented to our readers as possessing a very vigorous mind, fell into a sort of apathy, which had been constantly on the increase. She was alive, but it was mechanical life, and every day some new spring in the poor human machine either weakened or broke. By degrees her words became more and more infrequent, till she ended by not talking at all, and even took to her bed. Doctor Raynal declared that only one thing in the world could drag Mother Billot out of this deathly stupor, — the sight of her daughter.

Pitou himself offered to go to Paris at once; or rather he started, without saying anything about it. Thanks to the long legs of our Captain of the Haramont National Guards, the eighteen leagues, which separated the Demoustier region from the capital, were to him but a promenade. He left home at four in the morning, and between seven and eight in the evening he was in Paris.

Pitou seemed destined always to come to Paris when great events were transpiring. On the first trip he came in time to help capture the Bastille. The next time he came in Sebastien's footsteps, on the very day after the royal family had been dragged from Versailles to Paris, by the mob. The third time he came as a delegate, to assist in the Federation of 1790. The last time, the present, his trip was taken on the very day of the massacre in the Champ de Mars.

He found Paris alive with rumors; though, as to that, this was always the condition in which he found Paris.

From the first groups of people he met, he learned what had happened on the Champ de Mars. Bailly and Lafayette had fired on the populace. The populace were cursing Bailly with loud voices. When Pitou was last in Paris these men were adored as deities. Now he found their altars overturned and the men cursed. He absolutely could not understand all this.

What he did understand was, that there had been fighting, massacre, and slaughter in the Champ de Mars, all on account of a Patriotic petition, and that Gilbert and Billot had been there.

Although Pitou, to express it vulgarly, had eighteen leagues in his stomach, he redoubled his speed, and soon reached the Rue Saint Honoré and Gilbert's apartments. The Doctor had returned, but nobody had seen Billot. The Champ de Mars — so said the servant who gave Pitou his other information — was strewn with the dead and wounded. Mayhap Billot, his kind old friend and master, was among them.

The Champ de Mars covered with the dead and wounded! This news did not astonish Pitou less than he had been astonished by the fact that Bailly and Lafayette, those two popular idols, had fired upon the populace.

The Champ de Mars covered with the wounded and dead? Pitou could not picture it to himself! The Champ de Mars which he had helped to level, working with ten thousand comrades, remained in his memory as aglow with illuminations, joyful songs, and gay dances. Covered with the dead and wounded? and all because the people wished to celebrate the second anniversary of the Bastille, as they had celebrated the first anniversary the year before? It was impossible! In one year, how could their motives for joy and triumph have become the cause of rebellion and massacre? What spirit of vertigo had entered the Parisian head within a twelvemonth?

As we have said before, during the year preceding, thanks to the influence of Mirabeau, thanks to the new club of the Feuillants, thanks to the support of Bailly and Lafayette, — thanks especially to the reaction which followed the return from Varennes, — the Court had regained something of its lost power; and now this power clothed itself in mourning and massacre.

July 17, 1791, was a fearful retaliation for October 5 and 6, 1789.

As Gilbert told the Queen, the populace and royalty stood game to game. It remained to be seen who would win the rubber.

Preoccupied with these ideas, — though not one of them had influence enough to retard his strides, — we have already seen how our friend Ange Pitou, still wearing his uniform as captain of the Haramont National Guards, reached the Champ de Mars, by way of Louis Fifteenth Bridge and Rue Grenelle, just in time to prevent Billot from being thrown into the river, like a dead man.

On the other hand we may remember how Gilbert — after waiting a long time for the Queen, who did not return according to her promise — received an unsigned letter, whose handwriting he recognized as Cagliostro's, and in which he found the following paragraph:

Gilbert, let those two fools slide, who are still derisively called King and Queen, and betake thyself forthwith to the hospital at Gros Caillou. There thou 'lt find a dying man, — not so sick as Marie Antoinette and Louis, perchance; but thou mayst perhaps save him, whereas they cannot be saved, and may pull thee after themselves in their downfall.

As soon as Gilbert learned, through Madame Campan, that the Queen, who had asked him to await her return, would not come back, and had sent him his dismission, he at once left the Tuileries, and following almost the same road as Pitou, reached the hospital at Gros Caillou. Aided by two attendants, with their lights, he went from bed to bed, from mattress to mattress, through the halls and corridors, into the vestibule, and even into the court-yard, without finding anybody whom he knew, when suddenly a voice called him by name, and summoned him to the couch of a man half dead. That voice, as we know, was the voice of Pitou. The half-dead man was Billot.

We have described the condition in which Gilbert found the worthy farmer, and his chances for life, — chances both good and bad; but chances in which the worse would have overcome the better, if the wounded man had been under the care of a man less skilful than Doctor Gilbert.

CHAPTER XXV.

CATHERINE.

Of the two persons who Doctor Raynal thought should be notified of the desperate condition of Madame Billot, one, as we know, was confined to his bed, and was a near neighbor to death. This was the husband. The other alone could be present in the distress of the mother's last moments. That was the daughter.

It was necessary to acquaint Catherine with her mother's condition, and with her father's also; but where was Catherine? There was only one way of ascertaining, and that was by applying to the Count de Charny.

So kindly and hospitably had Pitou been received by the Countess, — when he went to her house in Gilbert's behalf, taking her son thither, — that now he did not hesitate to propose going again to the Rue Coq Heron, to inquire Catherine's whereabouts, though the hour was well advanced into the night.

In fact the clock on the Military School had sounded half-past eleven before the surgical treatment was finished, so that Gilbert and Pitou could leave Billot's bedside.

Gilbert commended his patient to the care of the attendants. There was nothing to do except wait for Nature to do her work. Besides, the Doctor would himself be there again the next forenoon.

Pitou and Gilbert took the latter's carriage, which was waiting at the hospital door, and the Doctor ordered the coachman to go to the Rue Coq Heron.

All was dark in that quarter. After ringing for fifteen minutes Pitou tried the knocker, and then he heard the creaking of a door, — not the street door, but the door of the porter's lodge, and a fractious and hoarse voice asked, with an accent of impatience which could not be mistaken: "Who 's there?"

"Me!" said Pitou.

"Who are you?"

"Ah, sure enough! — Ange Pitou, a captain in the National Guard."

"Ange Pitou? I don't know him."

"Captain in the National Guard!" reiterated Pitou.

"Captain," repeated the porter, "captain —"

"Captain!" rejoined Pitou, emphasizing the word; for he knew the influence of a title.

Indeed the porter began to think that he had to do with at least one of Lafayette's aides, for at that period the National Guard equalled in importance the Royal Army of former days. He consequently came nearer the outer door, and spoke more courteously, though without opening it. "Well, Monsieur Captain, what do you want?"

"I want to speak with the Count."

"He 's not here."

"With the Countess, then."

"She ain't here, neither."

"Where are they?"

"They went away this morning."

"In what direction?"

"To Boursonnes, their country-place."

"The Devil!" said Pitou, as if talking to himself.

"Those must have been the folks I passed by at Dammartin. Probably they were in that postchaise. — If I'd only known it!"

But as Pitou had not known it, he had missed seeing the Count and Countess.

"My friend," said the Doctor, interfering at this point of the conversation, "can't you, in the absence of your employers, give us a little information?"

"Ah, pardon, Monsieur!" said the porter, at once recognizing, by virtue of his aristocratic associations, the voice of a master, in the polite and mild tones which reached his ear. Opening the gate, the good man came forth in his drawers, and with his nightcap in hand. He went at once to the carriage door, to take the Doctor's orders, as servants expressed it in those times.

"What information do you wish, Monsieur?" he asked.

"Do you know a young woman, my friend, in whom the Count and Countess take a great interest?"

"Mademoiselle Catherine?" asked the porter.

"Precisely!" said Gilbert.

"Yes, Monsieur. The Count and Countess have been twice to see her, and have often sent me to ask if she needed anything; but, poor girl! though I don't believe she's rich, — neither she, nor the child which has come to her from the good God, — she always says she does n't need a thing."

At these words about a child, Pitou could not repress a great sigh.

"Well, my friend," said Gilbert, "poor Catherine's father has been wounded to-day in the Champ de Mars; and her mother, Madame Billot, is dying at Villers Cotterets. We must carry her this bad news. Will you give us her address?"

"Oh, poor girl! God help her! She's unhappy enough already! She lives at Ville d'Avray, Monsieur, in the main street. I can't tell you positively the number, but it's opposite a fountain."

"That's near!" said Pitou. "I'll find it!"

"Thanks, my friend!" said Gilbert, slipping a six-franc piece into the porter's hand.

"I don't need anything for that, Monsieur," said the old man. "Please God, Christians ought to be willing to help one another."

The porter bowed very respectfully to the Doctor, and went back into his lodge.

"Well?" said Gilbert, turning to Pitou.

"Well," said Pitou, "I'm off for Ville d'Avray." Pitou was always ready to go anywhere.

"Knowest thou the road?" asked the Doctor.

"No, but you can tell me."

"Thou hast a heart of gold and muscles of steel!" said Gilbert, laughing. "But come and get some rest, and go to-morrow morning."

"But if time presses —?"

"There is no such haste required in either case," said the Doctor. "Billot's condition is serious; but, unless there is some unforeseen accident, he is not at death's door. As to Mother Billot, she may live ten or twelve days."

"Oh, Monsieur Doctor! When she was put to bed, day before yesterday, she did n't talk, she did n't move. Nothing seemed alive but her eyes."

"Nevertheless I know what I'm talking about, Pitou; and I'll be answerable for her, as I say, for ten or a dozen days."

"Well, Monsieur Gilbert, you know better than I do!"

"It 's best to leave poor Catherine another night of restful ignorance. For the unhappy, a good night's sleep is very important, Pitou."

Pitou yielded to the force of this reasoning and asked: "Well, then, where shall we go, Monsieur Gilbert?"

"To my place, and thou shalt have thy old chamber."

"Well," said Pitou, smiling, "it 'll give me pleasure to see it again."

"And to-morrow," continued Gilbert, "at six o'clock in the morning, the horses will be all harnessed."

"Why have the horses harnessed?" asked Pitou, who always regarded horses as articles of luxury.

"To take thee to Ville d'Avray."

"Good!" said Pitou. "Is it fifty leagues from Paris to Ville d'Avray?"

"No, only two or three," replied Gilbert; and as he spoke there passed before his eyes, in the light of youth, the walks he used to take in the woods of Louveciennes, of Meudon, and of Ville d'Avray, with his old teacher, Rousseau.

"Well, then," said Pitou, "it 's only a matter of an hour, three leagues, and I 'll gobble it down like an egg."

"But Catherine! Dost fancy she also can gobble them down like an egg, those three other leagues, from Ville d'Avray to Paris, and the eighteen leagues from Paris to Villers Cotterets?"

"True!" said Pitou. "Excuse me for being such a fool, Monsieur Gilbert. — By the way, how goes it with Sebastien?"

"Marvellously well. Thou 'lt see him to-morrow."

"Still with Abbé Bérardier?"

"Still there!"

"So much the better, for I shall be so glad to see him."

"And he also to see thee, Pitou; for, like myself, he loves thee with all his heart."

Just as these words were spoken, the Doctor and Ange Pitou stopped at the door in the Rue Saint Honoré.

Pitou slept with all his heart, — as he walked, as he ate, as he fought; only, owing to his country habit of rising very early, he was up by five o'clock.

At six the carriage was ready. At seven he knocked at Catherine's door. It had been agreed with Doctor Gilbert that at eight they should be at Billot's bedside.

Catherine opened the door, and cried out at the sight of Pitou: "Ah, my mother is dead!" and then grew pale, and supported herself against the wall.

"No," said Pitou; "only, if you wish to see her before she dies, you must make haste, Mademoiselle Catherine."

This interchange of words, wherein so many things were said in a few sentences, dispensed with all preliminaries, and placed Catherine face to face with her misfortune at a single bound.

"Then there 's another trouble," continued Pitou.

"What is it?" asked Catherine, with the brusque and almost indifferent tone of one who fears no additional sorrow, having borne already her full share of human woe.

"Monsieur Billot was dangerously wounded yesterday, on the Champ de Mars."

"Ah!" was all she said, evidently less sensitive to this misfortune than to the other.

"Then here 's what I says to myself," said Pitou, "and this was also Doctor Gilbert's opinion: Mademoiselle Catherine must make a passing visit to Monsieur Billot, at the Gros Caillou Hospital, and then take the stage to Villers Cotterets."

"And you, Monsieur Pitou?"

"Me? Well, as you must go to your mother's death-bed, I think I ought to stay here and try to help Monsieur Billot to get well. I will remain with him; for he has nobody else, you understand, Mademoiselle Catherine."

Pitou uttered these words with angelic ingenuousness, not dreaming that therein he was revealing the whole history of his devotion.

Catherine offered him her hand. "Yours is a brave heart, Pitou. Come in, and embrace my poor Isidore."

She led the way, for the short scene we have described took place in the alley-way of the house, by the street door. She was as beautiful as ever, poor Catherine, clad in full mourning as she was; and this drew a fresh sigh from Pitou.

Catherine preceded him into a little chamber, opening into the garden. In that chamber, which, with a kitchen and toilet-closet, comprised Catherine's lodging, there were a bedstead and a cradle, — the bed for the mother, and the cradle for her child.

The infant was asleep. Catherine pulled away a gauze curtain, and stood aside, so that Pitou could see into the cradle.

"Oh, the beautiful little angel!" said Pitou, clasping his hands; and as if the babe were really an angel, he knelt and kissed its hand.

Pitou was speedily repaid for what he did. He felt Catherine's hair float over his face, and two lips were pressed upon his forehead. The mother was paying back the kiss given to her boy.

"Thank you, good Pitou!" she said. "Since the last kiss he received from his father, nobody else has kissed the poor little thing, except his mother."

"Oh, Mademoiselle Catherine!" stammered Pitou, dazzled and shaken up by the young girl's kiss, as if by an electric spark; yet this kiss came purely from the holy and grateful love of a mother's heart.

It was not the kiss of a sweetheart, a passionate woman, or even of a loving friend. It was a sacred, a divine kiss, and in this light did our honest and unselfish Pitou receive it; though it nevertheless vibrated in his heart, his brain, and throughout his stalwart form, touching the life-centres of his being, and toning them to ecstatic harmony.

What is so strong, so wide, so deep, so penetrating as mother-love? It distances all the other affections of this world, and is excelled only by the infinite and creative love of Heaven, to which it is akin.

CHAPTER XXVI.

THE DAUGHTER AND THE FATHER.

Ten minutes later Catherine, Pitou, and little Isidore were rolling along the road to Paris in Doctor Gilbert's carriage. The carriage stopped in front of the hospital at Gros Caillou. Catherine dismounted, took her babe in her arms, and followed Pitou.

At the door of the laundry she paused and said: "You say we shall find Doctor Gilbert by father's bedside?"

"Yes," said Pitou, half opening the door, "and there he is!"

"See if I can go in without exciting him too much."

Pitou entered the room, questioned the Doctor, and at once came back after Catherine. "The shock — so says Monsieur Gilbert — was so great that as yet he recognizes nobody."

Catherine was about to enter, with little Isidore in her arms, when Pitou said: "Give me your baby, Mademoiselle Catherine!"

Catherine hesitated a moment; but Pitou said: "Oh, give him to me! Then it will seem as if you had never been away from your father!"

"You are right!" said Catherine; and with more confidence, perhaps, than if he had been her brother, she placed her babe in Pitou's arms. Then, with a firm step, she went into the room, and straight to her father's bedside.

As we have said, Doctor Gilbert was at the head of the wounded man's bed. There was little change in the condition of the patient. His back was supported by pillows, as on the evening before; and with the aid of a wet sponge, which he gently squeezed, the Doctor was moistening the bandages which held the wounded parts in place. In spite of the beginning of a well-defined inflammatory fever, Billot's face wore a deathly pallor, on account of the quantity of blood he had lost, the inflammation being visible only in the eye and part of the left cheek.

At the first feeling of coolness he babbled and rolled his eyes; but his words were lost in that sleepiness which physicians call coma, and his eyes straightway closed again.

When Catherine reached her father's bedside she fell on her knees, and said, raising her hands to Heaven: "My God, bear witness that from the bottom of my heart I pray for my father's life!"

That was as much as the daughter could ask for the father who had intended to kill her lover.

At the sound of her voice a shudder ran through the sick man's frame. His respiration became more labored. He again opened his eyes. His glance — after wandering about a little, as if to see whence came the voice — fixed itself on Catherine. His hand moved, as if to repel the apparition, which he doubtless mistook for a feverish vision.

The girl's glance met her father's; and with a sort of terror Gilbert saw these flaming glances clash against each other like two lightning-flashes of hate, rather than meet like two rays of affection.

Then the girl rose to her feet, and went out as deliberately as she had entered. She found Pitou on all-fours, playing with Baby. Catherine took her little one again, with the violence of the lioness rather than the woman, and cried, as she pressed the babe to her breast: "My child, — oh, my child!"

In this cry was all the agony of the mother, all the grief of the widow, all the sorrow of the woman.

Pitou wished to accompany Catherine as far as the office of the stage, which was to leave at ten in the forenoon; but she refused his offer, in these words: "No! As you have well said, your place is near one who is all alone. Stay here, Pitou!" and she pushed Pitou back into the laundry.

When Catherine commanded, Pitou had no choice or wish but to obey.

As Pitou approached the bed, Billot was roused by the noise made by the somewhat heavy step of the Captain of the Haramont National Guard. He once more opened his eyes, and an expression of good-will chased from his countenance the imprint of hatred, — which, like a tempestuous cloud, had come over it at the sight of his daughter.

Catherine descended the staircase with her babe in her arms, and took her way through the Rue Saint Denis to the inn called the Pewter Plate, which was the starting-point for the diligence which ran to Villers Cotterets.

The horses were already harnessed and the postilion in his saddle. There was one seat left inside, and that Catherine took.

Eight hours later, at six in the afternoon, — while it was still daylight, — the stage drew up at the Rue Soissons.

If Isidore had still been alive, and the young girl had come to see her mother in good health, Catherine would have been led by a sense of shame to let the stage leave her at the end of Rue Largny, and then would have made the circuit of the village, so as not to be seen; but as a widowed mother she paid no heed to rural raillery, — or rather she did not think of it. So she left the diligence modestly, but unabashed. Her mourning made her resemble a sorrowful angel, from whom scorn and malice must surely be averted by that smiling angel, her babe.

Catherine was not readily recognized. She was so pale and so altered, that she no longer seemed like the same woman. More misleading than her looks was the air of distinction which had come to her insensibly, through intimate association with a high-bred gentleman like Isidore.

However, one person recognized her, while she was still some distance away. This was Aunt Angelica.

Aunt Angelica was at the townhouse gate, conversing with two or three gossips about the oath demanded of the priests. She said that she had heard Abbé Fortier declare that he would never take the oath of allegiance to the Jacobins or the Revolution, but that he would submit to martyrdom rather than bend his head beneath the Revolutionary yoke.

"Oh Jesus God!" she cried suddenly, interrupting her story, "if there ain't that Billot girl and her young one, getting out of the stage!"

"Catherine? — Catherine?" repeated several voices.

"Yes indeed! See! There she is, shying up that lane!"

Aunt Angelica was mistaken. Catherine was not striving to get out of sight; but she was in haste to be near her mother, and so walked rapidly; and she chose the lane because it afforded a far shorter cut than the highway.

When they heard Aunt Angelica's remark, "It 's that Billot girl!" and the exclamations of the other women, that it was Catherine, several children started to run after the girl; and when they overtook her they cried out: "Yes, yes, it 's true! It 's Mademoiselle!"

"Yes, children, it 's I!" said Catherine, pleasantly.

As she was always a favorite with the children, especially as she always had something for them, — a caress, if nothing more, — they shouted, "Good-day, Mademoiselle Catherine!"

"Good-day, my friends," she replied. "My mother is not dead yet, is she?"

"Oh, no, Mademoiselle, not yet!" they said; and then one child added: "Monsieur Raynal says she may last eight or ten days longer."

"Thank you, children!" said Catherine; and she kept on her way, after giving them a few coins.

The children ran back again to the square, and the gossips said to them, "Well —?"

"Well, it is she!" said the children; "and that 's sure, for she asked us about her mother! and see what she gave us!" and the children exhibited the pieces of money received from Catherine.

"Her goods must bring a big price in Paris," said Aunt Angelica, "if she can afford to give silver to all the brats who run after her."

Aunt Angelica did not love Catherine Billot. Catherine was young and handsome, while Aunt Angelica was old and homely. Catherine was tall and well-formed, while Aunt Angelica was short and lame.

Then again, it was at Billot's farm that Ange Pitou had found a shelter, when his aunt drove him away from her home.

Besides, it was Billot who read the Declaration of Human Rights on that never-to-be-forgotten Federation Day, nearly two years before, and hustled Father Fortier, to make him say Mass at the Patriot Altar, in the square.

All these reasons sufficed, especially when added to the natural acidity of her disposition, to make Aunt Angelica dislike the Billots in general and Catherine in particular; and when Aunt Angelica hated, she hated vigorously, like all religious devotees.

She hastened speedily to find Mademoiselle Adelaide, the niece of Abbé Fortier, and tell her the news.

The priest was enjoying a fine carp from the Wallue pond, flanked by a dish of scrambled eggs and a plate of spinach. It was a maigre day, and the priest had put on the ascetic and severe aspect of a man who expects to be martyrized every instant.

"What is it?" he inquired, hearing the women jabbering in the entry. "Are they after me, to make me avow my unalterable loyalty to God's name?"

"Not yet, my dear uncle," said Mademoiselle Adelaide. "No, it 's only Aunt Angelica," — for everybody, following Pitou's example, called the old maid by this title, — "it 's only Aunt Angelica, who has come to tell me the latest scandal."

"We live in an era when scandal runs abroad in the streets," responded Father Fortier. "What is the latest scandal which Aunt Angelica brings you?"

Mademoiselle Adelaide introduced Aunt Angelica, who, it will be remembered, had the business of letting chairs to the worshippers at the village chapel, — as is customary in Catholic churches in Europe; where there are no pews, such as are provided in Protestant churches, especially in England and America.

"Your servitor, Monsieur!" said the old maid.

"You should say servant, Aunt Angelica," said the priest, who could never quite throw aside his pedagogical habits.

"I 've always heard folks say servitor," said Aunt Angelica, "and I only repeat what I 've heard. Excuse me if I 've offended, Monsieur Abbé."

"You don't offend me, Aunt Angelica, but syntax!"

"I 'll make my excuses to Monsieur Syntax the first time I see him," humbly replied the old woman.

"Very well, Aunt Angelica, very well! Now won't you have a glass of wine?"

"Thanks, Monsieur Abbé, but I never drink wine."

"You are wrong. Wine is not forbidden by the rules of the Church."

"Oh, it ain't because wine is disallowed that I don't drink it. It 's because it costs nine sous a bottle."

"You are still penurious then, Aunt Angelica?" asked the priest, turning around in his chair.

"Oh, my God, Monsieur Abbé! Penurious? How can poor folks help it?"

"Go along, you poor woman! — getting the chair-rental for nothing, when I might get a hundred crowns for it from the first applicant!"

"Oh, Monsieur Abbé, how could anybody pay that? Why, I can only afford water to drink, though I do get the chair business for nothing."

"That 's why I offer you a glass of wine, Aunt Angelica."

"Take it!" said Mademoiselle Adelaide. "It will displease my uncle if you don't accept his offer."

"You think he 'll be provoked, your uncle?" said Aunt Angelica, who was dying to accept.

"Most certainly!"

"Then, Monsieur Abbé, you may give me two fingers' worth of wine, if you please, for I would n't disoblige you."

"Here you are, then!" said he, filling a glass to the brim with burgundy as pure as rubies. "Swallow that, Aunt Angelica; and when you next count your crowns, you 'll think you have twice as many."

As Aunt Angelica raised the glass to her lips she said: "My crowns? Ah, Monsieur Abbé, don't talk to me in such a way, — you, a priest of the good God, — you who stand between the living and the dead, as they say."

"Drink, Aunt Angelica, drink!"

Aunt Angelica moistened her lips with the wine, as if to please the priest, and then, shutting her eyes tight, she beatifically swallowed nearly a third of the contents of the glass.

"Oh, how strong!" she said. "I don't see how anybody can drink wine clear!"

"And I," said the priest, "don't see how anybody can put water into his wine; but never mind that! You can't prevent me from betting that Aunt Angelica has a pretty plum of a fortune laid away!"

"Oh Monsieur Abbé, Monsieur Abbé, don't say such things. I can't even pay my taxes, which are three francs ten sous [about seventy cents] a year!" and Aunt Angelica swallowed another third of the contents of her glass.

"Yes, I know you say so; but if I 'm not greatly mistaken, when the day comes for you to give up your soul to God, if your nephew, Ange Pitou, hunts about carefully, he 'll find, in some old stocking or other, enough money to buy the whole of the Rue Pleux."

"Monsieur Abbé, Monsieur Abbé!" cried Aunt Angelica, "if you say such things you 'll get me assassinated by some of those brigands who burn up barns and cut down the crops; for on the word of a holy man like you, they 'll believe I 'm rich. — Oh Lord, oh Lord, what a misfortune!" and with her eyes moist with tears of satisfaction she swallowed the rest of her wine.

"Well, well," said the priest, still in a jesting mood, "you see you can get used to this nice little wine, Aunt Angelica."

"All the same," said the old maid, "it 's awful strong!"

Having finished his supper the abbé said: "Well, now, what new scandal is troubling our Israel?"

"Monsieur Abbé, that Billot girl came home in the stage from Paris, with her baby."

"Ah ha! Why I supposed she would put it into the Foundling Hospital."

"And she would do well," said Aunt Angelica, "for then the poor little thing would n't have to blush for its mother."

"Indeed," said the priest, "that 's putting the institution in a new light. — And what does she come here after?"

"It appears she comes to see her mother, for she asked some children if her mother were still alive."

"You know, Aunt Angelica, that Mother Billot has neglected the sacrament of confession," said the priest, with a malicious smile.

"Oh Monsieur Abbé," replied Aunt Angelica, "that is n't her fault! The poor woman has been losing her wits for the past three or four months, as it seems; but before her daughter gave her so much trouble she was a very devout woman, one who feared God; and when she came to church she always hired two chairs of me, — one to sit upon, and the other to put her feet on."

"And her husband," asked the priest, his eyes fairly glistening with anger, "Citizen Billot, the captor of the Bastille, — how many chairs did he hire of you?"

"Well, I don't know!" answered Aunt Angelica, simply. "He never did come to church! But as to Mother Billot —"

"Well, well," said the priest, "there 's an account to be settled when she 's buried!"

Then he added, making the sign of the cross: "Return thanks with me, my sisters."

The old maids also made the sign of the cross, and devoutly said their prayers with him.

CHAPTER XXVII.

THE DAUGHTER AND THE MOTHER.

MEANWHILE Catherine kept on her way. On leaving the lane she turned to the left, went through the Rue Lormet, at the end of which she re-entered the main road to Pisseleu, by a narrow footpath through the woods.

All along this road mournful memories were aroused in Catherine's mind. To begin with, there was the little wooden bridge where Isidore bade her farewell, on the day when Pitou found her by the roadside, in a cold and frigid swoon. At the entrance of the farmhouse was the hollow willow-tree, where Isidore had secretly deposited his letters. Drawing nearer the house, she could see the little window by which Isidore gained access to her room, — the very place where the young man would have more speedily ended his career, on the very night when she left her home, if the farmer's gun had not luckily missed fire. Finally, in front of the great door of the farmhouse was the main road to Boursonnes, which Catherine had so often traversed, and which she knew so well, — the road by which Isidore used to come to the farm.

How many times by night, leaning against that window, her eyes fixed on that highway, had she breathlessly awaited his arrival, till at last she could perceive her lover, — always punctual and faithful, stealing along in the shadows, — and felt a great burden lifted from her breast, as she opened her arms to receive him.

And now he was dead; but when her arms met across her breast they pressed his babe to her heart. What were people saying about her dishonor and shame? Could such a beautiful child ever be a shame and dishonor to its mother?

Fearlessly and quickly she went into the house. A great dog began to bark; but suddenly he recognized his young mistress, came as near her as the length of his chain would permit, and rose with his paws in the air, whining joyfully.

At the barking of the dog a man appeared in the doorway, desirous of knowing what was the matter. "Mademoiselle Catherine!" he exclaimed.

"Father Clouis!" said Catherine.

"Welcome, my dear young lady!" said the old gamekeeper. "The house sadly needs your beautiful and cheerful presence!"

"And my poor mother?"

"Alas! — neither better nor worse! — or rather worse than better. She is sinking, poor dear soul!"

"And where is she?"

"In her chamber."

"All alone?"

"No, no, no! — oh no, I would n't have that! You must excuse me, Mademoiselle, if in your absence, and everything, I have somewhat made myself master here. The time you spent in my poor hut made me feel like one of the family. I loved you so much, — you and that poor Monsieur Isidore!"

"You know — ?" said Catherine, drying a few tears.

"Yes, yes! — killed for the Queen, like Monsieur George! But then, he has left you this beautiful child, — is n't it so? Though you weep for the father, you must smile for the child."

"Thanks, Father Clouis!" said Catherine, offering her hand to the old gamekeeper; "but my mother — ?"

"She 's there in her chamber, as I told you, with Madame Clement, — the same sick-nurse who took care of you."

"And has she her senses still, my poor mother?" asked Catherine, hesitatingly.

"There are times when we think so," said Father Clouis; "and that 's when somebody speaks your name. That 's the way we roused her the day before yesterday; but since then she has made no sign of recognition, even when we speak of you."

"Let 's go in, Father Clouis!" said Catherine.

"Enter, Mademoiselle!" said the old gamekeeper, opening the door into Madame Billot's bedroom.

Catherine looked into the room. Her mother was lying in a bed surrounded by green serge curtains. The room was lighted by one of those old-fashioned lamps with three tubes, still to be found in ancient farmhouses.

The invalid was being cared for by Madame Clement, as Father Clouis had said. The nurse was nodding in a big armchair, in that somnolent state peculiar to nurses, which is a somnambulic condition, midway between waking and sleeping.

Poor Mother Billot seemed little changed, except that her skin was the color of ivory. She seemed to be asleep.

"Mother, mother!" cried Catherine, throwing herself on the bed, as the nurse took the baby.

The invalid opened her eyes, and moved her head towards Catherine. An intelligent gleam came into her face. Her lips babbled some unintelligible sounds, which did not even reach the dignity of disconnected words. She put out her hand, as if to confirm, by the sense of touch, her almost extinguished hearing and eyesight; but the effort was abortive, the motion a failure. The eyes closed again. The arm rested like a dead weight on Catherine's head, who was on her knees by her mother's bedside; and the invalid relapsed into that insensibility from which she had been momentarily roused by her daughter's voice, as by a galvanic shock.

Like two lightning flashes coming from opposite quarters of the horizon, so Catherine's father and mother sent out contrary emotions from their respective conditions of lethargy. Father Billot emerged from his swoon as if to repulse Catherine far from him. Mother Billot emerged from her torpor as if to draw Catherine nearer to herself.

Catherine's arrival revolutionized things at the farm. Billot had been expected, but not his daughter. She described the accident which had happened to Billot, and told them that the husband was as near death in Paris as was the wife at Pisseleu; only it was evident that the two dying persons were on different roads, — Billot on the road from death to life, his wife on the road from life to death.

Catherine once more entered her maiden chamber. There were many tears for her in the remembrances recalled by that little bedroom, where she had indulged in the sweet dreams of childhood, the burning affection of maidenhood, and to which she now returned with the bruised heart of the widow.

At once she assumed, in the disordered household, the authority which her father had aforetime delegated to her, even to the neglect of her mother. With thanks and recompense Father Clouis returned to his burrow, as he called the hut at Clouise Rock.

The next day Doctor Raynal came to the farm. He was accustomed to pay a professional visit every other day, inspired by a sense of duty rather than hope. He knew that nothing he could do would be of any avail, and that Mother Billot's life, like a lamp from which the oil is exhausted, could not be prolonged by any human effort. He was right glad to find the daughter there. At once he broached a question which he would not have dared debate with Billot, — the question of the sacraments of Holy Church.

Billot, as everybody knew, was an extreme disciple of Voltaire; nor was the Doctor's religious devotion exemplary. On the contrary, to the skeptical spirit of the age, the Doctor added what would now be called the scientific temper. Though the age had only reached the stage of doubt, science was already at the point of negation. Nevertheless, under such circumstances as these, he considered it his duty to speak to the family on the subject.

Pious relatives usually profited by his notice to send for the priest; while unreligious relatives gave orders, if the priest should present himself, that the door should be slammed in his face.

Catherine was pious. She wholly ignored the dissensions which had taken place between Billot and Fortier, or rather she attached no great importance to this antagonism. She sent Madame Clement to the rectory to ask the pastor to come and administer the last sacraments to her mother. Being too small a hamlet for a separate chapel and curate, Pisseleu relied upon Villers Cotterets for its sacred offices. It was even in the cemetery of Villers Cotterets that the dead of Pisseleu were buried.

An hour afterward the bell of the viaticum was heard tinkling at the farmhouse door. The priest had come to administer the sacrament of Extreme Unction. The advent of the Sacred Host was welcomed by Catherine on her knees.

Hardly had the abbé entered the chamber, hardly did he perceive that she for whose benefit he had been summoned was speechless, sightless, voiceless, before he declared that he would not give absolution except to those who were able to make their confession before receiving the holy wafer; and, in spite of every request, he carried the pyx away.

Fortier was a priest of the gloomy and fanatical type. In Spain he might have been a Saint Dominic, and in Mexico a Valverde. It was useless to appeal to any other priest. Pisseleu was in his parish, and no other curate would dare encroach upon his rights.

Catherine's heart was pious and tender, but she was also very rational. She looked upon the refusal of the abbé only as a burden she must bear, hoping that God would be more indulgent than his minister to the poor dying woman.

She continued to discharge the duties of a daughter towards her mother, and the duties of a mother to her child, dividing her whole life between the young soul, newly entering into this world, and the weary one who was leaving it. For eight days and nights she only left her mother's bed when called to her infant's cradle.

During the eighth night, as the girl was still watching by the bed of the invalid, — who, like a bark foundering in the sea, was gradually being submerged in eternity, — the door of the chamber opened, and Pitou appeared on the threshold. According to his usual habit he had left Paris that morning.

When she saw him Catherine trembled. For an instant she feared lest her father was dead; but Pitou's face, without being precisely gay, did not belong to a bearer of fatal intelligence.

In point of fact Billot was going from better to best. For several days the Doctor had felt sure of his case. On the very morning of Pitou's departure the farmer had been transported from the hospital at Gros Caillou to the Doctor's residence. As soon as Billot was out of danger, Pitou announced his resolution of returning to Pisseleu. He was no longer troubled on Billot's account, but on Catherine's. Pitou foresaw what would happen when they should tell Billot, what as yet it had not been considered safe for him to know, about the condition of his wife. Pitou was sure that Billot, feeble as he still was, would start for home. What if he should find Catherine at the farm?

Doctor Gilbert had not concealed from Pitou the effect produced upon the wounded man by the entrance of Catherine into the hospital laundry, and her brief stay at her father's bedside. Evidently this vision remained in the depths of his soul; and when he awoke to renewed life, he remembered her advent as part of a disordered dream. As reason slowly returned, he cast about him anxious and hateful glances. Doubtless he expected to see the painful vision reappear.

Not a word did he say about it, however, not once did he utter Catherine's name; yet Doctor Gilbert was too profound an observer not to read or conjecture everything. As soon therefore as Billot was convalescent he sent Pitou back to the farm.

This was for the purpose of getting Catherine out of the way. Pitou would have two or three days in which to bring this about, as not for two or three days longer would the Doctor risk the announcement of the painful information brought to Paris by Pitou the week before.

All this was imparted to Catherine by Pitou, with all the deferential fear inspired in him by Billot's character; but Catherine declared that she would not go away without closing the dying woman's eyes, even if her father wished to kill her beside her mother's pillow.

Pitou sadly lamented this determination, but he could not find a word to say against it. He could only hold himself ready to interpose, in case of need, between father and daughter.

Two more days and nights rolled away. During these two days and nights Mother Billot's life seemed to steal away, breath by breath. For ten days she had eaten nothing. They could only sustain life by occasionally introducing a spoonful of syrup into her mouth. One could hardly believe life could be retained in the body by so little sustenance; and certainly the poor woman was barely alive.

During the tenth night, when the breath had apparently forsaken her body, the invalid suddenly appeared to revive. Her arms moved. Her lips were agitated. Her eyes opened into a full stare.

"Mother! mother!" cried Catherine; and she rushed to the door to get her babe.

One might say that Catherine bore with her the mother's very soul; for when she returned, holding little Isidore in her arms, the dying woman made an effort to turn in that direction. Her eyes remained open and staring; but there was a gleam of welcome therein for the returning daughter. She even extended her arms and uttered a moan.

Catherine fell on her knees, as she placed her son on the bed.

Then occurred a strange phenomenon. Mother Billot lifted herself from her pillow, and laid her hands on the heads of Catherine and her babe. Then, with such an effort as was made by the youthful son of Crœsus, who broke through his dumbness in a moment of peril, this dying mother ejaculated: "My children, I bless you!" and then fell back on her pillow, her arms lifeless and her voice mute.

She was dead. Her eyes only remained open, as if the poor woman, not having seen enough of her daughter while living, wished to gaze at her from beyond the grave.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

IN WHICH THE ABBÉ FORTIER PUTS INTO EXECUTION THE THREAT MADE TO AUNT ANGELICA IN REFERENCE TO MOTHER BILLOT.

CATHERINE piously closed her mother's eyes, first with her fingers and then with her lips.

Madame Clement had long anticipated the last sad hour, and provided some candles. While Catherine, full of tears, carried her crying child into her own chamber, and lulled him to sleep on her bosom, Madame Clement lighted two candles on each side of the head of the bedstead, crossed the hands of the dead woman over her breast, placed a crucifix between those lifeless fingers, and set a bowl of consecrated water on a chair, with a spray of boxwood kept over from the previous Palm Sunday.

When Catherine came back, the only pious duty left for her was to kneel beside the deathbed, with her prayer-book in her hands.

Meanwhile Pitou took upon himself the care of the burial arrangements. Not liking to go personally to Father Fortier, with whom there had been so much unpleasantness, he went to the sexton, to order a Mass for the dead, to the bearers, to let them know at what hour they would be needed, and to the gravedigger, to tell him to dig the grave.

Thence he went to Haramont, in order to notify his lieutenants, and the other thirty and one members of the Haramont National Guards, that the interment of Madame Billot would take place the next day at eleven o'clock.

As Mother Billot had never in her life occupied any public position, and held no rank in the Royal Army or the National Guard, Pitou's communication to his soldiery was perhaps officious, but certainly not official, — as may be readily understood. It was an invitation, not a command, to assist at the funeral.

However, it was but too well known how much Billot had done for the Revolution, which had turned the public brain and inflamed the general heart. It was known that he was couched on a bed of pain at that very moment, and not wholly out of danger, and that he had been wounded in defence of the holy cause of Liberty. Pitou's invitation, therefore, had all the force of a command. All the Haramont Guards promised their chief that they would willingly be on hand the next day at eleven, promptly and punctually, at the bereaved home.

As Pitou returned to the farm that night, he met the undertaker at the door, carrying the coffin on his shoulder. Intuitively Pitou possessed a delicacy of heart rarely found among peasants, or even among the higher classes. He placed the undertaker and his coffin in the stable, and went into the house alone, fully determined to spare Catherine the sight of this mournful box and the painful noise of the hammer.

Catherine was praying at the foot of her mother's bed. The pious care of the two women had already washed the dead, wrapped her in her shroud, and made her ready for the last rites.

Pitou gave Catherine his account of what had been done during the day, and invited her to go out for a little air; but she refused, wishing to discnarge her filial duties to the very end.

"It will be bad for your dear little Isidore, if you don't go out," said Pitou.

"Then you may take him out and give him the air, Monsieur Pitou."

She must have had great confidence in Pitou, or she would not have trusted him with her babe, even for five minutes.

Pitou went out, as if to obey her orders; but he was back again in five minutes, to say: "He won't go with me. He's crying!"

Indeed, through the open doors Catherine could hear her baby's grief. She kissed the covered forehead of the corpse, whose form and features were almost distinguishable through the linen. Recognizing a divided duty between her feelings as a daughter and as a mother, she then left her parent and went to her child.

Little Isidore was indeed crying; and Catherine took him in her arms, and followed Pitou out of doors. As soon as her back was turned, the undertaker came into the house with his burden.

Pitou wished to keep Catherine away for half an hour or so. As if by chance he led her along the road to Boursonnes. This highway was so full of reminiscences to the poor girl, that she walked a long distance without speaking a word to Pitou; but she silently answered the various voices which made themselves heard in her heart.

When Pitou thought it was about time for the undertaker's work to be done, he said: "Mademoiselle Catherine, suppose we return to the farm."

She emerged from her thoughts as from a dream. "Oh, yes! How kind you are, dear Pitou!" and then she began to retrace her steps homeward.

When they reached the house, Madame Clement made a sign to Pitou that the undertaker's work was over. Catherine re-entered her own chamber, to put little Isidore to bed. This maternal duty accomplished, she wished to resume her place by her mother's bedside; but Pitou met her at her chamber door and said: "It will be useless, Mademoiselle Catherine, for everything is done."

"How, — all is done?"

"Yes, during our absence, Mademoiselle — " Pitou hesitated and then added: "Yes, in our absence the joiner — "

"Ah, that's why you insisted upon my going out. — I understand, you kind Pitou!"

By way of recompense he received from Catherine a grateful look, as she added: "One last prayer, and I will come away!"

She went straight to her mother's room. Pitou followed on tiptoe, but paused on the threshold. The coffin was placed on two chairs in the middle of the room. At this sight Catherine paused tremblingly, and fresh tears coursed down her cheeks. Then she knelt beside the coffin, and pressed her forehead, pale with weariness and grief, against the oaken coffin.

Along the dolorous way, wherein the living follow the dead from their beds of suffering to the eternal rest of the tomb, some fresh detail constantly disturbs the memory, and wellnigh draws the last tear from the heart's fountain.

Catherine's prayer was long. She could not detach herself from the coffin. The poor girl knew that after Isidore's death she had but two friends on earth, her mother and Pitou.

Her mother had blessed her and said farewell. Her mother was here in the coffin, and to-morrow would be in the grave. Pitou was now therefore her only friend. It was hard to part with her last friend but one, especially when that one was her mother.

Pitou felt that he must come to Catherine's relief. He came into the chamber, and as words were useless, he tried to raise Catherine from her knees, by placing his hands under her arms.

"One prayer more, Monsieur Pitou," she said, "only one more!"

"You will make yourself ill, Mademoiselle Catherine!" said Pitou.

"What then?"

"Then I must hunt up a nurse for little Isidore!"

"Thou art right, thou art right, Pitou! My God, how kind in thee! My God, how I love thee!"

Pitou staggered, and almost fell backward. He had to support himself against the wall, as he retreated towards the door; and silent tears, almost of joy, rolled down his cheeks. Had not Catherine said that she loved him? He did not deceive himself as to the nature of her affection; but in whatever way she loved him, the simple fact was everything to his heart.

Her prayer being finished, Catherine kept her promise to Pitou, by rising and leaving the room. She walked slow, leaning on his shoulder, while Pitou put his arm around her waist to help her along.

She allowed him to take her away; but at the door she raised her head from his shoulder, threw a final glance at the corpse, gloomily lighted by the two candles, and said: "Adieu, my mother! For the last time, adieu!" Then she passed out.

At the door of her own chamber, as she was about to enter it, Pitou checked her. She had now learned to understand Pitou so well, that she knew he had something to say to her.

"What is it?" she asked.

"Well," stammered Pitou, somewhat embarrassed, "don't you think the time has come when you must quit the farm, Mademoiselle Catherine?"

"I shall not leave the farm till my mother herself leaves it!" said the girl.

She spoke these words with such firmness that Pitou saw her resolution was irrevocable; so he said: "When you do quit the farm, you know there are two places within a league of it, where you are sure to be welcome, — the hut of Father Clouis, and Pitou's little house."

Pitou called his chamber and his little office a house.

"Thanks, Pitou!" answered Catherine, indicating with a nod that she would accept one or the other of these two asylums.

Then she went into her room without farther anxiety about Pitou, who was always sure of making himself a home somewhere.

The next day, at ten in the forenoon, the friends invited to the funeral began to flock towards the farm. All the farmers in the neighborhood were there, from Boursonnes, from Noue, from Ivors Copse, from Largny, from Coyolles, from Haramont, and from Vivières.

Among the first arrivals was the Mayor of Villers Cotterets, the friendly Monsieur de Longpré.

At half-past ten came the Haramont National Guardsmen, with drum beating and flag trailing. Not a soldier was absent.

Each comer was welcomed by Catherine. She was clad in black, and she held her babe, also clad in black. It must be said that nobody felt anything but respect for this mother and infant, standing in the gloom of their double bereavement and double mourning.

At eleven o'clock more than three hundred people were at the farmhouse. The priest, the bearers, and other parish officers were not there, however.

There was a delay of fifteen minutes. Nobody else arrived. Pitou climbed to the top of the highest barn, whence he could overlook a circuit of two miles, reaching from Villers Cotteret to the little village of Pisseleu. Though he had good eyes, he could see nothing of the expected ecclesiastical visitors.

He came down and imparted to Monsieur de Longpré, not only his observations, but his conclusions. His observations showed him that nothing priestly was to be seen on its winding way. His conclusion was, that nothing priestly would come; for he had heard of Father Fortier's visit, and his refusal to administer the last sacraments to Mother Billot.

Pitou knew Fortier, and so guessed the whole truth. Fortier was resolved not to give the aid and countenance of his sacred office to the interment of Madame Billot, and the pretext, not the cause, for this refusal was the omission of her dying confession.

These reflections, communicated by Pitou to the Mayor, and by the Mayor to his assistants, produced a despondingeffect. At first everybody was silent. Then somebody said: "Well, if old Fortier won't say Mass, we can get on just as well without him."

This was the voice of Désiré Maniquet, whose antireligious sentiments were well known.

There was another silence. Evidently it seemed a very bold thing to propose the omission of the Mass for the dead, for this was an indication of adherence to the school of Rousseau and Voltaire.

"Gentlemen," said the Mayor, "let us go to Villers Cotterets. At Villers Cotterets everything will be explained."

"To Villers Cotterets!" cried every voice.

Pitou made a sign to four of his men. They slid two gun-barrels under the coffin, and so lifted the corpse. At the door the coffin was carried before Catherine, who was kneeling, and in front of little Isidore, whom she had placed on his knees.

After the coffin had passed out, Catherine kissed the threshold of the outer door, for she never again expected to enter the farmhouse, and said to Pitou, as she rose from the ground: "You will find us in the hut at Clouise Rock."

Then she walked rapidly away through the courtyard of the farm, and the gardens nearest the Noue.

CHAPTER XXIX.

IN WHICH THE ABBÉ FORTIER SEES THAT IT IS NOT ALWAYS AS EASY AS ONE SUPPOSES TO KEEP ONE'S WORD.

THE procession advanced silently, forming a long line, when suddenly those who brought up the rear heard a loud call behind. They turned to see what was the matter.

A horseman was riding at full gallop from the direction of Ivors, — that is, along the Paris road. Part of his face was disfigured by two black bandages. He was waving his hat as a sign for them to wait.

Pitou turned to the others and said: "Hold on! It 's Monsieur Billot. — Gracious! I would n't be in Abbé Fortier's skin!"

At the mention of Billot's name, everybody halted. The horseman was riding rapidly; and as he came nearer, others recognized the farmer, as Pitou had already done.

As soon as he reached the head of the procession, Billot leaped from his horse, threw the bridle on the animal's neck, and said, in very emphatic tones: "Good-day and thank you, fellow-citizens!" Then he took his place behind the coffin, instead of Pitou, who had led the mourners in Billot's absence. A stable-boy took charge of the horse and rode back to the farm.

Every one looked curiously at Billot. He was somewhat haggard and very pale. Part of his forehead and the flesh about his left eye were still black and blue, with the blood which had settled there. His set teeth and frowning brows bespoke gloomy wrath, which was only waiting for the opportune moment to burst forth.

"Do you know what is going on?" asked Pitou.

"I know all!" answered the farmer.

As soon as Gilbert had told Billot about his wife, the farmer hired a cabriolet, in which he rode as far as Nanteuil. As the horse was able to go no farther, the farmer, feeble as he was, had hired a saddle-horse. At Levignan he had changed horses, and reached home just after the funeral procession had started.

In a few words Madame Clement had told him everything. Billot at once remounted. As he turned the wall he could see the procession, which was moving slowly along the road, and he straightway called upon it to stop.

Thereafter, as we have said before, it was he who headed the funeral procession, with scowling forehead, threatening mouth, and arms folded over his breast.

Already quiet and mournful, the company became still more silent and gloomy.

At the entrance of the village of Villers Cotterets they found a group of persons waiting. These persons took their places in the procession. As the party moved along the streets, men, women, and children came out of their houses, saluted Billot, — who answered with a nod, — and then took their places at the end of the line. By the time the procession reached the public square it numbered more than five hundred.

From the square one could see the church. What Pitou had foreseen proved to be true. The church was closed.

In front of the door the procession came to a standstill. Billot was livid. The expression of his face became more and more menacing.

It was the fashion in those days for a horn to be played in church services; and as the horn most in favor was coiled like a snake, not only did the instrument receive a name indicative of its shape, but the hornplayer was also called a serpent.

The church and the Mayor's office stood side by side. As the church serpent also acted as janitor for the town-house, and was therefore dependent equally upon the Mayor and upon the priest, Monsieur de Longpré sent for the serpent and questioned him.

The priest had forbidden everybody connected with the church from having anything to do with the burial.

The Mayor asked for the church keys. The keys were at the beadle's.

"Go and get them!" said Billot to Pitou.

Pitou stretched his legs, which were like a pair of compasses, and was back again in five minutes, with this message: "Fortier has had the keys taken to the parsonage, so the church can't be opened."

"It is necessary to get the keys from old Fortier, then!" said Désiré Maniquet, who was a born advocate of extreme measures.

"Yes, yes! We 'll go to the parsonage for the keys!" cried two hundred voices.

"That will take too long," said Billot; "and when death knocks at the door, he is not in the habit of waiting."

Then he looked about him. Opposite the church there was a house in process of erection. The workmen were squaring off a beam. Billot marched straight up to them, and motioned with his hand that he wanted the piece of timber they were shaping. The workmen at once gave it up.

The timber rested on two joists. Billot passed his arms under the beam, near the middle of it, and raised it by a single effort; but he had counted on lost strength. Under this enormous weight the colossus trembled, and for an instant they thought he would fall. There was a lightning glance in his eye. With an awful smile he regained his equilibrium. Then he crossed the street with the beam in his arms, his step slow but firm. He was like one of those ancient battering-rams, with which Alexander, Hannibal, and the Cæsars were wont to beat down opposing walls.

With his legs apart Billot placed himself before the door, and this formidable machine began its awful play. The door was oaken. The locks, bolts, and hinges were iron. At the third blow bolts, locks, and hinges flew off, and the oak door was half open.

Then Billot dropped the beam, which four men with difficulty carried back to the place whence he had taken it.

"Now, Monsieur Mayor," said Billot, "have the coffin of my poor wife, who never did any harm to a living person, placed in the middle of the chancel. Pitou, get the beadle, the sexton, the choristers, and the altar-boys. I will see to the priest myself!"

The Mayor entered the church, with the coffin. Pitou went after the choristers, the altar-boys, the beadle, and the sexton. He was accompanied by Désiré Maniquet and four other men, in case they should find these church people obstinate. Billot set out for the priest's house.

Several men wished to follow Billot, but he said: "Let me alone! Perhaps something serious will happen. Let each man bear the responsibility of his own deeds."

Then he passed along Church Avenue, into the Soissons Road.

Thus for the second time, nearly two years after the first, the Revolutionary farmer was to find himself face to face with the Royalist priest. Everybody remembered what had happened the first time. Probably they should now be witnesses of a similar scene. However, seeing Billot striding towards the priest's house the people remained in their places, shaking their heads, but not taking a step.

"He told us not to follow him!" said the spectators, one to another.

The big door of the priest's house was as fast as the church door. Billot looked about him, to see if he could find another new building going up thereabouts, so as to borrow another beam. He could only see a freestone post, which had been dislodged somewhat by children at play, and now trembled in its hole, like a loose tooth in its socket.

The farmer went up to this post, shook it violently, enlarged its socket and finally tore the stone up from the earth in which it was embedded.

Lifting it above his head, like another Ajax or a new Diomed, he drew back a step, and then launched the granite block, with as much force as if it had been a catapult. The door was shivered into morsels.

At the same time that Billot opened this formidable passage, the window on the first story opened, and Fortier appeared there, shouting to all his parishioners for help; but the pastor's flock did not choose to hear his voice. They preferred letting the wolf and the shepherd fight it out together. It took a little time for Billot to break down two or three inside doors, which still separated him from the priest, as he had broken through the first. Perhaps this required ten minutes. As these minutes rolled away the priest's cries became more and more violent and his gestures more and more expressive. It was easy to see that danger was coming nearer and nearer to the holy man.

Suddenly Billot's pale face was visible behind the priest, and the farmer's heavy hand was laid on the pastoral shoulder. The priest braced himself against the wooden crosspiece, which divided the swinging window. He also was noted for his strength, and it would have been no easy thing for a Hercules to dislodge him from his hold.

Billot put his arms about the priest's waist, and braced himself well on his legs. With a shock that might have uprooted an oak-tree, he wrenched his opponent away from the window, with such force that the wooden crosspiece remained broken in the ministerial hands.

Then both farmer and priest disappeared in the depths of the room, and the receding cries of the abbé could be heard coming from afar, like the bellowing of a bull, borne away to his lair by some fierce lion of the Atlas Mountains.

Meanwhile Pitou had gathered together the sexton, the choristers, the altar-boys, the beadle, all trembling. Following the example of the janitor-serpent they hastened to put on their capes and frocks, light the candles, and prepare everything for a mortuary Mass.

They were busy doing this when they saw Billot reappear at the side door of the parsonage, opening upon Château Square, though they had expected to see him at the large door, opening on Rue Soissons. He was dragging the priest after him; and despite the priestly resistance, the farmer walked as rapidly as if he had been alone.

Billot was no longer a man. He was one of nature's forces, like a torrent or an avalanche. Nothing human seemed capable of resisting him. Only some other element of nature could struggle successfully against him.

When they were a hundred paces from the church the poor priest ceased to resist. He was completely subdued. Everybody stood aside to let the two men pass along. The frightened priest threw a startled glance at the door, broken into fragments like a pane of glass. When he saw in their several places — with book, halbert, or instrument in hand — those whom he had forbidden to set foot in the church, the priest shook his head, as if he at last realized that something powerful and irresistible weighed down religion, as well as its ministers. He entered the sacristy, and presently came forth in his professional robes, with the holy eucharist in his hands. He mounted the altar steps, placed the pyx on the holy table, and turned to speak the first words of the service; but at that instant Billot lifted his hand and said: "Enough, you miserable slave of God. I wished to curb your pride, — that 's all! I want people to understand that a good woman, like my wife, can get along without the prayers of a bigoted and despisable priest like you!"

As a great noise rose to the church rafters after these words, Billot added: "If this is sacrilege, let the sacrilege fall on me alone!"

Turning towards the crowd, which now not only filled the church, but the courtyard of the townhouse next door, he said: "Citizens, — to the cemetery!"

The general voice repeated his words: "To the cemetery!"

The four military bearers once more thrust their gun-barrels under the coffin and lifted the corpse. As they had come, — without priest, without hymns, without any of the funereal pomp with which religion is accustomed to escort the bereaved friends, — they now resumed their walk to the cemetery, Billot leading the mourners. There were six hundred persons in the procession.

The cemetery was situated, it may be remembered, at the end of a lane called Pleux, twenty-five rods from Aunt Angelica's cottage. The gate was locked, like the doors of the church and parsonage. Strangely enough, Billot paused before this frail obstacle. The dead showed respect to the dead!

At a sign from the farmer, Pitou ran after the gravedigger. The gravedigger of course had the key of the cemetery. Five minutes later Pitou brought not only the key, but two shovels.

Fortier had interdicted the poor dead woman both from the church and from holy ground. The gravedigger had received orders not to dig a grave.

At this fresh manifestation of the priest's malevolence towards the farmer, something like a threatening shiver ran through the crowd. If in his heart Billot had cherished a quarter part of the gall which belongs to religious fanatics, — gall which had aforetime astonished the satirical poet Boileau, — the farmer had only to speak the word, and the priest would have enjoyed the satisfaction of that martyrdom for which he had so ardently appealed, on that beautiful day in the autumn of 1789, when he refused to celebrate Mass on the Patriot Altar in the square.

Billot possessed the lion-like anger of the populace. He tore his way along, he broke through all obstacles which beset him, but he never retraced his steps.

He made a sign of thanks to Pitou, whose intentions he understood. He took the key, opened the gate, let the coffin pass in, followed it himself, and was in turn followed by the funeral escort, which now included nearly everybody in the neighborhood who could walk.

Only the ultra Royalists and bigots stayed at home. It need not be said that Aunt Angelica, who was among the stay-at-homes, locked her door in terror, crying out against "the Abomination of Desolation set up in the Holy Place," and calling down the thunderbolts of Heaven upon the head of her nephew.

All those, however, who had kind hearts, good sense, domestic affection, all those who were disgusted at seeing hatred substituted for mercy, and vengeance for humanity, — that is to say, three-fourths of the population, — were on hand, to protest, not against God, not against religion, but against priestly bigotry.

When they arrived at the place where the grave should have been dug, — for the gravedigger had already marked the spot before he received orders not to dig it, — Billot extended his hand to Pitou, who handed him one of the spades.

Then Billot and Pitou, with bare heads, surrounded by a circle of citizens whose heads were likewise uncovered, — under the devouring sun of the latter days of July, — began to dig the grave for that unhappy woman; a woman so pious and resigned in all things, that she would have been greatly surprised at what was taking place, and would have greatly preferred not to die, if she had foreseen the scandal which her death was to cause.

The labor lasted an hour, and neither of the two diggers had any idea of stopping till the grave was finished.

Meantime somebody had brought some ropes, and when the grave was dug the cords were in readiness. Billot and Pitou lowered the coffin into the grave. These two men undertook this last duty so simply and naturally, that not one of the onlookers thought of offering to help them. Indeed they would have deemed it a sacrilege to interfere with this pious task.

As the first lumps of earth fell upon the oaken coffin, Billot passed his hand over his eyes, and Pitou wiped his tears on his cuff. Then they resolutely replaced the earth.

When all was over, Billot threw his shovel aside, and extended both arms to Pitou, who threw himself upon the farmer's breast.

"God is my witness," said Billot, "that in thee I embrace all the grand and simple virtues on earth, — charity, devotion, unselfishness, fraternity, — and that I devote my life to the triumph of these virtues."

Then, extending his hand over the grave, he added: "God also be my witness that I swear eternal warfare against the King, who has tried to have me murdered, against the nobles, who have dishonored my daughter, against the priests, who have refused burial to my wife!"

Turning towards the spectators, who were full of sympathy over this triple adjuration, the farmer said: "Brothers, a new Assembly is to be convened in Paris, in place of that convention of traitors now sitting in the shadow of the Feuillant Club. Choose me for your representative in that new Assembly, and you shall see that I know how to keep my oaths!"

A cry of universal assent met this proposition from Billot; and in such an hour, on the grave of his wife, — an awful altar, worthy of the most solemn oath that could be taken, — Billot was named as a candidate for the new Legislative Assembly.

Billot thanked his compatriots for their sympathy, which they had shown him both in his hatred and his

; and then each one went home, — citizen or – carrying in his heart the ultra Revolutionary e weapons therefor being furnished, in their by kings, nobles, and priests, — the very that were to destroy themselves.

CHAPTER XXX.

DEPUTY BILLOT.

THE events which we have recorded produced a deep impression, not only on the inhabitants of Villers Cotterets, but on the farmers in the neighboring towns.

In electoral matters the farmers were a great power. They employed ten, twenty, or thirty day-laborers each; and though nominally suffrage was of two kinds at that era, the election really depended upon what were called the rural districts.

Each of these men, as he went home after the funeral, grasped Billot's hand, and said to him these two simple words: "Be easy!" and Billot indeed returned to his farm in a tranquil frame of mind, for now he could see, for the first time, an efficacious method of repaying the nobility and royalty for the evil they had wrought.

Billot felt! He did not reason; and his desire for vengeance was as blind as the wounds which he had received.

He returned to the farm without saying a word about Catherine. Nothing indicated that he had known of her temporary presence at the farm. For a year he had not spoken her name under any circumstances. To him his daughter was as if she had never existed.

It was not so with Pitou, — that heart of gold. From the bottom of his nature he regretted that Catherine could not love him; but when he thought of Isidore, and compared that elegant young man with himself, Pitou perfectly understood how it was that Catherine could not choose but love the Viscount.

Pitou envied Isidore, but he entertained no ill-will towards Catherine. On the contrary, he still loved her with profound and absolute devotion.

To say that this devotion was wholly exempt from pain would be false; but the agony which harrowed Pitou's heart, at each new proof of affection given by Catherine to her lover, only showed the ineffable goodness of the lad's soul.

When Isidore was killed at Varennes, Pitou felt for Catherine only the deepest pity. His feelings were the very opposite of Billot's, and he rendered complete justice to the young nobleman, remembering all that was worthy, good, and generous, even in a rival.

As we have seen, the result of this was not solely that Pitou perhaps loved Catherine the more when she was sadly clad in mourning, than he had loved her when she was joyous and merry, but also — what one might have believed impossible — that he found himself loving the poor little orphan almost as much as he loved Catherine herself.

We ought not to be surprised, therefore, that after Pitou had taken leave of Billot, like the others, he did not return to the farm, but wended his way towards Haramont.

So accustomed were his neighbors to his frequent disappearances and returns, that despite the high position which he occupied in their village, as their military chief, nobody minded his absence. When Pitou went away, they whispered: "General Lafayette has sent for Pitou!" and that was all.

When he returned they asked their captain for the news. Thanks to Gilbert, Pitou was always able to impart the freshest and most reliable intelligence; and when, several days later, the villagers found that Pitou's predictions were fulfilled, they continued to repose in him the blindest confidence, as if he were their prophet as well as their captain.

Gilbert knew all that was good and true in Pitou. He felt that when a critical moment should come, here was a man to whom he might confide his own life or Sebastien's, a treasure or a commission, trusting to his strength and fidelity.

Every time Pitou went to Paris, Gilbert would ask Pitou if he needed anything, and that, too, without making him blush the least in the world. Pitou always replied: "No, Monsieur Gilbert;" but this did not prevent Gilbert from giving Pitou several louis, which Pitou quietly put into his pocket.

Several louis was a fortune to Pitou, added to the special resources and the tithes which he was able to levy on the Orleans forest. So Pitou never reached the end of his handful of louis before he saw the Doctor again; and then the Doctor once more replenished Pitou's pockets from the spring of Pactolus.

Considering Pitou's disposition towards Catherine and Isidore, it is not surprising that he hastily separated himself from Billot, in order to learn how it fared with the young mother and her child.

On his way to Haramont, Pitou passed by Clouise Rock. A hundred paces from the hut he met Father Clouis, who was on his way home with a hare in his gamebag; for it was Hare-day.

In two words Father Clouis announced to Pitou that Catherine had come to ask for her former dwelling-place, which the old man had hastily restored to her. The poor girl had wept plentifully on entering the little room where she had become a mother, and where Isidore had conferred upon her such lively proofs of his affection.

All these sorrows were not without a certain charm. Whosoever has suffered a great affliction knows that the most cruel hours are those when the fountains of tears are dried, and the happiest hours are those when the tears flow freely.

When Pitou presented himself at the threshold of the hut, he found Catherine seated on her bed, her cheeks wet and her babe in her arms.

Seeing Pitou, Catherine set her babe on her knees, and offered both hands and her forehead to the young man. Pitou joyfully grasped her hands and kissed her forehead; and so for an instant Baby was enclosed by the arch above him, formed by the four clasped hands, and Pitou's lips resting upon the mother's fair forehead.

Then falling on his knees before Catherine, and kissing the infant's little hands, Pitou said: "Ah, Mademoiselle Catherine, be easy; for I 'm rich, and little Monsieur Isidore sha'n't want for anything."

Having fifteen louis, Pitou called himself rich. Herself good in heart and mind, Catherine appreciated all that was good in others.

"Thanks, Monsieur Pitou," she said. "I believe you, and it makes me very happy to believe you; for you are my only friend. If you abandon us, we shall be alone in the world; but you will never abandon us, will you?"

"Oh, Mademoiselle," said Pitou, sobbing, "don't say such things to me, or you 'll make me cry away all the tears in my body!"

"I was wrong to speak so," said she, "I was wrong! Please forgive me!"

"No, you were right, on the contrary! It 's I who am a fool, for crying in this way."

"Monsieur Pitou," said Catherine, "I need the air. Give me your arm, and we'll walk under the great trees. I think it 'll do me good."

"And me too, Mademoiselle," said Pitou, "for I feel quite stifled."

The baby did not need the air. He had drunk largely at the maternal fountain, and needed sleep. Catherine laid him on the bed, and gave her arm to Pitou.

Five minutes later they were walking beneath the noble trees of the forest, that magnificent temple reared by the hand of the Lord of Nature, — his divine and immortal daughter. As a certain American poet has said:

The groves were God's first temples.

In spite of himself this promenade, with Catherine leaning on his arm, recalled to Pitou the Whitsunday, some two years and a half earlier, when he conducted Catherine to the ballroom, and Viscount Isidore danced with her, to the lad's great distress.

What an accumulation of events during these thirty months! Without being so great a philosopher as Voltaire or Rousseau, Pitou could understand that Catherine and himself were but atoms involved in the general whirlpool; but, however small, these atoms have their joys and sorrows, just as much as the grand lords, princes, or even the kings and queens.

Though the mills of God grind slowly,
Yet they grind exceeding small.

Turned by the hands of Fatality, the millstones crush crowns and thrones into powder; and they had crushed into dust Catherine's happiness, quite as positively as if she had been seated on a throne and worn a crown on her head.

In a word, note the difference which the Revolution had made in Pitou's situation, — that Revolution to which he had contributed so ably, though without knowing what he did, and building better, or worse, than he knew.

Two and a half years before, Pitou was but a poor little peasant-boy, driven away from her home by Aunt Angelica, harbored by Billot, befriended by Catherine, sacrificed to Isidore.

To-day Pitou was a power. He wore a sabre at his side, and epaulets on his shoulders, and he was called captain; while Isidore was dead, and it was he, Pitou, who protected Catherine and her child.

In Pitou was a perfect illustration of Danton's response to some one who asked him: "What is your purpose in fostering the Revolution?"

"To put down those who are on top, and to raise those who are under foot!" was Danton's reply.

Although all these notions rattled through Pitou's brain, Pitou was too good and modest to take any advantage of them; but, on his knees, he begged Catherine to let him protect herself and her child.

On her side, Catherine — as is the case with all suffering hearts — found her appreciation heightened by sorrow, rather than by joy. In her days of happiness Pitou was only a good-natured boy, of very little importance, in her estimation. Now he had become in her eyes the unselfish creature he really was, — a man full of goodness, candor, and devotion.

Unhappy as she now was, and greatly in need of a friend, she saw in Pitou just the friend she needed. As Catherine therefore always welcomed him with outstretched hands and smiling lips, Pitou began to live a life of which he had no previous glimpse, even in his utmost dreams of paradise.

Meanwhile, though still mute in regard to his daughter, Billot pursued, even while busy with his harvest, his idea of being elected a Deputy to the Legislature. One man only might possibly prevail against Billot, if he cherished the same ambition; but Charny was enjoying unexpected felicity in the château at Boursonnes, where he was shut up with Andrée, and absorbed wholly in love and happiness. He was so oblivious to all the world, that he believed the world had forgotten him.

So the Count cared naught for politics; and as there was no special opposition to Billot's election in the district of Villers Cotterets, the farmer was elected Deputy by a big majority.

Once elected, Billot set about making as much money as possible. The year had been a good one. He settled with his tenants, reserving the part of their earnings which belonged to him. He set aside as much seed-grain as was necessary for planting, and as much hay, oats, and straw as was needful for his cattle. He put aside as much money as was required for the support of his laborers.

Then, one morning, he sent for Pitou. As we know, Pitou was in the habit of visiting Billot from time to time. Billot always received him with open hands, offering him breakfast, if it was the breakfast hour, asking him to dinner, if it was time for dinner, or giving him a glass of wine or cider, if it was the hour only for drinking a glass of wine or a mug of cider; but never before had Billot specially sent after Pitou, and it was not without trepidation that Pitou went to the farm.

Billot was always serious. Since his daughter left her home, nobody could say that he had ever seen a smile on the farmer's lips. Now Billot was more grave than usual.

According to his custom he offered Pitou his hand; but the hand which Pitou gave him he squeezed harder than usual, and retained in both his own.

Pitou looked at the farmer in astonishment, and the latter said: "Pitou, thou 'rt an honest man!"

"Gracious, Monsieur Billot," replied Pitou, "I hope so!"

"And I 'm sure of it!"

"You 're very kind to say so, Monsieur Billot!" said Pitou.

"I 've decided, as I 'm going away, that it 's thee who must be at the head of the farm."

"Me, Monsieur?" said our Pitou, greatly astonished. "Impossible!"

"Wherefore impossible?"

"Why, Monsieur Billot, because there are lots of little things where the eye of a woman is indispensable."

"I know that," said Billot. "Pick out a woman who will share the care with thee. I won't even ask her name. I need n't know it. When I 'm coming home to the farm, I 'll notify thee a week beforehand, in order that she may get herself out of the way, if the woman don't wish to see me, or I had better not see her."

"Well, Monsieur Billot?" said Pitou.

"Well," continued Billot, "all the grain necessary for sowing is in the loft. In the granaries are all the straw, hay, oats, and fodder necessary for the horses and cattle. In this drawer is the money needed for the wages and nourishment of the household."

As he spoke Billot pulled out a drawer full of money.

"Stop a minute, Monsieur Billot!" said Pitou. "How much is there in that drawer?"

"I don't know!" said Billot, closing the drawer again.

Then he locked it and gave Pitou the key, as he added: "When there is need of more, ask me for it."

Pitou understood how much confidence was implied in this response. He opened his arms to embrace Billot, but suddenly he thought how bold such an action must appear, in a lad like himself; and so he said: "Pardon, Monsieur Billot, I ask a thousand pardons!"

"Pardon for what, my friend?" asked Billot, touched by this humility. "Pardon for an honest man, because he reaches out his arms to embrace another honest man? Come, Pitou! Come, embrace me!"

Pitou threw himself into the farmer's arms.

Presently Pitou said: "But if by chance you happen to need me down there —?"

"Be easy, Pitou! I sha'n't forget thee!"

Presently Billot added: "It 's now two o'clock in the afternoon. At five I start for Paris. At six thou wilt be here with the woman selected to help thee."

"So?" said Pitou. "Then I 've no time to lose. Good-bye, dear Monsieur Billot!"

"Good-bye, Pitou!"

Pitou hurried away from the farm. Billot watched him till he was out of sight.

When the lad had disappeared the farmer said to himself: "Why could n't my girl Catherine fall in love with a brave fellow like him, instead of that snake-in-the-grass of a nobleman, who leaves her a widow without being married, a mother without being a wife?"

Needless to say that at five o'clock Billot took the stage at Villers Cotterets for Paris; and that at six Pitou, Catherine, and little Isidore came again to the farmhouse.

CHAPTER XXXI.

APPEARANCE OF THE NEW LEGISLATURE.

It was on October 1, 1791, that the new Assembly was to be inaugurated. Like the other Deputies, Billot was on hand towards the end of September.

The new Legislature was made up of seven hundred and forty-five members. Among them were four hundred attorneys and solicitors; seventy-two authors, journalists, poets; seventy Constitutionalist priests, — that is, priests who had taken the oath of allegiance to the Constitution. The two hundred and three other members were either landowners and farmers, like Billot, — who was both landlord and farmer, — or men engaged in some literary or mechanical pursuit.

The special characteristic prevalent among the new Deputies was their youthfulness. Most of them were not over twenty-six years. It seemed as if France had sent a new and unknown generation of men, to break violently with the past. Noisy, stormy, revolutionary, she wished to dethrone tradition.

The members generally had cultivated minds. As we have said, there were poets, lawyers, chemists. They were full of energy and grace, possessing extraordinary verve, and the courage of their convictions. They were debaters and fighters, but they were ignorant of state-affairs, inexperienced, and evidently brought with them that grand but terrible element which we call the unknown.

Now the unknown in politics always engenders anxiety. With the exception of Condorcet and Brissot, the same question might have been asked of almost any one of these men, — Who is he?

Where were the great lights or even the torches of the Constitutional Assembly? Where were the Mirabeaus, the Sieyès, the Duports, the Baillys, the Robespierres, the Barnaves, the Cazalès? All had vanished.

Here and there, as if astray among these ardent youngsters, were a few white heads. The others were representatives of a young and manly France, — a black-haired France. Fine heads these, to cut off in a revolution, — and nearly all of them were put to that use.

Within the kingdom there was the scent of civil war. Outside were rumors of foreign wars. These young men were not therefore Deputies simply; they were warriors. The advance guard came from the Gironde, a department which, in case of war, had offered to send to the frontier all its men between the ages of twenty and fifty.

This vanguard included men like Vergniaud, Guadet, Gensonné, Fonfrède, Ducos, — the clique soon called the Girondists, giving their name to a famous party which, in spite of its faults, has always received the sympathy of the world by reason of its misfortunes.

Born in the breath of war, the members leaped with a single bound into the bloody arena of political life, like athletes thirsting for contest.

Simply by seeing these Deputies rush tumultuously to their seats in the hall, one could catch anticipatory glimpses of the tempest which was to break forth in the storms of June 20, August 10, and January 21.

No longer were part of the benches known as the Right. In other words, there were no more Aristocrats, and the Right was therefore suppressed.

Nearly the whole Assembly came to Paris armed against two enemies, — the nobility and the priesthood. If these enemies resisted, the Deputies were under orders, from their constituents, to trample down this resistance.

As to the King, it was left to the consciences of the Deputies to dispose of him as they judged best. He was pitied; and it was hoped that he would escape from the triple power of the Queen, the Aristocracy, and the Clergy. If he sustained them, he must be crushed with them.

Poor King! He was no longer to be called King, Louis Sixteenth, or even his Majesty, but simply the Executive Power.

The first movement of these Deputies was to look about them, as they entered a hall with whose arrangements they were wholly unfamiliar.

On each side was a reserved gallery.

"For whom are those reserved places?" asked several voices.

"For the outgoing Deputies," responded the architect; for the place had been reconstructed.

"Oh ho!" growled Vergniaud, "what does that mean, — a censorial committee? Is this the Legislative Hall of the representatives of the Nation, or is it a schoolroom?"

"Hold on!" said Hérault, of Séchelles, "let us see how our masters behave!"

"Usher!" cried Thuriot, "you will tell people, as they come in, that there is in this Assembly a man who had the Governor of the Bastille thrown from the summit of his own walls, and that the name of this man is Thuriot." Eighteen months later this man called himself Tue-roi (the King-killer, — or literally, kill-king).

The first act of the new Assembly was to send a deputation to the Tuileries.

The King was so imprudent as to meet the deputation by one of his ministers, as proxy, who said: "Gentlemen, the King cannot receive you at this time. Return at three o'clock."

The delegates returned to the Assembly.

"Well?" said the other members, as they saw the deputation re-enter.

"Citizens," said one of them, "the King is not quite ready, and we have three hours before us."

"Good!" cried Couthon the cripple, speaking from his chair. "Let us utilize these three hours. I propose that the title of Majesty be suppressed!"

The response was a general hurrah. The title of Majesty was suppressed by acclamation, without a demand for a more explicit vote.

"What shall the Executive Power be called?" asked another voice.

"Let him be called the King of the French!" responded another voice. "With such a fine title as that, Monsieur Capet ought to be contented."

All eyes were turned upon the man who ventured to call the King of France Monsieur Capet. It was Billot.

"Let it be King of the French!" was the nearly unanimous cry.

"Look here!" said Couthon, "there are two hours left. I have another proposition to make."

"Go on!" shouted everybody.

"I move that when the King comes in we rise, but that when he is seated, we sit down again, and put on our hats."

For a few minutes there was a fearful tumult. The shouts of agreement were so boisterous as to be mistaken for cries of opposition.

At last, when the noise was stilled, it was found that everybody was agreed. The proposition was adopted.

Couthon looked at the clock. "We have yet an hour to wait," he said, "and I 've a third proposal to make."

"Hear! Hear!" cried everybody.

"I propose," added Couthon, with that soft voice of his, which upon occasion could vibrate so terribly, "I propose that there shall be no throne for the King, but simply an armchair."

The speaker was interrupted by loud applause.

"Hold on!" said Couthon, raising his hand. "I 've not yet finished."

Silence was at once restored.

"I move that the King's armchair be placed at the President's left hand."

"Take care!" called a voice. "That will not only abolish the throne, but subordinate the King!"

"Very well!" said Couthon. "I move, not only to suppress the throne, but to put down the King."

There was a frightful outcry. In that awful hand-clapping was the terrible spirit of June 20 and August 10.

"Very well, citizens," said Couthon, "the three hours have slipped away. I thank the King of the French for not being on hand. We have not wasted our time in waiting."

The deputation again went to the Tuileries. This time the King received them; but the inimical step had already been taken.

"Gentlemen," said he, "I cannot go to the Assembly for three days."

The delegates looked at each other, and then said: "Then, Sire, that will be on the fourth?"

"Yes, gentlemen, on the fourth!" said the King, turning his back upon them.

On October 4 the King said he was not well, and could not come till the seventh.

The absence of the King on the fourth did not prevent the Constitution of 1791 — that important work of the old Assembly — from entering the new Assembly.

It was escorted by a guard of a dozen of the oldest members of the defunct Constitutional Assembly.

It was borne by Camus, the Recorder. He ascended the platform, and exhibited the document to the public.

"Citizens," said he, like another Moses, "here are the tables of the law!"

Then began the ceremony of taking the oath.

All the Deputies filed past the precious document, but they were glum and cold. Many foresaw that this powerless Constitution would not last a year. They swore for the sake of swearing, because it was a ceremony imposed upon them, — the thing to be done.

Three-quarters of those who took the oath did not mean to keep it.

The report of the first day's three votes spread rapidly throughout Paris: No more talk about Majesty! No more thrones! A simple armchair at the President's left-hand.

This was as much as to say: "No more kings!"

As usual, finances first took the alarm. The public bonds fell terribly in value. Bankers began to tremble.

On October 9 a great change was made.

By the terms of this new law there was no longer a commander of the National Guard. On the ninth Lafayette was to resign his post, and each of the six chiefs of the six legions was to take his turn in being general commander.

The day fixed for the royal visit at last arrived. Everybody had forgotten that it was to be on the seventh.

The King entered. In opposition to what had been planned, so great an honor was a royal visit still esteemed, that the Deputies not only rose and took off their hats, but saluted his Majesty with loud acclaims. The Assembly even shouted: "Long live the King!"

In an instant, as if the Royalists present wished to throw their defiance in the face of the new Deputies, some people in the galleries shouted: "Long live his Majesty!"

A long murmur ran through the benches occupied by the members. They raised their eyes to the galleries, and saw that these cries came chiefly from the seats set apart for the members of the late Constitutional Assembly.

"All right, gentlemen," said Couthon, "to-morrow we 'll attend to your case!"

The King made a sign that he wished to speak. Everybody listened. The discourse which he pronounced, composed by Duport Dutertre, was one of the highest ability, and produced a grand effect. It related entirely to the necessity of maintaining order, and of rallying to the support of a beloved country.

Pastoret presided at the Assembly. Pastoret was a Royalist.

In his speech the King had said that he wished to be loved.

"We also, Sire," said the President, "wish to be loved, and by yourself!"

At these words general applause broke forth.

The King, by his discourse, took it for granted that the Revolution was finished. At that time the Assembly apparently believed as he did. But if the Revolution is to be finished, Sire, it will not do for you to be longer the voluntary King of the priests, or the involuntary King of fugitive noblemen!

The impression produced upon the Assembly spread rapidly through Paris.

That night the King went to the theatre with his children. He was received with thunders of applause.

Many wept; and even the King shed tears, he was so easily moved by his sensibilities.

During that night the King wrote to all the European powers to announce his acceptance of the Constitution of 1791. It will be remembered that once, in a moment of enthusiasm, he swore to support that Constitution, even before it was completed.

The next day Couthon remembered what he had promised the old Constitutional Assembly members the day before. He announced that he had a motion to make.

Everybody knew what Couthon's motions were, and everybody was silent.

"Citizens," said Couthon, "I move that every trace of privilege be effaced from this Assembly, and that consequently all the galleries be henceforth open to the public."

This motion was unanimously passed.

The next day the populace invaded the seats hitherto belonging to the outgoing Deputies; and in the face of this invasion, the ghost of the Constitutional Assembly vanished forever.

CHAPTER XXXII.

FRANCE AND FOREIGN PARTS.

As we have said before, the new Assembly was specially instructed to work against the priesthood and the nobility.

It was a genuine crusade; only the motto on the banners was not God so Decrees! but The People so Decree!

On October 9, the day of Lafayette's dismission, a report on the religious troubles in the Vendée was read by Gallois and Gensonné. It was wise and moderate, and thus made a deep impression.

Who had inspired such a document, — if, indeed, he were not its sole author? A keen and skilful politician, who will shortly enter the scenes depicted in our pages.

The Assembly was tolerant. One of the members, Fauchet, asked only that the State should cease to pay those priests who declared their unwillingness to obey the voice of the Nation, though pensions might be given to old and infirm priests, even if they continued to be refractory.

Ducos went farther. He demanded toleration. He insisted that the priests should be granted entire liberty, either to take or not to take the oath.

Farther still went the kind Constitutionalist Bishop Torne. He declared that even rebellious refusal, on the part of these priests, was a proof of their truth and honesty.

We shall presently see how the fanatics at Avignon responded to this forbearance.

Before the discussion about the Constitutionalist priests was fairly over, the question of the refugees was taken up in the Assembly. This was to transfer the debate from civil war to foreign, and so touch both of France's bleeding wounds.

Fauchet had treated the clerical question. Brissot took up the emigrant question.

Brissot took a stand both humane and elevated. He took up the question where Mirabeau had let it fall from his dying hands a year before.

He asked that a difference should be recognized between those who fled their country from fear, and those who went away in hate. For the former he asked indulgence; for the latter, severity.

In his opinion, it was not right to force citizens to remain within the kingdom. On the contrary, he thought it better to leave every door open.

He did not wish the confiscation of the estates, even of those who had emigrated through enmity to progressive principles. He only demanded that no funds should be paid over to those who were in arms against France.

Indeed it was a marvellous fact, that France continued to pay foreigners for their support of Condé, of Lambesq, of Charles de Lorraine, and their followers. In due time we shall see how the fugitives deserved this gentleness.

As Fauchet finished his speech, important news came from Avignon. As Brissot ended his speech, equally important intelligence came from other parts of Europe.

Then a bright light shone like an immense conflagration, from the land of the setting sun. This was the news from the West Indies, where France still held fast to certain islands.

Let us begin with the disturbances at Avignon. Let us narrate briefly the history of this second Rome.

Benedict the Eleventh died in a most scandalous fashion, in 1304. It was said that he was poisoned by eating some figs.

The King of France was Philip the Fourth, — Philip le Bel (the Fair), as he is always called.

Not many years before, when Boniface the Eighth was Pope, Philip the Fair had violently insulted him, through the hands of Prince Colonna, who was the ally of France; and in return Boniface placed Philip under the ban of the Papal See.

Now that a new pope was to be chosen, Philip the Fair kept his eyes keenly fixed on Perugia, where the electoral conclave was to be held.

For a long time Philip had cherished the idea of drawing the papal seat away from Rome, and establishing it in France. When once he had it in his own jail, so to speak, he could make the papacy work for his own profit. In the words of our great master, Michelet, the Pope might write lucrative ecclesiastical bulls for Philip, while displaying his own infallibility, and thus establish the Holy Ghost as the scribe and preceptor of the House of France, — that eldest daughter of the Church.

One day there came to Philip a messenger covered with dust, and so dead with fatigue that he could scarcely speak.

He brought this news. In the electoral conclave the French and Anti-French parties were so equally balanced that no pope could possibly be elected by the usual ballot; so there was talk about convening a new conclave, in some other city.

This idea did not suit the Perugians, who wanted to have a pope elected in their own city. They therefore resorted to an ingenious artifice. They placed a guard around the conclave, so that nobody could carry food or drink to the cardinals composing it, who were, as usual, in secret session. The cardinals uttered loud protests.

"Name your pope," cried the Perugians, "and you shall have plenty to eat and drink."

The cardinals held out twenty-four hours. At the end of twenty-four hours they had come to a decision.

They decided that the Anti-French party should choose three cardinals; and that out of the three the French party should choose one, who should be made pope.

Naturally enough, the Anti-French party nominated three enemies of Philip the Fair. One of these three enemies of Philip was Bertrand de Got, Archbishop of Bordeaux; who was, however, known to be far less the enemy of France than he was the friend to his own personal interests.

A messenger was at once sent to Philip with the news. It was the messenger who covered the ground in four days and nights, and arrived half dead with fatigue. There was no time to be lost. Bertrand de Got must be secured to Philip's interests. Philip accordingly sent to Bertrand de Got an express messenger — completely ignorant of the aim of the high mission with which he was charged — to ask the Archbishop to meet the King in the forest of Andelys.

The place of the meeting was at the crossing of three roads, and the night was dark enough for an incantation. It was under such conditions that those who seek superhuman favors of the Devil are obliged to swear allegiance as his liegeman, and kiss his cloven foot.

To quiet the Archbishop's suspicions, the interview began with a celebration of Mass. On the altar, at the moment of the elevation of the Sacred Host, — which announces the miracle of transubstantiation, and gives life to the service, — both King and Prelate swore themselves to secrecy. Then the candles were extinguished. Those who had celebrated the Mass withdrew, — followed by the altar-boys, carrying the crucifix and the sacred vases, — as if they feared it would be a profanation for them to be even mute witnesses of the scene about to take place.

The King and Archbishop remained alone.

Who told Villani the incidents we are about to describe, and which we gather from him? Satan, perhaps, who must have been a third party in that interview.

"Archbishop," said Philip le Bel to Bertrand de Got, "I can make thee pope, if I choose. That 's why I 've sought this meeting."

"The proof?" asked Bertrand.

"The proof is here!" and Philip showed a letter from the cardinals of his own party; wherein, instead of announcing their choice of a pope, they asked whom Philip wished them to vote for, out of the three candidates nominated.

"What must I do to be pope?" asked the Gascon, overcome with joy, and throwing himself at Philip's feet.

"Agree to grant me the six favors I ask."

"Speak, my sovereign! I am your subject, and it 's my duty to obey."

The King raised him, kissed him on his lips and said: "The six special favors which I ask of thee are as follows."

Bertrand listened with all his ears; for he feared, not so much lest the King should ask favors which would compromise the Archbishop's spiritual salvation, as those which were beyond his power to grant.

"The first favor," quoth Philip, "is that I shall be reconciled with Holy Church, and that my offence against Boniface Eighth, at Anagni, may be pardoned."

"Granted," was Bertrand's hasty response.

"Secondly, the holy sacrament of communion shall be administered to me and mine."

This was a great favor, for it will be remembered that Philip the Fair was under the ban of excommunication.

"Granted!" said Bertrand, astonished that such small rewards should be asked in return for a boon so great as the papal tiara. However, there were four other favors to come!

"Thirdly, the tithes of the clergy in my kingdom must be given to the Crown for the next five years, to help defray the cost of war with Flanders."

"Granted!"

"The fourth favor is that the bull issued by Boniface, and called Ausculta fili, shall be annulled and destroyed."

"Agreed! Agreed!"

"Fifthly, that Marco Jacopo, Messire Pietro de Colonna, and other friends of mine, shall be raised to the rank of cardinal."

"Granted! Granted! Granted!"

Then Philip paused.

"And the sixth favor, Monseigneur?" anxiously asked the Archbishop.

"The sixth," replied Philip, "I reserve for another time and place, for it is something very important and secret."

"Important and secret?" repeated Bertrand.

"So important and secret, that I wish to swear thee to it beforehand on the cross!" and drawing a crucifix from his pocket he presented it to the Archbishop.

The latter hesitated an instant. This was the last ditch to be crossed. Once over it, he would be supreme pontiff!

Presently he took the image of the Saviour in his hand, and said, in a firm voice: "I swear!"

"Very well!" said the King. "In which city of my kingdom wilt thou be crowned?"

"In Lyons!"

"Come with me! Thou art Pope, under the name of Clement the Fifth."

Clement the Fifth followed Philip the Fair, but he was uneasy about the sixth claim which his suzerain held in reserve.

On the day when this sixth demand was presented he found it to be a comparatively small matter, and made no difficulty about granting it. This favor was the destruction of the Order of Knights Templar.

The King had sworn to make Bertrand supreme pontiff; and to ensure the latter's faithfulness he had to leave a brother and two nephews in Philip's care, as hostages.

Probably all this was not quite after God's own heart, for the divine displeasure was manifested in a most decided way.

As the procession left the church after Clement Fifth's coronation, and was passing a wall loaded with spectators, the wall gave way, wounded the King, killed Brittany's Duke, and knocked down the Pope. His triple crown fell off, and this symbol of the papacy was rolled in the dirt.

A week later, in a banquet given by the new pontiff, the servants of his Holiness got into a quarrel with the attendants of some of the cardinals. The Pope's brother tried to separate them, and was killed.

These were bad omens; and to these omens was added a bad example.

The Pope fleeced the Church, but a woman fleeced the Pope. This woman was the beautiful Brunissande, who cost Christendom more than the Holy Land, — if we may trust the Chroniclers of that era.

Meanwhile the Pope kept his promises, one by one. The Pope whom Philip had created was a pontiff after Philip's own heart. For the King, he was a sort of hen laying golden eggs, whom his Majesty forced to lay both night and morning, threatening to cut her open if she did not attend strictly to business.

Every day, like Shylock in "The Merchant of Venice," he levied a pound of flesh from his debtor, according to the bond.

Boniface Eighth was declared to have been a heretic and a false pope. King Philip was relieved from his excommunication. The clerical tithes were remitted to the Crown for five years. Twelve cardinals were appointed, all devoted to Philip the Fair. The bull was revoked which Boniface Eighth had fulminated, and which alienated from Philip the ecclesiastical funds. The Order of Knights Templar was abolished, and the Templars put "in durance vile."

After all these things had been done according to agreement, it came to pass that on May Day, 1308, the Emperor of Germany, Albert of Austria, died. Then Philip conceived the idea of having his own brother, Charles of Valois, elected Emperor. It was the business of Clement Fifth to work for the accomplishment of this result.

The bondage of the pontifical hireling still continued. Bertrand's poor soul, saddled and bridled, was being ridden to Hell by the King of France.

He at last found spirit enough to throw his awful rider. Ostensibly Clement wrote in favor of Charles of Valois, for the imperial crown; but secretly he acted against him.

Thereafter he began to see the necessity of getting outside of France. The Pope's life was no longer secure in Philip's territory, especially as the accession of a dozen of Philip's friends to the College of Cardinals placed future papal elections wholly in Philip's hands.

The Fifth Clement remembered the figs which the Eleventh Benedict had eaten.

Clement was at Poitiers. He managed to escape in the night, and go to Avignon.

To explain the status of Avignon is no easy task. It was France, and yet it was not France. It was in France, yet not of it. It was a frontier, a neutral realm, an asylum, a city of refuge. It was an old principality, a republic, like San Marino; only it was ruled by two sovereigns: by the King of Naples, through his rights as Count of Provence; by the King of France, through his rights as Count of Toulouse.

Each of these two rulers held the lordship over one half of Avignon. Neither could arrest a fugitive on the soil governed by the other.

Clement Fifth naturally sought refuge in that part belonging to the King of Naples.

In escaping, however, from the power of Philip the Fair, he did not escape from the curse of the Grand Master of the Templars.

When Jacques de Molay ascended the pyre built for him in Paris, — in the Isle of the Cité in the River Seine, which is still the centre of the capital, — that noble man challenged his two executioners, Philip the Fair and Bertrand the Bold, to meet him at the divine Judgment Seat within the year. Aristophanes declares that dying men have the spirit of prophecy.

Clement was the first to obey this funereal summons. One night he had a vision of his palace in flames. Thereafter, says his biographer, "he was no longer gay, and did not last very long."

Seven months later it was Philip's turn. How did he die?

There are two versions of the story of his death. Both make it seem like the work of God's avenging hand.

The Chronicle, translated by Sauvage, relates that he died in the chase.

He saw a deer coming towards him, drew his sword, and pricked up his horse with his spurs; but instead of striking the deer, as he meant to do, he was carried by his steed straight against a tree, and with such violence that the good King fell to the earth, fatally wounded in the heart, and was taken at once to Corbeil.

At Corbeil, according to the Chronicles, his malady grew worse till he died. One might say that the malady could not well be graver.

On the other hand Guillaume of Nangis thus describes the death of the conqueror of Mons en Puelle.

Philip, King of France, was long afflicted with a malady, whose cause, unknown to his physicians, was a matter of surprise and wonderment both to them and to many others; though neither his pulse nor his urine indicated him to be in danger of death.

By his own desire he was at last transported to Fontainebleau, his birthplace. There, after receiving the sacrament with admirable fervor and devotion, in the presence and sight of a great number of his people, he happily surrendered his soul to his Creator, in the confession of the true and Catholic faith, in the thirtieth year of his reign, on Friday, on the eve of the Feast of Saint Andrew the Apostle.

It was not till Dante's time that a fit death was found for such a despicable man. According to that poet, Philip was gored to death by a wild boar.

He died by a boar's tusk, the robber whom we saw debasing the people's money on the banks of the Seine.

The popes who lived at Avignon after Clement Fifth, — John the Twenty-second, Benedict the Twelfth, Clement the Sixth, — waited for a chance to purchase Avignon. Such an occasion at last presented itself.

A young girl still in her minority, Jeanne of Naples, did not exactly sell Avignon to the papacy, but she gave it up, in return for the papal absolution granted to her lovers for an assassination they had committed in her behalf.

When she reached her years of majority she undertook to reclaim the territory; but Clement the Sixth held it, and held it successfully, — so successfully that when Gregory the Eleventh, in 1377, restored the seat of the papacy to Rome, Avignon was still governed by a papal legate, and remained a vassal to the Holy See.

This was the condition of things in 1791, when the events happened which are the cause of this long digression.

As in the times when Avignon was divided between the King of France, as Count of Toulouse, and the King of Naples, as Count of Provence, so in 1791 there were two Avignons in Avignon, — the Avignon of the priests, and the Avignon of the commonalty.

In the priestly Avignon there were a hundred churches, two hundred cloisters, and a papal palace. Its many bells were ready to sound an alarm or to ring for worship.

In the commercial Avignon there was a river, the Rhone, and there were silk-factories. There were two main roads which crossed each other, one running from west to east, from Nismes to Turin, the other running from north to south, from Lyons to Marseilles.

In this unfortunate town it might be said there were two sorts of French people, — the King's French and the Pope's French.

The Frenchmen of France were French indeed and in truth. The Frenchmen of Italy were almost Italians.

The French Frenchmen — that is, the traders and artisans — had to give themselves entirely to business, and work hard for the sustenance of themselves and their families; and then they hardly succeeded in their efforts.

The Italian French — that is, the ecclesiastics — had all the riches and power. They were the priests, the bishops, the archbishops, and absentee cardinals, off duty, — idle, elegant, bold, immoral ladies' men. They were masters among the women of the people, who knelt before them to kiss their white hands as they passed along the streets, and whom they misled practically and doctrinally. Among the higher classes they were gallants among the titled dames and autocrats of the salon.

Do you wish for a type of this class of priests?

Take the handsome Abbé Maury. He was a Franco-Italian of that sort, if one ever lived. He was the son of a shoemaker, but he was as aristocratic as Duke Lauzun, as haughty as Clermont Tonnerre, as saucy as any lackey.

Commonly, in all regions, children love those who live about them. This they do naturally before they become adults, and develop strong masculine and feminine passions. At Avignon, on the contrary, children were born with hatred in their souls.

On September 14, 1791, — while the Constitutional Assembly was still in session, — a royal decree was issued which united (or reunited, rather) Avignon and the whole County of Venaisin to the Kingdom of France.

During the year previous Avignon had been sometimes in the hands of the French party, and sometimes in the hands of the Anti-French party.

The storm burst forth in 1790. One night the Papists — the Italian French — amused themselves by hanging an effigy decorated with the Revolutionary tricolor, — the red, white, and blue.

By the art of man the Rhone had been deflected from its ancient course, for purposes of traffic and manufacture. The Durance had also been made navigable. Barriers had been constructed to restrain the swift destructive streams which were liable to rush from the heights of Ventoux, in the thawing days of spring. But when once the living human torrent in Avignon broke through its bounds, who could check its headlong and turbulent course?

All Avignon was in commotion over the sight which that morning brought to their eyes, — an image wearing the National colors, yet dangling like a criminal at the rope's end. Out of the Patriotic homes of Avignon came the people, clamorous with rage.

Four Papists, suspected of this indignity, were dragged from their houses, — two noblemen, one tradesman, and one mechanic, — and all four were hanged in place of the manikin. This was on June 11, 1790, just before the great Federation at Paris.

The French party had for its leaders two young men, Duprat and Mainvielle, and an older man, named Lescuyer.

Lescuyer was a Frenchman, in the fullest sense of the term. He was from Picardy, and possessed the opposite characteristics of impulsiveness and deep reflection. At Avignon he was established as a notary, and served as the secretary to the municipality.

These three chiefs raised some troops, two or three thousand perhaps, and with them made an expedition against Carpentras, — an expedition which did not well succeed.

A shower of ice-cold rain, mingled with hail, — such as sometimes falls from Mount Ventoux, — dispersed the forces of Mainvielle, Duprat, and Lescuyer, as the northern tempest dispersed the famous Invincible Armada, which Philip the Second sent against England in the days of Good Queen Bess.

What caused this miraculous shower, powerful enough to scatter the Revolutionary army? The Madonna!

Remember, dear reader, that Avignon was like Italy, where miracles were the daily bread of life. As Italy was both poetic and chivalrous, everything must have some reference to the Madonna. If there were no real miracles, some must be invented; for the mind, the heart, the tongue of Italy were filled with these two words, Miracle and Madonna. However, Duprat, Mainvielle, and Lescuyer, so strongly suspected a Catelan, one Chevalier Patus, of having efficaciously seconded the Madonna in her miracle, that they credited him with all the honor thereof.

At Avignon justice was sometimes wreaked upon treason. They often killed traitors. Patus was killed!

Now who made up the army representing the French party? Peasants, porters, deserters.

They searched for a man to command these common men. Such a man they thought they found in Matthew Jouve, who preferred to be called Jourdan. He was born at Saint Just, near the town of Puy in Velay. He was first a muleteer among the steep hills near his native town. Next he was a soldier, but without any experience of war, which might have humanized him. Then he kept a wineshop in Paris. At Avignon he traded in madder, so much used by the clothmakers and dyers.

He was a braggart of murders, a boaster of crimes. He displayed a big sabre, wherewith he said he had cut off the head of the Governor of the Bastille the year before, and also of the two royal bodyguards at Versailles on the Sixth of October.

Half in jest, half in fear, the people added the name of Headsman to the surname of Jourdan which he claimed.

Duprat, Mainvielle, Lescuyer, and their General Jourdan Headsman remained so long in control of the city that people began to be less afraid of them.

A widespread conspiracy was formed against them, a conspiracy crafty and mysterious, as are all priestly conspiracies. Religious fanaticism was roused against the Revolutionists.

The wife of a French Patriot gave birth to an armless babe. A rumor was circulated that the father had once broken off the arms of a silver angel which he was confiscating by night from a church. This imperfect child was therefore a token of the just vengeance of offended Heaven.

The father was obliged to hide, or they would have cut him in pieces, without even asking when and from what church, if any, the angel had been stolen.

Everywhere the Madonna seemed to protect Royalists, whether they were called Papists in Avignon, or called themselves Chouans (brown owls) in the distant province of Brittany.

In 1789 the Madonna in a church on the Rue Bac began to weep.

In 1790 she appeared behind an old oak-tree, in the Bocage (thicket) of the department of Vendée.

In 1791 she dispersed the troops of Duprat and Mainvielle, by driving sleet into their faces.

Lastly, in the church belonging to the Cordelier Monks at Avignon, she was seen to blush, doubtless with shame over the religious indifference of the inhabitants of the city.

This last miracle, attested by all the women, — the men had no great faith in it, — had already lifted the public mind to a great height, when a far different rumor spread throughout Avignon.

A great chest of valuables had been carried outside the town. This roused public curiosity. By the next day there was no longer one chest; there were six. By the second day it was said that eighteen full chests had been carried away.

What treasure did these eighteen coffers contain? Property belonging to Mont de Piété (Mount of Piety, or Pity), the government pawnshop. A porter let out the secret that the French party meant to evacuate Avignon, and wished to take these valuable pledges with them.

At this news a storm of wind passed through the city. This wind was the famous Avignon cry of zou-zou, heard in every popular outbreak, — a cry which was like a cross between a tiger's roar and a snake's hiss.

Everybody was so poor in Avignon (outside the ecclesiastical party) that nearly every family had some article in pledge at the great pawnshop; and robbery of its stores meant the robbery of the poor, of the fatherless and the widow. However small the forfeiture, everybody felt himself ruined. The rich are ruined by the loss of a million francs, the poor by the loss of a rag. All is relative.

This outbreak was on October 16, 1791. As it was Sunday morning, all the peasants of the neighborhood had come to Mass in the city. At that period everybody went armed; consequently all were ready for a fight. The moment was well chosen.

The game, moreover, was cleverly played. It appeared to be no longer a question between the French and Anti-French parties, but public sentiment was roused against robbers, — robbers guilty of the infamous crime of stealing from the poor.

The rabble rushed into the Cordelier church. Peasants and porters, white, red, and tricolored in politics, shouted for the municipal officers to at once publish their brokerage accounts, through their secretary Lescuyer.

Why did the popular wrath vent itself on Lescuyer? Nobody knows. When a life is to be violently sacrificed, there is always some fatal haphazard in the selection.

Suddenly Lescuyer was brought into the middle of the church. He was seeking a shelter in the townhouse when he was recognized and arrested, — no, not arrested, but driven into the church by kicks and cuffs and blows. Once inside the church, the unfortunate man, pale but nevertheless cool and calm, mounted a pulpit, and undertook to justify himself.

One would suppose it easy to do so by saying: "Open the storehouse, and let the people see for themselves that all the articles which we are accused of stealing are still there in safety."

Instead of this he began as follows: "My brethren, I believe the Revolution necessary, and have therefore aided it with all my might — "

They let him go no farther, for his enemies feared he would justify himself. He was interrupted by the terrible zou-zou, harsh as the awful storm known as the mistral, the northwest wind of the Mediterranean Sea.

A porter sprang up behind him into the pulpit, and threw Lescuyer down into the crowd. From that moment the tallyho of death was sounded.

They dragged him towards the altar. It was there the Revolutionist was to be butchered, for such a sacrifice must be acceptable to the Madonna, in whose name all this was going on. In the chancel, still alive, he escaped from the hands of his assassins, and took refuge in one of the canonical stalls behind a desk.

Some charitable hand passed him something to write with, as if he could write what he had not time to speak.

Unexpected aid gave him a brief respite. A Breton gentleman, who was on a journey to Marseilles, accidentally entered the church, and was seized with pity for the poor victim. With the courage and foolhardiness of a Breton he tried to save him. Twice or thrice he thrust aside the knives and clubs raised to strike Lescuyer, and called out: "Gentlemen, in the name of the law! Gentlemen, in the name of honor! Gentlemen, in the name of humanity!"

Then the knives and clubs were turned upon the Breton himself; but in the very thick of the assault he shielded poor Lescuyer with his body and still shouted: "Gentlemen, in the name of humanity!"

At last the rabble, tired at being so long kept from their prey, seized upon the gentleman himself, and dragged him along, intending to hang him; but three men rescued the stranger and shouted: "Let us finish with Lescuyer first. We can find this other fellow any time."

The scoundrels acknowledged the justness of this reasoning, and let the Breton alone. Then his rescuers forced him to save himself. His name was Monsieur de Rosély.

Lescuyer had no time to write. Even if he had time for it, his billet would not have been read. The tumult was too great.

In the midst of this tumult Lescuyer noticed a little door of egress behind the altar. If he could reach this door he might yet be saved. In a second, when they supposed him crushed by terror, he darted towards this door.

So surprising was this unexpected movement that he nearly reached the door; but there, at the very foot of the altar, a ribbon-maker struck him such a terrible blow with his club that the club was broken. Lescuyer fell stunned, like an ox beneath the sledge-hammer. He rolled just where they had wished him to be, — to the base of the altar.

Then, as if to punish the lips which had uttered blasphemous cheers for Liberty, the women cut and slashed those lips into strips; while the men, with that grim humor for which Southern France has sometimes been noteworthy, danced on his body, and crushed him with stones like Saint Stephen, singing the while with fiendish joy.

"Pardon, my brothers! Mercy, my sisters! In the name of humanity, in the name of the Virgin above, let me die!" This was the prayer which came from his lacerated lips.

This was asking too much; for the rabble meant that their victim should live in agony.

This went on till evening. For five hours the mangled victim lay there beneath the altar, suffering the agonies of death, while brutal jeers and laughter surged about him.

This is the news which reached the National Assembly in response to the philanthropic speech made by Fauchet.

It is true that very different intelligence came a day later.

Duprat and Jourdan were notified as to what was going on. Where could they find their scattered forces?

Duprat had an idea, — to sound the alarm on that famous silvern bell, which was rung only on two occasions, — the death or consecration of a pope.

It gave forth a strange and mysterious sound, rarely heard. This sound produced two entirely opposite effects. It chilled the hearts of the Papists. It gave courage to the Revolutionists.

At the sound of this bell, an unfamiliar tocsin, the country folks who were in the city rushed out of it, and fled to their several homes.

By this silvern alarm Jourdan was able to get together some three hundred soldiers. He took possession of the city gates, and left a hundred and fifty men to guard them.

With the other one hundred and fifty he marched upon the Cordelier church. He had two pieces of artillery. These he brought to bear upon the rabble, shooting and killing at random.

Then he entered the church. The church was deserted; but Lescuyer lay moaning at the feet of the Virgin, — the Madonna who had done so many miracles, and even blushed, but did not deign to stretch forth her divine arm to rescue this wretched man. It seemed as if he could not die. That bloody heap of flesh, one mass of wounds, still clung to life.

As they bore him through the streets, the people everywhere closed their windows as the escort passed by; and they shouted: "I was n't there at the Cordelier church!"

Jourdan, with his one hundred and fifty men, could have crushed Avignon, and its thirty thousand inhabitants, so great was the general cowardice. They did, on a small scale, what Marat and Panis did at Paris, on a large scale, on September 2, 1792.

By-and-by it will be seen why we say Marat and Panis, instead of Marat and Danton.

Jourdan and his men drove seventy or eighty unfortunate victims into the pontifical dungeons in the Glacière Tower, — a name which indicates their dismal and icy comfort, — the Trouillas Tower, as it is called in those parts.

Such was the news which reached Paris, and caused Lescuyer's death to be forgotten in the darkness of such awful reprisals.

As to the emigrants, whom Brissot defended, and to whom he wished to throw open the doors of France, let us see what they busied themselves about in foreign parts.

They reconciled Prussia with Austria, and made friends of these natural-born enemies.

They persuaded Russia to forbid the French ambassador from showing himself in the streets of Saint Petersburg, and sent a minister to the refugees at Coblentz.

They compelled Berne to punish an old Swiss for singing the Revolutionary song, Ça ira.

They persuaded Geneva, the birthplace of Rousseau, — who had done so much for the Revolution which was still in the process of evolution in France, — to direct its cannon against that country.

They compelled the Bishop of Liége to refuse to receive the French ambassador.

All this was brought about by the Royalist refugees; but other things foreign governments did on their own account against the interests of France.

Russia and Sweden returned to Louis Sixteenth, with the seal unbroken, the despatch in which he announced his adhesion to the Constitution.

Spain also refused to receive it; and delivered into the hands of the Inquisition a Revolutionary Frenchman, who only by suicide evaded the torture known as the San Benito, whereby delinquents are arrayed in yellow gowns, decorated with black and grotesque figures, and then delivered to the arm of the civil power, for the punishment of the stake.

Venice threw into Saint Mark's Square the corpse of a man strangled in the night, by order of the Council of Ten. On the breast of the dead man was a scroll with this inscription:

Strangled as a Free Mason.

The Emperor of Germany and King of Prussia responded to the French King's missive, but they did so with a menace:

> We desire that this may be a warning as to the necessity of taking serious precautions against the renewal of a condition of things which makes such deplorable results possible.

In the Vendée, — that is, on the Atlantic coast of France, along the Adour River, — there was civil war. The Vendeans, wedded to the old régime, were in arms against the Revolutionary Government; and they were assisted by the Chouans, who were smugglers or Royalists, as best served their turn, and probably took their owlish name from the warning signal which was imitated from that bird, and which they used to give notice when the enemy was nigh.

There was also a local civil war at Avignon.

As for foreign wars, they were on every side.

From the other side of the Atlantic came the cries of the entire population of an island, who were being slaughtered.

What was happening over there in the West? Who were these black slaves, weary of stripes, who were taking their turn at killing? They were Saint Domingo negroes, entering on a bloody revenge.

How did this state of things come about? In two words, — that is, in a less prolix fashion than we have been led into in reference to Avignon, for Avignon has decidedly carried us off our feet, — in two words, we will explain the situation.

The new Constitution promised freedom to the negroes.

Ogé, a young mulatto, — one of those brave hearts, as earnest and devoted as any I have ever heard of, — recrossed the seas, carrying with him the decree of emancipation as soon as it was voted.

Although the official sanction of these decrees had not yet been sent to the West Indies, in his haste for freedom Ogé clamored for the Governor to proclaim liberty to the oppressed.

The Governor ordered Ogé's arrest, and Ogé sought a refuge in the Spanish part of the island.

The Spanish authorities, — we know full well how Spain felt about the Revolution, — the Spanish authorities gave him up. Ogé was broken alive on the wheel.

This torture was followed by terror among the whites, who supposed he had many accomplices in the island. The planters made themselves the judges, and executions multiplied.

One night sixty thousand negroes rose in an insurrection. The whites were awakened by an immense conflagration, sweeping over their plantations. A week elapsed before the fire was quenched in blood.

What could France do, poor salamander, thus encircled with fire? We shall see!

CHAPTER XXXIII.

WAR.

In his splendid and energetic speech about the refugees, Brissot clearly exposed the intentions of the European sovereigns, and the sort of death they kept in reserve for the French Revolution.

Would they attempt to fight it down? No, they would stifle it!

Then he pictured the European league. He depicted a circle of sovereigns, some of them sword in hand, frankly flinging to the breeze their banners of hate; the others covering their faces with mantles of hypocrisy, till they should feel strong enough to unmask.

After thus describing the situation Brissot said: "Well, so be it! Not only do we accept the challenge of monarchical Europe, but we anticipate it. We will not wait for the attack. We will make the attack!"

At this appeal an immense burst of applause greeted the orator.

Being a man of instinctive intuition, rather than a man of genius, Brissot had expressed a most fervent thought, and his words echoed the deep-seated idea of duty which had guided France in the elections of 1791, — war! — not a war of egotistical vanity, instigated by a despot, in revenge for some insult to his throne, his name, his allies, or waged for the purpose of adding another submissive province to his kingdom or empire; but a war which carries with it the breath of life, — a war whose clarion-blasts everywhere seem to say: "Arise, ye who would be free! We bring you liberty!"

The world began to hear a great murmur, which rose and increased, like the roar of the sea.

This murmur was the undertone of thirty millions of minds, which had not yet spoken out plainly, but were already muttering deeply; and this growling Brissot voiced by his words: "We will not wait for the attack! We will make the attack!"

When these threatening words met with a universal national response, France was strong, — able not only to attack, but to conquer. There remained only questions of detail to be considered.

Our readers are already aware that this is a historic work which we are making, rather than a romance. We shall never probably recur again to this great epoch, to which are related two stories already published, "Blanche de Beaulieu" and "Chevalier de Maison-Rouge," — and one other story, written three years ago, but not yet published, which will most certainly appear, however, in due season.

We ought briefly to explain the occurrences embraced in that epoch. Nevertheless we must pass rapidly over minor questions, in order to promptly reach those events which remain to be described, with which the personages in our book are particularly concerned.

The recital of the events in the Vendée, of the massacre at Avignon, of the insults from various European countries, came like thunderbolts upon the Legislative Assembly.

On October 20 Brissot was contented to propose the imposition of a tax on the property of refugees. On the twenty-fifth Condorcet urged the confiscation of their goods, and also the exaction of the civil oath. Think of asking such an oath from men living outside France, and in arms against her!

This brought forward two Deputies, one of whom became the Mirabeau of the new Assembly, and the other its Barnave. These two able men were Vergniaud and Isnard.

Vergniaud was one of those poetic characters, tender and sympathetic, which Revolutions always bring to the surface. A native of fertile Limoges, he was mild, moderate, and affectionate, rather than passionate. Well and happily born, he was singled out by Turgot, the Intendant of Limousin, and placed in important positions at Bordeaux. His utterances were less acrid, less powerful than Mirabeau's. Although inspired by Greek literature, and somewhat surcharged with mythology, he was less prolix and less partisan than Barnave.

What made his eloquence vivacious and influential was the humane tone which forever vibrated within it. At the Assembly, in the midst of his sublimest and most indignant appeals from the rostrum, his breast always sent forth the accents of nature and piety. The leader of an aggressive, noisy, disputatious party, he always rose calmly and majestically above the situation, even when that situation was critical or even fatal.

Vergniaud's enemies called him undecided, unstable, and generally indolent. They inquired the whereabouts of his soul, which seemed ever to be absent. They were right. His soul was never under his own control, unless he made an effort to bind it within his breast. His whole heart was with a woman, — straying over her lips, coming to the light through her eyes. Only in the harp of the beautiful, the good, the charming Candeille did his soul vibrate with life.

Isnard was the opposite of Vergniaud. If Vergniaud was the Tranquillity of the Assembly, then Isnard was its Wrath.

Born at Grasse, in the country of perfumes and gales, he had the hasty and choleric temperament of that giant of the air, the mistral, which in the same breath uproots the rocks and pets the roses.

His voice, previously unknown, broke upon the Assembly like one of those unexpected thunderclaps which usher in the earliest storms of summer. At the first accent of his tongue, all the members of the Assembly were impressed. The most preoccupied among them trembled like Samuel, when he heard the voice of Jehovah, and was ready to say : " Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth ! "

Somebody presently interrupted him.

" I ask the Assembly, I ask France, I ask the world, — I ask you, Monsieur," — and he pointed to the member who had spoken, — " I ask if there is anybody, who, in good faith, in the secret recesses of his conscience, will maintain that the emigrant princes are not conspiring against their country. In the second place, I ask if there is any one in the Assembly who dares maintain that the man who conspires against his country ought not to be immediately indicted, arrested, and punished. If there is such an one, let him stand up ! "

After an impressive pause he resumed his speech.

" We are told that strength should be indulgent, that certain great national powers are disarming; but I say unto you, Watch ! Despotism and Monarchism are neither dead nor asleep. If the nations sleep an instant, they will awake in chains. The most unpardonable crimes are those which aim to restore men to bondage. If the lightnings of heaven were in the human grasp, they should strike those who molest popular liberty."

This was the first time such words had been uttered within those walls. Isnard's savage eloquence carried everything before it, as the Alpine avalanche drags trees, herds, shepherds, and houses in its downward course.

Before the session ended, the following decree was voted:

That if Louis Stanislaus Xavier, a French Prince commonly called Monsieur, does not return within two months, he shall forfeit his claim to the Regency.

On November 8 another vote was passed:

Those refugees who do not return by January 1, 1792, will be declared guilty of conspiracy, and will be liable to arrest and punishment by death should they return thereafter.

On November 29 came the turn of the priesthood.

The civil oath must be taken before the expiration of eight days.

Those who refuse to take it will be regarded as ripe for revolt, and recommended to the watchguard of the authorities.

If they live in a community where there are religious disturbances, the Directory of the Department may cause their removal from their ordinary places of residence.

If they disobey, they shall be imprisoned for a year or more. If they incite others to disobedience, they shall be imprisoned for two years.

If it becomes necessary to maintain an armed force in any community, that community must defray the expenses thereof.

Churches must be used only for forms of worship supported by the state. Churches not needed for this purpose may be sold for other religious uses, but not to persons who refuse the oath of Constitutional allegiance.

The municipalities shall send to the departments, and the departments shall transmit to the Assembly, full lists both of those priests who do and those who do not take the oath, with notes as to any conspiracy which may exist between priests and refugees, in order that the Assembly may be advised as to the best means of extirpating rebellion.

The Assembly looks with approval upon such writings as tend to enlighten the people as to questions ostensibly religious. Such works shall be printed, and their authors recompensed.

We have already shown what became of the Constitutionists, — or Constitutionalists, as they were formerly called, — the members of the defunct Constitutional Assembly. We have shown with what object the Feuillant Club was founded. The spirit of both these parties was wholly in accord with the disposition of the leaders of the Department of Paris. This was the spirit of Barnave, Lafayette, Lameth, Duport, and also of Bailly, who was still Mayor, though his term was nearly ended.

In the decrees against the priests, — decrees which they said were contrary to the public conscience, — and in the decrees against the refugees, — which they said were inimical to family bonds, — these conservative politicians saw a means of testing the King's authority.

A protest against these edicts was prepared by the Feuillants and signed by the Directory of Paris, in which Louis the Sixteenth was specially asked to veto the decree concerning the priesthood.

It will be remembered that the Constitution reserved to the King the right of veto.

Who signed this protest? The man who had been the first to attack the clergy, — that Mephistopheles whose clubfoot had broken the ice of opposition to the vested rights of the clergy, in whose ranks he belonged. This was Talleyrand, a man whose example makes it evident that the magnifying-glass of diplomacy does not see clearly in revolutionary times.

The rumor of this royal veto was spread abroad prematurely.

The Cordeliers pushed forward Camille Desmoulins, that free lance of the Revolution, who was ever ready to couch his spear against any fair game.

He also prepared a petition; but as he was liable to sputter when he tried to speak, he asked Fauchet to read it for him.

Fauchet read it; and it was applauded from end to end.

It would be difficult to treat the question with more irony, and at the same time more profoundly. He was Danton's friend, and the college comrade of Robespierre. This is what he said:

We do not complain, either of the Constitution for giving the King the power of the veto, or of the King for using that power. We recall the maxim of that great politician Machiavelli: "Even if the Prince ought to renounce his sovereignty, his subjects would be too cruel, too unjust, if they should blame him for persistently opposing the general will, inasmuch as it is contrary to nature that a man should voluntarily fall from a higher station to a lower."

Penetrated with this truth, taking the example of God himself, whose commandments are never impossible, we should not exact from the ex-sovereign an impossible love for the popular sovereignty of the Nation, and we should not take it ill of him if he affixes his veto to the best edicts of the Assembly.

As we have said, the Assembly applauded, adopted this declaration, decreed its insertion in the official report, and sent that report to the departments.

That night the Feuillants were in commotion. Many members of the club, though also members of the Assembly, had not been present at the session.

The next day those who had been absent the day before were in their places at the Assembly. They numbered two hundred and sixty. Amid a storm of howls and hisses from the galleries, the edict of the day before was annulled.

This meant war between the Assembly and the Feuillants, and led the Assembly to lean more and more upon the New Jacobins, represented by Robespierre, and the Cordeliers, represented by Danton.

Danton constantly gained in popularity. His monstrous head began to show itself above the crowd. A giant Adamastor, he towered in the path of royalty to say: "Beware! The sea which thou art navigating is called the Sea of Tempests!"

Suddenly the Queen came to the aid of the Jacobins against the Feuillants.

The animosities of Marie Antoinette were, to the Revolution, what squalls and flurries are to the great Atlantic.

Marie Antoinette hated Lafayette, — Lafayette, who had saved the royal family at Versailles on October 5, 1789, and lost his popularity, for the sake of the Court, by firing upon the populace on July 17, 1791.

Lafayette wished to succeed Bailly as Mayor of Paris. Instead of helping Lafayette, the Queen advised the Royalists to vote in favor of Pétion, — strange blindness! — of Pétion, her brutal companion during the return from Varennes!

On December 19 the King presented himself at the Assembly, bringing his veto of the decree against the priesthood.

The evening before, there had been a serious demonstration at the Jacobin Club.

A Swiss named Virchaux, from Neuchâtel, — the same man who, at the Champ de Mars, wrote out the petition for a republic, — offered the society a Damascus sword, destined for the first general who should win a victory over the enemies of liberty.

Isnard was there. He took the sword from the young Republican, drew the blade from its sheath, and sprang to the platform, crying out: "Behold the sword of the exterminating angel! It will be victorious! France will lift up her great voice and the nations will reply. The earth will be covered with warriors. Freedom's foes will be blotted from the list of mankind!"

The prophet Ezekiel could not have preached better.

The drawn sword was never replaced in its sheath. Twofold hostilities were declared, at home and abroad.

The Neuchâtel Republican's sword was first to smite the King of France, and then the kings of other lands.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

A MINISTER AFTER MADAME DE STAËL'S OWN HEART.

GILBERT had not seen the Queen since the day when she begged him to wait for her an instant in her room, and then left him, in order to listen to a political scheme, brought from Vienna by Monsieur de Breteuil, and couched in the following terms:

Treat Barnave like Mirabeau. Gain time, by swearing to support the Constitution, and by executing it to the letter, so as to show its impracticability. France will cool off and get weary. The French are feather-brained. They will take up with some new fad, and Liberty will go its way; or if Liberty is not forgotten, a year will be gained, and in a year we shall be ready for war.

Six months had rolled away since that date, and it was now in the winter of 1791–1792. Liberty had not been forgotten; and evidently foreign sovereigns were preparing to fulfil their promises and be ready for war.

One morning Gilbert was astonished to receive a visit from one of the royal chamberlains. At first Gilbert thought the King must be ill, and had sent for him professionally.

The chamberlain reassured the Doctor, and said he was simply wanted at the palace.

Gilbert insisted upon knowing who wanted him; but the chamberlain, doubtless acting under instructions, would only repeat his formula, that Gilbert was "wanted at the palace."

Gilbert was warmly attached to the King; whereas he pitied Marie Antoinette more as a woman than as a queen. She inspired him with neither love nor devotion, but moved him to deep compassion.

Gilbert hastened to obey the summons, and was introduced into the basement story, where Barnave had formerly been received.

In an armchair a lady was waiting, who rose when she saw Gilbert.

He recognized Madame Elizabeth, for whom he had great respect, well knowing the angelic goodness of her heart.

Gilbert bowed, at once taking in the situation. Neither the King nor Queen wishing to send for him in their own names, they had evidently made a convenience of Madame Elizabeth.

So he imagined; but her first words suggested that he was wrong in his conjectures.

"Monsieur Gilbert," she said, "I know not if others have forgotten the marks of interest which you displayed towards my brother at the time of our return from Versailles, two years ago, and towards my sister, on our return from Varennes last summer; but I, for one, remember these services."

Gilbert bowed and said: "Madame, God has chosen, in his wisdom, to give you all the virtues, even those of memory and gratitude, — rare virtues in these days, especially with crowned heads."

"You surely do not say that of my brother, Monsieur Gilbert? My brother often talks of you, and greatly values your experience."

"As a physician?" asked Gilbert, smiling.

"As a physician, — yes, Monsieur! but he believes your experience may be useful for the King's health and the kingdom's at the same time."

"The King is very kind, Madame. For which patient am I now summoned?"

"It is not the King who has summoned you, but myself," said she, blushing a trifle; for her pure spirit could not tell an utter falsehood.

"You, Madame? Oh, your health need not trouble you in the least. Your pallor arises from fatigue and anxiety, not from disease."

"You are right, Monsieur, and it is n't for myself I tremble, but for my brother. He worries me very much indeed, Monsieur."

"And myself also!" responded Gilbert.

"But our anxiety does not probably come from the same source. I must tell you that what disturbs me is the King's health."

"The King is ill?"

"No, not exactly! but he is depressed, discouraged. Listen! It is now ten days, — you see I count by days, — it is now ten days since he has spoken a single word, except with me. Even in his customary game of backgammon he only speaks such words as are indispensable to the game."

"It is now eleven days," said Gilbert, "since he went to the Assembly with his veto. Why did he not become speechless on the morning of that day, instead of losing his tongue the day after?"

"Did you then suppose," said Elizabeth, with alacrity, "that my brother could sanction such an impious decree?"

"My opinion is, that to put the King in the same boat with the priesthood, in the face of the rising sea and the coming storm, is to compel King and priesthood to be overwhelmed in the same deluge."

"But in the place of my poor brother, what would you do?"

"Madame, there is now one political party which is growing as rapidly as that gigantic afrite of which we read in the Arabian Nights story. He was at first enclosed in a small casket; but in the hour after the casket was opened he expanded a hundred-fold."

"You speak of the Jacobins, Monsieur?"

Gilbert shook his head. "No, I refer to the Girondists, — so named, because their leaders come from the department of France called the Gironde. The Jacobins do not wish for war. The Girondists demand it. War is a national affair."

"War? War with whom? My God, — war with our brother the Emperor? — with the King of Spain, our nephew? Our enemies, Monsieur Gilbert, are in France, not outside; and in proof of it — "

Madame Elizabeth hesitated. "Speak, Madame!" said Gilbert.

"I do not know, in truth, how to tell you, Doctor; and yet it is precisely for this that I have sent for you."

"You can trust me, Madame, as a man ready to give his life for the King."

"Monsieur, do you believe there is an antidote to poisons?"

Gilbert smiled. "A universal antidote? No, Madame! Every poisonous substance has its own antidote; although it must be said, in a general way, that these antidotes are powerless."

"Oh, my God!"

"In the first place, it is necessary to know whether the poison is vegetable or mineral. Usually mineral poisons take hold of the stomach and other digestive organs, while vegetable poisons affect the nervous system. The mineral poisons excite and inflame the parts they affect, while the vegetable poisons stupefy. Of what poison do you speak, Madame?"

"Listen, for I am telling you a great secret, a very great secret, Monsieur."

"I am listening, Madame."

"I fear they are trying to poison the King."

"Whom do you suppose guilty of such a crime?"

"This is what has happened. You know the Superintendent of the Civil List, Monsieur Laporte?"

"Yes, Madame!"

"Well, Monsieur Laporte has warned us that a man who belongs in the royal household, and is also connected with a pastry-cook's establishment in the Palace Royal, is a frightful Jacobin, and has been heard to say openly, that it would be a great thing for France if somebody should poison the King."

"Generally, Madame, people who wish to commit such crimes do not boast of it in advance."

"Oh Monsieur! but it would be so easy to poison the King. Fortunately, the man whom we distrust only has charge of the pastry in the palace."

"You have taken some precautions, Madame?"

"Yes. It has been decided that the King shall eat only roasted meats; that bread shall be brought from Ville d'Avray by Monsieur Thierry, the Superintendent of the Small Apartments, who at the same time is to furnish the wine. As to pastry, as the King likes it, Madame Campan has received orders to buy it as if for herself, sometimes at one shop and sometimes at another. We have been advised to be on our guard especially against powdered sugar!"

"Because arsenic can be more readily mixed with it, without being noticed?"

"Precisely. It was the Queen's habit to sweeten her water with this sugar, but this custom we have entirely discontinued. The King, Queen, and myself eat together. We dispense with the constant attendance of the servants. If anything is needed, we ring for it. While we are at table Madame Campan, by a private entrance, brings in the bread, pastry, and wine. We hide these things under the table, and pretend to drink the wine from the cellar, and the bread and pastry baked purposely for us. That 's the way we live; and we tremble all the time, the Queen and I, lest we should see the King suddenly turn pale, and hear him say that he is in pain."

"First," said the Doctor, "let me say that I take no stock in these threats of poison. Nevertheless, I put myself entirely at the disposal of their Majesties. What does the King wish? Does he wish me to have a chamber in the palace? I could do so, and thus be on hand for any moment I might be needed, until the King's fears —"

"Oh, my brother fears nothing," said Madame Elizabeth, quickly.

"I was wrong, Madame. I should have said, until your fears are over. I have had some experience with poisons and antidotes. I will hold myself in readiness to fight the poison, whatever its nature; but permit me to add, Madame, that the King, if he so chooses, will soon have nothing to fear."

"How can that be brought about?" said a voice which did not belong to Madame Elizabeth, and whose resonant and positive tones made Gilbert look around. The Doctor was not mistaken. That voice was the Queen's.

Gilbert bowed and said: "Madame, is it needful to repeat to the Queen my protestations of devotion, just now made to Madame Elizabeth?"

"No, Monsieur, no. I have heard all. I wish chiefly to know what disposition you still maintain towards us."

"The Queen doubts the stability of my sentiments?"

"Oh, Monsieur! So many heads and hearts have been alienated from us by this boisterous wind, that one scarcely knows who is trustworthy!"

"And is it for this reason that the Queen accepts, from the Feuillant Club, a minister recommended by Madame de Staël?"

The Queen started as she said: "You know that?"

"I hear that your Majesty is making arrangements with Monsieur de Narbonne."

"And I suppose you blame me?"

"No, Madame! As well make this effort as some other. When the King has tried everything else, perhaps he 'll end where he ought to have begun."

"You are acquainted with Madame de Staël, Monsieur?" asked the Queen.

"I have that honor, Madame. When I left the Bastille I was presented to her by Monsieur Necker, her father, from whom I learned that my arrest and imprisonment had been at the Queen's instigation."

The Queen reddened perceptibly, and then said, with a smile: "We once agreed not to revert to that error."

"I do not recall the error, Madame! I only reply to the question the Queen has deigned to put to me."

"What think you of Monsieur Necker?"

"He 's a worthy German, composed of heterogeneous elements. He is more than eccentric, and sometimes rises to the point of bombast."

"Yet were you not one of those who urged the King to take him again into government service?"

"Right or wrong, Necker was the most popular man in the kingdom; and therefore I urged the King to avail himself of that popularity."

"And Madame de Staël?"

"Am I to understand that your Majesty honors me by asking my opinion of Madame de Staël?"

"Yes."

"Well, as to her physique, she has a large nose, coarse features, a large waist —"

The Queen smiled. As a woman, it was not disagreeable to hear it said that the lady of whom she so often thought was not handsome. "Go on!" was all she said.

"Her skin is not very attractive. Her gestures are energetic, rather than graceful. Her voice is coarse, so that it sometimes seems as if it did not belong to a lady. In spite of all this she is only twenty-four or twenty-five years old. She has the throat of a goddess, magnificent black hair, superb teeth, a passionate eye. Her glance is a world in itself."

"But morally, intellectually, — as to talent and merit?" the Queen asked eagerly.

"She is good and generous. No one can remain her enemy after hearing her talk fifteen minutes."

"I refer to her genius, Monsieur. Politics require something more than the heart."

"Madame, the heart does no harm, even in politics. As to that word genius, which you first used, be very chary with that word. Madame de Staël has great, immense talent, but it does not reach the point of genius. Something heavy as well as strong, clumsy as well as powerful, weighs down her feet when she wishes to quit the earth. Between herself and her teacher, Jean Jacques Rousseau, there is the difference you find between iron and steel."

"You speak of her talent as a writer, Monsieur. Speak of the lady in her political capacity."

"In my opinion, Madame," replied Gilbert, "they value Madame de Staël beyond her merits. Since the emigration of Mounier and Lally, her parlors have become the headquarters of the English party, half Aristocratic, and preferring two legislative bodies, the Lords and Commons. As she belongs to the middle class, and most decidedly so, she has the insular weakness of adoring great noblemen. She admires the English people, because she believes they are eminently aristocratic. She does not know the whole history of England. She is unacquainted with the machinery of its government. Gentlemen who have only recently risen from the lowest classes, she mistakes for noblemen whose titles antedate the Crusades. In other nations they try to sustain and strengthen the nobility with new men and new blood. In England they use the old families to maintain the new men."

"You believe that this sentiment leads Madame de Staël to propose Narbonne for a prominent place?"

"In this instance two passions are united, love of aristocracy, and love of an aristocrat."

"You think Madame de Staël loves Monsieur de Narbonne because of his aristocratic connection?"

"It is not because of his merit, I fancy!"

"But nobody is less a born aristocrat than Monsieur de Narbonne. Even his father is unknown"

"Ah! — because nobody dares look straight at the sun!"

"See here, Monsieur Gilbert, I 'm a woman, and consequently I like gossip. What is said about Narbonne?"

"That he is brave, witty, profligate."

"But I refer to his birth."

"They say that when the Jesuits were trying to drive away Voltaire, Machault, Argenson, — the so-called Philosophic School, — it was necessary to contend also with Madame de Pompadour. This is what we learn from the traditions of the Regency, which preceded your Majesty's reign. They knew the possibilities of paternal love, when doubled by love of another sort. So they chose for this purpose, — for the Jesuits have a skilful hand in drawing such lots! — they chose a daughter of the King, and persuaded her to devote herself heroically to this incestuous task. Hence the generation of this charming cavalier, whose father is unknown, as your Majesty says, — not because his birth is lost in obscurity, but because it is as clear as the sunshine."

"Then you do not believe, like the Jacobins, — like Robespierre, for example, — that Narbonne comes from the Swedish embassy, of which De Staël is chief?"

"Oh yes, Madame; only he comes from the wife's boudoir, not from the husband's cabinet. To suppose that Monsieur de Staël had anything to do with this, would be to suppose him the husband of his wife. — Oh, my God, no! This is not the treachery of an ambassador, Madame, it is the weakness of lovers. Nothing less than love, the eternal fascinator, would lead a woman to place the gigantic sword of the Revolution in such frivolous hands."

"Do you speak of the sword which Monsieur Isnard kissed at the Jacobin Club?"

"Alas, Madame! I speak of the sword which is suspended over your head."

"Then in your opinion, Monsieur Gilbert, we are wrong in accepting Narbonne as Minister of War?"

"You will do better, Madame, if you at once take his successor."

"And who is that?"

"Dumouriez."

"Dumouriez, — a Soldier of Fortune?"

"Ah, Madame! that is a grand name gone wrong, ruined by bad usage, — a cowardly word! and it is an unfair epithet, as applied to him of whom you speak."

"Was n't Monsieur Dumouriez once a simple soldier?"

"I know very well, Madame, that Monsieur Dumouriez lacks that Court distinction, those titles of birth, to which everybody bows down. A provincial gentleman, unable to purchase a colonelcy and a regiment, he enlisted as a simple hussar. At the age of twenty he endured the sword-thrusts of five or six cavaliers, rather than surrender; but in spite of this manifestation of bravery, despite his genuine intelligence, he was allowed to vegetate in the lower ranks of the army."

"His intelligence? Yes, it was developed by espionage, in his service as a spy for Louis the Fifteenth."

"Why use the words espionage and spy in regard to him, to indicate what you call diplomacy in others? I happen to know that it was purely at the instance of the prime-minister of Louis the Fifteenth that Dumouriez entered into correspondence with the King. Where is there a Court noble who would not do as much?"

"But, Monsieur," said the Queen, showing her deep study of politics by her familiarity with the details, "he is essentially immoral, this man whom you commend. He lacks principle, and has no sentiment of honor. Monsieur de Choiseul himself told me that Dumouriez unfolded to him two projects in relation to the Corsicans, — one to subdue them, the other to give them liberty."

"True! but Choiseul forgot to tell you that when the first was preferred, Dumouriez fought valiantly for its success."

"If we should accept Dumouriez for Minister of War, this would be equivalent to a declaration of hostilities against Europe."

"Well, Madame, that declaration is already made in the popular heart. Do you know how many citizens of this department have already registered their names as volunteers? Six hundred thousand! In the Jura district the women declare that all the men may go, and that if the women can have pikes, they will defend their territory themselves."

"You use a word which always makes me tremble," said the Queen.

"Excuse me, Madame," replied Gilbert, "but will you tell me which word, in order that I may not again pain you by its use?"

"You used that word pikes! Oh, the pikes of Eighty-nine! I can still see the heads of my two faithful body-guards on the ends of those pikes!"

"Yet it is a wife, a mother, who proposes to open a subscription, in order to have more pikes manufactured."

"Is it also a wife and a mother who has persuaded the Jacobins to adopt the red caps, — the color of blood?"

"There again your Majesty is in error. It was desirable to consecrate the ideas of Equality and Fraternity by a symbol. It would be impossible to persuade all the French people to wear similar costumes; so it was determined to select a single article of dress, — the peasant-cap. The color was chosen, not because it is the mournful color of blood, but, on the contrary, because red is a gay and striking color, agreeable to the masses."

"Well, Doctor, you are such an advocate of new inventions, that I do not despair of yet seeing you with a pike in your hand, and a red cap on your head, feeling the King's pulse."

The Queen spoke half bitterly, half jestingly, and then withdrew, seeing that she could not overcome this man at any point.

Madame Elizabeth was preparing to follow her, when Gilbert said, in almost supplicating tones: "Madame, you love your brother, do you not?"

"It is more than love I feel for him, — it is adoration!"

"And you are willing to transmit good counsel to him, if it comes from a friend?"

"Speak out! If the counsel is really good —"

"From my point of view it is excellent."

"Then speak, speak!"

"Well, when the Feuillant ministry comes to nothing, — and that won't be long, — advise him to select a ministry composed wholly of men wearing those red caps, which alarm the Queen so much!"

Then, bowing low before Madame Elizabeth, Gilbert left the room and the palace.

CHAPTER XXXV.

DUMOURIEZ.

We have reported the foregoing conversation between the Queen and Doctor Gilbert, in order to interrupt the course, always somewhat monotonous, of a historic recital, and to set forth, in a form less bald than a chronologic table, the situation of the various political parties.

The Narbonne ministry lasted three months. One of Vergniaud's speeches killed it.

Mirabeau once exclaimed: "I see from here the window!"

In like manner, when the news arrived that the Empress of Russia had made a treaty with Turkey, and that Austria and Prussia had signed, at Berlin, on February 7, a compact of alliance offensive and defensive, — when this news arrived, Vergniaud mounted the rostrum and said: "I too may say, that from this platform I can see the palace wherein they are plotting a counter-revolution, and preparing measures which will enslave us to Austria. The time has come when you must put an end to such audacity, and confound the conspirators. Often enough, in the olden days, have Terror and Dismay stalked forth from yonder palace, in the name of Despotism. Now let Terror and Dismay re-enter that palace, in the name of the Law."

By a powerful gesture this magnificent orator seemed to drive before him Terror and Dismay, those two demoralized daughters of Awe and Majesty.

Dismay and Terror did indeed return to the Tuileries. Narbonne, elevated to office by a puff of amorous admiration, was overturned by a tempestuous flaw. This downfall occurred in March, 1792.

Hardly three months had elapsed after Gilbert's interview with the Queen, when a new man was introduced into the King's presence. He was short in stature, active, nimble, nervous. He had an intelligent head, in which sparkled eyes full of enterprise. He was fifty-six years of age, though he appeared ten years younger. His face was overspread with the brown tints of the bivouac, and he wore the uniform of a field-marshal.

He was only an instant alone in the parlor, into which he was shown; for at once the door opened and the King entered.

For the first time these two historic personages found themselves face to face. The King regarded the little man with a dull and heavy look, which was nevertheless not devoid of penetration. The little man returned the King's glance with one full of defiance and fire.

Nobody was there to introduce the stranger, which proved that his coming had been announced beforehand.

"It is Monsieur Dumouriez?" asked the King.

Dumouriez bowed.

"How long is it since you came to Paris?"

"I came at the beginning of February, Sire."

"Monsieur de Narbonne sent for you —?"

"To tell me that I was detailed to the army corps in Alsatia, under Marshal Luckner, and that I was to command the Besançon division."

"You did not go, however?"

"Sire, I accepted the commission; but I believed it my duty to suggest to Narbonne that as war was at hand," — here the King made a perceptible movement, but Dumouriez did not appear to notice it, — "and threatened to become general, I thought it would be better to pay more attention to Southern France, which was unprepared for an attack; and that consequently it seemed to me important that a plan of defence should be adopted for the lower districts, and that a general-in-chief and an army should be sent there."

"Yes, and you unfolded your views to Narbonne, after having communicated them to Monsieur Gensonné and to several other Girondists?"

"Gensonné is my friend, Sire, and also a friend to your Majesty, I believe."

"Then I 'm doing business with a Girondist, am I?" said the King, smiling.

"You have to do with a Patriot, and a faithful subject of his sovereign."

Louis bit his big lips and said: "And was it for the sake of serving your sovereign and country more efficiently that you refused an appointment as Minister of Foreign Affairs pro tem?"

"Sire, I responded that I should prefer the command promised me, rather than a place in the cabinet, either pro tem or not pro tem; for I am a soldier, and not a diplomat."

"On the contrary, I am assured that you are both a soldier and a diplomat."

"I am too much honored, Sire!"

"And it is under that assurance that I still insist upon the appointment," said the King.

"Yes, Sire! and I continue to refuse, despite my great regret at disobeying you."

"And why do you refuse?"

"Because the situation is grave, Sire. It has already upset Narbonne and compromised Monsieur de Lessart.

Every man, who thinks anything of his own capability, has the right not to let himself be employed in any way whatever, or else to insist that he shall be employed according to his value. Now, Sire, I am either worth something or nothing. If nothing, leave me in my obscurity. Who knows to what destiny you are driving me? If I am worth anything, do not try to make me the minister of a day, a passing power; but give me some definite support, so that you can then lean more securely on me. Our affairs — your pardon, Sire, for making his Majesty's affairs my own — our affairs are in such a bad odor with foreign lands, that a temporary Council cannot properly deal with other nations. Such a temporary arrangement, a ministry pro tem, — excuse the frankness of a soldier!" — nobody could be less frank than Dumouriez, but under certain circumstances he liked to appear so — "this arrangement would affect the Assembly badly, and destroy my popularity with its members. I will say further, that this pro tem business would compromise the King, and give him the appearance of clinging to his old Council, which he meant to recall at the first opportunity."

"Do you think the move would be possible, even if I cherished such an intention?"

"I believe it is time for your Majesty to break with the past in good faith."

"Yes, and make myself a Jacobin outright, perhaps? You said as much to Laporte!"

"Zounds! If your Majesty should do that, it would embarrass all parties, — the Jacobins most of all."

"Why don't you advise me to put on the red cap at once?"

"Well, Sire, if that would help matters —" said Dumouriez.

The King looked in a somewhat defiant way at the man who could begin such a response; but he only said: "Then it 's a permanent portfolio you wish for, is it, Monsieur?"

"I wish for nothing, Sire. I am ready to receive the King's orders; only I should like it better, if the King would send me to the frontier, instead of keeping me in Paris."

"And if I command you, on the contrary, to remain in Paris, and become definitely the Minister of Foreign Affairs, what should you say?"

Dumouriez smiled. "I should say that his Majesty was overcoming the prejudice with which others had inspired him against me."

"Well, yes, entirely so, Monsieur Dumouriez. You are henceforth my Prime Minister!"

"Sire, I devote myself to your service; but —"

"Some conditions?"

"Some explanations, Sire!"

"Speak! I 'm listening."

"The place of Prime Minister is not what it was formerly. Without being the less your Majesty's faithful servant, yet, in entering your cabinet, I become a National executor. Do not expect of me, hereafter, the language to which you have been accustomed from my predecessors. I only know how to speak according to Liberty and the Constitution. Confined by my official duties, I cannot pay my court to you. I shall not have much leisure, and I shall disregard the King's etiquette, in order better to serve the King himself. I shall work constantly for you or your Council; and I forewarn you, this work involves conflict."

"Conflict, Monsieur? Why so?"

"Oh, it 's very plain, Sire! Nearly all your foreign representatives are openly hostile to the Revolution. I forewarn you that I shall change them, and may go contrary to your selections and preferences. I may propose to your Majesty nominees whom you do not even know by name, and others whom you dislike — "

"And in that case, Monsieur?" said Louis, interrupting him hastily.

"In that case, Sire, when your Majesty's repugnance is too strong and outspoken, I shall obey, because you are master; but if your selections emanate not from your own choice, but are suggested by those around you, and seem evidently intended to compromise me, then I shall beg your Majesty to appoint my successor. Sire, think of the awful dangers which beset your throne. It must be buttressed by public confidence, and all depends upon you!"

"Permit me to interrupt you, Monsieur."

"Sire —!" said Dumouriez, bowing.

"I have thought of these dangers for a long time!"

Then, pointing to the portrait of Charles the First, and wiping his face with his handkerchief, Louis continued: "And if I try to forget them, there is a picture which keeps them in mind."

"Sire!"

"Wait till I've done, Monsieur. My situation is the same as his. Our perils are similar. Perhaps the scaffold of Whitehall is even now building itself in the Place de Grève."

"This is looking too far ahead, Sire!"

"It is looking at the horizon, Monsieur! If my fear be correct, I shall march to the scaffold as Charles did, — not perhaps in so knightly a fashion, but at least in a Christian way. — Now go on, Monsieur!"

Dumouriez paused, astonished at this unexpected display of firmness; but presently he said: "Sire, allow me to change the theme of our conversation?"

"As you will, Monsieur; but I wish to prove that I am not afraid to meet the fate with which they try to affright me; or, if I do fear it, that I am prepared to face it."

"Sire, despite all I have had the honor of saying to you, am I still to regard myself as your Minister of Foreign Affairs?"

"Yes, Monsieur."

"Then at the first meeting of the Council I shall introduce four despatchès. I warn the King that neither in style nor principles will they resemble those of my predecessors. If my initiatory efforts are acceptable to your Majesty, I shall keep on; otherwise my travelling equipage is in readiness for my departure, to serve France and my sovereign on the frontier. Whatever may have been said of my talents as a diplomatist, the field is my true element, the aim of all my endeavors for the past six and thirty years."

Thus speaking he bowed, and was about taking his leave, when the King checked him. "Wait a moment! We have settled one point, but there are five others to adjust."

"My colleagues?"

"Certainly. I do not mean to have you coming to me with complaints that you are hindered by this man or that. Choose your cabinet, Monsieur."

"Sire, you impose upon me a grave responsibility."

"I believe I best serve your wishes by charging you with this duty."

"Sire, I know scarcely anybody in Paris, except Lacoste, whom I recommend to your Majesty for the Naval Department."

"Lacoste? Is n't he merely a chief commissary?"

"Yes, Sire, — one who sent his resignation to Monsieur de Boynes, rather than pursue an unjust course."

"That 's a good recommendation! Whom do you propose for the other places?"

"I will consult others, Sire."

"May I know whom you will consult?"

"Brissot, Condorcet, Pétion, Rœderer, Gensonné —"

"All the Girondists, in fact?"

"Yes, Sire!"

"Ho for the Girondists, then! Let us see if they can manage better than the Constitutionalists and the Feuillants."

"There is another point, Sire!"

"What is it?"

"To ascertain whether the four letters which I am to write will be agreeable to you."

"That we shall learn to-night."

"To-night, Sire?"

"Yes, for matters are driving! We are to have an extraordinary meeting of my Council, composed of Monsieur de Grave, and Monsieur Cahier de Gerville."

"But Duport Dutertre?"

"He has resigned."

"I shall be at your Majesty's disposal," said Dumouriez, again bowing and about to withdraw.

"No, wait a minute. I want to compromise you." Hardly were these words out of his mouth when the Queen and Madame Elizabeth appeared, with their prayerbooks in their hands.

"Madame," said the King to his wife, "this is Monsieur Dumouriez, who promises to help us, and with whom we are this evening to form a new Council."

Dumouriez bowed, and the Queen looked with curiosity at the man who was to wield such an influence in the affairs of France.

"Monsieur," she said, "are you acquainted with Monsieur Gilbert?"

"No, Madame."

"Better make his acquaintance, Monsieur."

"May I ask in what capacity you recommend him?"

"As an excellent prophet. Three months ago he predicted that you would be Narbonne's successor."

At this moment the doors of the King's study were thrown open, and he went out to attend Mass.

Dumouriez followed in the royal train; but the courtiers avoided him as they would a pestilence.

"Did n't I say you would be compromised?" whispered the King, laughing.

"In the eyes of the aristocracy, Sire! This is a new favor which the King bestows upon me!" and so speaking, he at last succeeded in getting away.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

BEHIND THE TAPESTRY.

On that evening, at the hour named, Dumouriez came with the four despatches. Grave and Cahier de Gerville were already in the Council Chamber, awaiting the King.

As if the King himself only delayed his coming till Dumouriez's arrival, hardly had this gentleman entered by one door, before his Majesty came in by the other.

The two retiring ministers rose quickly. Dumouriez was already standing, and could only bow. The King responded with a nod. Then he said, as he took an armchair at the head of the table: "Gentlemen, be seated."

It seemed to Dumouriez that the door into the King's private room had been left open, and that the portière in front of it moved slightly. Was it the wind? Was it the touch of some person listening behind the tapestry, which intercepted sight but not sound?

The three ministers sat down.

"Have you your despatches, Monsieur?" asked the King, of Dumouriez.

"Yes, Sire!" and the General drew four letters from his pocket.

"To what national powers are they addressed?" asked the King.

"To Spain, Austria, Prussia, and England."

"Read them!"

Dumouriez again glanced at the tapestry, and its tremor convinced him that somebody was listening.

He began his reading in a firm voice. In these despatches he spoke in the name of the King, but in the spirit of the Constitution, — without acrimony, but also without feebleness.

He discussed the true interests of each government in its relation to the French Revolution. As each government might reasonably complain of the utterances in certain Jacobin pamphlets, he attributed these injurious misrepresentations to the freedom of the press, under whose sunshine, while rich harvests were ripening, impure vermin might also be warmed into life. In conclusion he demanded peace in the name of a free nation, whereof the King was the hereditary representative.

The King listened, and gave increasingly close attention to each successive despatch.

When Dumouriez had finished his reading, the King said: "I never before heard anything equal to this, General!"

"It is thus ministers ought always to write and speak in the names of their sovereigns!" said Cahier de Gerville.

"Well," resumed the King, "give me the despatches, and they shall go to-morrow."

"Sire, the couriers are already waiting in the court-yard below" said Dumouriez.

"I wish to have duplicates for safe keeping, and to show to the Queen," said the King, with some little embarrassment.

"I have anticipated your Majesty's wish, and here are four copies, certified to be genuine, by myself."

"Then let your missives be sent!" said the King.

Dumouriez went to the door by which he had entered.

An aide was in waiting, to whom he gave the despatches. Presently they heard several horses galloping out of the courtyard.

"That is done!" said the King, in response to his own thoughts, when this significant sound had died away; "and now let us see your list of colleagues."

"Sire," said Dumouriez, "I wish first of all that your Majesty would urge Monsieur Cahier de Gerville to consent to remain with us."

"I have already done so," said the King.

"And I regretfully persist in my refusal, Sire. My health is being undermined day by day, and I need rest."

"You hear, Monsieur," said the King, turning towards Dumouriez.

"Yes, Sire!"

"Well," insisted the King, "your ministers?"

"We have Monsieur de Grave still with us."

Grave raised his hand and said: "Sire, if the language of Monsieur Dumouriez astonished you just now by its frankness, mine will astonish you still more by its humility."

"Speak, Monsieur!" said the King.

"Here, Sire," replied Grave, drawing a paper from his pocket, "here is a somewhat severe but fair criticism made upon me, by a lady of great merit. Have the kindness to read it."

The King took the paper and read as follows:

Grave is spoken of for the War Portfolio. He is a small man in every way. Nature has made him mild and timid. His prepossessions lead him into superciliousness, albeit his heart inspires him with amiability. As a result, in an embarrassing effort to conciliate all parties, he becomes absolutely nothing.

Methinks I see him walking like a courtier behind the King, his head erect and his body weak, showing the whites of his blue eyes, which he cannot keep open after dinner, without the aid of three or four cups of coffee.

He talks little, as though his reserve were instigated by wise reticence; but in reality this silence arises from a lack of ideas. He will lose his head so completely in the midst of the affairs of his department, that one day or other he must ask permission to withdraw.

Louis hesitated about reading the paper through, and would not have done so except by the request of Monsieur de Grave himself.

"Well," said his Majesty, "there 's a woman's estimate. Is it from Madame de Staël?"

"No, better than that. It is from Madame Roland, Sire."

"And you say, Monsieur de Grave, that this is also your judgment of yourself?"

"In many points, Sire!—I will remain in the ministry until I can instruct my successor as to the run of affairs, and then I must ask your Majesty to accept my resignation."

"You were right, Monsieur. This language is yet more astonishing than the language of Monsieur Dumouriez. If you are resolved upon withdrawal, however, I should be glad to have you nominate your successor."

"I was about to beg your Majesty to allow me to suggest Monsieur Servan, an honest man, in every sense of the word, a man of solid temperament and pure morals, with something of the austerity of a philosopher, added to the sympathetic goodness of a woman. Besides, Sire, he is a clear-headed Patriot, a courageous soldier, a vigilant politician."

"Here goes for Servan! We have three secretaries then already, — Servan for War, Lacoste for the Navy, Dumouriez for Foreign Affairs. What shall we do about Finance?"

"Monsieur Clavières, Sire, if you approve the choice. He is a man of great financial knowledge, and superior skill in the management of money." So spake Dumouriez.

"Yes," said the King, "he is indeed active and industrious; but they also say he is irascible, self-opinionated, fussy, and wayward in discussion."

"These are the common faults of able cabinet-ministers, Sire."

"Well, we 'll overlook the shortcomings of Monsieur Clavières. So be it! Monsieur Clavières, Minister of Finance. Now how about Justice? To whom shall we give her?"

"Duranthon, a Bordeaux barrister, is very strongly recommended."

"By the Girondists, of course?"

"Yes, Sire. He is a level-headed, upright, and most excellent citizen, but somewhat weak and slow. We must light a fire under his feet, and supply the strength he lacks."

"There still remains one portfolio, — Interior Affairs."

"The unanimous opinion is that it belongs to Monsieur Roland."

"To Madame Roland, you mean?"

"To Monsieur and Madame Roland, — to both the learned husband and the brilliant wife!"

"You know them?" asked the King.

"No, Sire; but I am assured that he resembles one of Plutarch's heroes, while she is a woman from the pages of Titus Livius."

"Do you know what they will call your cabinet, Monsieur Dumouriez, or rather, what it is already nicknamed?"

"No, Sire."

"The Sans Culotte[1] Ministry."

"I accept the appellation, Sire. All the better will it be seen that we are men."

"And are your colleagues all ready for duty?"

"Half of them are not aware of their appointment."

"Will they accept?"

"I 'm sure of it."

"Very well, let us adjourn; and day after to-morrow we will hold our first session."

"Day after to-morrow, Sire!"

"You see," said the King, turning to Grave and Cahier de Gerville, "that you will have till the day after to-morrow for reflection and suggestion."

"Sire, our determination is already taken, and we will come on the day after to-morrow only to install our successors."

The three ministers retired, but before they reached the broad staircase a chamberlain overtook them, and said to Dumouriez: "Monsieur General, the King requests you to follow me, as he has something to say to you."

Dumouriez saluted his colleagues, and remained behind to ask: "The King or the Queen?"

"The Queen, Monsieur; but she judged it inexpedient to let the other two gentlemen know that it was she who sent for you."

Dumouriez shook his head and said: "Just what I feared!"

[1] This term means breechless, or unbreeched, — literally, without breeches, — and might be translated tatterdemalion or ragamuffin. It was applied to the Republicans by the Nobility, to indicate their opinion as to the Plebeian character of the ultra Revolutionary party.

"Do you refuse?" asked the chamberlain, who was no other than Weber.

"No, I'm with you."

"Come this way."

Through the poorly lighted corridors the chamberlain conducted Dumouriez to the Queen's apartments, and then said, without announcing the General by name: "Here is the person your Majesty asked for!"

Dumouriez entered. Never had our soldier's heart beat so violently, even when executing a battle-charge or mounting the deadly breach.

As he well understood, this was because he had never before encountered the same danger. The road which now opened before him was strown with dead and living sacrifices. At any moment he might stumble against the memory of Calonne, of Necker, of Mirabeau, of Barnave, of Lafayette.

The Queen was pacing the room with long steps, and she was very red. Dumouriez paused just inside the door, which was closed behind him. The Queen came towards him with a majestic and irritated demeanor.

At once taking up the question, with her usual vivacity, she said: "Monsieur, at this moment you are all-powerful; but you are so by the favor of the people, and the people quickly break their idols. They say you have much talent. First of all, have the wit to understand that neither the King nor myself will sanction all these new notions. Your Constitution is a perfect air-pump, an exhauster. Royalty suffers under it for want of air. I have sent for you to say, before you go any farther, that you must decide what part you will take, and choose between us and the Jacobins."

"Madame, I am grieved at the painful communications which your Majesty makes; but having detected the presence of the Queen behind the curtain which concealed her, I expected what now comes to pass."

"In that case, you are ready with your answer?" said the Queen.

"Here it is, Madame. I am between the King and the Nation; but before all, I belong to my country."

"The country! the country!" repeated the Queen. "The King then is nothing! Everybody apparently cleaves to the Nation, and nobody to the King."

"Oh yes, Madame, the King is always the King; but he has taken an oath to support the Constitution, and from the day when that oath was taken, the King became one of the chief subjects of the Constitution."

"A compulsory oath, Monsieur, — null and void."

For an instant Dumouriez stood speechless. Like the skilful actor he was, he looked at the Queen with profound pity.

At last he said: "Madame, permit me to say that your safety, the King's safety, and that of your august children, is bound up with the Constitution which you undervalue, and which will save you, if you will consent to be saved thereby. I should ill serve you, Madame, — I should ill serve the King, — if I talked to either of you otherwise."

The Queen interrupted him with an imperious motion. "Oh Monsieur, Monsieur! You are on the wrong road, I assure you." Then she added, with an undefinable touch of menace: "Be on your guard, Monsieur!"

"Madame," responded Dumouriez, in a perfectly calm tone, "I am more than fifty years old. My life has been beset with perils. In accepting the Portfolio of State I have said to myself that my official responsibility is by no means the greatest danger into which I run."

"Oh!" cried the Queen, striking her hands together,

"there is only one thing left for you to do, — slander me!"

"Slander you, Madame?"

"Yes. Do you wish me to explain your last words?"

"Do so, Madame!"

"Well, you implied that I was capable of assassinating you. — Oh Monsieur! — " and as she spoke, two great tears fell from her eyes.

Dumouriez had gone as far as possible. He had learned what he wished to know, — that is, if a single sensitive fibre remained at the bottom of her seared heart.

"God forbid," he said, "that I should so insult my Queen. Your Majesty's character is too great, too noble, to suggest such a suspicion, even to her most obdurate enemies. She has given proofs of heroism which I admire, and which have drawn me towards her."

"Do you speak the truth, Monsieur?" asked she, with tones in which emotion alone remained.

"On my honor, Madame, I swear it!"

"Then pardon my error, and give me your arm; for there are moments when I am so weak that I feel as if I should drop."

Indeed she did turn pale, and threw back her head.

Was this real? Was it one of those enticing perilous bits of comedy, not uncommon with this seductive Medea?

Cunning as he was, Dumouriez let himself be caught; or else, a more subtle actor than the Queen, he pretended to be deceived.

"Believe me, Madame, I can have no motive for deceiving you; for I abhor anarchy and its crimes as much as you do. Believe me, for I speak from my experience. I am better situated than the Queen for estimating events. What is now taking place is not some Orleans intrigue, as some would have you believe. It does not emanate from Pitt's animosity, as you have sometimes imagined. It is not even a transient popular movement. It is the almost unanimous protest of a great nation against ancient abuses. In all this, as I know very well, there are great animosities, which are liable to start a conflagration. Let us leave miscreants and fools on one side. Let us see only our Nation and our King, in this Revolution. What tends to separate these two, the Crown and the Nation, leads to mutual ruin. As for myself, Madame, I have undertaken, with all my might, to reunite them. Help me, instead of working against me! You dislike me? Am I an obstacle to your Counter-Revolutionary projects? If so, tell me, Madame. The King shall have my resignation on the spot, and I will sit in a corner, and mourn the fate of your country and mine."

"No, no! Keep your office, and pardon me!"

"I — pardon you, Madame? Oh, I beseech you not to humiliate yourself thus."

"Why not humiliate myself? Am I any longer a queen? Am I any longer a woman, even?"

She went to the window and pushed it open, notwithstanding the coldness of the March evening. The moon was silvering the leafless treetops in the gardens below.

"All people have a right to air and sunshine, have they not? To me only are sunshine and air denied. I dare not show myself at the windows, either on the courtyard side or the garden side. Day before yesterday I looked out into the courtyard. A gunner, who was there on guard, insulted me grossly, and said he should like the fun of carrying my head on the end of his bayonet.

Yesterday I opened the window looking towards the garden. On one side I saw a man standing on a chair, and reading aloud horrible things about us. On the other side I saw a priest insulted, beaten, and dragged away to one of the ponds. As if such scenes were of every-day occurrence, other people were all this time playing ball and promenading serenely, not troubling themselves about priest or speaker. — What times, Monsieur! What a situation! What people! And you wish me to believe myself a queen, when I can hardly believe myself a woman."

The Queen threw herself on a sofa, hiding her head in her hands. Dumouriez bent his knee, and respectfully kissed the hem of her robe.

"Madame," he said, "as surely as I undertake to sustain this struggle, you shall become once more a happy woman. You shall again become a powerful sovereign, or I will give up my life in the effort."

Rising, he saluted the Queen, and hurriedly left the room.

With an air of despair the Queen watched his withdrawal, repeating to herself: "A powerful sovereign? Perhaps that is yet possible, thanks to the sword; but a happy woman? Never, never, never!"

Murmuring a name which day by day became dearer and sadder, — the name of Charny, — she buried her head among the cushions on the sofa.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

THE RED CAP.

DUMOURIEZ withdrew rapidly from the Queen's presence, partly because her despair was painful. Though seldom moved by sentimental ideas, he was strongly affected by personal contact. There was no sentiment in his political conscience, but he was very sensitive to human suffering.

Moreover Brissot was waiting to accompany him to the Jacobin meeting, and Dumouriez did not wish to delay his submission to that terrible club.

As for the Assembly, he felt sure of his hold upon that body, so long as he was the choice of Pétion, Gensonné, Brissot, and the Girondists generally; but he was not the candidate of Robespierre, Collot d'Herbois, and Couthon, and it was Robespierre, Couthon, and Collot d'Herbois who managed the Jacobins.

Dumouriez's presence was unexpected. It was an audacious move for one of the King's ministers to come to the Jacobin Club. Hardly was his name spoken, when all eyes were turned towards him.

What would Robespierre do about it? Robespierre turned like the others, and bent his ear to catch the name flying from lip to lip. Then he knitted his brows, and again became cool and mute.

A glacial silence immediately spread through the hall. Dumouriez understood perfectly well that he must burn his vessels behind him, like the famous general who was bound not to retreat from the foreign shore where he had landed.

The Jacobins had just adopted the red cap as a sign of equality, only three or four members being of the opinion that their patriotism was sufficiently well known without giving this outward demonstration of it. One of this small number was Robespierre.

Dumouriez did not hesitate. He flung away his hat, snatched from a Patriot, sitting near, the red cap which adorned his head, and pulled it down over his own ears. Parading this sign of equality, he then mounted the rostrum.

The entire assemblage broke into applause. In the midst of this applause a sound was heard like the hiss of a viper, and the plaudits at once suddenly died away. It was the cry of hush, coming from Robespierre's puny lips.

More than once, at a later day, Dumouriez acknowledged that never did the whistle of bullets, within a foot of his head, make him shudder as did that hush, escaping from the lips of the ex-Deputy from Arras; but he was a rude fighter, this Dumouriez, a general and an orator rolled into one, — difficult to overthrow, either on the battlefield or on the rostrum.

He waited with a calm smile till the chill silence was fully restored, and then said, in vibratory tones: "Brothers and friends: henceforth every moment of my life will be consecrated to doing the will of the people and justifying the confidence of a Constitutional King. In my negotiations with foreign lands I shall be upheld by the strength of a free people, and these negotiations must lead either to solid peace or decisive war."

Here the applause broke out afresh, despite Robespierre's hiss.

"If we have war," continued the orator, "I will snap my political quill and take my place in the army, ready for victory or death with my brothers. A heavy burden rests on my shoulders. Brothers, aid me to bear it! I need your counsel. Let me receive it through your publications. Tell me the truth, the honest truth. Repel calumny, but do not repulse a citizen whom you know to be sincere and intrepid, and who is devoted to the Revolutionary cause."

Dumouriez was done. He came down amidst loud plaudits. These plaudits irritated Collot d'Herbois, — that speaker who was himself so often hissed, so rarely applauded.

"Why this applause?" he cried, without stirring from his place. "If Dumouriez comes hither as a cabinet-minister, there is nothing to answer. If he comes here as an affiliated member, as a brother, he only does his duty, and puts himself on the plane of our opinions. In that case, there is only one answer to make, — that he should act as he talks."

Dumouriez raised his hand, as much as to say: "That is just what I mean to do."

Robespierre rose, with his severe smile. Everybody understood that he wished to ascend the tribune, and made way for him to pass. When he deigned to speak, all others were silent; only the silence was soft as velvet, compared with that which had greeted Dumouriez. He mounted the rostrum, and began with his customary solemnity.

"I am not among those who believe it absolutely impossible for a cabinet-minister to be patriotic. I even accept, with pleasure, the assurances Monsieur Dumouriez gives us. When he accomplishes these predictions, when he overthrows the enemies armed against us by his predecessors, and by conspirators who still direct our government, — despite the expulsion of several royal councillors, — then, and not till then, I shall be disposed to chant his eulogy. Even then I shall still think every good citizen in this society is his equal. The Nation alone is great, is worthy of respect in my eyes. The traditions of ministerial power vanish before the people. Out of respect for the people, for the minister himself, I demand that his entrance here shall not be signalized by such marks of homage, which will indicate the decay of public spirit. He asks our advice. I promise, for my part, to give him counsel which will be both useful to him and beneficial to the public weal. As long as Monsieur Dumouriez proves — by his open declarations, and above all by real service to his country — that he is the fellow of all honest citizens, and the defender of the people, he will find only support in this club. I do not fear the presence of a cabinet-secretary in this society; but the instant that secretary is treated as if he had an ascendency over other citizens, I shall demand his expulsion; for that superiority can never be allowed."

The astute orator left the rostrum in the midst of cheers, but a snare awaited him on the lower step. Dumouriez was there with outstretched arms, pretending great enthusiasm.

"Virtuous Robespierre!" he cried, "incorruptible citizen! permit me to embrace thee!" and despite the resistance of the old Constitutionalist, the General pressed Robespierre to his heart.

The crowd only saw the deed, and not Robespierre's repugnance to its accomplishment. Once more the assemblage broke into applause.

"Come!" said Dumouriez to Brissot, in a low voice,

"the comedy is over! I have worn the red cap and embraced Robespierre! Now I 'm doubly a saint."

Indeed he walked to the door amid hurrahs from the floor and the galleries.

At the door was a young man, clothed with the dignity of an usher, who exchanged a rapid glance with the minister, and a still more rapid shake of the hand. This young man was the Duke de Chartres.

Eleven o'clock in the evening rung out. Brissot acted as guide to Dumouriez, and both hastily wended their way towards Roland's lodgings.

The Rolands were still living in the Rue Guénégaud. They had been notified the night before, by Brissot, that Dumouriez, at the instigation of Gensonné and Brissot, wished to name Roland to the King for the Portfolio of the Interior. Brissot had asked Roland if he felt strong enough for such a task; and Roland, with his usual simplicity, had replied that, on the whole, he thought he was.

Now Dumouriez came to announce that the choice was made. Roland and Dumouriez only knew each other by name, and had never met. One can understand with what curiosity the future colleagues regarded each other.

After the customary compliments, in which Dumouriez assured Roland of his satisfaction in calling to the government such an enlightened and honest Patriot, the conversation naturally reverted to the King.

"There is the difficulty!" said Roland, with a smile.

"Well, therein you display a simplicity which I certainly have not the honor of sharing with you," said Dumouriez. "I believe the King to be an honest man and a sincere Patriot."

Observing that Madame Roland answered not a word, but contented herself with a smile, Dumouriez asked: "Is n't that your opinion, Madame?"

"You have seen the King?"

"Yes."

"Have you seen the Queen?"

This time it was Dumouriez who did not answer, but contented himself with a smile.

An appointment was made for the next day, at eleven in the forenoon, when the new ministers were to take their oaths of office. On leaving the Assembly, they were to go at once to the King.

It was now nearly midnight. Dumouriez would have stayed longer, but this was a late hour for plain folks like the Rolands.

Why did Dumouriez wish to remain? Ah! There it is!

By a quick glance at the husband and wife when he entered, Dumouriez noted the age of the husband. Roland was only ten years older than Dumouriez, but Dumouriez appeared twenty years younger than Roland.

The General also noted the beautiful outlines of the wife. As the daughter of an engraver, Madame Roland labored in her father's workshop when she was a maiden; and after she became a wife, she worked in her husband's study. Labor, that harsh protector, had been her safeguard as a maiden, and should have been her safeguard as a wife.

Dumouriez belonged to that race of men who can never behold an old husband without laughing, or a young woman without disobeying the commandment against covetousness. His manners were therefore displeasing to both the wife and husband, and this is why they called the attention of Brissot and the General to the lateness of the hour.

rissot and Dumouriez both took their leave. When door closed behind them, Roland said to his wife: ell, my dear friend, what thinkest thou of our future eague?"

Iadame Roland smiled as she replied: "There are e men whom it is needless to see twice, in order to n an opinion about them. He has a sly character, ıpple mind, a crafty look. He expressed great satis- ion with the patriotic selection he came to announce. ll, I sha'n't be surprised if he sends thee away some ."

'That 's exactly my opinion!" said Roland.

Both went to bed, with their habitual serenity, neither the two dreaming that the iron finger of Destiny was ting their names in letters of blood on the tablets of Revolution.

The next day the new members of the royal cabinet k their oaths of allegiance before the National Assem-, and then went to the Tuileries.

Roland wore shoes with strings, probably because he d no silver to spend on buckles. He wore a round t, for he had never worn a hat of any other sort. He nt to the Tuileries in his usual attire, and happened come last in the line of secretaries.

Monsieur de Brézé, the Master of Ceremonies, let the ıer five pass in, but he stopped Roland.

Not understanding why he was refused entrance, land said: "But I also am a minister, like the others, Minister of the Interior!"

The Master of Ceremonies did not, however, appear all convinced.

Dumouriez heard the debate and interfered.

"Why do you refuse admission to Monsieur Roland?" asked.

"Ah Monsieur!" said the Master, twisting his arms; "a round hat! no buckles!"

"Ah Monsieur!" replied Dumouriez, with the utmost sangfroid, "a round hat! no buckles! All is indeed lost!" and as he spoke, he pushed Roland into the King's study.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

AT HOME AND ABROAD.

THE ministry which had so much trouble in getting into the King's study might well be styled the War Cabinet.

On March 1, 1792, the Emperor Leopold of Austria died in the midst of his Italian harem, slain by the aphrodisiac love-potions which he prepared for himself.

Marie Antoinette, who had one day read, perhaps in some Jacobin pamphlet, that a pastry-crust would some day bring the Emperor his just dues, — and thereupon sent for Gilbert, to ask if there was a universal antidote for poisons, — now declared openly that her brother had been poisoned by his enemies.

With Leopold, Austria's temporizing policy also died.

He who now ascended the throne was Francis the Second, with whom later generations have been well acquainted, because he was the contemporary of our fathers, as he has been of ourselves. He had in him a mixture of Italian and German blood, his father being the deceased Leopold, and his mother being Maria Louisa of Spain.

Though an Austrian, he was born at Florence in 1768, but returned to the Court of Vienna at an early age. A year or two before his accession to the throne, he married Maria Theresa of Naples.

He was weak, violent, and treacherous. According to the priestly estimate, he was an honest man. His nature was hard and bigoted. His duplicity was concealed beneath a placid countenance. Under a rosy mask he maintained a fearful tenacity of purpose. He accomplished his career like an automaton animated by springs, — like the statue of the Commander in the opera of "Don Giovanni" or the apparition of the King in Shakespeare's "Hamlet."

In order to avoid the loss of portions of his territory, he twenty years afterwards gave his daughter, Maria Louisa, in marriage to his vanquisher, Napoleon Bonaparte; and yet, when his new son-in-law was driven back by the icy winds of the north in the retreat from Moscow, Francis Joseph hastened to stab him in the back at the first step.

In a word, Francis Second was the man whose tyranny was shown in the lead mines of Venice and the dungeons of Spitzberg. He was the executioner of Andryane, and also of Silvio Pellico, the Italian poet, who for nearly ten years was incarcerated at Spielberg, and whose charming work, "My Prisons," won him the sympathy of the reading world.

The new Emperor was at once the protector of the aristocratic refugees, the ally of Prussia, and the enemy of France.

The French ambassador at Vienna, Monsieur de Noailles, was, so to speak, a prisoner in his own palace.

Our ambassador to Berlin, Monsieur de Ségur, was preceded by the rumor that he was coming to Prussia to obtain possession of the King's secrets, by making love to the royal favorites. It so chanced that the King of Prussia had both.

Ségur presented himself during a public reception, at the same time with the envoy from Coblentz. The King turned his back upon the French ambassador; and in a loud voice he inquired, of the messenger from the emigrant princes, as to the health of the Count d'Artois.

Prussia believed herself at that epoch, as she believes herself to-day, at the head of German progress. Prussia lived amidst the peculiar philosophical traditions of King Frederick, who aided the Turkish resistance and the Polish Revolution, while he at the same time strangled the liberties of Holland. He governed with crooked fingers, which incessantly fished for spoils in the troubled waters of revolutions, hooking now a part of Poland, again a fraction of Pomerania, or a slice of Neuchâtel.

France had two avowed enemies in 1792, Francis Second of Austria and Frederick William of Prussia, the nephew of the Great Frederick, whom he had succeeded not many years before.

The secret enemies of France were England, Russia, and Spain.

The head of this coalition was to be the bellicose King of Sweden, that dwarf, armed like a giant, who was known as Gustavus the Third, and whom Catherine the Second kept under her thumb.

If we were obliged to cite our great historian, Michelet, every time we borrowed a fact from his ample pages, readers would find this honored name on almost every leaf; and from him we learn the contents of the following diplomatic note, issued soon after the accession of Francis Second to the Austrian throne, — a note intended to humiliate France. Francis claimed to be ruler of the whole German Empire, as well as the Emperor of Austria.

First. Satisfactory arrangements must be made with the German princes, who have possessions within the limits of the kingdom of France, and Austria must be supported by France herself; or else the imperial sovereignty of the German Empire must be recognized as in the other departments of our empire.

Second. Avignon must be given up, in order that Provence may be divided, as aforetime.

Third. The French monarchy must be re-established on the footing of June 23, 1789.

It is only too evident that these demands corresponded with the secret desires of the King and Queen of France.

One might have supposed Austria had fallen asleep on June 23, 1789, and had awakened after a slumber of three years, under the impression that only one night had elapsed, and it was now June 24, 1789.

On March 16, 1792, Gustavus of Sweden was assassinated in the midst of a masquerade ball. On the second day afterwards, while the assassination was still unknown in France, this Austrian document reached Dumouriez, who shrugged his shoulders, and carried it at once to Louis Sixteenth.

Marie Antoinette belonged to the extreme party. She desired war, because she believed it must bring deliverance to royalty; whereas the King — who was lethargic, and given to indirection and evasion — belonged to the middle party, and dreaded a war.

If war was declared and France was victorious, the King would be at the mercy of the conquering general. In case of a defeat, the people would hold the King responsible, raise the cry of treason, and rush upon the Tuileries.

If their enemies should invade France as far as Paris, whom would they bring with them? Monsieur, — that is to say, the King's brother, the hereditary Regent of the kingdom.

'he deposal of Louis Sixteenth, the indictment of 'ie Antoinette as an unfaithful wife, the possible .aration that the royal children of France were ille- mate, — these would be the results of the return of aristocratic refugees to Paris.

'he King had confidence in the Austrians, the Ger- ıs, the Prussians; but he distrusted the émigrés.

Nevertheless, when the Austrian note was read, it at once understood that the hour had come when nce must draw the sword, and that the King could back out.

)n April 20, 1792, the King and Dumouriez together er the National Assembly. They bring with them leclaration of war against Austria. This declaration war is enthusiastically received.

At this solemn hour — upon whose details Romance not the courage to enter, preferring to leave their ısideration entirely to History — there are four dis- ctly defined parties in France: Absolute Royalists, of om the Queen is one; Constitutional Royalists, whereto King professedly belongs; Republicans; Anarchists.

Apart from the Queen, the Absolute Royalists have able leaders in France. In foreign lands they are ıresented by Monsieur, by Count d'Artois, by Prince ndé, and by Duke Charles de Lorraine. Monsieur de eteuil, at Vienna, and Monsieur Merci d'Argenteau, Brussels, are the Queen's representatives in this ty.

The leaders of the Constitutional party are Lafayette, illy, Barnave, Lameth, Duport, — in a word, the Feu- nt Club. The King would ask nothing better than abandon the idea of absolute monarchism, and go h the Constitutionalists; although he inclines rather hold back than march forward.

The leaders of the Republican party are Brissot, Vergniaud, Guadet, Pétion, Roland, Isnard, Ducos, Condorcet, and Couthon.

The Anarchist chiefs are Marat, Danton, Santerre, Gonchon, Camille Desmoulins, Hébert, Legendre, Fabre d'Églantine, and Collot d'Herbois.

Dumouriez is willing to be anything anybody wants, provided he finds it for his own interest and renown.

Robespierre has retreated into the shadows. He waits!

Meanwhile, to whom shall be committed the Revolutionary flag, which that uncertain Patriot, Dumouriez, has flaunted on the rostrum of the Assembly?

To Lafayette, who bears the unenviable notoriety of causing the Champ de Mars massacre! To Luckner, who is only known to France by the mischief he did her as a partisan during the Seven Years War! To Rochambeau, who wishes only a defensive war, and is mortified by seeing Dumouriez address his orders directly to his subordinates, without submitting those orders to the criticism of Rochambeau's long experience.

Here we have the three men in command of the three military divisions, ready to enter upon this campaign.

Lafayette holds the centre. He is to rapidly follow the windings of the Meuse, and push Givet back to Namur. Luckner guards Franché Comté. Rochambeau commands in Flanders.

Supported by the detachment which Rochambeau has sent into Flanders, under the leadership of Biron, Lafayette is to capture Namur, and then march on Brussels, where the Brabant Revolution awaits him with widespread arms.

Lafayette has a fine opportunity. He is the advance guard. It is for him Dumouriez intends the first victory. That victory will make him Commander-in-chief.

Lafayette once victorious, and therefore Commander-in-chief, with Dumouriez as a successful War Secretary, the Royalists may throw the red cap to the nettles, — to the dogs, as the English might say, — and then crush the Girondists with one hand and the Jacobins with the other. Then the Counter-Revolution will be an established fact.

But Robespierre? As we have said, Robespierre has retreated into the shadow. Many go so far as to accuse him of Royalist sentiments, and pretend that there is an underground passage from the carpenter Duplay's workshop to the royal dwelling of Louis Sixteenth. Is it not from this source that the pension will hereafter come, which is to be paid, at a later day, to Mademoiselle de Robespierre, by the Duchess d'Angoulême?

This time, as always, Lafayette fails to embrace his opportunity.

The war is waged by peace-partisans. The contractors are the special friends of the enemy. They would gladly leave the troops without ammunition and without provisions, if by so doing they could supply bread and powder to the Austrians and Prussians.

Note also that Dumouriez, the man of deep intrigues and darksome tunnels, does not throw aside his relations with Orleans, — relations which will ultimately be his ruin.

Biron also is an Orleans general. Thus the Orleanists and the Feuillants, through Biron and Lafayette, may become the first to wield the sword and sound the trump of triumph.

On the morning of April 28, 1792, Biron captures Quiévrain and marches towards Mons. The next day, April 29, Théobald Dillon rushes from Lille to Tournay.

Biron and Dillon are both aristocrats. They are handsome, witty, dissipated, and brave young fellows, of the school of Richelieu. The one is frank in his avowal of patriotic opinions. The other will not have time to ascertain his own opinions before he is killed.

As we have stated somewhere before, the dragoons are the arm of Royalist France.

Two regiments of dragoons are at the head of Biron's three thousand men. Suddenly these dragoons, without even seeing the enemy, begin to shout: "We are betrayed! Shift for yourselves!"

Still shouting, they wheel about, and plunge through the infantry, who flee in their turn, believing themselves pursued. The panic is complete.

The same thing happens to Dillon. Dillon encounters a corps of nine hundred Austrians. The dragoons of his advance guard get frightened, run away, and drag the infantry along with them. Abandoning artillery, wagons, and military equipage, they do not pause till they bring up at Lille, whence they started.

Then the fugitives lay all the blame of their cowardice upon their chiefs, and put to death Théobald Dillon and Lieutenant-Colonel Bertois; after which they deliver the bodies of these unfortunate officers to the populace of Lille, who hang them, and then dance about their swinging corpses.

By whom has this defeat been organized, having for its aim the awakening of hesitancy in the hearts of the Patriots, and confidence in the hearts of their enemies?

The Girondists have desired war, and bleed on both sides with the double wound thus received. Well, the Girondists (and it must be confessed that all appearances confirm the opinion) blame the Court, — that is, the Queen. Their first idea is to return Marie Antoinette blow for blow; but they have given royalty time to put on a breastplate more solid than the chain armor the Queen once gave the King, and which her Majesty, in company with Andrée, tested one night, in an obscure corner of Versailles.

Little by little the Queen has reorganized the famous guard, authorized by the Constitution for which it was named. She has enlisted not less than six thousand men.

And what men! Fencing-masters and bullies, who insult representative Patriots, even on their benches in the Assembly; gentlemen from Brittany and the Vendée; provincials from Nismes and Arles; robust priests, who, under the pretext of refusing to take the Constitutional oath, have thrown their cassocks to the winds, and taken up, instead of the sprinkler, the sword, dagger, and pistol. Besides all these, there are many Knights of the Order of Saint Louis, who have come from nobody knows where, and have been decorated nobody knows why.

Even Dumouriez complains of this in his Memoirs:

> Whatever government may succeed the one now in power, it cannot restore to honor this Order, of whose beautiful but unlucky crosses it has been so prodigal, bestowing six thousand in two years.

It is at this time that the Minister of Foreign Affairs refuses for himself the grand cordon, and has it given to Monsieur de Watteville, a major in the Swiss Regiment of Ernest.

It is necessary first to take away this armor, and then to smite the King and Queen.

Suddenly a rumor spreads abroad that a white flag has been found at the old Military Academy, — that this flag is constantly displayed, and is a gift from the King. This recalls the incident of the white cockade, on October 5 and 6, 1789.

Everybody is astonished, so well known are the Counter-Revolutionary opinions of the King and Queen, not to see a white flag floating on the Tuileries, and they expect to see it streaming above some other public building on any fine morning.

At the report of the discovery of this flag, the people flock to the barracks. The officers of the school set out to resist the popular invasion, but the soldiers will not help their leaders.

A white flag is indeed found, — a flag as large as your hand, — which has been stuck into a loaf of cake, sent to the school by the Dauphin.

In addition to this unimportant scrap, they find a number of hymns composed in honor of the King, and some scurrilous songs about the Assembly, besides thousands of Anti-Revolutionary leaflets.

Bazire hereupon sends a report to the Assembly. The King's Guards have broken into cries of joy on learning the defeats of Tournay and Quiévrain. They have even expressed the hope that in three days Valenciennes will be taken, and that in a fortnight a foreign army will be in Paris.

Nor is that all! A cavalier in that guard, a good Frenchman named Joachim Murat, — who entered this corps under the delusion that it was what its name indicated, the Constitutional Guard, — has tendered his resignation; and there has been an effort to bribe him with money, and then send him to Coblentz.

These Constitutional Guards form a fearful weapon in the hands of royalty. May they not, under the King's orders, march upon the Assembly, besiege the Riding School, make prisoners of the National Deputies, and them all off, one after the other? Or, not so bad as , what hinders them from taking the King, leaving s, and going with him to the frontier, — thus repeat- the Varennes flight, which this time would not be a ıre?

ccordingly on May 22, that is, three weeks after the ble check at Tournay and Quiévrain, Pétion, the new ·or of Paris, elected by the influence of the Queen, ·m he had brought back from Varennes, — a man ·m she befriends out of sheer hatred towards one who ld have been quite willing to let her escape from nce, namely, Lafayette, — Pétion sends a written ɛr to the Commander of the National Guard, in which ɔpenly expresses his fears as to the possible departure ;he King, urges the guards to "observe and watch, to multiply the patrols in the neighborhood."

'o watch what? To observe whom? Pétion does not . To multiply the patrols in what neighborhood? ɛ answer is silence.

What would be the use of saying King and Tuileries right?

Who is to be watched? The enemy!

Around what shall sentinels be multiplied? Around enemy's camp!

What is the enemy's camp? The Tuileries!

Who is the enemy? The King!

There you have the great question in a nutshell.

It is Pétion, a petty lawyer from Chartres, the son of olicitor, who thus arrays himself against the King of ance, — against a descendant of Saint Louis, a great- ndson of Louis the Fourteenth.

The King of France laments, for he knows that this ce speaks louder than his own. He complains in a ter, which the Directory of the Department of Paris causes to be posted on the walls of the city; but Pétion is not at all disquieted. He does not answer, but he maintains his order.

So Pétion is the true king. If you doubt it, you shall presently have proof of it.

Bazire's report demands the suppression of the King's Constitutional Guard, and that a warrant of arrest shall be issued against its commander, Monsieur de Brissac.

The iron is hot. The Girondists are hammering it, — strong blacksmiths as they are. For them the question arises: "To be, or not to be?"

The decree is voted the same day. The Constitutional Guard is disbanded. The arrest of the Duke de Brissac is received, and the guardianship of the Tuileries is again placed in the hands of the National Guards.

Oh Charny, Charny! Where art thou? At Varennes a year ago, with three hundred cavalry, thine attempt to rescue the Queen was a failure! but what couldst thou not do at the Tuileries, with six thousand men?

Charny is living in bliss, forgetful of all else, in Andrée's beautiful arms.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

THE RUE GUÉNÉGAUD AND THE TUILERIES.

We may perhaps recall Grave's resignation of his office as Minister of War, which was partly refused by the King and wholly refused by Dumouriez. The latter was bent on retaining Grave, because Grave was Dumouriez's ally. Indeed he did keep him in office awhile. When the news came, however, of a double check to the national arms, the Minister-in-chief felt that the Minister of War must be sacrificed.

He therefore abandoned Grave, as a sop thrown to the many-headed Jacobin Cerberus, in order to stop his barking; and in Grave's place he put Colonel Servan, ex-Tutor of the Pages, whom he at once mentioned to the King.

Undoubtedly Dumouriez did not foresee what this colleague would do, and what a blow he would aim at royalty.

While the Queen was watching on the roofs of the Tuileries, so to speak, — searching the horizon for some token of the longed-for coming of the Austrians, — another woman was also on the watch, in the little parlor in the Rue Guénégaud. The one typified the Counter-Revolution; the other typified the Revolution.

It is Madame Roland to whom our last words allude. It is she who urged Servan for the ministry, as Madame de Staël had urged Narbonne. Throughout those three terrible years, 1791, 1792, 1793, the hand of woman was everywhere.

Servan was always at Madame Roland's reunions. Like all the Girondists, of whom she was the vital breath and light, — as the nymph Egeria was to Numa Pompilius, in the establishment of the religion and laws of ancient Rome, — Servan was inspired by her valiant soul, which (like the miraculous bush of Moses) forever burned without being consumed.

It was even said that she was Servan's mistress. She let them talk on; for having a clear conscience, she could smile at calumny.

Every day she saw her husband come home weighed down with the contest. He felt himself hurried towards destruction, with his colleague Clavières; but as there was nothing visible to support his allegations, they might all be denied.

On the evening when Dumouriez came to tender him the Portfolio of the Interior, Roland made certain conditions.

"I have no other fortune save mine honor," he said. "I wish to leave the cabinet with that honor unstained. A recording secretary should be present at all the deliberations of the Royal Council, and note down each member's opinion, so that my record may be seen, if ever I am found wanting in patriotism and faithless to liberty."

To this Dumouriez agreed. He felt the need of covering his own unpopularity with the mantle of the Girondist name. Dumouriez was one of those men who always promise, and then keep or forget their pledges, as it happens to suit their convenience.

Dumouriez had not kept this promise, and Roland still waited in vain for his recording secretary. As Roland could not have this private record, he resorted to publicity. He founded a journal named "The Thermometer;" but no one understood better than himself that there

d be some decisions of the Council whose disclosure d afford treasonable aid to public enemies.
ıe nomination of Servan came as a help to Roland, this was not enough; for this new influence being ralized by Dumouriez, the Council made no liberal ress.
ıe Assembly struck one blow, in disbanding the ıtitutional Guards and arresting Brissac. On his
:n home with Servan, in the evening of May 29, nd reported the news.
What has been done with the discharged guards-
?" asked Madame Roland.
Nothing!"
They are free, then?"
Yes! only they must put away their blue uniforms."
To-morrow they will put on the red uniform, and ort themselves as Swiss Guards."
ure enough. The next day the streets were dotted ı Swiss uniforms. The disbanded guardsmen had ıged their coats, and that was all. They were there
'aris, extending a hand to foreign invaders, beckoning n to come, and ready to open to them the city gates.
or this condition of things the two men, Roland and 'an, could see no remedy. Madame Roland took a :t of paper, put a quill into Servan's hand, and dic-
d to him as follows:

ı proposition to establish in Paris, on account of the ap-ıching festival of the Great Federation and the Capture of Bastille, on July 14, an encampment of twenty thousand ınteers.

ervan dropped the pen after writing this one phrase.
he King will never consent!" he said.

"Well, it is not to the King this measure should be proposed, but to the Assembly. Moreover, it should not be suggested by yourself as a Royal Councillor, but as a citizen."

By the gleam of this lightning-flash, Servan and Roland could see an immense horizon stretching before them.

"You are right!" said Servan. "With that, and also an edict against the priesthood, we shall hold the King."

"You understand me perfectly, do you not?" said Madame. "The priests are the Counter-Revolutionary influence in families and in society. The priesthood have added this phrase to the Creed: and those who pay their taxes shall be damned! Within six months fifty Constitutionally sworn priests have been slain, — their houses sacked, their fields devastated. Now let the Assembly aim a strong decree at the rebellious priests. Finish your proposal! Roland will prepare the other!"

Servan finished his document, while Roland wrote as follows:

Every rebel priest shall be taken outside the kingdom, within a month, if his removal is demanded by twenty registered citizens, approved by the district officers, and ordained by the government. Each exile shall receive three francs a day, for the defrayal of his travelling expenses as far as the frontier.

Servan read his proposition as to the proposed camp of twenty thousand volunteers. Roland read his outline of an edict for the expulsion of the priests. Therein lay the solution of the whole difficulty.

Would the King act frankly in regard to these projects? Would he act treacherously?

If the King were an honest Constitutionalist, he must sign both these decrees. If not, he must oppose his veto.

"I will sign my proposition for a volunteer camp as if I were an ordinary citizen," said Servan.

"And Vergniaud shall propose the decree against the priests," said the husband and wife, both at once.

The next day Servan sprung his demand upon the Assembly. Vergniaud put the other paper in his pocket, and promised to bring it out at the proper time.

On the evening after he sent his proposal to the Assembly, Servan attended the Council as usual. Of course his action was under discussion. Roland and Clavières sustained it, against Dumouriez, Lacoste, and Duranthon.

"Come, Monsieur!" cried the Premier, "and give an account of your conduct."

"To whom, if you please?" asked Servan.

"To the King, to the Nation, — to me!" Servan only smiled.

"Monsieur," continued Dumouriez, "you have to-day taken a very important step."

"Yes, I am aware of it, Monsieur, — a step of the highest importance."

"Had you orders from the King for thus acting?"

"No, Monsieur! I acknowledge that I had not."

"Did you take advice from your colleagues?"

"No more than from the King. That I also avow."

"Then why did you take this step?"

"Because it was my privilege, both as a private individual and as a citizen."

"Then it was as a private citizen you presented this incendiary motion?"

"Yes!"

"Why then did you add to your signature your title as Minister of War?"

"Because I wished to show the Assembly that I am ready to support, as a public officer, what I demand as a private citizen."

"Monsieur," said the Premier, "what you have done is unworthy equally of a citizen and a royal minister."

"Monsieur," said Servan, "permit me to say that I must be the judge of all matters pertaining to my conscience; and if I seek for any other judge in a question so delicate, I promise you his name will not be Dumouriez."

Dumouriez grew pale, and took a step towards Servan. Servan grasped his sword-hilt. Dumouriez did the same.

At this moment the King entered. He was as yet ignorant of Servan's proposal, and nothing further was then said about it.

The next day the Assembly entered upon a discussion of this proposal to convene twenty thousand Federal Volunteers in Paris.

The King was in consternation over this intelligence, and sent for his Premier.

"You are a loyal servant, Monsieur," said the King, "and I know how vigorously you have taken hold of royal interests, as an offset to this contemptible Servan."

"I thank your Majesty," said Dumouriez. Then he asked, after a pause: "The King is aware that the obnoxious decree has been passed?"

"No! but that does n't matter. I have decided, in that case, to exercise my right of veto."

Dumouriez shook his head.

"Is n't that your advice?" asked the King.

"Sire," replied the Premier, "you are the target for the suspicions of the greater part of our country. You are without the means of resistance, and against you are directed the rage of the Jacobins and the deep policy of the Republicans. Under these circumstances such a veto on your part would be equivalent to a declaration of war with the Assembly."

"Very well! So be it! I have made war upon my friends who are outside. I may as well have war with my friends inside."

"In one case you have ten chances of victory. In the other you have ten chances of defeat."

"You evidently do not understand the object of assembling these twenty thousand men "

"If your Majesty will allow me five minutes of free speech, I hope to prove that I not only know what is hoped for, but also what will come out of all this."

"Speak on! I am all attention!" said the King; and with his elbow on the arm of his chair, and his head in his hand, Louis Sixteenth listened.

"Sire, they who ask for this enactment are as much the country's enemies as the King's."

"You see," interrupted Louis, "you acknowledge it yourself!"

"I will say more, — that the accomplishment of their desires will bring them bad luck."

"Well then —"

"Permit me, Sire —"

"Yes, yes! Go on!"

"The Minister of War did very wrong to propose an assemblage of twenty thousand men near Paris, while our armies are so feeble, our frontiers so bare, and our treasury so empty."

"Wrong?" said the King. "I should say so!"

"Not merely wrong, but imprudent, — which is even worse. It will be imprudent to have such an assemblage of undisciplined troops so near the Assembly, — troops disposed to overrate their patriotism, and liable to be brought under control by the first ambitious leader."

"It is really the Girondists who are speaking through Servan's voice!"

"Yes," replied Dumouriez, "but the Girondists will not profit by it!"

"Perhaps the Feuillants will be benefited?"

"Neither Feuillants nor Girondists, but the Jacobins, who have affiliations throughout the kingdom, and who will perhaps find nineteen thousand of their own liege members among the twenty thousand volunteers. Be certain of this, Sire, that the promoters of this edict will be overturned by the edict itself."

"If I could believe that, I should be consoled," said the King.

"I think, Sire, the decree is dangerous to the Nation, to the King, to the National Assembly, and, above all, to its authors, who will find their chastisement in their own action. Therefore my opinion is that you cannot well do otherwise than sanction it. It has been evoked by malice so profound that I venture to say there is a woman at the bottom of it!"

"Madame Roland, you mean? Why are not women content to sew and knit, instead of turning themselves into politicians?"

"What would you have, Sire? Madame de Maintenon, Madame de Pompadour, and Madame Dubarry made women lose their old habits. This decree, I say, has been instigated by deep malice, has been fiercely debated, and has been adopted with enthusiasm. Everybody is blind to the effects of this wretched decree. Even if you add your veto, the decree will be put into execution just the same. Instead of merely twenty thousand men, assembled according to law, and consequently submissive to lawful power, at the approaching Federative Festival, forty thousand men, who have not been thus legally summoned, will flock to Paris from the provinces, — enough to upset the Constitution, the Assembly, and the Crown at one blow! If we had been the vanquishers instead of the vanquished in our recent battles," added Dumouriez, lowering his voice, "if I had thus found a good pretext for making Lafayette Commander-in-chief, and putting a hundred thousand men under his control, then I should not bid you sanction this decree; but we are beaten at home and abroad, so I bid you sign it."

Just then there was a tap at the King's door. "Enter!" said Louis. It was the chamberlain, Thierry.

"Sire, Monsieur Duranthon, the Minister of Justice, wishes to confer with your Majesty."

"What can he want? See to it, Dumouriez."

The instant the Premier left the room the tapestry which covered the door communicating with the Queen's room was lifted, and Marie Antoinette appeared.

"Sire, Sire," she said, "be firm! This Dumouriez is a Jacobin, like the others. Did he not put on their red cap at the club? As to Lafayette, as you know, I would rather be ruined outright than be saved by that man!"

As the Premier's returning step was heard, the tapestry fell and the vision disappeared.

CHAPTER XL.

THE VETO.

As the portière fell back into its usual place the public door reopened.

"Sire," said Dumouriez, "on the motion of Vergniaud, the edict against the priests has been passed."

"It 's a conspiracy!" said the King, rising. "And how was the edict expressed?"

"Here it is, Sire. Duranthon brought it to you. I thought your Majesty would do me the honor of privately giving me your opinion about it, before conferring with the whole Council."

"You are right. Give me the paper."

With a voice trembling with agitation the King read the decree, written by Roland and proposed by Vergniaud, the text whereof has already been given.

After reading it, the King crushed it in his hands and threw it away, saying: "I will never sanction such an edict."

"Excuse me, Sire, for once more having a mind opposed to your Majesty's."

"Monsieur, I may hesitate in political matters, but in religious matters, — never! In political affairs I decide with the intellect, and the intellect is fallible. In matters of religion I decide according to my conscience, and conscience is infallible."

"Sire, more than a year ago you approved the law in regard to administering the Constitutional oath to the priests."

"Ah Monsieur! but I was forced to it!"

"Sire, then was the proper time to affix your veto. This second edict is only a natural result of the first. The first edict has produced all the evils in France. This edict is the remedy for those evils. It is severe, but not cruel. The other was an anti-religious edict. It attacked freedom of thought in matters of worship. The new law is political, and concerns only the security and tranquillity of the kingdom. It protects unsworn priests from persecution. Your veto, instead of protecting them, will deprive them of judicial aid, expose them to massacre, and force France to become their executioner. This is my opinion, Sire, — excuse a soldier's frankness, — this is my opinion, which I venture to express, — that having endorsed the former decree, making the oath almost compulsory, your veto of the second decree, — which may prevent an impending deluge of blood, — your veto, Sire, will burden your Majesty's conscience with all the crimes to which it may lead among the populace."

"To what crimes will it lead, Monsieur, — to what crimes greater than those already committed?" asked a voice from the end of the room.

Dumouriez started at the sound of this resonant voice. He recognized the Queen's metallic and ringing accent.

"Ah Madame!" he said, "I should have greatly preferred pursuing this discussion entirely with the King."

With a bitter smile at Dumouriez, and an almost scornful glance at the King, she said: "Monsieur, I have only one question to ask you."

"What is it, Madame?"

"Do you think the King ought longer to endure Roland's threats, Servan's knavery, and the insolence of Clavières?"

"No, Madame," said Dumouriez. "I am as indignant as yourself on that point. I wonder at the King's patience; and if we may now grapple with that question, I shall dare to beg the King to make an entire change in his Council."

"Entire?" said the King.

"Yes, — that your Majesty will send away the whole six of us, and select advisers who do not belong to any party, — if they can be found."

"No, no!" said the King. "I wish you to remain, — you and the worthy Lacoste, and also Duranthon; but do me the favor of disembarrassing me of those three insolent partisans, for I swear to you that my patience is exhausted."

"A dangerous undertaking, Sire."

"And you shrink from the danger?" said the Queen.

"No, Madame; only I must make certain conditions."

"Your conditions?" said the Queen, haughtily. The Premier bowed.

"Speak on, Monsieur!" said the King.

"Sire, I am the target of the three factions which divide Paris. The Feuillants, the Girondists, and the Jacobins all aim at me. I have become decidedly unpopular; and as it is only with the support of public opinion that one can hold the reins of government, I can be really useful to you only under one condition."

"Well?"

"Let it be said publicly, Sire, that I remain in the Council, — I and my two colleagues, — only to sanction the two edicts just passed, about the priestly oath and the military camp."

"That cannot be!" cried the King.

"Impossible! Impossible!" said the Queen.

"You refuse?"

"My most cruel enemy, Monsieur," said the King, "could not well impose upon me very much harder conditions."

"Sire, on my word as a gentleman and a soldier, I believe them essential to your safety."

Turning to the Queen, he continued: "Madame, if not for yourself, — if the intrepid daughter of Maria Theresa not only despises danger, but, following her mother's example, is ready to encounter it, — pray remember that you are not alone. Think of the King! Think of your children! Instead of pushing them into the abyss, join hands with me in holding back his Majesty from the precipice over which his throne already totters."

Then he added, speaking directly to the King: "If I judged the sanction of these two decrees advisable, — even before his Majesty expressed his desire to be rid of the factious half of his cabinet, which so weighs upon him, — the proposition to dismiss these three secretaries now makes the royal endorsement of these obnoxious decrees indispensable. If you send away these secretaries without endorsing these decrees, the people will have two motives for displeasure. They will regard you as an enemy of the Constitution, and the discharged ministers will pose as martyrs; and I will not promise that the gravest events may not imperil your crown and your life before many days. As for myself, I forewarn your Majesty that I cannot, even to serve royalty, go contrary, I will not say to my principles, but to my convictions. Duranthon and Lacoste think as I do, though I am not commissioned to speak for them. As far as I am concerned, however, as I have said, Sire, — and now I repeat it, — I cannot remain in the Council unless your Majesty signs both these new laws."

The King moved impatiently. Dumouriez started for the door.

The King exchanged a rapid glance with the Queen, who called the Premier by name.

Dumouriez paused, and she continued: "Do you realize how hard it is for the King to sanction a decree which will bring to Paris twenty thousand miscreants who would like to murder us?"

"Madame, the peril is great, I know. That is a reason for facing it, but not for exaggerating it. The decree empowers the Executive to name the gathering-place of these twenty thousand men, — who are not all rascals, however. Moreover, it confides to the Secretary of War the appointment of the officers and the methods of organization."

"And the Secretary of War is Servan!"

"No, Sire. From the moment of Servan's retirement, the War Secretary is myself."

"What, you?" said the King.

"You will take the Portfolio of War?" demanded the Queen.

"Yes, Madame; and I hope I may be able to turn against your enemies the sword now suspended over your own heads."

The King and the Queen again exchanged consulting glances.

"Suppose," continued the Premier, "that I should name Soissons as the place of encampment, and that I should name as commander some firm and wise lieutenant-general, with two good marshals under him. They might form the men into battalions. As there would be four or five divisions, the War Secretary could avail himself of the demands of our generals in the field, and send one or more of these divisions to the frontier.

Then, as you see, Sire, this edict, though voted with bad intent, so far from being a hindrance to us, will be very useful."

"But are you sure of obtaining permission to place the camp at Soissons?" asked the King.

"Sure of it!"

"In that case, take the War Office!"

"Sire, as Minister of Foreign Affairs I have only a light and indirect responsibility. It is quite otherwise with the Department of War. Your generals are my enemies. You have already learned their weakness. I shall be held responsible for their faults; but as this concerns your Majesty's life, as well as the safety of the Queen and your august children, and the maintenance of the Constitution, I accept the burden. We are therefore agreed on one point, — the endorsement of the edict about the twenty thousand volunteers?"

"If you are Secretary of War, I confide myself entirely to your judgment."

"Then let us come to the edict about priests."

"That I can never sanction, as I have already told you."

"You have made your sanction of this second decree necessary by sanctioning the former decree, relating to the same subject."

"I committed a fault, for which I reproach myself. That is no reason why I should be guilty of a second, greater than the first."

"Sire!" said the Queen.

Louis turned towards his wife, and asked: "You also, Madame?"

"Sire," said the Queen, "I must acknowledge that on this point, after the explication which he has given us, I am of the Premier's opinion."

"Well, then —" said the King.

"Well, Sire —?" repeated Dumouriez.

"I consent! but with the condition that you relieve me of my three obnoxious ministers as soon as possible!"

"Believe me, Sire, that I will seize the first occasion to do so; and I feel confident that occasion is not far off."

Saluting their Majesties, the Premier then retired. They gazed after their new War Minister till the door closed behind him.

"You made me a sign to agree to his proposal," said the King. "Now what have you to say about it?"

"Accept first the military edict. Let the camp be established at Soissons. Let Dumouriez disperse the men as he proposes; and afterward — well, afterward you can see what had better be done about the priestly edict."

"But he would remind me of my pledge, Madame!"

"Good! He would be compromised, and you would have a hold upon him."

"On the contrary, he would have a hold upon me, Madame! He has my word!"

"Bah! There 's a remedy for that, when one has been trained by such a Jesuit as Monsieur de la Vauguyon!" and taking the King's arm, she drew him with her into the next room.

CHAPTER XLI.

THE OCCASION.

As we have already hinted, the real battle was now between the Rue Guénégaud and the Tuileries, between the Queen and Madame Roland.

It is indeed strange that both these women exercised over their husbands an influence which led all four to death; only they travelled towards this end by opposite roads.

The events which we have narrated took place on June 10. The next day, in the evening, Servan came joyously to Madame Roland's.

"Congratulate me, dear friend," he said. "I have the honor of being turned out of the Council."

"How so?" asked Madame Roland.

"This is actually the fact. This morning I went to the King, for an interview about certain affairs in my department. When those had been attended to, I warmly attacked the question of the encampment for twenty thousand volunteers; but — "

"But —?"

"At the first word I spoke, his Majesty turned his back on me, being in a very bad humor; and this evening, in his Majesty's name, Dumouriez sent to me for the War Portfolio."

"Dumouriez?"

"Yes!"

"He is playing a villanous part, but that does n't surprise me. Ask Roland what I said to him about that man, the evening he came to us for the first time. Besides, we are informed that he is in daily conference with the Queen."

"He 's a traitor!"

"No! but he 's ambitious. Go and find Roland and Clavières."

"Where is Roland?"

"He is attending to his duties at the Bureau of the Interior."

"And you, — what are you about meanwhile?"

"Writing a letter which I will communicate to you on your return. — So be off!"

"You are certainly the famous Goddess of Reason, whom philosophers have invoked from time immemorial."

"And whom conscientious people have found. — Don't come back without Clavières."

"That request will probably cause some delay."

"I need an hour."

"Take it! and may the Genius of France inspire you!"

Servan went away. Hardly was the door shut before Madame Roland was at her desk, writing the following letter to the King, though it was not to appear in her own name.

SIRE: The present state of affairs in France cannot long continue. It is a crucial condition, whose tide is attaining its highest mark. It cannot but end in a storm, which must concern your Majesty as well as the whole country.

Honored with your confidence, and placed in a position where I owe you the truth, I venture to speak. Indeed, this is an obligation imposed upon me by yourself.

The French people have had a Constitution bestowed upon them. Some it makes discontented, and some rebellious; but the majority of the people wish to maintain it. They have sworn to maintain it, even at the cost of their own blood, and they have even joyfully greeted a civil war, which offered them a strong means of ensuring the maintenance of the Constitution.

Meanwhile the minority, buoyed up by certain encouragements, have used every effort to get the advantage. Hence an internal struggle against the laws. Hence the anarchy which good citizens lament, and which evil-wishers have used as an occasion for deriding the new order of things. Out of this arise the divisions everywhere showing themselves; for indifference is nowhere to be found. There is a popular demand for either the triumph or the amendment of the Constitution. People are working for either its maintenance or its alteration.

I herein abstain from any examination of what the Constitution is in itself, in order to consider only what present circumstances require. So far as possible I place myself outside the Constitution, in order to learn what is expected of it, and what measures ought to be favored.

Your Majesty rejoices in certain important prerogatives, which you believe to rightfully belong to royalty. Brought up with the idea of maintaining those prerogatives, you cannot gladly see them taken away. The desire for their restoration is as natural as regret at their disappearance.

These sentiments, which inhere in the nature of the human heart, must have entered into the calculations of the enemies of the Revolution. They have counted on secret favor, until such a time as circumstances may permit open protection. These tendencies cannot escape the notice of the Nation, and they inspire distrust.

Your Majesty has been constantly placed between two alternatives. On the one side you have been tempted to seek a return to ancient customs and personal preferences. On the other you have been urged to make those personal sacrifices which are dictated by philosophy and exacted by necessity.

This has led you to doubt whether you should embolden the malecontents who disturb the Nation, or appease the Nation by uniting yourself with it. Everything has an end, however, and the end of uncertainty has at last arrived.

Will his Majesty openly ally himself with those who pretend to wish to reform the Constitution, or generously and unreservedly devote himself to making it triumphant? That is the question whose solution is rendered inevitable by the absolute condition of things.

As to that very metaphysical inquiry, whether the French people are ripe for liberty, its discussion is not now in order; for it does not concern us so much to decide what our people may be a century hence, as to know of what the present generation is capable.

The Declaration of Human Rights, so early adopted by the Assembly, has become a political Gospel, and the French Constitution has already become a religion, for which the people are ready to die. This elation has already reached a point where it sometimes overrides the laws; and where the laws were not strong enough to repress malecontents, citizens have taken retribution into their own hands. In this way the estates and property of refugees, or of persons known to belong to their party, have been exposed to ravages inspired by revenge. This is why the authorities, in so many districts, have been obliged to deal severely with those priests who are proscribed by a public opinion which makes them its victims.

In this collision of interests, all sentiments have taken on a tinge of passion. Our Country is not simply a phrase for the imagination to dilate upon and embellish. It is a living being, for which sacrifices must be made, and which is the more endeared to us by the solicitude it causes. The Nation has been developed by great efforts, and reared in the midst of anxieties; and she is loved as much for what she has cost as for the hopes she holds forth. All the attacks made upon her but add so much fuel to the popular enthusiasm in her behalf.

To what a height will not this enthusiasm mount, whenever the united forces of our outside enemies combine with intestine intrigues to smite our Nation with fatal blows?

There are great disturbances in all parts of the kingdom. This fermentation will lead to a terrible explosion, unless calmed by a rational confidence in your Majesty's intentions. This confidence cannot be built on protestations. It must rest upon a basis of facts.

It is evident that the Constitution will be an established fact for the French Nation, and that our government will have all essential guarantees, as soon as your Majesty — absolutely desiring the success of that Constitution — is ready to sustain the Legislature to the full extent of your power in the Executive Department, so that the uneasiness of the people may be removed, and no aid and comfort be afforded to malecontents.

For example, two important edicts have been passed by the Assembly. Both intimately concern the public peace and the safety of the state. Delay in signing these edicts rouses distrust. If prolonged, it will cause great dissatisfaction.

In view of this impending effervescence of the public mind — I must say this — the turbulent elements of society may sweep all before them.

It is no longer possible to draw back. There are no further means of temporizing. The Revolution has taken fast hold upon our minds. It will become an accomplished fact, even at the price of blood; and therewith it will be cemented, unless wisdom anticipates such a misfortune, which it is yet possible to evade.

I am aware that some people imagine that anything can be accomplished or upheld by extreme measures; but if force should be employed to constrain our Assembly, as soon as terror spread over Paris, and division and dismay seized upon the suburbs, all France would rise in indignation. Torn with the horrors of civil war the Nation would develop that gloomy energy, — mother alike of virtues and of crimes, — always fatal to those who provoked it.

The welfare of the state and the happiness of your Majesty are closely connected. No force can separate them. Cruel woes and dire misfortunes will surround your throne, if it is not planted by yourself on the groundwork of the Constitution, and so bound firmly to that peace which the maintenance of that Constitution must finally procure for us.

Thus it is that the public disposition, the general course of events, political policy, and your Majesty's interest, all render indispensable your obligation to unite with the legislative body in responding to the wishes of the Nation. These reasons make a necessity of what principle sets forth as a duty. The natural sensibility of an affectionate people is ready to adopt any method of showing its gratitude.

You have been cruelly deceived, Sire, by those who have inspired you to distrust the people, or estrange yourself from subjects so easily touched with affection. It is through your perpetual alarm from this direction, that you have been pushed into a line of conduct which causes public disturbance. Only let it be seen that you are resolved to aid the success of the Constitution with which the popular happiness is so bound up, and soon you will again become the object of your people's fervent prayers.

The conduct of the priests in many sections affords a pretext which encourages the fanaticism of agitators, and this has made it necessary to pass a law against such disturbers. Oh that your Majesty would approve that edict! The public tranquillity demands it. The safety of the priesthood requires it. If that law is not put into operation, the departmental authorities will be compelled to substitute violent measures in place of legal measures, as has already been done in all directions, and the irritated people will rush into immediate excesses.

The attempts of our enemies; the agitation which has manifested itself in the capital; the great anxiety inspired by the behavior of your disbanded guards, and especially the ardent satisfaction shown by your Majesty, in a proclamation decidedly impolitic under the circumstances; the situation of Paris, and its nearness to the frontiers, — all these facts have created a necessity for a military encampment in our neighborhood.

This measure, whose urgency and expediency commend it to all well-disposed minds, still awaits your Majesty's approval. Why is tardiness allowed to give this approval an air of reluctance, when celerity would win all hearts?

Already the efforts of the staff-officers of the Parisian National Guards against this measure have roused the suspicion that they are instigated thereto by a higher authority. Already the declarations of several fanatical demagogues have awakened a suspicion of their alliance with those who are interested in the overturn of the Constitution. Already these facts have compromised your Majesty's intentions. If there is further delay, the disappointed people will see in their sovereign the friend and accomplice of conspirators.

Great Heaven! hast thou struck earthly powers with blindness? Shall we never have other counsel than that which leads to ruin?

I know that the severe language of truth is rarely welcome near the throne. I know also that revolutions are made necessary by the fact that truth is so seldom heard by royalty. I also know that I sustain to your Majesty, not solely the relation of a simple citizen, amenable to the laws, but also the relation of a cabinet-minister, honored with your confidence, and clothed with functions which confirm that trust; and I am unacquainted with any reason which should prevent me from fulfilling a duty I owe to my conscience.

It is in the same spirit that I reiterate my representations to your Majesty, as to the obligation and utility of putting into execution the law which ordains the appointment of a recording secretary for your Council. The simple existence of this law speaks so powerfully, that the execution thereof should follow without delay. It is important that all means should be employed to give such deliberations the proper gravity, prudence, and maturity; and if cabinet-ministers are to be held responsible, their opinions should be duly recorded. If such records were kept, I should not now be writing this letter to your Majesty.

Life is naught to one who esteems duty as of the highest importance; but next the happiness of having fulfilled the obligations of conscience, the single remaining pleasure is to prove that this task has been faithfully performed; and even that charge is not merely a public officer's pleasure, but his duty.

June 10, 1792.
The year IV. of Liberty.

This letter was hardly finished, and Madame Roland had barely traced the last word, when Servan, Clavières, and Roland came in.

In two words Madame Roland unfolded her plan to the three friends.

The letter, which was now read among the three, was to be next day read to the other three ministers, Dumouriez, Lacoste, and Duranthon.

Either they would approve it, and add their signatures, or they would reject it. In the latter event, Servan, Clavières, and Roland would at once offer their resignations, moved to do so by the refusal of their colleagues to sign a letter which seemed truly to express the opinions and wishes of the French people.

Then they would deposit the letter with the National Assembly, that there might be no doubt throughout France of the cause of the withdrawal of these Patriots from the Council.

The letter was read by the three friends, who did not find a word they wished to change. Madame Roland was the common soul, from which each drank the elixir of patriotism.

It was not the same on the morrow, after the letter was read by Roland to Dumouriez, Duranthon, and Lacoste.

All three approved the ideas, but differed as to the manner of expressing those ideas. At last they rejected the letter, declaring it would be worth more if reported personally to the King. Of course this was only an evasion of the question.

That evening Roland sent the letter to the King, signed by himself alone. Almost immediately Lacoste sent a dismissal to Roland and Clavières.

As Dumouriez had said to the King, they did not have long to wait for an occasion of dismission. It is also true that the King did not try to retard the occasion.

The next day, as had been planned, Roland's letter was read from the rostrum of the Assembly, at the same time as the announcement of the removal of himself and his two colleagues, Clavières and Servan.

By an immense majority the Assembly voted a record of its opinion, that the three deposed ministers deserved well of their country.

Thus war was declared both inside and outside France. Before dealing the opening blows, the Assembly only waited to learn what were the King's intentions in reference to the two decrees.

CHAPTER XLII.

THE PUPIL OF MONSIEUR DE LA VAUGUYON.

At the very moment when the Assembly was voting, by acclamation, thanks to the three retiring ministers, and ordering that Roland's letter should be printed and sent to all the departments of the kingdom, Dumouriez appeared at the legislative door.

He was known to be brave, but it was not supposed that he was audacious.

He had been apprised of what was going on, and had come boldly to take the bull by the horns.

The pretext for his appearance at the Assembly at that moment was a remarkable report on the condition of the Nation's military forces. As Minister of War only since the evening previous, he had, with the help of others, prepared this report during a single night. It was an attack upon Servan, which in reality fell upon Grave, and above all upon their predecessor, Narbonne. Servan had only been minister during ten or twelve days.

Dumouriez came well fortified. He had just left the King, whom he had urged to remain faithful to his double pledge in regard to his approval of the two decrees; and the King had responded, not only by renewing his promise, but by affirming that the clergy, whom he had consulted in order to satisfy his conscience, were of the same opinion as Dumouriez. So the War Minister went straight to the rostrum, which he ascended amid confused outcries and fierce shouts.

As soon as he reached the platform he coolly asked for a hearing.

This was granted, in the midst of an ungovernable tumult. At last, curiosity to hear what Dumouriez had to say brought about a calm.

"Gentlemen, General Gouvion has recently been killed. God has rewarded him for his courage. He died fighting the enemies of France. He is indeed happy! He is not a witness of our frightful discords! I envy his lot!"

Such words, uttered with dignity and deep melancholy, made their impression on the Assembly. Moreover this death caused a diversion in the sentiments of the members. They began to consider what ought to be done by the Assembly, in order to express its regret to the General's family, and it was decided that the President should write a letter of condolence.

Then Dumouriez again asked for the floor, which was again accorded.

He drew his report from his pocket; but hardly had he read the title, "Report on the Ministry of War," before the Girondists and Jacobins began to yell, in order to prevent him from reading it.

In the midst of this noise he read the introduction, but in such elevated tones, and with such clear enunciation, that they could not help hearing that this exordium dwelt upon the respect due a cabinet-minister, and was also an attack upon party divisions.

Such cheek was likely to excite his hearers, even if they had been in a less irritable mood.

"Do you hear him?" cried Guadet. "He already feels so sure of his strength, that he dares take us to task!"

"Why not?" replied Dumouriez, tranquilly, turning towards his interrupter.

It was long ago said, and truly, that in France the most prudent thing is courage. Dumouriez's courage vanquished his adversaries. They held their peace. That is, as they wished to hear, they listened.

The report was learned, luminous, able. Strong as was the prejudice against the speaker, he was twice applauded.

Lacuée, who was a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, took the stand to reply, while Dumouriez rolled up the report and was coolly replacing it in his pocket.

The Girondists saw this movement, and one of them called out: "See him, the traitor! He 's putting his report into his pocket. He means to run away with it. Stop him! That document will serve to confound him later on!"

At this outcry Dumouriez, who had not taken a single step towards the entrance, again drew the report from his pocket, and offered it to an usher.

A secretary stretched out his hand to receive it; and having received it, he searched for the signature. "Gentlemen, the report is not signed."

"Sign it! Sign it!" came from all sides.

"That was my intention," said Dumouriez. "So religiously is it drawn up, that I need not hesitate about putting my name to it. Give me the ink and a quill!"

Some one offered him a quill wet with ink. He then set one foot on the platform steps, and signed the report upon his knee.

The usher offered to take it again; but Dumouriez pushed him aside, and went and deposited the report on the desk. Then he crossed the hall with short steps, stopping here and there, and went out through the door behind the benches on the left.

His entry had been greeted with yells and shouts; but his exit, on the other hand, was accompanied by the profoundest silence.

The spectators in the galleries hurried out through the corridors, to have another look at the man who had dared to confront the whole Assembly.

At the Feuillant gate he was surrounded by three or four hundred persons, who pressed about him through curiosity or dislike, as if they had foreseen that three months later he would be the savior of France at Valmy.

Several Royalist Deputies left the hall, one after the other, and ran after Dumouriez. In their minds there was no longer any doubt that the General belonged to their party. This was precisely what Dumouriez had anticipated; and this was why he had made the King promise to sanction the two edicts.

"Well, General," said one of them, "they are raising the Devil in there!"

"They may well do that," answered Dumouriez, "for I don't know but what the Devil is at the bottom of it."

"You don't know?" said another. "Why, the Assembly has raised the question whether it is not best to send you to Orleans, and let you be tried there."

"Good!" said Dumouriez. "I need a vacation. There I can take the baths, drink fresh milk, and get rested."

"General," cried a third person, "they are voting not to print your report."

"So much the better. It is a blunder which will win unprejudiced observers to my side."

In the midst of such an escort and of such speeches Dumouriez arrived at the palace. The King welcomed him most cordially, for now the War Minister was decidedly compromised.

The new Council was already in session. In dismissing Roland, Servan, and Clavières, the Premier had believed himself well able to replace them.

For Minister of the Interior he proposed Mourgues, of Montpellier, a Protestant and a member of several scientific academies, who had formerly belonged to the Feuillant Club. This name the King had accepted.

For the Foreign Portfolio he had proposed either Maulde, Sémonville, or Naillac. The King preferred Naillac.

For Secretary of Finance he had proposed Vergennes, a nephew of the old Secretary. Vergennes was acceptable to the King, who immediately sent after him; but this gentleman, though expressing a deep attachment to the King, declined the honor.

It was therefore decided that during the interim the Finance Portfolio should be held by the Secretary of the Interior; and that while waiting for the return of Naillac, who was absent from Paris, Dumouriez should continue in charge of Foreign Affairs.

These four ministers, however, did not conceal from themselves the gravity of the situation; and they agreed that if the King, after the dismissal of Servan, Clavières, and Roland, should not keep the promise which was the price of this dismissal, they also would resign.

The new Council, as we have said, was already in session. The King knew what had taken place at the Assembly. He congratulated Dumouriez on the attitude he had maintained, and immediately signed the decree for the establishment of a camp of twenty thousand volunteers; but he postponed till the next day his official approval of the edict concerning the recalcitrant priests. He said he had still some scruples of conscience, which might be relieved by his confessor.

The ministers looked at one another. A faint suspicion glided through their minds. All things considered, however, the King's timorous conscience might need this delay, in order to become thoroughly strengthened.

The next day the Council returned to the question of the evening before. Sure enough, the night had done its work. The King's will was strengthened, if not his conscience. He declared he should append his veto to that edict.

One after the other, Dumouriez leading, — because to him the royal pledge had been personally given, — the four ministers spoke to the King firmly, but respectfully.

The King listened with closed eyes, in the attitude of a man who has made up his mind. When they had all spoken he said: "Gentlemen, I have written a letter to the President of the Assembly, to inform him of my resolution. One of you will countersign it, and all four of you will take the letter to the Assembly."

This was an order, issued in the style of the old régime, but ill-sounding to the ears of ministers made responsible under the Constitution.

"Sire," said Dumouriez, after an ocular consultation with his colleagues, "have you no other commands to issue?"

"No!" replied the King; and then he at once left the room.

The ministers remained in their places and voted to request an audience for next day. It was agreed that they should enter into no explanations, but simply resign in a body.

Dumouriez returned home. The King had almost beaten him in the game of politics, the finesse of diplomacy, — him, the general whose courage had been doubly buttressed by intrigue!

He found three notes from different persons, announcing mischievous gatherings in the Faubourg Saint Antoine, and cabals at Santerre's brewery. He at once wrote to the King to warn him of these occurrences.

An hour later he received a billet, not signed by the King, but in his handwriting:

Do not imagine, Monsieur, that I am to be intimidated by threats. My stand is taken.

In his turn Dumouriez seized his pen and wrote:

SIRE: You misjudge me, if you suppose me capable of employing such a method of maintaining my position. My colleagues and myself have the honor of writing to your Majesty, to ask for the favor of an audience to-morrow, at ten in the forenoon. Meanwhile I beg your Majesty to have the goodness to accept my resignation, and to select a successor who will take my place within twenty-four hours, and take charge of the departments both of War and Foreign Affairs.

This letter he sent by a clerk, in order to ensure a response. The clerk departed exactly at midnight, and in half an hour returned with the following note:

I will meet my ministers to-morrow at ten, and we will then talk over what you have written.

The Counter-Revolution was evidently at work in the palace. The Crown must indeed depend upon some reliable support.

There were the Constitutional Guards. To be sure they had been disbanded, but they were ready to come together at the first call.

Then there were seven or eight thousand Chevaliers of the Order of Saint Louis, for whom their red ribbon was a rallying sign.

Three Swiss battalions, of sixteen hundred men each, constituted an impregnable body of men, firm as the ancient Helvetian rocks.

Better than all was a letter from Lafayette, in which this phrase occurred:

> Persist, Sire! Strong in the authority delegated to you by the National Assembly, you will find all good Frenchmen arrayed in support of your throne!

Thus we see that something might be done. This was what was proposed: in one breath to reunite the Constitutional Guards, together with the Knights of Saint Louis and the Swiss mercenaries; on the same day, and at the same hour, to seize upon the cannon in the different sections, close the Assembly and the Jacobin Club, rally all the Royalist members of the National Guard, — forming a contingency of some fifteen thousand men, — and then wait for Lafayette, who in three days of forced marching could come from Ardennes.

Unfortunately the Queen would not listen to the suggestion of Lafayette's assistance. He was a moderate Revolutionist. In the Queen's opinion a moderate Revolution might be able to establish itself and persistently hold its own; whereas a Jacobin Revolution would run into such extremes that it could not last.

Oh, if Charny had only been there! but nobody knew where Charny was; and even if they had known, it would have been too great a humiliation for the Queen — not to mention the woman — to run after him.

The night was passed in tumultuous deliberation at the palace. The Court had the means of defence, and even of attack; but there was lacking a strong hand to arrange and direct.

At ten in the forenoon the ministers came. This was on June 16. The King received them in his private parlor.

Duranthon spoke first. In the name of all four, and with tender and deep respect, he offered the resignations of himself and colleagues.

"Yes, I quite understand you," said the King, — "the responsibility!"

"Sire," said Lacoste, "the royal responsibility! As to ourselves, you may surely believe that we are ready to die for your Majesty; but by dying for a set of priests, we should only hasten the fall of royalty."

Louis turned to Dumouriez. "Do you still entertain the same sentiments which you expressed in your letter?"

"Yes, Sire," responded Dumouriez, "if your Majesty is not converted by the fidelity of our attachment."

"Very well!" said the King, with a gloomy air. "If your decision is made, I accept your resignations, and will attend to your affairs."

All four bowed. Mourgues had his resignation already written out, and handed it to the King. The others gave theirs orally.

There were courtiers waiting in the antechamber. They saw the ministers come out, and saw, by the official faces, that all was over. Some courtiers rejoiced. Others were scared. The atmosphere was heavy, as often happens in the hot days of summer, and everybody felt the coming of the storm.

At the gates of the Tuileries, Dumouriez met a commander of the National Guard, Romainvilliers. He was coming with all haste.

"Monsieur Secretary," he said, "I come for orders."

"I am no longer minister, Monsieur," answered Dumouriez.

"But there are disturbing assemblages in some of the districts."

"Go to the King for orders!"

"This is a pressing affair!"

"Hurry, then! The King has already accepted our resignations."

Romainvilliers ran up the staircase.

On June 17, in the morning, Dumouriez saw Chambonnas and Lajard enter his apartments. They came on behalf of the King, — Chambonnas to receive the Portfolio of Foreign Affairs, and Lajard, the Portfolio of War.

The King expected Dumouriez on the next morning, June 18, to arrange with him the last details of his office, and go over the account of secret expenditures.

Seeing him re-enter the palace, it was believed that he had been recalled to his station, and many came up to congratulate him.

"Gentlemen," said Dumouriez, "be careful! You are making friends, not with a man who is coming in, but with a man who is going out. I only come to surrender my accounts."

Immediately there was a general stampede in his neighborhood.

At that moment an usher announced that the King would see Monsieur Dumouriez in his chamber.

The King had regained his serenity. Was this from mental force, or did it arise from a delusive sense of security?

Dumouriez presented his accounts. This task being finished, Dumouriez arose.

The King turned his armchair around and said: "Then you propose to rejoin Luckner's army?"

"Yes, Sire. I am glad to quit this dreadful city, and do so with only one regret, — that of leaving you in danger."

"Indeed," said Louis, with comparative indifference, "I know that I am always more or less in peril."

"Sire, you must know that what I now say to you has no personal interest to me. Once out of your Council, I am forever separated from you. It is out of fidelity, out of the purest attachment to yourself, out of my love of country, — it is for the sake of your crown, your wife, your children, it is in the name of all that is dear and sacred to the human heart, — that I beg your Majesty not to persist in your veto. This tenacity will do no good, and you will be lost, Sire!"

"Speak no further," said the King, impatiently, "my position is taken!"

"Sire, Sire, you said the same thing here, in this very room, in the Queen's presence, when you promised to approve those two edicts."

"I was wrong so to promise, Monsieur, and I have repented."

"Sire, I repeat to you, — and as this is the last time I shall have the honor of seeing you, pray pardon my frankness, — that you were not in the wrong when you promised to uphold these decrees; but you are wrong to-day, when you refuse to keep your promise. Your conscience is abused. You are urged on to a civil war. You have no strength. You will be overcome. History will pity you; but it will reproach you as the cause of our country's woes."

"Our country's woes?" said Louis. "Do you pretend to say I shall be blamed on that account?"

"Yes, Sire!"

"God is my witness, that I wish only the best happiness of France."

"I have no doubt of it, Sire! but you must render an account to God, not only for the purity, but also for the sagacity of your intentions. You think you are serving religion. You are destroying it. Your priests will be massacred. Your crown will be broken and rolled in your own blood, — in the blood also of the Queen and your children. Oh, my King, my King!"

Almost suffocating, Dumouriez pressed his lips on the hand which the King extended to him.

Then the King said, with that perfect serenity and majesty of which one might have supposed him incapable: "You are right, Monsieur. I expect a violent death, and I pardon my murderers in advance. As to yourself, you have served me faithfully. I esteem you, and I know that your intuitions are right. — Adieu, Monsieur!"

Rising quickly, the King retired into the embrasure of a window.

Dumouriez slowly gathered his papers together, in order to give himself time to compose his countenance. With lingering steps he went towards the door, ready to turn back at the first word from Louis the Sixteenth; but the first words were also the last.

"Adieu, Monsieur! May you be happy!" said the King.

After these words there was no excuse for tarrying an instant longer. Dumouriez went out.

Royalty had broken with its last prop. The King had dropped his mask. He stood with uncovered face before the people.

Let us see what the people were doing on their side.

CHAPTER XLIII.

A CABAL AT CHARENTON.

All day long a man parades up and down the Saint Antoine Quarter. He is dressed in a general's uniform, rides a huge Flemish horse, shakes hands right and left, kissing the pretty girls, and giving the young fellows drink-money.

This man is one of the six who have succeeded Lafayette, in joint command of the National Guards, — a silver piece divided into six copper sous. In other words, this is General Santerre, chief of a battalion.

Near him, like an aide-de-camp near his general, — and mounted also on a strong horse, — trots a man whose costume shows him to be a Patriot from the rural districts. A cut has left its scar on his forehead. His eye is gloomy and his physiognomy threatening. He presents a marked contrast to his commander, who has a frank smile and an open countenance.

"Be on the alert, my good friends! Watch over the Nation! Traitors are conspiring against her, but we are at the front." So speaks Santerre.

"What must we do, Monsieur Santerre?" ask the citizens of the ward. "You know we are with you! Where are the traitors? Lead us against them!"

"Wait!" replies Santerre. "When the right moment comes —"

"And is it coming?"

Santerre really does not know; but he responds at a venture: "Yes, yes! Be easy! You 'll be notified!"

The man following Santerre bends over his horse's neck, and whispers in the ear of certain men, whom he recognizes by certain signs: "The Twentieth of June!"

These men go away with that date on their lips. At a distance of every ten, twenty, or thirty paces a group forms about him, and this message circulates: "The Twentieth of June!"

What is to happen on that day? Nobody yet knows; but this they do know, that on June 20 something is to be done.

Among the men to whom this date is communicated may be recognized some who are no strangers to the events already recorded in our narrative.

There is Saint-Huruge, whom we saw on the morning of October 5, 1789, at the head of the first detachment which left the Palace Royal Garden for Versailles. Saint-Huruge is a husband who had been deceived by his wife at some time prior to 1789. He was imprisoned in the Bastille, from which he was delivered on July 14, when that fortress was demolished, and thereafter he devoted himself to revenge on nobility and royalty, in return for his conjugal wrongs and his illegal incarceration.

You recognize Verrières, do you not? Twice before have we met this Apocalyptical hunchback, with legs so long and body so short that he looks as if he were cloven in twain from toe to chin. Once we met him in the wine-shop at Sevres Bridge, in company with Marat and Aiguillon, the Duke being disguised as a woman. Again we saw him at the Champ de Mars, an instant before the firing began.

There is Fournier the American (so-called) who shot at Lafayette through the wheels of a carriage, and whose musket missed fire. He then promised himself that next time he would strike higher than the Commander of the National Guard, and in order that his gun should not thwart him again, he determined that he would strike with the sword.

There is Monsieur de Beausire, who has not amended his ways during the time he has been left in the background by our story, — after he reclaimed Olivia from the arms of the dying Mirabeau, — as the Chevalier des Grieux reclaimed Manon Lescaut from the hands which lifted her temporarily from the mud, and then let her fall again into the mire.

There is Mouchy, a short, twisted, lame, bandy-legged man, enveloped in an enormous tricolored scarf, which covers half his body, as if he were a municipal officer, a justice of the peace, or something of that sort.

Behold Gonchon, the Mirabeau of the People, who was once judged by Pitou to be homelier than the Mirabeau of the Nobility, — Gonchon, who disappears after an outbreak, as if he were part of a supernatural spectacle; but who vanishes only to reappear afterwards, more impassioned than ever, more terrible, more venomous, like a demon, without whom the manager of the spectacle could not get along.

Up and down through the crowd — reunited around the ruins of the Bastille, as on a modern Mount Aventine — passes and repasses a spare and pale young man, with hair brushed down smooth, and eyes full of fire. He is acquainted with nobody, and nobody is acquainted with him. He is as solitary as the eagle, which some day he is to make the national emblem.

This is Bonaparte, a lieutenant of artillery, who by chance is spending his furlough in Paris. It will be remembered that Cagliostro made a singular prediction to Gilbert concerning this man, when he once came to the Jacobin Club.

By whom is this crowd moved, influenced, excited? By a man with a powerful frame, a roaring voice, and hair like a lion's mane, whom Santerre, on his return home, finds waiting for him in his back shop, — Danton.

This is the hour when this terrible Revolutionist — hardly known heretofore, except by the noise which he made in the pit at the Theatre Français, over the representation of Chénier's "Charles the Ninth," and by his awful platform eloquence at the Cordelier Club — makes his first real appearance on the political stage, where he extends his giant arms.

Whence comes this man's power, which threatens to be so fatal to royalty? From the Queen herself.

She would not have Lafayette for Mayor of Paris, — this vengeful Austrian woman. She preferred Pétion, the man who was so discourteous to her on the journey from Varennes. Hardly was he installed as Mayor when he began the contest with the King, by placing the Tuileries under surveillance.

When he took possession of the City Hall, Pétion had two friends whom he stationed on his right hand and left, — Manuel on his right, Danton on his left. He appointed Manuel to the office of City Solicitor, with Danton as his substitute.

Standing on the rostrum and pointing to the Tuileriès, Vergniaud had said: "Often enough, in the olden days, have Terror and Dismay stalked forth from yonder palace, in the name of Despotism. Now let Terror and Dismay re-enter that palace, in the name of Law."

Well, the hour has come when the Girondist orator's grand yet fearful metaphor is to be translated into action. Terror is to be sought for and found in the Saint Antoine District, and hurried, with her discordant cries and distorted arms, into the palace reared by Catherine de Medicis.

What better can be done than to evoke that terrible Magician of the Revolution, whom men call Danton?

Danton has large shoulders and a heavy hand. Beneath his athletic breast beats a stout heart. Danton is the signal gong of the Revolution. To the blow struck upon his breast he responds with a powerful vibration, which spreads throughout the crowd, which is drowned in the noise.

On one side Danton touches the people, through Hébert. On the other he reaches the throne, through Orleans. He stands midway between the petty tradesman, at the street corner, and the prince royal, on the steps of the throne.

By a touch upon each connecting key before him, he can reach a responsive social fibre. Cast your eyes over this gamut, which runs over two octaves, in harmony with this powerful voice: Hébert, Legendre, Gonchon, Rossignol, Momoro, Brune, Huguenin, Rotondo, Santerre, Fabre d'Églantine, Camille Desmoulins, Dugazon, Lazouski, Sillery, Genlis, the Duke of Orleans.

Take note that we cognize only the visible outlines of power; but who shall say to what depths this force descends, and out of what depths it arises, — depths beyond the reach of our vision?

Well, it is this unseen power which sways the Saint Antoine Quarter.

On June 16 one of Danton's men, Lazouski the Pole, — a member of the Communal Council, — shoots the arrow.

He announces in the Council that on June 20 two districts, Saint Antoine and Saint Marceau, will present petitions to the King and to the Assembly, on the subject of the royal veto of the edict relative to the non-juring priests; and that at the same time they will plant a tree in the Feuillant Terrace, to be christened the Tree of Liberty, in commemoration of the session and oath in the Tennis Court, on June 20, 1789. To this scheme the Council refuses its sanction.

"We must get along without its sanction," whispered Danton in Lazouski's ear.

Lazouski repeats aloud: "We can get along without it!"

So this date of June 20 has an exoteric and an esoteric meaning. One is a pretext — the presentation of a petition and the planting of a Liberty Tree.

The other significance of the day is as yet known only to a few of the initiated. There is to be an attempt to rescue France from Lafayette and the Feuillants, and warn the incorrigible King, still a sovereign of the old school, that there are political tempests wherein a monarch may be engulfed, with his throne, his crown, his family, — as a ship is swallowed up in the ocean, with many lives and chattels, "with all her crew complete."

As we have said, Danton has been waiting for Santerre in the latter's back shop. He sent word last night, by Legendre, that to-day the awakening of the district must begin. In the morning Billot presented himself at the brewer's. After making a sign of recognition, he announced that for all day the committee had assigned him the duty of remaining near Santerre. This is how it happens that Billot, while apparently acting as Santerre's aide, really knows more about the whole matter than Santerre himself.

Danton makes an appointment with Santerre for the evening of the next day, in a small house at Charenton, situated on the right bank of the Marne, at the end of the bridge.

There may be met all those men, of mysterious and secret ways, who always direct the current in times of commotion. Each one of them is punctual at the rendezvous.

The passions of these men are diverse. Whence do they take their rise? That is indeed a gloomy page of history. Some are moved by love of liberty. Many, like Billot, are moved by the desire of vengeance for insults received. The greatest number are moved by hatred, misery, and bad instincts.

On the main floor is a closed room, into which only the chiefs have the right of entrance. From this room they emerge with careful, exact, and peremptory injunctions. One might call this room a Shekinah, where some god utters his oracles.

An immense map of Paris is spread on the table. Danton's finger traces the springs and brooks, — the courses and junction-points of these rivulets, these rivers, these streams of men, which two days later will inundate Paris.

Bastille Square, into which empty all the streets from the Saint Antoine, Saint Marceau, and Arsenal quarters, is named as the place of meeting. The Assembly Hall is to be the ostensible aim of the march, the Tuileries its real object.

The boulevard is to be the wide and safe street through which the thundering human wave is to roll.

Posts having been assigned to each conspirator, and each having promised to be on hand, the chiefs separate.

The general order is, to finish up at the palace. How are they to finish up at the palace? That is left in uncertainty.

During the whole day, on June 19, groups of people are standing on the embankments of the ruined Bastille, in the neighborhood of the Arsenal, and in the Saint Antoine District.

Suddenly a bold and fearsome amazon, clad all in red, appears in the midst of the Saint Antoine crowd. In her belt she carries her pistols. At her side she wears a sword, which, after eighteen other wounds, is destined to search out the heart-life of Suleau.

This is Théroigne de Méricourt, the beautiful citizeness of Liége. We saw her on the road to Versailles, on that memorable day in October. Where has she been in the interval?

Her native city, Liége, was in revolt. Théroigne wished to go to its help. She was arrested by the agents of King Leopold, and detained eighteen months in Austrian prisons.

Did she escape? Was she allowed to get away? Did she file her bars? Did she corrupt her jailer? Everything about this woman is as mysterious as the beginning of her life, as terrible as its end.

Whatever may be the other facts, she has returned! Here she is! From being a courtesan, rolling in wealth, she has become the people's prostitute. The nobility have given her the gold, wherewith she has procured the well-tempered blades and the embossed pistols with which she is to smite her enemies.

The people recognize her and welcome her with loud cries. How seasonably she arrives, the beautiful Théroigne, clad in red for the bloody festival of the morrow!

On the evening of the same day the Queen sees her gallop along the Feuillant Terrace. She is on her way from Bastille Square to the Champs Élysées, from the popular assemblage to the Patriotic banquet.

From the attics of the Tuileries, whither the Queen ascends when she hears the outcries, she can see the well-spread tables. Wine circulates. Patriotic songs resound. As each toast is drunk, — to the Assembly, to the Girondists, to Liberty, — the feasters shake their fists at the Tuileries.

Dugazon, the actor, sings couplets deriding the King, the Queen, and the palace; and the King and Queen can hear the applause which follows each refrain.

Who are these feasters? Marseilles Federals, led by Barbaroux. They only arrived last night.

On June 18 the Tenth of August makes its entry into Paris.

CHAPTER XLIV.

THE TWENTIETH OF JUNE.

In the month of June daylight comes early. By five in the morning the battalions had assembled. This time the uprising was systematic, and appeared almost like an invasion. The crowd knew its leaders and was submissive to discipline. Each man had his appointed place, under his own flag and in his proper rank.

Santerre was on horseback, with the staff of men belonging to his district. Billot did not leave Santerre for an instant. One might have supposed him charged, by some occult power, with the guardianship of his chief.

The multitude was separated into three divisions. The first was commanded by Santerre, the second by Saint-Huruge, the third by Théroigne de Méricourt.

Towards eleven o'clock, under an order brought by some man unknown, the immense mass of people put itself in motion. At its departure from the Bastille, the procession was composed of nearly twenty thousand men.

This troop presented a savage, terrible, and unique aspect. Santerre's division was the best-ordered. There were in it a goodly number of uniforms; and for weapons they had a fair supply of muskets and bayonets. The other two divisions constituted the army of the populace, ragged, lean, and haggard, — after four years of privation and of bread-scarcity, with three Revolutionary years among the four. This was the slum from which this army had come forth.

They had no guns and no uniforms. Their vests were in tatters, their blouses torn. Their odd weapons were such as they could light upon in the first wrathful impulse, at the first call for defence. There were pikes, pitchforks, rusty spears, sabres without hilts, blades fastened to long sticks, carpenters' axes, masons' hammers, shoeknives.

For a standard there was a gibbet, with a dangling puppet, to represent the Queen. There was also an ox-head, with an obscene motto interlaced with the horns; and a calf's heart stuck on the point of a spit, with the words: Heart of an Aristocrat!

Then there were flags with these legends:

APPROVE THE EDICTS, OR DIE!

RECALL THE PATRIOT COUNCIL!

TYRANT, TREMBLE! THY HOUR HAS COME!

At the corner of the Rue Saint Antoine the multitude split into two parts. Santerre and his National Guards marched along the boulevards, — the General wearing his uniform as battalion commander. Saint-Huruge rode a perfectly caparisoned horse, brought him by an unknown groom, and was backed by strong muscles from the market-place. Théroigne de Méricourt was couched on a cannon drawn by bare-armed men. Both these divisions went up the Rue Saint Antoine. They were all to go through Vendôme Square and reunite at the Feuillant Terrace.

For three hours this army marched along, drawing after it the population of the districts through which it passed. It was like torrents which leap and froth as they increase in volume. At each crossroad the army grew larger. At each street corner it burst into fresh foam.

The mass of the people were silent; but at unexpected intervals the silence was broken by loud clamors. Then they sung the famous Ça ira of 1793. Little by little, this had changed from a song of encouragement to one of menace. Then might have been heard the shouts: "Long live the Nation! Hurrah for the People! Down with Monsieur and Madame Veto!"

Long before the vanguard of the column hove in sight, the tramp of this army could be heard, like the noise of the inrushing tide. From time to time resounded the songs, the cries, the hurrahs, as the distant tempest comes howling through the air.

With Santerre's division were the people who carried the poplar-tree, to be planted on the Feuillant Terrace. In Vendôme Square they found a detachment of National Guards barring their passage. Nothing would have been easier than for this multitude to crush this detachment in its thousand serpentine coils. But no! The people were out on a holiday. They wished to laugh, to be amused, to terrify Monsieur and Madame Veto. They did not wish to kill anybody. The tree-bearers gave up their project of planting it on the Feuillant Terrace, and went around the palace to set it out in the courtyard of the old Capuchin Convent.

For nearly an hour the Assembly had been within earshot of the noise, when messengers came from the crowd to claim, for those whom they represented, the favor of passing in review before the National Deputies.

Vergniaud moved that the request be granted; but at the same time he proposed to send sixty Deputies to protect the palace. Even the Girondists did not wish harm to the King and Queen, though they were glad to give them a scare.

One of the Feuillants opposed Vergniaud's motion, on the ground that such a precaution would be insulting to the Parisians. Was this objector secretly hoping this demonstration would end in crime?

The admission was voted, and the armed populace from the faubourgs permitted to defile through the hall. The doors were soon opened, to give ingress to thirty thousand petitioners. The march began at noon and was not over till three o'clock.

The crowd had now obtained the first part of their demand. They had been admitted to the Assembly, and their petition had been read. It only remained for them to go to the King, and demand his sanction to the decrees about ecclesiastical exiles and the proposed encampment.

As the Assembly had received the deputation, would there be any valid excuse for the King's not receiving it? The King was certainly no greater lord than the President. When the King came to the Assembly, he had no better armchair than the President's, and moreover sat at his left hand!

The King expressed his willingness to receive the petition by the hands of twenty messengers. The crowd did not expect to enter the Tuileries. They believed the committee would go inside, while the crowd marched by the windows. All their banners, with the threatening mottoes, all their dismal standards, would be seen by the King and Queen through the windows.

All the gateways leading to the palace were closed. In the courtyard and in the Tuileries Garden were stationed three regiments of regular troops, two squadrons of police, several battalions of the National Guard, and four pieces of artillery. From their windows the royal family could see this apparent protection, and appeared correspondingly tranquil.

Meanwhile the crowd, still without any evil designs, asked to have the iron grating opened which separated them from the Feuillant Terrace. The officers on guard refused to open the gate without an order from the King.

Three city officials then asked permission to go in and ask for such an order. They were allowed to do so. Montjoye, author of the "History of Marie Antoinette," has recorded their names. They were Boucher René, Boucher Saint-Sauveur, and Mouchet. Mouchet was the little Justice of the Peace from the Marais District, a crippled, misshapen, twisted dwarf, wearing a big tri-colored scarf. They were admitted to the palace and conducted to the King. Mouchet did the talking.

"Sire, a body of men are acting under the shield of the law. Their actions should arouse no uneasiness. Peaceful citizens have united in bringing a petition to the National Assembly, and wish to hold a civic banquet in commemoration of the famous oath taken in the Tennis Court, in 1789. These citizens ask permission to enter the Feuillant Terrace. Not only is the gateway closed, but a mounted cannon bars the way. We come to ask that this gateway may be opened, and that we may be accorded a free entrance."

"Monsieur," responded the King, "by your scarf I see that you are a civic officer. It is your duty to see that the laws are executed. If you judge it necessary, for the evacuation of the Assembly grounds, let the gate be opened into the Feuillant Terrace, and let the citizens go through that terrace, and out by the gates from the Courtyard of the Stables. Arrange the matter with the Commanding General of the National Guards; and, above all, see that the public tranquillity is not disturbed."

The three city officials saluted and withdrew, accompanied by an officer, charged with the duty of confirming their statement that the order had been given by the King himself.

The grating was unlocked, and all tried to crowd through it. They were suffocating. Everybody knows how stifling it is in a crowd. The air blazes and bruises.

The iron gate leading to the Feuillant Terrace cracked like a wicker screen. The crowd breathed more freely, and dispersed themselves over the garden. Through some neglect the gate near the stables had not been opened. Finding it shut, the visitors turned aside, and marched past the National Guards, ranged like a hedgerow along the front of the palace.

Then they went out through the gate leading to the pier on the riverside. If they wished to return to their own districts, it was necessary to recross the palace grounds, through the wickets, and across Carrousel Square.

These wickets were shut and guarded; but the rabble, squeezed, bruised, and hustled, began to grow irritable. On account of this grumbling the wickets were opened, and the crowd spread itself throughout this great square.

Then they began to recall the principal affair of the day, — the petition for the King to remove his veto; so instead of keeping on their way towards home, they remained in Carrousel Square, — that is, within the rectangular enclosure between the walls of the Tuileries and Louvre palaces.

An hour passed. The populace grew impatient. They might as well have gone peacefully homewards; but this was not the plan of their leaders.

There were a few fellows who went from group to group, saying: "Stay here! The King will do what you ask! Don't go home without the King's sanction to those edicts, or we shall have all this work to do over again!"

These suggestions seemed entirely reasonable; but at the same time the visitors began to think that this famous approval was a long time on the way.

"We are hungry!" was the general cry. The bread-famine had indeed ceased; but there was a lack of work and money, and however low the price of bread, it cannot be had for nothing.

These people had all been up since five in the morning, many of them leaving pallets upon which they had lain down hungry the night before. They had all started out — mothers with their children, laborers with their wives — in the vague hope that the King could be persuaded to sign certain decrees, and that all would go well thereafter.

Now the King did not seem at all disposed to sanction those edicts. It was a hot day, and the people were thirsty. Hunger, thirst, and heat will even make dogs mad.

Well, these poor folks waited, and tried to borrow a little patience; but they presently began to shake the iron gates of the palace.

A city officer came into the courtyard, and harangued the multitude.

"Citizens, this is the royal domicil, and a forcible entrance would be a violation of civic rights. The King is willing to receive your petition, but only by the hands of a score of your representatives."

So then, the commissioners for whom the crowd had waited an hour, believing them to be in the royal presence, had not yet been introduced to the King!

Suddenly a great outcry was heard from the side towards the river. Santerre and Saint-Huruge were there on their horses, and Théroigne on her cannon.

"What are you doing there in front of the grating?" cried Saint-Huruge. "Why don't you enter?"

"Sure enough," said several fellows in the crowd, "why don't we enter?"

"Can't you see the gate is fastened?" exclaimed several voices.

Théroigne leaped from her cannon. "It 's loaded," she said. "Make the gate fly open with a cannon-ball!"

The cannon was brought to bear upon the gate.

"Wait! Wait!" cried two city officials. "No violence! The gate shall be opened." In fact they bore with all their might upon the crossbar, which held the two leaves of the gate together, till the bolt moved and the gate flew open.

The rabble rushed through the breach.

Do you want to know the nature of a mob, and what a turbulent torrent it may become?

Well, the mob entered. The cannon, drawn along in the rush, was dragged across the courtyard, and even rolled up the steps, till it reached the top of the stairway!

There some municipal officers were in waiting, wearing their scarfs of authority.

"What do you mean to do with that cannon?" they asked. "A piece of artillery in the King's apartments? Do you think you can get anything out of him by such violence?"

"That 's true!" responded the intruders, surprised to find they had brought the cannon there; and they turned it around, so as to get it downstairs again. The axle was somehow jammed against the doorpost, and there it stood, with its muzzle directed against the multitude outside.

"Well, that's good!" ejaculated those who were coming in. "Artillery in the King's house!"

Not knowing how the cannon came there, or that it was Théroigne's carriage, they believed royalty had aimed this gun at the populace.

Meanwhile, under orders from Mouchet, two men, with hatchets, were hacking and chopping the doorpost, and succeeded in splitting away one piece of it, which was lowered into the basement vestibule.

This operation — which was simply intended to liberate the cannon, and get it out of the way — sounded as if the doors were being hewn down.

Some two hundred gentlemen came hurrying to the palace, not with any hope of defending it, but believing the King's last days had come, and holding themselves ready to die with him.

Among them were the old Marshal de Mouchy; Monsieur d'Hervilly, a commander in the disbanded Constitutional Guards; Acloque, commander of the battalion of the National Guards from the Saint Marceau District; three grenadiers from the Saint Martin Battalion, who alone had remained at their posts, — Lecrosnier, Bridaud, and Gosse; and also a man in black, who had once before hastened to expose his breast to the assassin's bullet, — a man whose advice had always been thrust aside, yet who came forward again, in the very day of the danger he had tried to avert, to present himself as a last rampart between peril and the King. This was Doctor Gilbert.

The King and Queen, though greatly agitated by this fearful noise, became gradually used to it. It was now half-past three in the afternoon, and they hoped the end of the day would roll along as smoothly as its beginning.

The royal family were all together in the King's apartment. Suddenly the noise of the axes reached these rooms, rising above the gusty clamor, which seemed like the distant howling of the tempest.

At that moment a man rushed into the King's bedroom, exclaiming: "Sire, do not leave me! I will be responsible for your safety!"

CHAPTER XLV.

IN WHICH THE KING SEES THAT UNDER CERTAIN CIRCUMSTANCES ONE MAY PUT THE RED CAP ON HIS HEAD WITHOUT BEING A JACOBIN.

THIS man was Doctor Gilbert, who is only seen in our history at certain periodical distances, but is sure to appear in every great catastrophe of the immense drama which unrolls itself before us.

"Ah Doctor, is it you? What is going on?" asked the King and Queen, both at once.

"This, Sire, — that the palace is invaded; and the noise you hear is made by the populace, who demand a sight of you."

"Oh Sire, we 'll never desert you!" said the Queen and Madame Elizabeth, with one breath.

"Will the King give me, for a single hour, such authority as a sea-captain has over his ship in a storm?" asked Gilbert.

"I do give it!" said the King.

At this moment Acloque, a commander of the National Guard, appeared at the door, — pale, but resolved to defend the King to the very end.

"Monsieur," exclaimed Gilbert, "here is the King. He is ready to follow you. Take care of him!" Then Gilbert added, speaking to the King: "Go, Sire, go!"

"But what of me?" cried the Queen. "I must follow my husband!"

"And I my brother!" cried Madame Elizabeth.

"Follow your brother, Madame!" said Gilbert to Madame Elizabeth; "but you, Madame, remain here!" he added, addressing the Queen.

"Monsieur —!" said Marie Antoinette.

"Sire, Sire!" cried Gilbert, "in Heaven's name, beg the Queen to trust me, or I cannot be answerable for anything."

"Madame," said Louis, "listen to Monsieur Gilbert's advice, and obey his orders if necessary!" Then he said to Gilbert: "Monsieur, will you answer for the safety of the Queen and the Dauphin?"

"Yes, Sire, or I will die with them! That is all a pilot can promise in the midst of a tempest."

The Queen tried to make one more effort; but Gilbert stretched out his arms to bar the passage.

"Madame," he said, "it is you, and not the King, who runs the greatest danger. Rightfully or wrongfully, you are blamed for the King's resistance. Your presence will expose him to danger, without shielding him. Take upon yourself the office of the lightning-rod. Turn aside the electric stroke, if you can!"

"Then let the stroke fall on me alone, and spare my children!"

"I have promised the King to save both you and them, Madame! Follow me!"

Then turning to Madame de Lamballe (who had arrived from England a month before, and from Vernon within three days, and was again as one of the royal family) and to the other ladies of the household, he said: "Follow us!"

The other ladies with the Queen were the Princess de Tarente, the Princess de la Trémouille, Madame Tourzel, Madame de Mackau, and Madame de la Roche Aymon.

Gilbert was acquainted with the interior of the palace, and took his bearings. What he sought was a large apartment, where all the world could see and hear. This was the first task. He would put the Queen, her children, and her ladies behind some rampart, and take his own stand in front of it.

He thought of the Council Chamber, which they could reach without passing through the corridors. Fortunately it was still empty. He pushed the Queen, the children, and the Princess Lamballe into a recessed window. The minutes were so precious that there was no time for words. Already the intruders were pounding on the door.

He dragged the heavy Council table in front of the window, and his rampart was provided.

Madame Royale stood on the table beside her brother, who was seated. The Queen was behind them. Innocence was to be the defence of Unpopularity.

Marie Antoinette wished, on the contrary, to place herself in front of her children. "All is as it should be!" said Gilbert, in the tone of a general commanding a decisive movement. "Now don't stir!"

As the door was violently shaken, and he knew that there was a wave of women in that boisterous sea, he said, as he pulled back the bolts: "Enter, Citizenesses! Enter, for the Queen and her children are expecting you!"

As soon as the door was open the deluge poured in, as through a ruptured dike.

"Where 's that Austrian woman? Where 's Madame Veto?" cried five hundred voices.

It was an awful moment. Gilbert understood that in this decisive hour the power had escaped from the hands of the men, and passed into the hands of the women.

"Be calm, Madame!" he said to the Queen. "I need not counsel you to be gentle also!"

One woman was in advance of the others. Her hair was flying, and she brandished a sabre. She was fairly brilliant with rage, and perhaps with hunger.

"Where's that Austrian minx?" she cried. "She sha'n't die by any hand but mine!"

Gilbert took her by the arm, and led her in front of the Queen.

"Here she is!" he said.

Then the Queen said, in her sweetest tones: "Have I done you any personal wrong, my daughter?"

"None, Madame," replied the woman, astonished by Marie Antoinette's blended mildness and majesty, as well as by her beauty.

"Why do you wish to kill me, then?"

"They say you're leading the country to perdition!" stammered the confused woman, lowering the point of her sword to the floor.

"Then you have been deceived! I am the wife of the King of France. I'm the mother of the Dauphin,—this boy here! Very well! I'm a Frenchwoman, then, and shall never see my own country again. I can neither be happy nor unhappy, except in France. Alas! I was happy when you loved me!"

The Queen sighed. The young woman dropped her sabre and began to cry.

"Ah, Madame!" she said, "I did n't know you! Pardon me! I see you're a good woman."

"Keep on in this way, Madame!" whispered Gilbert, "and not only will you be saved, but in fifteen minutes all these people will be at your knees."

Leaving the Queen in the care of two or three National Guardsmen, who had just come in, and of Secretary of War Lajard, who had entered with the crowd, Gilbert now hastened to find the King.

His Majesty had encountered a similar scene. Just as he entered the salon called the Ox's Eye, the door-panels were broken in, and bayonet-points, spear-heads, and axe-blades were thrust through the openings.

"Open the door!" cried the King.

"Citizens," said Monsieur d'Hervilly, in a loud voice, "you need n't smash the door. The King wishes it opened."

As he spoke, he slipped the bolts and turned the key; and the door, already half broken down, creaked on its hinges.

Monsieur Acloque and the Duke de Mouchy had barely time to push the King into the window-recess, while several grenadiers, who were there, made haste to pile some benches and chairs in front of him.

Seeing the crowd rush in with shouts and imprecations, the King could not avoid calling out: "Help, gentlemen, help!"

Four grenadiers drew their swords and placed themselves by his side.

"Put up your swords, gentlemen!" said the King. "Only stay by me! That 's all I ask!"

A moment more and it would have been too late! The flash of the sabres seemed like a challenge.

A ragged fellow, with naked arms and foaming at the mouth, threw himself towards the King.

"So it 's thee, is it, Monsieur Veto?" he said; and he tried to stab the King with a blade tied to the end of a stick.

One of the grenadiers, who had not yet replaced his sabre in its scabbard, despite the King's order, beat down the stick with his weapon.

By that time the King had entirely regained his composure. Pushing the grenadier aside, he said: "Allow me, Monsieur! What have I to fear in the midst of my people?"

Taking a step forward, with a dignity of which he hardly seemed capable, and a courage to which he had hitherto been a stranger, the King presented his breast to the weapons aimed against it.

"Silence! I wish to speak!" exclaimed the voice of a stentor, in the midst of the uproar.

A cannon would have tried in vain to make itself heard amidst such yells and vociferations, and yet the tumult ceased at the sound of this voice.

It was the voice of Legendre, the butcher. He approached the King near enough to touch him. A circle was formed about them.

At that moment a man appeared at the outer extremity of the circle; and behind Danton's terrible double, as Legendre was called, the King saw the pale but calm face of Doctor Gilbert.

A glance from the royal eye asked the question: "What have you done with the Queen, Monsieur?" and the Doctor's smile responded: "She is safe!" The King thanked him with a sign.

"Monsieur," said Legendre, addressing the King.

At this title of Monsieur, which seemed to point a special insult, the King turned, as if he had been stung by an adder.

"Yes, Monsieur! — Monsieur Veto! I 'm talking to you!" continued Legendre. "Now listen, for it 's your business to hear us! You 're a tricky fellow! You 've always cheated us, and you 'll cheat us again. But look out for yourself! Your measure is almost full, and the people are tired of being your playthings and victims."

"Very well, I 'm listening!" said the King.

"So much the better! Do you know what we 're here after? We 're here to demand your signature to the decrees about the priests and the camp, and also the recall of your old Councillors. — Here 's our petition!"

Legendre unfolded a paper which he drew from his pocket, and recited the same threatening petition which had already been read that day to the Assembly.

The King listened, his eyes fixed on the reader. When it was finished, he said, without any emotion, — at least, any that was apparent: "I shall do, Monsieur, whatever the laws and the Constitution order me to do!"

"Oh, yes!" said a voice. "That 's your great war-horse, the Constitution! — the Constitution of '91, which lets you muddle the whole machine, tie France to the whipping-post, and give the Austrians time to come and swallow us up."

The King turned in the direction of this new voice, for he understood that this meant a still graver attack.

Gilbert also made a movement, and laid his hand upon the shoulder of the last speaker.

"I have seen you before, my friend!" said the King. "Who are you?" He spoke with curiosity, rather than with fear, although the man's face bespoke a resolute and formidable character.

"Yes, you have seen me before, Sire! You have now seen me thrice, — once on your way back from Versailles, on July 16, 1789; again at Varennes, a year ago. The other time, Sire, — here! Sire, recall my name! I have a name of sinister import. They call me Billot!" (the block.)

At this moment the noise redoubled. A man armed with a pike tried to dart it at the King; but Billot grasped the weapon, wrenched it from the assassin's hands, and broke it over his knee.

"No assassinations!" he said. "Only one weapon has any right to touch that man, — namely, the Law! They say there was once a King of England who had his head cut off, by the legal sentence of the people whom he had betrayed. His name should be known to thee, Louis. Don't forget it!"

"Billot!" murmured Gilbert.

"Oh, you 've done well enough!" said Billot, shaking his head; "but that man will be tried as a traitor, and condemned!"

"Yes, as a traitor!" cried a hundred voices. "Traitor! Traitor! Traitor!"

Gilbert threw himself between the King and his adversaries, and said: "Fear nothing, Sire! but try, by some open act, to give these furious men a little satisfaction."

The King took Gilbert's hand, and pressed it on his heart. "You see I fear nothing!" he said. "This morning I received the holy sacrament. Let them do with me what they please! As to the outward sign you wish me to give — Well, see here! How does this please you?"

As he ceased speaking, the King snatched a red cap from the head of a young ragamuffin, and placed that red cap on his own head.

The crowd broke into immediate applause. "Long live the King! Hurrah for the Nation!" shouted everybody.

One man made his way through the jam, and approached the King. In his hand this man carried a wine-bottle.

"If thou lovest the people as thou sayest, Fatty Veto, prove it by drinking this to their health!" he said, offering the bottle to the King.

"Don't drink, Sire!" said a voice. "Perhaps the wine is poisoned!"

"Drink, Sire. I'll be responsible!" said Gilbert.

The King took the bottle. "To the health of the people!" he said, and drank the wine.

Again huzzas for the King resounded.

"Sire," said Gilbert, "you have nothing more to fear. Let me return to the Queen."

'Go!" said the King, pressing the Doctor's hand.

As Gilbert went out, Isnard and Vergniaud came in. They had come thither from the Assembly, in order to make a hedge about the King with their popularity,— and with their bodies, if need be.

"The King?" they asked. Gilbert pointed him out, and the two Deputies went towards him.

In order to reach the Queen, Gilbert had to pass through several rooms, and among others the King's bedroom. The people had taken possession of it.

"Ah ha!" said some men, sitting down on the royal bed. "Gracious! Fatty Veto has a better bed than ours!"

There was nothing alarming about this sort of talk. The first effervescence had subsided.

Gilbert tranquilly rejoined the Queen. As he entered the salon where he had left her, he threw a hasty glance about him and breathed more freely.

She was still in the same place. The little Dauphin, like his father, had donned a red cap.

A great noise arose in the next room, which drew Gilbert's attention towards the door. This noise was caused by the approach of Santerre. This colossus came into the hall.

"Oh ho! The Austrian Woman is here, then!" Santerre exclaimed.

Gilbert crossed the hall diagonally, walked straight up to him, and said: "Monsieur Santerre?"

Santerre turned. "Ah, it 's Doctor Gilbert!" he cried joyfully.

"Who has not forgotten that you were one of those who opened the doors of the Bastille for him. — Let me present you to the Queen, Monsieur Santerre!"

"To the Queen? Present me to the Queen?" growled the brewer.

"Yes, to the Queen! Do you refuse?"

"No, on my word!" said Santerre. "I was going to present myself on my own account, but since you are here, why —"

"I know Monsieur Santerre already," said the Queen. "I know that during the famine he fed half the Saint Antoine District!"

Santerre paused in astonishment. Glancing in a somewhat confused way at the Dauphin, and seeing the sweat running in great drops down the little fellow's cheeks, he called to those near the table: "Take off his cap. Can't you see you 're suffocating the little chap?"

The mother thanked him with a look.

Then leaning on the table, and bending towards her, the sturdy Fleming said, in a low voice: "You have very awkward friends, Madame. I know those who could serve you better!"

An hour afterwards the crowd had all melted away, and the King, accompanied by his sister, entered the room where the Queen and their children were expecting him.

The Queen ran to him, and threw herself at his feet. The children grasped his hands. They all embraced one another, as might a rescued family after a shipwreck.

Only then did the King remember that he had the red cap still on his head. "Ah, I had forgotten that!" he cried; and crushing it in his hand with disgust, he threw it far away.

A young artillery officer, hardly twenty-two years old, witnessed this whole scene from outside, as he leaned against a tree on the edge of the pond. Through the windows he saw all the perils the King had encountered, all the humiliations heaped upon him. When he saw this incident of the red cap, he could no longer hold his peace.

"Oh!" he murmured. "If I only had twelve hundred men and two cannon I'd very soon relieve that poor King of all these hoodlums!"

As he had neither the twelve hundred men nor his two pieces of artillery, and as he could no longer bear the sight of this offensive spectacle, he went away.

This young officer was Napoleon Bonaparte.

END OF VOL. III.

LA COMTESSE DE CHARNY.

CHAPTER I.

REACTION.

The evacuation of the Tuileries was as quiet and pensive as its invasion had been noisy and terrifying. Surprised at the meagre results of their day's work, the rioters began to say to one another: "We got nothing! We shall have to go back again!"

Those who thought they foresaw what would happen, judged Louis Sixteenth by his reputation. They remembered how the King appeared at Varennes, clad like a lackey. They prophesied that at the first alarm Louis would hide in some closet, under a table, or behind a curtain; that somebody would stab him by accident; and then get himself off by saying "How now? A rat?" as Hamlet says in the play, when he slays old Polonius behind the arras, thinking it is his uncle, the tyrant of Denmark.

It had turned out quite otherwise with Louis. Never was the King so calm. Nay, more! Never had he been so great.

The insult had been tremendous; but it had not surpassed his resignation. His timid firmness, if one may so speak, needed to be excited; and in the heat it was tempered like steel.

Elevated by the desperate circumstances amid which he stood, for five hours he saw hatchets gleam above his head, and lances, swords, bayonets recoil before his breast, — and all this without growing pale. No general in ten battles, howsoever bloody, ever incurred more danger than had confronted him during the tedious onflow of that riot.

The Théroignes, the Saint-Huruges, the Lazouskis, the Fourniers, the Verrières, all these murderous demons, set out with the positive determination of killing the King; but his unexpected dignity, in the midst of the stress and storm, made the poniards drop from their hands.

If a sacred word may be used in such a connection, this was the passion of Louis the Sixteenth. Ecce homo! (Behold the Man!) was Pilate's exclamation about Jesus, when the Messiah was led forth crowned with thorns. This phrase might be repeated of Louis, when his head was encircled with that hateful red cap. As Jesus, in the midst of insults and injuries, still said in spirit, "I am your Messiah!" so Louis, in the midst of outrage and obloquy, never for an instant ceased to say, by word or manner, "I am your King!"

This is what had happened. It was the expectation of the Revolutionary transcendentalists, on forcing the gates of the Tuileries, that only the trembling and inert ghost of royalty would be found on the other side. To their great surprise they encountered the spirit of the Middle Ages, erect and living. For an instant the two opposing principles were seen face to face. One was like the setting sun. The other was rising in the east. This was as startling as if we should see another sun shining in the sky, ere one had sunk to its rest. There was as much grandeur and splendor in the one as in the other, as much faith and spirit in the importunity of the populace as in the royal tenacity.

Royalists were delighted. On the whole, the victory was on their side.

Commanded so violently to obey the Assembly, instead of signing one of the two decrees, — the one relative to a volunteer encampment, — as he had been ready to do, the King now made up his mind to veto both, knowing that he ran no more risk in rejecting both than in rejecting one.

On that fatal Twentieth of June, royalty sank so low that it seemed to touch bottom, so that henceforth it could not help rising again. In fact affairs began to take this direction.

On June 21, the next day, the Assembly voted that never again should an armed posse of citizens be allowed to cross its threshold. This was a disavowal — or better, a condemnation — of the uprising of the previous day.

On the evening of the twentieth, Mayor Pétion went to the Tuileries, immediately after the hostilities were over.

"Sire," he said to the King, "I have only just now heard of your Majesty's situation."

"That 's strange," said the King; "for it has lasted long enough!"

On the very next day Constitutionalists, Royalists, and Feuillants all united in demanding of the Assembly a proclamation of martial law. Everybody knew what the first proclamation of martial law brought about, on July 17, 1791, the year before.

This proposal was said to be founded on the discovery of new cabals.

Pétion hastened to the Assembly. He declared that such cabals had never existed. He was willing to answer for the tranquillity of Paris, so martial law was not proclaimed.

At the close of the session, about eight in the evening, Pétion went to the Tuileries, to reassure the King as to the peaceful condition of the capital. He was accompanied by Sergent, — Sergent, who was a copperplate engraver, a brother-in-law of Marceau, a member of the City Council, and one of the Commissioners of Police. Two or three other city officials went with them.

As they crossed the Carrousel Courtyard they were insulted by certain Knights of Saint Louis, Constitutional Guards, and National Guards who were there. Pétion was personally attacked. Despite the official scarf which he wore, Sergent was struck in the breast and face, and finally knocked down with a blow of the fist.

Hardly were they introduced, when Pétion saw that they were in for a contest.

Marie Antoinette launched upon him such arrows as the eyes of Maria Theresa might have discharged. Her eyes were like two rays of defiance and scorn, two terrific flashes of lightning.

The King knew what had taken place at the Assembly, and said: "Well, Monsieur Pétion, you fancy that peace is re-established in our capital, do you?"

"Yes, Sire. The people have made their wants known to you, and now they are peaceful and satisfied."

"Confess, Monsieur," said the King, plunging at once into the combat, "that yesterday's piece of work was a great scandal, and that your municipality neither did what it should nor what it could."

"Sire, the city did its duty. Public opinion must be the judge of that!"

"Say the entire country, Monsieur!"

"The city need not fear the national judgment."

"What is the present condition of Paris?"

"Quiet!"

"That is n't true!"

"Sire — !"

"Hold your tongue!"

"A magistrate of the people has no need to hold his tongue, especially when doing his duty and speaking the truth."

"That 's enough! Take yourself off!"

Pétion bowed and went out. The King was so irritable, his face wore such an expression of deep anger, that even the Queen — excitable woman and fiery amazon as she was — became fairly alarmed.

When Pétion had disappeared, she said to Rœderer: "My God, don't you think the King has been too choleric, and that this haste will put him at loggerheads with the Parisians?"

"Madame," answered Rœderer, "no one should be disturbed because the King imposes silence upon one of his subjects who fails in proper respect."

The next day the King wrote to the Assembly, complaining of this profanation of royalty, — of the royal palace and person.

Then he issued a proclamation to his people. He said he had two peoples, — those who had made the disturbance on June 20, and those to whom he complained of this disturbance. On June 24 their Majesties held a review of the National Guard, and were enthusiastically greeted.

On the same day the Directory of Paris suspended the Mayor. What had inspired such audacity? Three days later the matter was understood.

Lafayette came away from his army with a single officer, and on June 27 reached Paris, and went to the house of his friend Rochefoucauld. During the night the Constitutionalists, Feuillants, and Royalists were duly notified, and they planned to pack the galleries the next day.

On that day Lafayette presented himself at the Assembly. Three salvoes of applause welcomed him, but they were lost in the murmurs of the Girondists. It was easy to see that the session was to be painful.

Lafayette was certainly one of the bravest men who ever lived, but his bravery was not foolhardy. Rarely does it happen that a truly brave man is audaciously foolhardy as well.

Lafayette fully comprehended the danger to which he was exposed. Fighting single-handed against all others, he was about to stake the remnant of his popularity. If that was lost, he should perish with it. If he won, he might save the King.

This was the more magnanimous on his part, because he knew the King's repugnance and the Queen's hatred towards himself. Her Majesty had virtually said: "I would rather perish through Pétion, than be saved by Lafayette."

Perhaps he had come hither to gratify the bravado of some subaltern, rather than to meet a challenge.

Thirteen days earlier he had written both to the King and the Assembly, — to the King, to encourage his resistance, to the Assembly, to warn it against continual attacks on the Crown.

"He is insolent enough, surrounded by his troops!" said a voice. "We shall see if he 'll talk the same way here among us!"

These words had been reported to Lafayette in his camp at Maubeuge. Perhaps they were the true cause of his journey to Paris.

Amid applause from one side, but also amid groans from the other, he crossed the hall and ascended the rostrum.

"Gentlemen! I have been reproached with writing my letter of the Sixteenth of June in my camp. It therefore devolves upon me to protest against this imputation of cowardice, by coming out from behind the honorable bulwark with which the affection of my troops encircles me, and presenting myself alone at your bar. A still more imperative motive calls me hither. The outrages of the Twentieth of June have roused the indignation of all our best citizens, and especially of the army. The officers, subalterns, and privates have but one opinion about it. From all the military divisions I have received assurances of devotion to the Constitution and opposition to partisanship. I have checked these manifestations of loyalty. I have charged myself with the duty of expressing to you the general sentiment. I speak to you only as a citizen, however. It is time to guarantee the stability of the Constitution, to ensure the freedom of the National Assembly and the King, as well as the King's dignity. I beg the Assembly to treat the excesses of the Twentieth of June as treasonable crimes against his Majesty, to adopt efficacious measures for compelling respect to Constitutional authority, — especially yours and the King's, — and to give the army some assurance that the Constitution will not be disgraced at home, while brave Frenchmen are pouring out their blood for its defence at the frontiers."

Guadet rose slowly, as he saw that Lafayette was approaching his peroration. In the midst of cordial applause the sharp-tongued Girondist orator lifted his hand as a sign that he meant to reply. When the Girondists wished to shoot an arrow tipped with sarcasm and irony, it was Guadet to whom the bow was entrusted; and Guadet needed only to draw a dart at random from his quiver. Hardly had the echoes of applause died away before the sound of his resonant voice was heard.

"The moment I saw Monsieur Lafayette," so he began, "a very consoling idea offered itself to my mind. I said to myself, that evidently we had no more foreign enemies, that the Austrians were doubtless vanquished; for here was Monsieur Lafayette, to announce the news of his victory and their destruction. This illusion was short-lived. Our enemies are still the same! Our external perils have not changed! Nevertheless, Monsieur Lafayette is in Paris. He constitutes himself the organ of the worthy fellows in the army. Who are these honest fellows? What chance has the army had for deliberation? First of all, let Lafayette show us his leave of absence."

At this speech the Girondists felt the wind shifting to their quarter; and hardly was his mouth closed, when a thunder of applause broke forth.

One Deputy rose and said, without ascending the tribune: "Gentlemen, you forget to whom you speak, and you forget the question at issue. You forget that this is Lafayette! Lafayette is the eldest son of French Liberty. Lafayette has sacrificed his fortune, his titles, his life to the Revolution."

"Hold on!" cried a voice. "You 're pronouncing his funeral elegy!"

"Gentlemen," said Ducos, "freedom of discussion is hindered by the presence on the floor of one who does not belong to the Assembly."

"That 's not all!" said Vergniaud. "This general has forsaken his post in the face of the enemy. It is to him, not to the simple field-marshal whom he has left in his place, that his division of the army is confided. We know that Lafayette has left his post without a furlough ; and if he has left his post without a furlough, let him be arrested and tried as a deserter."

"That is the point of my question," said Guadet, "and I second Vergniaud's motion."

"Seconded ! Seconded ! " cried all the Girondists.

"Call the roll ! " said Gensonné.

The roll-call gave Lafayette's friends a majority of ten.

Like the populace on June 20, Lafayette had dared too much or too little. It was one of the sort of victories which made Pyrrhus bitterly lament the loss of half his army. "One more such victory, and I am lost ! " said the Roman general.

Like Pétion, when Lafayette left the Assembly he reported himself to the King. He was received with a milder face, but with a cankered heart.

Lafayette had sacrificed for the King and Queen more than his life. He had sacrificed his popularity. This was the third time he had made this offering, more precious than any sovereign can bestow. The first time was at Versailles, in October, 1789. The second time was at the Champ de Mars, in July, 1791. The third time was on this very day.

Lafayette had one last hope. It was this hope which made him espouse the side of his sovereign.

The next day he would witness a review of the National Guards with the King. He could not doubt the enthusiasm inspired by the presence of their old commander. Profiting by this influence, Lafayette would march upon the Assembly, and put the Girondists under arrest. During the tumult the King should flee to the camp at Maubeuge.

This would be a bold move, but in the present condition of things it would be sure.

Unhappily Danton went to Pétion's lodgings at three in the morning, to notify him of the scheme. At daybreak Pétion countermanded the review.

Who had betrayed Lafayette and the King? The Queen! Had she not already declared that she would rather perish through somebody else than be saved by Lafayette? Thus she aided the Fates. She was to perish through Danton's instrumentality.

At the hour when the review was to take place, Lafayette quitted Paris and returned to the army. He had not, however, given up all hope of saving the King.

CHAPTER II.

VERGNIAUD WILL SPEAK.

LAFAYETTE'S victory — a dubious victory, followed by a retreat — had one singular result. It floored the Royalists, who were supposed to be the gainers, while it puffed up the Girondists, who were supposed to be defeated. It aided them by revealing the precipice over which they were liable to fall.

If there had been less animosity in Marie Antoinette's heart towards Lafayette, the Girondists might have been forthwith suppressed.

The Court was not to be allowed time to repair the error it had committed. It was necessary to renew the force and tendency of the Revolutionary current, whose course had been temporarily stemmed, and turned backward towards its source. Every one sought for the best method, and all thought they had found it; but as fast as each method was discussed, its inefficiency was seen, and that special plan was relinquished.

Madame Roland, the soul of the party, wished for the evolution of some grand commotion in the Assembly. Who could bring about such a commotion? Who could strike such a blow? — Vergniaud!

Why was Achilles sulking in his tent? or, rather, why was Rinaldo wandering in Armida's bower? He was in love. It is difficult to hate when one is in love!

Vergniaud loved the beautiful Madame Simon Candeille, the actress, poetess, and musician. His friends would sometimes look for him two or three days without meeting him. At last they would find him lying at the feet of this charming woman, one hand resting on her lap, the other sweeping listlessly her harpstrings. Every night, in the orchestra of the theatre, he was on hand to applaud the woman whom he had adored all day.

One evening two Deputies left the Assembly in desperation. Vergniaud's inaction alarmed them, on account of France. These members were Grangeneuve and Chabot.

Grangeneuve was a Bordeaux advocate, the friend and rival of Vergniaud, and like him a Deputy from the Gironde.

Chabot was an unfrocked capuchin, the author, or one of the authors, of the "Catechism for Sans Culottes," a work which sprinkled royalty and religion with the gall he had secreted in the cloister.

Grangeneuve, sober and pensive, walked along by Chabot's side. As Chabot looked at his colleague, he thought he could see in his face the shadow of his thoughts.

"What art thou dreaming about?" asked Chabot.

"I am thinking that all these loiterers enervate the Nation and kill the Revolution."

"Ah! Dost thou think so?" replied Chabot, with the saturnine laugh habitual to him.

"I am thinking," continued Grangeneuve, "that if the people give royalty much more time, the people will be lost."

Chabot again emitted his harsh laugh.

"I am thinking," continued Grangeneuve, "that there is only one certain hour for revolutions, — that those who let this one opportunity escape them will never find it again, and must later be held to a strict account by God and posterity."

"Thou believest God and posterity will hold us accountable for our procrastination and inaction?"

"I fear so!"

After a silence Grangeneuve resumed: "See here, Chabot, I have a conviction. It is this, — that the people are disheartened by this last check, and that they will not be raised from their discomfiture without some powerful lever, without some sanguinary incentive. They need a chalice of rage or fright, from which to quaff redoubled energy."

"How can they get this fit of wrath and fear?" asked Chabot.

"That 's what I 'm cogitating," said Grangeneuve, "and I believe I 've found the secret."

Chabot drew nearer. By the intonation of his companion's voice, he knew there was something painful to be suggested.

"But," continued Grangeneuve, "can I find a man sufficiently capable, and possessing sufficient resolution, to carry out the plan?"

"Speak out!" said Chabot, with a firmness of accent which left no doubt in his colleague's mind. "I am capable of doing anything, to destroy those whom I hate; and I hate kings and priests."

"Well," said Grangeneuve, looking cautiously up and down the street, "I find there has always been innocent blood shed at the cradling of all revolutions, from the suicide of Lucretia to the beheading of Sidney. For statesmen, revolutions are theoretical; but for the populace, they are revengeful. If the multitude are urged to the point of vengeance, they must have a victim. That victim the Court withholds. Very well, then, let us sacrifice ourselves to the cause."

"I do not understand."

"Well, it is needful for one of us — one well known, energetic, upright — to fall beneath Royalist blows."

"Go on!"

"The man who falls must be a member of the National Assembly, so that the Assembly may take retaliation into its own hands. The victim must be myself!"

"But the Royalists will not injure thee, Grangeneuve! They 'll take especial care not to!"

"I know it! That 's why I say we must find a man of great determination."

"What for?"

"To kill me!"

Chabot recoiled a step; but Grangeneuve grasped him by the arm and said: "Chabot, just now thou hast boasted thyself capable of doing anything to destroy what thou hatest. Art thou capable of assassinating me?"

The monk was speechless; but Grangeneuve continued: "My oratory is nothing. My life is useless to Liberty; while my death, on the other hand, may be profitable to her. My corpse will be the standard of insurrection, and I tell thee — "

He paused. Then, with a vehement gesture, he extended his hand towards the Tuileries, and said: "That palace, and those whom it contains, must disappear in a cyclone."

Chabot looked at Grangeneuve, and trembled with admiration.

"Well?" insisted Grangeneuve.

"Well, sublime Diogenes, blow out thy lantern. The man is found!"

"Very well! Let us so arrange that the whole affair may be over this evening. To-night I will promenade all alone here," — they were opposite the wickets of the Louvre, — "in the most deserted and gloomy part of the neighborhood. If thou fearest lest thy hand fail thee, bring two other Patriots. I will make this sign, so that I may be recognized."

As he spoke Grangeneuve raised both arms, and then continued: "They must stab me, and I promise thee I will fall without a cry."

Chabot wiped his forehead with his handkerchief.

"In the daylight my body will be found. The Court will be blamed. The indignation of the people will do the rest."

"Very well, let it be to-night!" and the makers of this strange compact shook hands and separated.

Grangeneuve went home to make his will, which he dated a year back, at Bordeaux.

Chabot went to dinner at a restaurant in the gardens of the Palace Royal. After dinner he went to a cutler's and bought a knife. As he left the cutler's, his gaze fell upon the theatre posters. Candeille was to play. The monk therefore knew where to find Vergniaud.

Chabot went to the Comédie Française, which was only a few rods away, went up to the beautiful actress's dressing-room, and found there her usual admirers, Vergniaud, Talma, Chénier, Dugazon. She was to appear in two pieces. Chabot remained till the end of the performance.

When the plays were over, when the beautiful player resumed her usual dress, and Vergniaud stood ready to conduct her to the Rue Richelieu, where she lived, Chabot stepped into the carriage behind his colleague.

"You have something to say to me, Chabot?" asked Vergniaud, who at once saw that the capuchin had some special business with him.

"Yes! but be easy, for it won't take long."

"Speak at once, then."

Chabot pulled out his watch, saying, as he did so: "It's not yet time!"

"And when will it be time?"

"At midnight."

The lovely Candeille trembled at this mysterious dialogue, and murmured: "Oh, Monsieur!"

"Reassure yourself," said Chabot. "Vergniaud has nothing to fear; only his country needs him."

The carriage rolled along towards the actress's dwelling-house. The lady and both men remained silent. At Candeille's door Vergniaud asked: "Will you go in, Chabot?"

"No; you must come with me."

"My God, whither will you take him?" asked the actress.

"Some two hundred rods from here. In fifteen minutes he will be back again! I promise you that!"

Vergniaud pressed the hand of his lovely mistress, made her a reassuring sign, and went away with Chabot, through the Rue Traversière. Then they crossed the Rue Saint Honoré, and took the Rue Échelle. At the corner of that street the monk placed his hand on Vergniaud's shoulder, and called his attention to a man who was walking along beside the lonely walls of the Louvre.

"Seest thou?" he asked of Vergniaud.

"What?"

"That man!"

"Yes," said the Girondist.

"Well, that's our colleague, Grangeneuve."

"What's he doing there?"

"Waiting!"

"What for?"

"For somebody to kill him."

"To kill him?"

"Yes."

"And who is to kill him?"

"I!"

Vergniaud looked at Chabot as he would have looked at a madman.

"Remember Sparta, remember Rome, and then listen!" said Chabot.

Then he related the whole story. As the monk went on, Vergniaud lowered his head. He realized how far he was inferior — amorous lion and effeminate leader that he was — to that earnest Republican, who, like Decius, only asked for a gulf into which he could throw himself, in order to save his country.

"Very well," he said, "I want three days in which to prepare my oration."

"And in three days —?"

"Rest easy! In three days I shall either be bruised against the idol, or I shall overturn it!"

"I have thy word, Vergniaud?"

"Yes!"

"It is the pledge of a man?"

"Of a Republican!"

"Very well! I have no more need of thee at present. Go and comfort thy mistress."

Vergniaud retraced his steps to the Rue Richelieu. Chabot kept on towards Grangeneuve, who, seeing a man coming towards him, retreated towards the darkest angle. Chabot followed him.

Grangeneuve stopped at the foot of the wall, because he could go no farther. Chabot approached him. Grangeneuve made the sign agreed upon, by raising his arms. Then he stood still, like Chabot.

"Well, what hinders thee? Strike!"

"It 's useless!" said Chabot. "Our Vergniaud is to speak."

"So be it!" said Grangeneuve, with a sigh; "but I fancy the other means would be best!"

How could royalty possibly contend against such men as these?

CHAPTER III.

VERGNIAUD SPEAKS.

It was time for Vergniaud to decide. Perils were increasing at home and abroad.

As to foreign affairs, the Council of Ambassadors, at Ratisbon, unanimously refused to acknowledge the French Minister.

England, who called herself France's friend, was recruiting an immense force.

The Princes of the German Empire, who boasted of their neutrality, were secretly admitting the enemy into their territory.

The Duke of Baden allowed the Austrians to enter Kehl, which was only a league from Strasburg.

In Flanders it was worse yet. Luckner was a deaf old dotard, who managed to counteract all the plans of Dumouriez, — the only level-headed man, though not a genius, whom France had placed face to face with the foe.

Lafayette belonged to the Court party, and his last undertaking showed that the Assembly — that is to say, France — could not depend upon him.

Lastly Biron, though courageous and loyal, was discouraged by former reverses, and was only prepared to wage a defensive warfare.

So much for outside affairs.

At home Alsatia was loudly clamoring for arms; but the War Secretary, who was of the Court party, took care not to send what was wanted.

In the South, a lieutenant-general, belonging to the princely party, was the Governor of Lower Languedoc and Cévennes, and acknowledged the authority of the local nobility.

At a town in the West, it was announced at the conclusion of Mass, by a simple peasant named Allan Redeler, that an armed gathering of the friends of royalty would be held in a neighboring chapel. Five hundred peasants came at the first call. Thus were the Chouans planted in Vendée and Brittany. They only needed time to grow.

From nearly all the departments of the kingdom came Counter-Revolutionary addresses.

The danger was imminent, portentous, and great, — so great that it was no longer individuals alone who were in peril, but the country. Though not spoken publicly, these words were everywhere whispered : "The country is in danger!"

The Assembly waited. Chabot and Grangeneuve gave out word that in three days Vergniaud would speak, and they counted the hours as they sped.

Neither on the first or second day did Vergniaud appear in the Assembly. The third day arrived, and everybody was in trepidation. Not a Deputy was absent from his bench. The galleries were full.

Last of all Vergniaud entered. A buzz of satisfaction ran through the Assembly. The galleries applauded, as the pit applauds the entrance of a favorite actor. Vergniaud looked about, to see whom they were applauding, whereupon the plaudits redoubled, and apprised him that he was their object.

Vergniaud was hardly thirty-three years old. His character was pensive and phlegmatic. His genius was indolent, and amused itself with trifles. Ardent only in love, he seemed to be hastily culling by handfuls the flowers of a youth which would have but a short spring-time. He went late to bed, and seldom rose before noon.

When he was to speak, he prepared his speech three or four days in advance, — furbishing, polishing, sharpening it, as a soldier, on the eve of battle, sharpens, furbishes, and polishes his weapons.

He was, in oratory, what in a fencing-school would be called a fine player. No thrust seemed to him good, unless it was brilliantly made and loudly praised. It was indispensable for him to keep his speeches for moments of danger, for important crises. As a poet has well said: "He was not a man for all occasions. He was a man for grand emergencies."

As to his physique, Vergniaud was short rather than tall, though he had a robust frame which made him seem like an athlete. His hair was long and flowing. In his oratorical gesticulation he would shake it, as a lion shakes his mane.

Beneath his large forehead, shaded by heavy eyebrows, blazed two black eyes, filled with amiability or with fire. His nose was short, but somewhat large, with flaring nostrils. His lips were thick.

As when a spring is opened, the water gushes forth in joyful abundance, so his words fell from his mouth in high cascades, foaming and bubbling.

Pitted with the smallpox, his skin seemed like dotted marble, not yet polished with the sculptor's chisel, but only roughed out by the apprentice's hammer. His complexion was pale, purple, or livid, proportionately as his blood mounted to his face or retreated to his heart.

In repose or in a crowd, Vergniaud was an ordinary man, upon whom the eye of the historian, however piercing, would find no special reason to rest; but when passion's flame set his blood boiling, when his facial muscles palpitated, when his lifted hand asked for silence and controlled the crowd, then the man became a demi-god, the orator was transfigured, the platform became his Mount Tabor, whereon, like the Israelites, he won great victories.

Such was the man who now came to the Assembly, his hand as yet closed, but filled with thunderbolts. By the applause which broke out on his entrance, he divined that he was expected.

He did not ask for the floor, but went directly to the tribune, which he ascended in the midst of a quivering silence, and at once began his speech.

His first words had a mournful accent. They were deep and concentrated, — the utterance of a downcast man. He seemed as weary at the beginning as one ordinarily is at the close. This arose from his three days' contest with the spirit of eloquence. This was because he knew, in the supreme effort he was about to make, that he should overturn the temple of the Philistines. He mounted the rostrum in the midst of pillars standing erect about him, and upholding the dome of government; but he might descend therefrom clambering over the ruins of royalty.

As Vergniaud's genius is wholly embodied in this oration, let it here be given in its wholeness. We believe its reading will rouse the same curiosity one might have on visiting an arsenal, and standing before one of those historic engines of war, which levelled the walls of Rome, Carthage, and Saguntum.

He began in tones hardly intelligible; but his voice soon became deep, sonorous, and pealing.

CITIZENS: I come to you and I ask, — What then is the meaning of the singular situation in which the National Assembly finds itself? What fatality pursues us, and signalizes each day with events which bring disorder into our plans, and throw us back into a tumultuous whirlpool of hope, anxiety, and passion? What destiny has brought France into such a state of effervescence, wherein one begins to doubt whether the Revolution is retrogressing, or advancing towards its proper end?

At the very moment when our arms were apparently making some progress in Belgium, we saw them bowed before our enemies. They brought the war into our own territory. The only souvenirs of us Frenchmen, retained by the unfortunate Belgians, are the conflagrations which marked our retreat.

Along the Rhine the Prussians are concentrating their troops on our defenceless borders. How could it happen, precisely at a crisis so decisive for our national existence, that the movement of our troops should be suspended, and that by a sudden disorganization of our political ministry, the bonds of confidence should be broken, and the safety of the kingdom left with inexperienced hands?

Can it be that our triumphs are feared at home? Is it that the blood of the army at Coblentz is more sacred to us than our own? When priestly fanaticism threatens to deliver us over simultaneously to the ravages of both civil war and invasion, what can be the intentions of those who, with invincible obstinacy, refuse to sanction edicts aimed against the promoters of these disturbances? Do our rulers wish to reign over forsaken cities and blasted fields? Precisely what amount of tears, misery, blood, and death will satiate their vengeance? In a word, where do we stand?

Gentlemen, the enemies of the Constitution believe they have shaken your courage. Every day they attempt to alarm your consciences and your probity, to modify your love of liberty with the spirit of faction, — as if you had forgotten that a despotic Court and cowardly aristocratic leaders have bestowed the appellation of partisans upon public representatives who took the famous Oath of the Tennis Court, upon the conquerors of the Bastille, upon all who have instigated or fostered the Revolution.

Gentlemen, you are slandered only because you are strangers to that caste of nobility which the Revolution has humbled in the dust; and by those degraded men who regret the loss of their privilege of cringing and crawling, like so many worms, in the presence of rank and title, — a privilege they cannot hope to regain by your assistance.

Your enemies wish to estrange you from the people, because they know the people are your supporters. If by a culpable desertion of the people's cause you deserve popular neglect, it will be easy enough to crush your Assembly.

They wish to divide you, — you, who will postpone your differences and quarrels till war is over, and who do not find so much pleasure in hating, that you prefer such infernal recreation to the welfare of your country. They hope to see you overawed by armed petitioners, as if you did not know that in the commencement of the Revolution the sanctuary of Liberty was surrounded by the satellites of despotism, Paris besieged by Court troops, and that the days of peril in our first Assembly were the days of glory also.

Finally, I wish to call your attention to the crisis which we have now reached.

Our internal troubles have two causes, — aristocratic scheming and ecclesiastical scheming. Both tend towards the same result, — a Counter-Revolution.

The King refuses to sanction your edict in regard to the sacerdotal troubles. I know not if the gloomy genius of the Medicis and of Cardinal Lorraine still hover beneath the vaulted roof of the Tuileries Palace, and if the King's heart is disturbed by the ghostly ideas which their presence might suggest; but we cannot certainly believe — without injustice to the King, and without supposing him the Revolution's most dangerous foe — that he willingly encourages those attempts of priestly ambition, by letting them go on with impunity in their effort to win back the arrogant power wherewith these supporters of the Tiara have oppressed both kings and people.

Unless we are ready to credit the King with injustice, and pronounce him the most cruel enemy of his country, we cannot believe that he delights in encouraging sedition, and in perpetuating those disorders which lead to ruin through the medium of civil war.

I have come to the conclusion that if the King resists your laws, it is because he judges himself strong enough to maintain public peace without your aid. If it happens that the public peace is not maintained, that the torch of fanaticism threatens to raise a conflagration in the kingdom, that sectarian violence still spreads desolation in the various departments, then the agents of the royal authority are themselves the cause of all our evils.

Very well! Let them answer with their heads for all those troubles of which Religion is made the pretext! By thus placing the terrible responsibility where it belongs, you will show that there is an end both to your own patience and to the national turmoil.

In your solicitude for the external safety of the kingdom, you voted the establishment of a military encampment near Paris. On the Fourteenth of July, thither would come the Federationists of France, to repeat the oath of Liberty or Death! The poisonous breath of calumny has extinguished this project. To that also the King has refused his sanction.

I respect too much the exercise of his Constitutional rights to even propose that his Council should be held responsible for this refusal; but if, before the assembling of their battalions, it happens that the soil of Liberty is profaned, then those who are responsible for this delay should be dealt with as traitors! They should be thrown straightway into the pit which their carelessness or their malevolence has dug in the pathway of Liberty.

We must tear away the bandage which flattery and intrigue have tied over the King's eyes, and show him the terminus to which his perfidious friends will compel him to lead us.

It is in the King's name that the French refugee princes stir up the courts of Europe against us. It is to avenge the King's dignity that the treaty of Pilnitz has been concluded. It is for the defence of the King that we have seen his former body-guards flee to Germany under rebellion's flag. It is to give aid and comfort to the King that the refugees enroll themselves in the Austrian army, and sustain its efforts to tear the breast of their native land. It is in order to join these valiant chevaliers in their adherence to the royal prerogatives, that officers have abandoned their posts in the presence of the enemy, broken their oaths, stolen the funds entrusted to their charge, and corrupted their men, thus staining their honor with cowardice, perjury, insubordination, theft, and murder. In all these disasters the King's name has been cited.

Now in the Constitution I read as follows: "If the King puts himself at the head of an army, and directs its force against the Nation, or if he does not oppose, by some formal act, any such enterprise undertaken in his name, he shall be regarded as having abdicated his throne."

All in vain will it be for the King to reply: "It is true the national enemies pretend to act in my behalf, but I have proved myself not their accomplice. I have obeyed the Constitution. I have put troops into the field. To be sure the troops are weak, but the Constitution does not designate how strong I shall make my army. It is true that some encampments of troops might have been held in reserve to relieve those in the field; but the Constitution does not compel me to form such reserve camps. It is true that when my generals advanced without resistance into the enemy's country, I ordered their recall; but the Constitution does not compel me to achieve victories. It is true that my ministers have deceived the National Assembly as to the number, disposition, and supplies of our troops; but the Constitution gives me the right of choosing my own Council, and nowhere commands me to give my confidence to Patriots, and drive from me all Counter-Revolutionists. True, the Assembly has voted some decrees necessary to the defence of our dear country, and I have refused them my approval; but the Constitution guarantees me this right. Finally, it is true that the Counter-Revolution is at work, that despotism wishes to replace in my hands an iron sceptre, — that I may crush you with it, that you may be compelled to grovel before me, that I may punish you for having the insolence to wish for freedom ; but all this is strictly in accordance with the Constitution. Not one act has emanated from me which the Constitution condemns. No one has any right to doubt my fidelity to the Constitution, or my zeal in its defence."

If it were possible, gentlemen, amidst the calamities of a baleful war, amidst the disorders of an Anti-Revolutionary upheaval, that the King of France should use such derisive language, — if it were possible to talk of his love for the Constitution with such insulting irony, should we not have a right to answer him in the following strain ?

"Oh King! Doubtless you believe, like the tyrant Lysander, that truth is worth no more than falsehood, and that it is well to amuse men with oaths, as children are amused with jackstones.

"You have pretended to love the laws, only for the sake of retaining as much power as would serve you in defying them. You have only agreed to the Constitution, lest it should push you from your throne, upon which you need to remain, in order that you may destroy that Constitution. You profess to love the Nation, only that you may inspire the people with confidence, and so assure the success of your perfidy.

"Think you still to abuse us with hypocritical protestations ? Do you think you can give a different complexion to the cause of our misfortunes, by your artifice, your impudence, your sophisms ?

"Was it for the sake of defending us that you sent an inferior force to resist foreign invasion, and so left your troops no possibility but defeat ? Was it for the purpose of defending us that you neglected projects for fortifying the interior of the kingdom, and failed to make preparations for resistance, against a time when we might become the prey of tyrants ? Was it in our defence that you failed to reprimand a general who violated the Constitution, and so weakened the courage of those who served under him ?

"Is it for our sakes that you have constantly disorganized your Council? Does the Constitution leave to you the choice of your ministers for our weal or for our woe? Does it make you commander-in-chief of our armies for our glory or our shame? Does it give you the right of approval or veto, a large income, and great prerogatives, in order that you may use these privileges to the detriment of the Constitution and the kingdom?

"Not so, thou man whom the generosity of the French people has roused to no responsive emotion, — man sensible only to the love of despotism.

"You have not kept your vows to the Constitution. The Constitution may be upset, but you shall not gather the fruit of your perjury. You have not formally repudiated the victories which in your name have been achieved over Liberty, but yours shall not be the fruit of these unworthy triumphs. Henceforth you are naught to the Constitution which you have so unworthily violated, or to the people whom you have so pusillanimously betrayed!"

So might we speak to the King!

As the facts which I have recalled to your notice do not lack striking support from several acts of the King; as it is certain that the false friends who surround him are bribed by the conspirators at Coblentz, who burn to lead the King to his perdition, in order to place the crown on the head of some one of their own chiefs; as it is important for his personal safety, as well as the safety of the kingdom, that his conduct should not be clouded with suspicion, I propose an address which shall remind him of the truths I have here recited, through which it may be urged upon the King that the neutrality which he maintains, between his own country and Coblentz, is treason towards France.

Moreover, I demand that you shall declare the country to be in danger. At this cry of alarm you will see all citizens rally. The earth will be covered with soldiers, who will renew the prodigies of valor which covered with glory the nations of antiquity. After being regenerated in 1789, have the French people been shorn of their patriotism?

Has the day not dawned when those who dwell in the stability of Rome can reunite with those who have taken their stand on the Mount Aventine of resistance? Are you waiting for the time when, weary with the fatigues of the Revolution, or corrupted by the habit of living as palace parasites, weak men can without enthusiasm talk of liberty, and discuss slavery without a shiver?

What are we waiting for? Is it a military government, which some wish to establish? The Court is suspected of treasonable projects. There is talk of military movements and martial law. The public imagination is being familiarized with the idea of bloodshed. The French King's palace is gradually being changed into a fortified castle.

Where are our enemies? Against whom are these bayonets and cannon pointed?

The friends of the Constitution have been driven out of the Royal Council. The reins of government are dangling at random, needing the grasp of vigor and patriotism. Everywhere discord is fomented and fanaticism triumphs. The connivance of the government increases the audacity of powerful foreign states, who belch forth against us their armies and their weapons; and this same connivance cools the sympathy of those nations who secretly pray for the triumph of Liberty. The cohorts of our enemies stretch wider and wider. The shuttles of intrigue and perfidy are weaving treason. The Legislature opposes rigorous but necessary edicts to head off these plots. The King's own hands tear these edicts in twain.

Summon, — for it is time, — summon the French people to save their native land! Show them the gulf in all its immensity! Only by an extraordinary effort will they be able to cross it. It is for you to move them, by an electric movement which will send a shock throughout the land.

Imitate the Greeks at Thermopylæ, or those venerable Roman senators who, on their own thresholds, awaited the death which their savage enemies brought into their country. It is only needful to make such sacrifices, in order to find avengers of your ashes. The day when your blood reddens the soil, tyranny — with its pride, its palaces, its upholders — will vanish before an all-powerful nationality and the wrath of the people.

In this speech there was an ascending force. By increasing gradations, like the crescendo of a tempest, it beat the air like the wings of some huge bird, rising like a hurricane.

The effect was like that of a water-spout. The whole assemblage, Feuillants, Royalists, Constitutionalists, Republicans, members on their benches and spectators in the galleries, were overwhelmed, caught up, and carried away by this powerful whirlwind. Everybody yelled with enthusiasm.

On the same evening Barbaroux wrote to his friend Rebecqui, who remained in Marseilles:

Send me five hundred men who know how to die!

CHAPTER IV.

THE THIRD ANNIVERSARY OF THE CAPTURE OF THE BASTILLE.

On July 11 the Assembly declared that the country was in peril. For the promulgation of this declaration the King's authorization was requisite, according to the Constitution. This the King did not give till the evening of the twenty-first.

Indeed, to proclaim the country in peril was an acknowledgment of royal impotence. It was an appeal to the Nation to save itself, inasmuch as the King either could or would do nothing about it.

During the interval from July 11 to July 21 the palace was greatly agitated by fear.

On July 14 the Court expected the development of some plot against the King's life. A bulletin from the Jacobins confirmed this expectation. It was prepared by Robespierre. His two-edged sword was easily recognizable.

This circular was addressed to the Federationists who were coming to Paris for their festival of July 14, so cruelly stained with blood the year before. Thus spake the Incorruptible:

> Greeting to the French people in their eighty-three departments! Greeting to Marseilles! Greeting to the Nation, powerful and invincible, who gathers her children about her in all times of her fears and her festivals! We open our doors to our brothers!

Citizens, do you come hither merely for an empty federal ceremony, and for superfluous adjurations? No, no! You hasten at the appeal of the Nation, menaced from without, betrayed from within!

Our perfidious chiefs lead our armies into snares. Our generals respect the territory of the tyrannical Austrian, and burn the villages of our Belgian brothers. A monster — Lafayette! — has insulted the National Assembly to its very face.

Reviled, threatened, outraged, does the Assembly still exist? So many attacks have at last awakened the Nation, and so you are gathering here together. Those who sing the Nation's lullaby will try to seduce you. Flee from their caresses! Flee from their banquets, when they drink to the success of Moderation and imbibe forgetfulness of duty! Keep your suspicions intact! The fatal hour is about to sound!

Behold the Patriot Altar! Will you allow base idols to come between you and Liberty, to usurp the adoration which belongs to her alone? Let us swear allegiance only to our country, sustained by the everlasting arms of the King of Nature.

At the Champ de Mars everything will remind you of the treachery of our enemies. Not a sod can there be upturned which is not soiled with the innocent blood poured out upon it. Purify that soil! Avenge that blood! Do not leave that sacred precinct till you have determined the salvation of our native land!

It would be difficult to speak more explicitly. Never was slaughter advised in more positive terms. Never were sanguinary reprisals preached in more clear and urgent tones.

Mark this! It was Robespierre, the caustic tribune, the fine-spun orator, who said to the eighty-three departments, in his blandest voice: "My friends, believe me, it is best to kill the King!"

Everybody was in consternation at the Tuileries, especially the King. The Court partisans were positive that the outbreak of June 20 had for its object the assassination in the midst of a riot; and that if this crime had not been committed, it was solely on account of the King's courage, which had awed the murderers. There was some truth in all this.

Now all the courtiers still remaining with those two condemned persons called the King and Queen, declared that the crime which had miscarried on June 20 had been merely postponed till July 14.

Of this they were so fully persuaded that they begged the King to put on a tunic of chain mail, so that the first stab or the first shot would be blunted on his breast, and his friends have time to rally to his assistance.

Alas! The Queen no longer had Andrée to aid her in this nocturnal task, as on a former similar occasion, and to go with her, at midnight, to some remote corner of the Tuileries, there to test, with a tremulous hand, the solidity of this silky cuirass, as she had once done at Versailles.

Fortunately the King's breastplate had been preserved; although at the time of his first violent journey to Paris the King had only tried it on, in order to please the Queen, and afterwards refused to wear it. Now the King was so closely watched, that his friends could find no opportunity of again having him put it on, and correcting any faults which might be found in it.

For three days Madame Campan carried it about under her clothing. At last, when she was one morning in the Queen's chamber, while her Majesty was still abed, the King came in, rapidly threw off his coat, and tried on the armor, while Madame Campan fastened the doors.

When the shirt of mail had been thus put on, the King called Madame Campan, and said in a low voice: "It is to satisfy the Queen that I do this. They won't assassinate me, Campan, you may be sure. Their plans are changed, and I must expect a different sort of death. At any rate, come to my rooms, when you leave the Queen's, as I have something to confide to you."

The King left the room. The Queen had observed this interview, but without hearing anything. She followed the King with a restless glance till the door closed behind him, and then asked: "Campan, what did the King say to you just now?"

In tears Madame Campan threw herself on her knees by the bedside of the Queen, who took her attendant's hands, while that lady repeated aloud what the King had whispered.

The Queen sorrowfully shook her head and said: "Yes, that is the King's opinion, and I begin to think as he does. The King believes that what is taking place in France is but a repetition of what happened in England during the last century. He reads continually the history of the unfortunate Charles the First, in order to bear himself better than the English monarch. Yes, yes! I begin to think the King will be tried, my dear Campan! As to myself, I am a foreigner, and I shall be assassinated. Alas! What will become of my poor children?"

The Queen could proceed no further. Her strength abandoned her, and she began to sob.

Madame Campan arose and hastened to prepare a glass of sweetened water, mixed with ether; but the Queen made a negative sign.

"Nervous maladies belong to happy women; but all the medicine in the world can do naught for maladies of the soul. In our misfortunes I am no longer sensible of my bodily existence. I think only of my fate. Do not say anything about this to the King, but go and find him."

Madame Campan hesitated about obeying.

"What is the matter?" asked the Queen.

"Oh, Madame!" cried Madame Campan, "I must tell your Majesty that I have had made for you a chain tunic like the King's. On my knees I beg your Majesty to wear it."

"Thank you, dear Campan!" said Marie Antoinette.

"Ah! Your Majesty accepts it, then?" cried the attendant, joyfully.

"I accept it as a token of your devotion; but I shall take good care not to put it on."

Then, taking her attendant's hand, she added softly: "I shall only be too happy if they assassinate me! My God! They will then do more than Thou hast done in giving me life, for they will deliver me from it!—Go Campan, go!"

Madame Campan left the room; and it was time, for she was stifling.

In the corridor she met the King, who was walking towards her. On seeing her, he stopped, and offered his hand. Madame Campan took his hand, and wished to kiss it; but the King drew her to himself, and kissed her on both cheeks.

Before she could recover from her astonishment he bade her follow him.

Walking in advance of her, and pausing in an inside entry which led to the Dauphin's chamber, the King felt with his hand till he found a spring, and opened a cupboard, so carefully concealed in the wall that the aperture was completely lost among the brown patches which formed the darker parts of the painted stones.

This was the iron vault which the King had made and walled up with Master Gamain's help, more than two years before.

There was a large portfolio filled with papers in the safe, and on one of the shelves were piled several millions in golden louis.

"Here, Campan," said the King, "take this portfolio, and carry it to your own room."

Madame Campan tried to lift it, but the portfolio was too heavy.

"Sire, I cannot!" she said.

"Wait, wait!" said the King.

After shutting the safe, which again became entirely invisible, he took the portfolio, and himself carried it to Madame Campan's room.

"There!" he said, drying his forehead.

"Sire, what ought I to do with this portfolio?"

"The Queen will tell you, when she tells you what it contains."

The King left the room. In order that the huge portfolio might not be seen, Madame Campan, with an effort, pushed it between the two mattresses of her bed, and then returned to the Queen, to whom she said: "Madame, I have in my possession a portfolio which the King has just brought me. He says your Majesty will apprise me what it contains, and what is to be done with it."

The Queen laid her hand on Madame Campan's, who stood before the bed, waiting for an answer.

"Campan, those are writings which would be fatal to the King, if things should come to a trial, — which God forbid! At the same time, — and doubtless this is what he wishes me to tell you, — in that portfolio is a full account of a session of the Council in which the King advised against a declaration of war. He had it signed by all his Councillors. In case of a trial he thinks that if these other papers are harmful to him, this one may be useful."

"But, Madame," asked the alarmed tiring-woman, "what is to be done with them?"

"Whatever you choose, provided they are in safety. You alone are responsible for them. Only you must not go away from me, even when you are not on duty. Such are our circumstances, that at any moment I may need you. As you are one of our trustworthy friends, I wish to have you always at hand."

The festival of July 14 took place. It concerned itself with the Revolution, not with the assassination of the King. Probably no such idea as that was really entertained; but there was a disposition to celebrate Pétion's victory over the King.

We know already that immediately after the Twentieth of June Pétion was suspended from office by the Directory of Paris. Without the King's concurrence, this act would have been inoperative; but the suspension was confirmed by a royal proclamation, sent to the Assembly.

On July 13, the eve of the anniversary of the downfall of the Bastille, the Assembly, acting on its own separate authority, removed the injunction from Pétion.

On July 14, at eleven in the forenoon, the King came down the great staircase, with the Queen and their children. Three or four thousand unorganized troops escorted the royal family. The Queen looked in vain into the faces of these soldiers, and also of the National Guards, for any mark of sympathy. The most devoted turned away their heads and avoided her glance.

As to the people, there was no mistaking their sentiments. Cheers for Pétion were heard on all sides. Then, as if there were a desire to make the ovation more lasting than the enthusiasm of a moment, on every man's hat the King and Queen could see the words which announced at once the royal defeat and the Mayor's victory: Long live Pétion !

The Queen was pale and trembling. In spite of what she had said to Madame Campan, she was convinced that there was a plot against the King's life. She shuddered every instant, fancying she saw an outstretched arm with a knife, or a hand levelling a pistol.

At the Champ de Mars the King descended from his carriage, took his place at the left of the President of the Assembly, and with him walked on towards the Patriot Altar.

There it was necessary for the Queen to separate herself from the King, in order to ascend, with her children, to the balcony reserved for them. She paused, refusing to go up the stairs until her husband was safe in his place, and anxiously followed him with her eyes.

At the foot of the Patriot Altar there occurred one of those sudden movements, such as crowds often make. The King disappeared, as if he had been submerged. The Queen screamed, and started towards the place; but presently he reappeared, walking up the steps of the Patriot Altar.

Among the ordinary symbols which figure in solemn festivals, — such as Justice, Force, Liberty, — there was one which gleamed mysteriously and formidably under a crape veil. This symbol was borne by a man dressed in black and crowned with cypress, and it particularly attracted the Queen's notice.

She was glued to the spot where she stood. Though assured of the safety of the King, who had now reached the top of the altar platform, she could not detach her gaze from this gloomy apparition.

At last she made an effort to unloose the chains of her tongue, and said, though without addressing anybody in particular: "Who is that man in black, crowned with cypress?"

"The headsman!" was the response of a voice which made her tremble.

"And what does he carry in his hand, under that crape veil?"

"The axe of Charles the First."

The Queen grew pale and looked around her. It seemed as if she had heard the sound of that voice before.

She was not mistaken. The man who spoke was the man she had seen at Taverney Château, at Sevres Bridge, and on her return from Varennes. In a word, it was Cagliostro. Uttering a cry, she fell fainting in Madame Elizabeth's arms.

CHAPTER V.

THE COUNTRY IN PERIL.

On July 22, at six in the morning, a week after the Bastille Festival at the Champ de Mars, all Paris shuddered at the sound of a heavy piece of artillery, discharged on New Bridge. A cannon at the Arsenal answered like an echo.

From hour to hour, during the day, this alarming detonation was renewed.

The six legions composing the National Guard, led by their commanders, assembled by daybreak at the Hôtel de Ville.

Two processions were organized, to carry throughout the streets of Paris and its suburbs the proclamation that the country was in danger.

It was Danton who conceived the idea of having this alarming display, and he asked Sergent to arrange the programme.

As an engraver Sergent was an artist of only moderate ability, but he was great at planning spectacular shows. The outrageous insults heaped upon him by Royalists in the yard of the Tuileries, when he went there with Pétion after the riot of June 20, had augmented his hatred. In his programme for July 22 he showed the same magnificent skill which was to reach its culmination on August 10.

Both processions, which were to go through the city in opposite directions, left the City Hall at six in the morning.

First came a detachment of cavalry, with music at its head. A gloomy melody had been composed for the occasion, and resembled a funeral march.

Behind this detachment of cavalry came six pieces of artillery, which marched abreast, when the quays and streets were wide enough, and two-by-two, where the streets were narrow.

Next came four officers on horseback, bearing as many ensigns, on each of which was one of the four words :

LIBERTY — EQUALITY — CONSTITUTION — COUNTRY.

Then followed a dozen municipal officers, with their scarfs and swords.

Following them — solitary and isolated, like France herself — came a National Guardsman on horseback, holding aloft a large tricolored banner, on which were inscribed these words :

CITIZENS, OUR COUNTRY IS IN DANGER.

Then came six other pieces of artillery, arranged like the first, rumbling and jolting heavily.

They were followed by a detachment of the National Guards, after which a second body of horsemen brought up the rear.

At every square, bridge, and crossroad the procession halted. Silence was commanded by the drum-roll. The banners waved ; and when the noise was subdued, and ten thousand spectators held their breath captive within their breasts, a city official raised his voice, and read aloud the legislative act, to which he always added this watchword :

THE COUNTRY IS IN PERIL.

This last startling cry vibrated in every heart. It was the cry of the Nation, of France, of Native Land. It was the utterance of an agonized mother, crying, "Help, my children!"

Meanwhile, hour by hour, the roar of cannon at New Bridge found its echo in the detonation at the Arsenal.

In all the large squares of the city, the Notre Dame Purview being the chief centre, platforms had been erected for the enlistment of volunteers. In the middle of each staging was a large plank, resting on two drums, which served as a recruiting table; at every jarring movement on the platform, these drums sent forth gloomy vibrations, like the rumbling of a distant storm.

Around each of these platforms were tents, surmounted with tricolored flags, each tent graced with red, white, and blue streamers, and crowned with a chaplet of oak-leaves.

Around the table were seated municipal officers, arrayed in their official scarfs, who delivered the certificates to the recruits as fast as their names were registered.

At each side of the staging were two cannon. At the foot of the wide staircase leading up to the table were musicians, who played continually. Beyond the tents, following the same curved line, was a circle of armed citizens.

All this was both grand and terrible. It was the frenzy of patriotism.

Everybody rushed up to have his name inscribed. The sentinels were powerless to keep back the applicants, who continually broke through the ranks. The two staircases, one for ascending and the other for descending, large as they were, were not adequate for the crowd.

Every man climbed up as he could, aided by those who had already reached the top of the platform. As soon as his name was registered, and the certificate filled out, he jumped to the ground with proud cheers, flourishing his parchment, running to kiss the cannon's mouth, and singing the Ça ira.

Thus were celebrated the nuptials between War and the French People, — that war of two and twenty years' duration, which would result in a freer future for the world, though it failed somewhat of this effect in its own day and generation.

Among these volunteers were many past the military age, who, with sublime idiocy, tried to disguise their years. Others were too young for service; but these pious liars were so anxious to be soldiers, that they stood on tiptoe and answered sixteen, when they were really only fourteen.

In this way the aged Latour d'Auvergne came from Brittany, and the youthful Viala from the south.

Those who were kept back by indissoluble ties wept because they could not go. They hid their faces in their hands to conceal their shame, when the successful recruits called out to them: "Sing, you fellows! Hurrah for the Nation!"

As the cannon sounded, hour by hour, from New Bridge to the Arsenal, so these cheers for the Nation continually rose higher and louder in the air.

The excitement was so great, the people were so frenzied, that the Assembly was alarmed at its own work. Four members were delegated to go over Paris in all directions. It was their business to say: "Brothers, in the name of our country, no riots The Court would like to have one, in order to raise some excuse for getting the King out of the way. Don't give the Court such a pretext. He must stay with us."

Then these terrible word-planters would add, in an insidious whisper: "It is necessary for him to have his punishment!"

There was hand-clapping, as these messengers passed along ; and through the multitude, like the sough of the storm through forest branches, could be heard the sentence : "He must be punished!" Nobody said who ought to be punished ; but everybody knew very well to whom the pronoun applied.

This lasted till midnight. Until midnight the cannon thundered. Until midnight the crowds stayed around the platforms. Many encamped at the Champ de Mars, making their first bivouac at the foot of the Patriot Altar.

Every report of the cannon resounded in the heart of the Tuileries.

The heart of the Tuileries was the King's chamber, where Louis, Marie Antoinette, the royal children, and the Princess Lamballe were assembled. They did not go out all day long. They felt that their destinies were somehow involved in that grand and solemn time.

The royal family did not separate till after midnight, — that is, till they knew the last gun had been fired.

Since the convocations in the faubourgs the Queen no longer slept in the old apartments. Her friends prevailed upon her to occupy a room situated between the King's chamber and the Dauphin's. Accustomed to wake always at daybreak, she insisted that neither the blinds nor shutters should be closed, so that her sleeplessness might be less disagreeable. Madame Campan slept in the same chamber with the Queen.

Let us relate how it happened that the Queen consented to let one of her attendants sleep near her. One night, when the Queen was about to retire, an hour after midnight, as Madame Campan was standing before the Queen's bed and talking with her, they heard steps in the corridor, and then a noise which sounded like a struggle between two men. Madame Campan wished to ascertain what was going on, but the Queen clung to her attendant, — or rather to her friend, — and said : " Don't leave me, Campan ! "

Just then a voice in the corridor shouted : " Fear nothing, Madame ! It's only a rascal who meant to kill you, but I've got him ! " It was the voice of a chamberlain.

" My God ! " cried the Queen, raising her hands to Heaven, " what an existence ! Outrages by day ! Assassins at night ! "

Then she called out to the chamberlain : " Let the man go, and open the door for him ! "

" But Madame — ! " said Campan.

" Ah, my dear," said the Queen, " if he is arrested to-night, the Jacobins will carry him aloft in triumph to-morrow."

The man was released, and proved to be an employee connected with the King's toilet-room. Henceforth the King persuaded the Queen to let some one share her room. She selected Madame Campan.

The night following the proclamation of national danger, Madame Campan awoke towards two o'clock. A ray of moonshine crept through the window-panes, like a nocturnal visitant or a friendly flame, and rested on the Queen's bed, tingeing the linen with a pale, peaceful, and bluish hue.

Madame Campan heard a sigh. She knew that the Queen was not asleep. " Is your Majesty in pain ? " she asked softly.

" I suffer all the time, Campan," responded Marie Antoinette, " but I hope this suffering will not last much longer."

"Good God, Madame!" cried the attendant, "has your Majesty been indulging in painful thoughts?"

"No, quite the contrary, Campan!"

Reaching forth her colorless hand, which became still paler in the reflected moonlight, the Queen said with an accent of deep melancholy: "In a month this ray of moonlight will see us free and relieved from our chains."

"Ah!" cried Madame Campan, joyously, "have you accepted Lafayette's succor, and are you to escape?"

"Succor from Lafayette? No, God be praised!" said the Queen, with an accent of unmistakable repugnance. "No! but in a month my nephew, the Emperor Francis, will be in Paris."

"Are you sure of it, Madame?" cried Campan, in alarm.

"Yes, all is decided. There is an alliance between Austria and Prussia. The two powers combined will march on Paris. We know the route both of the princes and the allied armies. We can say positively that on such a day our rescuers will be at Valenciennes, on such a day at Verdun, on such a day at Paris!"

"And you do not fear — ?" Madame Campan checked herself.

"— being assassinated?" said the Queen, finishing the sentence. "That may be! I know it! But what then Campan? Whoever risks nothing, gains nothing!"

"On what day do the allies hope to reach Paris?"

"Between the Fifteenth and Twentieth of August."

"God grant it!" said Campan.

Fortunately God did not grant it! or rather, he heard the prayer, and sent to France unhoped-for aid, — the Marseillaise!

CHAPTER VI.

THE MARSEILLES HYMN.

WHAT encouraged the Queen was precisely what should have frightened her, — the Duke of Brunswick's manifesto. This manifesto was prepared at the Tuileries, and sent away early in the month; but it was not expected back in Paris, for publication, before July 26.

About the same time that the Court was preparing this brainless document, whose effect we shall note in due time, let us see what was going on at Strasburg.

Strasburg was an exceedingly French town, the more so because it had narrowly escaped being an Austrian dependency. Strasburg was one of France's most solid bulwarks, and saw the enemy at her very gates.

For six months, ever since there had been a serious question of war, patriotic battalions, composed of youthful and ardent volunteers, had been assembling at Strasburg.

Strasburg, whose sublime steeple is mirrored in the Rhine, which alone separated France from the enemy, was at that time a seething caldron of war. It was the seat of gayety, pleasure, balls, and parades, and the sound of warlike implements was unceasingly mingled with holiday music.

As arriving volunteers entered one gate of the city, out by the other went those soldiers who were considered properly prepared for the fray. In Strasburg friends met and embraced, before uttering their last farewells.

Sisters wept. Mothers prayed. Fathers said: "Go, and die for France!"

Above all could be heard detonations of cannon and the chimes of holy bells, those two brazen voices which speak to God, — one to invoke his mercy, the other his justice.

On the occasion of one of these departures — more solemn than the rest, because there were more troops — Mayor Dietrich of Strasburg, a worthy and excellent citizen, invited the brave young fellows to come to his house, and fraternize with the garrison officers in a banquet.

The Mayor's two girls, with a dozen or fifteen of their companions, — blond and noble daughters of Alsatia, who might have been mistaken for nymphs of Ceres, by their golden hair, — though they were not to preside at the festival, were to perfume and embellish it, like so many bouquets of flowers.

Among the guests — a frequent visitor at Dietrich's house as a family friend — was a noble young gentleman from Franché Comté, named Rouget de l'Isle.

At a later period the author of this history was acquainted with this gentleman. While the novelist listened, pen in hand, the poet related the story of the birth of this poetic war-flower, whose unfolding the reader is about to witness.

Rouget de l'Isle was then twenty years of age, and belonged to the Strasburg garrison as an engineering officer. A poet and musician, his harpsichord was to be heard in the midst of the grand harmony of the era, and his voice was to be heard among the strongest and most patriotic.

Never was a more French or more national banquet brightened by the warm summer sun. None talked of themselves. All talked of France.

Death was present, to be sure, as at the classic banquets of antiquity; but Death seemed beautiful, and wore a smiling face. He bore not the hideous scythe or the funereal hourglass, but in one hand was his sword, and in the other a palm-branch.

They wanted something to sing. The old Ça ira was an anthem of wrath and of civil war. What they wanted was a patriotic appeal, fraternal in spirit, but threatening to foreign enemies.

Where was the modern Tyrtæus who, amidst the smoke of artillery and the whistle of bullets, could lift up his voice in the hymn of France against her invaders?

To this demand the enthusiastic, passionate, and patriotic Rouget de l'Isle responded: "Here am I!" and immediately left the dining-hall.

In a half-hour, before they began to be uneasy over his absence, all was ready, words and music. The hymn had been struck out at one flow of the metal into the mould, as if it had been the statue of a god.

Rouget returned. His hair was tossed back. His forehead was covered with sweat. He was breathless from his struggle with those two sublime sisters, Music and Poesy.

"Listen!" he cried, "listen all!"

He was sure of his muse, this noble young fellow!

At the sound of his voice every one turned towards him, some holding their goblets, while others clasped their neighbors' trembling hands.

Rouget de l'Isle began:

Come on, ye children of our Nation,
The day of glory now is here!
Against us tyrants take their station,
Their blood-red standards to uprear.
Their blood-red standards to uprear.

Along our fields, are ye not hearing
The trampling oaths of soldiers fierce?
They come, within our arms, to pierce
Our sons and comrades so endearing.

To arms, ye patriot band! In bright battalions stand!
March on! March on!
May blood impure soon lave our thirsty land.

[NOTE. — As the version of the Marseillaise given by Dumas differs somewhat from the older popular version, still sung and printed in France, the usual words or lines are here and there inserted in brackets, while our author's preference is retained in the text. — Translator.]

Allons, enfants de la patrie;
Le jour de gloire est arrivé!
Contre vous [nous] de la tyrannie
L'étendard sanglant est levé,
L'étendard sanglant est levé.
Entendez-vous dans nos [les] campagnes
Rugir [mugir] ces féroces soldats?
Ils viennent jusque dans nos [vos] bras
Égorger nos [vos] fils, nos [vos] compagnes.

Aux armes, citoyens! formez vos bataillons!
Marchons, marchons;
Qu'un sang impur abreuve nos sillons!

At the first lines an electric thrill ran through the assemblage. Twice or thrice bursts of enthusiasm followed the close of the stanza, but voices thirsting for more shouted: "Silence! attention!"

Rouget continued, with a gesture of deep indignation, as his soul was stirred within him:

What will these hordes of minions blameful,
Of perjured kings and traitors bold?
For whom are wrought these shackles shameful,
These irons kept from days of old?

For us, ye French! what outrage dire!
What anger it should swift excite!
Against our rights they dare unite,
To send us back to slavery's mire.

Que veut cette horde d'esclaves,
De traîtres, de rois conjurés?
Pour qui ces ignobles entraves,
Ces fers dès longtemps préparés?
Français, pour nous, ah, quel outrage!
Quels transports il doit exciter!
C'est nous qu'on ose méditer [menacer]
De rendre à l'antique esclavage!

The singer began his refrain alone; but he had no need to ask the company to join in the chorus, for that chorus came in a single cry from every lip:

To arms, ye patriot band! In bright battalions stand!
March on! March on!
May blood impure soon lave our thirsty land!

Then Rouget continued, amidst increasing enthusiasm:

By cohorts strange, a foreign legion,
Shall our dear hearths and homes be bound?
And hireling hosts, throughout this region,
Fell our bold warriors to the ground?
Jehovah! 'neath these fetters fateful,
We bow the head and bend the knee;
But masters of our destiny,
Shall never be these despots hateful.

Quoi! des cohortes étrangères
Feraient la loi dans nos foyers?
Quoi! ces phalanges mercenaires
Terrasseraient nos fiers guerriers?
Grand Dieu! par des mains enchaînées,
Nos fronts sous le joug se ploirant [plieraient]!
De vils despotes deviendraient
Les maîtres de nos destinées!

A hundred throbbing breasts waited for the poet's rejoinder, and before the last lines were sung they shouted: "No! no! no!"

Then, with the dominance of a trumpet, the chorus again rang out:

To arms, ye patriot band! In bright battalions stand!
March on! March on!
May blood impure soon lave our thirsty land!

Now there ensued such a tremulous rustle among his hearers, that before singing the fourth stanza Rouget was obliged to ask for silence. They listened feverishly, as his vehement voice sang on:

Ye tyrants, tremble! Traitors scheming,
By parties all ye stand condemned!
Quail! for your parricidal dreaming,
Whose just reward doth now impend!
Here all are soldiers strong to fight you;
And when they fall, in life's young spring,
The earth new heroes forth shall bring,
With hearts already armed to smite you.

Tremblez, tyrans! et vous, perfides!
L'opprobre de tous les partis!
Tremblez! vos projets parricides
Vont enfin recevoir leur prix.
Tout est soldat pour vous combattre,
S'ils tombent, nos jeunes héros,
La terre [France] en produit de nouveaux,
Contre vous tout [tous] prêts à se battre.

"Yes! yes!" shouted all voices.

Outsiders had come in after the banquet was over, to hear the song.

Fathers pushed forward their sons, who were able to march. Mothers lifted in their arms children who still had to be carried.

Then Rouget de l'Isle saw that a verse was still wanting, the song of the children, — the sublime chorus of the growing harvest, of the sprouting grain. While his comrades were repeating frantically the terrible refrain, he leaned his head on his hand. There, in the midst of noise, cheers, and bravos, he improvised the following stanza :

Upon their lifework, we will enter,
When our dear elders are no more ;
May their blest virtues be our mentor,
Along the paths they trod before.
Less anxious far to long survive them,
Than honored graves with them to share,
With pride sublime we 'll do and dare,
Their deaths to avenge, or die beside them.

Nous entrerons dans la carrière
Quand nos aînés n'y seront plus ;
Nous y trouverons leur poussière
Et la trace de leurs vertus.
Bien moins jaloux de leur survivre
Que de partager leur cercueil,
Nous aurons le sublime orgueil
De les venger ou de les suivre !

Above the stifled sobs of the mothers and the enthusiastic accents of the fathers, the pure voices of childhood could be heard singing the chorus :

To arms, ye patriot band ! In bright battalions stand !
March on ! March on !
May blood impure soon lave our thirsty land !

"Ah !" softly said one of the guests ; "but is there no pardon for those who have been led astray in our holy war ?"

"Wait, wait!" said Rouget, "and you shall see that my heart merits no such reproach!"

With a voice full of emotion he sang that holy apostrophe, which contains the very heart of France. Humane, noble, generous, even in its wrath, — flying aloft on wings of pity, — the Nation rises superior to her own anger:

Ye Frenchmen loyal, be forbearing,
Whene'er ye give or hold your blows, —
Those dupes regretful always sparing,
Against you armed by spiteful foes.

Français! en guerriers magnanimes,
Portez ou retenez vos coups:
Épargnez ces [les] tristes victimes
S'armant à regret contre nous.
[À regret s'armant contre vous.]

Applause interrupted the singer. "Yes! Yes! Yes!" came from all sides. "Pity and pardon for our brothers misled, our brothers enslaved, — who are forced against us at the point of the bayonet!"

"Yes!" replied Rouget, "all pardon and mercy for those!" and then he sang on:

But strike those blood-stained knaves infernal,
And tools of pitiless Bouillé, —
Who wait, like tigers for their prey,
To tear the loving breast maternal!

Mais ces despotes sanguinaires,
Mais les complices de Bouillé,
Contre ces tigres sans pitié,
[Tous ces tigres qui, sans pitié,]
Déchirant [déchirent] le sein de leur mère!

"Yes; down with them!" shouted every voice.

March on! March on!
May blood impure soon lave our thirsty land!

"Now to your knees, all of you!" cried Rouget de l'Isle. They obeyed.

Rouget alone remained upright. Placing one foot on a comrade's chair, as if it were the first step in the Temple of Liberty, and raising his hands to Heaven, he sang the last stanza, an invocation to the Presiding Genius of France:

Let holy patriot love ne'er perish!
Guide and uphold our vengeful hands!
Oh Freedom, whom we fondly cherish,
Fight thou with our defensive bands.
May victory perch beneath our banners,
Drawn hither by thy dulcet tones!
May dying foemen, mid their groans,
Thy triumph see, hear our hosannas!

Amour sacré de la patrie,
Conduis, soutiens nos bras vengeurs;
Liberté, Liberté chérie,
Combats avec tes défenseurs!
Sous nos drapeaux, que la victoire
Accoure à tes mâles accents;
Que nos [tes] ennemis expirants
Voient ton [ta] triomphe et notre gloire!

"Go on! France is saved!" cried a voice.

Then once more all lips joined in that sublime hymn, — the pathetic De profundis of Despotism, the exulting Magnificat of Liberty:

To arms, ye patriot band! In bright battalions stand!
March on! March on!
May blood impure soon lave our thirsty land!

Joy — wild, intoxicating, insensate joy — filled all hearts. Everybody threw himself into his neighbor's arms. Maidens spread the floral crowns and bouquets broadcast at the bard's feet.

Thirty-eight years later, in describing to the narrator this great day, — to me a young man, who had just heard for the first time, in 1830, this sacred hymn sung by the puissant voice of the people, — thirty-eight years later, the poet's forehead was still radiant with the splendid aureole of 1792.

This was just!

How comes it that even I, in writing these last verses, find myself so greatly moved? Why is it that my right hand trembles, while it copies the Children's Chorus and the Invocation to the Angel of France? Why does my left hand brush away a tear, ready to fall upon the paper?

It is because the holy Marseilles Hymn is not merely a war-cry, but a pæan of fraternity. It is because it typifies the powerful hand of France, outstretched to all nations. It is because this hymn will be the last sigh of Liberty in her death, her first glad cry in the new birth.

As this hymn was born at Strasburg, and christened the Song of the Rhine, how did it happen to blossom suddenly in the heart of France, under the name of the Marseilles Hymn?

That is precisely what we are about to tell our readers!

NOTE. — The translator is well aware of the inadequacy of his version to express the fervor and fire of the Marseillaise; but it follows very nearly the peculiar rhythm and rhyming of the original, line for line; whereas other easily accessible translations, though meritorious, sacrifice either metre or meaning, and sometimes both.

There is a popular English version, which has been in use for over half a century, beginning thus:

Ye sons of France, awake to glory!
Hark, hark! What myriads bid you rise!
Your children, wives, and grandsires hoary, —
Behold their tears and hear their cries!

To arms! to arms, ye brave! The avenging sword unsheathe!
March on! March on!
All hearts resolved on victory or death!

This is both spirited and easily sung; but one looks in vain for the parallel of its language in the original hymn.

Other versions, full of poetic thought, give to every line eight syllables, divided into four equal feet, without the recurrence of the redundant closing syllable in the first, third, fifth, and eighth lines of each stanza; while one chorus,

To arms, citizens! Your battalions form!
March on! March on!
Until the beams of peace succeed the storm!

cannot be sung properly to the old music, and gives no hint of the decidedly bloodthirsty character of the French refrain, which even Dumas characterizes as terrible.

CHAPTER VII.

BARBAROUX'S FIVE HUNDRED MEN.

As if to give a basis for the proclamation of Danger to the Country, issued by the Assembly, the Coblentz manifesto arrived in Paris on July 28, 1792. As we have already said, this document was a foolhardy piece of work, a menace, and therefore an insult to France.

The Duke of Brunswick, a man of intellectual ability, deemed the manifesto absurd; but above the Duke were the kings forming the coalition. Having received the document all prepared from the hands of the French King, they sent it at once to their general.

According to this manifesto all Frenchmen were blameworthy, and every village deserved to be pulled down or burned. As to Paris, it was a modern Nineveh, preordained to briers and thistles. As in the famous Jerusalem Temple, not one stone should be left upon another.

This was the utterance of the manifesto which arrived from Coblentz on July 28, and bore the date of July 26. What eagle had transported this document in its claws, that it could travel two hundred leagues in thirty-six hours?

One can imagine the explosion produced by such a document. This evoked the spark which fell upon the powder. All hearts leaped. Everybody was alarmed, and prepared at once for the fray.

Among all these men let us select one, — among all these types, one type. Already we have named our man, — Barbaroux. Now let us try to depict this type of manhood.

As we already know, early in July, Barbaroux wrote to Rebecqui: "Send me five hundred men who know how to die!"

Who was the man capable of penning such a phrase, and what influence did he exercise over his compatriots? His was the influence of youth, good looks, and patriotism.

This man was Charles Barbaroux, whose gentle and charming face troubled Madame Roland, even in her conjugal chamber, and made Charlotte Corday dream of him, even as she stood at the foot of the scaffold.

Madame Roland began by distrusting him. Why did she distrust him? He was too handsome!

This same reproach was bestowed upon two Revolutionists, whose heads, handsome as they were, appeared on the scaffold within fourteen months of each other, — one under the hand of the Bordeaux executioner, the other under the hand of the headsman of Paris. The first was Barbaroux. The second was Hérault de Séchelles.

Hear what Madame Roland said about them:

> Barbaroux is a trifler. The adoration lavished upon him by frivolous women has filched away his serious sentiments. When I see handsome young men fairly intoxicated with the impression they produce, as is the case with Barbaroux and Hérault de Séchelles, I cannot help thinking that they adore themselves too much to be truly devoted to their country.

In this our stern Pallas Minerva was mistaken. His country was Barbaroux's chief mistress. If not his only mistress, at least she was the one he loved well enough to die for her.

Barbaroux was born at Marseilles, of a race of hardy seamen who made commerce poetic. By his form, grace, ideality, — above all, by his Greek profile, — he seemed like a direct descendant from the Phocians, who brought their gods from the banks of the Permessus to the borders of the Rhone.

Although so youthful, he had already practised the art of eloquence, — which the men of Southern France know how to make both a weapon and a gem, — and the art of Poetry, that flower of Parnassus, which the founders of Marseilles transported with them from the Corinthian Gulf to the Gulf of Lyons. He had also busied himself with the study of medicine, and had been a correspondent of Saussure and Marat.

He at first came into public notice during the agitations in his native city, following the election of Mirabeau to the Assembly. Soon afterward he was appointed secretary to the City Council of Marseilles.

Later there were troubles in Arles. In the midst of these disturbances appeared Barbaroux's handsome form, like an armed Antinoüs.

Paris claimed him. That great furnace needed this odorous vine-branch. The crucible needed this pure metal.

He was sent to the capital to give an account of the Avignon troubles. One might have said that he belonged to no party, — that his heart, like that of Justice, entertained neither friendship nor prejudice. He stated facts, terrible as they were; and in telling the truth, he seemed as great as Truth herself.

The Girondists had just arrived. What distinguished them from other parties, — what ruined them ultimately, perhaps, — was that they were genuine artists. They loved the beautiful. They grasped the warm and fresh hand of Barbaroux. Proud of their new adherent, they took him at once to Madame Roland's.

We already know what Madame Roland thought of Barbaroux at first sight. What astonished her especially was his youth. For a long time her husband had corresponded with Barbaroux, and his letters were always prompt, accurate, and full of wisdom. She had never asked about the age or aspect of this grave correspondent. It seemed to her that he must be a man at least forty years old, his head made bald by thought, his face wrinkled with nightly study.

Waking from her dream, she found him a handsome fellow of twenty-five, — gay, laughing, frivolous, fond of the ladies. All that fiery generation — which flourished in '92, to be cut off in '93 — were passionately fond of womankind.

It was in this head, which seemed so frivolous, and which Madame Roland thought too handsome, that the first thought was formulated, which found its culmination in the Tenth of August.

The storm was in the air. Frantic clouds rushed from north to south, from sunrise to sunset. Barbaroux gave these clouds a destiny, massing them above the tiled roofs of the Tuileries.

Before any one else had made a plan, he wrote to Rebecqui: "Send me five hundred men who know how to die!"

Alas! The true King of France was the King of the Revolution, who could write that he needed five hundred men who knew how to die, — men who came with the same simplicity of mind which had led him to send for them.

Rebecqui chose these men himself, — recruited them from the French party at Avignon. For two years they had been fighting. They had been hating through ten generations. They had fought at Toulouse, at Nismes, at Arles. To blood they were accustomed. Of fatigue they did not even speak.

On the day appointed they set out as if it were a very simple journey, this stretch of two hundred and twenty leagues. Why not? They were hardened sailors, tough peasants, with faces burned by the African sirocco or by the mistral from Mount Ventoux. Their hands were black from tar and callous from labor. Wherever they went they were called brigands.

During a halt which they made beyond Orgon, they received the words and music of Rouget de l'Isle's hymn, still called the Song of the Rhine. Barbaroux had sent them this viaticum, this travelling provision, in order to make the journey seem shorter.

One of them deciphered the music and sang the words. Then with a great outburst they all repeated this awful chant, — far more terrible than Rouget himself had imagined.

In passing through the mouths of the sons of Marseilles, the song changed its character and the words changed their accent. No longer was it a song of fraternity, and of resistance to foreign invaders. It was an anthem of extermination, civil war, and death. It was the Marseillaise, — that resounding hymn which made us tremble with fear beneath our mothers' breasts.

This little band of Marsillians marched through one village after another, terrifying France by the ardor wherewith they sang this new song, heretofore unknown to the land.

When he knew they had reached Montereau, Barbaroux ran and told Santerre. Santerre promised him to meet the Marsillians at Charenton, with forty thousand men.

Here is what Barbaroux calculated to do with Santerre's forty thousand men and his own five hundred Marsillians, — to put the Marsillians at the head, and carry the Assembly and City Hall with a rush. Then he meant to walk over the Tuileries, after the fashion of the conquerors of the Bastille in 1789, and proclaim the Republic on the ruins of that Florentine palace.

Barbaroux and Rebecqui went to Charenton, and there awaited Santerre and his forty thousand men from the faubourgs. Santerre came with two hundred men! Perhaps he did not wish to give Marsillians — that is, outsiders — the glory of such an achievement.

The little band, with fiery eyes, tanned skin, and hoarse speech, went through Paris, from the Royal Garden to Champs Élysées, singing the Marseillaise. Why should we call it by any other name than they gave it?

The Marsillians were to encamp on the Champs Élysées, where a banquet was to be given them the next day. The banquet did take place; but between the Champs Élysées and the Swinging Bridge, a few rods from the festival, were ranged battalions of grenadiers from the section called the Daughters of Saint Thomas. This was a Royalist detachment, which the palace had placed as a shield between the new-comers and itself.

The Marsillians and the Saint Thomas Grenadiers were enemies from the outset. They began by an interchange of insults, which they followed with blows. At the first show of blood the Marsillians shouted the call to arms, sprang for their guns, which were stacked near by, and charged with their bayonets.

The Parisian Grenadiers were sent head over heels by the first onslaught. Fortunately they had behind them the Tuileries and the iron gates. The Swinging Bridge protected the flight, and raised a barrier before their enemies.

The fugitives found an asylum in the royal apartments. Tradition has it, that one wounded man was cared for by the Queen's own hands.

The Federationists, the Marsillians, the Bretons, the Dauphinais, all numbered five thousand men. These five thousand men were a power, not by their numbers, but by their faith. The spirit of the Revolution was in them incarnate.

On July 17 they sent an address to the Assembly :

You have declared the country in danger ; but do you not endanger yourselves by prolonging the career of traitors? Send after Lafayette ! Suspend the Executive Power! Depose the Department Directories ! Renew the Judicial Power !

On August 3 Pétion himself renewed this demand. With his icy voice, and in the name of the municipality, he demanded an appeal to arms. It is true there were two dogs behind him, urging him on by biting the calves of his legs, — Danton and Sergent.

" The municipality," said Pétion, " denounces the Executive Power. To cure the ills of France, they must be assailed at their very source, and that without a moment's delay. We should prefer to ask simply for a temporary suspension of Louis Sixteenth; but that the Constitution forbids, and he constantly appeals to the Constitution. Therefore we not only ask his abdication, but demand it."

Listen to the King of Paris denouncing the King of France, — the King at the City Hall declaring war against the King at the Tuileries !

The Assembly recoiled at the proposal for such summary measures. The question of royal forfeiture was put off till August 9.

On the eighth the Assembly voted that there was no ground for proceeding against Lafayette. The Assembly was evidently retracing its steps. What would be the vote next day, in reference to deposing the King? Would the Assembly also put itself in opposition to the popular will? Let the Assembly be on its guard! Can the members not see what imprudence may bring about?

To go back a little. On August 3, the same day when Pétion asked for the King's deposal, the people in the Saint Marceau District were dying with hunger, on account of a struggle meaning neither peace nor war. They accordingly sent delegates to the Quinze Vingts Section, and said to their brothers in the Saint Antoine Section: "If we march against the Tuileries, will you march with us?"

"We will march!" was the reply.

On August 4 the Assembly condemned the insurrectionary proclamation issued by the Mauconseil Section.

On the fifth the municipality refused to publish the Assembly's decree. It was not enough that the King of Paris should declare war against the King of France. Here was the municipality putting itself in opposition to the Assembly.

The report of all these movements reached the Marsillians. Barbaroux's men had arms, but they had no cartridges. They clamored for cartridges, but they did not receive them.

On the evening of August 4, an hour after the news was spread abroad that the Assembly had condemned the action of the Mauconseil Section as riotous, two young Marsillians called at the Mayor's office. There were only two city officials present, — Sergent, who was Danton's man, and Panis, who clove to Robespierre.

"What do you wish?" asked the two magistrates.

"Cartridges!" replied the young men.

"We have been positively forbidden to let you have them!" said Panis.

"Forbidden to give us cartridges?" replied one of the two Marsillians. "Why, the fight 's coming on, and we sha'n't be able to hold our own!"

"Have we been brought to Paris for slaughter?" cried the other.

The first Marsillian pulled out a pistol. Sergent smiled and said: "You can't intimidate municipal magistrates with such petty menaces."

"Who talks of menaces and intimidation?" said the young man. "This pistol is n't for you. It 's for myself!" Pressing the weapon against his forehead, he added: "Give me powder and cartridges! or, on the word of a Marsillian, I 'll blow my brains out!"

Sergent had an artistic imagination, a true French heart. He felt that the young man's appeal was the appeal of France herself.

"Panis, we must take care!" he said. "If this youngster kills himself, his blood will be required of us!"

"But if we furnish the cartridges contrary to orders, we shall be staking our heads on the cast!"

"Never mind! I believe the hour has come for us to risk our heads," said Sergent. "Every one for himself. I lay mine on the hazard of the die. It is for thee to choose for thyself!"

Taking a sheet of paper, Sergent wrote and signed an order for the delivery of ammunition to the Marsillians.

"Give it me!" said Panis, when Sergent had finished it; and he also signed the order.

Henceforth people might be easy on one point, — that while the Marsillians had cartridges, they would not lie still and be butchered.

The Marsillians being now armed, the Assembly, on August 6, welcomed a belligerent petition which the Marsillians had addressed to it; and not only so, but the petitioners were all admitted to the honors of the session.

The Assembly was frightened, so much so, that the members debated the question if it would not be better to retire into the provinces.

Vergniaud alone held his ground. In God's name, why? Who shall say it was not because he was bound to stay near the beautiful Candeille, that he preferred remaining in Paris? It does n't matter, however.

"It is in Paris," said Vergniaud, "that we must secure the triumph of Liberty, or perish with our goddess. If we leave Paris, let us do so after the fashion of Themistocles, taking all the citizens with us. Let us leave behind us only ashes, and flee before our enemies, only in time to let them dig their graves."

Everybody was in doubt. Everybody hesitated. Everybody could feel the earth tremble beneath him, and feared lest it should gape under his very footsteps.

On August 4, the day when the Assembly condemned the Mauconseil proclamation, the day when the two young Marsillians distributed among their five hundred comrades the cartridges wrung from Sergent and Panis, — on that very day there was a gathering at the Blue Dial, on the Temple Boulevard. Camille Desmoulins was there, both on his own account and Danton's. Carra held the quill, and drew up a plan of insurrection.

This plan being matured, the conspirators went to see Antoine, a member of the former Constitutional Assembly, living on the Rue Saint Honoré, opposite Assumption Church, with Carpenter Duplay's family, in the same house with Robespierre.

Robespierre was not then quite up to the political mark; for when Madame Duplay saw this band of agitators take possession of Antoine's room, she hurried up there and called to them in affright: "Monsieur Antoine, are you going to slay Monsieur de Robespierre?"

"He's all right!" responded Antoine. "Nobody thinks of Robespierre, thank the Lord! If he's afraid, let him get out of the way!"

At midnight Carra's scheme was sent to Santerre and Alexandre, the two district commanders. Alexandre would have marched at once, but Santerre said his district was not ready.

Santerre kept his word to the Queen on June 20. Even on August 10 he only marched against her because he could not avoid so doing. The insurrection was consequently postponed.

Antoine said that nobody thought about Robespierre. He was in error. The public mind was so agitated that they even thought of taking Robespierre for the driving-wheel, — him, the centre of immovability.

Whose notion was this? Barbaroux's! He was almost in despair, this hardy Marsillian. He was almost ready to quit Paris and return to Marseilles.

Listen to Madame Roland:

> We counted little on our defences at the North. Together with Servan and Barbaroux, we examined the chances for the preservation of liberty in the South, and of founding there a new republic. We took the atlas, and traced on its maps the lines of demarcation. Said Barbaroux: "If my five hundred Marsillians cannot succeed here, that will be our best resource."

Well, Barbaroux now thought he had found another resource, — the genius of Robespierre. Perhaps it was Robespierre who wished to know more about Barbaroux's outlook.

The Marsillians had left their former barracks, which were too far off, and had taken up their abode in the old Cordelier Convent, which was at the very door of the New Bridge.

This brought them into association with Danton. In case of an insurrection, these terrible Marsillians would start with Danton's impetus. If the movement succeeded, Danton would have all the honor.

Barbaroux asked for an interview with Robespierre. Robespierre put on an air of condescension to this desire. He sent word to Barbaroux and Rebecqui that he was ready to see them at his lodgings.

As has been said, Robespierre lodged at Carpenter Duplay's. It may be remembered that chance led him thither on the evening of the butchery at the Champ de Mars. This chance Robespierre regarded as a blessing from Heaven, not merely because Duplay's hospitality saved his life from imminent danger at the time, but because the place naturally became the scene of his future activity.

For a man who wished to deserve the epithet incorruptible, this was precisely the lodging required. Nevertheless, he did not at once take possession of it. First he took a trip to Arras, whence he brought back his sister, Mademoiselle Charlotte de Robespierre, and resided in the Rue Saint Florentin, with this dry and uninteresting person, to whom the author had the honor of an introduction thirty-eight years afterwards.

Robespierre fell ill. When Madame Duplay, who was a perfect fanatic about Robespierre, heard about his sickness, she reproached Mademoiselle Charlotte, because she had not notified her at once of his malady, and requested that the invalid should be taken to the Duplay home.

Robespierre was willing to go. When leaving that home, where he had been a transitory guest, he resolved some day to return thither as a lodger. Madame Duplay's proposal harmonized capitally with his plans.

She also had dreamed of the honor of having the Incorruptible for her guest. She therefore arranged for him a small but neat attic, into which she carried the best and prettiest furniture in the house, to keep company with a charming blue and white bedstead, full of coquetry, such as would be agreeable to a man who, at the age of twenty-seven, had been painted with a rose in his hand.

In this attic Madame Duplay had new pine shelves put up by her husband's workmen, on which Robespierre could place his books and papers.

These books were not numerous. The works of Racine and Rousseau formed the chief library of our austere Jacobin. Apart from these two authors, Robespierre read only Robespierre. The other shelves were loaded with his old law-papers, and his platform speeches.

As to his walls, they were covered with all the portraits of this great man, her lodger, which Madame Duplay's fanaticism could discover. As he had only to put out his hand in order to read Robespierre, so to whatever side he turned, Robespierre still saw Robespierre, — always Robespierre.

It was into this sanctuary, into this tabernacle, this Holy of Holies, that Barbaroux and Rebecqui were ushered.

Only the participators in this scene could tell with what subtile skill Robespierre wove the conversational threads. First he spoke of the Marsillians, of their patriotism, of his dread of seeing even the noblest sentiments carried to extremes. Then he talked of himself, of his services to the Revolution, of the wise deliberation wherewith he had regulated its current.

Was it not time this Revolution should be checked? Had not the hour come for all parties to unite in choosing the most popular man among them, in order to put the Revolution into his hands, with directions for him to take charge of the entire movement?

Rebecqui did not let him go farther. "Robespierre, I see what you're at," said he.

Robespierre sprang from his chair, as if a reptile had reared its crest in his face.

Rebecqui also rose and said: "Come on, Barbaroux! We no more want a Dictator than a King!" and both departed in haste from the Incorruptible's attic.

Panis, who had come with them, followed them into the street, and said: "Ah, you have caught hold of the thing at the wrong end! You don't understand Robespierre's idea. He only wishes for temporary authority. If anybody follows out such an idea as yours, — why, certainly nobody better than Robespierre — "

Barbaroux interrupted Panis, and repeated the words already spoken by his comrade: "No more a Dictator than a King!"

Then he hurried away with Rebecqui.

CHAPTER VIII.

WHAT MADE THE QUEEN NOT CARE TO FLEE.

One thing reassured the people in the Tuileries. This was precisely what alarmed the Revolutionists. The Tuileries, having been put into a condition for defence, had become a fortress, with an effective garrison.

On that famous Fourth of August, when so many things happened, royalty did not remain inactive. During the night before August 5 some hired Swiss battalions had been brought from Courbevoie to the Tuileries. A few of these companies were separated from the rest, and sent to Gaillon, where the King perchance might seek a refuge.

Three sure men, three experienced commanders, were stationed near the Queen: Maillardot, with his Swiss; D'Hervilly, with his Saint Louis Chevaliers and his Constitutional Guards; and Mandat, a Commanding General of the National Guard, who promised the help of twenty thousand resolute and devoted soldiers.

August 8, in the evening, a man found his way into the interior of the palace. Everybody knew this man, so he entered the Queen's apartments without difficulty.

When Doctor Gilbert was announced, the Queen said, in a feverish voice: "Let him come in;" and as he entered she said: "Ah, come in, Doctor, come in! I am glad to see you."

Gilbert lifted his eyes towards her. In the whole appearance of Marie Antoinette there was a joyous and satisfied air, which made him shudder. He would have much preferred to see her pale and downcast, than in this feverish state.

"Madame," he said, "I fear that I come too late and at a bad time."

"On the contrary, Doctor!" she responded, with a smile, — an expression which her mouth had almost forgotten, — "you come most opportunely and are most welcome! You will shortly see something I have for a long time wished to show you, — a king, a genuine king!"

"I fear you are deceiving yourself, Madame, and that you will show me only a local commander, not a king."

"Monsieur Gilbert, perhaps we can no more agree in our views of the symbolical character of royalty, than about many other things. In my mind, a king is not merely a man who can say, I do not wish! but one who can say, I will."

The Queen alluded to the famous veto, which had led to the extremely humiliating situation wherein she now found herself.

"Yes, Madame," answered Gilbert; "and, above all in your Majesty's eyes, a king is a man who avenges himself."

"Who defends himself, Monsieur Gilbert! You know that we are publicly threatened. We are likely to be attacked with a strong arm. There are, so we are assured, five hundred men from Marseilles, led by one Barbaroux, who have sworn, on the ruins of the Bastille, that they will not return to Marseilles till they have bivouacked on the ruins of the Tuileries."

"I have heard something to that effect," replied Gilbert.

"And it does not make you smile, Monsieur?"

"It has alarmed me, both on your account and the King's!"

"So much so, that you come here to suggest that we abdicate, and put ourselves discreetly into the hands of Monsieur Barbaroux and his Marsillians?"

"Ah Madame, if the King could abdicate, and so secure, by the sacrifice of his crown, his own life, as well as yours and your children's — !"

"You would give him that counsel, would you not, Monsieur Gilbert?"

"Yes, Madame; and I would kneel at his feet to beseech him to follow it."

"Monsieur Gilbert, permit me to say that you are not very stable in your opinions."

"Madame, my opinion is always the same. Devoted to my King and my country, I have always wished to see the King in unison with the Constitution. Out of this desire have come the successive prevarications and the various counsels which I have had the honor of suggesting to your Majesty."

"And what advice do you give us at this moment, Monsieur Gilbert?"

"Never have you been in a better position to follow it than at this moment, Madame."

"Let us hear it!"

"I advise you to flee."

"To flee?"

"Ah, Madame! You know very well it is possible, and never were such facilities afforded you for its success."

"How so?"

"You have nearly three thousand men already in the palace."

"Nearer five thousand, Monsieur," said the Queen, with a smile of satisfaction; "and we can have twice as many at the first sign."

"There is no necessity for making a sign which might perhaps be intercepted. Your five thousand men are quite enough."

"Well, Monsieur Gilbert, in your opinion, what ought we to do with these five thousand men?"

"Place yourself in their midst, with the King and your august children. Leave the Tuileries when such a move is least expected. When you are two leagues away, mount your horses, and get into Gaillon and Normandy, where you are expected."

"That is, trust myself to Lafayette?"

"He, at least, Madame, has shown his devotion to you."

"No, Monsieur, no! With these five thousand men, and five thousand more who will run at our first bidding, I prefer to try something else."

"What will you attempt?"

"To crush this rebellion at once and forever!"

"Ah Madame, Madame! He was right when he told me you were doomed!"

"Who said that, Monsieur?"

"A man whose name I dare not repeat to you, Madame, — a man who has thrice spoken to you."

"Silence!" said the Queen, turning pale. "He shall be proved a liar, this false prophet!"

"Madame, Madame, I am much afraid you fatally hoodwink yourself!"

"Then you think they will dare attack us?"

"The public mind inclines that way."

"And the populace fancy they can enter here again, as on the Twentieth of June?"

"The palace is not a well-fortified place."

"No; but if you will come with me, I will show you that we may be able to hold out some time."

"It is my duty to follow you," said Gilbert, bowing.

"Come, then!" said the Queen; and preceding Gilbert to the middle window, she bade him look out upon the Carrousel Courtyard, where they could see, not indeed the immense square which now extends along the whole front of the palace, but three small courtyards, shut in by walls which were then standing, — the courtyard belonging to the Floral Pavilion, and called the Courtyard of the Princes; the Central Courtyard, named after the palace; and the one nowadays bounded by the Rue Rivoli, and called the Swiss Courtyard.

"See there!" she said.

Gilbert noticed that the walls were pierced with narrow loopholes, which would give the garrison an advantage, if it should be necessary to open fire upon the mob. If the first outpost were forced, the garrison could retire, not only into the palace, whose every door opened upon a courtyard, but also into the side buildings, so that the Patriots who ventured into either courtyard would find themselves between two fires.

"What do you say to that, Monsieur?" asked the Queen. "Would you still advise Monsieur Barbaroux and his five hundred Marsillians to persevere in their enterprise?"

"If my advice would be listened to by such fanatics as they are, I would commend to them a course similar to that which I commend to you. I have come to ask you not to wait for an attack. I would ask them not to make that attack."

"And probably they would pass your advice by on one side?"

"As you pass it by on your side, Madame. It is the misfortune of humanity, to constantly ask for advice which is never followed."

"Monsieur Gilbert," said the Queen, smiling, "you forget that the advice you give us is unsolicited!"

"True, Madame," said Gilbert, taking a backward step.

"But this," added the Queen, offering her hand to the Doctor, "only makes us the more grateful for it."

A slight smile of doubt hovered over Gilbert's lips.

At that instant some wagons, loaded with oaken timber, were driven into the Central Courtyard, where they were evidently expected by some men who, in spite of their plain clothing, were recognizable as soldiers. These men began to saw these planks into pieces six feet long and three inches thick.

"Do you know who those men are?" asked the Queen.

"Engineers, as it seems to me."

"Yes, Monsieur; and they are preparing to close up the windows, and leave only the loopholes open, so as to fire through them."

Gilbert looked sorrowfully at the Queen.

"What have you to say?" she asked.

"I pity you sincerely, Madame, for having forced your memory to retain these words and your tongue to speak them."

"Why so, Monsieur? There are circumstances when it is needful for women to make themselves men, and that is when the men —"

She checked herself; but presently she added, finishing her thought rather than her sentence: "But this time the King has decided."

"Madame, as you have decided upon these terrible extremes, which I see you regard as the door of your safety, I hope you have arranged for the defence of all the approaches to the palace, — for example, by the Louvre gallery, from the adjoining palace."

"Ah, you set me thinking. Come with me, Monsieur. I wish to assure myself that an order which I gave has been carried out."

She preceded Gilbert through her apartments, as far as the door leading into the Floral Pavilion, which connected with the picture-halls.

The door was open, and Gilbert could see workmen dividing the gallery into spaces of twenty feet long.

"You see!" said she. Then she added, addressing the officer in charge of the work: "Well, Monsieur d'Hervilly?"

"Well, Madame, if the rebels only leave us twenty-four hours longer, we shall be done."

"Do you believe they will give us twenty-four hours, Monsieur Gilbert?" she asked the Doctor.

"If anything is on foot, Madame, it will not be before the Tenth of August."

"The tenth? On a Friday? A bad day for an outbreak, Monsieur! I supposed the rebels would be intelligent enough to choose a Sunday."

She walked on, while Gilbert followed. As they were leaving the picture-hall they met a man in the uniform of a general officer.

"Well, Monsieur Mandat," said the Queen, "are your arrangements all made?"

"Yes, Madame," responded the officer, looking doubtfully at Gilbert.

"Oh, you can speak before this gentleman, Monsieur!" said the Queen. "He is our friend. Is n't it so, Doctor?" she added, turning to Gilbert.

"Yes, Madame," replied Gilbert, "and one of the most devoted!"

"In that case," said Mandat, "there is another matter. A detachment of National Guards stationed at the City Hall, and another at New Bridge, will let the insurrectionists pass by them. When Monsieur d'Hervilly, with his gentlemen, and Monsieur Maillardot, with his Swiss, encounter the rebels in front, their retreat being cut off, they will be utterly crushed."

"You see, Monsieur, — your Tenth of August will not be a Twentieth of June."

"Alas, Madame, so I fear!"

"For us? — for us?" persisted the Queen.

"Madame," replied Gilbert, "you know what I told your Majesty. As much as I deplored Varennes —"

"Yes, — so earnestly you now recommend Gaillon! Have you time to go with me down to the basement, Monsieur Gilbert?"

"Certainly, Madame!"

"Come, then!"

By a small winding staircase she led the way to the lower story. It was a veritable camp, fortified and defended by Swiss Guards. The windows were already blinded, as the Queen expressed it.

She went up to the colonel and asked: "Monsieur Maillardot, what do you say for your men?"

"That they are ready, like me, to die for your Majesty!"

"They will defend us to the last extremity, then?"

"When they once open fire, Madame, they will only cease at the King's written order."

"You hear, Monsieur Gilbert? Outside the circuit of the palace, all is hostility; but inside, all is fidelity."

"That is a consolation, Madame, but not a surety."

"Do you know that you are very discouraging, Doctor?"

"Her Majesty has conducted me whither she would. Will she now permit me to reconduct her to her own rooms?"

"Willingly; but as I am tired, give me your arm!"

Gilbert bowed at this mark of high favor, so seldom bestowed by the Queen, except upon a few of her intimate friends, — especially since her unhappy days began.

He reconducted her to her chamber. Marie Antoinette sank into an armchair.

Gilbert dropped on one knee before her and said: "Madame, in the name of your august spouse, in the name of your dear children, for your own personal safety, once more I plead with you to use the forces which you have about you for flight, and not for battle."

"Monsieur," said the Queen, "ever since July 14 I have hoped to see the King take his revenge. The hour has come, — at least, so we think. We shall either save our royalty, or bury it in the ruins of the Tuileries!"

"Can nothing make you forego this fatal resolution?"

"Nothing!" and as she spoke the Queen offered Gilbert her hand, partly as a sign for him to rise, and partly that he might kiss it.

Gilbert kissed her hand respectfully, and rose from his knee.

"Madame," said he, "will your Majesty permit me to pen a few lines, which seem to me so urgent that they must not be an instant delayed?"

"Do so, Monsieur," said the Queen, motioning him to a table.

Gilbert seated himself and wrote these three lines:

Come, Monsieur! The Queen is in mortal danger, unless a friend can persuade her to flee; and I believe you are the only friend who can have any influence over her.

After he had signed and directed the letter the Queen said: "Without being too inquisitive, I should be glad to know to whom you have written?"

"To Monsieur de Charny, Madame!"

"To Monsieur de Charny?" cried the Queen, pale and tremulous. "Why do you write to him?"

"That he may persuade your Majesty to do what I cannot persuade you to do."

"Monsieur de Charny is too happy to remember his unfortunate friends!"

The door opened and an usher entered, saying: "Count Charny, who has this instant arrived, asks permission to offer his respects to your Majesty."

The Queen was no longer pale, but livid. She stammered some unintelligible words.

"Let him come in! Let him come in!" said Gilbert. "Heaven sends him!"

Charny appeared at the door, in his naval uniform.

"Oh, come, Monsieur!" said Gilbert to him. "I was writing to you!" and he handed the Count his letter.

"I heard of her Majesty's danger, and here I am," said Charny, with a low bow.

"Madame, Madame," said Gilbert, "in Heaven's name listen to what Monsieur de Charny says. His voice will be as the voice of France!"

Bending respectfully to the Queen and the Count, Gilbert went away, bearing with him a last hope.

CHAPTER IX.

IN THE NIGHT BETWEEN AUGUST NINTH AND TENTH: AT DANTON'S.

Our readers must allow us to transport them into a house on the street called Ancienne Comédie, near the Rue Dauphine.

Fréron lived on the second story. We will pass by his door, where it would be useless to ring, because he is on the next floor, with his friend Camille Desmoulins. While we are going up the seventeen stairs which separate one story from the other, let us give a hasty account of Fréron.

Louis Stanislaus Fréron was the son of the famous Monsieur Élie Catherine Fréron, so unjustly and cruelly attacked by Voltaire. When one reperuses to-day the critical articles aimed by the journalist at the author of "La Pucelle," "The Philosophic Dictionary," and "Mohammed," one is surprised to see that the journalist said, in 1754, what we think in 1854, — a hundred years afterward.

Irritated by the persecutions which he had seen heaped upon his father, — who died with chagrin in 1776, after the suppression of his journal, "The Literary Year," by Miromesnil, the Keeper of the Seals, — the younger Fréron, who had reached the age of thirty-five at the period of our narrative, embraced with ardor the principles of the Revolution, and he had published, or was now about to publish, "The People's Orator."

On the evening of August 9, as we have already said, he was with Camille Desmoulins, and had supped there with Brune, the future Marshal of France, who meanwhile was foreman in a printing-office.

Barbaroux and Rebecqui were the two other guests. Only one woman shared the repast, which bore some resemblance to the refreshment enjoyed by the ancient martyrs before going into the arena, and which was called the Feast of Liberation.

This woman was Lucile, — a charming lady, with a sweet name, who left a mournful memory in our annals.

In our story we can hardly accompany thee to the scaffold which thou wilt ascend, poetic and loving creature, because it is the shortest pathway to reunion with thy husband; but in passing we can sketch thy picture with two strokes of the pen.

Only one portrait remains of thee, poor child! Thou didst die so young, that the painter was, so to speak, forced to grasp thy likeness in its flight. That is a miniature which we have seen in the admirable collection of Colonel Morin, who so affably placed his treasures at our disposal, — treasures which were allowed to be scattered, precious as they were, after the death of that excellent man.

In this portrait Lucile appears small, pretty, and decidedly roguish. There is something essentially plebeian in her charming face. Indeed, as the daughter of an old Treasury clerk, and of a very beautiful creature who was said to have been the mistress of Terray, the Secretary of the Treasury, Lucile, as her name proves, — Lucile Duplessis Laridon, — was born of the common people, like Madame Roland.

In 1791 a love-match wedded this young girl — rich in comparison with him — to that wild fellow, that waif of genius, Camille Desmoulins.

Poor, homely, slow of speech, because of the stammer which prevented him from becoming an orator, — and perhaps made him the great writer whom you know, — Camille won her at once, by the refinement of his mind and the goodness of his heart.

Although he was of Mirabeau's opinion, who said, "You can make nothing of the Revolution unless you dechristianize it," Camille was married in Saint Sulpice Church, according to the Catholic ceremonial; but in 1792, when a son was born, he carried the babe to the City Hall, and claimed for it a Republican baptism.

It was in their apartments, up two flights on the Rue Ancienne Comédie, that they unfolded, to the equally great alarm and pride of Lucile, the entire plan of insurrection, — a plan which Barbaroux frankly acknowledged he had accidentally sent in his nankeen breeches to his laundress, three days before.

As Barbaroux had no great confidence in the success of the blow he had himself prepared, and as he feared falling into the hands of the victorious Court, he displayed, with truly antique simplicity, a poison, — prepared, as was Condorcet's, by Cabanis.

At the beginning of supper, Camille, who had little more hope than Barbaroux, raised his glass, and repeated in Latin, that he might not be understood by Lucile, the sentiment from the Book of Ecclesiastes: Edamus et bibamus; cras enim moriemur (Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die); but Lucile understood him, and said: "Good! why speak a language I do not understand? I divine what thou sayest! Go on, Camille! It is not I, be assured, who will hinder thee from fulfilling thy mission."

On this assurance they spoke freely and aloud. Fréron was the most resolute of all. It was known that he loved some woman hopelessly, but nobody knew who the woman was. His despair over Lucile's death revealed his fatal secret.

"And thou, Fréron," asked Camille, "hast thou poison?"

"I? If we do not succeed to-morrow I shall get myself killed! I am so weary of life, that I only look for some pretext for ridding myself of it."

Rebecqui was more hopeful as to the result of the contest.

"I know my Marsillians!" he said. "I chose them myself. I am sure of them, from the first to the last. Not one will draw back!"

After supper it was proposed to visit Danton. Barbaroux and Rebecqui refused, saying that they were expected at the Marsillian barracks, near by, hardly twenty rods from the Desmoulins home.

Fréron had an appointment at the City Hall, with Sergent and Manuel. Brune passed the night with Santerre. Each of these persons was united with forthcoming events by his own peculiar thread.

When they separated, only Lucile and Camille went to Danton's residence. These two households were strongly bound together, — not only the men, but the women.

We all know Danton. More than once, following the old masters who have painted his grand features, we have been called upon to reproduce them.

His wife is less known. Let us say a few words about her.

In Colonel Morin's collection was to be found a souvenir of this remarkable woman also, who was the object of her husband's deep adoration; only it was not a miniature of her, like Lucile's, which Morin possessed, but a plaster cast. Michelet believes this cast was moulded after death. Its characteristics are goodness, calmness, and strength.

Although not yet sick with the malady which led to her death in 1793, she was already sad and restless; as if, feeling the approach of death, she had an inward perception of the future.

Tradition has it that she was pious and timid. Despite this piety and timidity she one day spoke her mind most vigorously, although it was opposed to the mind of her parents. That was when she declared her intention of marrying Danton.

As was the case with Lucile in her relations to Camille Desmoulins, so Madame Danton saw, behind the sombre and perturbed face of this obscure man, — without reputation or fortune, — the god of her idolatry, who, like Jupiter in his intercourse with Semele, was to destroy her in the act of revealing himself to her soul.

It was a tempestuous and terrible fortune to which the poor creature bound herself; but perhaps there was as much pity as love in the decision which united her to that angel of thunderous lightning, who was to have the honor of personifying the great year 1792, as Mirabeau had personified 1791, as Robespierre afterwards personified 1793.

The two houses were near together. Lucile and Camille, as we have said, lived on the Rue Ancienne Comédie. The Dantons lived on the Rue Paon Saint André. When Camille and Lucile arrived at Danton's, Madame Danton was in tears, and Danton, with a resolute air, was trying to console her. The woman went at once to the woman, and the man to the man. The women embraced. The men shook hands.

"Believest thou anything will happen?" asked Camille.

"I hope so!" answered Danton. "Santerre is lukewarm. Luckily, as I think, to-morrow's affair is not one of mere personal interest and individual leadership. The irritation produced by long suffering, the general indignation, the sentiments roused by the approach of foreigners, the conviction that France is betrayed, — those are the elements on which we must count. Out of forty-eight municipal sections, forty-seven have voted for the dismission of the King. Each section sends three delegates to unite into a Commune and save the country."

"Save the country? That is rather vague!" said Camille, shaking his head.

"Yes! but all the same it is perfectly understood."

"And Marat and Robespierre?"

"Naturally nobody sees either of them. One is hidden in his garret, the other in his cellar. When the business is all done, you will see them appear, one like a weasel, the other like an owl."

"And Pétion?"

"It would take a sharp man to say where he stands. On the fourth he declared war against the palace. On the eighth he gave notice to the department authorities that he would no longer be responsible for the King's safety. This morning he proposed to station National Guards in Carrousel Square. This evening he asked the department for twenty thousand francs, wherewith to send our Marsillians home again."

"He wants to lull the Court to sleep," said Camille.

"I fancy so," replied Danton.

Just then a new couple entered, — Monsieur and Madame Robert. It may be mentioned that the year before, on July 17, 1791, Madame Robert, or Mademoiselle de Kéralio, dictated, on the Patriot Altar, the famous petition which her husband at once wrote down.

Unlike the other two couples, where the husbands were superior to their wives, this woman was superior to her husband.

Robert was a stout man, thirty-five or forty years old, a member of the Cordelier Club, with more patriotism than talent. He had no facility as a writer, was a great enemy of Lafayette, and was very ambitious, — if we are to believe Madame Roland's account of him in her Memoirs.

Madame Robert was thirty-four. She was small, adroit, witty, and proud, and had been brought up by her father, Guinement de Kéralio, a Knight of Saint Louis and a member of the Academy of Inscriptions, who had counted among his pupils a young Corsican, whose gigantic career he was far from foreseeing.

Educated by her father, as we have said, Mademoiselle de Kéralio naturally became a literary and learned woman. At seventeen she wrote, translated, compiled. At eighteen she composed a novel, called "Adelaide."

As her father's income was barely sufficient for himself, he wrote for "The Mercury" and "The Scholars' Journal;" and more than once he put his name to articles which his daughter wrote, and which were far superior to his own. It was thus she attained that acute, quick, and ardent mind, which made her eventually one of the most indefatigable journalists of her day.

The Roberts had just come through the Saint Antoine Quarter. Things looked strange there, they said.

The night was beautiful. The light was soft and peaceful. There was hardly anybody in the streets; but all the windows were illuminated, and all these lights seemed to burn for the purpose of brightening the night.

The effect was peculiar. These were not the illuminations of a holiday. They were more like the pale lights which keep watch over the bed of death. One felt the life of the district breathing through this feverish slumber.

Just as Madame Robert finished her description, the sound of a bell made everybody start. It was the first stroke on the alarm-bell, which resounded from the Cordelier Club.

"Good!" said Danton. "I hear our Marsillians! I've no doubt that is their signal."

The women looked at each other with terror, especially Madame Danton, whose face bore testimony to her fear.

"The signal?" asked Madame Robert. "Is the palace to be attacked during the night?"

Nobody answered; but Desmoulins, who went into the next room at the first clang of the bell, came back with his musket in his hand.

Lucile uttered a cry. Then, feeling that in such a crucial hour she had no right to depress the man she loved, she threw herself into Madame Danton's sleeping alcove, fell upon her knees, leaned her head on the bed, and began to weep.

Camille came to her. "Be calm!" he said. "I won't leave Danton's side!"

Madame Danton seemed like a dying woman. Madame Robert, clinging to her husband's neck, wished to accompany him.

The men went out and the three women remained alone. Madame Danton was seated, in a fainting condition. Lucile was on her knees, weeping. Madame

Robert walked rapidly up and down the room, and said, without perceiving that every word was a blow to Madame Danton's heart: "This is all Danton's fault. If my husband is killed, I shall die with him; but before I die, I'll stab Danton!"

An hour passed away. They heard the stairway door open. Madame Robert hurried forward. Lucile lifted her head. Madame Danton remained motionless. was Danton who entered.

"Alone?" cried Madame Robert.

"Be calm, Madame!" said Danton. "Nothing will happen before to-morrow."

"But Camille?" asked Lucile.

"And Robert?" asked Madame Robert.

"They are both at the Cordelier Club, where they are preparing calls to arms. I have come to bring you this news. Nothing will happen to-night; and as a proof of it, I'm going to sleep."

Without undressing he threw himself on the bed, and in five minutes was as sound asleep as if there were not pending at that instant the question of life and death between royalty and the people.

At one o'clock in the morning Camille also came back.

"I bring you news about Robert," he said. "He has gone to the municipality to carry our proclamations. Don't be uneasy. They are for to-morrow only; and yet —"

Camille shook his head as if in doubt. Then he laid his head on Lucile's shoulder, and in his turn fell asleep.

He had been sleeping half an hour when somebody rang. Madame Robert hurried to open the door. It was Robert. He had come for Danton, in behalf of the municipal officers. He roused Danton.

"Go away!" said Danton. "Let me sleep. To-morrow 'll be time enough."

Robert and his wife accordingly went out and returned to their own home.

Presently the door-bell rang again. Madame Danton opened the door and admitted a big blond youth, twenty years old, dressed like a captain in the National Guards, and holding a gun in his hand.

"Monsieur Danton?" he asked.

"My dear!" said Madame, rousing her husband.

"Well, what is it now?"

"Monsieur Danton," said the big blond youth, "you are waited for down there."

"Where is down there?"

"The municipal quarters."

"Who waits for me?"

"The commissioners from the sections, and especially Monsieur Billot."

"That madman? Very well! Tell Billot that I 'm coming."

Then looking into the face of the unknown lad, who wore, despite his youth, the insignia of his superior rank, Danton said: "Pardon me, my captain, but who are you?"

"I 'm Ange Pitou, Monsieur, Captain of the Haramont National Guards."

"Ah ha!"

"One of the Bastille conquerors!"

"Good!"

"I had a letter yesterday from Monsieur Billot, telling me that probably there 'd be a coil down here, and that all good Patriots were needed."

"And then?"

"Well, then I came away, with such of my men as wished to follow me; but as they 're not such good walkers as I am, they stopped over at Dammartin. They 'll be here to-morrow, in good time."

"At Dammartin? Why, that 's eight leagues off!"

"Yes, Monsieur Danton."

"And Haramont is how many leagues from Paris?"

"About nineteen. We left there this morning at five."

"Ah ha! So you 've done your nineteen leagues to-day, have you?"

"Yes, Monsieur Danton!"

"And you arrived — ?"

"At six this evening. I asked for Monsieur Billot. They told me he was sure to be in the Saint Antoine District, at Santerre's. I went to Monsieur Santerre's; but there they told me they had n't seen him, and that probably I should find him at the Jacobin Club, on the Rue Saint Honoré. Well, the Jacobins sent me to the Cordelier Club, and there they told me he had gone to the City Hall."

"And you found him at the City Hall?"

"Yes, Monsieur Danton. Then he gave me your address, and said: 'Thou 'rt not tired, Pitou?' — 'No, Monsieur Billot.' — 'Well, go and tell Danton that he 's a lazybones, and we 're waiting for him!' — So here I am."

"Morbleu!" said Danton, jumping from the bed. "Here 's a boy who makes me ashamed! Let us go, my friend, let us go!"

He kissed his wife, and then went out with Pitou. His wife uttered a feeble sigh, and leaned her head on the back of her armchair. Lucile thought she was weeping, and respected her grief.

At the expiration of an hour, seeing that Madame

Danton did not stir, Lucile roused Camille. Then she went to Madame Danton. The poor woman was in a deep swoon.

The first rays of morning stole through the windows. The day promised to be a fine one; but as if this were a painful harbinger, the sky was red as blood.

CHAPTER X.

DURING THE NIGHT BETWEEN AUGUST NINTH AND TENTH : AT THE TUILERIES.

We have seen what was taking place in Republican domicils. Now let us see what was going on five hundred steps away, in kingly dwellings.

There also the women wept and prayed. They wept even more plentifully. Chateaubriand says, that princes' eyes are so formed as to contain an immense quantity of tears.

However, let us render justice to each one separately. Madame Elizabeth and Madame de Lamballe wept and prayed. The Queen prayed but did not weep.

They all supped at the usual hour. Nothing could derange the King's appetite.

As they left the table, Madame Elizabeth and Madame de Lamballe returned to the room known as the Council Chamber, — where it was arranged for the royal family to pass the night, so as to hear every report, — but the Queen took the King aside, and wished him to go into another apartment.

"Whither are you conducting me, Madame?" asked the King.

"To my chamber. Will you not put on the shirt of mail which you wore on the Fourteenth of July?"

"Madame, that was well enough to save me from an assassin's knife or bullet, in a time of conspiracy or on a ceremonial day; but in a day of warfare, when my friends are exposing themselves for me, it would be cowardly if I did not expose myself like my friends."

So saying, the King left the Queen and went into his private room, where he shut himself in with his confessor. The Queen rejoined Madame Elizabeth and Madame de Lamballe in the Council Chamber.

"What is his Majesty doing?" asked Madame de Lamballe.

"He is at confession!" responded the Queen, with an indescribable accent.

At this moment the door opened and Monsieur de Charny appeared. He was pale, but perfectly calm.

"May I speak with the King?" he asked, bowing to the Queen.

"Just now, Monsieur, the King is myself," she answered.

Charny knew that better than anybody else. Nevertheless he insisted.

"You can go up to the King's room, Monsieur," said the Queen, "but I assure you that you 'll disturb him tremendously."

"I understand. The King is with Monsieur Pétion, who has just arrived."

"The King is with his confessor, Monsieur."

"Then it is to you, Madame, I must make my report as Major General of the Palace."

"Yes, Monsieur, if you will be so kind."

"I have the honor to explain to your Majesty the condition of my forces. The mounted gendarmes, to the number of six hundred men, commanded by Monsieur Rulhières and Monsieur de Verdière, are arranged in line of battle on the Grand Square of the Louvre. The Paris Gendarmes on foot, intra muros (within the walls), are stationed in the stables. A squad of one hundred and fifty men has been detailed to form a guard at the Mansion Toulouse, in order to protect, if need be, the treasury, the registry of accounts, and the special coffers. The Paris Gendarmes on foot, extra muros (outside the walls), comprising only thirty men, are stationed at the small royal staircase, leading to Princes Courtyard. Two hundred officers and soldiers of the old footguards or horseguards, fifty young Royalists, as many gentlemen, — some three hundred and fifty or four hundred fighters, — are assembled in the room called the Ox's Eye and the adjacent hallways. Two or three hundred National Guardsmen are scattered about the courtyards and gardens. Finally, fifteen hundred Swiss, who constitute the real strength of the palace, are assigned to different posts, — stationed under the Grand Vestibule and at the bottom of the staircases, which they are charged to defend."

"Well, Monsieur, are not all these measures very encouraging?"

"Nothing satisfies me, Madame," replied Charny, "when your Majesty's welfare is at stake."

"Then your voice is still for flight, Monsieur?"

"My advice is for you to put yourself, the King, and your august children in the very midst of your soldiers."

The Queen started.

"Your Majesty dislikes Lafayette! Well then, you have confidence in the Duke de Liancourt. He is at Rouen, Madame. He has hired the mansion of an English gentleman named Canning. The General of the Province has made his troops swear their allegiance to the King. The Swiss battalions of Salis Samade, on which we may depend, are distributed along the road. As yet all is quiet. Let us leave the palace by way of the Swinging Bridge, and the city by way of the Star Barrier, at the end of the Champs Élysées. Three hundred horsemen, of the disbanded Constitutional Guard, await us there. At Versailles we can easily add fifteen hundred gentlemen to our ranks. With four thousand men I can answer for taking your Majesty wherever you may wish to go."

"Thanks, Monsieur de Charny," said the Queen. "I appreciate the devotion which has led you to quit your dearest friends, and offer your services to another — "

"The Queen is unjust," interrupted Charny. "The life of my sovereign will always be most precious of all in my eyes, as duty will always be the dearest of all the virtues."

"Duty, — yes, Monsieur," murmured the Queen ; "but as every one seems determined upon doing his duty, I think I also understand mine. My duty is to maintain the nobility and greatness of royalty, and to see to it that if royalty be struck down, it shall fall worthily, at its post of honor, — like the ancient gladiators, who studied how to die gracefully."

"This is your Majesty's last word ?"

"It is above all my last wish."

Charny saluted, and was about to withdraw. Meeting Madame Campan at the door, on her way to rejoin the princesses, he said to her : "Ask their Highnesses to put whatever precious things they have into their pockets. We may perhaps be compelled to quit the palace at any moment."

While Madame Campan went to transmit this suggestion to the Princess Lamballe and Madame Elizabeth, Charny again approached the Queen.

"Madame," said he, "it must be that you are in hopes some outside help may be added to our material resources. If this is so, let me know it. Remember that by this time to-morrow, I shall have to render my account to God or to men, for what is now taking place."

"Very well, Monsieur!" she replied. "Two hundred thousand francs have been sent to Pétion and fifty thousand to Danton. Through this sum of two hundred and fifty thousand francs a promise has been obtained from Danton that he will stay at home, and from Pétion that he will come to the palace."

"But, Madame, are you sure of the trustworthiness of your agents in this transaction?"

"Pétion arrived just now, — so you told me."

"Yes, Madame!"

"That is something, as you see."

"That is not enough. I am told that he had to be sent for three times before he came."

"If he is on our side," said the Queen, "he is, while talking with the King, to lay his index finger on his right eye."

"But if not on our side —?"

"If he does not side with us, he will be our prisoner, and I shall give most positive orders that he be not allowed to leave the palace."

At that instant they heard a bell toll.

"What is that?" asked the Queen.

"The tocsin," said Charny.

The princesses rose in alarm.

"What 's the matter?" said the Queen. "The tocsin is only the trumpet of the insurgents."

"Madame," said Charny, who appeared more disturbed than the Queen by this sinister sound, "I must find out if that bell heralds any serious movement."

"And we shall then see you again?" said the Queen, vivaciously.

"I have placed myself at the orders of her Majesty, and I shall not quit my post while there is the least shadow of danger."

Charny bowed and went out. The Queen remained awhile in thought, and then said to herself: "Let us see if the King has finished his confession!" and left the room in her turn.

Meanwhile Madame Elizabeth partly undressed herself, so that she could sleep more comfortably on a sofa. From her collar she removed a carnelian brooch, which she showed to Madame Campan. The stone was engraved. The carving represented a tuft of lilies, with a motto.

"Read it!" said Madame Elizabeth.

Madame Campan took it nearer the candles, and read :

Forget offences! Pardon injuries!

"I sadly fear that maxim has little influence over our enemies, but it is none the less dear to me!" said the Princess.

As she spoke, a shot resounded in the courtyard. The women screamed.

"There 's the first shot," said Madame Elizabeth. "Alas! It won't be the last!"

Pétion's arrival at the Tuileries had been announced to the Queen. Here are the circumstances under which the Mayor of Paris made his entry.

He arrived at half-past ten. This time nobody made him wait in the antechamber. On the contrary he was told that the King was expecting him. In order to reach the King, however, he had first to cross the ranks of the Swiss Hirelings, next of the National Guards, and finally of those gentlemen known as Knights of the Poniard.

Nevertheless, as they knew the King had sent for Pétion, and that he might, if he had so chosen, have remained in his own proper palace, the City Hall, — and not have put himself into that lion's den called the Tuileries, — he was allowed to pass on; although such epithets as Judas and traitor were hurled in his face as he ascended the staircase.

Louis Sixteenth was awaiting Pétion in the same room where he had treated the Mayor so rudely on June 21, nearly two months before. Pétion recognized the door, and smiled. Fortune had already arranged for him a terrible revenge.

At the entrance the Mayor was stopped by Mandat, Commander of the National Guards, who said: "Oh, it 's you, is it, Monsieur Mayor?"

"Yes, Monsieur, it is I!" said Pétion, in his habitually phlegmatic way.

"What are you doing here?"

"I must excuse myself from answering that question, not recognizing your right to question me; and as I 'm in a hurry, I can't stop to discuss matters with inferiors!"

"With inferiors? '

"You are hindering me. I tell you I 'm in a hurry, Monsieur Mandat. I have come here because the King has three times sent for me. Of my own accord I should not have come."

"Ah ha! Well, then, as I have the honor of seeing you, I wish to ask why these City Police Commissioners have distributed a profusion of cartridges to those Marseilles men, and why I, Mandat, have received only three for each of my men."

"First of all," said Pétion, without losing his self-control, "no requisition has been made for more cartridges for the Tuileries. Three cartridges for each National Guard and forty for every Swiss was the order. As many have been furnished as the King asked for."

"Why this discrepancy in the numbers?"

"It is for the King to tell, Monsieur. Probably he distrusted the National Guards."

"But I, Monsieur," said Mandat, "I asked you for powder."

"That is true; but unfortunately it was not the correct thing for you to receive it."

"That's a pretty answer!" cried Mandat. "It's for you to make it the correct thing, since the order must come from you!"

The discussion had now reached a point when it would have been difficult for Pétion to hold his own. Fortunately the door opened, and Rœderer, the Syndic of the Municipality, came to the Mayor's aid, with the message: "Monsieur Pétion, the King is waiting for you."

Pétion entered. The King was indeed waiting for Petion, and waiting impatiently.

"Ah, here you are, Monsieur Pétion," said his Majesty. "How is it with the city of Paris?"

Pétion gave him a nearly correct account of the condition of the city.

"Have you nothing more to say to me, Monsieur?" asked the King.

"No, Sire!" answered Pétion.

The King looked at him meaningly, and said: "Nothing, absolutely nothing?"

Pétion opened his eyes wide, not understanding the King's persistence.

On his side the King waited for Pétion to lay his finger on his eye. This, it will be remembered, was the sign by which the Mayor was to indicate that, in return for two hundred thousand francs, the King might count on his help.

Pétion scratched his ear, but did not put his finger nearer his eye.

The King had been deceived. Some trickster had pocketed the two hundred thousand francs.

The Queen entered, just as the King was puzzled what to ask Pétion next, although Pétion was expecting some new demand.

"Well," whispered the Queen, "is he our friend?"

"No," said the King. "At least, he has made no sign!"

"Then he is our prisoner!"

"May I retire?" asked Pétion of the King.

"For God's sake, don't let him go away!" said Marie Antoinette.

"No, Monsieur. Presently you will be at liberty, but I have more to say to you." Raising his voice, the King added: "Go into my cabinet!"

To the ears of those in his cabinet this meant: "I confide Pétion to your care. Watch him, and don't let him get away."

The men in the cabinet understood perfectly well. They surrounded Pétion, who felt himself a prisoner.

Fortunately Mandat was not there. He was busy contesting an order which had just been issued for him to go to the City Hall.

There was a crossfire. Mandat was wanted at the Hôtel de Ville, as Pétion was wanted at the Tuileries.

Mandat objected strongly to accepting this bidding, and would not decide to go at once.

As to Pétion, he was the thirtieth person in a little room where four would have been in each other's way.

"Gentlemen," he presently said, "it's impossible to stay here long without suffocating."

This was everybody's opinion. Nobody therefore opposed Pétion's exit; but everybody followed him, albeit they did not quite dare to openly restrain him.

He went down the first stairway they came to. These stairs led to a basement room, opening into the garden. He feared for an instant that the garden door might be locked, but it was unfastened.

Pétion now found himself in a larger and more airy prison; but it was a prison quite as secure as the cabinet. Nevertheless, it was far more comfortable.

One man who followed him gave Pétion his arm after they entered the garden. This was Rœderer, the Attorney General of the Department.

Both began to walk up and down the terrace which skirted the palace. The terrace was lighted by a line of lamps. The National Guards came and extinguished those which were nearest the Mayor and his companion. Why was this? Pétion suspected mischief.

"Monsieur," he said to a Swiss officer who was following him, whose name was Salis Lizers, "are they planning mischief against me?"

"Be easy, Monsieur Pétion!" replied this officer, with a strongly pronounced German accent. "The King has commissioned me to keep watch over you; and I promise you that if anybody kills you, he shall die the instant after, by my own hand."

Under similar circumstances Triboulet said to Francis the First: "If it's all the same to you, let it be the instant before, Sire!"

Pétion made no reply, but walked as far as the Feuillant Terrace, which lay in the full moonlight.

This terrace was not then, as at a later day, bounded by a grating, but enclosed by a wall eight feet high, with three gates, two small and one large.

These gates were not only closed and fastened, but barricaded. Moreover they were guarded by grenadiers from the sections of Butte des Moulins and Filles de Saint Thomas, well known for their royalism. From them there was nothing to be hoped. Now and then Pétion bent over and picked up a pebble. which he threw over the wall.

While Pétion was promenading and throwing stones, he was twice told that the King wished to speak with him.

"Well," asked Rœderer, "are n't you going?"

"No!" said Pétion, "it 's too hot up there. I remember that cabinet, and have no wish to return to it. Besides, I 've made an appointment to meet somebody here on the Feuillant Terrace!" and he continued to walk to and fro, and throw pebbles over the wall.

"An appointment with whom?" asked Rœderer.

At that moment the door of the Assembly Building opened, which led into the Feuillant Terrace.

"I fancy," said Pétion, "that 's just what I 'm waiting for."

"An order for the admission of Monsieur Pétion!" said a voice. "The Assembly summons him to its bar, to give an account of the condition of things in Paris!"

"Precisely so!" said Pétion to himself. Then he added aloud: "Here I am, ready to answer the questions of my enemies."

The National Guards, imagining that this would be to Pétion's disadvantage, let him pass.

It was now nearly three in the morning. Day was breaking; only, what was somewhat singular, the sky was the color of blood.

CHAPTER XI.

THE NIGHT BETWEEN THE NINTH AND TENTH OF AUGUST: BILLOT'S WILL.

WHEN sent for by the King, Pétion foresaw that leaving the palace might not be so easy as entering it. Stepping up to a rough-faced man, with an ugly seam across his forehead, he said: "Monsieur Billot, what news can you give me about the Assembly just now?"

"That there 'll be an all-night session."

"Very well! What did you say was to be seen at New Bridge?"

"Some cannon and National Guards, placed there by Monsieur Mandat's orders."

"And did you not also say that under Arcade Saint Jean, at the entrance of Rue Saint Antoine, a large body of soldiers was assembled?"

"Yes, Monsieur, also by Mandat's direction."

"Well, now listen to this, Monsieur Billot."

"I 'm listening!"

"Here 's an order to Manuel and Danton to send home the National Guards who are at Saint Jean's Arcade, and take away the defences from New Bridge. Cost what it may, this order must be executed, you understand."

"I will carry it to Monsieur Danton myself."

"Good! You live in the Rue Saint Honoré, I believe?"

"Yes, Monsieur."

"After delivering the order to Danton, return to your lodging and get a little rest. After two hours or so, get up, and take a walk along the outside of the wall by the Feuillant Terrace. If you see or hear some stones thrown over the wall from the Feuillant Terrace, it will be because I am kept there against my will, and threatened with violence."

"I understand."

"Then present yourself at the bar of the Assembly, and bid your colleagues send for me. You understand, Monsieur Billot, I trust my life in your hands."

"And I 'll be answerable for it! Go in peace!"

Pétion therefore came away, depending upon Billot's well-known patriotism. The latter had spoken with all the more confidence, because Pitou had just arrived.

He sent Pitou to Danton, bidding the lad not come back without the great leader. Despite Danton's sluggishness, Pitou reached his heart, and brought him to the City Hall.

Danton saw the artillery at New Bridge. He saw the National Guards at Saint Jean's Arcade. He saw how important it was that such large military detachments should not be allowed to remain where they could close in behind the armed populace. With Pétion's order in hand, Manuel and Danton dismissed the National Guards from Arcade Saint Jean, and sent the artillery away from New Bridge. This left the route of the insurrection clear.

Meantime Billot and Pitou returned to the Rue Saint Honoré, where Billot still lodged in his old quarters. Pitou nodded to the house as to a friend. Billot sat down, and made a sign to Pitou to do likewise.

"Thanks, Monsieur Billot," said the lad, "but I 'm not tired." However, Billot insisted, and Pitou sat down.

"Pitou," said the farmer, "I sent word for thee to come and join me."

"And as you see, Monsieur Billot, I have n't made you wait," said Pitou, with that broad smile, characteristic of Pitou, which showed all his thirty-two teeth.

"No indeed! Does thee guess that something serious is going to happen?"

"I thought as much; but tell me now, Monsieur Billot, —"

"What, Pitou?"

"I don't see either Monsieur Bailly or Monsieur Lafayette."

"Bailly is a traitor, who had us murdered on the Champ de Mars."

"Yes, I know; for, as you might say, I raked you up there, bathed in your own blood."

"Lafayette is a traitor, who wants to carry off the King."

"Ah, I did n't know that! Monsieur Lafayette a traitor! Who 'd have thought it? And the King?"

"The King is the biggest traitor of all."

"As to that," said Pitou, "that does n't surprise me!"

"The King plots with foreigners, and wants to deliver France to her enemies. The Tuileries is a hotbed of conspiracy, and so it has been decided to capture the Tuileries. Understand?"

"Parbleu! If I understand — say, Monsieur Billot — as we took the Bastille?"

"Yes!"

"Only it won't be so hard!"

"That 's a mistake!"

"How so? Will it really be harder?"

"Yes."

"It seems to me, however, the walls are n't so high."

"Yes, but they 're better guarded. You see, my dear boy, the Bastille was only defended by a garrison of fifty pensioners; whereas there are three or four thousand able men in the palace."

"The Devil! Three or four thousand men?"

"Without counting the fact that the Bastille was taken by surprise; whereas, ever since the first of this month, the people at the Tuileries have feared an attack, and have put everything in a defensible condition."

"So they mean to defend it?"

"Yes! and all the better because Monsieur de Charny is entrusted with the defence."

"In fact he left Boursonnes yesterday by post, with his wife. — But is Monsieur de Charny also a traitor?"

"No! He 's an aristocrat, that 's all. He has always been on the Court side, and consequently has not betrayed the people, nor has he ever coaxed the people to trust him."

"So we are to fight against Monsieur de Charny?"

"Probably!"

"Singular, is n't it? — Neighbors, too!"

"Yes! This is what they call civil war, Pitou; but thou art not obliged to fight, if it is n't agreeable."

"Excuse me, Monsieur Billot, but what is agreeable to you is also agreeable to me."

"I should like it better not to have thee fight, Pitou!"

"Then why on earth did you send for me, Monsieur Billot?"

The farmer's face clouded. "I sent for thee, to give thee this paper."

"This paper, Monsieur Billot?"

"Yes."

"What paper is it?"

"The copy of my will."

"How? A copy of your will? Hey, Monsieur Billot," continued Pitou, laughing, "you don't look like a man who expects to lie down and die."

"No," said Billot, pointing to his musket and his pouch hanging on the wall; "but I look like a man who may be killed."

"Ah yes, we 're all mortal!" said Pitou, sententiously.

"Well, Pitou, I sent for thee here, so as to give thee this copy of my will."

"To me, Monsieur Billot?"

"To thee, Pitou, inasmuch as I make thee my sole legatee —"

"Me, your heir?" said Pitou. "No, I thank you, Monsieur Billot! You say that just for the joke of the thing!"

"I tell thee it is so, my friend!"

"It can't be, Monsieur Billot."

"What? Can't be so?"

"No! When a man has legitimate heirs, he can't give his estate all away to outsiders."

"Thou art mistaken, Pitou. He can!"

"Well, he ought not to, Monsieur Billot."

A cloud passed over Billot's countenance. "I have no heirs!" he said.

"You have n't any heirs? What do you call Mademoiselle Catherine?"

"I know nobody of that name."

"Go away, Monsieur Billot, and don't talk to me in any such way. It provokes me."

"Pitou, when a thing belongs to me I can give it to whom I choose. In like manner, if I die, it belongs to thee, in thy turn; and thou canst give it to whom thou wilt."

"Ah ha! Good!" said Pitou, who began to understand. "Then if any misfortune happens to you —

Bah! What an ass I am! You won't meet with any misfortune!"

"Just now thou saidst truly, that we are all mortal."

"Yes! — Well, you 're right. I 'll take the will, Monsieur Billot; but is it sure, if I am so unfortunate as to become your heir, that I can do what I please with your property?"

"Undoubtedly the property would all belong to thee. They won't be so likely to try any trickery on thee, a good Patriot, — understand, — as they might on folks who have been hand and glove with aristocrats."

Pitou's apprehension grew clearer and clearer.

"Well, things being so, Monsieur Billot, why, I accept," said Pitou.

"Well then, as that 's all I have to tell thee, put that paper into thy pocket, and get rested."

"For what purpose?"

"Well, in all probability we have work for the morrow, — or rather for to-day, for it is already two in the morning."

"You are going out, Monsieur Billot?"

"Yes, I have some business along the Feuillant Terrace."

"And you don't need me?"

"On the contrary, thou wouldst be in my way!"

"In that case, Monsieur Billot, I 'll eat a bit."

"True! Why, I quite forgot to ask if thou wert hungry."

"Oh, that 's because you know I 'm always hungry," said Pitou, laughing.

"No need to show thee where to find the pantry —"

"No, no, Monsieur Billot. Don't bother yourself about me. You 'll come back, won't you?"

"I will come back!"

"If not, you must tell me where I may find you again."

"Useless! In an hour I shall be back."

"Very well, then! Good luck!"

Pitou went in search of nourishment, with an appetite which, like the King's own, was never lessened by events, however grave; while Billot took his way towards the Feuillant Terrace.

We know his errand there. Hardly had he reached the place before he was apprised, by a stone which fell at his feet, followed by a second and then a third, that what Pétion feared had come to pass, and that the Mayor was detained in the Tuileries.

Following the instructions he had received, the farmer at once reported the matter to the Assembly, which at once sent for Pétion, as we have already seen.

Being thus set at liberty, Pétion merely walked through the Assembly Hall, and returned on foot to the City Hall, leaving his carriage to represent him in the courtyard of the Tuileries.

Billot also returned to his lodgings, and found Pitou finishing his supper.

"Well, Monsieur Billot, what 's the news?" asked the lad.

"Nothing," said Billot, "unless it be that day is breaking, and the sky is as red as blood."

CHAPTER XII.

FROM THREE O'CLOCK TILL SIX IN THE MORNING.

We have seen how the day began. The sun's first rays fell upon two horsemen, who were riding along the deserted quay nearest the Tuileries. These two horsemen were General Mandat and his aide.

About one in the morning Mandat had been summoned to the City Hall. At first he refused to go. At two o'clock the order was imperatively renewed. Mandat still wished to resist, but Rœderer came to him and said: "Monsieur, note the fact that, according to the stipulations of the law, the Commander of the National Guard is under the orders of the city government."

Mandat made up his mind to go, but he was ignorant of two things. First, he did not know that forty-seven out of the forty-eight municipal sections had decided to unite, and that each had chosen three commissioners, whose business was to meet and concert measures for saving the country. Mandat expected to find the old city government, composed as it had been up to that time, and he had no idea that he was to encounter one hundred and forty-one new faces. Mandat was also ignorant of the order which had been issued by the city, to clear out the soldiers from Arcade Saint Jean and New Bridge, — an order which, in view of its importance, had been attended to by Manuel and Danton in person.

On arriving at New Bridge, Mandat was therefore stupefied to find it completely deserted. He paused, and sent his aide forward to reconnoitre. In ten minutes the aide returned. He had found neither artillery nor National Guards. Dauphine Square, Dauphine Street, and Augustin Quay were as deserted as New Bridge.

Mandat kept on his way. Perhaps it would have been better if he had returned to the palace, but men march whither Destiny pushes them.

As he drew nearer the Hôtel de Ville, he seemed to be drawing nearer to life and animation. Just as in certain organic conditions the blood retreats towards the heart and abandons the extremities, which remain cold and colorless, so the excitement, the heat, — in a word, the Revolution, — were along the Quay Pelletier, on the Place de Grève, and in the City Hall, the seat of popular life, the heart of the great body which we call Paris.

Mandat stopped at the corner of Quay Pelletier, and sent his aide to the camp under the Arcade Saint Jean. The popular tide was ebbing and flowing through the arcade, but the National Guards had disappeared.

Mandat wished to retrace his steps. The popular tide massed itself behind him, and forced him, like a waif, to the very steps of the City Hall.

"Remain here," he said to the aide, "and if any ill-luck happens to me, go and report it at the palace."

Mandat let himself be carried along by the waves which encircled him. The aide, whose uniform indicated his secondary importance, remained at the corner of the Quay Pelletier, where nobody molested him, the public attention being fixed on his commander.

On arriving at the great hall of the Hôtel de Ville, Mandat found himself in the presence of strange and stern faces. Here was the whole insurrection, ready to call to account the man who not only wished to curb its growth, but to strangle that insurrection in its very birth.

At the Tuileries — we recall his scene with Pétion — it was Mandat who played the inquisitor. Here Mandat was himself to be interrogated.

One of the members of the new Commune — that terrible Commune which stifled the Assembly, and later struggled with the Convention — advanced, and asked, in the name of all present: "By whose order have the guards at the palace been doubled?"

"By the order of the Mayor of Paris."

"Where is that order?"

"At the Tuileries, where I left it, that it might be put into execution in my absence."

"Why was the artillery ordered out?"

"Because I wished to have a battalion parade; and when a battalion parades, the artillery goes with it."

"Where is Pétion?"

"He was at the palace when I left it."

"A prisoner?"

"No! He was at liberty, and walking in the garden."

Just then the examination was interrupted. A member of the new Council produced an unsealed letter, and asked to have it read aloud. Mandat only needed to glance at that letter to know that he was lost. He recognized his own handwriting.

This letter was the order which he had sent, at one o'clock that morning, to the battalion posted at Saint Jean Arcade, commanding an attack upon the rear of any crowd moving against the palace, while the battalion from New Bridge was to attack the crowd on the flank. This order had fallen into the hands of the Commune, after the withdrawal of the soldiers.

The examination was now done. What more fatal avowal could be obtained from the accused than this letter?

The City Council decided that Mandat should be removed to the Abbaye Prison. This sentence was read to Mandat, and then its fulfilment began. In reading the decision to Mandat, the President, as we are informed, made a sort of horizontal gesture with his hand, — such a gesture as the populace knew but too well how to interpret.

Peltier, the author of "The Revolution of August 10, 1792," says that the President made a very expressive horizontal gesture, as much as to say: "Let him be disposed of!"

The gesture was indeed very expressive a year later; but this horizontal gesture, which meant so much in 1793, did not signify as much in 1792, when the epoch of the guillotine had not begun.

As it was not until August 21 that the head of the first Royalist was cut off in Carrousel Square, — that is, eleven days after the riot of August 10, — how could this horizontal sign, unless agreed upon in advance, have meant, "Kill this gentleman."

Unluckily, however, many facts seemed to justify the accusation.

Hardly had Mandat descended three of the steps in front of the City Hall, when, at the very moment when his younger son was hastening to meet him, a pistol-ball entered the prisoner's head. The same thing had happened three years before to Flesselles.

Mandat was only wounded. He rose, but in an instant fell again, beaten down by twenty pike-blows. The boy threw up his arms and shouted: "Father, father!" No attention was paid to his cries.

Suddenly, from out a circle wherein one could see only the gleam of sabres and pikes, an arm was uplifted, holding a bleeding head, detached from its trunk.

This was Mandat's head. His son fainted. The aide galloped off to the Tuileries, to report what he had seen. The assassins separated into companies. Some of the wretches threw the body into the river. Others promenaded the streets of Paris, with Mandat's head on a pike. It was now nearly four o'clock.

Before the bearer of the fatal news reaches the palace, let us see what was going on there.

After the King had attended to the duty of confession, he went to bed ; for not only was he unable to withstand the demands of nature, but when his conscience was at peace, he was easy in regard to other matters. However, he retired without undressing.

When the tocsin was again heard, and the drums began to beat a general alarm, the King was awakened.

Monsieur de la Chesnaye, to whom Mandat had delegated his authority when he left the palace, roused the King, so that he might show himself to the National Guards, and reanimate their enthusiasm by his presence and a few apt words.

The King arose, heavy-headed, oscillating, half asleep. His hair was powdered, but the powder was all rubbed away from the side of his head which had touched the pillow. They tried to find the royal barber, but he was not there ; so the King left his room with his hair in disorder.

The Queen was still in the Council Chamber. Being forewarned that the King was about to show himself to his defenders, she ran to meet him.

Quite the opposite of this poor monarch, — whose dull look seemed to rest on no one in particular, the muscles of whose mouth were distended with involuntary palpitations, and whose violet-colored coat gave him an air of being in mourning for royalty, — although the Queen was pale, she was burning up with fever, and her eyes were red and dry; yet she belonged to this monarchical phantom, who showed himself in full daylight, with large blinking eyes, and without the midnight halo of royalty.

She hoped to bestow upon him part of her superabounding courage, force, and life.

All went very well, however, as long as royalty was exhibited only in the privacy of its own apartments; although the National Guardsmen, who mingled with the noblemen, seeing the King so close at hand, — this poor, heavy, awkward man, who had figured at such disadvantage, under similar circumstances, on Monsieur Sausse's balcony at Varennes, — began to ask if this could be the hero of June 20, the King whose poetic story priests and women had already begun to embroider on funereal crape. They had to acknowledge to themselves that this was not the King whom the National Guardsmen expected to see.

Just at this moment the old Duke de Mailly, with one of those good intentions destined to furnish Hell with one more paving-stone, — just at this moment, we say, the old Duke de Mailly drew his sword, and threw himself at the King's feet, swearing, with a trembling voice, that he would die — he, and the French nobility whom he represented — for the descendant of Henry the Fourth.

Here were two blunders instead of one. First, the National Guards had no great sympathy for the nobility of France, whom Mailly represented. Second, it was not the descendant of Henry the Fourth whom they were to defend, but a Constitutional sovereign. In response, therefore, to a few cries of God save the King, cheers for the Nation resounded on all sides.

It was necessary to regain a lost opportunity. The King was urged to go down into the Royal Courtyard. Alas! That poor monarch — deprived of his food, having slept only one hour instead of seven, and possessing a wholly material nature — had no longer any will of his own. He was like an automaton, moved by the impulse of an outside volition.

Whence came this impetus? From the nervous nature of the Queen, who had neither slumbered nor eaten.

There are persons so poorly organized, that when once circumstances get beyond their control, they succeed badly in whatever they undertake. Instead of winning the disaffected, it seemed as if Louis Sixteenth approached them for the purpose of showing how little prestige the falling monarchy could leave in a man's countenance, when that man was lacking in native genius and force.

In the courtyards, as in the rooms upstairs, when the same few Royalists shouted "Long live the King!" there were tremendous hurrahs for the Nation.

The Royalists had the bad judgment to insist. "No, no, no!" shouted the Patriots, "no other King but the Nation!" and the King replied, almost like a suppliant: "Yes, my children, the Nation and your King are but one and the same."

"Bring the Dauphin," whispered Marie Antoinette to Madame Elizabeth. "Perhaps the sight of this child may affect them."

Some of the attendants ran after the Dauphin. Meanwhile the King continued his sorrowful inspection. He even conceived the wretched notion of going nearer the artillery, whose officers were mainly Republicans.

If the King had known how to speak, how to make men listen to him when their convictions were already estranged from him, this would have been a courageous undertaking, and might have succeeded, even at the cannon's mouth; but there was nothing persuasive in either the speech or manners of Louis Sixteenth. He stammered. The Royalists tried to cover his hesitation, by raising anew the cry of "Long live the King," which had twice proved abortive.

This effort nearly led to a collision. Several cannoneers left their posts and shook their fists at the King as they called out: "Think we'll fire upon our brothers, for the sake of defending a traitor like thee?"

The Queen drew the King backward. Several voices called out: "The Dauphin! Long life to the Dauphin!" Nobody took up the cry. The poor child did not arrive on time. He was late at call and missed his cue, as they say in the theatre.

The King returned to the palace, and it was a veritable retreat, almost a flight. When he reached his own rooms, Louis Sixteenth sank breathless into an armchair.

The Queen remained at the door, looking all around for somebody to lean upon. She perceived Charny, leaning against the casing of the door of her room, and went to him at once.

"Ah Monsieur, all is lost!"

"I fear so, Madame!"

"Can we still flee?"

"It is too late, Madame!"

"What is there left for us to do?"

"To die!" responded Charny, with a salutation; whereupon the Queen sighed and re-entered her chamber.

CHAPTER XIII.

FROM SIX TO NINE O'CLOCK IN THE MORNING.

HARDLY was Mandat murdered before the Commune appointed Santerre Commanding General in his stead. Santerre at once ordered the drums to beat a general tattoo throughout the city, and the church-bells to ring out a double alarm. Then he organized Patriot patrols, with orders to go as far as the Tuileries, and especially to keep an eye on the Assembly.

As a matter of fact the patrols had been hovering about the National Assembly all night. About ten o'clock in the evening the patrol arrested a knot of eleven persons in the Champs Élysées. Ten of these men were armed with daggers and pistols, and the eleventh with a blunderbuss. These eleven people allowed themselves to be taken without resistance, and were conducted to the Feuillant Guardhouse for safekeeping.

During the rest of the night eleven other prisoners were arrested, and brought to the same place. The twenty-two were confined in two separate rooms.

About daybreak the first eleven found a way of escape, by jumping from their window into a garden, and breaking through the gates. The other eleven were more securely confined.

At seven o'clock in the morning, a young man twenty-nine or thirty years old, wearing the hat and uniform of the National Guards, was brought into the Feuillant Courtyard. The freshness of his attire, the brightness of his arms, the elegance of his style, had roused the suspicion that he was a Royalist, and this led to his arrest. Moreover, he was very cool.

A man named Bonjour, an old clerk in the Naval Department, was that day superintending the Feuillant Section. He questioned the National Guardsman.

"Where were you arrested?"

"On the Feuillant Terrace," replied the prisoner.

"What were you doing there?"

"I was on my way to the palace."

"What for?"

"In obedience to an order from the City Council."

"What duty did that order assign you?"

"To examine the condition of things, and report to the Attorney General of the Department."

"Have you that order?"

"Here it is!" As he spoke, the young man drew a paper from his pocket.

The superintendent unfolded the paper and read:

The bearer of this order will go to the palace, in order to look into the condition of things, and report to the Attorney General of the Department.

BOIRIE,
LE ROULX,
Municipal officers.

The order was regular. However, as there was some fear lest the signatures might be forged, a man was sent to the City Hall to have them identified.

This last arrest brought a crowd of people into the courtyard; and several voices in the crowd — there are always such voices in popular gatherings — began to call for the death of the prisoners.

A city official, who was present, knew that it would not do to let these voices become too strong. He mounted a small platform, in order to harangue the crowd and get the people to go away. Just as they were about yielding to the influence of his sympathetic speech, the messenger who had been sent to the City Hall, to ascertain if the signatures of the city officers were genuine, returned to say that the order was all right, and that the man named Suleau, the bearer of it, should be set at liberty.

This was the same man whom we met one evening at Madame de Lamballe's reception, when Gilbert sketched a design of the guillotine, for Louis the Sixteenth, and Marie Antoinette recognized, in this novel instrument, the unknown machine which Cagliostro had caused her to see in a decanter at Taverney Château.

At the sound of this name a woman, unnoticed in the crowd, raised her head, and uttered a cry of rage.

"Suleau," she cried, "Suleau, editor-in-chief of 'The Acts of the Apostles,' — Suleau, one of the assassins of the independence of Liége? He belongs to me! I demand Suleau's death."

The crowd opened to make way for this woman. She was small and pinched, and wore an amazonian costume, in the colors of the National Guard. In her shoulder-belt she carried a sword. Advancing towards the municipal commissary, she forced him to step down, and then took his place. Hardly was her head seen above the crowd, when the crowd shouted her name with one voice, — Théroigne!

Théroigne was pre-eminently popular. Her share in the disturbances in October, 1789, her arrest at Brussels, her detention in Austrian prisons, her leadership on June 20, — all united to give her a popularity so great that Suleau, in his sarcastic journal, began, in 1789, to jest about Citizen Populus as her lover, — meaning, by this name, to personify the whole people. In this there was a double allusion, both to the political popularity of Théroigne and to the looseness of her morals; for in this latter respect her reputation was widespread.

Suleau had published a Brussels paper called "The Royal Tocsin," and thus aided in suppressing the Liége revolt, and replacing a noble people — who wished to be free, and unite with France — under the Austrian yoke and the Bishop's crook and mitre.

At this time Théroigne was preparing a narrative of her arrest, and had read a few chapters of it to the Jacobins.

She now demanded the death, not only of Suleau, but of the eleven other prisoners.

Suleau could hear her voice in the midst of the applause, demanding his death and that of his companions. Through the door he appealed to the officer in charge of the post, who had under him two hundred National Guardsmen.

"Let me out," said he. "I'll give my name. They can kill me, and that 's the end of it. My death will save eleven other lives."

Naturally the guards refused to open the door. Suleau tried to jump out of the window; but his companions grasped him from behind, and pulled him in again. They could not believe they were to be delivered to butchers in cold blood.

They deceived themselves. Superintendent Bonjour, intimidated by the yells of the mob, granted Théroigne's demand, and forbade the National Guards from offering any resistance to the will of the rabble.

The National Guards obeyed and withdrew, and in so doing left the door unguarded. The populace rushed into the prison, and seized the first man they chanced to find.

This first victim happened to be an abbé named Bouyon, a dramatic author, equally well known for his epigrams, over the signature of Cousin Jacques, and by the hisses with which three-fourths of his pieces were received at the Montansier Theatre. He was a colossal man. Snatched from the arms of the commissioner, who tried to save him, he was dragged into the courtyard, where he began a desperate contest with his murderers. Although he had only his arms to fight with, he was able to disable two or three scoundrels. A bayonet-thrust nailed him to the wall, and he died in such a situation that his last blows could not reach his enemies.

During this struggle two other prisoners managed to escape.

Next to Abbé Bouyon came a member of the old Royal Guard, named Solminiac. His defence was less vigorous than his predecessor's, and his death was the more cruel.

Then they murdered a third, whose name is unknown. Suleau came fourth.

"Hold on!" said a woman to Théroigne. "Here 's thy Suleau!"

Théroigne did not know him by sight. As he was commonly nicknamed Abbé Suleau, she believed him to be a priest. Like a wildcat she sprang upon him, however, and clutched him by the throat.

Suleau was young, brave, and vigorous. With a blow of his fist he sent Théroigne reeling ten feet away, violently shook off three or four men who were thirsting for his blood, snatched a sabre from the hands of the cut-throats, and with two blows felled two of these butchers to the ground.

A terrible fight ensued. Always gaining ground, always nearing the door, Suleau three times freed himself. He reached the door at last, but he was obliged to turn, in order to open it, and was thus exposed to his assassins for a defenceless instant. That instant afforded enough time for twenty sabres to stab him. He fell at Théroigne's feet, who had the cruel joy of giving him a last wound.

While Suleau was struggling with his murderers, a third prisoner managed to escape.

The fifth man, who was dragged out of the guardhouse by the miscreants, roused a cry of admiration in the crowd. He had belonged to the old bodyguard. His name was Vigier, and he had been known as Handsome Vigier. Being as brave as he was handsome, and as adroit as he was brave, Vigier fought fifteen minutes. Thrice he fell and thrice he recovered himself. Every pavement in that courtyard was tinged, not only with his own blood, but with that of his murderers. At last, like Suleau, he was overcome by numbers.

The death of the others was simple slaughter. Their names are unknown. The nine corpses were dragged to the Square Vendôme, where they were beheaded. Their heads were stuck on pikes, and paraded throughout Paris.

Poor Suleau had been two months married to a charming woman, Adèle Hal, the daughter of a celebrated painter.

That evening one of Suleau's servants obtained his master's head by paying its price in gold, and subsequently succeeded, after long search, in recovering his body. Suleau's devoted wife had been for a month in the expectation of maternity, and it was she who demanded his precious remains, in order to bestow upon them the last sad rites.

Before the general struggle really began, therefore, blood had flowed in two places, — on the steps of the City Hall and at the Feuillant Guardhouse. Presently we shall see it flowing at the Tuileries. After the drops, the rivulet; after the rivulet, the river!

Just as these murders were committed, — that is, between eight and nine in the morning, — ten or eleven thousand National Guards, called together by Barbaroux's alarm-bell, and by Santerre's general drumbeat, came through the Rue Saint Antoine, entered the Arcade Saint Jean, — so well guarded the night preceding, — and entered the Place de Grève.

Those men came to ask for an order to march on the Tuileries. They had to wait an hour.

Two rumors as to the cause of this delay were circulated among the crowd. One was to the effect that the newly organized Commune hoped for concessions from the palace. The other rumor was that the Saint Marceau District was not quite ready, and it was desirable not to march without the Saint Marceau quota.

The thousand men who were armed only with pikes became very impatient. As usual, the worse armed men were the most zealous. They broke through the ranks of the National Guards, declaring they would go ahead, and sack the palace all alone.

Several confederated Marsillians and ten or a dozen French Guardsmen — the same guardsmen who, two or three years before, had helped to capture the Bastille — put themselves at the head of this rabble, and were hailed as its chiefs by common consent. This was the vanguard of the insurrection.

Meanwhile his aide, who had seen Mandat's assassination, rode at full speed to the Tuileries; but it was not till the King and Queen had returned to their respective apartments, after his Majesty's ill-starred visit to the royal courtyards, that the aide was able to see them and report his gloomy news.

The Queen felt as one always feels, at the announcement of the death of a man who has left one's side an instant before; she could not believe it. She made the aide describe the scene once and again, with all its harrowing details.

Meanwhile the noise of a brawl made itself heard on the main floor, and came in through the windows.

The gendarmes, the National Guards, and the patriotic cannoneers — those who had raised the shout for the Nation when the King was present — at last began to provoke the Royalists, by calling them Royal Grenadiers, and declaring that there were, among the grenadiers from the sections of Saint Thomas and Buttes des Moulins, men who had been sold to the Court.

As they were still ignorant, in the courtyards and basement, of the death of their commanding-general, though this was already known on the main floor, a grenadier shouted: "That low-lived Mandat has sent nobody to the palace but aristocrats."

Mandat's older son was in the ranks of the National Guards. We already know the whereabouts of Mandat's younger son, who tried in vain to defend his father on the steps of the City Hall.

At this insult to his absent father, the elder brother rushed from the ranks with his sabre drawn. Two or three cannoneers threw themselves in front of him.

Weber, the Queen's chamberlain, was there, among the Saint Roch Grenadiers. He flew to the youth's assistance.

The sabres clashed. A quarrel was imminent between the two parties. The Queen was attracted to the window by the noise, and saw Weber. She called Thierry, the King's valet, and ordered him to go after her foster-brother.

Weber came up, and told the Queen all about the fracas. In return, she announced to him Mandat's death.

The noise under the window increased. "See what is going on now!" said the Queen.

"What is happening, Madame?" said Weber. "The cannoneers are abandoning their guns. They have rammed home a ball in each, and as the cannon are not loaded with powder, they are now useless."

"What thinkest thou of the situation, my good Weber?"

"I think," replied the worthy Austrian, "that your Majesty had better consult Monsieur Rœderer, who appears to me one of the most devoted men in the palace."

"Yes, but where can I speak to him without being overheard, watched, interrupted?"

"In my room, if the Queen wishes," said Thierry.

"So be it!" said the Queen. Turning to her foster-brother she added: "Find Monsieur Rœderer, and bring him to Thierry's room."

As Weber went out by one door, the Queen followed Thierry by the other. Nine o'clock rung from the palace clock.

CHAPTER XIV.

FROM NINE O'CLOCK TILL ELEVEN IN THE FORENOON.

WHEN one touches such an important point in history as we have now reached, not a single detail should be omitted; for these details are linked one to another, and their accurate adjustment constitutes the length and breadth of the picture on the canvas, which the hands of the Past unroll for the eyes of the Future.

At the very moment when Weber announced to the Queen the entrance of the Syndic of the Commune, the Swiss Captain Durler was on his way up to the King's rooms, to ask either the King or the Major General for the last orders.

Charny saw the worthy captain looking for an usher or chamberlain to introduce him, and asked: "What do you wish for?"

"Are n't you the Major General?" said Durler.

"Yes."

"I have come for final orders, Monsieur, as the head of the insurrectionary column is just visible from the Carrousel Courtyard."

"You have been ordered to stand your ground, Monsieur, for the King is determined to die in our midst."

"All right, Monsieur Major," simply responded Durler; and he returned to his companions with this order, which was their death-warrant.

As Captain Durler had said, the insurrectionary vanguard was coming into sight. It consisted of a thousand men armed with pikes, with a score of Marsillians and a dozen or fifteen French guards at their head. In the ranks of the latter glittered the gilt epaulets of a young captain. This young captain, by Billot's recommendation, had been charged with a mission, which will be duly explained.

An eighth of a league (not far from a quarter of a mile) behind this vanguard came a large body of National Guards and Federals, preceded by a battery of a dozen pieces of artillery.

When Charny's order was communicated to them, the Swiss Guards ranged themselves quietly and resolutely, each one at his post, maintaining the gloomy and deliberate silence of determination.

The National Guards, less severely disciplined, took their places in a more noisy and disorderly way, but with equal resolution.

The gentry were badly organized, having only such short-range weapons as swords and pistols. Knowing that the forthcoming struggle would be to the death, they awaited with a sort of feverish intoxication the moment of actual conflict with the populace, — their old adversary, the immortal athlete, the fighter constantly overcome, yet rising again with increasing power, through eight centuries.

While the besieged, or those who were on the eve of a siege, were getting into position, there was a rap at the gate of the Royal Courtyard, and several voices cried out: "A parley!" Above the wall fluttered a white handkerchief, fastened to a spear or a pike.

Rœderer was sent for. He was already on the way.

"They are knocking at the Royal Gate, Monsieur."

"I hear it, and I 'm coming."

"What is to be done?"

"Open the gate."

The order was transmitted to the porter, who unfastened the gate, and then let his legs save his head.

Rœderer found himself face to face with a vanguard of pikemen, and said: "My friends, you have asked to have the gate opened for a parley, and not for an army. Who is your spokesman?"

"Here he is, Monsieur," said Pitou, with his mild voice and benevolent smile.

"Who are you?"

"I am Captain Ange Pitou, chief officer of the Haramont Federals."

Rœderer was not aware that there were any such soldiers as the Haramont Federals; but as time was precious, he judged it unnecessary to ask any questions; so he said: "What do you want?"

"I demand a free passage for myself and my friends."

Pitou's ragged friends, brandishing their pikes and making wry faces, appeared like dangerous enemies.

"A passage? Wherefore?"

"To block up the Assembly. We have a dozen cannon; but not one will be fired, if we get what we want."

"And what do you want?"

"That the King should be deposed."

"Monsieur, this is a serious matter," said Rœderer.

"Very serious, Monsieur," rejoined Pitou, with his customary courtesy.

"It demands deliberation!"

"That 's fair!" replied Pitou. Then he added, looking at the big palace clock: "It lacks fifteen minutes of ten. If at ten o'clock we receive no reply, we shall begin our attack."

"Meanwhile you will allow us to close the gate, will you not?"

"Of course!" replied Pitou, who then said to his comrades: "My friends, let them close the gate!" and he motioned to the foremost of the pikemen to retreat.

They obeyed, and the gate was closed without any difficulty; but during the short time it stood open, the besiegers had a chance to observe the formidable preparations made for their reception.

When the gate was fastened, Pitou's men were very anxious to continue the parley. Several were hoisted upon the shoulders of their comrades, and climbed upon the wall, which they straddled, while they began conversation with the National Guards inside, who met them halfway, and were more than ready for a friendly, peaceable, and familiar chat.

The quarter-hour rolled away. Then a man came from the palace, and gave orders to open the gate. This time the porter kept out of sight in his lodge, and so the National Guards lifted the bars.

The besiegers supposed their request had been granted. As soon as the gate was open they crowded in, like men who had been kept a long time waiting, and were pushed forward by a power in their rear, — that is, by the rabble. They called loudly for the Swiss Hirelings, swung their hats on the ends of their pikes and sabres, and shouted: "Hurrah for the Nation! Hurrah for the National Guards! Hurrah for the Swiss!"

The National Guards responded with cheers for the Nation. The Swiss maintained a deep and gloomy silence. At the mouths of the cannon the assailants paused to look ahead and around.

The great vestibule was full of Swiss, arranged three ranks deep, according to height. As there was also a row of Swiss on each step of the portico, this made six ranks, able to open fire at the same time.

Some of the insurgents began to reflect, and Pitou was among this number; only it was rather late for reflection.

Now there came to pass what always happens to the brave populace under similar circumstances; for such people are like children, good-natured one moment, and cruel the next.

Seeing the danger, they did not think of running away, but they tried to go about, and jest with the National Guards and the Swiss.

The National Guardsmen were not disinclined to joke; but the Swiss were more serious.

Why? Five minutes before the appearance of the insurgent vanguard, this is what had happened.

After what was recounted in the previous chapter, and as a result of the quarrel to which Mandat's son gave rise, the Patriot National Guards had been separated from the Royalist National Guards, and dismissed.

In separating from their fellow-citizens, the Patriots also said farewell to the Swiss, whose courage was both admired and pitied. They added that if any of the Swiss would follow them, they should be received into their houses like brothers. Two Vaudois, in answer to this appeal, made in their own tongue, at once threw themselves into the arms of the Frenchmen, their natural companions.

At this instant two gunshots came from the palace loopholes, and two balls struck the deserters in the very arms of their new friends. The Swiss officers, who were excellent shots and hunters of the chamois and the ibex on their native hills, had taken the quickest way to nip desertion in the very bud. One can easily understand how such an event made the Swiss soldiers grave and mute.

As for the men who had now been admitted into the courtyard, armed with old pistols, old muskets, and new pikes, — that is, so badly armed that they might as well have had no weapons whatever, — they were the same strange precursors of the Revolution whom we are sure to see at the beginning of all great outbreaks. They ran, laughing, to see the abyss open which was to engulf a throne, — yes, more than a throne, a monarchy.

The cannoneers were on their side. The National Guards seemed about ready to join them. They tried to persuade the Swiss to do likewise. They did not notice how time slipped away. Their chief, Pitou, had given Rœderer till ten o'clock to decide, and it was now quarter-past ten. The rabble were amusing themselves. Why should they count the minutes?

One of them had no pike, no gun, not even a sabre, but he had a pruning-hook, such a crook as is used to pull down the branches of trees which are to be cut away.

To his neighbor this man said: "Suppose I try to hook a Swiss!" and straightway the fellow caught a Swiss soldier by his crossbelt, and pulled the man towards himself. The Swiss only resisted enough to make it look as if he were resisting.

"There 's a bite!" said the fisherman.

"Pull gently!" said his neighbor.

The hookman did pull gently, and the Swiss passed from the vestibule into the courtyard, as a fish is drawn from the river and landed on the grass.

There were great cheers and loud bursts of laughter.

"Another! Another" they shouted on all sides.

The fisherman noted another Swiss, whom he could hook like the first. After the second came a third, and then a fourth and a fifth. The whole regiment would have been landed, if they had not heard the order: Take aim!

Seeing the muskets levelled, with the usual clank and mechanical precision which accompanies the movements of regular troops, one of the insurgents — for there is always, under such circumstances, some crazy-head who gives the signal for massacre — fired a pistol at one of the palace windows.

In the brief interval between the command to aim and the word fire! Pitou saw what would happen. "Lay low!" he cried to his followers, "or you 're all dead men!" and suiting example to precept, he prostrated himself; but before his advice could be followed, the order to fire resounded in the vestibule, which was forthwith filled with flame and smoke, and a hailstorm of bullets came crashing as from a giant's blunderbuss.

This compact human mass, — for at least half the column had crowded into the courtyard, — this compact mass swayed like a field of wheat bent by the wind. Then, like a harvest cut down by the sickle, the rabble staggered and collapsed.

Hardly one third of them remained alive. This third fled, passing under the fire of two lines of soldiers and the barrack-sheds. There came shots both from the sheds and the soldiers in line. The shooters would have killed each other, but for the thick screen of men between them.

This curtain was torn open in large rents, however. Four hundred men remained on the pavement, whereof three hundred had been killed outright. The other hundred, wounded more or less mortally, moaned, tried to raise themselves, and fell back again, giving to some parts of the corpse-strewn courtyard a motion like that of the retreating waves, — a movement horrible to look upon.

Little by little all became quiet. Apart from a few delirious fellows, who obstinately insisted upon living, the sea became calm.

The fugitives scattered themselves through Carrousel Square, some rushing out upon the riverside, and others into Rue Saint Honoré, all shouting for help against their murderers.

At New Bridge these fugitives met the main body of the insurgents. This army was commanded by two men on horseback; but they were followed by a man on foot, who nevertheless had the air of being in command.

"Ah!" cried the fugitives, recognizing in one of the horsemen the brewer from the Saint Antoine District, remarkable for his colossal stature, — his enormous Flemish horse serving him as a pedestal, — "ah, Monsieur Santerre, — help, help! They are slaughtering our brothers!"

"Who are?" asked Santerre.

"The Swiss! They fired on us, while we were cheek by jowl with them."

Santerre turned to the other horseman and asked: "What do you think of that, Monsieur?"

The second rider was a small, light-complexioned man, whose hair was cut short like a brush, and who spoke with a strong German accent. "Faith!" he said, "I believe there is a military proverb which bids a soldier betake himself wherever he hears the voice of a fusillade or a cannon. Let us find the noise."

The man on foot said to one of the fugitives: "You had with you a young officer. I do not see him!"

"He fell among the first, Citizen Deputy! which is a pity, for he was a brave young man!"

"Yes, he was a brave youth!" responded the inquirer, paling visibly. "Yes, he was a brave youth, and he shall be bravely avenged! — Go ahead, Monsieur Santerre!"

"In such a grave affair I think we ought to summon experience to our aid, as well as courage, my dear Billot."

"So be it!"

"Consequently, I propose to assign the general command to Citizen Westermann, who is a thorough officer and a friend of Citizen Danton; and I propose to obey like a private soldier."

"As you please, provided you march without losing an instant."

"Will you accept the command, Citizen Westermann?" asked Santerre.

"I accept!" replied the Prussian, laconically.

"Then give your orders!"

"Forward!" cried Westermann; and the huge column, which had paused for an instant, put itself again in motion.

As the vanguard entered Carrousel Square, through the wickets from the Rue Échelle and the quays, eleven sounded from the Tuileries clock.

CHAPTER XV.

FROM ELEVEN O'CLOCK TILL NOON.

RE-ENTERING the palace, Rœderer met a chamberlain, who was searching for him on the Queen's account. In his turn he was looking for the Queen, knowing that she was the real strength of the palace in that hour.

He was glad to learn that she was waiting for him in a retired corner, where he could talk with her alone, and without fear of interruption. He therefore followed Weber upstairs.

The Queen was seated near the chimneypiece, her back towards the window. At the noise made by the opening door she turned quickly around, and said: "Well, Monsieur?" in an inquiring tone, yet without asking any positive question.

"The Queen has done me the honor to send for me?" asked Rœderer.

"Yes, Monsieur! You are one of the chief magistrates of the city. Your presence in the palace is a buckler for royalty. I wish therefore to ask you what you hope and what you fear."

"Little to hope, Madame! All to fear!"

"The populace are absolutely marching against the palace?"

"The vanguard is in Carrousel Square, talking with the Swiss Guards."

"Talking, Monsieur? I gave orders for the Swiss to repel force with force. Are they disposed to disobey?"

"No, Madame, the Swiss will die at their post."

"And we at ours, Monsieur. As the Swiss are soldiers in the King's service, so sovereigns are soldiers in the service of the monarchy."

Rœderer was silent.

"Am I so unfortunate as to have an opinion not in accordance with yours?" asked the Queen.

"Madame, I have no opinion whatever, unless your Majesty favors me by asking for it."

"Monsieur, I do ask for it."

"Well, Madame, I will speak to you with the frankness of a man whose mind is made up. My opinion is that the King is lost, if he remains in the Tuileries."

"But if we do not remain in the Tuileries, where shall we go?" said the Queen, rising in trepidation.

"At the present juncture of affairs, there is only one asylum for the royal family."

"And that, Monsieur —?"

"Is the National Assembly."

"Where do you say, Monsieur?" asked the Queen, snapping her eyes rapidly, and speaking as if sure she had not heard him correctly.

"The National Assembly!"

"And you believe, Monsieur, that I will ask anything of those fellows?"

Again Rœderer held his tongue.

"Taking one set of enemies with another, I like those who attack us openly, in the face of day, better than those who wish to stab us from behind, and in the dark."

"Well, Madame, make your decision, — either to give in to the populace, or beat a retreat towards the Assembly!"

"Beat a retreat? Are we then so poor in our defenders that we must retreat without firing a shot?"

"Before coming to a determination, Madame, will you listen to the report of a competent man, and learn what forces are at your disposal?"

"Weber, go after one of the palace officers, either Monsieur Maillardoz, Monsieur de la Chesnaye, or —" She was about to name Monsieur de Charny, but she paused, and Weber left the room.

"If your Majesty will go to the window, she can judge for herself!" said Rœderer.

With evident repugnance she took a few steps towards the window, drew aside the curtains, and looked out. Carrousel Square, and even the Royal Courtyard, were full of pikemen.

"My God!" she exclaimed, "what are those men doing there?"

"As I told your Majesty, they are talking."

"But they have come into the very precincts of the palace!"

"I have hoped to gain time, so as to give your Majesty an opportunity to decide what course should be taken."

At that instant the door opened. "Come, come!" said the Queen, without knowing to whom she was speaking.

Charny entered. "Here I am, Madame," said he.

"Ah, it's you! Then I have nothing to ask, for only a little while ago you told me what alone remains for us to do."

"And according to Monsieur," asked Rœderer, "there remains —?"

"Only to die!" said the Queen.

"You see that what I propose is preferable, Madame?"

"Upon my soul, I know not what is best!" said the Queen.

"What does Monsieur propose?" asked Charny.

"To conduct the King to the Assembly," said Rœderer.

"That is not death," said Charny, "but it is dishonor!"

"You hear, Monsieur," said she to Rœderer.

"Let us see if there is no middle course," replied Rœderer.

Weber came forward and said: "I am of small importance, and I know it is bold for me to speak a word in such a company; but perhaps my devotion inspires me. What if the Assembly should be asked to send a deputation to watch over the King's safety?"

"So be it! I consent to that!" said the Queen. "Monsieur de Charny, if you approve the proposition, go and submit it to the King, I beg of you!"

Charny bowed and went away.

"Follow the Count, and bring me the King's answer," she said to her foster-brother, who thereupon obeyed.

The presence of Charny, so grave, devoted, cold, was such a cruel reproach to the woman, if not to the Queen, that she could not see him without a shudder. Perhaps, also, she had an awful presentiment of what was soon to happen.

Weber returned to say: "The King accepts, Madame, and Messieurs Champion and Dejoly are going at once to the Assembly to carry his Majesty's request."

"Look there!" said the Queen, suddenly.

"What, Madame?" asked Rœderer.

"What are they doing there?"

The besiegers were just then busy catching the Swiss Guards.

Rœderer looked; but before he had time to get any idea as to what was going on, a pistol-shot smote the air, followed by a formidable discharge. The palace trembled, as if shaken to its foundations. The Queen uttered a scream, recoiled a step, and then returned to the window, constrained by curiosity.

"See! See!" she cried, with flashing eyes. "They 're fleeing! They 're routed! What do you say now, Monsieur Rœderer? Have we no other resource but the Assembly?"

"Will your Majesty do me the favor to follow me?" replied Rœderer.

"See! See!" continued she. "The Swiss are making a sortie, and pursuing them. The Square is empty! Victory! Victory!"

"In mercy for yourself, Madame, follow me," pleaded Rœderer.

The Queen recovered herself, and followed him.

"Where is the King?" he asked of the first lackey whom they met.

"In the Louvre Gallery," was the response.

"That is precisely whither I wish to conduct your Majesty," said Rœderer.

The Queen followed, without having any idea of her guide's intentions.

The extensive gallery of the Louvre was barricaded through half its length, and divided into three sections. Two or three hundred men were there to defend it, and they could retreat into the Tuileries, by means of a sort of swinging staircase, which a kick of the last fugitive would send tumbling down into the basement floor of the building.

The King was at a window with Chesnaye, Maillardoz, and five or six other gentlemen. In his hand he held a spyglass. The Queen ran to the balcony, but she had no need of a spyglass to see what was going on.

The insurrectionary army was approaching. It was long and wide, covering the whole quay, as far as the eye could see. By way of New Bridge the posse from the Saint Marceau District was effecting a junction with the men from Saint Antoine. All the bells of Paris were frantically jangling the alarm. The big bell of Notre Dame Cathedral was overpowering all the other resonant bell-metal.

A hot sun poured out its myriad scintillations upon the gun-barrels and spear-heads. Like a distant storm, could be heard the heavy roll of artillery.

"Well, Madame?" said Rœderer.

Beside the King were collected some fifty persons. The Queen took a long look at the friends surrounding herself. This look seemed to come from her deepest heart, and to ask how much devotion really remained in her service. The poor woman stood mute, not knowing whom to address, not knowing what petition to make. She took her boy, and showed him to the officers of the Swiss and National Guards, and to the gentry who were present. It was no longer the Queen who demanded a throne for her inheritance. It was the distressed mother, in the midst of a conflagration, asking: "My child! Who will save my child?"

During this time the King was conversing softly with the Municipal Syndic, or rather Rœderer was repeating to him what he had already said to the Queen.

Two distinct groups were formed around the two august personages. The group about the King was composed of collected and grave counsellors, who apparently approved the advice given by Rœderer. The largest group, around the Queen, was made up of zealous and enthusiastic young officers, waving their hats, drawing their swords, extending their hands towards the Dauphin, kissing the hem of the Queen's gown, and swearing to die for herself and her son. In their enthusiasm the Queen found a breath of hope.

At this moment the King's retinue mingled with the Queen's. With his usual air of immobility, the King stood in the centre of both groups united. Perhaps this quietness arose from courage.

The Queen seized two pistols from the belt of Maillardoz, the commander of the Swiss Guards.

"Come, Sire!" she said. "Now is the time to either come forth bravely, or perish in the midst of your friends."

The Queen's action raised the enthusiasm of her friends to the brim. With open mouth and suspended breath everybody awaited the King's response.

A young, handsome, and brave king, with flashing eye and quivering lip, might have thrown himself, with a pistol in each hand, into the midst of the combat, endeavoring to recall fortune to his side! They waited. They hoped.

The King took the pistols from the Queen's hands, and returned them to Maillardoz. Then he said, turning to Rœderer: "You say then, Monsieur, that I ought to betake myself to the Assembly?"

"Sire, that is my advice," said Rœderer, bowing.

"Let us go, gentlemen," said the King, "for there is nothing to be done here."

The Queen uttered a sigh, took the Dauphin in her arms, and addressed herself to Madame de Lamballe and Madame de Tourzel: "Come, ladies, since the King so wills!"

This was like saying to all the others: "We abandon you!"

Madame Campan awaited the Queen in the corridor through which she had to pass. The Queen saw her, and whispered: "Wait in my room. I will rejoin you there, or I will send for you from elsewhere, — God knows where!" Then leaning towards Campan she murmured: "Oh for a plunge into the sea!"

The gentlemen whom she had left behind looked at each other, as if to say: "Is it for this King that we have come to our deaths?"

Chesnaye understood this mute question, and answered it: "No, gentlemen, it is for royalty! Man is mortal, but principle is imperishable."

As to the unhappy women, — and there were many of them, though several who were absent from the palace made ineffectual efforts to re-enter it, — as to the women, they were completely terrified. One might have believed them so many marble statues, standing at the angles of the staircases and along the corridors.

At last the King condescended to think of those whom he abandoned. At the bottom of the staircase he paused and asked: "What will become of all those whom we are leaving up yonder?"

"Sire," responded Rœderer, "nothing is easier than for them to follow us. They are dressed like citizens, and can find their way out through the garden."

"True," said the King, "so let us go on!"

"Ah, Monsieur de Charny," said the Queen, perceiving the Count, who was waiting for them at the garden gate, with his sword drawn, "why did we not listen to you day before yesterday, when you counselled flight?"

The Count made her no reply; but he approached the King and said: "Sire, the King had best take my hat and give me his, for his own hat may lead to his detection."

"You are right," said the King, "on account of its white plume. — Thanks, Monsieur!" So he took Charny's hat in exchange for his own.

"Monsieur," said the Queen, "will the King run any danger during this short walk?"

"You see, Madame, if any danger does lie in the pathway, that I am doing all I can to turn it aside from him whom it menaces."

"Sire," said the Swiss captain, charged with protecting the King on his way through the garden, "is your Majesty ready?"

"Yes," replied the King, pulling Charny's hat over his face.

"Then let us set out!" said the captain.

The King walked between two ranks of Swiss soldiers, who kept step with his Majesty.

Suddenly cries were heard at the right. The gate which opened into the palace yard, near the Café de Flore, was forced open. A mass of people, having learned that the King was on his way to the Assembly, rushed into the garden. A man who seemed to be the leader of the incursion bore aloft his banner, which was a head on the point of a pike. The Swiss captain called a halt, and prepared to shoot.

"Monsieur de Charny," said the Queen, "if you see me liable to fall into the hands of these wretches, you will kill me, will you not?"

"I cannot promise you that, Madame."

"And why not?" exclaimed the Queen.

"Because, before a single hand touches you, I shall be dead!"

"Hold!" said the King, "that is poor Mandat's head! I recognize it!"

The murderous band dared not come too near, but they heaped insults upon the King and Queen. Five or six muskets were fired. One Swiss fell wounded, and another dead. The captain ordered his men to aim, and they obeyed.

"Don't fire, Monsieur!" said Charny, "or not one of us will reach the Assembly alive."

"True, Monsieur," said the captain. "Shoulder arms!"

The soldiers again obeyed, and the party continued its way diagonally across the garden.

The heat of the year had yellowed the chestnut-trees. Although it was not yet the middle of August, the leaves were already dry and were strewing the ground. The little Dauphin amused himself by rolling the leaves under his feet, and kicking them over his sister's shoes.

"The leaves fall early this year," said the King.

"Did not some rabid fellow say that our monarchy would only last till the leaves should fall?" asked the Queen.

"Yes, Madame," replied Charny.

"And what is the name of this skilful prophet?"

"Manuel."

A new obstacle now presented itself to the progress of the royal family. Above them, on the terrace which it was necessary to ascend and cross, — in order to go from the palace garden to the Riding School, where the Assembly still held its sessions, — a large knot of men and women were waiting, and brandishing their arms threateningly.

This peril was all the greater, because the Swiss could no longer keep their ranks. Nevertheless the captain tried to force a way through the crowd; but this enraged the rabble so that Rœderer called to him: "Take care, Monsieur! You 'll get the King killed!"

There was a halt, and a messenger was sent to notify the Assembly that the King demanded an asylum. The Assembly at once sent out a deputation; but the mere sight of this deputation redoubled the fury of the rioters, whose angry shouts could be heard: "Down with old Veto! Down with that Austrian hussy! Abdication or death!"

The children, observing that their mother was specially menaced, pressed nearer to her. The little Dauphin asked: "Monsieur de Charny, why do all these people wish to kill my mamma?"

One man of gigantic stature, armed with a pike, yelled louder than the rest: "Down with old Veto! Death to the Austrian Woman!" and tried to so thrust his weapon among them as to wound either the Queen or King.

The Swiss escort had vanished one by one. The royal family were surrounded only by the half-dozen gentlemen who had come out of the Tuileries with them, together with Monsieur de Charny, and the deputation from the Assembly. There were yet thirty paces to cover, in the midst of a compact mass. It was evident that the rabble did not mean to leave many days to the King, and especially to the Queen. At the foot of the steps the struggle began.

"Monsieur," said Rœderer to Charny, "put up your sword, or I can't answer for the results!" Charny obeyed without a word.

The royal party was lifted up by the multitude, as a ship is lifted by the waves in a storm, and so they were carried to the side of the Assembly building. The King was obliged to repulse a man who fairly shook his fist in the royal face. The little Dauphin, almost stifled, screamed, and put out his hands for help.

A man sprang forward, grabbed the child, and wrenched him from his mother's arms. "Monsieur de Charny! My child!" she cried. "In Heaven's name, save my boy!"

Charny took a few steps towards the man who bore the Dauphin; but this left the Queen so exposed, that two or three arms were extended towards her, and one hand grasped the lace which covered her breast.

The Queen screamed. Charny forgot Rœderer's advice, and his sword disappeared in the body of the man who had dared to lay his hand upon the Queen. The crowd howled with rage, at seeing one of their own men fall, and rushed headlong upon the royal group.

The women yelled: "Kill her, the Austrian minx! Give her to us, till we eat her up! Death! Death!"

Twenty naked arms were ready to seize her; but the Queen, crazy with grief, did not think of her own personal danger, and continually cried: "My son, oh, my son!"

As the little party almost touched the threshold of the Assembly, the rabble made a final effort, feeling that the prey was about to elude their grasp.

Charny was so beset that he could only use the pommel of his sword. Among the clinched and threatening fists he could see one hand holding a pistol, pointed at the Queen. He dropped his sword, grasped the upraised pistol with both hands, tore it from the hands of the man holding it, and discharged it full in the breast of the nearest assailant. The wounded man was stunned, and fell to the ground.

Charny then stooped to pick up his sword. The sword was already in the hands of a vagabond, who was trying to stab the Queen with it. Charny threw himself upon the assassin. During that brief interval the Queen was drawn after the King, into the vestibule of the Assembly building. She was saved.

To be sure the door was closed behind her, and Charny fell on the doorstep, felled by a blow on his head from an iron bar, and stabbed in his breast with a pike.

" Like my dear brothers ! " he murmured, as he fell. " Poor Andrée ! "

Like his brothers, George and Isidore, Oliver de Charny had fulfilled his destiny. The Queen's fate was yet to come.

At that moment a frightful discharge of artillery announced that the insurgents were formally attacking the palace.

CHAPTER XVI.

FROM NOON TILL THREE O'CLOCK.

For an instant, like the Queen herself when she saw the flight of the advanced guard, the Swiss perhaps believed they had encountered and scattered the main army of the insurgents. They had killed some four hundred men in the Royal Courtyard, and a hundred and fifty or two hundred more in Carrousel Square. They had captured seven pieces of artillery.

As far as the eye could reach, not a man was to be seen who tried to defend himself. One small isolated battery, however, placed on the terrace of a house which faced the Swiss Guardhouse, kept up a firing which they had not been able to silence. Therefore, as they now believed themselves masters over the insurrection, the Swiss were taking measures to put an end to that battery, cost what it might; when suddenly they heard, from the riverside, the roll of drums and the jarring motion of heavy artillery.

This was the coming army, which the King had seen through his spyglass, while in the Louvre Gallery.

At the same time the rumor began to spread that the King had quitted the palace, and had asked an asylum at the Assembly. It is difficult to describe the effect of this news, even upon the most devoted Royalists. The King, who had pledged himself to die at his royal post, now deserted that post, and went over to the enemy, or gave himself up as a prisoner, without striking a blow.

The National Guards felt themselves relieved from their oaths, and nearly all went away. Several gentlemen followed them, judging it useless to stay and be killed for a cause which acknowledged itself to be virtually lost.

Only the Swiss remained, silent and gloomy, the slaves of discipline. From the highest part of the terrace next the Floral Pavilion, and through the windows of the Louvre Gallery, they could see approaching the men from those heroic faubourgs which no army had ever successfully resisted, and which in a single day had overturned the Bastille, — that fortress whose feet had been rooted in the soil for four centuries.

The assailants had their plan. They believed the King to be still in the palace. They wished to surround the palace on all sides, in order to capture the King.

The column which came along by the left bank of the river, therefore, received orders to force the grating on the waterside. Those who came by the Rue Saint Honoré were to break in the Feuillant Gate. The column on the right riverbank, commanded by Westermann, was under orders from Santerre and Billot to attack the front of the palace.

Suddenly the latter column came through the wickets into Carrousel Square, singing the Ça ira. The Marsillians were at the head of this column, dragging in their midst two small, four-pound cannon, loaded with grapeshot.

Nearly two hundred Swiss were on this square, in battle array. The insurgents marched straight upon them. The moment the Swiss levelled their muskets to open fire, the insurgents unmasked their two cannon and fired first.

The Swiss discharged their muskets, but immediately retired into the palace, leaving thirty dead and wounded men on the pavement of the square.

Then the insurgents, having at their head the Marseilles and Breton Federals, rushed upon the Tuileries, spreading themselves through the two courtyards, the Royal Courtyard, also called the Central, — where lay so many dead bodies, — and the Princes Courtyard, next to the Floral Pavilion and the quays.

Billot wished to fight where Pitou had been slain. He was also in hopes that the poor boy was only wounded, and that he, Farmer Billot, might repay, in the Royal Courtyard, the service Pitou had rendered him in the Champ de Mars.

Billot was therefore among the first to enter the Central Courtyard. The odor of blood was such that it seemed as if one were in a slaughter-house. From this heap of corpses exhaled a gas which was as visible as smoke.

This odor and this scene exasperated the assailants, and they rushed upon the palace. Besides, retreat would have been impossible, even if they had thought of it. Masses of men were continually pouring through the wickets into Carrousel Square, — which were then much narrower than at the present time, — and pushed the vanguard on to the fight. Although the front of the palace blazed as with fireworks, not one assailant had an idea of going back.

Once inside the Central Courtyard, the insurgents found themselves caught between two fires, — like those in whose blood they were marching up to their ankles, — from the vestibule of the Clock Tower on one side, and from a double row of barrack-sheds on the other.

It was necessary to silence these barracks, first of all. The Marsillians threw themselves upon these huts, like dogs upon a roast; but they could not demolish them with their hands, and so they called for crowbars, shovels, and pickaxes.

Billot called for mammoth cartridges. Westermann understood his lieutenant's plan. Big cartridges were brought, with tinder, sulphur, and matches.

At the risk of seeing the powder explode in their hands, the Marsillians set fire to the fuses, and threw the burning cartridges into the sheds. The barracks at once caught fire, and their defenders were obliged to evacuate them, and seek a refuge under the vestibule. Then iron smote iron, and fire met fire.

Suddenly Billot felt himself pulled backwards. He turned, supposing he was to encounter an enemy; but when he saw who had pulled him, he uttered an exclamation of joy. It was Pitou, — hardly recognizable, and covered with blood from head to foot, — but Pitou, safe and sound, without a single wound.

At the moment when he saw the Swiss muskets levelled at himself and his comrades, he shouted to his companions to throw themselves upon the ground, and set them the example; but this example they had no time to follow. The fusillade, like a huge scythe, cut away three-fourths of these human grass-blades, which take twenty-five years to grow, but may be mown down in a second of time.

Pitou was literally entombed under a mound of corpses, and bathed in the warm liquid trickling from their sides.

In spite of his exceedingly disagreeable situation, — weighed down by dead bodies, and soaked in their blood, — Pitou resolved not to breathe a word, but to wait and give a sign to somebody at the first favorable moment. For this opportune moment he had to wait a whole hour; and truly each minute of that hour seemed like an hour itself.

At last he judged the propitious moment had come, for he heard the victorious shouts of his companions, and Billot's voice calling his name in the midst of them.

Then, like Enceladus buried under Mount Etna, he shook off the bed of corpses which covered him, and managed to regain his feet. Recognizing Billot in the first rank, he was anxious to press the farmer to his heart, without caring which side he got hold of.

A discharge from the Swiss, which laid low a dozen men, recalled Pitou and Billot to the gravity of their situation. Nine hundred feet of buildings were on fire, at the right and left of the Central Courtyard.

The weather was oppressive, and there was not a flaw of wind stirring. The smoke of the conflagration and the fusillade weighed upon the combatants like a leaden coverlid. The smoke filled the vestibule of the palace. The whole façade, every window whereof emitted flame, was hidden by a veil of smoke. It was impossible to see which were the slayers or the slain.

Pitou, Billot, the Marsillians, the leaders of the column, went on ahead, and made their way into the vestibule, in the midst of the smoke.

There they found a wall of bayonets, — those of the Swiss soldiers. Then the Swiss began their retreat, — that heroic retreat, in which, step by step, stair by stair, leaving a file of their own men at every move, the battalion fell slowly backward. That night forty-eight corpses were to be counted on the staircase alone.

Suddenly, through the corridors and chambers of the palace, resounded the cry: "The King orders the Swiss to stop firing!" It was then two in the afternoon.

Here is what had happened in the Assembly, and led to the order proclaimed in the Tuileries to suspend the contest, — an order which had the double advantage of lessening the exasperation of the victors and saving the honor of the vanquished.

When the door opening into the Feuillant Terrace closed behind the Queen, and through the aperture she saw the crowbars, bayonets, and pikes which threatened Charny's life, she screamed, and extended her arms towards the door; but drawn away by those who accompanied her, — at the very moment when motherly instinct bade her follow her child before all else, — she involuntarily moved along into the Assembly, following the King.

There a great joy awaited her. She saw her boy, seated on the President's desk. The man who had carried him triumphantly away was waving his red cap over the young Prince's head, and shouting joyfully: "I 've saved the son of my master and mistress! Long life to Monseigneur the Dauphin!"

Her son being in safety, a sudden twinge of the heart reminded her of Charny.

"Gentlemen," said she, "one of my bravest officers, one of my most devoted friends, remains outside your door, in danger of death. I ask succor for him."

At the sound of her voice five or six Deputies hurried away; while the royal family, and the adherents who accompanied them, found accommodations in the seats set apart for the cabinet-ministers.

The Assembly received them standing, not because of the etiquette due to crowned heads, but out of the respect due to misfortune.

Before seating himself, the King made a sign that he wished to speak. There was silence while he said: "I have come here to ward off a great crime. I believe I am nowhere safer than in your midst."

"Sire," replied Vergniaud, who was presiding, "you can count on the firmness of the National Assembly. Its members have sworn to die in defence of the rights of the people and of lawfully constituted authority."

The King seated himself. At that moment a frightful volley was heard almost at the gates of the Riding School.

The National Guards, mingling with the insurgents who were on the Feuillant Terrace, were firing upon the Swiss captain, and others who had served as an escort for the royal family.

An officer of the National Guard, having doubtless lost his head, entered the Assembly in affright, and did not pause till he reached the bar, where he shouted: "The Swiss, the Swiss! We are driven back!"

For an instant the Assembly believed that the Swiss Guards, having repulsed the Revolutionists, were marching upon the Riding School, to reclaim their King; for at that epoch Louis Sixteenth, it must be said, was rather the King of the Swiss than of the French.

The members rose spontaneously in a body, and with one accord. Representatives, spectators in the galleries, National Guards, secretaries, all raised their hands and shouted: "Come what will, we swear to die, or live as freemen." The King and his family took no part in this adjuration, but remained seated; but this cry, uttered by three thousand tongues, passed over their heads like a hurricane.

The error about the Swiss was of brief duration, but the enthusiasm was sublime.

Fifteen minutes later another cry was heard: "The palace is invaded. The insurgents are marching upon the Assembly to slaughter the King!"

Then the same men who had sworn, in their hatred of royalty, to die free, raised their hands with the same spontaneous vim, and swore to defend the King unto the death.

At that very moment, in the name of the Assembly, the Swiss Captain Durler was being ordered to lay down his arms.

"I serve the King, and not the Assembly," he said. "Where is the King's order?"

The messengers from the Assembly had not brought a written order.

"I hold my command from the King," added Durler. "I will submit only to the King's orders."

They took him by force into the Assembly. He was black with powder and red with blood.

"Sire," he said, "they want me to lay down my arms. Is it the King's order?"

"Yes," responded Louis. "Give up your arms to the National Guards. I do not wish one of you brave fellows should perish."

Durler bent his head, uttered a sigh, and went out; but at the door he declared he would not obey unless the order was written.

Then the King took a sheet of paper and wrote:

The King orders the Swiss Guards to lay down their arms, and withdraw to their quarters.

Then it was that this order was heard throughout the rooms, corridors, and stairways of the Tuileries.

As this order restored some tranquillity to the Assembly, the President jingled his bell. "Let us resume business!" he said.

A Deputy arose and said, that according to the Constitution, the Assembly was forbidden to transact any business in the King's presence.

"True," said Louis Sixteenth, "but where will you put us?"

"Sire," said the President, "we can offer you the empty box reserved for 'The Logographe,' that journal having ceased to appear."

"Very well," said the King, "we are ready to go there."

"Ushers," cried Vergniaud, "conduct the King to the box set apart for 'The Logographe.'"

The ushers hastened to obey. The royal family left the hall by the same door which had given them ingress, and found themselves again in the corridor.

"What is this on the floor?" asked the Queen. "It looks like blood."

The ushers did not answer. If those stains were really blood, very likely the ushers did not know how they came there. As the fugitives came nearer the appointed place, the stains, singularly enough, grew larger and more frequent. To spare the Queen the sight of them, the King quickened his pace, and himself opened the door into the box, as he said:

"Enter, Madame!"

The Queen stepped forward, but as she set foot on the threshold she uttered a cry of horror, covered her eyes, and drew backward.

The presence of these blood-stains was explained. A corpse had been laid out in the box. It was this body the Queen, in her haste, had almost stumbled over, and which made her scream and retreat.

"Hold!" said the King, in the same tone in which he had said, "It's the head of poor Mandat!" — "Hold, this is the body of our poor Count Charny."

It was indeed the Count's body, which a few Deputies had rescued from the hands of his butchers, and had obtained permission to place in this box, not foreseeing that ten minutes later the royal family would be likewise installed there.

The corpse was removed, and the royal family went into the cabinet. There was an attempt to wash it, or clean it, for the floor was covered with blood; but the Queen made a sign of objection, and was the first to sit down in her place. Nobody noticed that she broke the strings of her shoes, and placed her trembling feet in contact with the still tepid blood.

"Oh Charny, Charny!" she murmured, "why is not my blood spilled to the last drop, that it might mingle eternally with thine?"

Three o'clock sounded.

CHAPTER XVII.

FROM THREE O'CLOCK TILL SIX IN THE AFTERNOON.

We left the palace at the moment when the vestibule was nearly captured, when the Swiss Guards were being pushed back, step by step, to the very door of the royal apartments, and a voice resounded through the corridors: "An order for the Swiss to lay down their arms!"

This volume is probably the last we shall write on this awful epoch. In proportion as our narrative advances, we leave the historic ground we are now covering, never to return to it again. This makes it the more needful to place this important day, August 10, 1792, before our readers in all its details, and to do so without prejudice, animosity, or partisanship.

Our readers entered Royal Courtyard in the wake of the Marsillians. We followed Billot into the midst of flame and smoke, and saw him mount every step of the stairway, at whose angle we left him, accompanied by Pitou, who arose, like a bloody spectre, from out a heap of the slain.

The palace was taken. What lugubrious genius presided at this victory? "The popular Wrath," somebody replies.

Yes, undoubtedly; but who directed that wrath? A man whom we have scarcely named, that Prussian officer, mounted on his small black horse, beside the giant Santerre, on his colossal Flemish animal, — the Alsatian Westermann.

Who was this man, making himself visible only in the midst of the tempest, like the lightning? One of those men whom Deity retains in the arsenal of his anger, and only draws forth from obscurity when he has need of him, in the hour when a divine and retributive blow is to be struck.

This was Westermann, the Man of the Setting Sun, as he was called; and indeed he only appeared when royalty was sinking, never to rise again.

Who discovered him? Who divined his existence? Who was the messenger between him and Deity?

Who would have supposed that to this brewer Santerre, a giant carved out of a block of material flesh, would be given a soul for this struggle, wherein the Titans of earth were to overthrow the gods of royalty? Who complemented Geryon with Prometheus? Who filled out Santerre with Westermann? Danton!

Where did the potent Revolutionist find this conqueror? In a cell, in a cesspool, in a dungeon, — at Saint Lazare.

Westermann was accused — accused, please understand, not convicted — of having forged banknotes, and was arrested by way of precaution.

For the work of the Tenth of August, Danton needed just such a man, — one who would not draw back, because, in retreating, he would but mount the pillory.

This mysterious prisoner attracted Danton's attention. When the day and hour came wherein he needed this prisoner, Danton's powerful hand broke the chains and handcuffs, and bade him come forth.

The Revolution, as we have before said, involved not only the abasement of those who were above, but the exaltation of those who were beneath. It set at liberty the captives, and put into prison, not only those who were free, but those who, until then, had been grandees, princes, and kings, — the most powerful of earth.

Doubtless it was because Danton felt so sure of what was coming, that he appeared so indifferent amidst the feverish clouds which preceded the sanguinary morning of August 10. He had already sown the wind. There was no need to disquiet himself further, for he was sure to "reap the whirlwind."

The whirlwind was Westermann. The tempest was Santerre, that gigantic personification of the people. Santerre hardly showed himself all day. Westermann was everywhere and did everything.

It was Westermann who directed the movement for a junction of the Saint Marceau and Saint Antoine men. It was Westermann, mounted on his little black horse, who appeared at the head of the army, at the wickets leading into Carrousel Square. It was Westermann who knocked at the door of the Tuileries with the hilt of his sword, as if he were commanding the door to open for a regiment reaching the end of its journey, and about to make the palace its headquarters.

We saw this door open. We saw how heroically the Swiss did their duty, how they were beaten down in their retreat, but without fleeing, — destroyed, rather than conquered. We followed them step by step up the staircase, which they lined with their own dead.

We might follow them step by step into the apartments, which they also will strew with their comrades.

When they learned the King was about quitting the palace, two or three hundred gentlemen, who had come thither to die with the King, held a meeting in the hall called the Queen's Guardroom, in order to consider if it was their duty to die without the King, he being no longer ready to die with them, as he had so solemnly covenanted. It was decided, as the King had gone to the National Assembly, that these gentlemen should rejoin him there.

They rallied all the Swiss whom they met, and a score of National Guards, and descended, five hundred in all, into the gardens.

Their passage was barred by a grating called the Queen's Grille. They tried to spring the bolt, but the bolt would not yield. The strongest among them tried to pry it open with a bar, and finally succeeded in breaking it.

The opening gave passage to the party, but they had to go through one by one. It was only thirty paces from here to Royal Bridge, at whose grating insurgent battalions were stationed. Two Swiss soldiers were the first to undertake to cross this narrow interval. Both were killed before they had taken four steps. All the others walked over their dead bodies.

These fugitives were riddled with balls; but as the bright uniforms of the Swiss offered an attractive target, it was upon them the bullets preferably fell. For two gentlemen killed and one wounded, sixty or seventy Swiss were overcome. The two gentlemen slain were Monsieur de Carteja and Monsieur Clermont d'Amboise. The wounded gentleman was Monsieur de Viomesnil.

In their further walk towards the Assembly Hall they had to pass in front of a guardhouse erected under the trees, between the terrace and the riverside. The guards there also came out and fired upon the Swiss, slaying eight or ten more.

The remainder of the party, after losing some eighty men in eighty yards, kept on their way towards the steps leading to the Feuillant Terrace.

Monsieur de Choiseul saw them coming. With sword in hand he ran to them, under the fire of the cannon on Royal Bridge and Swinging Bridge, and tried to rally the fugitives, by shouting to them to come to the Assembly. Believing himself followed by the four hundred men still able to run, he rushed into the corridors, and up the stairway which led to the legislative hall.

On the last step he met Deputy Merlin, who said to him: "What are you doing here with your naked sword, you rascal?"

Monsieur de Choiseul looked about him. He was alone.

"Put up your sword, and go and find the King," said Merlin to him. "I alone have seen you, — that is to say, nobody."

What had become of the men by whom Choiseul believed himself followed? The cannon-shot and musket-volley had made them turn upon themselves, like dry leaves in a whirlwind, and they went along as far as the Orangery Terrace. Thence the fugitives rushed into Louis Fifteenth (now Concorde) Square, and towards the old Garde Meuble (where the crown possessions were kept), in order to reach the boulevards or the Champs Élysées.

Monsieur de Viomesnil, eight or ten other gentlemen, and five Swiss took refuge in the Venetian Embassy, situated on Rue Saint Florentin, whose door happened to be standing hospitably open. They were saved.

The others tried to reach the Champs Élysées. Two cannon-loads of grapeshot were discharged from the base of the statue of Louis Fifteenth, and broke the line of fugitives into three fragments.

One section fled up the boulevard, and met the mounted gendarmes, who were coming with a battalion from the Capuchin Station. The fugitives believed themselves saved; and Monsieur de Villiers, himself an old assistant-major of gendarmes, ran to one of the horsemen, shouting: "Help, my friends, help!" The horseman drew a pistol, and blew out the old gendarme's brains.

At this sight thirty Swiss, and a gentleman who had formerly been one of the King's pages, hurried into the building belonging to the Naval Department, where they were asked what business they had to be there. The thirty Swiss were disposed to give up. Seeing eight ragamuffins make their appearance, they laid down their arms and shouted: "Hurrah for the Nation!"

"Ah you traitors!" said the rioters, "you give up because you can't help yourselves! Do you shout for the Nation because you think this will save you? No quarter!"

Two Swiss dropped simultaneously, the one felled by the blow of a pike, the other by a gunshot. In an instant their heads were cut off, and placed on pikeheads.

The other Swiss, furious over the death of their two comrades, picked up their muskets again, and hastily fired. Seven out of the eight tatterdemalions fell dead or wounded.

The Swiss then made for the great gateway for safety, but found themselves face to face with a cannon's mouth. They recoiled. The cannon advanced. The fugitives grouped themselves together in an angle of the court-yard. The cannon was turned on its pivot, and its muzzle blazed upon them. Out of the twenty-eight, twenty-three were killed.

Fortunately, almost at the same moment, while the smoke blinded those who had fired the gun, a door opened behind the five remaining Swiss soldiers and the ex-page.

All six hurried through the door, which closed behind them, and the rioters did not see this sort of trap, which robbed them of the survivors. Believing their victims all dead, they withdrew, dragging their cannon after them with yells of triumph.

The second of the three sections of palace fugitives was composed of some thirty soldiers and gentlemen, commanded by Monsieur Forestier de Saint-Venant.

Surrounded on all sides at the entrance of the Champs Élysées, their chief determined to have them sell their lives dearly. Sword in hand, with his thirty followers armed with bayonets, he thrice charged upon the battalion stationed at the foot of the statue. In these three attacks he lost fifteen men. With the other fifteen he endeavored to fight his way through, and reach the Champs Élysées. A volley of musketry killed eight men. The other seven dispersed, and were pursued with sabres by the gendarmes.

Saint-Venant was seeking refuge in the Ambassadors' Café, when a gendarme galloped up, leaped the ditch which separated the sidewalk from the road, and with a pistol-shot wounded the loins of the unfortunate leader.

The third section, composed of sixty men, reached the Champs Élysées, and tried to wend its way towards Courbevoie, with that instinct which leads pigeons to fly straight to the dovecot, or sheep to the sheepfold. At Courbevoie were their regular barracks, from which the Swiss had been summoned to duty at the palace. Surrounded by the mounted gendarmes and by the populace, the sixty were taken to the City Hall, where they hoped to find security; but two or three thousand furious rioters, who were massed in the Place de Grève, tore them from their escort and slaughtered them in cold blood.

One young gentleman, however, Chevalier Charles d'Autichamp, fled from the palace along Rue Échelle, a pistol in each hand. Two men tried to stop him, but he killed them both. The populace threw themselves upon him, and dragged him as far as the Place de Grève, in order to put him to death more deliberately and cruelly.

Happily they forgot to search him. Besides his two pistols, which he flung away as worthless, he had a knife. This he opened in his pocket, holding it ready against a time of need. Just as they reached the square in front of the City Hall, the sixty Swiss, who had been brought thither already, were in the process of butchery. This spectacle distracted his guards. With two blows of his knife he slew those nearest him, and then glided through the crowd like a serpent, and disappeared.

The hundred men who conducted the King as far as the Assembly, and then took refuge at the Feuillant Club, were afterwards disarmed. The five hundred whose fate we have related, and a few isolated fugitives like Charles d'Autichamp, — who evaded death so cleverly, — were the only men who escaped from the palace.

The rest were killed under the vestibule, on the stairway, on the landings, or were slaughtered in the various apartments, and even in the chapel.

Nine hundred dead bodies of Swiss Guards and gentlemen strewed the floors of the Tuileries.

CHAPTER XVIII.

FROM SIX TO NINE O'CLOCK IN THE EVENING.

THE populace entered the palace as one enters into a wild beast's lair, betraying their feelings by such cries as "Death to the wolf! Death to the she-wolf! Death to the cub!"

Had they encountered the King, the Queen, and the Dauphin, they would certainly and unhesitatingly, believing they were administering justice, have struck off these three heads at one blow. Let us acknowledge that this would have proved most fortunate for the victims.

In the absence of those whom they tracked with their shouts, whom they searched for even in the cupboards, behind tapestries, and under bedsteads, the victors seemed to revenge themselves upon everything, — upon things inanimate as well as upon men. They killed and destroyed with the same unfeeling ferocity. These walls, within which the massacres of Saint Bartholomew and of the Champ de Mars had been decreed, called for a terrible revenge.

It will be seen that we do not exonerate the people. On the contrary, we show them besmirched and bloody as they were. We must, however, hasten to say that the victors left the palace with hands red, but empty!

We read, in the book called "The Revolution of August 10, 1792," that some men were shot by the populace for stealing.

Peltier, who cannot be accused of partiality for the Patriots, tells us that a wine-dealer, named Mallet, brought to the Assembly one hundred and seventy-three golden louis, found on a priest killed at the palace; that twenty-five rioters brought thither a trunk full of the King's plate; that one combatant threw a cross of the Order of Saint Louis on the President's desk; that another deposited thereon the watch belonging to a Swiss. Another brought a roll of assignats; another a bag of crowns; others brought jewels and diamonds. The last restoration was a small coffer belonging to the Queen, and containing fifteen hundred louis.

The historian adds ironically, not at all aware that he is paying to these men a magnificent compliment:

The Assembly expressed its regret at not knowing the names of the modest citizens who thus came and faithfully placed in its bosom all these treasures stolen from the King.

We are not flatterers of the populace. We know them to be the most ungrateful, the most capricious, the most inconstant of all masters. We shall therefore relate their crimes as well as their virtues.

On that day they were cruel. They reddened their hands with delight. On that day gentlemen were flung alive out of the windows. Swiss soldiers, dead or dying, lay disembowelled on the staircases. Hearts were plucked from breasts and squeezed between both hands, like sponges. Heads were cut off and borne on pikes. On that day many people, who would have considered themselves dishonored by stealing a watch or a cross of Saint Louis, yielded themselves to the fearful joys of vengeance and cruelty.

Nevertheless, in the midst of this massacre of the living, of this profanation of the dead, they sometimes granted mercy, like the satiated lion. Madame de Tarente, Madame de la Roche Aymon, Madame de Ginestous, and Mademoiselle Pauline de Tourzel remained at the Tuileries, forsaken by the Queen. They were in Marie Antoinette's own room. When the palace was captured, they heard the cries of the dying and the threats of the victors. They heard footsteps advancing towards them, precipitous and pitiless. Madame de Tarente went and opened the door. "Come in," said she, "we are only women!"

The victors entered, with smoking guns and bloody sabres in their hands. The women fell on their knees.

The slaughterers had already lifted their knives against them, calling them the counsellors of Madame Veto, the confidants of the Austrian Woman. A man with a long beard, sent by Pétion, cried from the threshold: "Have mercy on the women! Don't dishonor the Nation!" and mercy was granted.

To Madame Campan the Queen had said: "Wait for me! I shall return! or I shall send for you to meet me again, — God knows where." Madame Campan waited in their chamber for the Queen to come back or send for her.

She herself relates that she completely lost her head in the midst of the awful confusion; and that, missing her sister, who was hidden behind a curtain, or had crept behind some furniture, she hoped to find her in a chamber on the lower floor, and so went downstairs rapidly. There she found only two of her own chambermaids, and a sort of giant who was the Queen's Hungarian footman.

At the sight of this man, Madame Campan, all excited as she was, understood that the danger menaced him, rather than herself.

"Flee! Flee!" cried she. "Flee, unhappy man! The lackeys are already far away! Flee, while there is yet time."

He tried to rise; but falling back again, he exclaimed in a plaintive voice: "Alas! I cannot! I am dead from fright!"

As he was thus speaking, a company of men, drunk, furious, and bloodstained, appeared on the threshold, fell upon the Hungarian, and tore him to pieces.

Madame Campan and the two women fled by a private staircase. Some of the murderers, seeing these three women flee, ran after them, and soon overtook them.

The two chambermaids, who had fallen on their knees to supplicate the slaughterers for forbearance, grasped the murderous blades.

Madame Campan, caught at the top of the stairs, felt a rough hand slide down her back, in order to seize her by her dress. She saw, like a fatal flash, the blade of a sabre shine above her head. She even calculated the short interval which was to separate life from eternity, — an interval, however short, which contains a whole world of remembrances, — when, from the bottom of the stairs, a voice with the accent of command made itself heard.

"What are you doing up there?" asked that voice.

"Hey!" answered the murderer, "what is it?"

"The women are not to be killed, do you understand that?" continued the voice from below.

Madame Campan was on her knees. The sabre was lifted above her head. She already anticipated the pain she was to undergo.

"Get up, you jade!" said her executioner. "The Nation forgives you!"

What was the King doing meanwhile, in the box of "The Logographe"?

The King was hungry, and was calling for his dinner.

They brought him bread, wine, a chicken, cold veal, and fruit.

Like all the Bourbon princes, like Henry Fourth and Louis Fourteenth, this King was a great eater. Behind the emotions of his soul, — rarely betrayed in his face, with its soft and slackened fibres, — sleep and hunger, these two great beggars in the body, were constantly on the watch. We have seen him asleep in the palace. Now we see him eating at the Assembly.

The King broke his bread and carved his chicken, without paying the least attention to the eyes directed towards him.

Two of these eyes, the Queen's, were burning, because they could not weep. She refused all nourishment. Despair was her nurse. It seemed to her, with her feet dabbling in Charny's precious blood, that she could remain there forever, and live like a flower among the tombs, without other food than that furnished by grim Death itself.

She had suffered much on the return from Varennes; she had suffered much during her captivity in the Tuileries; she had suffered during the night and the day just past; but probably, on all these occasions, she did not suffer so much as when she saw the King eating.

The situation, however, was serious enough to deprive any man of his appetite, except Louis Sixteenth. The Deputies, to whom the King had come for protection, needed themselves to be protected. They did not conceal their weakness.

That morning, the Assembly endeavored to prevent the massacre of Suleau, and did not succeed. At two o'clock the members tried to prevent the massacre of the Swiss, and failed.

Now they were themselves threatened by an exasperated crowd, shouting: "Abdication! Abdication! Deposal! Deposal!"

A committee was appointed during the sitting. Vergniaud was a member thereof. He assigned the presidency to Guadet, in order not to have the power escape from the hands of the Girondists, even for an hour. The deliberation of the commissioners was of short duration. They deliberated, as it were, under the resounding echo of rattling musketry and roaring cannon.

It was Vergniaud who took the quill and wrote an act for the provisional suspension of royalty.

He re-entered the Assembly, mournful and downcast; for this was the last pledge he could give the King of his respect for the Crown, and to his guest of his respect for the rites of hospitality. Here is his address:

GENTLEMEN: I come, in the name of our Extraordinary Commission, to propose to you a very rigorous measure; but I rely upon the deep sorrow which pervades your body, to teach you how important it is, to the welfare of the country, that you should at once adopt it.

The National Assembly considers that the perils of the country are at their height; that the evils from which the land suffers arise chiefly from distrust inspired by the Chief of the Executive Power, on account of a war undertaken in his name against the Constitution and against French independence; that this distrust has aroused, in all parts of the empire, a desire for the revocation of the authority now vested in Louis Sixteenth.

Considering, however, that the Legislature is unwilling to enlarge its power by its own authority, and that it can reconcile its allegiance to the Constitution with its firm desire to save liberty, only by appealing to the sovereignty of the people, the following decrees are recommended:

The French people are hereby invited to form a National Convention.

The Chief of the Executive Power is temporarily suspended from his functions. A decree shall be proposed during the day, for the nomination of a Governor for the Prince Royal.

The payment of the King's civil list shall be suspended.

The King and the royal family shall remain within the precincts of the Assembly until Paris is restored to a state of tranquillity.

The department shall cause the Luxembourg Palace to be prepared for the royal residence, under a guard of citizens.

The King listened to this decree with his accustomed immobility. Then, leaning over the box of "The Logographe," and addressing Vergniaud, when the latter returned to take his place as President, the King said: "Do you know that what you have been doing is not very Constitutional?"

"Indeed, Sire!" answered Vergniaud, "but this was the only means left for saving your life. If we do not accord the deposal, the people will take your head!"

The King made a movement with his lips and shoulders, signifying: "It 's possible!" and went back to his seat.

At this very moment the clock above his head struck the hour. He counted every vibration. When the last one was reached he said: "Nine o'clock!"

The edict of the Assembly declared that the King and royal family must remain within the precincts of the Assembly until Paris was restored to a state of tranquillity.

At nine o'clock the inspectors of the hall came after the King and Queen, and led them to the temporary lodgings prepared for them near by.

The King signified, with his hand, that he wished to tarry a moment. In fact, the business in hand was not without interest to him, — the nomination of a new ministry.

The Minister of War, the Minister of the Interior, and the Minister of Finance were all nominated. They were the men recently driven out by the King, — Roland, Clavières, and Servan.

Three offices still remained unfilled, — Justice, the Navy, and Foreign Affairs.

Danton received the portfolio of Justice, Monge that of the Navy, and Lebrun that of Foreign Affairs.

The last minister having been nominated, the King said: "Now let us go!"

He rose and went out first.

The Queen followed him. She had not taken any food since she left the Tuileries, not even a glass of water.

Madame Elizabeth, the Dauphin, Madame Royale, Madame de Lamballe, and Madame de Tourzel escorted them.

The apartments prepared for the King were situated in the upper story of the old, adjacent monastery of the Feuillants. It had been occupied by the Recorder Camus, and consisted of four rooms.

In the first, which was in reality simply an anteroom, were domiciled the King's attendants who remained faithful to him in his misfortunes. These were the Prince de Poix, the Baron d'Aubier, Monsieur de Saint-Pardon, Monsieur de Goguelat, Monsieur de Chamillé, and Monsieur Hue.

The King took the second room for himself.

The third was offered to the Queen. It was the only one with paper on the walls. On entering it, Marie Antoinette threw herself upon the bed, gnawing the bolster, — the prey to a grief such as would make the agonies of the rack seem small in the comparison.

Her two children remained with their mother.

The fourth room, though very narrow, was reserved for Madame Elizabeth, Madame de Lamballe, and Madame de Tourzel, who established themselves in it as best they could.

The Queen lacked everything, — even money, for her purse. Her watch had been taken from her during the tumult at the door of the Assembly. She had no linen, for it can be easily understood that she brought nothing extra with her from the Tuileries. She however borrowed twenty-five louis of Madame Campan's sister, and sent to the English embassy for some linen.

In the evening the Assembly caused the decrees of the day to be proclaimed by torchlight through the streets of Paris.

CHAPTER XIX.

FROM NINE O'CLOCK TILL MIDNIGHT.

WHEN these torches passed in front of Carrousel Square, through the Rue Saint Honoré and on the quays, they illuminated a sorrowful spectacle.

The material struggle was finished; but the combat lasted longer in human hearts, for hatred and despair outlived the contest.

Contemporaneous accounts and Royalist legends dwell at length and tenderly, as we also are ready to do, on the sufferings of the royal heads from whose brows the crown was that day torn. They note the courage, the discipline, the devotion of the Swiss Guards and the loyal gentry. They have counted the drops of blood shed by those brave defenders of the throne. They have not counted the corpses of the populace, the tears of the mothers, the sisters, and the wives.

Let us say what we mean in a single word: Before God, before that high wisdom which not only permits but directs the events of this lower world, blood is blood and tears are tears. There were many more deaths among the common people than among the gentlefolks and the Swiss Guards.

Note what is said by Peltier, the author of "The Revolution of August 10, 1792," — Royalist as he was:

That day, August 10, cost humanity nearly seven hundred regular soldiers and twenty-two officers, twenty Royalist National Guards, five hundred Federals, three commanders of National troops, forty gendarmes, more than a hundred persons employed in the royal household, two hundred men killed for stealing, nine citizens massacred on the Feuillant Terrace, Monsieur de Clermont d'Amboise, and nearly three thousand common people killed in Carrousel Square, in the Tuileries Garden, and in Louis Fifteenth Square, — a total of about four thousand six hundred men.

This popular justice bestowed upon thieves found its repetition at a later day, in the revolutions of 1830 and 1848.

This loss is wholly conceivable. We have seen the precautions taken to fortify the Tuileries. The Swiss generally fired from behind good walls. Their assailants, on the contrary, could only parry the blows with their breasts.

Three thousand five hundred insurgents perished, without counting the two hundred thieves who were shot. Suppose there was an equal number of wounded men! The historian above quoted speaks of the dead only.

Many out of these three thousand five hundred men — suppose we say one half — were married, the poor fathers of families, and were driven into the fight by intolerable misery. They went into the contest with the first weapons they could grasp, and fell with them still in their hands. They even entered the contest unarmed, and so went to their deaths, leaving their wives in despair and their children famishing.

This death they found not only in Carrousel Square, where the fight began, but in the palace rooms, where it was continued, and in the Tuileries Gardens, where it ended.

Between three in the afternoon and nine in the evening, every corpse wearing a uniform was picked up and hastily thrown into the Madeleine Cemetery.

As to the plebeian bodies, that was another matter. They were gathered into wagons, and carted away to their respective sections. Nearly all were from the Faubourg Saint Marceau or the Faubourg Saint Antoine.

There they were laid side by side, especially near the Arsenal and the Pantheon, in Bastille and Maubert Squares.

Wherever one of these gloomy vehicles rolled heavily along, it left a trace of blood behind. As it entered one or the other faubourg it was surrounded by a crowd of mothers, wives, sisters, children, filled with mortal grief. Read what Michelet says, for he is the true historian of the people. As fast as the living recognized the dead, cries, sobs, and menaces broke forth.

Mysterious and unheard-of maledictions rose like a flock of nightbirds, with their awful suggestiveness, beating their wings in the obscurity, and croaking pitifully over the gloomy Tuileries. Like so many flocks of crows over a field of battle, these curses hovered over the King, the Queen, the Court, over the Austrian circle which surrounded Marie Antoinette, over the nobles who counselled her. Some promised themselves a future retaliation; and they had it on September 2, 1792, and on January 21, 1793. Others were intoxicated with the blood their eyes had drunk. Grasping again their sabres, their pikes, their muskets, they again rushed into Paris to slay. To slay whom? Any Swiss who happened to remain alive, — any nobleman, any courtier, — to kill the King, to kill the Queen, if they could find them.

Somebody might remonstrate: "But in killing the King and Queen, you make their children orphans! In killing the nobles you make widows of their wives, and plunge their sisters into mourning!"

But wives, sisters, and children might reply: "We also are orphans! We also are sisters in mourning! We also are widows!"

With hearts full of sobs they went to the Assembly, they went to the Abbaye Prison, and beat their heads against the doors, crying for vengeance.

The Tuileries presented a terrible spectacle, blood-stained, smoking, deserted by all save the dead, and three or four squads of soldiers, keeping watch lest, under pretence of searching for dead friends, nocturnal visitors should pillage the royal dwelling, entering through its broken windows and battered doors. In each vestibule there were sentinels, and also at the bottom of each staircase.

The detachment at the Clock Pavilion — that is, by the grand stairway — was commanded by a young captain in the National Guards, a youth whom the sight of this unparalleled disaster doubtless inspired with pity, if one could judge by the expression of his face, as wagon-load after wagon-load of corpses was driven away, — under his supervision, as it were. However, the awful events which had taken place seemed to have no more influence over his physical needs than over the King's, for at eleven o'clock in the evening he was busy satisfying his monstrous appetite with a four-pound loaf of bread, which he held under his left arm, while with his right hand, armed with a knife, he cut off one huge slice after another, and thrust it into his large mouth, opening wider and wider, in proportion to the magnitude of the supply it was destined to receive.

Leaning against one of the pillars in the vestibule, he watched that long spectral procession of mothers, wives, daughters, — lighted by torches placed here and there, — who searched, in this extinguished crater, for the bodies of their fathers, their husbands, or their sons, destroyed in the great eruption.

Suddenly, at the sight of a shadowy, half-veiled form, the young captain shuddered, as he murmured : " Madame de Charny ! "

The shadow passed on, without hearing or pausing.

The young captain made a sign to his lieutenant, who came to him at once.

" Désiré," he said, " here is a poor woman, one of Monsieur Gilbert's friends, who is probably looking for her husband among these dead folks. Somebody must follow her, in case she needs help or information. I leave thee in charge of the post. Watch for both of us ! "

" The Devil ! " responded the lieutenant, — for he whom the captain called only by his first name rejoiced also in the appellation of Maniquet, — " thy dame looks like an aristocrat."

" That 's because she is one, — an aristocrat and a countess," said the captain.

" Go ahead ! I 'll watch for both of us ! "

The Countess had already turned the first angle of the staircase, when the captain, detaching himself from his pillar, began to follow her, at a respectful distance of fifty paces.

He was not mistaken. It was indeed her husband for whom poor Andrée was searching, only she was agitated, not by tremors of doubt, but by the certainty of despair.

When he heard, in the midst of his joy and happiness, the echoes of the events taking place in Paris, Charny said to his wife, his face pale and resolute : " Dear Andrée, the King of France is in peril of his life, and has need of all his defenders. What ought I to do?"

Andrée answered: "Go where duty calls thee, my own Oliver, and die for the King, if need be!"

"But thou —?"

"Oh, as for me, be not troubled. As I have never truly lived except in thee, doubtless God will let me die with thee."

Thenceforth all was understood between these two great hearts, and they exchanged no more words on the subject.

They ordered posthorses, and began their journey. Five hours afterwards they dismounted at the little mansion in the Rue Coq Heron.

That very evening, — as Gilbert, depending upon the Count's influence, was writing to him, begging him to come to Paris, — Charny, in his naval uniform, waited upon the Queen. From that moment, as we know, he did not leave her Majesty.

Andrée remained alone with her attendants, praying in her own room. For an instant she thought of imitating her husband's devotion, and asking for her old place near the Queen, as the Count had taken his near the King; but she lacked the courage.

August 9 was full of anguish to her, but it brought her no positive ill-news.

On August 10, about nine in the morning, she heard the first sounds of the cannon. Needless to say that each thunderous reverberation sent a thrill to the remotest fibre of her being.

About two o'clock the fusillade ceased. Were the people the conquered or conquering? She inquired. The people were the victors!

What had become of Charny in that fearful struggle?

She knew him, — that he was sure to take a chief part in it.

She sought for further news, and was told that nearly all the Swiss Guards were killed, but that most of the gentry were saved.

She waited. Charny might return under some disguise. It might be necessary for him to fly instantly. The horses were therefore at once harnessed, and attached to the travelling-carriage.

Horses and carriage waited for the master; but Andrée knew full well, whatever danger he might incur, that the master would not go without her. She even had the gates opened, so that if Charny had to flee, nothing might hinder his flight; and then she continued to wait, as the hours crept along.

"If he is hiding anywhere, he can venture out in the night. Let us wait till night!"

So she reasoned; but night came, and Charny did not come.

In August the darkness comes on slowly. Not till ten o'clock did Andrée lose all hope. Then she threw a veil over her head and went into the street.

All along the way she met groups of women wringing their hands, and bands of men crying for vengeance. Through their midst she passed unchallenged. The wrath of the men and the grief of the women were her safeguards. Besides, they were looking after men that night, not women, and there were women on every side, — weeping.

Andrée at last reached Carrousel Square. She heard the proclamation of certain new decrees of the National Assembly. The King and Queen were under the protection of that Assembly. That was all she understood.

She saw two or three wagons drive away, and asked what they were carrying. She was told that these wagons contained bodies gathered up in Carrousel Square and Royal Courtyard. As yet it was only from those places that any of the dead had been removed.

Andrée said to herself that Charny would be likely to fight neither in Carrousel Square nor Royal Courtyard, but at the door of either the King's or the Queen's rooms. She therefore crossed the Royal Courtyard and the Grand Vestibule, and went upstairs.

It was at this moment that Pitou, in his capacity of commander of the post there stationed, saw Andrée and followed her.

CHAPTER XX.

THE WIDOW.

It is impossible to give an adequate idea of the state of devastation at the Tuileries. Blood flowed in the chambers, and rolled like a cascade down the staircases. There were dead bodies in every apartment.

Andrée followed the example of the other seekers. She took a torch, and began her inspection of one corpse after another. As she searched, she drew nearer and nearer to the rooms formerly occupied by the King and Queen.

Pitou still followed her. There, as in the other chambers, she pursued her fruitless search. Then she stood for a moment undecided, not knowing which way to go.

Pitou saw her embarrassment. Approaching her, he said: "Alas! I can guess whom you are looking for, Madame."

Andrée turned, and he added: "Perhaps Madame needs my help?"

"Monsieur Pitou!" said Andrée.

"At your service, Madame!"

"Yes, yes!" said Andrée, "I need you sorely." Going to him, she grasped both his hands, and asked: "Do you know what has become of Count Oliver?"

"No, Madame, but I can help you look for him."

"There is one person who can tell us whether he is dead or living, — and also, dead or alive, where he is."

"Who is that, Madame?"

"The Queen!" murmured Andrée.

"You know where the Queen is?"

"At the Assembly, I believe; and I have a faint hope that Count de Charny is with her."

"Yes, yes!" said Pitou, grasping at this hope, — not on his own account, but on that of the widow. "Will you come with me to the Assembly?"

"But if they refuse us admission?"

"I promise to have the door opened."

"Come, then!"

Andrée threw away her torch, at the risk of setting the floor afire, and consequently the Tuileries; but what mattered the Tuileries to her profound despair, — so deep that she could not shed a tear?

Andrée knew the interior of the palace, from having lived there awhile. She therefore descended to the basement story, by the little staircase reserved for household service, and so regained the Grand Vestibule, without again passing through the blood-stained apartments. Once more Pitou found himself at his post in the Clock Pavilion.

Maniquet had kept careful guard. "Well," he asked, — "thy Countess — ?"

"She hopes to find her husband at the Assembly, and so we're going there." Then Pitou added, in a lower tone: "As we may only find the Count's dead body, send me four good fellows to the Feuillant Gateway, — four upon whom I may rely to defend the corpse of a Royalist, as faithfully as if it were the corpse of a Patriot."

"That's all right! Off with thy Countess. The men shall be there."

Andrée was waiting at the gate, where a sentinel had been placed. As it was Pitou who had stationed him there, the sentinel naturally allowed Pitou to pass.

The gardens of the Tuileries were lighted by lamps placed here and there, particularly on the pedestals of the statues. As the weather was almost as warm as it had been during the day, and scarcely a breath agitated the leaves of the trees, the lamp-flames burned without a flicker, like so many lances of fire, and threw their light far and wide, not only on those exposed parts of the garden laid out in flower-beds, but even upon the dead bodies lying here and there under the trees.

Andrée was so sure that only at the Assembly could she obtain news of her husband, that she walked thitherward, turning neither to the right nor the left.

They reached the legislative building. The royal family had been gone from the hall an hour, having retired, as we know, into the temporary apartments provided for them.

In order to reach these apartments there were two obstacles to be overcome. First, there were the sentinels, watching outside; next there were the gentlemen, watching inside.

As a captain of National Guards, in command of a post at the Tuileries, Pitou had the password, and therefore could easily conduct Andrée as far as the antechamber, where the noblemen were assembled. It was for Andrée thereafter to gain admission to the Queen for herself.

We know the arrangement of the apartments occupied by the royal family. We have depicted the Queen's despair. We know how, on entering that little green-papered chamber, she threw herself on the bed, biting the bolster amidst sobs and tears. Certainly one who had lost throne, liberty, and life mayhap, had lost so much that none had any reason to call her despair to account, or try to find, beneath her great abandonment, any more lively sorrow to draw tears from her eyes and sobs from her breast.

Out of the respect inspired by her supreme grief, the Queen's friends for a while left her alone. Presently, however, she heard the door leading into the King's room open and shut, but she did not turn her head in that direction. She heard footsteps approaching her bed, but still buried her face in the pillow.

Suddenly she sprang up, as if a serpent had bitten her to the heart. A well-known voice pronounced the one word Madame.

"Andrée!" cried Marie Antoinette, raising herself on her elbow. "What do you want with me?"

"I wish of you, Madame, what God wished of Cain, when he asked: 'Cain, where is thy brother?'"

"With this difference," said the Queen, "that Cain had killed his brother, whereas I — oh! — I would have given not only my life, but ten lives, if I had them, to save his!"

Andrée staggered. The cold sweat burst from her forehead, and her teeth chattered.

"Then he is killed?" she asked, making a great effort.

The Queen looked at Andrée and replied: "Do you fancy it is for my crown that I am weeping?" Then, showing her bloody feet, she added: "If this blood had been mine, do you not suppose I would have washed it away?"

Andrée became so pale as to be nearly livid. Presently she spoke: "You know where his body is?"

"If they will let me go out, I will show you!"

"I will wait for you in the entry, Madame," said Andrée, as she left the room.

Pitou was at the door. "Monsieur Pitou," said she to him, "one of my friends is willing to show me where I can find the body of Monsieur de Charny. She is one of the Queen's attendants. May she go with me?"

"If she comes out, Madame, it must be on condition that I bring her back again to the same place!"

"You can bring her back!" said Andrée.

"Very well, then!" said Pitou, — adding, as he turned towards the sentinel: "Comrade, one of the Queen's women wishes to go out, in order to aid us in searching for the body of a brave officer, of whom Madame is the widow. I will be responsible for that woman, — body for body, head for head."

"That's all right, captain," said the sentinel.

The door of the antechamber opened, and the Queen appeared, her face covered with a veil. They descended the staircase, the Queen walking foremost, and Andrée and Pitou following.

After a session of twenty-seven hours the Assembly had just vacated the great hall. That hall, where so many startling events had been compressed into twenty-seven hours, was mute, — empty and gloomy as a sepulchre.

"A light!" said the Queen.

Pitou took up an extinguished torch, relighted it by a lantern, and gave it to the Queen, who resumed her walk.

As they passed by the entrance, she pointed towards it with her torch, and said: "There is the doorway where he was killed!"

Andrée did not respond. She seemed like a spectre, obeying the spell of an enchantress.

In the corridor the Queen lowered her torch nearer the floor, and said: "There is his blood!"

Still Andrée was mute.

The Queen went directly to a sort of closet, situated opposite the lodge of "The Logographe," opened the door, and said, as she let the torchlight fall upon the interior: "There is his body!"

Still silent, Andrée entered the closet, sat down on the floor, and, with an effort, lifted Oliver's head upon her lap.

"I thank you, Madame," she said, "that is all I ask of you."

"But I have something to ask of you," said the Queen.

"Speak!"

"Will you forgive me?"

There was a moment of silence, as if Andrée hesitated. At last she said: "Yes, for to-morrow I shall be with him!"

From her bosom the Queen drew a pair of golden scissors, which she kept concealed as one hides a poniard, in order to have some weapon she could use against herself, in a moment of extreme danger.

"Then —" she said, almost prayerfully, presenting the scissors to Andrée, — "then —"

Andrée took the scissors, cut a lock of hair from the dead man's head, and gave it to the Queen, with the scissors. The Queen grasped Andrée's hand and kissed it. Andrée uttered a little scream and withdrew her hand, as if Marie Antoinette's lips were red-hot iron.

"Ah!" murmured the Queen, throwing a last look upon the body, "who can say which of us two loved him best!"

"Oh Oliver, my well-beloved," whispered Andrée in her turn, "I hope thou at least knowest that I loved thee best!"

The Queen was already on her way back to her apartments, leaving Andrée in that little room, alone with the body of her husband, whereon, like the glance of some friendly face, fell a ray of moonlight, shining through a grated window.

Without knowing who she was, Pitou reconducted Marie Antoinette to her own rooms, which he saw her re-enter. Thus, having discharged this responsibility in presence of the sentinel, he went out upon the terrace, to see if Désiré Maniquet had sent the four men asked for. The four men were there.

"Come in!" said Pitou to them; and they entered.

Lighting the way with the torch which he had retaken from the Queen's hands, he led the way to the little room where Andrée was still crouching, and gazing at the pale but always beautiful face of her husband, illumined by the loving moon. The torchlight made her raise her eyes.

"What do you wish?" she asked of Pitou and his followers, as if she feared these unknown men had come to take away from her the body of her dearly beloved Oliver.

"Madame," answered Pitou, "we come for the body of Monsieur de Charny, in order to carry it safely to the Rue Coq Heron."

"You swear to me it is for that purpose?"

Pitou extended his hand over the body, with a dignity whereof one might have supposed him incapable, and said: "I swear it, Madame!"

"Then I return you my thanks, and I shall pray God, with my latest breath, that he will spare you and yours the sorrow wherewith I am overwhelmed."

The four men took up the body and laid it on their guns. Pitou, with his sword drawn, put himself at the head of the funeral cortege. Andrée walked beside the body, holding in hers the Count's cold hand, already stiffening.

On their arrival at the Rue Coq Heron, they laid the body on Andrée's bed, who then said to the four men: "Receive the blessings of a woman who, by to-morrow, will be on high, to renew her prayers to God in your behalf."

Then she said to Pitou: "Monsieur, I owe you more than I can ever repay. May I rely upon you for one last service?"

"Command me, Madame!"

"To-morrow morning, at eight o'clock, see to it that Doctor Gilbert is here."

Pitou bowed, and took his leave. In doing so, he turned his head, and saw that Andrée was kneeling before the bed as before an altar.

As he crossed the gateway into the street, three in the morning sounded from the clock on the church of Saint Eustache.

CHAPTER XXI.

WHY ANDRÉE WANTED GILBERT.

THE next day, at eight precisely, Gilbert rapped at the door of the little pavilion in Rue Coq Heron.

On receiving the request which Pitou brought him in Andrée's name, Gilbert was astonished, and made our captain recount the events of the night before, in all their details. Then he meditated for a long time. Finally, when he started out in the morning, he summoned Pitou, and asked him to go for Sebastien, at Abbé Berardier's, and bring him to the Rue Coq Heron. When there, they were to wait till the Doctor came out.

Doubtless the old porter had been notified of the Doctor's expected arrival; for as soon as his name was known, he was at once introduced into the parlor adjoining the little bedroom.

All clad in black, Andrée was awaiting him. It was easy to see that she had neither wept nor slept since the day before. Her face was pale, her eyes dry.

Never before were the lines of her face so firmly set, — lines which indicated a strength of will carried nearly to the point of insanity. It was difficult to see what resolution had taken possession of this diamond heart, but it was easy to perceive that some special idea enthralled her.

As a philosophic physician and a clever observer, Gilbert understood this at a glance. He bowed and waited.

"Monsieur Gilbert, I have asked you to come hither."

"And I have responded punctually to your invitation, as you see, Madame."

"I sent for you, rather than anybody else, because I wished that he of whom I asked a certain favor should be one who would have no right to refuse me."

"You are right, Madame, — not perhaps in what you are going to ask, but in what you say. You have a right to exact anything from me, even my life."

Andrée smiled bitterly. "Your life, Monsieur, is one so precious to humanity, that I should pray God to make it long and happy, instead of seeking to abridge it; but you cannot but agree with me that if your existence is blessed by a propitious influence, other careers seem born under a fatal star."

Gilbert made no reply, but Andrée resumed, after a moment's silence: "Mine, for example! What do you think of my existence, Monsieur?"

As Gilbert lowered his eyes, without replying, she went on: "Let me recall my history to you in a few words. — Be calm! There will be no reproaches for any one."

By a gesture, Gilbert bade her speak on.

"I was born poor. My father was ruined before my birth. My youth was melancholy, isolated, solitary. You knew my father, and no one better knows his depth of sordid interest in me! Two men — one of whom it would have been better if I had never known, the other a stranger — exerted a mysterious and fatal influence over my life, with which my own voluntary will had nothing to do. One of these men disposed of my soul, the other of my body. Without suspecting that I had ceased to be a maiden, I became a mother. In that sad event I feared losing the affection of the only being who had ever truly loved me, — my brother. I took refuge in the idea of becoming a mother, and being loved by my child; but my child was stolen from me an hour after its birth. I found myself a wife without a husband, a mother without a child."

Here Andrée was somewhat moved, but presently she resumed her story.

"The Queen's friendship consoled me. One day chance placed a handsome and brave young man in the same carriage with us. Fate decreed that I, who had never known the passion of love, should love him. He loved the Queen. I became the confidant of their passion. I believe you also have loved without return, Monsieur Gilbert, and so you can understand how I suffered. Even this was not enough. A day came when the Queen besought me to save her life, — more than her life, her honor! It became my duty to be his wife, — the wife of the man I had loved for three years, — and yet to remain separated from him. I was wedded to him. Five years I lived near that man. Within, I was on fire. Outwardly I was ice, — a statue with a burning heart. Physician, tell me! Can you understand what such a heart must suffer?"

Still Gilbert spoke not.

"Finally, on one ineffably happy day, my devotion and silence, my self-abnegation, touched that man. Through seven years I had loved him, without making him suspect it, even by a look. Now he came to throw himself trembling at my feet, to say he knew all, and yet loved me! As if to reward my patience, at the very time when I was winning my husband, God ordained that I should regain my child also. A year sped by like a day, like an hour, like a minute. In that one year was concentrated my whole life! Four days ago the thunderbolt fell at my feet. My husband's honor bade him come to Paris and die. I said nothing against it, I shed not a tear; but I came with him. Hardly did we reach the city before he left me. Last night I found him again, dead! He is in yonder room. Do you think it too ambitious in me, after such a life, — the desire to sleep in the same tomb with him? Is this a request which you have power to refuse, — this service which I demand at your hands? Monsieur Gilbert, you are a skilful physician, a learned chemist. You have been guilty of a great wrong towards me! You have much to atone for! Well, give me a sure and rapid poison, and I will not only forgive you, but I shall die with a heart overflowing with gratitude."

"Madame," replied Gilbert, "your life has been, as you say, one long and dismal trial, and gloriously have you endured it. You have borne your sorrows like a martyr, — nobly, sacredly."

Andrée gave a slight nod, to indicate that she was waiting for the answer.

"Now you say to your executioner: 'Thou hast given me a cruel life! Give me now a pleasant death.' — You have a right to say so. You have the right to add: 'Thou wilt do what I say, because thou hast no right to refuse me what I ask.'"

"Then Monsieur — ?"

"Do you still ask for poison, Madame?"

"I beseech you to give it to me, my friend!"

"Life is then so unbearable that you find it impossible to endure it?"

"Death is the sweetest favor men can bring me, the greatest benefit God can grant me."

"In ten minutes, Madame, you shall have what you desire."

He bowed and stepped backward, but Andrée offered him her hand, and said : " Ah, in one instant you have done me more good than you have done me wrong in all your life. Bless you, Gilbert ! "

Gilbert went out. At the gate he found Sebastien and Pitou, who were waiting in a cab.

" Sebastien," he said, drawing from his breast a little flask, suspended from a gold chain around his neck, and containing an opal-colored liquid, — " Sebastien, thou wilt give this vial to the Countess, from me."

" How long may I remain with her, father ? "

" As long as it pleases thee."

" And where shall I find thee again ? "

" I will await thee here."

The lad took the vial and went into the house. In a quarter-hour he came out again. Gilbert glanced instantly at the bottle, and saw that Andrée had returned it unopened.

" What did she say ? " he asked.

" She said : 'Not by thy hand, my child ! ' "

" What did she do ? "

" She wept."

" Then she is saved," said Gilbert. " Come, my child ! " and he kissed Sebastien more tenderly, perhaps, than he had ever done before.

Gilbert reckoned without Marat. Eight days afterward he learned that the Countess had been arrested, and taken to the Abbaye Prison.

CHAPTER XXII.

THE TEMPLE.

BEFORE following Andrée to the jail into which they were to send her as one suspected, let us follow the Queen to the prison in which they immured her as absolutely guilty.

We have shown the antagonism existing between the Assembly and the Commune. The Assembly, like all constituted bodies, had not kept pace with individuals. The Assembly launched the people into the track of the Tenth of August, and then lagged behind.

The sections improvised the famous Council of the Commune; and this Council really brought about the Tenth of August, which had been instigated by the Assembly.

The proof of this can be found in the fact that the King sought the Assembly as a refuge against the Commune. The Assembly gave a shelter to the King, whom the Commune would not have been sorry to find in the Tuileries, in order to stifle him between two featherbeds, or hang him between two doors, along with the Queen and the Dauphin, — with the she-wolf and the cub, as they were called.

The Assembly caused the project to miscarry; though the success of this scheme, infamous as it was, would really have been a great blessing.

As the Assembly protected the King, the Queen, the Dauphin, and even the Court itself, the Assembly was called Royalist. As the Assembly issued a decree that the King should dwell at the Luxembourg, — that is to say, in a palace, — the Assembly must surely be growing aristocratic.

In Royalism, as in all things, there is a difference of degree. What was Royalistic in the eyes of the Commune, or even in the eyes of the Assembly, seemed Revolutionary in other eyes.

Lafayette, though proscribed from France as a Royalist, was liable to imprisonment as a Revolutionist by the Emperor of Austria.

The Commune began to accuse the Assembly of being Royalistic. From time to time Robespierre would thrust his small head, pointed and venomous, out of the hole in which he was hidden, and hiss forth a calumny.

Robespierre was just then saying that a very powerful party was offering the French throne to the Duke of Brunswick. He meant the Girondists, you understand, — that is to say, the party which would have been the first to shout for war, the first to give itself for the defence of France!

The Commune, therefore, in order to obtain dictatorial power, must oppose all the doings of the so-called Royalist Assembly.

The Assembly offered the Luxembourg to the King as a lodging-place. The Communists declared they would not answer for the King, if he went to live in the Luxembourg. The cellars of the Luxembourg, they affirmed, were connected with the unwholesome catacombs running beneath the city, and might offer a means of escape.

The Assembly, unwilling to quarrel with the Commune over such a trifle, left to the latter the choice of a royal residence. The Commune thereupon chose the Temple.

Consider whether or not the location was well chosen!

The Temple was not like the Luxembourg Palace, connected through its cellars with the catacombs, and by its walls with the plain, forming an acute angle with the Tuileries and the Hôtel de Ville. No, it was a prison, located under the eyes of the Commune. The Commune had only to reach out its hands, in order to open or close the Temple's doors. It was an old and isolated donjon, whose ditch had been covered over. It was an old tower, low, strong, gloomy, and dismal. Philip the Fair, that is to say, Royalty, crushed within it the Middle Ages, in revolt against him. Royalty was now to enter it, and be crushed by the New Age.

How came this old tower to remain there, in that populous quarter, — a tower dark and sorrowful, like a screech-owl staring in the broad daylight?

It was in this place the Commune decided that the King and his family should dwell.

Was this deliberately done, in order that the King should live in a place which had been a refuge for ancient bankrupts, who used to come there, put on green caps, and "smite the bottom of the stone," as the law of the Middle Ages expressed it, after which the debts of these bankrupts were regarded as cancelled?

Was the incarceration of the royal family in this place intentional, because of its historic memories? No, it came about through chance, through fatality, — through Providence, we might say, were not such a word too suggestive of deific cruelty.

In the evening of August 13 the King, the Queen, Madame Elizabeth, Madame de Lamballe, Madame de Tourzel, Monsieur Chemilly, and Monsieur Hue, the King's valets, were transferred to the Temple.

The Commune, in its haste to have the King occupy his new residence, sent him there before the Tower was properly prepared. Consequently the royal family were at first taken into that portion of the building formerly inhabited by Monseigneur d'Artois, when he wished to stay in Paris, and which was therefore called the Palace.

All Paris seemed to rejoice. Thirty-five hundred citizens had died, to be sure; but the King, the friend of foreigners, the great enemy of the Revolution, the ally of nobles and priests, — the King was a prisoner!

All the houses overlooking the Temple were illuminated that night. Lanterns were even hung on the battlements of the tower.

When Louis Sixteenth stepped from the carriage, he found Santerre on horseback, ten paces from the coach door. Two municipal guards, with covered heads, awaited the King.

"Come in, Monsieur!" they said.

The King entered. Naturally mistaken as to his future abode, he asked to be shown the apartments of the Palace.

The guards exchanged a smile. Without telling him that the walk he was to take was useless, since it was the Donjon he was to occupy, not the Palace, they let him go through the more spacious portions of the Temple, room after room.

The King began to plan for the use of different apartments; and the guards enjoyed this error, which was to turn speedily into bitterness.

At ten o'clock supper was served. During the meal Manuel stood behind the King. He was no longer a servant, prompt to obey. He was a jailer, an overseer, a master. If two contradictory orders were given, one by the King, the other by Manuel, Manuel's was the one obeyed. This was really the commencement of captivity.

Beginning with August 13, in the evening, the King, vanquished on the summit of monarchism, abandoned this supreme height, and descended with rapid strides the opposite declivity of the mountain, at whose foot lay the scaffold.

It took him eighteen years to reach the highest summit. It took him five months and eight days to reach the bottom.

Behold with what rapidity he was driven!

At ten o'clock they were in the dining-room of the Palace. At eleven they were in the drawing-room of the Palace. He was still the King; or rather he still believed himself to be the King, for he was ignorant of what was going on.

At eleven o'clock, one of the commissioners appeared, and ordered the valets to take whatever linen they had, and follow them.

"Follow you where?" asked the valets.

"To the night residence of your employers," answered the commissioner. "This Palace is simply their day residence."

The King, the Queen, and the Dauphin were no longer the masters of their own lackeys.

At the door of the Palace they found a city officer bearing a lantern, who led the way. They followed the officer. By the faint glimmer of this lantern, and partly owing to the fact that the public illumination was beginning to decrease, Monsieur Hue had to look hard to see the King's future residence. He could see nothing before him except the sombre Donjon, rising in the air like a granite giant, on whose brow still sparkled the embers of a fiery crown.

"My God!" said the valet, pausing, "can it be that you are leading us to that Tower?"

"Precisely!" answered the officer. "The time of palaces is gone by! You shall see how we lodge the assassins of the people."

As he spoke, the man with the lantern stumbled against the first steps of a winding staircase.

The grooms were about to stop at the first landing; but the man with the lantern continued on his way. At the third landing he stopped, turned into a corridor on the right of the stairs, and opened a door on the right side of the corridor.

This room was lit by a single window. Three or four seats, a table, and a poor bed composed its entire furniture.

"Which of you two is the King's servant?" inquired the city officer.

"I am his valet," replied Monsieur Chemilly.

"Valet or servant, it 's all the same!"

Pointing to the bed, he added: "There 's where your master will sleep."

The man with the lantern threw a blanket and two sheets upon a chair, lighted two candles on the shelf, and left the two valets alone.

The Queen's room, up two flights, was still to be made ready.

Messieurs Hue and Chemilly looked at each other in utter amazement. They could still behold, with tearful eyes, the splendors of regal dwellings. Now the King was not only thrown into prison, but he was lodged in a kennel. The majesty of a theatric stage was unhappily missing.

The valets examined the room. The bed was in an uncurtained alcove. An old wicker screen, resting against the wall, indicated some precaution taken against vermin, — an insufficient precaution, as could readily be seen.

The valets were not, however, wholly disheartened, but went resolutely to work and cleaned up the room and bed as best they could. While one was sweeping and the other dusting, the King entered.

"Oh Sire!" they said with one voice, "what infamy!"

The King — was it from strength of soul, or was it from indifference? — remained tranquil. He cast a look around him, but did not utter a single word.

The wall was papered with cheap engravings; and as a few of these were obscene, he tore them off, saying: "I do not want my pure daughter to behold such objects!"

When his bed was made, the King retired; and he slept as peaceably as if he were still at the Tuileries, — more calmly, perhaps!

If at this period the King had been presented with a yearly income of thirty thousand francs, and a country house, with a forge, a library of Travels, a chapel where he could hear Mass, a chaplain to officiate, a park of ten acres, — a home where he could live apart from all intrigues, and be surrounded by the Queen, the Dauphin, and Madame Royale, — that is, to use much sweeter words, by his wife and children, — the King would have been the happiest man in the realm.

It was very different with the Queen.

If the arrogant lioness did not roar at the sight of her cage, it is because so cruel a pain had possession of her breast, that she became blind and insensible to all her surroundings.

Her domicil consisted of four rooms: an antechamber, which the Princess Lamballe occupied; a bedroom in which the Queen installed herself; a closet which was assigned to Madame de Tourzel; and another bedroom, which became the habitation of Madame Elizabeth and the two children. These rooms were all somewhat cleaner than the King's.

Manuel, however, as if ashamed of the deception practised upon the King, said that the municipal architect, Citizen Palloy,— who formerly had charge of the levelling of the Bastille, — would come and confer with the King, and see what could be done towards rendering the abiding-place of the royal family as comfortable as possible.

While Andrée is burying the remains of her beloved husband, while Manuel is installing the royal family in the Temple, while the carpenter is erecting the guillotine in Carrousel Square, — in that field of victory, soon to be transformed into a Place de Grève, — let us cast a glance into the interior of the City Hall, where we have already been admitted many times; and let us weigh the government which has succeeded Bailly's and Lafayette's, — a government which is even substituting itself for the Assembly, and aspires to the dictatorship. Let us behold the men, and this will furnish us an explanation of their acts.

On the evening of August 10, when all was over, — when the noise of the cannon was hushed, when the rattle of musketry was deadened, when there were no longer any assassinations, — on that night, a troop of people, drunk and ragged, carried in their arms, into the midst of the Council of the Commune, that man of darkness, that owl with blinking eyelids, that prophet of the populace, the divine Marat, — as he was blasphemously called.

He yielded himself to their wishes. There was now nothing to be afraid of. The victory was secure; and the field was open to the wolves, the vultures, and the ravens.

They called him the Victor of the Tenth of August, he whom they had found when he was just venturing to put his head out through the venthole of his cellar!

They crowned him with laurels; and he, like Cæsar, simply suffered the crown to rest upon his brow.

They came, these Citizen Ragamuffins, and threw their god, Marat, into the midst of the Commune, — as we have said. Thus was the crippled Vulcan imposed upon the Council of the Gods.

At the sight of Vulcan, the other gods laughed. At the sight of Marat, many laughed and others were disgusted, but a few trembled. The tremblers were in the right.

Nevertheless, Marat did not belong to the Commune. He was never chosen a member of it. He was simply carried there; but there he stayed! They made for him — purposely for him — a journalist's lodge in the Council Chamber; but there was this difference. Instead of having the journalist under the control of the Commune, as "The Logographe" had been under the control of the Assembly, it was the Commune which was in the claw and under the paw of Marat.

As in the beautiful drama of our dear and great friend Victor Hugo, the Podesta Angelo rules Padua, but feels Venice above himself, so the Commune was above the Assembly, but felt Marat weighing down upon the Commune.

That haughty Commune, which the Assembly obeyed, see how in turn it obeyed Marat!

Here is one of the first measures they voted:

Henceforth, the printing-presses of the venomous Royalists shall be confiscated, and awarded to the Patriot printers.

On the morning of the day in which this decree was issued, Marat executed it. He went to the royal printing establishment, had a press removed to his house, and bagged all the type that best suited him. Was he not foremost among Patriot printers?

The Assembly was frightened by the crimes of August 10, but was powerless to stop them. The slaughter went on in the Assembly yard, in its corridors, and at the very door of its hall.

Danton said: "When the work of justice begins, popular vengeance must cease. I engage myself, before this Assembly, to protect the men who are within its precincts. I will march at their head, and I will answer for them."

Danton said this before Marat appeared in the Communal Council. From the moment Marat was admitted there, Danton could no longer hold himself responsible for anything.

The lion shuffled before the serpent, and tried to play the fox.

Lacroix, that old official, that athletic Deputy, — one of Danton's hundred arms, — ascended the rostrum, and asked that the Commander of the National Guard, Santerre, — the man who, according to the Royalists themselves, concealed behind his rough behavior a sympathetic heart, — that Santerre be empowered to nominate a court-martial, which should try the Swiss Guards, both officers and privates, though without finally disposing of them.

The following was Lacroix's idea, or rather Danton's: That a court-martial should be appointed from among those who had fought with the prisoners. They were men of courage, these fighters, and consequently men who would appreciate and respect courage in others.

Moreover, the fact that these native soldiers were the victors would make them reluctant to condemn the conquered.

Did not these victors, thirsting for blood and smoking with slaughter, spare lone women, and even protect and escort them? A court-martial, chosen from the Bretons and Marsillians,— in a word, among the victors, — meant the salvation of the prisoners. To prove that this was a measure of clemency, we need only mention that the Communal Council rejected it.

Marat preferred massacre. That would be the shortest way! He wanted heads, — first, last, and always!

His estimate of the necessary number of deaths, instead of diminishing, continually increased. First he asked for fifty thousand heads, next for a hundred thousand, then for two hundred thousand; and finally, he wanted two hundred and seventy-three thousand heads.

Why such an odd number, such a strange fraction? He would have been greatly puzzled over this question. He demanded massacre, that is all; and massacre began to organize itself.

Danton kept away from the Commune. His work in the ministry absorbed him, as he said.

What were the Communists doing? They sent deputations to the Assembly. On August 16 three deputations succeeded one another at the bar.

On August 17 a new deputation presented itself and said:

> The people are weary at not being avenged. Tremble, lest they take justice into their own hands! To-night, at twelve, the alarm-bells will be heard. We must have a Criminal Tribunal established at the Tuileries. We must have a judge for each section of the city. Louis Sixteenth and Antoinette wanted blood. Let them see flowing the blood of their own satellites!

This audacity, this urgency, caused two men to spring to their feet, — the Jacobin Choudieu, and the Dantonist Thuriot.

"They who come here and demand massacre," said Choudieu, "are not friends, but flatterers of the people. An inquisition is demanded. I shall resist it to the death!"

"You wish to dishonor the Revolution!" exclaimed Thuriot. "The Revolution belongs not to France alone; it belongs to humanity!"

After petitions came menaces. Representatives from the sections took their turn, and said: "If, within two or three hours, the jury is not nominated, and the jurymen ready to act, great misfortunes will stalk throughout Paris."

This last threat compelled the Assembly to obey. The Deputies noted the creation of an extraordinary tribunal. On August 17 the demand was made. On August 19 the Tribunal was created. On August 20 the Tribunal was organized, and condemned a Royalist to death. On the evening of August 21 this man, upon whom sentence had been passed the previous day, was executed, in Carrousel Square, by torch-light.

The effect of this first execution was terrible, — so terrible, that the executioner himself could not stand it. At the very moment when he was exhibiting to the people the head of the victim of this first execution, which was to lead the way in so long a procession of funereal wagons, the headsman uttered a scream, allowed the head to roll upon the pavement, and then fell backwards. His aids lifted him. He was dead.

CHAPTER XXIII.

THE SANGUINARY REVOLUTION.

THE Revolution of 1789, that is to say, the Revolution of Necker, Sieyès, and Bailly, ended in 1790. The Revolution of Barnave, Mirabeau, and Lafayette ended in 1792. The great Revolution, the bloody Revolution, the Revolution of Danton, Marat, and Robespierre, had now begun.

In placing side by side the names of the last three men, we do not wish to confound them in one and the same estimate. On the contrary, to our eyes, they represent, in their very distinct individuality, the three faces of the three years which were to follow.

Danton's embodiment was the year 1792; Marat's was the year 1793; and Robespierre's was the year 1794.

Moreover, as events succeeded one another so rapidly, let us glance at these events. Let us examine the means by which the National Assembly and the Commune sought respectively to prevent or to accelerate these events.

Besides, we have nearly encroached upon the domain of history. All but a few of our personages have already foundered in the Revolutionary storm.

What has become of the three brothers Charny, George, Isidore, and Oliver? They are dead! What has happened to the Queen and Andreé? They are prisoners. Lafayette, — where is he? He is in exile.

On August 17 Lafayette succeeded, through a skilful manœuvre, in directing the army towards Paris, in order to re-establish there the Constitution, defeat the work of August 10, and restore the King.

Lafayette, that loyal man, lost his wits, like the rest of them. His intention was to lead the Prussians and the Austrians directly into Paris. The army rejected him instinctively; just as they repulsed Dumouriez eight months later.

History would have coupled together the names of these two men, — we might say, chained them together, — if Lafayette, detested as he was by the Queen, had not had the good fortune to be arrested by the Austrians and sent to Olmutz. His captivity caused his desertion to be forgotten.

On August 18 Lafayette crossed the frontier. On August 21 the enemies of France, those allies of royalty, against whom the massacre of August 10 was aimed, and against whom the outbreak of September 2 was also to be directed, — those Austrians whom Marie Antoinette summoned to her assistance, on a certain clear night, when the moon, in shining through the panes of the Queen's chamber, poured a bright light upon her bed, — those Austrians invested the town of Longwy. After twenty-four hours' bombardment, Longwy surrendered.

The day preceding this capture, there was a revolt in the Vendée, at the other extremity of France. The required ecclesiastical oath furnished the pretext for this upheaval.

The Assembly met these events by nominating Dumouriez Commander of the Army in the East, and ordering the arrest of Lafayette.

The Assembly voted, that as soon as the city of Longwy should again be in the power of the French Nation, all the houses, except national buildings, should be destroyed, levelled with the ground. A law was also enacted, banishing from the land every priest who had not taken the Constitutional oath. Domiciliary visits were authorized; and it was ordered that the property of refugees should be confiscated and sold.

What was the Communal Council doing meanwhile? We have said that Marat was its oracle. The Commune was attending to the guillotine on Carrousel Square. They had one head a day. This seems little enough now; but, in a book published towards the end of August, the members of the Tribunal explained the enormous task they imposed upon themselves in order to obtain this result, — unsatisfactory as it might be. This publication was signed by Fouquier Tinville.

See what the Commune was dreaming about. By-and-by we may assist at the realization of that dream.

It was on the evening of August 23 that the Commune put forth its prospectus. Followed by a mob picked up from the gutters of the faubourgs and the markets, a deputation from the Commune presented itself, towards midnight, before the Assembly.

What did it demand? That the Orleans prisoners should be brought to Paris to be executed.

Well, the Orleans prisoners had not yet been tried. What mattered it? This was a simple formality with which the Commune could well afford to dispense. Moreover, there was the memorial of August 10, which would come to the aid of this project.

Sergent, the artist, was to organize this lugubrious memorial, as he had already put upon the stage the procession which proclaimed the country's peril; and we know whether or not he succeeded in his efforts on that memorable occasion.

On this occasion, Sergent surpassed himself. The thing to be done was to fill with mourning, with vengeance, with deathly sorrow, the hearts of all those who, on August 10, had lost any one dear to them.

In front of the guillotine, which was in operation on Carrousel Square, Sergent erected, in the midst of the great basin of the Tuileries, a gigantic pyramid, covered all over with black serge. Upon each side were inscribed the names of massacres with which the Royalists could be reproached, — the massacres of Nancy, Nismes, Montauban, and the Champ de Mars.

The guillotine was saying I kill! The pyramid seemed to respond : Keep on killing!

It was on Sunday evening, August 27, five days after the priestly insurrection in Vendée, — and four days after the surrender of Longwy, whereof General Clerfayt had just taken possession in the name of King Louis Sixteenth, — that this expiatory procession put itself into motion, in order to take advantage of the mysterious majesty wherewith darkness endows all things.

Through the clouds of incense, burning all along the route, could be seen, first the widows and orphans, left by the massacre of August 10. They were dressed in white robes, their waists girded with black sashes. They carried, in a structure built after the model of an antique arch, the petition dictated by Madame Roland, and copied upon the Patriot Altar, by Mademoiselle de Kéralio. These bloody sheets were collected again, scattered, as they had been, over the Champ de Mars ; and ever since July 17, 1791, they had been calling for a Republic.

Then came some huge, black coffins, recalling those overcrowded wagons which, on the evening of August 10, were piled with corpses in the Tuileries courtyards, and took their way towards the faubourgs.

Next came the ensigns of mourning and vengeance, demanding death for death.

Then came Law, — a colossal statue, bearing a sword at her side, — followed by the Judges of the Courts. At their head marched the special Revolutionary Tribunal, — the Tribunal which asked to be excused for causing only one head to fall each day.

Then came the Communal Council, the bloody mother of that blood-stained Tribunal.

In the Councillor ranks was a statue of Liberty, of the same size as the statue of Law.

Finally came the members of the Assembly, wearing those civic crowns which may console the dead, but are so insufficient for the living!

The procession advanced majestically, in the midst of sombre chants by Chénier, and of gloomy music by Gossec, — marching with similar steady steps.

Part of the night of August 27 was spent in the performance of this expiatory ceremony, the funereal feast of the multitude, during which the crowd, shaking their fists at the empty Tuileries, were threatening the prisons, those strongholds of security which had been given to the King and the Royalists, in exchange for their châteaux.

When the last lamps were extinguished, and the last torches reduced to smoke, the people retired.

The two statues of Law and Liberty remained alone, to guard the immense sarcophagus; but, as nobody paid any attention to them, it happened, either through imprudence or sacrilege, that during the night the two statues were despoiled of their lower garments; and on the day following, the two poor goddesses were less than women.

On beholding this sight the populace uttered a wild scream. They accused the Royalists, ran to the Assembly, called for vengeance, took possession of the statues, dressed them anew, and finally dragged them, by way of reparation, to Louis Fifteenth Square. At a later day the scaffold followed these images to this square, and gave them, on January 21, a terrible satisfaction for the outrage of August 28.

On that very day, August 28, the Assembly voted the law in regard to household inspection.

The report began to spread among the people, of a junction of the Prussian and Austrian armies, and of the capture of Longwy by General Clerfayt. Thus the enemies, summoned by the King, the nobles, and the priests, were marching upon Paris. If nothing arrested their progress, they could reach the capital in about six forced marches.

What would then happen to Paris, which was boiling like a crater, and whose eruptions, during the last three years, had made themselves felt throughout the world? There would happen what Bouillé's famous letter predicted. That insolent joke, which created so much laughter, might now become a reality, — "not one stone should remain upon another."

There was talk, as of something sure to come, of a Great and General Judgment, terrible and inexorable, — a judgment which, after destroying Paris, would destroy the Parisians also. In what manner and by whom was this judgment to be administered? The writings of those days will show us. The blood-stained hand of the Commune was in that legend, which, instead of relating to the past, referred to the future.

What reasons have we for not believing that legend? The following statement appeared in a letter found in the Tuileries on August 10, which we ourselves have read in the Public Archives, where it can still be seen :

Tribunals come in the wake of armies. The Council of Refugees, along the road, and in the camp of the King of Prussia, are arraigning the Jacobins, and preparing their gibbets.

When the Prussian and Austrian armies arrived at Paris, the trials would take place, judgments would be rendered, and all that remained to do would be to execute the sentences.

In order to confirm what was said in this letter, the following was printed in the official bulletin of the War Department.

The Austrian cavalry, in the neighborhood of Sarrelouis, have captured the Patriot mayors and all known Republicans.

The Uhlans, having taken some municipal officers, cut off their ears, and nailed them to their foreheads.

If such acts were perpetrated in the inoffensive provinces, how would the conquerors behave towards Revolutionary Paris? What they would do was no longer a secret.

Listen to the report which was spreading itself, which was reported in public places, and which radiated from each centre, till it reached the most distant parts of the city! A large throne was to be built for the allied kings, in sight of the heap of ruins where once stood Paris. The entire captive population was to be driven, badgered, hunted, and brought to the foot of this throne. There, as in the day of the Last Judgment, there was to be a separation of the good from the evil, the sheep from the goats. The good — that is, the Royalists, the nobles, the priests — would be sent to the right, and France restored to them, that they might do with it whatever they pleased. The bad — that is, the followers of the Revolutionists — would go to the left, and there the guillotine would await them, — that instrument invented by the Revolution, through which the Revolution was finally to perish.

The Revolution, — that is to say, France. No, the Revolution was not France alone, for that would mean little. Nations were to serve as holocausts sacrificed to ideas. The Revolution was not so much France, as the ideal of France.

Why was France first in pronouncing the word liberty in Europe? She believed that she was proclaiming something holy, — light for the eyes and life for the soul. She proclaimed: "Liberty for France! Liberty for Europe! Liberty for all!" She thought she was acting nobly, in trying to emancipate the world; but in this she was apparently mistaken.

Behold, God put her in the wrong. Providence was against her! Believing herself innocent and sublime, she was culpable and infamous! Intent on a good action, she had committed a crime! Therefore was she to be judged, condemned, decapitated, and dragged to the Gehenna of the universe; and the universe, for whose salvation she died, would applaud her execution. Thus Jesus, crucified for the world's salvation, died amidst the jeers and insults of that world!

In order to oppose the foreign invader, must this poor Nation rely alone upon herself? Those whom she had adored, whom she had enriched, whom she had paid, would they not perhaps defend her? No!

Her King conspired with the enemy. From the Temple, where he was imprisoned, he continued to correspond with the Prussians and Austrians. Her nobles were marching against her, organized by her princes. Her priests had instigated revolt among the peasants.

In their prison depths the Royalists clapped their hands over the reverses of France. The Prussian success at Longwy raised a cry of joy in the Temple and the Abbaye.

No wonder that Danton, a man of extreme resolutions, entered the Assembly like a roaring lion. The Minister of Justice believed justice to be powerless, and came to ask for strength. Justice then must be backed by force.

Danton ascended the rostrum, and shook his lion's mane. Extending that powerful hand, which, on August 10, broke open the doors of the Tuileries, he said: "We must have a National Convention. That will cause the despots to retreat. So far we have only had a sham war. We must no longer be entertained by such miserable play. The people must fling themselves upon their enemies, attack them in a body, and exterminate them at one blow. At the same time conspirators must be bound, to keep them out of mischief."

Danton demanded a general levy, domiciliary visits, nocturnal investigations, and the proclamation of the death-penalty against whomsoever should lay obstacles in the way of the Provisional Government.

Danton received all he asked for. Had he demanded more, he would have received it in like manner.

Let us listen to Michelet:

> Never had a people come so near death. When Holland, seeing Louis Fourteenth at its doors, had no other resource except inundation, in order to drown herself, she was in less danger; for Holland had Europe on her side. When Athens saw the throne of Xerxes on the rock of Salamis, — when, spurning the ground, she dived into the sea, and had only water for her country, — she was in less danger; for she was wholly in her fleet, which was powerfully organized in the hands of the great Themistocles. More fortunate than France, Athens had no treachery in her bosom.

France was disorganized, disintegrated, betrayed, sold, delivered! France was, like Iphigenia, under the knife of Calchas. The encircling kings awaited only her death, in order that the wind of despotism might fill their sails. She, poor France, extended her arms to the gods, but the gods were mute!

At last, when she felt the cold hand of death upon her, she roused herself by a violent and terrible contraction. Then, like a living volcano, she sent forth, from her very heart, that flame which has since enlightened the world for half a century.

It is true there is a spot of blood on the sun of France, — the blood-spot of September 2. We shall soon come to that, and see who then caused blood to flow anew, and whether or not the blame can be laid at the door of France.

Before entering upon this investigation, let us once more borrow from Michelet, and close this chapter with two of his pages. We are powerless in the presence of this giant subject, and, like Danton, call strength to our rescue. Who can speak like this Past Master in History? Listen!

Paris had the appearance of a stronghold, and seemed more like Lille or Strasbourg. Regulations, sentinels, military precautions, — premature to be sure, — were to be encountered everywhere. The enemy was still at a distance of fifty or sixty leagues. More serious, most affecting of all things, was the sentiment of profound and admirable solidarity, which revealed itself everywhere.

Each addressed himself to all, and spoke and prayed for the country. Each became a recruiting-officer, and went from house to house, offering a uniform, arms, — whatever else he possessed, — to any one who could enlist. Every man became an orator, — preached, talked, sang patriotic songs.

Who did not become an author in that peculiar moment? Who did not print? Who did not publish?

The most ingenuous scenes, in which every one took part, were enacted everywhere, — on public squares, in the enrolment-places, on the platforms where the names were registered.

All around there were songs, cries, tears of enthusiasm or farewell. Above all these voices, one great voice was resounding in all hearts, — a voice so much the more profound for being silent. It was the voice of France herself, eloquent in all its symbols, pathetic even in the most tragical of these symbols, — the flag, sacred and terrible, announcing the country's danger, a flag waving from the windows of the Hôtel de Ville, an immense flag, streaming to the winds, and seeming to invite the popular legions to march in haste from the Pyrenees to the Scheldt, from the Seine to the Rhine!

In order to appreciate the full significance of that moment of sacrifice, we must look into each cottage, into each home, and see the pain of the women, the travail of the mothers in this second childbirth, a hundred times more terrible than that in which those children first came from beneath the bleeding heart. We must see the old women, with dry eyes and broken hearts, gathering hastily the few garments which their boys will carry with them, and the poor earnings, the pennies saved by fasting, which the mothers have stolen from themselves for their sons, against that day of the last agony.

To give up their children to that war which was opening so hopelessly, to sacrifice them in that extreme and hopeless situation, was more than most of the mothers could do. They sank under the sorrow which oppressed them; or, by a natural reaction, they fell into fits of madness They ate nothing, feared nothing. No terror can lay hold upon such a state of mind. What terror can there be for one who invokes death?

We are told that one day, doubtless in August or September, a band of these furious women met Danton in the street, and insulted him as they would have insulted Death himself. They said he was responsible for the whole Revolution, for all the blood which had been shed, for the death of their children.

They cursed him and scratched him. They prayed that God would cause all the blame to fall upon Danton. He was not surprised; and although he felt traces of their finger-nails all over his body, he turned around briskly, looked upon those women, and pitied them. Danton had a great heart. He climbed upon a post, and began to insult them in their own language, in order to comfort them. His first words were violent, ludicrous, obscene. His hearers were astounded. His fury, real or simulated, disconcerted them.

For the groundwork of his popularity, this prodigious orator, keen and calculating, had a sensual and strong temperament, specially adapted to amativeness, a temperament in which flesh and blood were uppermost. Danton was, before and above all things, manly. There was in him a mixture of the lion and the bulldog, and also a good deal of the bull. His physiognomy was frightful. The sublime ugliness of his turbulent face lent to his speech, quick, darting, and fitful, a sort of savage sting. The masses, who love strength, felt, in his presence, that fear and sympathy which every powerful and generative being is capable of awaking. Underneath that violent and rough exterior, a heart could be felt.

At last a doubt arose in the minds of all whether this terrible fellow, who spoke only by threats, was not, after all, a brave man at heart. These women, arrayed against him, felt all this confusedly, and allowed themselves to be harangued and mastered. He led them where and how he chose. He rudely explained to them what women were good for, the purpose of passion, the object of procreation. He argued that one does not bear children for one's self, but for one's country

When he reached this point, he suddenly raised himself, and spoke as if no one were listening but himself. His whole heart, it is said, seemed to bound out of his breast, in words of violent tenderness for France. Upon that strange face, — pitted by smallpox, and resembling the ashes of Vesuvius and of Ætna, — there appeared two big drops; and they were tears!

The women could resist no longer. They wept for France, instead of weeping for their children Hiding their faces with their aprons, they ran away crying

Oh thou great historian whom we call Michelet, where art thou? At Nervi!

Oh thou great poet, called Victor Hugo, where art thou? At the Isle of Jersey.

CHAPTER XXIV.

THE EVE OF SEPTEMBER SECOND.

"WHEN the country is in danger," said Danton in the National Assembly, on August 28, 1792, "everything belongs to the country."

On August 29, at four in the afternoon, a general alarm was beaten on the drums. Everybody knew what this meant, — that the household-inspection visits were to begin.

As by the touch of a magic wand, Paris changed its aspect at the very first roll of the drum. Populous as it was, Paris all at once became a desert. Open shops were closed. Each street was surrounded and occupied by a platoon of sixty men. The barriers were guarded. The river was guarded.

At one in the morning the visits began in every house. The sectional commissioners rapped at the street door in the name of the law, and the street door was forthwith opened.

Then they rapped at the door of each suite of rooms, always in the name of the law, and these doors were also opened. Unoccupied lodgings were opened by force.

Two thousand muskets were seized, and three thousand people arrested.

Terror was wanted, and terror there was.

Out of this was born a result of which no one had dreamed, or of which some had perhaps dreamed too much.

These domiciliary visits opened to the poor the abodes of the rich. The armed men from the sections, who followed the magistrates, gazed with amazement upon the silk and gold magnificence of the mansions still inhabited by their owners, as well as those from which the proprietors were absent. Out of this circumstance was developed, not a desire for booty, but an increase of hatred.

So little pillaging was done, that Beaumarchais, who was in prison at the time, relates that a woman plucked a rose in his splendid gardens on the Saint Antoine Boulevard, and that the rabble wished to throw her into the water for the offence.

Note that this took place while the Communal Council was voting to punish silver-brokers with death.

This Commune was already usurping the functions of the Assembly, and ordaining capital punishment. The Commune gave to Chaumette the right to open the prisons and free the prisoners. It arrogated to itself the privilege of pardon. It ordered that to the door of each prison should be affixed a list of the prisoners confined there. This was an appeal to hatred and revenge; for every one took special note of the cell in which some personal antagonist was confined.

The Assembly saw into what a ditch all this must lead. In spite of itself, the Assembly would be compelled to imbrue its hands in blood. Who was doing this? Its enemy, the Commune.

Only an occasion was wanting for the contest to break forth angrily between the two ruling powers. This opportunity was amply furnished by a fresh exploit on the part of the Commune.

On August 29, the day appointed for household visits, the Commune, on account of an article in his journal, summoned to its bar Girey Dupré, — one of the boldest Girondists, because one of the youngest.

Having no time to flee to the Assembly, Girey Dupré took refuge at the War Secretary's Office. Huguenin, President of the Commune, had the office surrounded, in order to take the Girondist editor by force.

The Girondists were still in the majority in the Assembly. At this insult to one of their number they roused the Deputies, and summoned President Huguenin to the bar of their Assembly.

Huguenin paid no attention to this summons from the Assembly. On August 30 the Assembly passed a decree dissolving the Communal Council.

One fact proves that this decree of the Assembly derived strong support from the popular horror of theft.

A member of the Communal Council, or a man so styling himself, broke into the Garde Meuble, and stole a little silver cannon, a gift of the City of Paris to Louis Fourteenth, when a child.

Cambon, who had been appointed Guardian of the Public Treasures, heard of this theft, and summoned the accused man to the bar of the Assembly. The man denied nothing, and did not offer an excuse, but contented himself with saying that, as this precious object was in danger of being stolen, he thought it would be better off in his hands than anywhere else.

The tyranny of the Commune weighed heavily upon many people, and seemed a hindrance. Louvet, a man famous for courageous proposals, was President of the Rue Lombard Section. He declared publicly, in his district, that the General Council of the Commune was guilty of usurpation.

Finding themselves thus sustained, the Deputies voted, that as Municipal President Huguenin would not come voluntarily to their bar, he should be brought forcibly; and that within twenty-four hours a new Council must be chosen by the sections.

This decree was passed on August 30, at five in the afternoon.

Let us count the hours, for now we are nearing the massacre of September 2. Every minute we may see a step taken by that bloody goddess called Terror, — her hair bristling, her eyes gory, and her arms writhing.

Though not quite logical in so doing, the Assembly voted that the Commune had done the country some meritorious service, even while its dissolution was decreed; for the Assembly still cherished some fear of this redoubtable foe.

Ornandum, tollendum! was Cicero's word concerning Octavius Cæsar. The Commune did as Octavius did. It would let itself be crowned, but would not let itself be driven away.

Two hours after the passage of this vote, Tallien, the little scribbler who prided himself on being Danton's man, and was Secretary of the Commune, proposed to the Thernes Section to march against the Lombard Section.

This meant civil war indeed, — not of the populace against the King, of the lower class against the upper, of plebeians aganst aristocrats, of cottages against castles, of houses against palaces, but of sections against sections, pikes against pikes, citizens against citizens.

Meanwhile Marat and Robespierre lifted up their voices, — the latter as a member of the Commune, the former as an outside amateur.

Marat demanded the massacre of the National Assembly. That was nothing. It was not unusual to hear him make such proposals.

Robespierre, the cautious, catlike Robespierre, — the vague and subtile denouncer, demanded that they should take up arms, not only for defence, but for attack. He must have felt that the Commune was very strong, or he would not have dared to speak in this way.

It was strong indeed; for that very night Secretary Tallien betook himself to the Assembly with three thousand pikemen.

This is what he wrote:

The Commune, and the Commune alone, has raised the members of the Assembly to their present rank as the representatives of a free people. The Commune passed the edict against obstreperous priests, and arrested those men upon whom nobody else dared lay a finger. Before many days the Commune will purge a free soil of their presence.

On the night between August 30 and 31, in the very presence of the Assembly which had voted to dissolve it, the Commune spoke the first word of slaughter.

Whose special mouth uttered the first syllable? Who threw out this blood-red programme, which was as yet unprinted?

As we have seen, it was Tallien, the man who later brought about the Ninth Thermidor.

We must do the Assembly the justice to say that it was aroused. Manuel, the Municipal Solicitor, saw that the Commune was going too far. He had Tallien arrested, and demanded that Huguenin should make reparation to the Assembly.

Meanwhile, although Manuel arrested Tallien, and demanded that Huguenin should apologize, yet he foresaw what was sure to happen. Listen to what was done by this poor pedant, with his small brain and honest heart.

In the Abbaye was Manuel's personal enemy, of Beaumarchais. Beaumarchais was a great jester, and his shafts had hit Manuel. It came into Manuel's head that if Beaumarchais was butchered with the others, this murder might be attributed to some low spite on Manuel's part. He ran to the Abbaye and called for Beaumarchais. The prisoner, on seeing him, began to offer some explanations to the victim of his literary raillery.

"This is no question of literature, of journalism, or of criticism. There is the open door! Save yourself to-day, if you don't wish to have your throat cut to-morrow!"

So spake Manuel. The author of "The Barber of Seville" and "Figaro's Marriage" did not wait for a second bidding. He slipped through the open door, and disappeared.

Suppose he had hissed Collot d'Herbois the actor, instead of criticising Manuel the author, then Beaumarchais would have been a dead man!

The Thirty-first of August arrived, the great day which was to decide between the Assembly and the Commune, — that is, between Moderation and Terror.

The Commune decided to hold its position at any price. The Assembly was willing to dissolve in favor of a new Assembly.

The Commune naturally wished to take the lead, especially as the times were most favorable to municipal ascendency.

The populace, without knowing whither they wished to go, were ready to go anywhere. Having been let loose on June 20, and having gone still farther on August 10, they now felt an undefined hunger for blood and destruction.

Marat on one side, and Hébert on the other, were stirring up the public mind.

They did not go so far as Robespierre, who was desirous of regaining his shaken popularity. All France had desired war. Robespierre counselled peace. Though not a novelist, he surpassed the most absurd novel by the extravagance of his gossipy mare's nests. He declared that a powerful party had offered the French throne to the Duke of Brunswick.

Who were the three strong parties engaged in this contest? The Assembly, the Commune, the Jacobins; and the Jacobins and the Communists might fairly be regarded as one party.

Certainly the Jacobins did not want Brunswick, and neither did the Communists. Indeed, Robespierre was a member of the club, and also of the Communal Council; and he surely did not mean to criminate himself.

Were the Girondists the powerful party who wanted Brunswick to rule over them?

We have said that Robespierre surpassed the most absurd romancers by his stories. What more ridiculous than to suppose the Girondists would declare war against Prussia and Austria, and then offer a throne to the opposing general?

Who were the men whom Robespierre accused of this absurdity? Such men as Roland, Vergniaud, Clavières, Servan, Gensonné, Guadet, Barbaroux, — the warmest Patriots, and at the same time the most honest men in France.

There are times when a man like Robespierre can say anything. Worse still, there are times when the people will believe anything. Such a time was August 31. If a physician that day had kept his finger on the pulse of France, he would have felt its pulsations rising every minute.

On the thirtieth at five in the evening, the Assembly, as we have said, voted the dissolution of the Communal Council. The decree provided that within twenty-four hours the sections should appoint a new Council.

By five o'clock on the afternoon of the thirty-first this decree was to be put in force; but Marat's outcries, Hébert's menaces, and Robespierre's slanders made the old Council press so heavily upon Paris, that the sections dared not vote for a new Council. As an excuse for this neglect, they said that the decree had never been officially announced.

Towards noon, on August 31, the Assembly was notified that its decree of the day previous would not probably be obeyed. This necessitated an appeal to force, and who could say what force might do for the Assembly?

Through Panis, who was his brother-in-law, Santerre adhered to the Commune. Panis, it may be remembered, was a fanatical admirer of Robespierre, who once proposed to Barbaroux and Rebecqui to appoint a dictator, and gave them to understand that they needed such a dictator as the Incorruptible.

Santerre represented the faubourgs, and theirs was the irresistible power of the ocean. It was the men of the faubourgs who had broken down the gates of the Tuileries. They could also break down the doors of the Assembly.

The Deputies feared, if they took up arms against the Commune, not only that they might be abandoned by extreme Patriots, by those who wished for the Revolution at any price, but also, — and this was worse, — that they might be poorly sustained by moderate Royalists. In that case the Assembly would be wholly lost.

About six o'clock it was rumored among the benches that there was a great tumult at the Abbaye Prison.

A certain Monsieur de Montmorin had just been acquitted. It was popularly believed that he was the same man who, as cabinet-minister, signed the passport with which Louis Sixteenth tried to escape from France. The populace went in a mass to the prison, and noisily demanded the death of the traitor.

Every effort was made to undeceive the people, but all night long there was a frightful fermentation throughout the city.

It was easily seen, next day, that the slightest event might increase this excitement to gigantic proportions.

This event happened in the Châtelet Prison; and we will try to describe it in all its details, because it refers to one of the personages of our history of whom we have lost sight for a long time.

CHAPTER XXV.

IN WHICH WE ONCE MORE ENCOUNTER OUR FRIEND, MONSIEUR DE BEAUSIRE.

IMMEDIATELY after August 10 a special commission was instituted to take cognizance of the thefts committed at the Tuileries. The populace had done well, according to Peltier, in shooting two or three hundred robbers, taken in the very act; but there were as many others, as may be easily understood, who for a time were able to conceal their plunder.

Among these honorable and industrious men was to be found our old acquaintance, Monsieur de Beausire, formerly a subordinate officer in the royal service.

Knowing the antecedents of Mademoiselle Olivia's lover, the father of young Toussaint, our readers need not be astonished at thus finding him among those who had an account to settle, not with the Nation, but with the courts, for the part they had taken in the sack of the Tuileries.

Like all the rest of the world, Beausire went to the palace. He was a man of too much sense to commit the blunder of being the first, or even one of the first, to enter a place which it was perilous to enter among the earliest comers.

It was not Monsieur de Beausire's political opinions which brought him to the royal palace. He came neither to lament the downfall of royalty, nor to rejoice in the triumph of the people. No! Monsieur de Beausire came as an outsider, looking down, from a loftier altitude, upon those weaknesses which men call their opinions. He had but one purpose, — to see if those who had lost a throne had not also dropped some more portable jewel, easily carried away to a place of safety.

To save appearances, Beausire wore the red cap, and was armed with an enormous sabre. He also slightly stained his shirt, and wet his hands in the blood of the first dead man he ran across. Like a wolf in the wake of a conquering host, or a vulture swooping over a battle-field after the fight, a superficial observer might have mistaken him for one of the victors.

Indeed he was generally mistaken for a conqueror, by those who heard him shouting, "Death to Royalists!" and saw him zealously searching under the beds, opening closets and even bureau drawers, in order to be sure that no contracted aristocrat was concealed therein.

Unluckily for Beausire, another man was there at the same time,— a man who did not shout, who did not grope beneath the beds, who did not open the cupboards, but who came in amidst the fire, although unarmed, along with the conquerors; though he had vanquished nobody, and was now promenading with his hands behind his back, as cool and collected, in his neat black suit, as if he were taking the air in a public garden on a holiday. Now and then this man would exclaim: "Don't forget, Citizens, that you are not to kill the women nor touch the trinkets."

To those whom he saw slaughtering men and throwing furniture out of the windows, this onlooker evidently thought he had no right to speak. At the first glance he noted Beausire as not belonging to the belligerent class.

About half-past nine Pitou — who, as we already know, had obtained, as a post of honor, the guardianship of the Clock Vestibule — saw coming towards him, from the interior of the palace, a dismal sort of giant, who said to him politely, but at the same time firmly, as if he were commissioned to bring order out of disorder, and substitute justice for vengeance: "Captain, you will see a man coming downstairs, with a red cap on his head and a sabre in his hand, making all sorts of frantic gestures. You will have him arrested and searched by your men. He has stolen a casket of diamonds."

"Yes, Monsieur Maillard," answered Pitou, touching his hat.

"Ah ha!" said the old usher, "you know me, do you, my friend?"

"I think I do know you! Don't you remember, Monsieur Maillard, how we took the Bastille together?"

"Possibly!" said Maillard.

"Then once we were at Versailles together, in the turmoil."

"I was certainly there!"

"You were conducting some ladies, and you had a sort of a duel at the gate of the Tuileries, with a sentinel who would n't let you pass."

"Then you will do what I now bid you, will you not?"

"That, and anything else you may command, Monsieur Maillard! Ah, you 're a Patriot, you are!"

"I 'm proud of it," said Maillard, "and that is why we ought not to allow the name to be disgraced. Attention! Here 's our man!"

At that moment Beausire was coming down the stairway into the vestibule, flourishing his great sabre, and yelling, "Long life to the Nation!"

Pitou made a sign to Tellier and Maniquet, who quietly placed themselves before the door, while Pitou waited for Beausire on the lower stair.

Beausire saw this arrangement of things, and doubtless was troubled thereby; for he paused, as if he had forgotten something, and started to go upstairs again.

"Excuse me, Citizen," said Pitou, "this is the way out."

"Ah, this is the way out?"

"And as orders have been given to evacuate the Tuileries, you will come this way, if you please."

Beausire straightened himself, and resumed his way down. At the last step he stopped, touched his red cap, and said, in an affected military tone: "How is it, comrade, am I to go out or not?"

"You 're to go out; but everybody must submit to a little formality."

"Ah! And what is that, my fine officer?"

"To be searched, Citizen!"

"Searched?"

"Yes!"

"Search a Patriot, a victor, a man who comes here to exterminate the aristocrats?"

"Such is the order! So, my comrade, if you are a comrade, sheathe your big sword, — it is useless, now that the aristocrats are killed! — and let yourself be searched willingly; or else I shall be compelled to employ force."

"Force? Ah ha! Thou speakest like that, because thou hast twenty men at thy back; but if we were man to man — !"

"If we were man to man, Citizen, this is what I would do. I should grasp thee, — so! — thy wrist with my right fist. I should wrench thy sabre from thee with my left hand, and snap it under my foot, as not being worthy the touch of an honest man, after being handled by a thief!"

Putting his theories into practice, Pitou held the sham

Patriot with his right hand, snatched his sword away with his left, broke the blade under his foot, and threw the handle away.

"A thief!" cried the man in the red cap, "a thief! I, Monsieur de Beausire!"

"My friends," said Pitou, pushing the ex-gendarme into the midst of his men, "search this Monsieur de Beausire!"

"Well, search!" said the fellow, bracing his arms like a martyr.

They needed no permission from Beausire to proceed in their examination; but to Pitou's great surprise, and above all to Maillard's, though they searched the ex-gendarme thoroughly, turning his pockets inside out, inspecting every crevice, they found nothing on him but eleven sous, except a playing-card, whose figures were so blurred with age as to be scarcely visible.

Pitou looked at Maillard. The latter shrugged his shoulders, as much as to say: "What can you expect?"

"Begin again!" said Pitou, one of whose leading qualities, as we may remember, was patience.

The men obeyed, but the second search was as fruitless as the first. They found only the same old card and the same eleven sous.

Beausire was triumphant, and said: "Well, do you still think a sabre dishonored by my touch?"

"No, Monsieur," said Pitou; "and in proof of my sincerity, if you are not satisfied with the apologies which I make you, one of my men will lend you his sword, and I will give you any other satisfaction you please."

"Thanks, young man!" said Beausire. "You have acted according to orders, and an old soldier like myself knows that an order is sacred. Meanwhile Madame de Beausire will be anxious on account of my long absence, and if may be allowed to retire —"

"Go, Monsieur," said Pitou. "You are free!"

Beausire bowed with an indifferent air, and took himself off. Pitou looked for Maillard. Maillard was not there.

"Did you see Monsieur Maillard go away?" he asked.

"It seems to me," said one of the Haramont Guardsmen, "that I saw him go upstairs again."

"It seems to me," said Pitou, "that I see him coming down again."

Sure enough, Maillard was coming down the stairs. Thanks to his long legs, he touched only every other stair, and was soon in the vestibule.

"Well," said he, "did you find anything else?"

"No," replied Pitou.

"Then I am more fortunate, for I have found the casket!"

"Then we were wrong!"

"No, we were right!"

Opening the casket, Maillard drew out some gold settings, from which all the precious stones had been extracted.

"What does that mean?" said Pitou.

"That means that this fellow anticipated a search, took out the diamonds, thought the settings might bother him, and so threw them and the casket back into the drawer, where I have just found them."

"Good!" said Pitou. "And the diamonds?"

"Well, he found some means to dispose of them."

"Ah, the robber!"

"Has he been gone long?" asked Maillard.

"As you came down he went through the gate of the Central Courtyard."

"Which side did he take?"

"He was heading towards the river."

"Adieu, Captain!"

"Are you going, Monsieur Maillard?"

"I want to relieve my mind," said the old usher; and stretching his long legs like a pair of compasses, he set out in pursuit of Beausire.

Pitou remained absorbed in thought over what had passed; and he was still burdened by his cogitation when he recognized Madame de Charny, and those events followed which we set down in their proper place, not judging it well to complicate them with this incident of the theft, which it seemed to us would come in better at a different point.

CHAPTER XXVI.

THE PURGATIVE.

Though Maillard's walk was so rapid, he did not overtake Beausire, who had three circumstances in his favor: first, several minutes of leeway; second, the obscurity; third, the number of people who were walking about in Carrousel Square, in whose midst Beausire had easily disappeared.

Nevertheless, having reached the Tuileries Quay, the ex-usher of the Châtelet Court did not return, but kept on his road. He lived in the Saint Antoine District, and it was but little out of his way to follow the riverside as far as the Place de Grève.

Over New Bridge and Exchange Bridge a great body of people were hurrying. There was an exposure of dead bodies on the square in front of the Palace of Justicè, and many were on their way thither in the hope, or rather the fear, of finding a brother, a relative, or some other friend. Maillard followed the crowd.

At the corner of the Rue Barillerie and Palace Square was a friend of his, — a pharmacist, as apothecaries were then denominated. Maillard entered his friend's shop, and chatted with him about current events, while surgeons were going and coming, obtaining from the druggist bandages, ointment, lint, — in fact all sorts of things necessary for dressing wounds; for among the dead was heard now and then a cry, a groan, a gasp, which indicated the presence of life; and then the victim was at once drawn out from the companionship of the dead, and sent to the great hospital called Hôtel Dieu.

There was a good deal of bustle in the drug-store, but Maillard was not in the way. Moreover a Patriot of Maillard's stamp was always welcome, even at such a time; for his reputation was like a balm, both in the old Cité and in the faubourgs.

He had been there some fifteen minutes, his long legs drawn up under him so as to make himself as small as possible, when a woman came in, — a woman perhaps thirty-seven or thirty-eight years old, who, beneath an appearance of abject poverty, preserved a certain air of former opulence, with traces of aristocracy, either natural or assumed.

What specially struck Maillard was the strange likeness of this woman to the Queen. He would have uttered a cry of astonishment, had he not exercised over himself the self-control we have before noted.

By the hand she held a little boy, eight or nine years old. She approached the counter with some timidity, concealing her poverty-stricken attire as well as she could, which was all the more noticeable, because of the care she bestowed, even in her distress, upon her face and hands.

So numerous were the customers, that it was a long time before she could get any attention. At last she addressed the master of the establishment: "Monsieur, I wish to get a purgative for my husband, who is ill."

"What sort of a purgative do you wish, Citizeness?" asked the apothecary.

"Whatever you please, Monsieur, provided it costs no more than eleven sous."

This odd sum of eleven sous struck Maillard. Eleven sous was precisely the sum found, it will be recollected, in Beausire's pocket.

"Why must it not cost over eleven sous?" asked the apothecary.

"Because that's all the money my husband was able to give me."

"Make up a mixture of tamarinds and senna," said the apothecary to his oldest apprentice, "and give it to the lady."

The apprentice busied himself about this preparation, while the apothecary attended to other customers; but Maillard, who had nothing to distract his attention, took special notice of the woman who wanted a purgative which cost only eleven sous.

"Here is your medicine, Madame," said the apprentice.

"Here, Toussaint," said the woman, with a drawl which seemed habitual, "give me the eleven sous, my child!"

"Here they are," said the youngster, laying his fistful on the edge of the counter. "Now come, Mamma Olivia, come along! Papa's waiting!" and as he spoke, he tried to draw his mother away, still repeating: "Come, come, Mamma Olivia! Come along!"

"Excuse me, Citizeness," said the apprentice, "but here are only nine sous."

"What? Only nine sous?" said the woman.

"Count them yourself!" said the apprentice.

The woman did count them. There were indeed but nine sous.

"What hast thou done with the other two sous, thou naughty boy?" she asked.

"I don't know," said the child. "Come along, Mamma Olivia!"

"Thou shouldst know, — especially as thou didst wish so much to carry the money, that I gave it to thee."

"I must have lost them! Come along!"

"You have a bright boy there, Citizeness!" said Maillard. "He appears full of intelligence, but you must take care not to let him grow up a thief."

"A thief!" said the woman, whom the little chap had called Mamma Olivia. "Why do you say that, pray?"

"Because he has not lost the two sous. They are hidden in his shoe."

"Me?" said the child. "That is n't true!"

"In the left shoe, Citizeness," said Maillard, "in the left shoe."

In spite of young Toussaint's cries, Mamma Olivia took up his left foot, and found the two sous in the shoe. She gave the two sous to the druggist's apprentice, and then dragged the child away, threatening him with a punishment which would have seemed terrible to the listeners, if she had not accompanied her threats with endearments which left no doubt that motherly tenderness would get the upperhand.

This occurrence, unimportant in itself, would certainly have passed unnoticed in the midst of so many graver events, if the woman's resemblance to the Queen had not singularly impressed Maillard.

The result of his meditation was that he went up to his friend the apothecary, in an unoccupied moment, and said: "Did you notice it?"

"What?"

"That woman's resemblance, that woman who just went out —"

"To the Queen?" said the druggist, laughing.

"Yes. You have noticed it, then?"

"A long time ago!"

"How, — long ago?"

"Certainly! The resemblance is historic."

"I don't understand."

"Don't you recall the old story of the famous necklace?"

"It is not for an old Châtelet usher to forget that affair!"

"Then you surely remember a certain Nicole Legay, sometimes called the Demoiselle Olivia."

"Ah, that 's true! She was the woman who played the part of the Queen, in relation to Cardinal Rohan, was she not?"

"And lived with a scamp who was concerned in various doubtful affairs, an ex-gendarme, — a rascal, a gambler, a spy, a backbiter, — named Beausire."

"Called what?" said Maillard, starting as if a centipede had bitten him.

"Called Beausire," repeated the apothecary.

"And this Beausire is the man she calls her husband?" asked Maillard.

"Yes!"

"And it 's for him she wanted that medicine?"

"Probably the scamp has indigestion."

"A purgative dose?" continued Maillard, like a man on the track of an important secret, who will not let himself be turned from his pursuit.

"A purgative, yes!"

"Ah, I 've found my man!" said Maillard, tapping his forehead.

"What man?"

"The eleven-sou man!"

"Who 's the eleven-sou man?"

"Good gracious, — Monsieur de Beausire!"

"You 've got him?"

"Yes, if I can find out, right away, where he lives."

"I know, if you don't!"

"Good! Where is it?"

"Number six, Rue Juiverie!"

"Near here?"

"Two steps."

"Well, that does n't surprise me!"

"What?"

"That young Toussaint stole two sous from his mother."

"What, it does n't surprise you?"

"No! He 's Beausire's boy, is n't he?"

"His living portrait!"

"A good dog is born to the chase! Come now, my dear friend," continued Maillard, "tell me, with your hand on your conscience, how long will it take your medicine to operate?"

"Seriously?"

"Very seriously!"

"Not less than two hours."

"That 's all I need. I've time enough!"

"You take an interest in Beausire?"

"So great an interest that, fearing he may not be well cared for, I shall go at once for —"

"What?"

"Two nurses! Good-bye, my friend!"

Leaving the drug-store with a quiet smile, the only sort of smile which ever lightened his lugubrious visage, Maillard retraced his steps to the Tuileries.

Pitou was absent. It will be remembered that he had gone with Andrée to find some traces of Charny. In his absence, Maillard found Tellier and Maniquet in charge of the post.

Both recognized him; and Maniquet said: "Ah, is it you, Monsieur Maillard? Well, did you overtake your man?"

"No, but I'm on his scent!"

"Faith, that's lucky!" said Tellier; "for notwithstanding we found nothing on him, I'll swear he had those diamonds."

"Lay a wager, Citizen, and you'll win."

"Good!" said Maniquet; "but can you get them back again?"

"I hope so, if you'll help."

"In what way, Citizen Maillard? We're at your orders."

Maillard beckoned the lieutenants to come nearer, and said: "Pick me out two reliable men from your company!"

"For courage?"

"For honesty!"

"Oh, take any of them." Then, turning to his men, Désiré said: "Two willing volunteers!"

A dozen men sprang up.

"That will do! Come, Boulanger!" said Maniquet. One of the men obeyed.

"Molicar, too!" A second took his place beside the first.

"Do you want another, Monsieur Maillard?" asked Tellier.

"No, two will do. Come on, my friends!"

The two Haramontese followed Maillard, who conducted them as far as the Rue Juiverie, and stopped before the house numbered six.

"Here we are!" he said. "Let us go up."

The two men went with him through the dooryard, and then up four flights of stairs. There they were guided by Monsieur Toussaint's cries, he not being quite consoled for the correction, not wholly maternal; for Monsieur de Beausire, understanding the gravity of the boy's misdeed, had believed it his duty to add several whacks, with his hard hand, to the soft pats which Mademoiselle Olivia had bestowed upon her son, and which it went against her heart to inflict.

Maillard tried to open the door. It was bolted inside. He knocked.

"Who 's there?" asked Olivia's drawling voice.

"Open, in the name of the law!" responded Maillard.

A brief dialogue in an undertone could be heard, one result whereof was that young Toussaint held his tongue, believing that the law was seeking him out, on account of the two sous he had tried to steal from his mother. Beausire attributed this interruption to the edict for domiciliary visits; and though not feeling very confident about the matter himself, he made an effort to reassure Olivia.

At last she decided to open the door, just as Maillard was about rapping for the second time. The three men entered, to the great alarm of Olivia, and also of Monsieur Toussaint, who tried to extinguish himself behind an old rattan chair.

Beausire was abed. On a lightstand, illuminated by a poor candle, smoking in an iron candlestick, Maillard beheld, with satisfaction, the empty bottle. The medicine had been swallowed. It only remained to see what the effect would be.

During their trip Maillard had related to Boulanger and Molicar what had taken place at the pharmacy, so that when they reached Beausire's apartments, they thoroughly understood the situation.

When Maillard installed his assistants on each side of the bed, he contented himself with saying to them:

"Citizens, Monsieur de Beausire is exactly in the situation of the Princess in the Arabian Nights story, who would only speak when she was forced, but dropped a diamond every time she opened her mouth. Do not let a word fall from Monsieur de Beausire, without knowing what it contains. I will go to the City Hall and wait for you. When Monsieur no longer needs your services, you can conduct him to the Châtelet, where you will say that he is sent by Citizen Maillard; and then you may bring whatever he has given you to me, at the City Hall."

The two National Guardsmen bowed, as a sign of passive obedience, and placed themselves under arms, one on each side of Beausire's couch.

The apothecary was not mistaken. At the expiration of two hours the medicine operated. Its effects continued an hour or so, and could not have been more satisfactory.

About three in the morning Maillard saw his two men come in. They brought with them a hundred thousand francs' worth of diamonds of the purest water, wrapped in a memorandum of the incarceration of Monsieur de Beausire. These diamonds were deposited at the office of the City Solicitor, in the name of Maillard and the two Haramontese, and that officer filled out a certificate, declaring that Citizens Maillard, Molicar, and Boulanger merited the thanks of their country.

CHAPTER XXVII.

THE FIRST OF SEPTEMBER.

LET us see now what grew out of the tragico-comic occurrence we have just described.

The case of Monsieur de Beausire, shut up in the Châtelet Prison, was duly referred to the special jury, appointed to take cognizance of thefts committed on August 10 and the days following.

He could not deny his guilt, which was but too clearly evident; so the prisoner was constrained to humbly confess his offence, and implore the clemency of the court.

The tribunal ordered an inquiry into Beausire's antecedents; and not being greatly edified by the information thus elicited, the court condemned the ex-gendarme to five years in the galleys, added to public exposure and branding.

In vain did Beausire urge that he had been led into this theft by the most honorable sentiments, — that is, by the hope of providing a peaceful future for his wife and child. Nothing could modify the sentence, and as the tribunal was specially constituted, there was no appeal from its decisions. So on the second day after the case was decided, the sentence was to be put into execution. Alas, that the punishment was not executed at once, and Beausire sent far away.

Fatality decreed that on the eve of the day when Beausire was to be put into the pillory, one of his old comrades was brought into the prison. The two recognized each other, and mutual confidences followed.

The new prisoner was, so he said, acquainted with a perfectly organized conspiracy, which had for its end an outbreak, either on the Place de Grève or Palace Square.

The conspirators were to assemble in large numbers, under the pretext of seeing the first public branding which was to take place, — this being done sometimes in front of the Palace of Justice and sometimes in front of the City Hall, in Place de Grève. At the watch-cries of "Long live the King! Hurrah for the Prussians! Death to the Nation!" the conspirators were to take possession of the City Hall, call to their aid the National Guards, — two-thirds of whom were Royalists or, at least, Constitutionalists, — insist upon the abolition of the Communal Council, which had been voted down by an Assembly decree of August 30, and finally effect a Counter-Revolution in favor of royalty.

Unfortunately it was Beausire's newly arrested friend who was to give the signal. As the other conspirators were ignorant of his arrest, they would of course go to the square on the day of the expected exposure of Beausire; but as there would be nobody to shout the signal, "Long live the King! Hurrah for the Prussians! Death to the Nation!" the outbreak would not take place.

This was the more to be regretted, added Beausire's friend, because no plot had ever been better arranged, or promised so sure a result.

The arrest of this friend was the more deplorable, because the condemned man could not fail to obtain his freedom in the midst of the tumult, and so escape the double penalty of the galleys and branding.

Although possessing no very decided opinions, Beausire had, at bottom, a leaning towards royalty. He therefore regretted bitterly — first for the King's sake, and secondarily for his own — that this movement could not go on.

Suddenly he smote his forehead. He was illuminated with a sudden idea; so he said to his comrade: "But this first exposure is to be of myself!"

"Undoubtedly! and I repeat, it would have been great luck for thee!"

"And thou sayest thy detention is unknown?"

"Entirely!"

"Then the conspirators will assemble just the same as if there had been no arrest?"

"Even so!"

"So if anybody gives the signal, the outbreak will follow?"

"Yes! but who will give it, when I am locked up, and can't communicate with anybody outside?"

"I will!" said Beausire, in the tone of Medea, in Corneille's tragedy.

"Thou?"

"Yes, I! I shall be there, sha'n't I, seeing that it 's my show? Very well, then, I 'll shout 'Long life to the King! Hurrah for the Prussians! and Death to the Nation!' That is n't very difficult, as it appears to me."

Beausire's comrade was transfixed with amazement and rejoined: "I always said thou wert in very truth a man of genius!"

Beausire bowed.

"If thou doest that," continued the Royalist prisoner, "not only wilt thou be freed, not only wilt thou be pardoned, but more! As I shall proclaim it abroad that the success of the plot is owing to thee, thou mayest brag in advance of a goodly recompense."

"It is not for reward that I move in this matter," said Beausire, with the most disinterested air in the world.

"That 's all right!" said his friend; "but if the reward comes, I advise thee not to refuse it!"

"If this is thy counsel — " said Beausire.

"More! I not only advise it, but I urge it! If necessary, I will command it!" insisted the friend, majestically.

"So be it," said Beausire.

"Well," resumed the friend, "to-morrow we shall breakfast together, — the superintendent of the prison will not refuse a last favor to two old comrades, — and we will drink a bottle of wine to the success of the conspiracy."

Beausire entertained some doubt as to the complaisance of the superintendent in regard to next day's breakfast; but whether he breakfasted with his friend or not, he made up his mind to keep his promise.

To their great satisfaction, the superintendent gave his consent. The two friends breakfasted together, and drank not one bottle, but two, three, four bottles.

Over the fourth bottle Monsieur de Beausire was a furious Royalist. Luckily the officers came after him, to conduct him to the Place de Grève, before the fifth bottle was uncorked.

He ascended the wagon as if it were a triumphal chariot, and looked disdainfully around upon the crowd, for whom he was preparing such a tremendous surprise.

On the parapet at Notre Dame Bridge a woman and boy were waiting for his appearance. Beausire recognized poor Olivia, bathed in tears, and also young Toussaint, who, seeing his father in the hands of the police, called out: "That 's good! Why did he pound me?"

Beausire wafted them a benignant smile; and he tried to add a gesture, which would doubtless have been full of majesty, if his hands had not been tied behind his back.

The square in front of the City Hall was crowded with people. It was known that the condemned man was expiating a crime committed at the Tuileries. Through the published accounts, everybody knew the circumstances which had accompanied and followed this theft, and there was no sympathy for the prisoner. When the wagon stopped in front of the pillory, the guard had much difficulty in keeping back the populace.

Beausire regarded this tumult and crowd with an air which plainly said: "You 'll see! This will be quite another sort of a show in a minute."

When he appeared on the platform there was one general hurrah! but when the moment of execution drew near, when the executioner unbuttoned Beausire's sleeve and exposed his naked shoulder, when he stooped to take the red-hot iron from the furnace, there came what always comes at such a time. In the presence of the supreme majesty of Justice, the world held its peace.

Beausire profited by this moment. Rallying all his strength, he called out, in a voice sonorous, loud, and penetrating: "Long live the King! Hurrah for the Prussians! Death to the Nation!"

Whatever tumult Beausire had expected, the result surpassed his hopes. They were not shouts which he elicited, but yells. The crowd uttered an immense roar and rushed upon the pillory.

This time the guard found it impossible to protect Beausire. The ranks were broken. The scaffold was invaded. The headsman was hurled down from the platform. The prisoner was wrenched from the post, nobody knew how, and thrown into the midst of that devouring ant-hill which we call the multitude.

He would have been killed, ground into mincemeat, when a man, wearing his official scarf, came running down from the porch of the City Hall, whence he had been watching the execution. This was the City Solicitor, Manuel. He had strongly humane sentiments, which he was usually constrained to lock up in his inmost breast, but which came to light under such unparalleled circumstances.

With great difficulty he made his way to Beausire, extended to him his hand, and said, in a loud voice: "In the name of the law I demand this man."

The populace hesitated about obeying him. Manuel detached his scarf, waved it above his head, and shouted: "Help, all good citizens!"

A score of men pressed about Manuel. They rescued Beausire, half-dead already, from the hands of the mob. Meanwhile the City Hall was seriously imperilled, the exasperation was so great.

Manuel appeared on the balcony and said: "This man is guilty, but he is guilty of a crime for which he has not been tried. Name a jury among yourselves. That jury shall meet in one of the rooms in this very building, and sit in judgment on this criminal. The sentence of this jury shall be carried out, whatever it may be."

Is it not singular that, on the eve of the massacres which took place in the prisons, one of the very men who has been blamed for these massacres should utter such language as this, even at the peril of his own life? This is one of the anomalies of politics, explain it who can.

This pledge appeased the throng. Fifteen minutes later the popular jury was introduced to Manuel. It was composed of twenty-one members. These twenty-one jurymen appeared on the balcony.

"Are these men your proxies?" demanded Manuel of the crowd.

By way of response the people clapped their hands.

"Very well," said Manuel, "now that we have a jury, we can have justice."

According to promise, the jury was installed in a room in the City Hall.

More dead than alive, Beausire was brought before this improvised tribunal. He tried to defend himself; but his second offence was as open as the first, and in the popular opinion it was more serious.

To shout "Long live the King!" when the King was a prisoner in the Temple; to cry "Hurrah for the Prussians!" when the Prussians had just captured Longwy, and were not over sixty leagues from Paris; to yell "Death to the Nation!" when the Nation was stretched on the rack, — these were frightful crimes, which deserved the highest penalty.

The jury decided that he was guilty, and should not only receive capital punishment, but that his death should be rendered more shameful by hanging him on the very spot where the offence had been committed, in order that he should not gain what little benefit might accrue to him through receiving only the punishment of the guillotine, which the law had just substituted for the gallows.

The hangman was therefore ordered to immediately put up a gibbet on the same scaffold where the pillory was placed.

The sight of this work going forward, and the certainty that the prisoner, who was kept in sight, could not escape, calmed the popular excitement.

We have no intention of glorifying Manuel, one of the most abused Revolutionists, but we do wish to tell the exact truth. Here is what Michelet says about this occurrence :

On September 1 a frightful scene took place in the Place de Grève. A thief, who was being branded in the pillory, and who was undoubtedly drunk, took it upon himself to shout "Long life to the King! Hurrah for the Prussians ! and Death to the Nation ! "

He was instantly torn from the pillory, and would have been torn into pieces ; but City Solicitor Manuel rushed forward, recaptured him from the hands of the populace, and took him into the City Hall.

Manuel himself was in extreme peril. He was compelled to promise that the prisoner should be judged by a jury of the people.

This jury sentenced him to death. The authorities held this sentence to be right and valid, and it was at once carried into effect, the culprit perishing next day.

This was the special event which, as we said at the close of a preceding chapter, occupied the attention of the Assembly.

The next day was Sunday, — an aggravating circumstance. The Assembly could not but see that everything tended towards another massacre. The Commune meant to maintain itself at any price. Massacre — that is, terrorism — was one of the surest means of accomplishing this result.

Retracting its decision of two days before, the Assembly repealed the decree dissolving the Commune.

Then one of the members rose and said: "It is not enough to repeal your decree. In voting that decree, only two days ago, you declared the Commune to be deserving of national gratitude. This praise is too vague; for some day you may say, that while the Commune merited the gratitude of the country, yet that such and such members of that Council were not included in the eulogy, and consequently that this or that member may be arraigned. It is necessary to say, not simply the Commune, but the representatives of the Commune."

The Assembly accordingly voted that the representatives of the Commune merited the national gratitude.

At the same time the Assembly was passing this vote, Robespierre was delivering a long speech at the Communal Council, in which he said that as the Assembly, by its infamous manœuvres, had undermined public confidence in the Commune, the Communal Council ought to retire, and do the only thing which remained for it to do, in order to save the people, — that is, to remand the power to the people.

Like all Robespierre's proposals, this was vague and indefinite, but terrible. What was the meaning of that phrase about restoring the power to the people? Did it mean that the Council should subscribe to the Assembly's decree, and ask for a new election? Probably not!

Did it mean that the Council of the Commune was to resign its legal authority, and declare, of its own accord, that the Commune, after what it had done on August 10, regarded itself as powerless to continue the great work of the Revolution, and wished the people to finish that work?

If the populace, without a curb, and with hearts full of vengeance, should undertake to continue the work begun on August 10, this would involve the slaughter of the men who had fought with them on that same August day, and had since then been imprisoned in the various prisons of Paris.

This is how matters stood on the eve of the first day of September, when the atmosphere was heavy with storm-clouds, and all felt that lightning and thunder were suspended just above their heads.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

THE NIGHT BETWEEN THE FIRST AND SECOND DAYS OF SEPTEMBER.

THIS then was the situation of things when, on September 1, at nine o'clock in the evening, Doctor Gilbert's official (the word servant had been abolished, as Anti-Republican) came into his employer's room to say: "Citizen Gilbert, the cab is at the door."

Gilbert pulled his hat over his eyes, buttoned his riding-coat up to his neck, and was ready to go out; but on the threshold there stood a man wrapped in a large cloak, his face shaded by a broad-brimmed hat.

Gilbert recoiled a step. In the darkness, and at such an epoch, anybody might be an enemy.

"It is I, Gilbert!" said a kindly voice.

"Cagliostro!" cried the Doctor.

"Even so! Only you forget that I no longer call myself Cagliostro, but Baron Zannone. However, for you, dear Gilbert, I change neither my name nor my heart, but am always — at least, so I hope — Joseph Balsamo."

"Oh yes," said Gilbert, "and the proof of it is, that I was just going to your house."

"So I suspected, and that is precisely why I am here. As you doubtless felt assured, — in such times as these I cannot do as Robespierre does, take a trip into the country."

"Yet I feared I might not meet you, and am the more glad to see you here. Come in, I beg of you."

"Certainly, here I am! Now I say, what do you want?" said Cagliostro, following Gilbert into the more retired room in his suite.

"Master, be seated," he said; and Cagliostro sat down.

"You know what is going on," resumed Gilbert.

"You mean what is to come," said Cagliostro, "for at this moment nothing in particular is taking place."

"You are right! Something terrible is on foot, is it not so?"

"Terrible indeed! Sometimes the terrible becomes the essential."

"Master, when you utter such words, with your inexorable sangfroid, you make me tremble."

"Why so? I'm but an echo, — the echo of Fate."

Gilbert lowered his head.

"Gilbert, do you recall what I told you, the day when I saw you at Bellevue, — October 6, three years ago, — when I predicted the death of the Marquis de Favras?"

Gilbert shuddered. Even he, usually so strong in the presence of events as well as of men, felt like a child when he was brought into contact with this mysterious personage.

"I then told you, that if the King had in his paltry brain a grain of the spirit of self-interest, — which I hoped he had not, — he would run away."

"Well, he did run away!" said Gilbert.

"Yes! — but I meant that he ought to flee while there was a chance. Zounds! When he did try to get away, as you know, it was too late. I added, what you have not forgotten, that if the King, the Queen, and the nobility resisted the progress of the Revolution, we should have a worse Revolution thereafter."

"Yes, you were right once more! The worst Revolution has come!"

"Not wholly! but it is going on, as you see, my dear Gilbert. Do you also recall what I told you about a certain machine, invented by one of my friends, Doctor Guillotin? Have you walked through Carrousel Square, on the Tuileries side? Well, that instrument is at work there, — the same which I caused the Queen to see in a decanter at Taverney Château! — You remember the time. You were there, a lad no higher than my arm, and already the lover of Mademoiselle Nicole, whose husband, by the way, — that dear Monsieur de Beausire, — has just been sentenced to be hanged, and there was no escape for him."

"Yes," said Gilbert; "but apparently the guillotine is too slow, for sabres, pikes, and daggers help it along."

"Listen!" said Cagliostro. "We must understand one thing, — that we have to do with wilful wrongheads. The Nobility, the Court, the Queen, and the King received all sorts of warnings, but they were of no avail. The Bastille was taken. That did them no good. Then came the October riots. They taught royalty nothing. The Twentieth of June taught the Court nothing. Then came the Tenth of August. Even that profited royalty nothing. They have put the King into the Temple, and the Nobility into the different prisons, — Abbaye, Force, Bicètre. All this has taught royalty nothing. The King, in the Temple, rejoices at the conquest of Longwy by the Prussians. At the Abbaye the nobles cheered for the King and the Prussians. They drink champagne under the very noses of the poor, who can only have water. To the very beards of paupers, famishing for bread, these aristocrats munch their patties and truffles. This indifference extends even to King William of Prussia, to whom some one might write: 'Take care! If you pass Longwy, if you take one step nearer to the heart of France, that step will be the King's death-warrant.' He might respond : ' However frightful may be the situation of the royal family, the invading armies cannot retreat. With all my heart I hope to arrive in time to save the French King's life ; but my chief duty is to save Europe.' He is marching on Verdun. — We must make an end of things."

"An end of what?" asked Gilbert.

"Of the King, the Queen, the Nobility."

"You would murder the King? You would murder the Queen."

"Murder? Oh, no! That would be decidedly a blunder. They must be tried, condemned, and publicly executed, — as happened to Charles the First. We must rid ourselves of them in some way, and the sooner the better!"

"Who so decides?" cried Gilbert. "Is it the intelligence, the integrity, the conscience of the people of whom you speak? When you had Mirabeau for genius, Lafayette for loyalty, Vergniaud for fairness, if you had come to me in the name of those three men, and declared slaughter to be necessary, I should have shuddered, as I shudder now, but I should have been half convinced. But in whose name do you come to me to-day? In the name of Hébert, a huckster ; of Collot d'Herbois, a hissed playwright ; of Marat, a sick-brained fellow, whose physician is obliged to bleed him as often as he demands fifty thousand, a hundred thousand, two hundred thousand heads! Master, allow me to despise such commonplace men, men who must have emotional and hasty crises and changes of scene, — these wretched dramatists, these weak rhetoricians, who take delight in swift destruction, who fancy themselves skilful magicians, when they are ordinary mortals, and so deface God's handiwork.

They think it a grand and sublime thing to dam up the stream of life which feeds the world; to exterminate by a word, a sign, a wink; to cause the disappearance, by a breath, of any living obstacle, into which Nature has put twenty, thirty, forty, fifty years of creative work. These men are miserable scamps; but you do not belong to them."

"My dear Gilbert, you are still in error. You call these fellows men. You do them too much honor! They are only tools!"

"Tools of destruction!"

"Yes, — but for the benefit of a principle. That principle is the enfranchisement of nations, — it is Liberty! It represents the Republic, not merely of France, — God forbid such egotism! — but of the world, — a universal fraternity. No, these men lack genius, lack loyalty, lack conscience; but they have what is stronger, more stable, more irresistible than all those qualities, — instinct."

"The instinct of Attila."

"Exactly! You have said it, — the instinct of Attila, who called himself the Scourge of God, who came with the barbarous blood of the Huns, the Swabians, the Alains, to stamp out the civilization of Rome, corrupted for four hundred years, by the reigns of such men as Nero, Vespasian, Heliogabalus."

"But to come back to facts, instead of generalizing," said Gilbert, "to what will this awful and wholesale massacre lead?"

"Oh, that's easily seen. It will compromise the Assembly, the Commune, the people, — all Paris. Paris must be smirched with blood, you understand, in order that Paris, — which is the brain of France, the intellect of Europe, the soul of the world, — feeling already guilty of the unpardonable sin, may rise as one man, urge France onward, and drive every enemy outside the sacred soil of the country."

"But what matters this to you? You are not a Frenchman!"

Cagliostro smiled and replied: "Can it be that thou, Gilbert, with thy superior intelligence and strong mind, wouldst tell a man not to meddle in the affairs of France, because he is not a Frenchmen? Are not French affairs the world's affairs? Does France — poor egotist! — labor for herself alone? Did Jesus die only for Jews? Would you challenge an apostle, because he was not a Nazarene? Listen to me, Gilbert! I have discussed all these matters with a genius greater than mine or thine, — with a man, or a demon, named Althotas. One day he made a calculation as to the amount of blood which must be shed before the sun of liberty would rise o'er all the world. Well, even that man's arguments did not shake my conviction. I have marched on. I am still marching on. I shall continue to march on, overturning everything that I find in my way. To such an obstacle I say, with a calm look and serene voice: 'Woe to the obstacle! I am the future!' — Meantime, thou desirest to ask a favor for some one! Is it not so? That favor is already granted. Tell me the name of the man or woman thou wouldst save."

"Master, I wish to save a woman whom neither you nor I can allow to die."

"Thou wouldst save the Countess de Charny?"

"I would save the mother of Sebastien."

"Thou knowest that Danton, as Minister of Justice, holds the keys of her prison?"

"Yes! but I also know that you can bid Danton open or close that door!"

Cagliostro rose, went to the desk, traced a cabalistic sign on a scrap of paper, and then gave it to Gilbert. "There, my son. Go to Danton, and demand of him what thou wilt."

Gilbert rose, but Cagliostro added: "But afterwards, what is to be done?"

"After what?"

"When the King's trial comes."

"I hope to get myself nominated to the Convention, so as to oppose the King's death as best I can."

"Yes, I understand that," replied Cagliostro. "Act according to conscience! But promise me one thing."

"What is it?"

"There was a time when thy promise was without conditions, Gilbert!"

"In those times you did not talk of nourishing a people with blood, or a nation with murder."

"So?—Well, promise me that if the King is tried and put to death, thou wilt follow the advice I then give thee."

Gilbert offered his hand and said: "Master, all advice coming from you is precious to me."

"And will be followed?"

"I swear it, if it wounds not my conscience."

"Thou art unjust, Gilbert! I have offered thee much. Have I exacted anything?"

"No! and what is more, you have just accorded me a life more valuable than my own."

"Go on, then!" said Cagliostro, "and may the Genius of France lead thee,—one of whose noblest sons thou art."

Cagliostro left the house, and Gilbert soon followed. The cab was still in waiting. The Doctor entered, and told the driver to stop at the Bureau of Justice, where he could see Danton.

As Minister of Justice, Danton had a fair pretext for not being seen at the Communal Council. Besides, why should he go there? Were not Marat and Robespierre ever on hand? Robespierre would not allow himself to be distanced by Marat. Harnessed to butchery, they both rode at the same pace. Moreover, Tallien was watching them both.

Two things were possible for Danton. If he decided to ally himself absolutely with the Commune, he might form a triumvirate with Marat and Robespierre. If the Assembly should triumph, as Minister of Justice Danton might expect a dictatorship. On his side, he did not wish for the association of Robespierre and Marat; but on the other side, the Assembly did not care for Danton.

When Gilbert was announced, Danton was with his wife, or rather his wife was at his feet. The anticipated massacre was so well known beforehand, that she was supplicating him not to commit such a crime. She was dying with grief, poor woman, over the massacre which had already taken place.

Danton could not make her understand very clearly one thing, — that he could do nothing contrary to the decisions of the Commune, unless he had dictatorial authority conferred upon him by the Assembly. With the Assembly on his side, there was a chance of victory. Without the Assembly, defeat was certain.

"Die, die, die! if it must be," said the poor woman; "but don't let that massacre take place!"

"Men of my stamp do not care to die uselessly," replied Danton. "I would die willingly, however, if my death would serve my country."

Doctor Gilbert was announced.

"I shall not go away," said Madame Danton, "till I have thy word to do everything in the world to prevent this abominable crime."

"Remain, then!" said Danton.

Madame Danton retired a few steps, to let her husband come forward and greet the Doctor, whom he already knew by sight and reputation.

"Doctor, you arrive opportunely. If I had known your address I would certainly have sent for you."

Gilbert saluted Danton; and, seeing a lady behind the minister, he bowed to her also.

"This is my wife, Monsieur, the wife of Citizen Danton, who believes her husband strong enough to prevent Marat and Robespierre, backed by the whole Commune, from doing what they choose, — that is, to keep them from killing, exterminating, devouring."

Gilbert looked at Madame Danton, who was weeping through her clasped hands. "Madame, will you allow me to kiss those pitiful hands?"

"Good!" said Danton. "Here we already have re-enforcements."

"Tell him, Monsieur," cried the poor woman, "that if he permits this massacre, there will be a bloodstain on his whole life!"

"Nor is that all," said Gilbert. "If this stain could rest upon only one man's forehead, — who believes it essential to the good of his country that this pollution should soil his name, — such a man might throw his honor into the gulf and sacrifice himself, as Decius threw his body into the abyss for the sake of his country. In the times in which we live, what matters the life, reputation, honor of one citizen? But this will be a blot upon the forehead of France!"

"Citizen," said Danton, "when Vesuvius has an eruption, show me a man who is strong enough to check the molten river. When the storm rises, show me an arm vigorous enough to push back old ocean!"

"When one speaks the name of Danton, such a man need no longer be sought. He is here! No need to ask where that strong arm may be; for it acts, and thus speaks for itself."

"See here!" said Danton, "you're all out of your heads! Must I tell you what I scarcely dare say to myself? Certainly, I have the will. As certainly I have the genius. Certainly also I shall have the force, if the Assembly so wills it. But do you know what's going to happen? Just what happened to Mirabeau. Even his genius could not triumph over his reputation. I am not a crazypate, like Marat, to inspire the Assembly with terror. I am not an incorruptible Robespierre, to inspire it with confidence. The Assembly will refuse me the means of saving the state, because I am in bad repute. It will adjourn, and keep me dangling off and on. It will be whispered that I am a man of lax honor, — a man not to be trusted, even for three days, with absolutely arbitrary power. A committee of worthy men will be appointed. Meanwhile it will be too late. The slaughter will take place. As you say, the blood of a thousand unfortunates, slain by the crimes of three or four hundred drunkards, will draw before the scenes of this Revolution a crimson curtain, which will hide from historic view our sublime heights. It will not be France who is accused," he added, with a magnificent gesture; "it will be myself. I shall avert from France the world's curse, by causing it to fall upon my own head."

"And thy wife and thy children?" cried the unhappy woman.

"Thou? It will kill thee, as thou hast said! And thou wilt not be accused of being my accomplice, inasmuch as my crime is thy death. As to our children, they are sons. Some day they will be men. Be assured they will either have their father's heart, and will bear aloft the name of Danton, or else they will be weak and belie me. So much the better! The feeble are not of my race, and I repudiate such sons in advance."

"But at least you will ask the Assembly for some authority?" said Gilbert.

"Do you fancy I have waited for you to give me this counsel? I have already sent for Thuriot, I have sent for Tallien. Wife, see if they are in the other room. If so, let Thuriot come in."

Madame Danton went out, and Danton said: "I shall tempt fortune in your presence, Monsieur Gilbert. You shall be the witness to posterity of my efforts."

The door opened. "Here is Citizen Thuriot, my dear," said Madame Danton.

"Come in!" said Danton, extending his large hand to the man who served him, as an aide serves his general. "That was a sublime word of thine on the rostrum the other day, about the French Revolution being not merely for ourselves, but for all the world, and about our being responsible for it to all humanity. Well, we must make a last effort to keep our Revolution pure."

"Speak on!" said Thuriot.

"To-morrow, at the opening of the session, before any business is begun, this is what thou must demand, — that the number of members in the General Council of the Commune be increased to three hundred, so that without interfering with those chosen before August 10, the old members may be hereafter outnumbered by the new. We must establish a fixed basis for the legislative representation of Paris. We must enlarge the Council, but neutralize it. We must augment its members, but modify its spirit. If this proposition is not adopted, if thou canst not make the Deputies understand my idea, then confer with Lacroix. Tell him to attack the question openly. Let him propose the death-penalty for those who refuse, directly or indirectly, to obey the Executive Power, or in any way try to impede any of its orders or measures. If this measure passes, that will give us the dictatorship. The Executive Power, — that is myself! I will enter the Assembly and claim the authority; and if there is any hesitation about giving it to me, I will seize it."

"Then what will you do?"

"Then," said Danton, "I will grasp a flag. In place of the bloody and hideous demon of massacre, whom I shall banish to his native shades, I will invoke the noble and serene genius of battles, who strikes without fear or anger, and looks placidly upon death. I will ask if all those knots of men are banded together for the butchery of unarmed citizens. I will denounce as infamous whoever dares threaten the prisons. Perhaps many may approve massacre, but the murderers are not many. I will profit by the military spirit which reigns in Paris. I will surround each cluster of murderers with an eddy of genuine volunteers, who are waiting for an order to march, and then I will send them to the frontier, — that is, against the enemy, that the foul element may be dominated by the nobler."

"Do it! Do it!" cried Gilbert, "and you will accomplish something grand, magnificent, sublime."

"Oh Lord!" said Danton, shrugging his shoulders with a singular mixture of strength and carelessness, "this is the simplest thing to do! If I can only get the proper help, you shall see."

Madame Danton kissed her husband's hands. "Thou wilt have help enough, Danton," she said. "Who would not be of thy mind, my brave and noble husband, hearing thee speak thus?"

"Yes! but unfortunately I cannot talk thus. If I were to expose these ideas by speaking out, they would begin the massacre with me."

"Well," said Madame, "would it not be better to finish in that way?"

"A woman, who talks like a woman! With me dead, what would become of the Revolution, between that bloodthirsty maniac they call Marat, and that sham philanthropist they call Robespierre? No! I ought not to die yet! I do not wish to die yet! What I ought to do is to prevent massacre, if I can. If it breaks out in spite of me, then I want to exculpate France, and let the crime be charged to my account. I shall go on to the end just the same, only the progress will be frightful. — Call Tallien!"

"Tallien," said Danton, when his friend entered, "it may be that to-morrow the Commune will send me a written order to report at the municipal headquarters. You are the Secretary of the Council. Arrange it so that I shall not receive that letter, and shall be able to prove that I have not received it."

"The Devil!" said Tallien, "how shall I do it?"

"That 's your lookout. I tell you what I want, what I demand, what ought to be. It is for you to find the means. — Come now, Monsieur Gilbert, you have something to ask of me."

Opening the door into a small office, he bade Gilbert enter, and then followed him.

"Now then, how can I be useful to you?"

Gilbert drew from his pocket the paper Cagliostro had given him, and presented it to Danton.

"Ah! You come from him. — Well, what do you want?"

"The liberation of a lady imprisoned at the Abbaye."

"Her name?"

"Madame de Charny."

Danton took a sheet of paper and wrote the order of release. "If you wish to save anybody else, speak! I would be glad, by instalments, to save all those unfortunate people."

Gilbert bowed and said: "I have all I wish."

"Go then, Monsieur Gilbert; and if you need me, come to me at once, man to man, without any go-between. I shall be too happy to do something for you."

As he reconducted Gilbert to the door, he murmured: "Oh Monsieur Gilbert, if I could only have your reputation as an honorable man for one day!"

As he closed the door behind the Doctor he sighed, and wiped away the sweat which ran down his forehead.

Gilbert wended his way to the Abbaye, bearing the precious paper which was to restore freedom to Andrée.

Although it was near midnight, suspicious groups were already gathered in the streets near the prison. Gilbert passed through their midst and rapped at the door. The gloomy door opened beneath a low vaulted archway. Gilbert shuddered. That low arch was not that of a prison, but of a tomb.

He presented his order to the superintendent. It directed that the person named by Doctor Gilbert should be at once set at liberty. Gilbert designated the Countess, and the superintendent ordered a turnkey to conduct Citizen Gilbert to the prisoner's cell.

Gilbert followed the turnkey, ascended three flights of stairs by a small staircase, and entered a cell lighted by one lamp.

A lady clad in black, looking pale as marble in her mourning, was seated near a table on which the lamp was placed. She was reading in a little book bound in shagreen, and ornamented with a gilt cross. The remnants of a fire burned on the hearth by her side.

Despite the noise made by the door, she did not lift her eyes. She seemed absorbed in her reading, or rather in her meditation, for Gilbert waited two or three minutes before he saw her turn the leaf. The turnkey locked the door behind Gilbert, and waited outside.

At last Gilbert said: "Madame!"

Andrée raised her eyes, and looked at him for an instant without seeing anything. The veil of her meditation still hung between her gaze and the man before her. At last she saw him clearly.

"Ah, it is you, Monsieur Gilbert?" she asked. "What do you wish?"

"Madame, there are sinister rumors current as to what may happen to-morrow in the prisons."

"Yes," said Andrée, "it appears that we are to be butchered; but you know, Monsieur Gilbert, that I am ready to die."

Gilbert bowed and said: "I have come after you, Madame."

"After me?" said Andrée, with surprise. "To take me where?"

"Wherever you will, Madame. You are free!" and as he spoke he showed her Danton's order of release.

She read the order; but instead of returning it to the Doctor, she kept it in her hand.

"I ought to have expected this, Doctor," she said, trying to put on a smile, — something to which her face had grown unaccustomed.

"Expected what, Madame?"

"That you would come and hinder me from dying."

"Madame, there is one life in the world more precious to me than my father's or mother's would have been, if God had given me the blessing of a father and a mother. I mean yours."

"Yes, and that is why you have broken your pledge once already."

"I did not fail in my promise. I sent you the poison."

"By my son!"

"I did not say by whom I would send it!"

"So you have thought of me, Monsieur Gilbert? For my sake you have ventured into the lion's den? For my sake you have brought that talisman to open the prison doors?"

"I have already said, that as long as I live you need not die."

"This time, however, I think I hold death securely, Monsieur Gilbert," said Andrée, with a brighter smile than the former.

"Madame, if I have to take you away by force, I declare to you that you must not die."

Without a reply Andrée tore the order into three or four pieces, and threw them into the fire.

"Try it!" she said.

Gilbert uttered an exclamation.

"Monsieur Gilbert, I have renounced all idea of suicide, but not the idea of death."

"Oh Madame! Madame!"

"Monsieur Gilbert, I wish to die!"

Gilbert let a groan escape him.

"All I ask of you," she said, "is that you will try to recover my body, — to save it, after death, from the outrages which in life it will not escape. Monsieur de Charny rests in the tomb of his château at Boursonnes. It is there I passed the only happy days of my life. I wish to be placed near him."

"Oh Madame, in Heaven's name, — I swear to you —"

"And I, Monsieur, pray to you in the name of my misfortunes."

"Very well, Madame! You have rightly said that it is my duty to obey you in all points. I withdraw, but I am not yet conquered."

"Do not forget my last wishes, Monsieur!"

"If I do not save you in spite of yourself, then your last wishes shall be obeyed."

Once more bowing, Gilbert retired. The door closed behind him with that lugubrious clang peculiar to prison portals.

CHAPTER XXIX.

THE SECOND OF SEPTEMBER.

THAT happened which Danton had foreseen. At the opening of the session, Thuriot laid before the Assembly the proposition formulated on the previous day by the Minister of Justice. The Assembly did not understand. Instead of voting at nine o'clock in the morning, they argued the matter at needless length, and finally adopted the proposition at one in the afternoon.

It was too late. These four hours retarded the liberty of Europe for a whole century.

Tallien was more skilful. Requested by the Commune to send an order to the Minister of Justice, to betake himself at once to the Communal Council, Tallien wrote as follows:

MONSIEUR SECRETARY: On receipt of this communication, you will come to the Hôtel de Ville.

Only he addressed it wrongly! Instead of writing, "To the Minister of Justice," he wrote, "To the Minister of War."

Danton was expected. Servan appeared instead, and asked, somewhat embarrassed as he was, what they desired. Of Secretary Servan the Commune wanted absolutely nothing at all.

The blunder was satisfactorily explained, but the mistake was past recall.

We have said that the Assembly, in voting at one o'clock, voted too late; and this is proved by the fact that the Commune, which was in the habit of despatching things, profited by the delay.

What the Communists wanted was massacre and a dictatorship.

As Danton had said, the miscreants were not as numerous as people believed.

During the night between September 1 and 2, while Gilbert was unsuccessfully attempting to deliver Andrée from the Abbaye Prison, Marat was sending his growlers into the clubs and sections. Enraged though they were, these emissaries could make no impression whatever upon the clubs; and only two out of the forty-eight sections, Poissonnière and Luxembourg, voted for slaughter.

The Communists well knew that they could not obtain a dictatorship, unless they had on their side Marat, Robespierre, and Danton. This is why they ordered Danton's presence at the City Hall.

We have said that Danton foresaw all this; so he did not receive the letter, and consequently did not appear.

If he had received this letter, if Tallien's convenient blunder had not caused the order to be sent to the War Department instead of the Department of Justice, perhaps Danton would not have dared to disobey.

Notwithstanding his absence, the Communal Councillors were obliged to reach some conclusion. They decided to nominate a Committee of Vigilance; only that committee could not be chosen from outside the members of the Council. The question therefore arose, as to how Marat could be placed on this committee of massacre, — for such it really was! — inasmuch as Marat did not belong to the Council.

The whole matter was left in charge of Panis. It can be easily understood that this ex-attorney — this low-minded, mean-spirited, harsh man, this poor little author of a few ridiculous verses — could have no influence of his own; but through his deity, Robespierre, and through Santerre, his brother-in-law, his weight in the municipality was tremendous, — so much so, that he was authorized to choose three members, who should constitute the Vigilance Committee.

Panis did not dare to exercise alone this extraordinary power. He requested three of his colleagues to assist him, — Sergent, Duplain, and Jourdeuil.

These in turn chose five persons to aid them, — Deforgues, Lenfant, Guermeur, Leclerc, and Durfort.

The original decree bears the four names of Panis, Sergent, Duplain, and Jourdeuil; but on the margin is found another name, in the chirography of only one of the four signers. This handwriting is confused, though it is believed to be that of Panis.

The name thus inscribed is Marat; but he had no right to figure on that committee, since he was not a member of the Commune.

Michelet, the only historian who has thrown light upon the stormy darkness of that September, should be consulted. The document above-mentioned should also be seen. My friend Monsieur Labat, the librarian at the Prefecture of Police, is pleased to show it to those interested, as he has shown it to me.

With the name of Marat, murder was enthroned! Let us follow it through the fearful development of its omnipotence.

We have already said that the Commune did not spin out its business, like the Assembly, but despatched it promptly.

At ten o'clock the Vigilance Committee was appointed, and issued its first order, whose object was the transportation of twenty-four prisoners from the Mayor's office (where the committee was in session) to the Abbaye. The Mayor's office was then located where stand to-day (1855) the Police Headquarters. Eight or nine out of the twenty-four prisoners were priests. That is, they wore the cloth of an execrated profession, of men who had organized civil war in the Vendée and Southern France.

These captives were to be taken from prison by Marseilles and Avignon federationists. Four carriages were in readiness. Six prisoners entered each carriage, and the carriages started.

The signal was given by a third cannon-shot.

The intention of the Commune is easily understood. This slow and funereal procession would provoke the ire of the people. Likely enough the carriages would be stopped and the prisoners murdered along the route, or else at the door of the Abbaye. After that it would only be necessary to let the massacre follow its own course. Once begun, whether along the route or at the prison door, it would soon cross the threshold.

It was the very moment when the carriages left the Mayor's office that Danton took for appearing at the Assembly.

Thuriot's proposition had become useless. It was too late, as we have said before, to apply to the Commune the decree just passed. Only the dictatorship now remained.

Danton ascended the rostrum. Unfortunately he was alone. Roland was too honest a man to accompany his colleague. They looked for Roland, but looked for him in vain. Force was there, but not Principle or Honor.

Manuel had just announced to the Commune the peril at Verdun. He proposed that all enrolled citizens should encamp that very night on the Champ de Mars, in order to be ready for marching against the enemy next morning, at daybreak. This proposition was adopted.

Another member, in view of the urgency of the danger, proposed firing signal-guns, tolling the bells, and beating a general alarm.

This second proposition was put to vote and was adopted, like the one preceding. Under the circumstances, this measure was ill-omened and murderous. The drum, the bell, and the cannon rouse gloomy suggestions and dismal vibrations in the calmest breasts, much more so in hearts already so violently agitated. All this, however, was premeditated.

At the firing of the first cannon, Monsieur de Beausire was to be hanged.

Let us announce at once, with the sadness which must belong to the loss of so interesting a personage, that at the discharge of the first cannon Monsieur de Beausire was actually executed.

At the third discharge the carriages, already mentioned, were to leave the Prefecture. As the cannon was fired at intervals of ten minutes, those who witnessed the execution of Monsieur de Beausire could also assist in the transportation of the prisoners, and take part in their slaughter.

Danton was kept informed by Tallien of what was happening. He therefore knew about the national peril at Verdun, and about the proposed encampment on the Champ de Mars. He must therefore have known also that the cannon were to be fired, the bells tolled, and the drums beaten.

In his reply to Lacroix, he took as a text the danger of the country, and proposed an edict, "that whoever refused to serve in person, or to furnish arms, should be punished with death."

Then, in order not to have his intentions misunderstood, and his projects confounded with those of the Commune, he added: "The tolling of the bells about to take place is not a signal of alarm. It is the signal for an attack upon the enemies of the country! In order to conquer them, gentlemen, we must have audacity, — audacity first, last, and every time. Then France will be saved!"

Thunders of applause followed these words.

Lacroix then arose, and made the following proposition: "That all who directly or indirectly refuse to obey legal decrees, or who hinder, in any shape or manner, the execution of the orders given and the measures taken by the Executive Power, shall merit the death penalty."

The Assembly understood full well, this time, that what they were asked to vote was a dictatorship. The Deputies seemingly approved, but they named a committee of Girondists to draft the decree. The Girondists, like Roland, were unfortunately too honest to place their trust in Danton, and the discussion lingered until ten in the evening.

Danton became impatient. He wished to do good, but he was compelled to allow evil to be done.

He whispered a word to Thuriot, and went out.

What did he say? He told Thuriot where to find him, in case the Assembly should confide to him the dictatorial power.

Where was he to be found? At the Champ de Mars, amongst the enrolled volunteers.

What were Danton's intentions, had the power been delegated to him? He would have caused himself to be acknowledged by this mass of men, armed, not for massacre, but for foreign war. He would have entered Paris with them, and thus have drawn an immense number of miscreants to the frontier, — capturing them as in a net.

He waited until five o'clock, but no one came.

What happened meanwhile to the prisoners, who were on their way to the Abbaye? Let us follow them! They were going slowly, and might be easily overtaken.

At first they were protected by the coaches in which they were confined. The instinct of the danger they incurred caused each man to hide, as best he could, in the bottom of the carriage, and show himself as little as possible; but those who had the prisoners in charge themselves denounced those prisoners. The anger of the people did not rise fast enough; so the guards tried to lash it by their words to the passers-by: "Behold! Here they are, the traitors! Here they are, the accomplices of the Prussians! the men who will give up our cities and murder your wives, while you march to the frontier!"

Even this, however, was powerless to raise a massacre. Danton was right in saying that murderers were scarce. Anger, yells, threats could be heard, but that was the end of it.

The procession followed the line of the river, over New Bridge, and through the Rue Dauphine. The patience of the prisoners was not exhausted. The people could not be induced to commit a single murder. They were nearing the Abbaye. They had reached the Bussy Crossway, and it was time to decide upon some course of action.

Should the prisoners be killed after entering the prison? If so, it could then be easily seen that this was done under the deliberate order of the Commune, and not by the spontaneous indignation of the people.

Fortune came to the assistance of these murderous projects.

On the Bussy Crossway stood one of those platforms where voluntary enrolments were in progress. There was some obstruction, and the carriages were obliged to halt.

The opportunity was propitious. If lost, it might not present itself again.

A man pushed through the escort, which did not object. He mounted the step of the first carriage. In his hand he held a sabre, which he plunged into the coach repeatedly and at random, and then drew out stained with blood.

One of the prisoners had a cane, with which he endeavored to parry the strokes. While doing so, he struck the face of one of the guards, who exclaimed: "Ah, ruffians! We protect you, and you strike us! To the rescue, comrades!"

A score of men, anxiously awaiting such an appeal, sprang from the crowd. They were armed with pikes, and with knives fastened to long sticks, which they thrust into the coach. One could hear the agonized cries of the victims, and see the blood ooze through the bottom of the carriage, leaving its trace in the street.

Blood calls for blood. The massacre, which was to last four days, was now begun.

The prisoners, crowded in the Abbaye, had conjectured ever since morning, by the countenances of their jailers, — and by a few words which escaped them, — that something tragical was on foot. During that day, by order of the Commune, meals were served before the usual hour in all the prisons.

What meant this change in prison rules? It meant something fatal; and the victims anxiously awaited their impending doom.

Towards four o'clock the distant murmur of the crowd began to beat against the base of the prison walls, like the first waves of the rising tide. From the barred windows of the turret overlooking the Rue Saint Marguerite, a few saw the approaching carriages. Yells of rage and pain soon found their way into the prison through all its openings, and were followed by a cry: "The murderers are upon us!" Such yells and cries soon spread themselves throughout the corridors, and penetrated into the cells, — even into the deepest dungeons.

Next came this other cry: "The Swiss! the Swiss!"

There were one hundred and fifty Swiss in the Abbaye. It had been difficult, on August 10, to protect them from the wrath of the people. The Commune knew what hatred the populace entertained towards red uniforms. To begin the massacre by killing the Swiss was therefore an excellent way of initiating the people.

It took about two hours to exterminate these one hundred and fifty unlucky fellows.

When the last one was despatched, Major Reading, the mob called for the priests.

The priests answered that they were ready to die, but first wished to enjoy the sacrament of confession. This desire was granted, and they received two hours' respite.

To what were these two hours devoted? To forming a tribunal.

Who formed that tribunal? Who presided over it? Maillard!

CHAPTER XXX.

MAILLARD.

It was fit that the hero of July 14, of October 5 and 6, of June 20, of August 10, should also be the hero of September 2.

The ex-constable of the Châtelet must have wished to apply some formality, some solemn procedure, some appearance of legality to the massacre. — He wanted the Royalists killed, but he wanted them killed legally, under a decree pronounced by the populace, whom he considered the sole and infallible judges, alone possessing the right of acquittal.

Two hundred persons had already been murdered before Maillard installed his tribunal.

Only one person had been spared, the Abbé Sicard.

During the tumult two other persons — Parisot, the journalist, and La Chapelle, the King's steward — succeeded in leaping from a window, and so found themselves in the midst of this committee, which was holding its session at the Abbaye. The members of this committee had caused the fugitives to sit near by, and thus rescued them; but the murderers deserve no thanks, for it was not their fault that these two men escaped.

We have before mentioned that a curious document, to be seen at the Prefecture of Police, records the appointment of Marat upon the Vigilance Committee. The Abbaye registry, a document no less curious, is even now stained with the blood which spurted forth, and reached even the members of the tribunal.

Ye who are in search of affecting souvenirs, look at this book, and you will see these two notes continually recurring on its margins : " Killed by the judgment of the people," — " Acquitted by the judgment of the people," with the name Maillard beneath.

These notes are written in a large, beautiful, steady hand, perfectly plain, and peaceful, free from trouble, fear, or remorse. The last note is repeated forty-three times.

Maillard therefore saved, at the Abbaye, the lives of forty-three persons.

While he enters upon the duties of this office, at nine or ten o'clock in the evening, let us follow two men who are coming from the Jacobin Club, and walking towards the Rue Saint Anne. They are the high priest and the adept, the master and the disciple, — Saint-Just and Robespierre.

We saw Saint-Just on the evening of the reception of three new Enlightened Ones into the Lodge in the Rue Plâtrière. His complexion is still unwholesome, — too white for a man and too pale for a woman. His necktie is starched and stiff. The pupil of a shrewd, hard, and unsympathetic master, he has outdone his master in these qualities !

The master still feels somewhat moved by those political combats, wherein man hustles man, and passion meets passion.

As to the pupil, all that is transpiring seems to him only a game of chess on a large scale, where life is at stake. Beware, ye who are playing against him, for he is inflexible, and will not pardon the loser !

Robespierre doubtless had good reasons for not going to the Duplay home that evening. He said, in the morning, that he should probably go into the country. Saint-

Just's little hired lodging perhaps seemed to Robespierre a place safer than his own room, wherein to spend that terrible night between September 2 and 3.

Saint-Just was still an unknown young man. We might almost call him a child.

The two men entered this little room at about eleven.

It is useless to inquire what these two men were talking about. Their topic was the massacre, of course; only one spoke of it with the affected sensibility of a philosopher of the Rousseau school; while the other spoke with mathematical dryness, as a disciple of the school of Condillac. At times Robespierre would weep over the victims, like the fabled crocodile.

On entering his chamber, Saint-Just laid his hat on a chair, took off his tie, and began to undress.

"What art thou doing?" inquired Robespierre.

Saint-Just looked at him with such surprise, that Robespierre repeated his question: "I ask what thou art about?"

"I'm going to bed, of course!" answered the young man.

"And why go to bed?"

"Why? To do what one usually does in bed, — go to sleep."

"What? Thou thinkest of sleep on such a night as this?"

"Why not?"

"When thousands of victims are falling, or about to fall, — when this is to be the last night for so many who breathe now, but will breathe not to-morrow, thou yet thinkest of sleep!"

Saint-Just bethought himself a moment. Then, as if that short moment's silence enabled him to draw a new conviction from the bottom of his heart, he said: "Yes,

I know! but I know also that it is a necessary evil, since thou hast authorized it. Suppose this were the yellow fever, the plague, or an earthquake, by which so many people often perish, — more than will perish to-night. No good to society results from such disasters; yet out of the deaths of our domestic enemies will come our own security. I advise thee therefore to go home, and go to bed, as I do. Try to sleep, as I shall!"

While uttering these words, the hard-headed and cold politician lay down. Adding only, "Adieu till the morrow!" he straightway fell asleep.

He slept as long, as calmly, as peaceably as if nothing extraordinary had happened in Paris. He fell asleep about half-past eleven in the evening, and awoke towards six next morning.

He fancied he saw a shadow between daylight and himself. Turning towards the window, he saw Robespierre.

Supposing the latter had left him on the previous evening, and had returned thus early, he said: "What brings thee here so soon?"

"Nothing," said Robespierre. "I have n't been out."

"What — not been out?"

"No."

"Not been abed?"

"No."

"Nor asleep?"

"No."

"And where hast thou spent the night?"

"Standing here, with my forehead glued to the window-pane, listening to the noise in the streets."

Robespierre did not lie. Either from dread, anxiety, or remorse, he had not slept one second.

As to Saint-Just, sleep seemed no different to him that night than on any other.

There was on the other side of the Seine, in the very courtyard of the Abbaye, a man who slept no more than Robespierre. This man was leaning on the angle of the last passageway leading into the courtyard, and was almost lost in its shadow.

This last passageway had been transformed into a tribunal, and its interior presented a strange scene. There stood a large table, lit by two copper lamps, which were necessary even in the daytime. Around this table, heaped with sabres, swords, and pistols, twelve men were seated.

Their dull faces, their robust frames, their red caps and their carmagnole jackets, all indicated that they belonged to the common people.

Another man, making thirteen, was in their midst, and presided over them. He was dressed in a black and threadbare coat, a white vest, and short breeches. His look was solemn and mournful, and his strong head was bare.

This man was perhaps the only one of them all who knew how to read and write. Before him lay the jail registry, with writing materials.

These men constituted the Abbaye jury. They were terrible judges, whose sentences, from which there was no appeal, were carried out instantly, by some fifty executioners. These men were armed with sabres, daggers, and pikes; and they were dripping with blood, as they waited in the courtyard.

The President was Sheriff Maillard.

Did he come here of his own accord, or was he sent by Danton? Danton wished to have done in the other prisons, — in Carmes, Châtelet, and La Force, — what was done here at the Abbaye, — that is to say, have a few persons saved.

How did Maillard happen to be there? No one can answer that question.

On September 4 Maillard disappeared. He was no longer to be seen, no more to be heard from. He was, so to speak, submerged and drowned in blood.

Meanwhile, since the previous evening, at ten o'clock, he had been presiding over this tribunal.

On his arrival he had this table brought out, and the registry placed before him. He selected haphazard, and without distinction, twelve jurors. Then he seated himself at the end of the table, while six assistants sat on his right, and six on his left. The massacre was now resumed, but not without some method.

The name of each prisoner was read from the jailer's book. The turnkeys went after the prisoner, while Maillard related the cause of imprisonment. When the prisoner made his appearance, the President consulted his colleagues with a glance. If the prisoner was found guilty, Maillard simply said: "To La Force!"

Then the outside door would be opened, and the condemned person fell beneath the stabs of the butchers.

On the other hand, if the prisoner was acquitted, the black spectre, Maillard, would arise, lay his hand on the prisoner's head, and say: "Let him be released!" and that prisoner was saved.

When Maillard first presented himself at the prison door, a man detached himself from the wall and went to meet him.

As soon as the first words were exchanged between them, Maillard recognized this man, and bent his tall body before him. This was done, perhaps, not exactly as a token of submission, but at least as a sign of good-will.

Then Maillard had this man enter the prison; and when the table was set up and the tribunal established, the President said to him: "Stand there. When the person you are interested in is on trial, just nod to me."

The man had been there in his corner since the night before. He was leaning on his elbows, and waiting, silent and motionless.

This man was Gilbert. He had sworn to Andrée that he would not let her die, and he was trying to keep his promise.

From four o'clock until six in the morning, both slayers and judges took some rest. At six they ate some food.

During the three hours thus spent in repose and repast, the wagons, sent by the Commune, came to remove the dead. The coagulated blood in the courtyard was three inches deep. Their feet slipped in this blood. As it would take too long to clean it up, they brought a hundred trusses of straw, which they laid here and there on the ground; and then they covered over the straw with the garments of the dead, — particularly with the Swiss uniforms. The clothes and the straw absorbed the blood.

While the jurors and the slayers were asleep, the prisoners, shaken with terror, were lying awake; but hope returned when the yells ceased. Perchance the executioners had only a certain number of victims assigned to them, and the massacre would end with the slaughter of the Swiss and the King's Guards.

This hope was of short duration! Towards seven o'clock in the morning the cries and the calls began anew.

A jailer came down to tell Maillard that the prisoners were ready to die, but desired to hear Mass.

Maillard shrugged his shoulders, but granted the request.

He was busy, at that very moment, listening to the congratulations addressed to him by an envoy of the Commune, — a man of slender stature, with a mild countenance, dressed in a puce-colored suit, and a small wig.

This man was Billaud Varennes. He harangued the slaughterers in the following terms: "Brave Citizens! You have just purged society of some great culprits! The municipality is at a loss how to pay its debt to you. The spoils of the dead should, doubtless, belong to you, but this would look like theft. As an indemnity for that loss, I am requested to offer to each one of you twenty-four francs, which will be paid at once."

Billaud Varennes actually caused the salary for this bloody business to be immediately distributed to the murderers.

We will now explain what had happened, and thus show a reason for the Commune's generosity and satisfaction.

On the evening of September 2 some of the butchers, who were without shoes and stockings, looked wistfully upon those of the prisoners, and even went to the sectional headquarters, to ask permission to step into dead men's shoes. The officials consented.

We have said some of the butchers, because the majority of them were small traders, and belonged in that vicinity; as we learn from the "Inquest of the Second of September," preserved in the police archives.

After that, Maillard noticed that these slayers believed themselves absolved from asking permission, and that they took not only shoes and stockings, but everything else that was fit to take.

Maillard thought that this was interfering with his massacre, and he therefore referred the matter to the Commune. Hence the message of Billaud Varennes, and the religious silence with which this singular message was received.

Meanwhile the prisoners heard Mass. Abbé Lenfant, an ex-chaplain of the King, read the service, and Abbé de Rastignac, a religious author, served as acolyte.

The priests were two old gray-headed men, with venerable countenances. Their words of resignation and faith, preached from a sort of rostrum, had a great and beneficent influence upon their unfortunate auditors.

The little congregation was just kneeling to receive the benediction from the Abbé Lenfant, when the calls began anew.

The first name announced was that of the consoling priest. He crossed himself, finished his prayer, and then followed those who had come after him.

The second priest remained, and continued the solemn exhortation. He was called next, and in his turn followed those who summoned him.

The other prisoners remained together. Their conversation became strange, gloomy, terrible. They discussed the manner in which death was to be met, and the chances of torture more or less prolonged.

Some proposed to reach out their heads, in order that they might fall at one blow. Others proposed to raise their arms, so that death might penetrate their breasts. Some said they would hold their hands behind their backs, in order to oppose no resistance.

One young man detached himself from the rest, and said : "I shall soon know which is the easiest way."

He went up inside a turret, whose grated window overlooked the scene of the massacre. Thence he studied death. Then, coming back, he said: "They who are stabbed in the breast die easiest."

At that very moment the following words were heard: "My God, I go to thee!" Then followed a sigh.

A man had fallen on the floor, and was beating himself against the flagstones.

This was Monsieur de Chantereine, Colonel of the King's Constitutional Guard. He had stabbed himself thrice in the breast with a knife.

The prisoners took the knife, but used it with hesitation. Only one other succeeded in killing himself.

Three women were there. Two were frightened girls, who clung close by two old men. The other was a lady in mourning. She was kneeling in prayer, and calmly smiling as she prayed.

The two young girls were Mademoiselle de Cazotte and Mademoiselle de Sombreuil. The two old men were their fathers.

The young woman in mourning was Andrée.

Monsieur de Montmorin was now called. This gentleman, it will be remembered, was formerly a cabinet-minister, and had made out the passports by means of which the King tried to escape. Montmorin was so unpopular that the day before, a young man came near being killed on account of bearing the same name.

Monsieur de Montmorin did not come in to hear the exhortations of the two priests. He remained in his cell, furious and disheartened, — shouting for his enemies, asking for arms, shaking the iron bars of his prison, and breaking an oak table, whose boards were two inches thick.

He had to be taken by force before the tribunal. When he entered the passageway, he was not only pale, but his eyes were inflamed and his fists were raised.

"To La Force!" said Maillard. The ex-minister took the word literally, and thought that he was simply to be transferred from one prison into another, and so he said to Maillard: "President, since it pleases thee to be called by that name, I hope that thou wilt have me taken there in a carriage, in order to avoid being exposed to the insults of villains."

"Have a carriage brought for Monsieur de Montmorin!" said Maillard, with exquisite politeness. Then, addressing Montmorin, he continued: "Take the trouble to be seated, while waiting for the carriage, Monsieur!" The Count sat down, muttering.

Five minutes later the carriage was announced. One of the supernumeraries had understood the part he was to play in the drama, and proved himself equal to the occasion.

The fatal door was opened, — the one leading unto death, — and Monsieur de Montmorin passed through it. Scarcely had he taken three steps when he fell, pierced by a score of pikes.

Next came other prisoners, whose unimportant names are buried in oblivion.

In the midst of these obscure names, one shone with peculiar brilliancy, that of Jacques Cazotte, — Cazotte the Seer, who, ten years before the Revolution, predicted to every one the doom awaiting him. This was the author of "The Devil in Love," of "Olivier," and "A Thousand and One Trifles." His was a frenzied imagination, an ecstatic soul, an ardent heart, and he embraced with eagerness the cause of the Counter-Revolution. In his letters, addressed to his friend Pouteau, who was employed at the Superintendency of the Civil List, he expressed these opinions, which were at this time punishable by death.

His daughter acted as his secretary, in writing these etters, and when her father was arrested, she came and asked the privilege of sharing his imprisonment.

If any one were allowed to entertain Royalist opinions, it should certainly be that old man, seventy-five years of age, whose feet were rooted in the monarchy of Louis Fourteenth, and who, to rock the Duke de Bourgogne to sleep, composed two songs which afterwards became popular, "All in the beautiful midst of Ardennes," and "Godmother, you must warm the bed." Such reasons might have prevailed with philosophers, but did not influence, in the least, the slaughterers at the Abbaye. Cazotte was therefore doomed beforehand.

As soon as Gilbert saw this handsome, gray-headed old gentleman, whose eyes were bright and whose countenance seemed inspired, he detached himself from the wall, and made a motion, as if to go and meet him. Maillard noticed that movement. Cazotte advanced, leaning on his daughter.

The latter, on entering the passageway, understood that she was in the presence of their judges. She therefore left her father, and pleaded for him so hard, and with such sweet words, that the jurors began to waver. The poor child noticed that hearts were really beating under those rude exteriors; but in order to find them, she must descend into the depths. She gave herself to the task with bowed head, and with Compassion as her guide. These men, who knew not what it was to shed tears, — these men wept! Maillard rubbed, with the back of his hand, those dry and hard eyes, which for the last twenty hours had contemplated the massacre without once looking down. He extended his arm, laid his hand on Cazotte's head, and said: "Let him be set at liberty!"

The young girl did not know what to make of it.

"Fear not, Mademoiselle," said Gilbert, "your father is safe."

Two of the jurors arose and accompanied Cazotte as far as the street, for fear, through some fatal mistake, the victim might be again given over to the death from which he had just been rescued. For this time, at least, Cazotte was safe.

The hours passed on, and the massacre continued. Benches were brought for the spectators. The wives and children of the slayers were permitted to witness the spectacle.

These men were really conscientious actors. It was not enough for them to be paid. They wanted also to be seen and applauded.

Towards five o'clock in the afternoon, Monsieur de Sombreuil was called. Like Cazotte, he was a well-known Royalist. The difficulty of saving him was made greater by the fact, not forgotten, that as Governor of the Hôtel des Invalides, on July 14, he had fired upon the populace. Moreover, his sons were abroad, in the enemy's ranks. One of them had so distinguished himself at Longwy, that the King of Prussia honored him with a decoration.

Monsieur de Sombreuil was noble and resigned, bearing high his head of gray hair, whose curls flowed down as far as the collar of his uniform. Like the other old man, he came leaning on his daughter's arm.

This time Maillard dared not order the prisoner's release. Making an effort, however, he said: "Whether he be innocent or guilty, I think that it would ill become the people to befoul their hands in the blood of this old gentleman."

Mademoiselle de Sombreuil heard these noble words, which will weigh heavily in the divine balance. She drew her father through the door of life, exclaiming: "Saved, saved!"

No judgment had been pronounced, either to condemn or to acquit.

Two or three of the assassins put their heads through the doorway, and asked what they should do.

The jurors were silent. At last one member said: "Do just as you please!"

"Well," cried the butchers, "let the young girl drink to the health of the Nation!"

Upon this a man, covered all over with blood, with upturned sleeves and ferocious countenance, presented a glass to Mademoiselle de Sombreuil. Opinions are divided as to whether the glass contained blood or wine. Mademoiselle de Sombreuil exclaimed: "Long live the Nation!" She then wet her lips with the liquid, whatever it was, and Monsieur de Sombreuil was saved.

Two hours more went by. Then the voice of Maillard — as cool in summoning the living as was the voice of Minos in summoning the dead — called for Citizeness Andrée de Taverney.

This name caused Gilbert's limbs to quiver and his heart to fail. A life, more important to him than his own, was to be in peril, — to be condemned or saved.

"Citizens," said Maillard, to the members of the terrible tribunal, "the woman who is to appear before you is a poor creature, formerly devoted to the Austrian Women; but the latter — ungrateful, as queens ever are — recompensed her devotion by ingratitude. To that friendship this woman sacrificed all she had, — her fortune and her husband. You will see her enter. She is dressed in black. To whom does she owe her mourning?

To the prisoner in the Temple! Citizens, I demand of you the life of that woman."

The members of the tribunal made approving signs. One said: "We will see."

"Well then," said Maillard, "look!"

At this instant the door was actually opening, and one could see, in the gloom of the corridor, a woman dressed in black. Her head was covered with a black veil. She came in all alone, with a firm step and without assistance. She might have been taken for an apparition of that dreadful world, "that undiscovered country," as Hamlet puts it, "from whose bourne no traveller returns."

At sight of her the judges trembled. Advancing as far as the table, she lifted up her veil. Never had a more incontestable though pale beauty appeared to mortal eye. She was a marble divinity. All glances were fixed upon her. Gilbert was breathless.

Addressing Maillard, in a voice at once sweet and firm, she said: "Citizen, are you the President?"

"Yes, Citizeness," answered Maillard, surprised that he, the questioner, should himself be questioned.

"I am the Countess de Charny, wife of the Count de Charny, killed on that infamous day, the Tenth of August. I am a Royalist, a friend of the Queen. I deserve death, and now I call for it aloud."

The jurors uttered a cry of surprise. Gilbert turned pale, and withdrew as far as possible into the angle of the gateway, in order not to be seen by Andrée.

Seeing the consternation of Gilbert, Maillard said: "This woman is beside herself. Her husband's death has turned her brain. Let us pity her and spare her life. The people's justice does not punish insanity."

He arose, and was about to lay his hand upon her head, as he was wont to do with those whom he proclaimed innocent; but Andrée pushed Maillard's hand aside, and said: "I have my full reason. If you wish to spare any one, let it be one who asks and deserves that favor, and not I, who do not merit such a boon, and positively refuse it."

Maillard turned towards Gilbert. Seeing him in a supplicating attitude, he added: "This woman is crazy. Set her at liberty!" and he motioned to a member of the tribunal to push her out through the door of life.

"Innocent!" cried the man. "Let her pass!"

Everybody made room for Andrée. The sabres, the pikes, the pistols were lowered before this statue of Grief. She had scarcely advanced ten steps when Gilbert, who was leaning against the window and watching her departure, all at once saw her pause and cry out: "Long live the King! Long live the Queen! Shame on the Tenth of August!"

Gilbert groaned, and ran into the yard. He saw the flash of a sabre. Quick as lightning it disappeared, and buried itself in Andrée's heart.

He was at her side just in time to catch the poor woman in his arms. Andrée turned towards him her fainting eyes. She recognized him, and murmured, in a voice scarcely audible: "Love Sebastien for both of us."

Then, in a still weaker voice she said: "I shall be near him, shall I not? — near my Oliver, near my husband, — forever!" And so she died!

Gilbert took her in his arms and raised her from the ground.

Fifty naked arms, stained with blood, threatened him; but Maillard appeared behind him, laid his hand upon his head, and said: "Let Citizen Gilbert pass. He is carrying away the corpse of a poor demented woman, who has been killed by mistake."

They all made way. Gilbert passed through with Andrée's corpse, and without encountering the slightest resistance, so potent was Maillard's influence upon the multitude.

CHAPTER XXXI.

WHAT HAPPENED AT THE TEMPLE DURING THE MASSACRE.

THOUGH organizing the massacre, whereof we have endeavored to give a specimen, — though desiring to subjugate the Assembly, and constrain it by terror, — the Commune was nevertheless very fearful lest some misfortune should befall the prisoners in the Temple.

Longwy had been taken by the Prussians, and Verdun was surrounded by the same enemy, only fifty leagues (about one hundred and twenty-five miles) from Paris. Under these circumstances the King and his family were precious hostages, which might become safeguards for the most compromised Republicans.

Commissioners were therefore sent to the Temple. Five hundred armed men would not have sufficed to guard this prison, and such a guard would perhaps have themselves opened the gates to the populace. One commissioner bethought himself of a shrewd device, — a surer defence than all the pikes and bayonets in Paris; and that was to encircle the Temple with a tricolored ribbon, bearing the following inscription:

CITIZENS: You know how to unite the love of order with vengeance. Respect this barrier! It is essential to our vigilance and our responsibility!

Strange times, when oaken doors were battered down, when iron gratings were demolished, and yet the populace knelt before a ribbon! Yes, the mob absolutely knelt before that tricolored ribbon at the Temple, and kissed it! Not a rioter stepped over it!

On September 2 the King and Queen were ignorant of what was going on outside in Paris. True, there was a greater fermentation than usual, in and about the Temple, but they had begun to get accustomed to these feverish outbursts.

The King generally dined at two o'clock. He did the same that day; and after dinner he went down into the garden, as was his custom, with the Queen, Madame Elizabeth, Madame Royale, and the little Dauphin. During their walk they heard the outside clamors redouble.

One of the municipal officers, who followed the King, whispered to one of his colleagues. What he said was spoken sufficiently loud, however, for Cléry to overhear: "We were wrong in allowing them to promenade this afternoon."

It was then about three o'clock, the hour when the slaughter began, of the twenty-four prisoners on their way from the Mayor's office to the Abbaye.

The only domestics allowed to the King were Cléry and Hue. The unfortunate Thierry — whom we saw on August 10, lending his chamber to the Queen, that she might therein receive Monsieur Rœderer — was at the Abbaye, and was to be executed on September 3.

It appears that the second municipal officer was also of the opinion that they had done wrong in allowing the royal family to come into the garden, and both officials intimated to the august prisoners that they had better go in at once.

They obeyed the order; but scarcely were they assembled in the Queen's chamber when two other municipal officers entered, who were not just then on duty at the Small Tower. One of them, an ex-Capuchin friar named Mathieu, came towards the King and said: "Do you know, Citizen, what is going on? The country is in the greatest peril."

"How do you expect me to know anything, Monsieur?" replied the King. "I am in prison, and debarred from intercourse with the world without."

"Well then, I will tell you what's going on. Our enemies have entered Champagne, and the King of Prussia is marching upon Châlons."

The Queen could not repress a movement of joy, which, though very rapid, did not escape the official's notice, and he said: "Yes, yes! We are perfectly aware that we shall perish, with our wives and children; but you will have to answer for it all! You will die before we do, and the people will be avenged."

"Let God's will be done," answered the King. "I have done all I could for my people, and I have nothing to reproach myself with."

The same official said, turning towards Monsieur Hue, who was standing near the door: "As to thee, the Commune has ordered me to put thee under arrest."

"Who is to be under arrest?" asked the King.

"Your servant."

"My servant? Which one?"

"This one," said the official, pointing to Monsieur Hue.

"Monsieur Hue? Of what is he accused?" asked the King.

"That does n't concern me; but he will be taken away this evening, and his papers will be put under seal."

As he went out the ex-friar said to Cléry: "Look out how you behave, for the same thing will happen to you, if you don't walk straight!"

Next day, September 3, at eleven in the morning, the King and his family were again assembled in the Queen's room. A municipal officer ordered Cléry to go up into the King's rooms, where the valet found Manuel, and a few other members of the Commune. All their countenances expressed great anxiety. We have before said that Manuel was not eager to shed blood. There was a party of Moderates, even in the Commune.

"What does the King think of the removal of his valet?" asked Manuel.

"His Majesty is very uneasy about it," answered Cléry, who heretofore had been the Dauphin's special valet, not the King's.

"Nothing evil will befall him," continued Manuel "Nevertheless, I am requested to inform the King that Hue will not return, and that the Council will replace him. You may apprise the King of this decision."

"This mission is not included in the duties of my office, Citizen," answered Cléry. "Please be kind enough to excuse me from announcing to my master a fact which is sure to grieve him."

Manuel meditated a moment, and then said: "So be it! I am going down to the Queen's rooms."

He indeed went down, and found the King, who calmly received the news which the Attorney of the Commune announced.

Then the King said, with the same indifference he had shown on June 20 and August 10, and which he would retain even in presence of the scaffold: "Very well, Monsieur, I thank you. I will make use of my son's valet, and should the Council object, I will try to help myself."

Presently he added, with a slight movement of the head: "I am quite decided in this, for I care for no new servant."

"Have you any complaints to make?" asked Manuel.

"We are short of linen," said the King; "and this is a great privation to us. Do you think you could prevail upon the Commune to furnish us with some linen, according to our needs?"

"I will refer the matter to the Commune," answered Manuel.

Then, seeing that the King did not ask him for any outside news, Manuel withdrew.

At one o'clock the King manifested his desire for a walk. During their promenades they could always observe certain signs of sympathy, made from some window, from some attic, or from behind some blind; and this was consolatory.

On this occasion the municipal officers refused permission for the royal family to go out.

At two o'clock they sat down to dinner. Towards the middle of the dinner, drumbeats were heard, and increasing yells therewith, approaching nearer and nearer the Temple.

The royal family left the table, and assembled in the Queen's bedroom. The noise continued to draw nearer.

Who was causing this noise? They were butchering at La Force, as well as at the Abbaye, — not under the presidency of Maillard, but under that of Hébert. The La Force massacre was therefore the more terrible. Yet these latter prisoners might have been still more easily saved. There were fewer held for political offences at La Force than at the Abbaye. The assassins were in smaller numbers, and the spectators less eager. But instead of Hébert's dominating the massacre at La Force, as did Maillard at the Abbaye, the massacre controlled Hébert. Forty-three persons were saved at the Abbaye, whereas not ten were spared at La Force.

Amongst the prisoners at La Force was the poor little Princess Lamballe. We have met this lady in the last three books we have written, — in "The Queen's Necklace," "Ange Pitou," and in our present history, — and she was always the Queen's devoted shadow.

The populace hated her. They called her the Austrian Woman's Counsellor. She had been the Queen's confidant, her intimate friend, something more perhaps, — at least so went the report; but she was never the Queen's adviser. This darling little girl from Savoy, with her pretty, compressed mouth and her constant smile, was capable of loving, and she proved it; but a counsellor, — and, above all, a counsellor to a virile woman, obstinate and domineering, like the Queen, — that Lamballe never was.

The Queen loved her, as she loved Madame de Guéméné, Madame de Marsan, Madame de Polignac; but being light, moody, and fickle in all such sentiments, she perhaps made the Princess Lamballe suffer as much for being her friend, as she made Charny suffer as a lover. Only, as we know, the lover grew weary; while the friend, on the contrary, remained steadfast. Both perished for the royal woman whom they had loved.

The reader will recall that evening at the Floral Pavilion, when Lamballe held a reception; for she used to welcome to her apartments, those whom the Queen could not receive in hers.

Soon after that soirée Madame de Lamballe retired to England. There she might have remained, and spent a long life; but the good and sweet creature, knowing the Tuileries to be in danger, hastened back, and demanded her place at the Queen's side.

On August 10 she was separated from her royal friend. Conducted first to the Temple with the Queen, she was almost immediately transferred to La Force.

There she felt crushed under the burden of her devotion. She wished to die near the Queen, with the Queen. Under her royal eyes, death would appear sweet. Away from the Queen, Lamballe no longer had the courage to die. This woman was not of Andrée's stamp. She was ill from fright.

Lamballe was not ignorant of the hatred stirred up against her. Shut up, as she was, with Madame de Navarre, in one of the upper rooms of the prison, she saw Madame de Tourzel taken away on the night of September 2. It was as if some one had said to her: "You only remain to die later."

She lay in her bed. As each puff of noise was wafted near her, she hid herself between the sheets, like a frightened child. She fainted every minute. Again coming to herself she would say: "Oh, my God! I expected to be dead!" Then she would add: "If we could only die as we swoon, it would be neither painful nor difficult."

Murder was everywhere, — in the courtyard, at the doors, in the lower rooms. The odor of blood reached her, like funereal incense.

At eight in the morning her chamber door opened. Her fright this time was such that she did not faint, did not hide herself between the blankets. She looked around, and saw two National Guardsmen.

"Get up there, Madame!" said one of them, roughly, "You are to go to the Abbaye."

"Oh gentlemen," said she, "it is impossible for me to leave my bed, I am unable to walk." Then she added, in a voice scarcely audible: "If you want to kill me, you might as well do it here as anywhere else."

One of the men whispered into her ear while the other listened at the door: "Obey! We wish to save you!"

"Then go out. and let me dress myself," said the prisoner.

The two men did go out, and Madame de Navarre helped her to dress; or rather, she put on her clothes for her.

About ten minutes later the two men came in again. The Princess was ready; only, as she had said, she was unable to walk. The poor woman quivered all over. She took the arm of the National Guardsman who had spoken to her, and leaned upon him as she descended the stairs. When she arrived at the entrance, she found herself all at once in front of the bloody tribunal presided over by Hébert. At the sight of these men, with their rolled-up sleeves, — the men who had constituted themselves judges, — at the sight of those other men with blood-stained hands, who had appointed themselves executioners, — the Princess fainted away.

She was questioned three times; and three times she swooned, without being able to answer.

"Cheer up, for they wish to save you!" softly repeated the man who had already spoken to her.

This promise restored some strength to the poor woman, and she murmured: "What do you want with me, gentlemen?"

"Who are you?" asked Hébert.

"Marie Louise de Savoie Carignan."

"Your business?"

"Superintendent of the Queen's Household."

"Have you any knowledge about the plots of the Court on the Tenth of August?"

"I am not aware that there were any plots; and if there were, I was ignorant of them."

"Swear allegiance to Liberty and Equality! Swear hatred to the King, the Queen, and Royalists."

"I will willingly swear to the first two points, but cannot swear to the rest, because this feeling is not in my heart."

"Swear, swear!" softly whispered the National Guardsman. "Swear, or you're a dead woman!"

The Princess extended her hands, and totteringly and instinctively took a step towards the further wicket.

"Why don't you swear?" asked her protector.

As if, in the terror of death, she feared lest she should pronounce a shameful oath, the Princess put her hand over her mouth, in order to keep back the words which might escape in spite of herself. A few moans were heard through her fingers.

"She has sworn!" cried the National Guardsman who accompanied her. Then he said to her softly: "Pass out quickly, through the door in front of you. Cheer for the Nation as you go, and you are saved."

As she went out she found herself in the arms of a butcher who was awaiting her. It was no other than Big Nicholas, who cut off the heads of the two bodyguards at Versailles. This time he had promised to save the Princess. He drew her towards something shapeless, quivering, and bloody, and whispered: "Cheer for the Nation! Hurry up, and shout for the Nation!"

Doubtless she would have screamed out these words, but unfortunately, on opening her eyes, she beheld in front of her a heap of corpses, upon which a man was trampling. The blood gushed from beneath his hobnailed shoes, as grape-juice splashes in the vintage.

She beheld this terrible spectacle, turned around, and could only exclaim: "Fie! What horrors!"

This cry was smothered, in order to save her.

It is said that her father-in-law, Monsieur de Penthièvre, had given a hundred thousand francs to effect her release.

She was pushed into the narrow passage leading from the Rue Saint Antoine to the prison, and which is called now the Priest's Alley, when a miserable fellow, a barber named Charlot, broke through the hedge formed around her, and snatched her cap off with his pike. This man had recently joined the Volunteers as a drummer. Was his intention simply to throw off her bonnet, or did he mean to strike her in the face?

The blood flowed. Blood calls for more blood. Another man threw a stick of wood at the Princess, which struck her in the neck. She stumbled, and fell upon one knee.

There was now no hope of saving her. From all sides sabres and pikes rained upon her. She did not utter a single cry, for she was virtually dead as soon as she spoke her last words.

Scarcely had the Princess expired, — perhaps she was still alive, — when they rushed upon her. In an instant her clothes were torn off, even to her under-garments. Palpitating with the last quavers of agony, she found herself nude. An obscene sentiment presided over her death, and hastened this robbery of her raiment. Her murderers wanted to see this beautiful form, to which the women of Lesbos would have rendered homage.

Naked as God had created her, she was laid on a bench, before all eyes. Four men installed themselves in front of her, washing and wiping away the blood flowing from seven wounds. A fifth man described, and pointed out with a stick, those corporeal beauties which, as people said, had formerly brought her into royal favor, and which now caused her death.

She remained thus exposed from eight o'clock until noon. At last the listeners grew tired of this lecture, on the scandalous history of the corpse. One man came forward and cut off her head. That neck, long and flexible as a swan's, offered little resistance!

Grison was the name of the wretch who committed this crime, — more hideous, perhaps, than if committed upon a living person. History is the most inexorable of all divinities. She plucks a quill from her wing, dips it in blood, writes a name, and that name is held up for the execration of posterity! Subsequently that same man was guillotined as chief of a band of thieves.

A second man, named Rodi, opened the Princess's breast, and plucked out her heart.

A third, named Mamin, attacked another part of the body.

It was on account of her love for the Queen that this poor lady was thus mutilated. What hatred, then, must the Queen herself have inspired!

They spitted upon pikes the three detached parts of this ill-used body, and marched away towards the Temple. An immense crowd followed the three assassins; but with the exception of a few children and a few drunkards, who vomited at the same time wine and gall, the procession was silent and terror-stricken.

They halted at a hairdresser's shop on the route, and went in.

The man who carried the head placed it on a table, and said: "Curl this head for me! It 's going to visit its mistress, at the Temple."

After the Princess's beautiful hair was curled, the crowd kept on towards the Temple, — this time, with loud yells.

These were the yells which the royal family heard while at their dinner-table.

The assassins were approaching, for they entertained the abominable thought of exhibiting to the Queen this head, this heart, and the other portion of the Princess's remains.

The ruffians presented themselves at the Temple, but the tricolored ribbon barred their entrance. These men — these assassins, these murderers, these butchers — dared not step over a ribbon!

They asked that a deputation of six fellows, three of whom were carrying the parts we have mentioned, might enter the Temple and march around the Donjon, in order to show these bloody trophies to the Queen. The request seemed so very reasonable, that it was granted without discussion!

The King was seated, pretending to play a game of backgammon with the Queen. Under the pretext of watching the game the other prisoners could draw nearer to each other, and so speak a few stray words, unheard by the municipal officers.

All at once the King saw one of the officials close the door, rush towards the window, and draw the curtains.

This man's name was Danjou. He was a former seminarist, a sort of giant, who, on account of his size, they called the Priestly Six-footer.

"What is the matter?" asked the King.

The official, seeing the Queen's back turned, took advantage of this, and signalled to the King not to question him.

Yells, insults, and threats reached the chamber, notwithstanding the fact that the door and windows were closed. The King understood that something terrible was taking place, and put his hand upon the Queen's shoulder, to keep her in her sitting position.

At this moment, knocks were heard at the door. Sorely against his will, Danjou was obliged to open it.

There stood some officers of the guard and some municipals, whom the King addressed. "Gentlemen, is my family safe?"

"Yes," answered a man, dressed in a National Guardsman's uniform, and wearing double epaulets; "but a rumor has gone abroad that there is no one left here at the Tower, and that all of you have escaped. Place yourself at the window, in order to satisfy the people."

The King, ignorant of what really was going on, saw no reason for not obeying. He made a movement as if to advance towards the window; but Danjou stopped him, saying: "Don't do that, Monsieur!"

Turning towards the officers of the National Guard, Danjou added: "The people should have more confidence in their magistrates."

"Well," said the man with the epaulets, "that is n't all! They want you to go to the window, to see the head and heart of the Princess Lamballe, which they have brought here on purpose to show you, that you may know how the people treat their tyrants. I advise you, therefore, to appear at the window. Otherwise, these things will be brought up here."

The Queen uttered a cry, and fainted. Madame Elizabeth and Madame Royale caught her in their arms. The King said: "You might have spared yourself the trouble, Monsieur, of announcing this terrible misfortune to the Queen." Then, pointing to the group of ladies, he continued: "See what you have done!"

The man shrugged his shoulders, and went out, singing the Carmagnole.

At six o'clock Pétion's secretary presented himself. He had come to pay to the King the sum of 2,500 francs.

Seeing the Queen standing motionless, and thinking she was doing this out of respect for him, he had the kindness to invite her to a seat.

Madame Royale, speaking of this event, says in her Memoirs:

My mother bore herself thus because, since that dreadful scene, she had remained upright and motionless, taking note of nothing that was going on in the room.

Terror had changed Marie Antoinette into a statue.

CHAPTER XXXII.

VALMY.

And now let us for an instant turn our eyes away from these fearful scenes of massacre, and follow, through the defiles of the Argonne, one of the characters of our story upon whom rested, at that moment, the supreme destinies of France. It will be readily understood that we refer to Dumouriez.

Dumouriez, as we have seen, on leaving the Royal Council, returned to his employ as an active general; and after the flight of Lafayette from France, he received the title of Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the East.

Dumouriez's nomination, by the men in power, was a sort of miracle of intuition. He was in fact detested by some and despised by others; but, more fortunate than Danton on September 2, he was unanimously acknowledged to be the only man who could save France.

The Girondists, who had originally nominated Dumouriez, now hated him. It will be remembered that they had been the means of his entering the Royal Council, and that he afterwards drove their special representatives out of it; and yet they went to seek him, obscure as was his position in the Army of the North, and made him General-in-Chief.

The Jacobins always hated and despised Dumouriez. They understood, however, that glory was the principal ambition of this man, and that he would conquer or die. Robespierre did not dare to support Dumouriez personally, on account of the General's bad reputation in the Jacobin party, but persuaded Couthon to give this support.

Danton neither hated nor despised Dumouriez. He was a man of robust temperament, judging things from a lofty position, and caring little about reputation, — one of these men who do not disdain to employ vice itself, if it can be made to contribute to their ends. Danton knew what advantages could be obtained from Dumouriez, but mistrusted his stability. He sent two men after him. One was Fabre d'Églantine, — that is to say, Danton's Mind. The other was Westermann, — Danton's Arm.

All the forces of France were put into the hands of a man who was called an intriguer. Luckner, an old, weather-beaten German soldier, who had proved his incapacity at the beginning of the campaign, was now sent to Châlons, to levy recruits. Dillon, a brave and distinguished soldier, of a higher standing in the military hierarchy than Dumouriez himself, received orders to obey him.

Kellermann also was put under the command of this man, to whom weeping France was entrusting her sword, and saying: "Defend me! for thou art the only one whom I know who can defend me!" Kellermann grumbled, swore, and wept; but he obeyed. He however obeyed with an ill-grace; and the cannon's boom was needed to make of him what he really was, a truly devoted Patriot.

The march of the allied sovereigns upon Paris was mapped out into a certain number of stages; but after the capture of Longwy and the surrender of Verdun, the allies all at once halted.

What reason can be assigned for this? A spectre was standing between them and Paris, — the spectre of Beaurepaire.

Beaurepaire was an old rifle-officer, who had formed, and was commanding the Maine and Loire Battalion. As soon as he heard that enemies had placed a foot on the soil of France, he and his men crossed the country as fast as possible, from west to east.

On their way they encountered a Patriot Deputy from their section, who was returning homeward, and who asked them: "What news shall I take to your families?"

"That we are dead!" answered a voice.

No Spartan, marching to Thermopylæ, could have given an answer more sublime!

The enemy arrived before Verdun, as we have said, on August 30, 1792. On August 31 the city was called upon to surrender.

Beaurepaire and his men, supported by Marceau, wanted to fight to the death. The Council of Defence, composed of the town officers, assisted by the principal inhabitants of the place, ordered a surrender.

Beaurepaire smiled disdainfully, and said: "I have sworn to die, rather than surrender. You may survive in shame and dishonor, if you wish, but I shall remain faithful to my oath. Here is my last word — I die!" and Beaurepaire blew out his brains.

This spectre was as huge as the Giant Adamastor, and more terrible. Now the allied sovereigns — who had believed, on the statements of the Royalist refugees, that France would meet them with open arms — saw something else.

They saw the soil of France, so fruitful and so populous, changed, as by a magic wand. Grain disappeared, as if swept away westward by a whirlwind. The armed peasant alone remained erect in his furrow. Those who had guns took their guns. Those who had scythes took their scythes. Those who had only one pitchfork took that one pitchfork.

The weather was also favorable to France. A fearful rain drenched the men, softened the ground, and spoiled the roads. This rain fell upon one army as well as upon the other, — upon the just and unjust, the French and Prussians alike; only everything else aided France, while everything else was hostile to the Prussians.

For the Prussians, the peasants had nothing but their guns, their scythes, and their pitchforks; or, worse than that, nothing but their unripe grapes. For his compatriots, the peasants had a glass of wine, hid behind a bundle of fagots, a glass of beer, put away in an unknown corner of the cellar, and dried straw to spread over the ground, and make real beds for the soldiers.

Many mistakes were made, and those of Dumouriez were not among the slightest. In his Memoirs he records them all, — his own, as well as those of his lieutenants.

He had written to the National Assembly:

> The defiles of Argonne are the Thermopylæ of France; but fear not! Happier than Leonidas, I shall not perish there!

The defiles of Argonne were ill-guarded. One of them was taken, and Dumouriez was obliged to retreat. Two of his lieutenants missed their way, and were routed. Dumouriez went astray, and was nearly lost himself. He had fifteen thousand men, but they were so completely demoralized that twice they were put to flight by fifteen hundred Prussians! Nevertheless Dumouriez was the one man who did not despair. He retained his courage and even his cheerfulness. In writing to the Council he said: "I answer for everything." Although he was pursued, outflanked, and intercepted, he nevertheless succeeded in effecting a junction with Beurnonville's ten thousand men, and Kellermann's fifteen thousand. He rallied his routed generals, and on September 19 he was in camp at Saint Menehould, where he could put his two hands upon seventy-six thousand men ; while the Prussians numbered only seventy thousand.

It is true that this army often complained. The soldiers were sometimes two or three days without bread. Then Dumouriez would mingle with his soldiers, and say : "My friends, the famous Marshal of Saxony has written a book upon War, in which he pretends that troops should be deprived of bread, at least once a week, in order to render them, in case of necessity, less susceptible to privation. We have come to that point, already ; but you are far better off than those Prussians, whom you see before you. They are sometimes four days without bread, and have to eat their dead horses. You have lard, rice, and flour. Make flapjacks, and Liberty will season them !"

There was something worse. The scum of Paris, the scum which rose to the surface on September 2, had now been pushed into the army. These miserable fellows came singing the Ça ira, and declaring that epaulets, crosses of Saint Louis, and embroidered coats must all be set aside. They would tear off decorations and plumes, and put all people and things on an equality.

In this state of mind they arrived at the camp, and marvelled at the void which was straightway formed around them. No one cared to answer either their threats or their advances. The General, however, announced that a review would take place on the morrow.

Next day the new arrivals found themselves, by an unexpected manœuvre, surrounded by a numerous and hostile body of cavalry, ready to sabre them, and artillery, ready to crush them.

In all, the rebellious soldiers formed seven battalions. Dumouriez now advanced towards them and exclaimed: "You fellows, — for I will not call you citizens, soldiers, or my children, — you fellows see before you this artillery, and behind you this cavalry. That is to say, you are placed between sword and fire! You have dishonored yourselves by your crimes. I shall suffer neither assassins nor thieves here, and I will have you all hacked to pieces at the slightest mutiny! If you amend your ways, and behave like the brave army into which you have had the honor of being admitted, you will find me a good father. I know there are among you certain scoundrels, charged to urge you on to crime. Drive them away yourselves, or else denounce them to me. I hold you responsible for one another!"

Not only did these men bend their necks, and become excellent soldiers, not only did they drive away the unworthy from their ranks, — but more, they cut in pieces that miserable Charlot, who struck the Princess Lamballe with a club, and carried her head at the end of a pike.

Such was the condition of things when Kellermann was expected, — Kellermann, without whom nothing could be risked.

On September 19 Dumouriez received notice that his lieutenant was at a distance of five miles from him, upon the left.

Dumouriez had him at once instructed to encamp, on the following day, between Dampierre and Élize, behind the Auve. This position was clearly indicated.

While sending this message to Kellermann, Dumouriez saw the Prussian army unroll itself over the mountains of Lune, which showed that the Prussians were between Paris and himself, and, consequently, nearer Paris.

It was more than probable that the Prussians wanted battle. Dumouriez therefore sent word to Kellermann to take the heights of Valmy and of Gizaucourt as his field of battle. Kellermann confounded his camp with his field of battle, and stopped on the heights of Valmy. This was either a great mistake or a terrible venture.

Placed as he was, Kellermann could turn backward, only by causing his army to cross a narrow bridge. He could fall back upon Dumouriez's right, only by crossing a marsh, where he would be swallowed up. He could fall back on Dumouriez's left, only through a deep valley, where he would be crushed. No possibility, therefore, was left for retreat.

Was this what the brave Alsatian intended? If so, he grandly succeeded. A fine spot, this, if an army was resolved either to conquer or die.

Brunswick beheld our soldiers with astonishment, and said to the King of Prussia: "Those fellows, who have lodged themselves up there, have evidently decided never to retreat."

However, the Prussians had been led to believe that Dumouriez was headed off. They had been assured that this army of tailors, vagabonds, and cobblers, as the refugees called them, would disperse at the first volley of German cannon.

The French had neglected to have General Chazot occupy the heights of Gizancourt. He was stationed on the highway to Châlons, instead of on the heights, whence he could attack his enemies in the flank. The Prussians took advantage of this mistake, occupied the position themselves, and attacked Kellermann's corps.

The day began in gloom, and was darkened by a heavy fog. This the Prussians did not mind, for they knew where the French army lay. The French (so the Prussians believed) were all on the heights of Valmy.

Sixty iron mouths blazed away all at once. The Prussian artillery-men fired at haphazard; but as they were firing into masses of troops, it did not seem necessary to aim carefully.

The first shots were terrible, and fell hard upon that enthusiastic French army, who would have well known how to attack, but had scarcely learned how to wait.

And then luck — it cannot be called skill — was at first against us. The Prussian shells fired two powder-wagons, which burst. The drivers jumped from their horses, in order to shelter themselves from the explosion, and were arrested as deserters.

Kellermann pushed his horse towards the place of confusion, which was darkened by fog and smoke. All at once both rider and horse fell, as if by a thunderbolt. The horse had been shot through by a bullet, but the man was fortunately safe. He jumped upon another horse, and rallied a few battalions which were disbanding.

It was then eleven o'clock in the morning, and the fog began to dissipate.

Kellermann noticed that the Prussians were forming into three columns, and were preparing to attack the Valmy plateau. He in turn formed his troops into three columns.

Going throughout the lines he said: "Soldiers, let not a single gun be fired! Wait till you can meet the enemy man to man, and then receive them on your bayonets."

Putting his hat at the end of his sabre, he then continued: "Hurrah for the Nation! Let us on! and conquer for her!"

Brunswick shook his head. Had he been alone, the Prussian army would not have advanced another step; but the Prussian King was there. His Majesty wanted to join the battle, and must be obeyed.

The Prussians marched up, firm and gloomy, under the direction of the King and Brunswick. They crossed the space which separated them from their enemies, with the solidity of an old army of the Great Frederick. Each man seemed bound, as with an iron ring, to the one before him.

All at once this immense military serpent seemed to break in the middle, but the fragments were soon reunited.

Five minutes later the lines were again sundered, and were once more brought together.

Dumouriez's twenty pieces of artillery now attacked the flank of the Prussian column, and crushed it beneath a rain of fire. The head of the column could not advance, for it was continually drawn back by the writhing convulsions of the main body, which was riddled by grapeshot.

Brunswick saw that the day was lost, and ordered a retreat to be sounded.

The King, on the contrary, ordered a charge, put himself at the head of his soldiers, and pushed his docile and brave infantry under the double fire of Kellermann and Dumouriez. His ranks were dashed to pieces against the French lines.

Something luminous and splendid hovered over this young French army, — Faith!

Brunswick said: "Such fanatics have not been seen since the religious wars!"

These were sublime fanatics, — fanatics for Liberty. The heroes of 1792 had just begun the great conquest, the war which was to end in the conquest of mind.

On September 20 Dumouriez saved France.

The day following, the National Convention was emancipating Europe, by proclaiming the French Republic!

CHAPTER XXXIII.

SEPTEMBER TWENTY-FIRST.

At noon, on September 21, before it was known in Paris that Dumouriez's sudden victory had saved France the night before, the doors of the Riding School were opened, and the seven hundred and forty-nine members of the new Convention might have been seen entering their hall slowly and solemnly, casting questioning looks at one another.

Two hundred of these men had been members of the former Assembly; and often this Convention was called the Assembly, from force of habit.

The National Convention was elected under the influence produced by the news of September. One might therefore expect it to be a reactionary assemblage. It was more than that, for several nobles were in it. An extremely democratic impulse led to a call for even servants to vote, and many of them nominated their masters.

These new Deputies were mostly from the middle classes, — doctors, lawyers, professors, sworn priests, literary men, journalists, and merchants. Their minds were uneasy and wavering. Five hundred of them, at least, were neither Girondists nor Mountaineers, — as the extreme Republicans were called, on account of the position of the benches they occupied in the Convention. Events would determine what place the new majority was to take in this Assembly.

All were united, however, in a twofold hatred, — hatred of those cruel September days, and hatred of the Paris Deputies, almost entirely chosen from the Commune (that is, from the Municipal Council so called) which was responsible for the awful tragedy of those days.

It almost seemed as if the blood then shed was flowing across the legislative hall, and separating the hundred Mountaineers from the rest of the Convention. The members of the Centre fairly leaned towards the Right, or conservative party, as if to avoid this red river.

When we recall the men, and remember the events which had occurred, we must confess that the Mountain presented a formidable aspect.

As we have before said, the members of the Commune were chosen from the inferior ranks of the populace; and above the Commune was that famous Vigilance Committee, which had generated the massacre.

At the summit of this triangle of organizations — the Convention, the Commune, and the Vigilance Committee — rose three terrible countenances, — or rather three profoundly characteristic masks, — like the three heads of a hydra.

First, there was the cold and expressionless face of Robespierre, its parched skin glued upon a narrow forehead. His blinking eyes were hidden behind a pair of spectacles. His extended hands were cramped upon his knees, reminding one of those stiffly seated Egyptian figures carved in porphyry, the hardest of all marbles. He was a sort of Sphinx, who alone seemed to possess the watchword of the Revolution, though no one dared ask him for it.

Next came Danton, with his agitated expression, his twisted mouth, his irregular face, — stamped with a sublime ugliness, — and his fabulous body, half man, half bull. In spite of all this, Danton almost inspired observers with sympathy; for one could not help feeling that it was the beatings of his profoundly patriotic heart which caused that flesh to creep and that lava to flow, and that his large hand, always obedient to his first impulse, was ready to strike down a standing enemy, or to raise a fallen foe, with equal celerity.

Near these two countenances, so different in expression, — behind and above them, — appeared, not a man, — for it is not possible for a human being to attain such an unparalleled degree of ugliness, — but a monster, a grotesque fantasy, a vision sinister and ridiculous, — Marat! His brazen face was swollen with bile and blood. His eyes were insolent and bloodshot. His big and flabby mouth seemed specially designed to launch insults, — or rather, to vomit them. His crooked and supercilious nose inhaled, through its flaring nostrils, that odor of popularity which exhaled from the gutter and flowed with the sewer.

Marat was dressed no better than the dirtiest of his admirers. His head was tied up with a soiled piece of linen. His shoes, with nails in their soles, were without buckles, and often without strings. His pantaloons were made of rough cloth, and were spotted — or covered all over — with mud. His unbuttoned shirt exposed his lean breast, which was large, when compared with the size of his whole body. His narrow black cravat, greasy and crumpled, revealed the hideous ligaments of his neck, which were ill-adjusted, and caused his head to lean towards the left. His thick hands were always threatening fists. In their more peaceful intervals these hands would toil amid his tangled hair.

On the whole, with his giant's trunk perched upon a dwarf's legs, Marat was hideous to look upon. The first inclination of all beholders was to turn away; but the eye could not withdraw quickly enough to avoid reading upon his visage the words September Second! and then the beholder's gaze would remain staring and horrified, as before the Medusa's mythologic head.

These were the three men whom the Girondists accused of aspirations towards dictatorship. The three, on the other hand, denounced the Girondists for advocating democratic Federalism.

Two other men, linked with our story by different interests and opinions, were seated at the two opposite sides of the Convention. They were Billot and Gilbert.

Gilbert was on the extreme Right, between Lanjuinais and Kersaint. Billot was at the extreme Left, between Thuriot and Couthon.

The members of the former Legislative Assembly, who escorted the new Conventionists to their benches, came there to solemnly relinquish their old authority, and place their power in the hands of their successors.

François de Neufchâteau, the last President of the dissolved Assembly, mounted the rostrum, and spoke as follows:

REPRESENTATIVES OF THE NATION: The Legislative Assembly has ceased to exercise its functions, and places the government in your hands.

The object of your efforts should be to give the French people Liberty, Law, and Peace: Liberty, without which Frenchmen can no longer live; Law, which is the firmest foundation of Liberty; and Peace, the sole and only legitimate end of war.

Liberty, Law, and Peace! These three words were engraved by the Greeks upon the portals of the Temple at Delphi. You should engrave them upon the entire soil of France!

The Legislative Assembly had existed one year, during which great and important events had taken place, — on June 20, on August 10, and on September 2 and 3.

At the close of that year France was at war with the two great powers of the North. There was civil war in the Vendée. There was a debt of 2,200,000,000 (over two billions) of francs in assignats, or paper bonds. Then there was the victory of Valmy, won on the previous day, but still unknown in Paris.

Pétion was chosen President by acclamation. The following secretaries were elected: Condorcet, Brissot, Rabaut Saint-Étienne, Vergniaud, Camus, and Lasource. Five of these were Girondists.

The whole Convention, with the exception of thirty or forty members, was in favor of a Republic. The Girondists, however, in a meeting at Madame Roland's, decided that the discussion upon the change of government should be admitted only at the proper hour and in its regular order, — that is, when all the executive and legislative committees had been lawfully appointed.

On September 20, however, the very day of the battle of Valmy, other fighters were engaged in a far more decisive affray.

Saint-Just, Lequinio, Panis, Billaud Varennes, Collot d'Herbois, and several other members-elect of the Convention, were dining at a restaurant in the Palace Royal. They resolved that by the next day the word Republic should be hurled at their opponents.

"If our opponents take it up," said Saint-Just, "they are lost, for the word will be first pronounced by our party. If our opponents discard that word, they will be equally lost; for in antagonizing this popular passion, the Girondists will be submerged in the unpopularity which we will heap upon their heads."

Collot d'Herbois took it upon himself to make the motion. No sooner had François de Neufchâteau conveyed to the Convention the authority of the old Assembly, than Collot d'Herbois asked for the floor.

His request being granted, he mounted the rostrum, and the watchword was given to the impatient waiters.

He said: "Representative Citizens: I propose that the first decree of the Assembly, which has just met, be the abolition of all royalty."

These words were received with tremendous applause, both from the hall and the galleries.

Only two opponents arose. They were two well-known Republicans, Barrère and Quinette. They asked that the Convention should await the wishes of the people.

"The wishes of the people? What for?" asked a poor village curate. "What is the use of deliberation over a subject upon which all parties are agreed? In the moral order, kings belong to the same class as monsters do in the physical order. Royal Courts are the workshops of all crime. The history of kings is the martyrology of nations!"

The members asked one another who this man could be, who delivered this short but energetic history of royalty. Few only knew his name, which was Grégoire.

The Girondists felt the blow aimed against them. Perhaps they were henceforth to sail only in the wake of the Mountaineers.

Ducos, the friend and pupil of Vergniaud, cried out from his place: "Let us draw up the decree at this very sitting. The decree needs no introduction or explanation. After the light spread abroad by the Tenth of August, the history of the crimes of Louis Sixteenth is a sufficient prelude to your edict abolishing royalty!"

Thus was the balance again restored between the parties. The Mountaineers demanded the abolition of royalty, but the Girondists asked for the establishment of the Republic.

The Republic was not decreed by ballot; it was voted by acclamation. The Deputies threw themselves into the future, not merely for the sake of fleeing from the past. They rushed into the unknown, out of hatred for the known.

The proclamation of the Republic met an immense popular need. It was the consecration of the long struggle sustained by the people, since their rights had begun to receive legislative recognition; and they had, through their Commune, taken the law into their own hands. This decree involved the absolution, from all offences, of the Maillotins, of the League, of the Jacquerie, of the Fronde, of the Revolution, — the acquittal of all sinners against royalty. The proclamation of the Republic meant the crowning of the masses at the expense of kings.

So much more freely did every citizen breathe, that it seemed as if the weight of the throne had been lifted from every breast.

The ensuing hours of illusion were short, but splendid. It was supposed that a Republic had been proclaimed. Instead of that, a lawless rebellion had been consecrated. No matter! A great deed had been done, which would shake the world for more than a century.

Those true Republicans, the Girondists, — who were at least the purest, and wished the Republic to be free from crimes, and intended, the next day, to hurl themselves in the face of the triumvirate of Danton, Robespierre, and Marat, — the Girondists were filled with joy.

For them the Republic meant the realization of their fondest wishes. Thanks to them, the true type of human government, lost beneath the ruins of twenty centuries, was found again. Under Francis the First and Louis Fourteenth, France had been a subjugated Athens. Under Girondist lead, she would become an independent Sparta.

This was a beautiful, a sublime dream; and this is why the Girondists that evening held a banquet at the home of Minister Roland. There were assembled Vergniaud, Guadet, Louvet, Pétion, Boyer Fonfrède, Barbaroux, Gensonné, Grangeneuve, and Condorcet. Before another year had elapsed these guests were to meet at another banquet, far more solemn even than this one! but for the present, each turned his back on the morrow, shut his eyes to the future, and willingly drew a curtain before the vision of that unknown ocean upon which they were launched; though they could already hear the roaring of that whirlpool, which, like the Maelstrom of Scandinavian legends, was soon to absorb, if not the whole ship, at least the pilots and crew.

Their thought was born. It had taken to itself a form, — "a local habitation and a name." There it stood before their eyes! The young Republic had sprung forth, all armed with helmet and spear, like Minerva from the head of Jove. What more could these pure-minded Republicans desire?

During the two hours which this solemn love-feast lasted, — like the agapæ of the early Christians, — high thoughts were exchanged, upheld with great devotion. These men were talking about their lives, as of something which no more belonged to themselves, but to the Nation. They reserved to themselves only their honor!

that was all. If need be, they would relinquish fame and renown.

Some there were, in the foolish intoxication of youthful hope, who saw opening before them those cerulean and infinite horizons, found only in dreams. These were the young and fiery spirits, who had but recently entered that most exacting of all struggles, the contest of the political arena. Among these were Barbaroux, Rebecqui, Ducos, and Boyer Fonfrède.

Others there were who halted by the roadside, in order to regain strength for the remaining journey. These were the men who had borne the heat and burden of the legislative day, — men like Guadet, Gensonné, Grangeneuve, and Vergniaud.

Finally, there were those who felt that they had reached the goal, and understood that their popularity was on the wane. Lying under the shade of the ripening foliage of the Tree of the Republic, they sadly asked themselves whether it was really worth their while once more to rise, gird up their loins, and resume the pilgrim staff, only to stumble over the first obstacle. Such men were Roland and Pétion.

In the eyes of all these men, who was their future chief? Who was the principal founder of the young Republic, and must be its future regulator? — Vergniaud!

When dinner was ended, he filled his glass and said: "Friends, a toast!"

All stood, like himself, and he continued: "To the immortality of the Republic!"

All repeated after him: "To the immortality of the Republic!"

He was about to put the glass to his lips, when Madame Roland exclaimed, "Wait!"

She wore on her bosom a fresh rose, — just blossoming, like the new era upon which they were entering. She took this rose, and as an Athenian woman scattered leaves into the goblet of Pericles, so did Madame Roland scatter these rose-leaves in Vergniaud's glass.

Vergniaud smiled sadly, drained the glass, and then whispered to Barbaroux, who sat at his left hand: "Alas! I fear that noble soul is mistaken. Not rose-leaves, but cypress twigs should flavor our wine to-night. In drinking to a republic whose feet are wet with the blood of September's horrors, God knows if we are not drinking to our own destruction. — Never mind!" he added, raising a sublime look to Heaven, "were this wine my heart's blood, I would drink it to Liberty and Equality!"

"The Republic forever!" repeated all the guests in chorus.

Almost at that very moment, when Vergniaud offered his toast, and the guests were responding with cheers for the Republic, trumpets were sounding in front of the Temple, imposing a great stillness.

From their chambers, the windows being open, the King and Queen could hear a city officer, with a sonorous, firm, and powerful voice, proclaiming the abolition of Royalism and the establishment of the Republic.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

ROMANCE OF THE MARTYRED KING.

THOUGH printing under the form of fiction, my readers can see with what impartiality I have placed before their eyes, not only the terrible, the cruel, the bloodthirsty, the debased features of the Revolutionists, and the events which they fostered, but also the good, the beautiful, the sublime elements of those same people and events.

To-day those persons are dead of whom I write. The events only remain. Immortalized by History, they can never die.

I would gladly summon from the grave all those of whom I speak, — so few of whom filled out the appointed measure of their days, — and ask them if I have not pictured their careers, not perhaps exactly as they were, — for who can claim to know all mysteries? — but as they have seemed to my honest convictions.

I would say to Mirabeau, "Tribune, arise!" to Louis Sixteenth, "Martyr, arise!" I would say: "Rise, all of you, — Favras, Lafayette, Bailly, Fournier the American, Jourdan the Headsman, Maillard, Théroigne de Méricourt, Barnave, Bouillé, Gamain, Pétion, Manuel, Danton, Robespierre, Marat, Vergniaud, Dumouriez, Marie Antoinette, Madame Campan, Barbaroux, Roland, Madame Roland, — king, queen, artisan, orators, generals, murderers, politicians! Rise, and declare if I have not candidly presented you to my own generation, — to the low, to the exalted, especially to women, — that is, to the mothers of our sons, whom we would gladly instruct in history."

To the long lines of events, standing on either side of the road we have travelled together, I would thus appeal: "Great and luminous Fourteenth of July! Dark and threatening Fifth and Sixth of October! Thou crimson storm in the Champ de Mars, when powder was mixed with lightning, and the thunder of cannon mingled with heaven's artillery! thou prophetic invasion of the Twentieth of June! thou terrible victory of the Tenth of August; thou awful memory of the Second and Third of September! To all of you I say: Have I truthfully represented you? Have I told your story well? Have I wittingly lied about you? Have I unfairly tried to calumniate or defend you?"

The men and women would reply, the events would reply: "Thou hast sought the truth, without hatred or passion. Thou hast believed, or thou wouldst not have spoken. Thou hast been faithful to the glories of the past, insensible to the allurements of the present, confident in the hopes of the future. Be thou absolved! Be thou acquitted!"

Well, what I have so far done, not as an appointed judge, but as an impartial narrator, I shall continue to do unto the end; and that end we are approaching rapidly. We are sliding down the steep incline of events, and there are few breathing-places between September 21, 1792, — the day of the monarchy's demise, — and January 21, 1793, — the day of the monarch's doom.

We have heard the proclamation of the Republic, made beneath the royal prison-house, by the strong voice of Municipal Lubin; and that proclamation naturally summons us to that prison, — the Temple.

Let us enter into that gloomy edifice, wherein is confined a king who is fast becoming a man, a queen who still a queen remains, a virgin martyr, and two poor children, innocent by their years, if not by their birth.

The King was in the Temple. How came he there? Was it deliberately planned to send him to this shameful prison? No!

To begin with, Pétion had an idea of transporting Louis to the interior of France, assigning him Chambord for his estate, and treating him as a sort of used-up sovereign.

If all the European monarchs would have curbed their generals, their ministers, and their manifestos, and have been content to note what was going on in France without meddling with her politics, then the throne-forfeiture of August 10, this secluded residence in a beautiful palace, with a fine climate, in the midst of what is well called the Garden of France, — all this would not have been a severe retribution for a man expiating, not merely his own faults, but those of the two Louis preceding him, the Fourteenth and Fifteenth.

However, there had just been a Royalist revolt in the Vendée, and it was objected that there might be a rescuing dash along the Loire. This reason appeared weighty, and so Chambord was passed by.

The Assembly suggested the Luxembourg, in Paris itself. The Luxembourg, a Florentine palace which had belonged to Marie de Medicis, — with its lovely solitude, and gardens which rivalled those of the Tuileries, — would have been a residence not less desirable than Chambord for a deposed ruler.

To this place it was objected that the cellars under the palace opened into the catacombs, which had recently been found both unsafe and unwholesome. Perhaps this was only a pretext on the part of the Commune, because the Council wished to have the King directly under its fist; but it was a plausible pretext.

The Commune decided for the Temple, the edifice which had formerly belonged to the Order of Knights Templar, so persecuted by Philip the Fair. By this decision was intended not the Grand Tower, or Donjon of the Temple, but the part called the Palace, which was of yore the Commandery of the Chiefs of the Templars, and later became a pleasure-house for Count d'Artois, the youngest brother of Louis the Sixteenth, and afterwards King of France.

At the very moment when Pétion was taking the royal prisoners to the Temple Palace, just as they were being installed there, and Louis was making his household arrangements, a denunciation reached the Commune, which led the Council to send Manuel to make a change in the municipal arrangements, and substitute the old Donjon in place of the Palace.

Manuel came and inspected the place designed as the home of King Louis and Marie Antoinette, and went away somewhat mortified.

The Donjon was really uninhabitable, and had only been occupied by a sort of janitor. Its narrow apartments did not afford sufficient room. The beds were inconvenient and alive with vermin.

All this arose less from reprehensible premeditation on the part of the judges, than from that fatality which weighs down a dying race.

The National Assembly did not dicker about the expense of gratifying the royal palate. The King was a hearty eater. This is not adduced by way of reproach. It belongs to the temperament of the Bourbons to be great eaters! Louis Sixteenth, however, ate at awkward times. He ate, and with a good appetite, even while the slaughter was going on at the Tuileries. During his trial, not only did his judges reproach him with his unseasonable repast, but — what is worse — implacable History recorded the facts in her archives.

The National Assembly granted 500,000 francs for the expenses of the royal appetite. During the four months the King remained in the Temple, the cost was 40,000 francs, — 10,000 francs per month, over 333 francs a day. This was to be reckoned in paper assignats, it is true; but at that date the assignats had only fallen off some six or eight per cent.

In the Temple, Louis had three personal and thirteen table servants. He had four courses every day at dinner. There were six roasts, four side dishes, three varieties of jam, three dishes of fruit, a decanter of bordeaux, a decanter of malvoisie, a decanter of madeira. He and his little son drank wine. The Queen and the Princesses drank only water.

On the gastronomical side, therefore, the King had nothing to complain of; but he wofully lacked air and exercise, sunshine and shade.

Formerly accustomed to the chase at Compiègne and Rambouillet, to the parks of Versailles and the Grand Trianon, and latterly to the drives and walks from and around the Tuileries, Louis now found himself reduced, not to a courtyard merely, not to a garden, not even to a small park, but to a little piece of dry and barren earth, with four beds of exhausted turf, some decaying and stunted trees, made leafless by the autumnal gales.

In this place, every day at two o'clock, the royal family promenaded; or rather, let us say, that there, at two daily, the royal family were led up and down.

This was something unfamiliar, disagreeable, harsh; but it was less harsh and disagreeable than the cellars of the Inquisition at Madrid, the lead-mines established by the Council of Ten at Venice, or the dungeons at Spielberg, where monarchs often sent their political offenders.

Let it be well understood that while we do not excuse the Commune, neither do we excuse the kings. We simply say that the Temple was a reprisal, — a fatal, ill-advised, a terrible reprisal; whereas this penalty has been represented as persecution, and thus the culprit has been transformed into a martyr.

Meanwhile, what was the present aspect of the different personages whom we have undertaken to follow in the principal phases of their lives?

The King, with his near-sightedness, his flaccid cheeks, his hanging lips, his heavy and uncertain gait, seemed like some worthy farmer, bowed down by misfortune. His sadness was like that of an agriculturist, when a hail-storm has bruised his crops and the lightning has fired his barns.

The Queen's attitude was as usual, quiet, supercilious and highly antagonistic. In the days of her grandeur, Marie Antoinette inspired love. In the hour of her downfall, she inspired much devotion, but no pity. Pity is born of sympathy, and sympathy the Queen did not win.

Madame Elizabeth, with her white robe, symbolic of her moral and physical purity, with her blond hair, which was all the more beautiful, now that she was forced to wear it loose and unpowdered, — with blue ribbons on her cap and about her waist, — seemed like the guardian angel of the family.

Despite the charm of her youth, Madame Royale was not very interesting. A complete Austrian, like her mother, — another Marie Antoinette or Maria Theresa, — she already displayed the contempt and pride which belong alike to royal families and birds of prey.

The little Dauphin was somewhat interesting, with his golden locks, and his fair but somewhat sickly complexion; yet his blue eye was stern and bold, and he often wore an expression beyond his age. He understood everything, and could catch the suggestions which his mother gave him in a single glance. He had all the juvenile trickery and witchery which often draws tears from executioners themselves. He even touched Chaumette, — poor child! — Chaumette, that marten with a pointed snout, that weasel in spectacles.

"I would give him an education," said the ex-clerk to Hue, the King's valet; "but it would be necessary to take him away from his family, so that he would forget his rank."

The Commune officers were both cruel and imprudent, — cruel in subjecting the royal family to such harsh treatment, to vexations, and even insults; imprudent in letting the royal family be seen in its feeble and crushed condition.

Every day new guardians were sent to the Temple, who were called municipals. They entered the Temple sworn enemies of the King. They came out the sworn enemies of Marie Antoinette, but feeling softer towards the King, pitying the children, and glorifying Madame Elizabeth.

In place of the wolf, the she-wolf, and the cubs, whom did they find in the Temple? They found a middle-class family. They found the mother somewhat lofty, — a sort of Elmira, who would not allow anybody to touch the hem of her gown; but they found no trace of a tyrant.

How did the day pass with this family? Let us see how the time was employed, as we learn it from Cléry, the valet devoted to his master till the last minute.

First let us look about the prison, and afterwards return to the prisoners.

The King was confined in the Small Tower. The Small Tower was back to back with the Large Tower, but there was no interior connection between them. The Small Tower was square, and flanked by two turrets. In one of these turrets was a small staircase, which ran from the main story to the gallery on the flat roof. In the other turret were small rooms, mere cabinets, corresponding to each floor of the Small Tower.

There were four stories in the main part of this Small Tower. The main story, up one flight from the court-yard, was divided into an antechamber, an eating-room, and the small room, or cabinet, in the turret.

The next story was divided in much the same way. Here the large room served for the bedroom of the Queen and Dauphin. The second room, separated from the first by a dark little entry, was occupied by Madame Elizabeth and Madame Royale. In order to enter the cabinet in the turret, it was necessary to pass through this bedroom; and this turret-cabinet, — which, by the way, was only what the English call a toilet-closet, — was used in common by the royal family, the municipal guardians, and the soldiers.

The King occupied the suite up three flights, which contained the same number of rooms. He slept in the largest. The cabinet in the adjoining turret served him for a little study. Beside it was a kitchen, with a little anteroom, which at first, before they were separated from him, was occupied by Chamilly and Hue, but was afterwards sealed up.

The upper story was closed. The basement was consecrated to old kitchens and sculleries, long disused.

How did the royal family manage to live in such narrow quarters, half tenement and half prison? We shall see.

The King rose regularly at six o'clock in the morning. He shaved himself, as long as he was allowed to do so.

Cléry brushed his hair and helped him dress. As soon as he was brushed and dressed he went into his study, — that is, into a library, in which were fifteen or sixteen hundred volumes, besides the ancient archives of the Knights of the Order of Malta.

One day the King found among these books, and pointed out to Hue, the works of Voltaire and Rousseau. "These," he said, in a low voice, "are the men who have ruined France!"

When he entered this room each morning, Louis usually knelt five or six minutes in prayer. Then he read till nine. During this time Cléry put the King's chamber in order, arranged breakfast, and went downstairs to the Queen's apartments.

While alone in this cabinet, Louis amused himself by translating from Virgil or the Odes of Horace; for in order to keep up the Dauphin's education, he resumed the study of Latin.

This cabinet was very small. The door was always open; and a municipal officer was always in the bedroom, whence he could look through the open door, and see what the King was about.

The Queen did not open her door till Cléry's arrival; in order, the door being shut, that the municipal officer might not come in.

Cléry would dress the young Prince's hair, arrange the Queen's toilet, and then go into the other chamber to render Madame Royale and Madame Elizabeth the same service. This moment of toilet was both rapid and precious, for it was the only time when Cléry could tell the ladies whatever outside information he had gleaned. If he made a certain sign, which meant that he had something to say, the Queen, or one of the ladies, would enter into some conversation with the official, and Cléry would take advantage of this distraction to whisper what he had to say.

At nine the ladies and children went up to the King's chamber, where breakfast was served. During the dessert Cléry went downstairs again, and put the Queen's apartments in order.

A man named Tison, with his wife, had been ordered to join Cléry, under the pretence of aiding him in his work, but really to act as spies, not only upon the royal family, but upon the guards also. The husband, formerly a clerk in the city excise-office at one of the barriers, was a harsh and malicious old fellow, incapable of any humane sentiments. The woman, made more womanly by the love she bore for her daughter, carried that love to such an extreme that once, when separated from her child, she denounced the Queen, in the hope that thus her daughter might be restored to her, — a pathetic story, which is related in the work which follows this one, "Le Chevalier de Maison-Rouge."

At ten o'clock in the morning, after breakfast, the King went down to the Queen's room, and there passed the day. He occupied himself almost exclusively with the Dauphin, making him repeat passages from Corneille or Racine, giving him a lesson in geography, and letting him draw maps. For three or four years France had been divided into departments, and it was particularly the geography of the kingdom in which the King instructed his son.

On her part the Queen busied herself with teaching Madame Royale. These lessons were often interrupted by the mother's relapse into deep and gloomy reveries. When this happened, her daughter would leave her alone in that mysterious grief, unblessed with tears, and withdraw on tiptoe, making a sign for her brother to keep silence. The Queen would remain some time thus absorbed. Then a tear would appear on her eyelash, steal down her cheek, and fall upon her yellow hand, which had taken on an ivory tint. Then the poor prisoner — who had been for a while set free in an immense domain of thought, in the limitless field of remembrance — would emerge abruptly from her dream; and, looking about her, she would find herself again in her prison-house, her heart bruised, and her head bowed with shame.

At noon the three ladies assembled in Madame Elizabeth's room, in order to change their morning gowns, this being the one moment when the modesty of the Commune left them alone, and no guard was present.

At one o'clock, when the weather permitted, the royal family were taken down into the garden. Four municipals and an officer of the National Guards accompanied them, or rather watched them. As there were many workmen about the Temple, employed in demolishing old buildings and putting up new walls, the prisoners were only allowed to use that part called Chestnut Alley.

Cléry was also present at these outings, and gave the young Prince a little exercise at playing ball and quoits.

At three they all returned to the Small Tower. Cléry served the dinner. Every day at that hour Commander Santerre came to the Temple, accompanied by two aides, and examined scrupulously the apartments both of the King and Queen.

Sometimes the King spoke to him; but the Queen, never. She had forgotten June 20, and what she owed to that man's friendship, the first time the mob overran the Tuileries.

After dinner they all went upstairs again. The King played a game of piquet or backgammon with the Queen or his sister, while Cléry took his turn at dining.

At four o'clock the King stretched himself for a siesta, on a lounge or in a big armchair. Then the profoundest silence reigned. The ladies took their work or some books, and everybody was mute, even the little Dauphin.

Louis Sixteenth passed from wakefulness to slumber almost without an interval, — such was the tyrannical rule over him of his corporeal needs. He slept usually from an hour and a half to two hours.

When he awoke, conversation was resumed. Cléry was called, for he was never far off, and gave the little Dauphin a writing-lesson. Then he took him into Madame Elizabeth's room, and made him play battledoor and shuttlecock.

When evening came, the royal family gathered about a table. The Queen read aloud something to amuse and instruct the children. Aunt Elizabeth took the Queen's place when she was weary. This reading lasted till eight o'clock.

At eight the Prince had his supper in Aunt Elizabeth's chamber. The family were in the room while he ate; and from a set of the "French Mercury," which the King had found in the library, he gave out enigmas and conundrums for his children to guess.

After the Dauphin's supper, the Queen heard him say his little prayer:

ALL-POWERFUL GOD, who hast created and redeemed me, thee I adore. Prolong the days of the King my father, and also those of all my family. Protect us from our enemies. Give Madame de Tourzel the strength she needs to bear what she endures on our account.

Then Cléry undressed the boy and put him to bed, and one of the younger ladies remained near him until he fell asleep.

Every night about that hour a newspaper-carrier went along the street crying aloud the news of the day. Cléry would be on the alert, and then repeat to the King the crier's words.

At nine the King took his supper. On a tray, Cléry carried some food to whichever lady was still watching with the Dauphin.

His repast finished, the King would go into the Queen's chamber, to wave an adieu to her and his sister, and kiss the children, and then would go up to his own apartments, where he would sit in the little library and read till midnight.

When the King had gone the ladies would shut themselves in, an official staying in the small entry which separated their two chambers. The other official always followed the King upstairs.

Cléry placed his bed near the King's; but before lying down Louis always waited till the new official came upstairs, in order to ascertain who he was, and if he had ever been on duty before. There was always a change of guards at eleven in the forenoon, five in the afternoon, and at midnight.

This sort of life lasted, without any change, as long as the King remained in the Small Tower, — that is, till September 30.

As one can see, the situation was sad, and the worthier of pity because borne so nobly. The most hostile onlookers were softened by the sight. They came to keep watch over an abominable tyrant, who had ruined France, slaughtered Frenchmen, and appealed to foreign armies, — over a Queen who united the sensuality of Messalina with the depravity of Catherine Second. They found a man clad in gray, whom they might readily mistake for his valet, — a man who ate well, drank well, slept well, played backgammon and piquet, taught his boy Latin and geography, and made his children solve riddles. They found a woman undoubtedly proud and disdainful, but noble, calm, resigned, and still beautiful, teaching her girl embroidery and her boy his prayers, speaking softly to the servants, and saying my friend, even to a humble and deferential valet.

The first hours were full of hatred. Each guard came with sentiments of vengeance and animosity in his heart, and gave free course to these sentiments. Gradually he relented. Leaving home in the morning with a high head and threatening aspect, these men would return to their homes in the evening with a gloomy air and bowed head.

The wife of one of these men was waiting for him with much curiosity.

"Ah, it 's thee!" she cried.

"Yes!" responded the municipal, laconically.

"Well, hast thou seen the tyrant?"

"Yes, I 've seen him!"

"Has he a ferocious look?"

"He looks like a retired grocer in the Marais District."

"What was he doing? Swearing, cursing the Republic —?"

"He passes his time in studying with his younkets, teaching them Latin, playing piquet with his sister, and propounding enigmas to amuse his wife."

"Has n't he any remorse, the wretch?"

"I saw him eat. He eats like a man with a tranquil conscience. I saw him sleep, and I 'll bet he never has the nightmare."

Then the wife would become pensive in her turn, and presently she would say: "So he can't be as cruel and guilty as folks say?"

"Guilty? Well I don't know. — Cruel? I should say not! — Unhappy? Most decidedly!"

"Poor man!" the wife would ejaculate.

This is what happened. The more the Communists humiliated the prisoner, the more they tried to show that he was only a man like any other, the more those other men pitied one in whom they recognized a fellow-man.

Sometimes this sympathy manifested itself directly to the King, or to Cléry and the Dauphin.

One day a stonecutter was busy making holes in the wall of the antechamber, where some enormous bolts were to be inserted. While the workman was taking his breakfast, the Dauphin amused himself by playing with the tools. Then the King took the chisel and mallet from the boy, and handled them in such a way as to show that he was a skilful locksmith and mechanic.

The mason looked on in amazement, from the corner where he was munching his bread and cheese. He had not shown the King and the Prince the courtesy of rising, but now he rose in respect for the man and his child. Approaching them, with his mouth full of bread, but with his cap in his hand, he said to the King: "When you go out of this Donjon you can say you worked at your own prison-bars!"

"Ah! When and how shall I go out?" said the King.

The Dauphin began to cry. The mason dried a tear. The King dropped chisel and hammer, and went into his chamber, where he walked the room for a long time.

Another day a suburban was acting as sentinel at the Queen's door, — a man coarsely dressed, but with a strong sense of propriety. Cléry was alone in the room, reading. The sentinel watched him very attentively. Presently, called elsewhere by his duties, Cléry rose and started to go out; but the sentinel presented arms, and said in a low and timid voice, almost trembling: "You can't pass here!"

"Why not?" asked Cléry.

"Because my orders are to keep my eye on you."

"On me? Surely you must be mistaken!"

"Are n't you the King?"

"Then you don't know the King?"

"I have never seen him, Monsieur; and, if I must say it, if I see him at all, I would rather see him somewhere else."

"Speak low!" said Cléry. Then pointing to a door he added: "I 'm going into that chamber, and then you can see the King. He sits at a table, reading."

Cléry went in, and told the King what had happened; so the King rose and walked into the other room, that the good fellow might see him more readily.

Suspecting that it was solely on his account that the King was taking this trouble, the sentinel said to Cléry: "Ah Monsieur! how good the King is. As for me, I don't believe he has done half so much mischief as they say!"

A sentinel, stationed at the end of the alley which served as the promenade for the royal family, one day gave them to understand that he had some information to communicate. At the first turn in their walk, nobody appeared to give any attention to these signs; but at the second turn Madame Elizabeth approached the soldier, to see if he would speak to her. Unhappily the young man, who had a distinguished bearing, remained mute, either through fear or respect; but tears filled his eyes, and he pointed to a pile of rubbish, where a letter was probably concealed.

Under pretence of finding some stones for the little Prince's quoits, Cléry began to search among the dirt; but the officials, doubtless suspecting what he was after, ordered Cléry to desist, and forbade his ever talking with the sentinels, under pain of being separated from his master.

All who came near the prisoners did not show the same sentiments of respect and pity. Hatred and vengeance were so strongly rooted in many minds as not to be eradicable by the sight of royal misfortunes, though borne with middle-class virtue, and consequently both King and Queen had to hear gross remarks and insults.

One day the official on duty near the King was a man named James, a teacher of English. This man stuck to the King like his shadow, never leaving him. When the King went into his little library to read, this official followed, and sat down near the prisoner.

"Monsieur," said the King, with his habitual mildness, "your comrades have usually left me alone when I came into this little room, — so small, that I cannot elude their watch when the door is open."

"My colleagues can take their own way, and I 'll take mine."

"Notice if you please, Monsieur, that the room is not large enough for two."

"Then go into the larger room!" harshly replied the official.

Without saying another word the King rose and went into the bedroom. The Englishman followed, and was in Louis's way till the guard was relieved.

The sentinels were regularly changed at midnight. One morning the King supposed the official on duty was the same who had been there the evening before; so he went to him, and said, with some interest: "Ah, Monsieur, I 'm sorry they forgot to relieve you from duty!"

"What do you mean?" was the surly reply.

"I only meant to say that you must be tired."

"Citizen," answered the fellow, whose name was Meunier, "I 'm here to watch you, and not for you to concern yourself with my affairs." Putting on his cap, he went closer to the King, and added: "Nobody, and you less than anybody else, has any right to meddle with me!"

One day the Queen ventured to speak to an official, who was present during dinner. "In what section do you live, Monsieur?"

"In my own country!" he proudly replied.

"But it seems to me that your country is all France," replied the Queen.

"Except the part occupied by the enemies whom you have brought into it."

Some of the commissioners would never speak to any member of the royal family without adding some obscene epithet or ringing oath.

One day an official named Turlot said to Cléry, loud enough for the King to hear every word: "If the headsman don't guillotine this sacred family pretty soon, I 'll guillotine 'em myself."

In going out for their walk the royal family had to pass by a large number of sentinels, several of whom were stationed in the interior of the Small Tower. When the military chiefs and the municipals passed by, the guards presented arms; but when the King came along, they would ground their arms or turn their backs.

It was the same with the outside guards on duty at the foot of the Tower. When the King came along, they would ostentatiously keep their caps on, or sit down; but as soon as he had passed by, they would stand up again, and take off their caps.

These insults were carried yet farther. One day a sentinel, not content with presenting arms to the military and municipal officers, while he refused to do so to the King, wrote as follows on the interior of the prison door:

The guillotine is a fixture, and awaits the tyrant, Louis Sixteenth!

This was a new device, and became very popular. This writer had many imitators. Very soon the walls of the Temple, especially on the staircase used by the royal family, were covered with such inscriptions as these:

We must put the fat hog on short allowance.

Down with the red ribbon! Strangle the Cubs!

Other inscriptions, like the title under a picture, explained some impertinent sketch.

Under the drawing of a hangman's noose was this sentence:

Madame Veto will dance!

Beneath the picture of a man on the gallows was the motto:

Louis taking an air-bath!

The most aggravating tormentors were two men who were always at the Temple, — Simon the shoemaker and Rocher the sapper.

Simon was a monopolist. He held all sorts of places. Not only was he a shoemaker, but a municipal official. Moreover he was one of six commissioners, charged with inspecting the work and surroundings of the Temple.

By virtue of these three occupations he never left the Donjon.

This man, celebrated for his subsequent ill-treatment of the little Dauphin, was the personification of impudence. Every time he came into the presence of the prisoners, it was for the purpose of inflicting some new outrage.

If the valet asked for something for the King, Simon would say: "Let Capet ask for what he wants all at once. I can't run up and down to please him!"

In impertinence Rocher was his equal, but he was not so bad a man. On August 10 it was Rocher who caught up the little Prince, outside the Assembly door, and placed him in safety on the President's table.

From being a saddler, Rocher became a military officer under Santerre, and then a janitor in the Temple. He usually wore his sapper's uniform and a black fur cap, and carried a large sabre. His beard and mustache were long. About his waist was a belt, from which depended his great bunch of keys.

He was placed in the Tower by Manuel, to watch over the royal prisoners, and prevent others from doing them any mischief, — not for the sake of harming them himself. He resembled a child, set to guard a cageful of birds, with directions not to let anybody harm them, but who amuses himself by pulling out their feathers.

When the King wished to go out, Rocher would appear at the door, but he would not open the door till he had made the King wait, while the janitor jingled his big bunch of keys. Then he would pull the bolts with a bang. When the bolts were drawn and the door was open, Rocher would rush downstairs, and place himself by the last wicket, at the end of the archway, with a pipe in his mouth. As each member of the royal family came out, but particularly the ladies, he would blow a puff of smoke into their faces.

These miserable cowards did these things in the presence of National Guards, who, instead of checking them, often brought their chairs, and sat down to enjoy the fun, like spectators at a play.

This encouraged Rocher, who went everywhere bragging: "Marie Antoinette may be awfully proud, but I've brought her down, I have! Elizabeth and the girl have to knock down to me, in spite of themselves. The wicket is so low that they have to bow down when they go through it! Every day I give one or t' other of 'em a taste of my pipe. One day the sister says to the commissioner, says she: 'Why does Rocher smoke all the time?'—'Apparently because he chooses!' says the commissioner."

In all such great expiations, besides the penalty inflicted upon the victims, there is always some fellow who makes them drink the gall to its very dregs. For Louis Sixteenth this tormentor was Simon or Rocher. For Napoleon it was Hudson Lowe. These are the very men whose behavior causes others to idealize the victim's suffering, and sanctify his death, when he has submitted to the last penalty, and is done with life. Would Saint Helena be Saint Helena, without the jailer in his red coat? Would the Temple be the Temple without its sapper and its cobbler? Such men are genuine parts of the romance. They rightfully make a part of long and lugubrious popular stories.

Unhappy as the prisoners were, they had one consolation, that of being together; so the Commune resolved to separate the King from his family.

On September 26, five days after the legal proclamation of the Republic, a municipal told Cléry that the apartments in the Great Tower, destined for the King, would soon be ready for him.

Much distressed, Cléry transmitted this sad news to his master, who received it with his usual courage, and said: "Try to find out beforehand when the painful separation is to take place, and let me know."

Unhappily Cléry could learn and impart nothing more.

On September 29, at ten in the forenoon, six municipals came into the Queen's room, when the royal family were all there together. They brought an order from the Commune, depriving the captives of writing-materials. The search-warrant extended not only to the rooms, but to the persons of the prisoners.

"When you need anything," said the spokesman, whose name was Charbonnier, "your man can come down, and inscribe your wishes in a register, which will be kept in the Council Room."

Neither King nor Queen made any answer. They found and surrendered all the writing-materials they possessed. The others did the same, and the servants followed the royal example.

Then only did Cléry ascertain, by some official words which he overheard, that on that very evening the King would be transferred to the Great Tower. He told Madame Elizabeth, who reported the news forthwith to the King.

Nothing happened till evening. At each noise, at each jar of a door, the prisoners' hearts beat more quickly, and their hands met in an anxious pressure. The King remained in his wife's rooms longer than usual.

The hour of separation came at last. The door opened. The six officials who had been there in the forenoon now came with a new order from the Commune, which one of them read to the King. This was the legal warrant for the King's removal to the Great Tower.

This time the King's self-restraint failed him. Whither were they taking him, along this new and gloomy path? He was entering upon the unknown and mysterious, and he did so with fear and trembling.

The farewells were long and doleful. At last the King must follow the officials. As the door closed behind him, never had it sent forth a sound so melancholy.

In such a hurry were the authorities to impose this new affliction upon their captives, that the apartments to which they conducted the King were not yet in readiness. For furniture, there were only two chairs and a bed. The paint and the paper were not yet dry, and this made the odor of the place unbearable.

The King went to bed without complaining. Cléry slept on a chair near by.

Cléry roused and dressed the King as usual. Then he wished to go back into the Small Tower, to dress the Dauphin, but he was stopped, and one of the officials, named Véron, said to him: "You will have no further communication with the other prisoners. The King is not to see his children again."

This time Cléry had not courage to tell his master the doleful intelligence.

At nine, ignorant of the rigor of the separation, Louis asked to be taken to his family.

"We have no such orders," said the commissioners.

The King insisted, but they made no other answer, and left him.

The King was alone with Cléry, the master seated, and the servant leaning against the wall. Both were completely overcome.

Half an hour later two officials came in, followed by a waiter from a restaurant, bringing some bread and a glass of lemonade.

"Gentlemen," queried the King, "am I not to dine with my family?"

"We take our orders from the Commune," answered one of them.

"But if I can't go down, can't you let my valet go? He has charge of my son, and I hope nothing will prevent his still caring for the boy."

The King asked this favor so simply, and with such an absence of animosity, that the officials were surprised, and did not know what to say. His tone, his manners, and his resignation were so far from what these men expected, that they were dazed, and again went away, only saying that it did not depend upon them.

Cléry stood near the door, looking at his master with deep sympathy. He saw the King take the bread which had been brought to him, and break it in two pieces. One he offered Cléry.

"It appears they have forgotten your breakfast," he said. "Take this half. The other is enough for me."

Cléry refused, but as the King insisted, the valet finally took the bread; but in so doing he could not help bursting into sobs, and the King also wept.

At ten came an official, with the workmen who were putting the rooms into proper condition.

Approaching the King with some pity in his face, the man said: "Monsieur, I was present when your family breakfasted, and I take it upon myself to assure you that they are all in good health."

The King's heart felt a glow of relief. This man's pity did him good.

"I thank you," he said, "and I beg you to report to my family that I also am well. Can I not have some books which I left in the Queen's chamber? If so, you will do me a great favor if you will bring them to me."

The official asked nothing better, but he was greatly embarrassed, not knowing how to read. At last he acknowledged his difficulty to Cléry, and begged him to go also, and pick out the books the King desired.

Cléry was only too glad. By this means he could carry the Queen information about her husband. Louis made a sign with his eyes. This sign contained a world of intelligence.

Cléry found the Queen in her chamber, with Madame Elizabeth and the children. The ladies were weeping. The little Prince had been crying also, but tears vanish quickly from the eyes of children.

Seeing Cléry enter, the ladies rose and questioned him by gestures, though not by words.

The Dauphin ran up to him, crying out: "It 's my good Cléry!"

Unfortunately Cléry could only speak a few cautious words, the two guards, who had come with him, being in the room; but the Queen could not contain herself, and spoke directly to them: "Oh gentlemen, if we are not permitted to live near the King, can you not grant us the favor of seeing him once daily, — say at the dinner hour?"

The other ladies did not speak, but joined their hands supplicatingly.

"Gentlemen," said the Dauphin, "let my father come to us again, and I will pray the good God to bless you."

The municipals looked at each other, but did not reply; this silence drew grievous cries and sobs from the female bosoms.

"On my faith, it can't do any harm," said the man who had conversed with the King upstairs. "Let them dine together to-day."

"But to-morrow?" said the Queen.

"Madame," responded he, "our conduct is regulated by the decrees of the Commune. To-morrow we will see what the Commune ordains. — Is n't that your opinion, Citizen?" he asked of his colleague.

The latter nodded assent. The ladies, who were waiting for this assent with anxiety, uttered a cry of joy. Marie Antoinette clasped her two children to her heart. Madame Elizabeth lifted her hands to Heaven in thankfulness. This unexpected joy, which evoked such cries and tears, seemed almost like grief.

One of the municipals could not restrain his tears; and even Simon said, for he had just come in: "I believe you beggars of women will make me cry, too!"

Then he added, speaking to the Queen: "You did n't cry in this sort of way, Citizeness, when you had folks killed on the Tenth of August!"

"Ah Monsieur," she replied, "the people are deceived as to our sentiments. If they knew us better, they would do as this gentleman does, — they would weep over us."

Cléry took the books the King had asked for, and went upstairs to repeat this good news; but the municipals were in almost as great haste as Cléry. It is so pleasant to be doing good!

Dinner was served in the King's rooms. All the members of the family were brought there. One might have thought it a holiday. Much had been gained by thus gaining a day.

Indeed much more had been gained; for thenceforth nothing was said about the order from the Commune, and the King continued, as heretofore, to see his family during the day, and to eat his meals with them.

CHAPTER XXXV.

IN WHICH MASTER GAMAIN REAPPEARS.

On the morning of the same day, while these events were taking place at the Temple, a man wearing a red cap and a carmagnole jacket, leaning on a crutch which aided his steps, presented himself at the office of the Department of State.

Roland was very accessible; but accessible as he was, he was forced to have ushers in his antechamber, just as much as if he were the minister of a monarch instead of being the secretary of a republic.

The man with the crutch and jacket was therefore obliged to pause in the antechamber, before an usher who barred his passage, asking him: "Whom do you wish to see, Citizen?"

"I wish to talk with the Citizen Minister," said the man in the jacket.

It was now a fortnight since the titles of Citizen and Citizeness had been substituted as a democratic modification of Monsieur and Madame.

Ushers are always ushers, — that is, somewhat impertinent fellows. We refer to the ushers belonging to the official departments. If we were speaking of church vergers, instead of government ushers who sport the chain, we might speak differently.

This usher responded in a patronizing tone: "My friend, you must learn one thing, — that we can't interview Citizen Roland in that way."

"How then should one see the Citizen Minister, Citizen Usher?" asked the man in the red cap.

"He can be seen when one has a written appointment."

"I know things were as you say under the tyrant's reign; but under the Republic, in a time when all men are equal, things are not so stuck-up."

This suggestion made the usher reflect.

"It is not very pleasant, don't you see," continued the man with the red cap, the jacket, and the crutch, "to come from Versailles expressly to render the government a service, and then not have the officer see you."

"You come to render a service to Citizen Roland?"

"A small one."

"And what sort of a service brings you?"

"I come to denounce a conspiracy."

"Goodness! We're up to our ears in conspiracies now."

"Ah!"

"You have come from Versailles just for that?" asked the usher.

"Yes."

"Well, then, you can go back to Versailles."

"All right! I can go back; but your secretary will repent it, if he don't see me."

"Good Lord! that's the order! Write to him, and come back with a letter appointing an audience. Then it'll be all right."

"That's your last word?"

"That's my last word."

"It appears to be more difficult to see Citizen Roland than it was to have an interview with his Majesty Louis Sixteenth."

"How so?"

"I know what I'm talking about."

"Well, what do you know?" asked the usher.

"Well, I know there was a time when I could enter the Tuileries whenever I chose."

"You?"

"Yes, and I had only to give my name at the door."

"What do they call you then, — King Frederick William, or Emperor Francis?"

"No, I'm neither a tyrant, a slave-merchant, nor a nobleman. I call myself simply Nicholas Claude Gamain, master of masters, master over all."

"Master in what?"

"In lockmaking! Did n't you ever hear of Nicholas Claude Gamain, Citizen Capet's old master in the locksmith business?"

"Ah! What! It 's you, Citizen, who are — "

"Nicholas Claude Gamain."

"Locksmith to the former King?"

"His master in lockmaking, — if that 's what you mean, Citizen."

"That 's what I meant to say."

"Yes, that 's me, flesh and bones!"

The usher looked questiouingly at his comrades. They responded with affirmative nods, and so he said: "Then it 's quite a different matter."

"What do you mean by a different matter?"

"It means that if you 'll write your name on a bit of paper, I 'll send that paper in to the Citizen Minister."

"Write? Ah yes, write! Writing was n't my forte, even before those scoundrels poisoned me; but now it 's still worse. See how their arsenic used me up!"

Gamain showed them how his legs were twisted, how his spine was distorted, and how his hands were as crooked and stiff as claws.

"What! Did they deform you in this sort of way, you poor fellow?"

"Themselves! That 's what I want to tell the Citizen Secretary, and many things beside. As they say he 's to be put on trial, that rascally Capet, what I have to say will not perhaps do the Nation any harm, under the present circumstances."

"Very well! Be seated here, Citizen, and I 'll send in your name to the Citizen Minister."

Thereupon the usher wrote as follows:

Claude Nicholas Gamain, formerly master locksmith to the King, asks for an immediate audience with the Citizen Secretary, in order to make important revelations.

This paper he gave to one of his comrades, whose special business it was to announce visitors. In five minutes this comrade returned and said: "Follow me, Citizen!" Gamain made an effort to rise, which wrung from him a cry of pain, and followed the usher.

The usher conducted Gamain not into the office of the nominal minister, Citizen Roland, but into the office of the real minister, Citizeness Roland. It was a small room, hung with green paper, lighted by a single window, in whose recess was a little table, at which Madame Roland was seated with her work.

Roland was standing by the fireplace. The usher announced Citizen Nicholas Claude Gamain, and Citizen Nicholas Claude Gamain appeared at the door.

The master locksmith never had a very prepossessing personal appearance, even in the times of his best health and prosperity; but the malady to which he was now a prey — and which was nothing but severe rheumatism in the joints — so distorted his limbs and disfigured his face as not to add to his usual beauty.

When the usher closed the door behind Gamain, never did an honest man, — and it must be said that never did anybody deserve this title of honest man better than Roland, — never, we say, did an honest man, with a calm and placid countenance, find himself face to face with such a low-lived rascal, with a more repulsive physiognomy.

Roland's first sentiment was one of deep repugnance. He looked at Citizen Gamain from head to foot. Noticing that he was trembling on his crutch, a sentiment of pity for one of his fellow-men, — if one can suppose Citizen Gamain to be the fellow of Citizen Roland, — a sentiment of pity inspired the first word spoken to the locksmith.

"Sit down, Citizen! You appear to be suffering."

"I guess I am suffering," said Gamain, as he sat down. "It has been so ever since that Austrian wench poisoned me."

At these words an expression of profound disgust passed over Roland's face, and he exchanged a glance with his wife, who was half hidden in the alcove.

"Did you come here to denounce this crime?" asked Roland.

"For that and other things."

"Do you bring any proof of your denunciations?"

"Oh, as to that, you 've only to come with me to the Tuileries, and you 'll see the closet."

"What closet?"

"The closet where that rascal kept his treasures. Oh, I might have known something was up, when the work was done, and that Austrian woman said to me, in her wheedling way: 'You 're warm, Gamain! Drink this glass of wine, Gamain! It 'll do you good!' — I might a' known the wine was poisoned!"

"Poisoned?"

"Yes! I might a' known," continued Gamain, with an expression of gloomy hate, "that men as helps kings to hide their treasures can't expect to live long afterwards."

Roland approached his wife, and questioned her with his eyes; and she replied: There is something at the bottom of all this, my dear. I recall this man's name. He was the King's teacher in lockmaking."

"And this closet, this safe?"

"Ask him more about that closet!"

"About that closet?" replied Gamain, who overheard her. "Oh, I 'll tell you about that. It 's an iron cupboard, with an invisible lock, in which Citizen Capet concealed his gold and his papers."

"And how did you learn about the existence of this closet?"

"Because I was sent for, me and my companion, from Versailles, to fix a lock which he 'd made, and which would n't go right."

"But this safe was probably broken open and pillaged on the Tenth of August!"

"No danger of that!" said Gamain.

"Why was there no danger?"

"Because I 'll defy anybody in this world, except him and me, to find it, — much more to open it."

"Are you sure?"

"Sure and certain! As it was when he quit the Tuileries, so it is to-day."

"And at what period did you and King Louis Sixteenth fix this safe?"

"Well, I can't exactly tell, but it was a year or more before he ran away to Varennes."

"And how did it come about? — Let us hear! — You must pardon me, my friend, but this affair appears so extraordinary, that before going to see the safe, I should like to know the particulars."

"Oh, the details are easily given, Citizen Minister, and they 'll turn out all correct. Capet sent to Versailles for me. My wife did n't want me to come. Poor wife! She had a presentiment. She says to me: 'The King 's in a bad fix. Thee 'll be compromised through him!' — But I says to her: 'When he sends to me for a matter connected with my trade, and he 's my pupil, why, I ought to go.' — 'Goodness!' says she, 'there 's some politics underneath it. He 's at something else besides lockmaking!' — "

"In short, my friend, in spite of your wife's advice, you came to Paris?"

"Yes. Better if I 'd listened to her! I should n't a' been in this fix. — But they shall pay me, the poisoners!"

"Then — ?"

"Ah, yes, — to return to the safe — "

"Yes, my friend; and will you try not to detain me longer than you can help? All my time belongs to the Republic, and I have very little to spare."

"Well, then he showed me a secret lock, which would n't work. He had made it himself, which proves that if it had, he would n't have sent for me, — the traitor!"

"He showed you a lock which would n't work?" repeated Roland, trying to keep Gamain on the track.

"Well, he says to me: 'Why don't it work, Gamain?' — Says I to him: 'Sire, I must examine the lock!' — Says he: 'That 's fair!' — Then I examined the lock, and I says to him: 'Do you know why the lock don't work?' — 'No,' says he, 'or I should n't ask you.' —

'Well, it don't work, Sire,' — they called him Sire, in those days, — the scamp! — 'it don't work, Sire, — it 's all simple enough, — it don't go' — Well, follow my reasoning now; for not being so well up in lockmaking as the King, you won't be able to understand me. — That is, — no, — now I think of it, it was n't a double lock, — it was a casket lock."

"It 's all one to me, my friend," replied Roland. "As you have surmised, I 'm not so well posted in lockmaking as the King, and I don't know one lock from another."

"I can explain the difference in a touch of the finger — "

"Needless! You explained to the King, you say — "

"Why the lock did n't work. — Shall I explain to you why it would n't work?"

"If you wish," answered Roland, who began to think it might be best to abandon Gamain to his prolixity.

"Well, it would n't work, you understand, because the projection of the key pressed so hard on the beard of the lock, that the spring could only go half a circle, and because, at that point, it was n't filed away enough, and so it didn't hold. That was the matter! Now you understand, don't you? The width of the beard being six lines, the shoulder should have been one line. See?"

"Marvellously," said Roland, who did not understand a single word.

"Says the King — you know they still gave that title to the infamous tyrant! — says the King: 'Faith, that 's so! Well, Gamain! please do what I don't know how to do as well as thee, my master.' — 'Oh,' says I, 'not only your master, but master of masters, master over all.'"

"Well, well?"

"Well, while I went about this task, Monsieur Capet chatted with my apprentice, whom I've always suspected of being an aristocrat in disguise. In about ten minutes it was done. Then I came downstairs, bringing the iron door into which the lock was fitted, and said: 'There it is, Sire!' — 'Hey, Gamain,' says he, 'come with me!' — He went before, and I followed. He took me first into a bedroom, — then into a gloomy entry, leading to the Dauphin's chamber. There it was so dark that we had to light a candle. The King says to me, 'Hold thou that candle, Gamain, so that I can see!' — He allowed himself to thee-and-thou me, that tyrant! — Then he lifted a wooden panel, behind which was a round hole, about two feet in diameter at the mouth. Then, as he saw my surprise, says he: 'This safe I've made on purpose to hold my money. Thou seest it must be closed with an iron door.' — 'It won't take long,' says I, 'for the hinges are on already, and the bolt.' — I hung the door, and did n't have to push it, neither. It shut itself. Then we put back the panel in its place; and so Good-night! No more closet, no more door, no more lock!"

"And you believe, my friend, that this closet was for no other purpose, and that the King took all this pains for the sake of hiding his money, so that he might keep it near him, in case —?"

"Hold on! That 's a trap. He believed, the scamp, that he was awfully cunning, but I beat him at it. This is what happened. Says he: 'Help me to count the money I have in this closet.' We counted two millions in double louis, which we placed in four leathern sacks; but while I counted his gold, I saw, out of the corner of my eye, his chamberlain carrying papers — papers — papers!

and I says to myself, says I : 'Good ! This closet is to conceal some papers. The money is a trick.'"

"What sayst thou to that, Madeleine?" asked Roland of his wife, bending over her in such a way that Gamain could not hear.

"I say this is a revelation of the highest importance, and that not an instant is to be lost."

Roland rang, and an usher appeared.

"Is there a carriage harnessed in the courtyard?" asked Roland.

"Yes, Citizen!"

"Order it to be ready."

Gamain rose and said, in a vexed tone : "Ah, you 've had enough of me, have you?"

"Why so?" asked Roland.

"Because you have called your carriage. It seems that government ministers have their carriages, even under the Republic."

"My friend," replied Roland, "ministers must always have carriages. A carriage is not a luxury for them, but an economy."

"Economy of what?"

"Of time, — the dearest and most precious commodity of any in the world."

"Then I must come again, I suppose?"

"What for?"

"Gracious ! — To show you that safe and its treasure !"

"Useless !"

"Why useless?"

"Because I have sent for the carriage in order to go there now."

"To go where?"

"To the Tuileries !"

"We 're going there?"

"As fast as we can," said Roland.

"That 's all right!" said Gamain.

"But —?"

"But what?" asked Gamain.

"The key!" said Roland.

"What key?"

"The key of the safe. It is not probable that Louis left it in the door."

"Certainly not! He was n't such a fool as he looked, that fat Capet!"

"Then take your tools."

"What for?"

"To open the safe!"

Gamain drew a new key from his pocket, and said: "What do you call that?"

"A key."

"A key to the safe, which I made as a souvenir. I studied that lock well, not doubting that some day —"

"That man is a scoundrel!" whispered Madame Roland to her husband.

"Thou thinkest then —?" asked Roland with some hesitation.

"I think we have no right, in our position, to refuse any information which fortune sends, to help us to a knowledge of the truth."

"Here it is!" said Gamain, as he twirled the key.

"And you think," said Roland, with a disgust it was impossible wholly to conceal, "you think that key, although made from memory, and after so many months, will open the iron door?"

"At the first turn, I hope. It ain't for nothing that a man is a master of masters, and master-in-chief."

"The Citizen's carriage is ready," said the usher.

"Shall I go with thee?" asked Madame Roland.

"Certainly! If there are papers, I shall confide them to thee. Art thou not the most trustworthy man of my acquaintance? — Come with me, my friend," he added, turning to Gamain.

Gamain followed, grumbling between his teeth: "Ah, did n't I say I 'd pay thee off for that, Monsieur Capet?"

That? — What did he mean by that? He referred to the King's ancient kindness towards him.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

THE RETREAT OF THE PRUSSIANS.

WHILE Citizen Roland's carriage bowls along towards the Tuileries; while Gamain again finds the concealed panel in the wall; while his key, forged from memory, fulfils his malicious promise, and opens the iron closet with marvellous facility; while that iron closet yields up the fatal deposit entrusted to it, — the papers which, notwithstanding the absence of those confided to Madame Campan by the King himself, are to have a cruel influence over the destiny of the prisoners in the Temple; while Roland removes these documents to his office, and reads them one by one, searching fruitlessly for some trace of Danton's alleged treachery, and then files them carefully away, — while all this is going on, let us see what was being done by this former Minister of Justice.

We call Danton an ex-minister, because, when the Convention was once organized, he had no choice but to ask his dismission.

He therefore mounted the rostrum and said: "Before expressing my opinion on the first decree of the Convention, permit me to resign into its hands the functions delegated to me by the Legislative Assembly. I received these functions amidst the roar of cannon. Now the junction of our armies has been effected, and the union of our representatives is in operation. I am, therefore only an emissary of the people, and in that capacity I speak."

To these words, "The junction of our armies has been effected," Danton might have added, "and the Prussians are beaten;" for he made his speech on September 21, and on September 20, — that is, on the evening before, — the battle of Valmy had been fought, though Danton was not yet aware of it.

He contented himself with saying: "Let us dissipate all idle phantoms of dictatorship, which alarm the people. Let us declare that there can be no Constitution, save one which the people accept. Heretofore it has been necessary to arouse the people against tyranny. Now let the laws be made as terrible against those who violate law, as were the thunders of the populace against tyrants. Let criminals be punished! Let us forswear all exaggeration! Let us declare that the rights of property, whether territorial or industrial, shall forever be maintained."

With his customary acuteness, Danton met the two great national fears. Frenchmen feared for their liberty and their property.

Strangely enough, who do you suppose feared most for the rights of property? The new proprietors, — those who had bought property the day before, and still owed for three-quarters of it.

These were the people who straightway became more conservative than the old nobles, the old land-owners. The nobles valued their lives above their ancient domains. The proof thereof is, that they abandoned their estates to save their lives; whereas the peasants, the purchasers of confiscated property, the parvenus, preferred their little corner of the earth to life itself, and guarded it, musket in hand, unwilling to leave it for anything else in the world.

Danton understood this. He knew that it was well to reassure, not only those who had been land-owners for a day, but also those who were to become so thereafter; for the one grand idea of the Revolution was in this sentence:

All Frenchmen should be proprietors. Property does not always make men morally better; but it makes them worthier citizens, by inspiring them with the sentiment of independence.

The spirit of the Revolution is summed up in some other words, spoken by Danton:

Guarantee the abolition of all despotism, and the sacredness of all property. In other words: to begin with, man has a right to govern himself; and consequently, man has a right to the preservation of the fruit of his free industry.

Who said all this? The man who bears the sins of June 20, August 10, and September 2, — the Giant of Tempests, who made himself the Pilot of Peace, and threw into the sea two anchors, which are the safeguard of nations, — Liberty and Property.

The Girondists did not understand. The honest Girondists had an invincible dislike for the — how shall we express it? — the fickle Danton; for they knew that he refused the dictatorship, at the very moment when he was asking for it in order to prevent massacre.

A Girondist arose. Instead of applauding this man of genius, who had just voiced the two great fears of France, — in order to allay them by so doing, — this Girondist said to Danton: "Whoever tries to make property sacred, endangers it. To touch it, even for the purpose of steadying it, is to shake it. Property is anterior to law."

The Convention finally passed two edicts:

There can be no Constitution till one is adopted by the people.

Security of persons and property is the safeguard of the Nation.

This was just the thing; and yet it was not. Nothing is more perilous in politics than nearly so.

Danton's resignation was accepted. The man who dared shoulder the burdens of September 2 — that is, the dread of Paris, the hatred of the provinces, the execration of the world — was certainly a strong man. At that time he held the threads of diplomacy, of war, and of the police.

Dumouriez, and therefore the army, was in Danton's hand.

The news of the victory at Valmy reached Paris, and was the cause of general rejoicing. It was borne on eagles' wings, and was regarded as much more decisive than it was in reality. As a result of this, France jumped from abject fear into sublime audacity. The clubs breathed war and battle.

This is what was said aloud: "If the King of Prussia was vanquished, why was not the King of Prussia taken prisoner, bound, throttled, or at least driven to the other bank of the Rhine?"

In a lower tone men said: "It's very clear! Dumouriez has betrayed us! He was bribed by the Prussians."

Dumouriez was already receiving the usual recompense for a great service, — ingratitude.

The King of Prussia did not in the least regard himself as beaten. He had attacked Valmy Heights, and had not succeeded in taking them! That was all! Each army had saved its camp. From the beginning of the campaign the French had constantly lost ground, driven back by panics, by defeats, by reverses. This time the French held their own, — nothing more, nothing less. The loss of men was about equal on both sides.

Such was the popular French demand for a great victory, that the real facts could not hastily be made known to Paris, to France, to Europe; but Dumouriez sent them to Danton, through Westermann. The Prussians suffered so little and were so far from being beaten, that twelve days after the Battle of Valmy they were still immovable in their camp.

Dumouriez wrote for instructions as to whether he should treat with the King of Prussia, in case any propositions were made. To this demand there were two replies. One was from the ministry. It was arrogant, perfunctory, dictated by victorious enthusiasm. The other reply was calm and wise, and emanated from Danton personally.

The ministerial letter took high ground, and thus it ran:

> The Republic will not treat with its enemies while they are within its territory.

Danton's letter said:

> If the Prussians will only evacuate our territory, agree with them at any price.

A settlement was not easily made, considering the Prussian King's present state of mind. At nearly the same time when the news of the victory at Valmy reached Paris, the news reached Valmy of the abolition of royalty and the proclamation of the Republic. The Prussian King was furious.

The invasion had been undertaken, in order to rescue the King of France; yet heretofore the only results had been seen on August 10, September 2, and September 21, — that is, in the King's captivity, the massacre of the Royalists, and the abolition of royalty. All this raised Frederick William to a height of saturnine fury. He was determined to fight, come what would, and on September 29 gave orders for a bloody battle.

As may be seen, he was very far from an evacuation of French territory.

However, on September 29, instead of a fight, there was a conference.

Dumouriez was prepared at all points.

Brunswick, though very insolent in his words, was very prudent when deeds were in question. He was more English than German. He had espoused the sister of the Queen of England. He received his inspiration quite as much from London as from Berlin. If England decided for battle, he was ready to fight with both hands, one for England, the other for Prussia; but if England, his real master, did not unsheathe her sword, he was quite ready to sheathe his own.

On September 29 Brunswick produced, in the conference, letters from England and Holland, refusing to join in the coalition. Moreover, Custine was marching along the Rhine and threatening Coblentz. If Coblentz should be taken, the gateway of return to Prussia would be closed against Frederick William.

Then there was something still more serious, something more important. It chanced that the Prussian King had a mistress, the Countess of Lichtenau. She followed after the army, as was the fashion of the day. Like Goethe, who was in a Prussian army-wagon, scribbling the first scenes of "Faust," she thought this would be a famous military pleasure-trip, and she much wished to visit Paris.

The Countess was arrested at Spa. There she heard of the Valmy defeat, and of the dangers which beset her royal lover. Two dangers she greatly dreaded, this beautiful Countess, — the bullets of French men and the smiles of French women. She wrote letter after letter, and her postscripts to these letters, — the summary of what she had written, — were always made up of two words, come back!

The Prussian King only remained, sooth to say, because he was ashamed to abandon Louis Sixteenth. Danton hastened to send him, through Westermann, the various orders of the Commune, which showed the royal prisoners to be well cared for. As this satisfied the King of Prussia, it is evident that he was not very difficult to please. His friends aver that before his retirement he made Danton and Dumouriez pledge their own honor to save Louis Sixteenth's life; but there is nothing to confirm this assertion.

On September 29 the Prussian army began its retreat, and marched a league. The next day it accomplished another league.

The French army was its escort, as if doing the honors of the country by this companionship. Whenever the soldiers wished to make an attack, to intercept the retreat, — in a word, to stir up the boar, and make him face the dogs at his heels, — Danton's men held them back.

If the Prussians would only get out of France, that was all Danton asked for. By October 22 this desire was fulfilled.

On November 6 the cannon at Jemmapes announced the judgment of God on the French Revolution. It was no longer a possible failure.

On November 7, the next day, the Girondists brought in a proposition for the trial of the King.

Something similar had taken place six weeks before, when Dumouriez gained the decisive battle of Valmy, September 20, and the Republic was proclaimed the next day, September 21.

Each of these two victories had its coronation, and aided France in one more Revolutionary step.

This time it was an awful step. The blindfold pilgrims were now nearing a result towards which, for three years, they had been ignorantly journeying. As happens in nature, objects which had heretofore been seen only in a mass, now assumed more definite outlines.

What was to be seen in the horizon? A scaffold! At the foot of that scaffold, the King!

In that material epoch, the elevated ideas of superior minds were overruled by the inferior instincts of hatred, vengeance, and destruction. A man like Danton, one who had assumed the responsibility of the crimson days of September, — a man who felt the truth of what a certain English poet has said, —

> Great evils need great passions to redress them,
> And whirlwinds fitliest scatter pestilence, — even he was loudly accused of being the chief of the Indulgents.

It is difficult for ideality to control deeds. What the members of the Convention could not understand — or, at least, what only a few of them could understand, some clearly and others intuitively — was this, that they should have proceeded against Royalism, not against the King.

Royalty was a gloomy abstraction, a mysterious peril, which nobody wanted. It was an idol, gilded on the outside; but, like the whited sepulchres of which Jesus spoke, it was full of "dead men's bones, and all uncleanness."

The King was another matter. The King was a man, — a man not very interesting in the days of his prosperity, but a man purified by misfortune and broadened by captivity. His humanity was developed through his disgrace. The brightening influence of adversity over him was such that even the Queen, — either from new intuition or from repentance of the past, — now that she was a poor prisoner in the Temple, almost adored, worshipped — in a religious sense of the word — this king, this prince, this man, whose plebeian instincts and sensuous appetites had often sent the blood to her face. It cannot be said that she loved him however; for her poor broken heart had lost all the love it had ever contained, — like a leaking vase, which has lost its precious liquor drop by drop.

One day the King entered the Queen's rooms, and found her sweeping the chamber, where the little Dauphin lay ill. He paused on the threshold, let his head fall on his breast, and said with a sigh: "Ah Madame, what an occupation for the Queen of France! What if Vienna could see what you are doing? Who would have believed that I should cause you such a downfall, by linking your fate with mine!"

"And do you count as nothing," replied the Queen, "the glory of being the wife of the best and most persecuted of men?"

This is what Marie Antoinette said, and without a witness, as she believed, not knowing that a poor valet, who had followed the King's fortunes, gathered up these words like black pearls, that they might form a diadem, not for the brow of a king, but for a condemned prisoner.

Another day Louis saw Sister Elizabeth cutting with her teeth, for want of scissors, the thread with which she was repairing the Queen's gown.

"Poor sister!" said he. "What a contrast to that pretty mansion at Montreuil, where you once lacked nothing!"

"Ah, my brother," said this saintly lady, "can I regret anything, when I share your misfortunes?"

All this became known. All this was noised abroad. All this embellished, with golden arabesques, the sad romance of the royal martyr.

Royalty was smitten to the death; but the King, living and imprisoned, suggested a great and powerful thought, — so great and forcible that it entered the brains of but few men, who found it so unpopular that they hardly dared to give it utterance.

"People need salvation, but they do not need vengeance," said Danton to the Cordelier Club.

"Assuredly the King must be tried," said Grégoire to the Convention, "but he is regarded with so much contempt, that there is no place left for hatred."

This is what Thomas Paine wrote:

> I wish the prosecution could be drawn up, not against Louis Sixteenth, but against the whole tribe of kings. One of them we have in our power. He will put us on the track of conspiracy everywhere. . . . Louis Sixteenth will be very useful to prove the necessity of revolutions.

Lofty minds like Paine's, and great hearts like Danton's and Grégoire's, were in accord on this point. Not one king, but kings should be indicted, and Louis should be summoned as a witness.

Republican France — that is, a nation which had attained its majority — should proceed, not only in her own name, but in the name of nations still submissive to royalty, — that is, still under age. France should sit in judgment, not as an earthly magistrate, but as a divine arbiter. She should look down from the higher spheres, and her word should no longer rise to the throne like a splash of mud and blood, but it should fall upon the kings of earth like a thunderclap.

Suppose a public prosecution, supported by proofs, had been begun against Catherine Second, — murderess of her husband, the plunderer of Poland. Suppose the monstrous details of her life had been openly exposed, like Madame de Lamballe's corpse. Imagine that Pasiphae of the North, chained in the pillory of public opinion, and say what would have been the result of teaching the nations by such a prosecution.

Nevertheless, whatever good there may be in such a process has yet to be brought out.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

THE ARRAIGNMENT.

THE documents in the iron closet opened by Gamain, — to whom the Convention, in return for his good work, voted a pension of twelve hundred francs a year, and who died in the tortures of rheumatism, after regretting a thousand times that he could not die on the guillotine, to which he helped to send his royal pupil, — these papers, minus those which had been sorted out by the King, and given to Madame Campan, — these papers, we say, to the great disappointment of the Rolands, contained nothing against either Danton or Dumouriez.

They were specially compromising to the King and the priesthood. They showed the poor, mean, narrow, ungrateful spirit of Louis Sixteenth, who specially hated those who wished to save him, — Necker, Lafayette, Mirabeau. Against the Girondists he had nothing to say.

The discussion as to the trial began on November 13. Who opened this discussion? Who made himself the sword-bearer of the Mountain, as the extreme Revolutionary party was now called? Who flamed down upon the gloomy assemblage like a devastating angel?

A young man, or rather a boy, twenty-four years old, — sent to the Convention before attaining the required age, and whom we have seen several times in the course of this history.

He was originally from one of the roughest districts of France, Nièvre. He had in him that bitterly acrid sap which makes men dangerous, if not great. He was the son of an old soldier, whom thirty years of service had elevated to the cross of Saint Louis, and consequently ennobled with the title of Chevalier. This young man was born thoughtful and sad. His family had a small estate in the Department of Aisne, at Blérancourt, near Noyon; and he dwelt in this modest abode, which was far from attaining even the mediocrity glorified by the Latin poet.

Sent to Rheims to study law, he made poor lessons and poor verses; and he wrote a licentious poem, after the fashion of "Orlando Furioso" and "La Pucelle," which was unsuccessfully published in 1789, and republished, with greater success, in 1792.

He had hastened away from his province, and came to Paris to find Camille Desmoulins, — that brilliant journalist, who held in his hands the future reputation of unknown poets.

Camille, himself a sublime Bohemian, full of spirit, vim, and venture, saw coming to him one day this arrogant student, full of pretence and pathos, whose slow and measured words fell one by one, like drops of frozen water percolating the rock, and seemed as if they came from a woman's mouth. As to the rest of his face, his blue eyes were hard and stern, and shaded by black eyebrows. His complexion was pale white, — sickly, rather than healthy, — as when we met him at the time of his initiation among the Enlightened Ones.

His sojourn at Rheims had perhaps given our law-student that scrofulous malady which kings pretended to be able to cure by a touch on their coronation-days. His chin was lost in the midst of an enormous neckerchief wound about his throat; although it was then the fashion to wear the cravat loose and flowing, as if to give the headsman every facility for baring it when the time should come.

His body was rigid and automatic. He would have seemed like a ridiculous machine, if he had not become terrible as a wraith. His face was overtopped with a forehead so low that his hair fell almost to his eyes.

Well, one day Desmoulins saw this strange figure appear before him, — a figure towards which he was supremely antipathetic.

The youngster showed Camille his verses, and said to him, in the course of a social interchange of thought, that since the days of the Romans the world was empty.

The verses appeared poor to Camille, the thought being false. He made sport of the poetry, he mocked the philosophy; and the philosophic poet returned to the solitude of Blérancourt, "like Tarquin," as Michelet, the great painter of men of this sort, expresses it, "like Tarquin decapitating poppies with a switch, — seeing in one poppy a Danton, and in another a Desmoulins."

His time came at last, for to certain men the occasion never fails.

His village, his borough, his little town of Blérancourt was in danger of losing a certain trade-market, upon which it largely depended for its prosperity. Without knowing him, the young man wrote to Robespierre, begging him to support the local measure, which was confided to him, and offering, besides, to give up his little estate, — all that he possessed, — that it might be sold for the profit of the Nation.

That which made Desmoulins laugh made Robespierre ruminate. He sent for the young fanatic, studied him, and saw in him the temper of those men by whom revolutions are carried on. Through his influence with the Jacobins, Robespierre had the boy nominated to the Convention, although he was under the requisite age. The chairman of the electoral body, Jean de Bry, protested; and with his protest he sent the baptismal certificate of the member-elect, who was only three months over twenty-four years of age; but under Robespierre's influence, this objection was set aside.

It was into this young man's abode that Robespierre retired on the night of September 2. It was this youngster who then slept, while Robespierre could not sleep. This youngster was Saint-Just.

"Saint-Just," said Camille Desmoulins to him one day, "dost know what Danton says of thee?"

"No."

"He says thou bearest thy head as carefully as if it were the holy eucharist."

A smile glimmered around the youngster's feminine mouth. "Ah ha!" said he. "Well, I 'll make him carry his head as Saint Denis carried his, — in front of him!" and he kept his word.

When Saint-Just offered his proposition as to the royal indictment, he descended slowly from the summit of the Mountain, where he sat, to the rostrum in the centre, and as slowly he demanded a death-sentence. Demanded, do we say? Ordered would be the better word.

It was an atrocious discourse which fell from the pale and feminine lips of this handsome man. Let him hunt it up who will! let him print it who can! for we lack the courage to give much of it.

No long trial of the King is necessary! Let him be killed!

He must be killed, for there are no longer any laws by which to prosecute him. This very man has destroyed them.

He must be killed as an enemy. Only citizens have the right of trial. In order to try the tyrant, we should have first to reconstitute him a citizen.

He must be killed as a criminal taken in the very act, his hands dyed with blood. Moreover, Royalism is an eternal crime. A king is a being outside of nature. Between king and people there is no natural affinity.

Saint-Just spoke in this strain for an hour, — without warmth, without animation. He spoke with the voice of a pedagogue and the gestures of a pedant. In every paragraph he returned to his refrain, — which fell with singular weight, and which produced among his auditors a shock such as might come from hearing the swish of the blade of the guillotine, — He must be killed!

This speech made a great sensation. Not one of the judges who did not feel, in listening to it, as if the cold steel were piercing his own heart. Even Robespierre was alarmed at seeing his pupil, his disciple, plant the Revolutionary banner so strongly, and so far in advance of the most advanced Republican outposts.

Thenceforth, not only was the prosecution resolved upon, but the King was already doomed. To attempt to save the King was now to devote oneself to death. Danton had the disposition to do it, but not the courage. He had enough patriotism to let himself be innocently branded as an assassin, but he had not enough stoicism to incur the name of traitor.

On December 11, 1792, the trial began.

Three days before, a city official presented himself at the Temple, at the head of a deputation from the Commune. Entering the royal presence, he read to the prisoners a warrant, ordering them to give up their knives, razors, scissors, daggers, — in fact all sharp instruments, of which prisoners are generally deprived.

About the same time Madame Cléry came, accompanied by a friend, to see her husband. As usual, the valet went down to the Council Hall. There he conversed with his wife. She ostentatiously talked with him aloud about family matters; but while she was talking thus, her friend said to Cléry, in a whisper: "Tuesday next the King will be taken to the Convention. The trial will begin. The king may take his own counsellors. So much is certain."

The King had forbidden Cléry from concealing anything from him. Bad as was this information, the faithful servant decided to communicate it to his master. At night, therefore, when the King was undressing, Cléry repeated to him the words we have just reported; adding this fact, that during the trial the Commune proposed to separate Louis from his family.

Four days remained, in which Louis Sixteenth could arrange matters with his wife. He thanked Cléry for the fidelity with which he had kept his word, and added: "Continue to try and discover their intentions concerning me. Do not fear to distress me. I have arranged with my family not to appear as if we had been forewarned of anything, so that you may not be compromised."

As the day drew nearer when the trial was to open, the municipal officers became more distrustful. Cléry had therefore no other information to give the prisoners than he could find in a journal which somebody managed to send him. This journal published the decree, that on December 11 Louis Sixteenth should be brought to the bar of the Convention.

On December 11, at five o'clock in the morning, the drums beat a general alarm throughout Paris. The gates of the Temple were thrown open, and a squad of horsemen, with artillery, entered the courtyard. If the royal family had been utterly ignorant of what was impending, they would have been alarmed by such an unseasonable racket. They feigned therefore to be ignorant of its cause, and asked the commissioners on duty for some explanation, which they refused to give.

At nine o'clock the King and Dauphin (who now shared his father's rooms) went to breakfast in the ladies' apartments. They were allowed to pass a last hour together, but it was under the eyes of the commissioners. At the end of the hour they had to separate, and as they were forbidden to appear to know what was in progress, they had to shut up their hearts when they separated.

The Dauphin really knew nothing. He was spared this sadness, on account of his youth. He insisted upon playing ninepins; and, distracted as he was, the King wished to give his son this recreation. The Dauphin lost every game, and three times the game ended with the number sixteen.

"Confound the number, sixteen," said the boy. "I believe it brings me bad luck."

The King answered not, but this word smote him as a sorrowful omen.

At eleven o'clock, while he was giving the child his lesson in reading, two officials came in, to say that they were after young Louis, to take him to his mother. The King wished to learn the motive of this removal. The officials only replied that they were executing the orders of the Council.

The King kissed his boy, and charged Cléry to conduct him safely to his mamma. Cléry obeyed, and came back again.

"Where did you leave my boy?" asked the King.

"In the Queen's arms," said Cléry.

One of the commissioners reappeared. "Monsieur," he said to the King, "Citizen Chambon, Mayor of Paris," — he was Pétion's successor, — "is in the Council Room, and is soon coming upstairs."

"What does he wish?" asked Louis.

"I do not know," answered the commissioner, and then went out of the room, leaving the King alone.

For a moment the King strode up and down the room, and then seated himself in an armchair at the head of the bed.

The official was with Cléry in the next room, and said to the valet: "I do not dare to go into the prisoner's room again, for fear he will question me." Everything was so quiet in the King's chamber, however, that the commissioner finally grew uneasy. He entered the room softly, and found Louis with his head between his hands, in deep meditation.

At the noise of the door, turning on its hinges, the King lifted his head, and asked aloud: "What do you wish?"

"I feared you were not comfortable."

"I am obliged to you," said the King. "No, I am not uncomfortable; only the way in which my son was taken away from me has affected me sensibly."

The official again withdrew.

Not till one o'clock did the Mayor appear. He was accompanied by a new City Prosecutor, Chaumette, by Recording Secretary Coulombeau, by several city officials, and by Santerre, who was himself attended by his aides.

The King arose. "What do you wish with me, Monsieur?" said he to the Mayor.

"I come for you, in virtue of a decree of the Convention, which Secretary Coulombeau will read to you."

The secretary unrolled a paper and read:

Decree of the National Convention, ordering Louis Capet —

At this point the King interrupted the reader by saying: "Capet is not my name. It is only the name of one of my ancestors."

As the secretary wished to continue the reading, the King said: "Useless, Monsieur! I have seen the decree in a newspaper."

Turning to the commissioners, he added: "I could have wished to have my little son with me during the two hours which I have passed in waiting for you, — two cruel hours, which then would have been very sweet. However, this treatment is only a specimen of what I have endured for the past four months. — I follow you, not to obey the Convention, but because my enemies can force me to do so."

"Come, then, Monsieur!" said Chambon.

"I only ask time to put on my riding-coat. Cléry, my riding-coat."

Cléry gave the King the garment required, which was nut-brown in color. Chambon walked first and the King followed. At the bottom of the staircase the prisoner looked anxiously at the muskets, the pikes, and especially at the cavalry in sky-blue, the formation of this corps being heretofore unknown to him. Then he cast a last glance at the Tower, and they set out.

It rained. The King was in a carriage, and made the journey with an unruffled countenance.

Passing in front of the gates Saint Denis and Saint Martin, he asked which of the two was to be demolished.

At the entrance of the Riding School (for the Convention met in the same old place) Santerre laid his hand on the King's shoulder and led him to the bar, to the place and armchair wherein he had sworn allegiance to the Constitution.

The Deputies remained seated when he entered, one only rising and saluting as he passed. Much astonished, the King turned, recognized Doctor Gilbert, and said: "Good-day, Monsieur Gilbert!"

Then he added to Santerre: "Do you know Monsieur Gilbert? He was formerly my physician. I hope you will not be too hard upon him, for saluting me."

The examination began. Here the prestige and glory of misfortune began to disappear in the presence of publicity. Not only had the King to reply to a fire of questions, but he replied badly, — hesitatingly, evasively, contradictorily, trickily, as if he were a country lawyer, arguing about some petty farm. Such a man appears to poor advantage in open day. The examination lasted till five o'clock. At that hour Louis was conducted into the Conference Hall, where he waited for his carriage.

The Mayor came to him and said: "Are you hungry, Monsieur, and do you wish for anything?"

"I thank you," said the King, with a negative gesture; but almost immediately, seeing a grenadier take a loaf from his knapsack, and give half of it to Chaumette, Louis went to him and said: "Will you give me a bit of your bread, Monsieur?"

As he spoke softly, Chaumette drew back and said: "Speak louder, Monsieur!"

"Oh, I can speak loud enough," replied the King, with a sad smile. "I only asked for a bit of bread."

"Willingly," answered Chaumette, and he offered him the half-loaf, saying: "There, cut it! It 's a Spartan repast. If I had a root also, I 'd give you half of that."

They descended into the courtyard At sight of the King the crowd set up the refrain of the Marseillaise, March on, march on! dwelling with energy upon the line:

May blood impure soon lave our thirsty land!

Louis turned slightly pale, and stepped into the carriage. Then he began to eat his bread, — the crust only. The soft part remained in his hands, and he did not know what to do with it. The Prosecutor's assistant took the bread and threw it out of the window.

"Ah, that 's bad!" said the King, "to throw away bread, — especially when it 's so scarce."

"How do you know it 's scarce?" asked Chaumette. "You don't suffer for want of bread!"

"I know it must be scarce, because that which is given me has so much bran in it."

"My grandmother," replied Chaumette, "used to say to me: 'Little boy, never lose a crumb of bread, for you may not always be able to get it!'"

"Monsieur Chaumette," said the King, "your grandmother was a very sensible woman, as it appears to me."

They were silent. Chaumette leaned back in the carriage.

"What is the matter?" asked the King "You look pale!"

"Indeed, I don't feel quite right," said Chaumette.

"Perhaps it 's the motion of the carriage, which jolts along rather slowly."

"Perhaps so!"

"Have you ever been to sea?"

"I went to war with La Motte Picquet, in the glorious days of old," said Chaumette.

"La Motte Picquet was a brave man!" said the King; and then he also relapsed into silence.

Of what was he thinking? Of his splendid navy, victorious in the Indies? Of his harbor at Cherbourg, won from the sea? Of his glittering admiral's uniform, all red and gold, so different from the nut-brown costume he was now wearing? Of his artillery, which boomed with delight, when he rode abroad, in the days of his prosperity ?

How far from his old estate was this poor King Louis, shut up in a wretchedly slow hack, making its way through hosts of people, who crowded up to catch a sight of him, — waves from an infectious and encroaching sea, rising from the ditches and cesspools of Paris. His eyes blinked in the daylight. His beard was long, thin, and faded. The skin from his famished jaws hung in folds on his thin neck. He wore a gray coat and a brown overcoat. As they jogged along he repeated, with that sort of automatic memory peculiar to the Bourbons and to babes: "Ah, there's such a street! There's such a street, — and such a street, — and such a street!"

When they reached the Rue Orleans he said: "Ah, there's the Rue Orleans!"

"Say the Rue Egalité," answered somebody.

"Ah, yes! On account of Monsieur —"

He did not finish, but relapsed into silence; and between the Rue Egalité and the Temple he did not speak a solitary word.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

THE MARTYR KING'S STORY.

THE King's first care, on returning to the Temple, was to ask that he might be taken to his family. The answer was, that there was no order to that effect. Louis then understood that he, like all prisoners under trial for capital offences, was to be kept in seclusion.

"At least, tell my family that I have returned!" he said.

Without paying any attention to the four officials who surrounded him, he then began to read, as usual.

He had yet one hope, that at supper-time his family would come up to his room. His expectation was in vain. They did not come.

"I suppose my boy will pass the night with me," he said, "for I see his things are still here!"

Alas! the prisoner no longer entertained, even with respect to his son, the certainty he affected to feel. This question was no more definitely answered than the other.

"Then suppose I go to bed," said he. As usual, Cléry helped him to undress.

"Oh, Cléry," murmured the King, "I was far from expecting such questions as were put to me!"

Indeed, nearly all the questions put to the King had their origin in that iron closet; and the King, ignorant of Gamain's treachery, did not suspect that this safe had been discovered.

Nevertheless he went to bed, and was hardly in bed before he fell asleep, with that peacefulness of which he had given so many proofs, and which, under many circumstances, might be mistaken for lethargy.

It was not so with the other prisoners. This absolute separation was frightfully significant, for it was like the seclusion of the condemned.

As the Dauphin's bed and other things were still in the King's room, where he had slept in these latter weeks, the Queen put the child to sleep in her own bed, as was formerly her custom; and all night she sat by the foot of the bed, watching over his slumbers.

Her grief was so evident, her attitude so much resembled that of the celebrated statue of a Mother near the Tomb of her Son, that Madame Elizabeth and Madame Royale resolved to pass the night in their chairs, by the side of the Queen; but the officials interfered, and compelled the two ladies to go to bed in their own room.

The next day, for the first time, the Queen asked a favor of her guardians. She asked for two things, — that she might see the King, and that she might receive the journals, in order to be informed as to his trial.

These requests were referred to the Council. One was utterly refused, — that in reference to the journals. The other was half granted.

The Queen could not see her husband, nor could the sister see her brother; but the children might see their father, on condition that they would see neither their mother nor their aunt.

This ultimatum was made known to the King. He reflected an instant, and then said, with his accustomed resignation: "Well, whatever happiness it would give me to see my children, I renounce that happiness. Besides, the business which occupies me will prevent me from devoting to them the time they need. Let the children remain with their mother."

On receiving this answer they removed the Dauphin's bed to his mother's chamber, who did not leave her children until she was on trial before the Revolutionary Tribunal, as the King now was before the Convention.

Despite this seclusion, they tried to find some means of communication. It was Cléry who again charged himself with arranging this correspondence, with the aid of another attendant of the princesses, whose name was Turgy.

Turgy and Cléry often met, as they were going and coming in the discharge of their duties; but the espionage of the city officials made conversation very difficult. The only words they were allowed to exchange were limited to these : "The King is well. — The Queen, the princesses, and the children are well."

One day, however, Turgy gave Cléry a little note, and said : "Madame Elizabeth slipped this into my hand in returning me a napkin."

Cléry hastened with the billet to the King. It was written with pinholes, — for the ladies had long been deprived of ink, quills, and paper, — and contained these sentences :

We are well, my brother. Write in your turn.

The King replied; for since the examination, he was allowed the use of writing-materials.

Giving it to Cléry he said : "Read it, my dear Cléry, and you will see it contains nothing that can compromise you."

Cléry respectfully refused to read it, and blushed as he pushed away the royal hand. Ten minutes later, Turgy received this reply, which in due time was transmitted to the other prisoners.

On the same day, as Turgy was passing before the slightly open door of Cléry's chamber, he threw a ball of thread under the bed. This ball contained a second note from Madame Elizabeth. This was the method agreed upon.

Cléry wound the same thread around second note from the King, and hid it in the cupboard, among the napkins. Turgy found it, and placed a reply in the same spot.

The same proceedings were repeated during several days. Every time the valet gave a new proof of his fidelity and cunning in this direction, the King would say to him, shaking his head: "Be careful, my friend! you're exposing yourself!"

This method was indeed too precarious. Cléry tried to find another.

The commissioners supplied the prisoners with candles tied in bundles. Cléry carefully saved the strings; and when he had a sufficient quantity, he informed the King that he had invented a means of making the correspondence more active.

Madame Elizabeth occupied a room beneath Cléry's. The window in her room was directly underneath a window in the little corridor adjoining Cléry's room. During the night he could lower the twine. Madame Elizabeth could tie her letters to this string, and in the same way receive those of her brother. There was a projection under the lower window, which would prevent the letters from falling into the garden.

By this same thread, stationery could be lowered, so that the ladies need no longer write with pins.

In this way the prisoners heard from one another every day, the ladies receiving news of the King, and the King receiving news from them and his son.

In other respects, the King's position was very much weaker since he had been arraigned before the Convention. When he answered, he answered somewhat arrogantly, with the pride of royalty, — not like an accused man on trial, but rather like a knight who accepts a challenge and takes up the gauntlet.

Unluckily for him, the nature of Louis Sixteenth was not such as to enable him to assume either of these two parts advantageously. He answered awkwardly, timidly, badly, as we have already said. Feeling fettered, in the presence of so many proofs as had fallen, he knew not how, into his enemies' hands, at last he asked for counsel.

After a tempestuous debate, which followed the King's withdrawal from the hall, it was voted that he might have counsel. The next day four members of the Convention, appointed for the purpose, visited the King, to ask him whom he would choose for his lawyer, and he named Target. The Commissioners retired, and notified Monsieur Target of the honor done him by the King.

Idiotic choice! Target — though a man of great worth, and an old member of the Constitutional Assembly, who had taken an active part in the preparation of the Constitution — was afraid. He refused in a cowardly way, turning pale with fear before his own century, that he might afterwards turn red with shame before posterity.

The next day, however, after the King's trial began, the President of the Convention received this letter:

CITIZEN PRESIDENT: I do not know whether the Convention will allow Louis Sixteenth an advocate to defend him, and leave to him the choice of a defender. If so, I wish Louis Sixteenth to know that, if he sees fit to select me for that duty, I am ready to attend to it.

I do not ask you to apprise the Convention of my offer, for I am far from supposing myself a person of sufficient importance to inspire the members with any special interest; but twice, when such appointments were much sought after, I was called to the Royal Council of him who was then my master; and I owe him the same service now, when it is a duty which many people consider dangerous.

If I knew of any other way to make known my disposition toward the King, I would not take the liberty of addressing you.

Considering the place which you occupy, it has seemed to me that you, better than anybody else, could transmit this message.

I am with respect &c.

MALESHERBES.

Two other requests were received at the same time, one from a Troyes lawyer, Monsieur Sourdat. He spoke boldly:

I am moved to defend Louis Sixteenth, by my conviction of his innocence.

The other letter was from Olympe de Gouges, that eccentric improvisatrice, — who dictated her comedies, because, so it was said, she did not know how to write.

Olympe de Gouges constituted herself the advocate of Woman's Rights. She wished them to have the same rights as men, — the right to elect delegates, discuss laws, declare peace and war; and she based her claim on a sublime sentence:

Why should women not mount the rostrum? They can mount the scaffold.

Poor creature! She did indeed mount the scaffold; but when the sentence was pronounced, she became once more a woman, — that is, feeble. Wishing to claim all the advantages of the law, she declared herself in the way of maternity. The tribunal sent her to the physician and nurses, and the result of this consultation was, that if she was in such a condition, it was too recent to constitute any claim for mercy. At the scaffold she became more manlike, and died as becomes such a woman.

As to Monsieur de Malesherbes, he was the same man who was in the Royal Council with Turgot, and fell with him. We have elsewhere described him as a small man, of seventy or seventy-two years. Naturally he was awkward and absent-minded, stocky, ordinary-looking, "with the veritable physiognomy of an apothecary," as Michelet expresses it, — a man from whom one would scarce expect the heroism of classic days.

In the Convention he never called the King anything but Sire. "What makes you so bold?" asked one of the members. "My indifference to death," ingenuously replied Malesherbes.

He did indeed despise the death to which he afterward rode so calmly, chatting with his companions in the wagon; and he received the fatal blade as if it gave him only what Guillotin had said of it, "a slight coolness about the neck."

The superintendent at Monceaux — it was to this cemetery that the bodies of those publicly executed were conveyed — related a singular proof of Malesherbes's indifference to death. In the fob of the dead man's smallclothes he found Malesherbes's watch, which marked two o'clock. According to his habit, he had wound up his watch at noon, — that is, an hour before he went to the scaffold, — and it continued to run its daily course.

As he could not have Target, the King accepted Malesherbes and Tronchet; and they, being pressed for time, added another lawyer, Desèze, to their number.

On December 14 it was announced to Louis that he was at liberty to confer with his defenders, and that on the same day he would receive a visit from Monsieur de Malesherbes.

This devotion touched the King, though his temperament did not render him easily accessible to such emotions. Seeing this septuagenarian coming to him with such sublime simplicity, the King's heart swelled within him. Those arms — royal arms, so rarely opened — were outstretched, and he said, in the midst of his tears: "My dear Monsieur de Malesherbes, come and embrace me!"

After pressing him affectionately to his heart, the King continued: "I know how my affairs are situated. I expect death, and I am prepared to meet it. As you see me at this moment, — and I am very tranquil, am I not? — well, so I shall walk to the scaffold."

On December 16 a deputation — composed of four members of the Convention, Valazé, Cochon, Grandpré, and Duprat — came to the Temple. Twenty-one deputies had been appointed to examine the indictment against the King, and these four belonged to that committee.

They brought the King the act of accusation, and the documents relating to the case. The whole day was occupied with the verification of these papers.

Each document was read by the secretary. After the reading Valazé would say: "Do you recognize this?" and the King would answer Yes or No, as the case might be.

Several days after, the same commissioners returned, and read to the King fifty additional papers, which he acknowledged and signed, like the others. In all there were one hundred and fifty-eight such papers, of which he had copies.

During these interviews the King was somewhat afflicted with fluxion. He remembered Gilbert's salute, when he first entered the Convention, and asked the Commune if he might be permitted to call in his former physician. The Commune refused this request.

"If Capet will drink no more ice-water, he will have no trouble," said one of the members of the Council.

On December 26 the King made his second appearance at the bar of the Convention.

His beard had grown still longer. As we have said, it was homely, sandy, and straggling. He asked for razors, and they were granted, but only on condition that he should use them only in the presence of four city officials.

On December 25, at eleven o'clock in the evening, the King began the preparation of his will. This document is so well known, touching and Christian as it is, that we will not record it here.

Two last testaments have often attracted our attention, — that of Louis Sixteenth, who lived in the presence of republicanism, and yet could see only royalty; that of Orleans, who lived in the presence of royalty, and yet could see only republicanism.

We will cite only one phrase of the King's will, because it throws light upon his standpoint. Everybody sees, so it may be said, not according to the reality of things merely, but according to one's point of view. Thus he wrote:

I close by declaring before God, and expecting to appear before him, that I cannot reproach myself with the crimes charged against me.

These phrases have won for Louis Sixteenth, in the eyes of prosperity, the reputation of being an honest man. Perjured in all his oaths, he fled towards a foreign land, leaving behind him a protest against the very oaths he had solemnly taken. He had discussed, appreciated, and recorded the plans of Lafayette and Mirabeau for his safety, yet had called upon the enemy to enter the heart of France. Being now ready to appear before God, who must be his judge, and believing that God would reward both good and bad actions, how could Louis feel able to say: "I cannot reproach myself with the crimes charged against me"?

Perhaps the construction of the phrase explains the matter. The King did not say: "The allegations against me are false;" but he said: "I cannot reproach myself with the crimes charged against me;" which is not exactly the same thing.

Although ready to go to the scaffold, Louis was still the pupil of Monsieur de la Vanguyon!

To say, "The allegations against me are false," would be to deny those allegations, and Louis could not deny them; but to say, "I cannot reproach myself with the crimes charged against me," might mean, strictly interpreted: "These crimes may exist, but I do not reproach myself with them."

Why did not Louis Sixteenth reproach himself? Because his point of view, as we have just said, was the standpoint of royalty. Because, thanks to the influences under which he was reared, thanks to his belief in the sanctity of hereditary rights, and the infallibility of the royal right divine, kings cannot see crimes, especially political crimes, in the same light as other people.

In the eyes of Louis the Eleventh, his revolt against his father was no crime. It was a war for the public welfare.

To Charles the Ninth, the Saint Bartholomew Massacre was no crime. It was a measure dictated by public security.

This same Malesherbes, who now defended the King, had tried in former days, when he belonged to the Royal Council, to persuade the King to reinstate the Protestants in their old political rights; but he found Louis Sixteenth very obstinate on this subject.

"No," said the King, "no! The proscription of Protestants is a law of the state, a law of Louis Fourteenth. Never disturb the ancient landmarks."

"Sire," replied Malesherbes, "politics should never override justice."

"But," cried the King, like a man who could not understand, "Where was there any proscription of justice in the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes. Was not the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes necessary to the welfare of the state?"

In the eyes of Louis Sixteenth, therefore, this persecution of the Protestants, devised by an old devotee and a revengeful Jesuit, — an atrocious measure, which made the blood run in the streams of the Cevennes valleys, and kindled the pyres at Nismes, Albi, and Béziers, — this persecution was not a crime, but, on the contrary, a state necessity.

There is another matter which has to be urged for the royal standpoint, — that a king, almost always born of a foreign princess, from whom he derives the best part of his blood, is almost a stranger to his people. He governs them, — that is all. By whom does he govern them? By his ministers.

Not only are his subjects considered unworthy of being related to him, unworthy of being allied to him by marriage, but they are not even worthy of being directly governed by their King. Foreign sovereigns, on the contrary, are the relations and allies of a king, who has neither kinsfolk nor allies in his kingdom; and with these foreign kinsmen he can correspond without the intervention of public officers.

The Spanish Bourbons, the Neapolitan Bourbons, the Italian Bourbons, all came from the same stock, Henry the Fourth. They were all cousins.

The Emperor of Austria was Louis the Sixteenth's brother-in-law. The Savoy princes were his kinsfolk, for Louis was Saxon on his mother's side.

When the people reached a point where they wished to impose upon the King conditions which he did not believe to be for his interest, to whom did Louis appeal for support against his revolted subjects? To his cousins, his brothers-in-law, his kinsfolk. To him, the Spanish and the Austrians were not the enemies of France, because they were the relatives and the friends of himself, the King; and from the Royalist point of view, the King was the state, was France. "The state? It is I!" said his great predecessor.

What did these kings come to defend? The sacred, infallible, almost divine cause of royalty.

This is why Louis Sixteenth could not reproach himself with the crimes charged against him.

Royalism inflamed the popular egotism. The people carried their hatred of royalism so far that they wished to suppress God, because it was said that royalism emanated from God. Doubtless the people also had their state reasons, which seemed reasonable from their point of view, and which led to the excesses of July 14 and October 5 and 6, 1789, and of June 20 and August 10, 1792.

We do not add September 2; for, we repeat it, those outrages did not originate with the people, but with the Commune alone.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

THE TRIAL.

DECEMBER 26 arrived, and found the King prepared for everything, even for death. He had made his will the evening before; because he feared, no one knows why, that he should be assassinated the next day at the Convention.

The Queen was forewarned that, for the second time, the King was on his way to the Assembly. The movements of the troops and the noise of the drums would have frightened her beyond measure, if Cléry had not found means to make her acquainted with the cause of so much excitement.

At ten o'clock Louis Sixteenth started, under the care of Chambon and Santerre.

At the Convention he had to wait an hour. The people took their revenge for having had to cool their heels for five hundred years in the royal antechambers at the Louvre, at the Tuileries, and at Versailles.

A discussion was taking place, at which the King must not assist. On December 12 a key, delivered by him to Cléry, had been seized in the valet's hands. It had occurred to somebody to try this key in the iron closet, and it fitted.

This key was shown to Louis Sixteenth. "I do not recognize it!" he said; yet in all probability he had wrought that key himself. It was over such details that the King completely failed in greatness.

This discussion over, the President announced to the Assembly that the accused and his counsellors were at the bar. The King entered, accompanied by Malesherbes, Tronchet, and Desèze.

"Louis," said the President, "the Convention has decided that you shall be heard to-day."

"My advocates will read you my defence," replied the King.

There was profound silence. The whole Convention felt that it could well allow a few hours to this King deprived of royalty, to this man whose life was to be cut off.

Perhaps this assemblage, some of whose members were gifted with superior minds, expected to enjoy the brilliancy of a grand discussion.

Prepared to lie down in its bloody sepulchre, already wrapped in its cerements, perchance royalty would suddenly rise, clad in the majesty of death, and utter some of those great words which History records and the Cycles re-echo. There was nothing of the sort. Desèze's speech was only the professional plea of an advocate; yet this was a beautiful cause to defend, — the cause of the heir of so many monarchs, whom Fate had arraigned before the people, not for the guilt of personal crimes, but to expiate the crimes and faults of a whole race.

It seems to us that if, on this occasion, we had experienced the honor of standing in Monsieur Desèze's shoes, we should not have uttered the speech set down to Monsieur Desèze's name.

Properly speaking, the floor belonged to Saint Louis and Henry Fourth. Those great chiefs of the royal race should have been summoned to cleanse Louis Sixteenth from the weakness of Louis Thirteenth, the prodigality of Louis Fourteenth and the debauchery of Louis Fifteenth.

It was not thus, we repeat. Desèze quibbled, when he should have charmed. He should have been poetic and flowery, rather than concise. He should have addressed the heart, not the reason.

Perhaps, when this commonplace discourse came to an end, Louis would take up the word. As he had consented to defend himself, perhaps he would do so worthily, grandly, nobly. Thus he spoke :

GENTLEMEN : My line of defence has been made clear to you. I will not recur to it. In speaking to you, perhaps for the last time, I declare that my conscience does not reproach me, and that my defenders have only spoken the truth.

I have never feared a public examination of my conduct ; but it lacerates my heart to find, in your indictment, the accusation that I have wished to shed the blood of my people, and above all, that the disasters of the Tenth of August should be laid to my charge.

I confess that the multiplied proofs which I have from time to time given of my love for the people, and the general course of my conduct, seem to me to give abundant evidence that I have not feared to expose myself, in order to save bloodshed ; and my career should put the imputation of bloodshed far from me.

Can you understand that the successor of sixty kings, the descendant of Saint Louis, Henry Fourth, and Louis Fourteenth, should have nothing else to say to his accusers ?

Ah Sire, the more unjust the accusation, from thy point of view, the more thine indignation should have made thee eloquent. Thou didst owe something to posterity, if only a sublime malediction launched upon thine executioners !

Much astonished, the Convention asked: "Have you nothing else to say in your defence?"

"No!" responded the King.

"You may retire!" and Louis did retire.

He was taken to one of the adjacent rooms. There he took Monsieur Desèze into his arms, and pressed him to his heart. Then, as Monsieur Desèze was perspiring, more from emotion than heat, Louis urged him to change his linen, and himself warmed the shirt which he handed the lawyer.

At five o'clock Louis returned to the Temple. An hour later his three counsellors visited him, just as he was getting up from the table. He offered them refreshment, but only Monsieur Desèze accepted.

While Desèze was eating, Louis said to Malesherbes: "Well, you see that I was not mistaken! From the first moment, I saw that my doom was pronounced before my case was heard."

"Sire," responded Monsieur de Malesherbes, "when I left the Convention I was surrounded by a crowd of good citizens, who assured me that you should not perish, or, at least, that they and their friends would perish first."

"Do you know them, Monsieur?" asked the King, quickly.

"I do not know them personally, but I certainly should recognize some of their faces."

"Well," said the King, "try to see each of them, and tell them that I shall never forgive myself, if a single drop of blood is shed on my account. I did not wish for bloodshed, even when it might have preserved my throne and my life; and all the more I do not wish bloodshed now, when both throne and life are sacrificed."

Monsieur de Malesherbes went away early, in order to obey this request.

The New Year's Day of 1793 arrived. Kept in still more rigorous confinement, Louis had only one servant with him.

He was meditating sorrowfully over his isolation one day, when Cléry approached the bed, and said in a low voice: "Sire, I ask leave to offer you my most ardent wishes for a speedy end to your misfortunes."

"I accept your good wishes, Cléry," said the King, offering his hand.

Cléry took the offered hand, kissed it, and wet it with his tears. Then he helped his master to undress At that moment the city officials entered.

Louis looked at them, one after the other. Observing one whose face indicated some sympathy, he went up to him, and said: "Oh Monsieur, will you do me a very great service?"

"What is it?" asked the man.

"Go, in my behalf, and get me some news of my family, and give them my good wishes for the year now beginning."

"I will go!" said the official, greatly moved.

"Thank you!" said the King. "I hope God will reward you for what you do for me!"

"But," said another official to Cléry, "why does n't the prisoner ask permission to see his family? Now that the trial is over, I am sure this will be granted without difficulty."

"To whom should the request be addressed?" asked Cléry.

"To the Convention."

An instant later, the official who had been to the Queen's room returned, and said: "Monsieur, your family thank you for your good wishes, and return you theirs."

The King smiled sadly, and said: "What a New Year's!"

That night Cléry imparted to the King what the official had said to him, as to the possibility of seeing his family.

The King reflected, and appeared to hesitate. "No," he said at last; "but in a few days they will not refuse me this consolation. We must wait."

The Catholic religion has awful heart-penances, which it imposes upon the elect! Was Louis under a penance?

Judgment was to be pronounced on January 16, 1793.

Monsieur de Malesherbes remained a long time with the King during the forenoon. Towards noon he went out, saying that he would return again, and give a report of the success of the formal appeal he had made, as soon as that appeal was heard.

The vote bore upon three questions, awful in their directness:

1. Is Louis guilty?

2. Shall there be an appeal from the judgment of the Convention to the judgment of the people?

3. What shall be the penalty?

That posterity should be able to see that the vote, if not without malice, was certainly without compulsion, it was public.

A Girondist, named Birotteau, demanded that each member should ascend the rostrum, and give his decision aloud.

One of the Mountaineers (as the members of the extreme party were called) went farther. He demanded that the votes should be signed.

Finally a man named Rouyer, who belonged to the Right, demanded that a list should be read of those members who were absent on special commissions, and that those who were absent without being on duty should be censured, and their names sent to the several departments.

Then began that terrible session which lasted sixty-two hours. The hall presented a singular aspect, little in harmony with what was going on therein. The event was sad, sombre, gloomy. The aspect of the hall gave one the idea of a theatric spectacle.

The rear of the hall had been transformed into boxes, where sat the prettiest ladies in Paris, eating oranges and sipping ices, and wearing their winter costumes of velvet and fur.

Various gentlemen went to greet these ladies, and then returned to their benches, exchanging signs with their fair friends now and then. One might have supposed himself in an Italian theatre.

The side nearest the Mountain was conspicuous for elegance. Among the Mountaineers were seated the millionnaires, — the Duke of Orleans, Lepelletier de Saint-Fargeau, Hérault de Séchelles, Anacharsis Clootz, the Marquis de Châteauneuf.

All these gentlemen had seats reserved in the gallery for their mistresses, who were decorated with tricolored ribbons, and provided with special cards and letters which they presented to the ushers, who acted as door-openers to the boxes.

The upper galleries, free to the populace, were filled throughout the three days. Their occupants were drinking as at a cabaret, eating as if they were in a restaurant, and speech-making as if the Convention were a club-house.

To the first question — Is Louis guilty? — 683 voices answered, Yes.

To the second question — Shall the decision of the Convention be submitted to the ratification of the people? — 281 voices voted for such an appeal, and 423 voted against it.

Then came the third question, — the grave question, the supreme question, — What shall be the penalty?

When they reached this point, it was eight o'clock in the evening of the third day, — a January day, wet, cold, and gloomy. Everybody was tired, impatient, bored. Human strength, with the actors as well as the spectators, was exhausted by a prolonged session of forty-five hours.

Each member mounted the rostrum in his turn, and pronounced one of these four decisions, — Imprisonment, Exile, Death, or Death, with the Right of Appeal to the People.

All marks of approbation or disapprobation being forbidden, when the galleries heard that word Death! they murmured.

Once, nevertheless, this word was followed, not only by murmurs, but by howls and hisses. This was when Philippe Egalité mounted the rostrum and said: "Wholly devoted to my duty, convinced that all ought to be put to death who have ever attempted, or shall ever attempt, to gain the sovereignty over the people, I vote for death."

In the midst of this terrible scene a sick Deputy, named Duchâtel, had himself brought to the Convention, wearing his nightcap and his dressing-gown. He came to vote for banishment, and the vote was admitted, because it tended towards indulgence.

It was Vergniaud, who had been President on August 10, who was also President on January 19, and thus had to make the public proclamation, both of deposal and death.

"Citizens," he said, "you have exercised a great act of justice. Humanity, I hope, will lead you to maintain a religious silence. When Justice has spoken, Humanity should have her turn."

Then he read the result of the vote. Of 721 voters, 334 had voted for banishment or imprisonment, and 387 for death, — some for immediate death, and the rest for death, with the privilege of a popular appeal. There were consequently 53 more votes for death than for banishment. Taking from this majority of 53 votes for death the 46 votes for death after a reprieve, there still remained a majority of 7 votes for immediate death.

"Citizens," said Vergniaud, with an accent of profound grief, "in the name of the Convention, I declare that the penalty pronounced against Louis Capet is death."

It was during the evening of Saturday, January 19, that the penalty was voted, but it was not till Sunday, January 20, at three o'clock in the morning, that Vergniaud announced the decree.

During this time Louis, though shut out from all communication with the outside world, knew that his fate was decided. Alone, away from wife and children, — whom he had refused to see, in order to mortify his heart, as a sinful monk mortifies his flesh, — he committed his life or death into the hands of his Creator, and did so with apparent indifference.

On Sunday morning, January 20, at six o'clock, Malesherbes visited him. Louis had already risen. He sat with his back turned towards a lamp on the mantelpiece, his face in his hands, and his elbows resting on a table.

The noise made by his defender drew him from his revery, and he said, "Well, Monsieur?" when he saw who it was.

Malesherbes dared not answer; but the prisoner could see, by the lawyer's face, that all was over.

"Death!" said Louis. "I was sure of it." Then he opened his arms, and pressed Malesherbes to his breast. The lawyer was all in tears.

Then he said: "Monsieur de Malesherbes, for two days I have been considering whether, in the whole course of my reign, I have merited such condemnation from my subjects. Well, I swear to you, with all the sincerity of my heart, as a man about to appear before God, that I have always desired the welfare of my people, and have never had a single wish to the contrary."

This took place in the presence of Cléry, who was shedding hot tears. The King pitied Cléry's grief, and led Malesherbes into his private cabinet, where he remained closeted with him an hour. Then he came out, and once more embraced his brave friend, and begged him to return in the evening.

"This good old gentleman has greatly moved me," he said to Cléry, as he re-entered the chamber; "but what is the matter with you "

This question was elicited by a general tremor which overpowered Cléry, after Malesherbes, whom he had received in the antechamber, told him that the King was condemned to death.

Endeavoring to dissemble his feelings as much as possible, Cléry prepared the materials for shaving the King.

The King mixed the lather himself, and Cléry stood before him, with the basin in both hands. Suddenly the King became very pale. His cheeks, ears, and lips turned white. Fearing he was ill, Cléry put down the bowl, and tried to sustain him; but the King only grasped his servant's hands and said: "Come, come! Courage!" and then he shaved himself calmly.

About two o'clock the Executive Council came to make known the decision. Among them were Garat, Minister of Justice; Lebrun, Minister of Foreign Affairs; Grouvelle, Secretary of the Council; the President and the Attorney General of the Department; the Mayor; the Solicitor of the Commune; the President and Public Prosecutor of the Criminal Tribunal.

Santerre came forward, and said to Cléry: "Announce the Executive Council!"

Cléry was preparing to obey; but the King, who had heard the noise, spared him the trouble. The door opened, and Louis appeared in the little entry.

Then Garat, with his hat on his head, took the lead and said: "Louis, the National Convention has charged the Provisional Executive Council with the duty of communicating to you the proceedings of January 15, 16, 17, 19, and 20. The Secretary of the Council will read you these decrees."

Grouvelle accordingly unfolded the document, and read with a trembling voice:

ARTICLE I.

The National Convention declares Louis Capet, the late King of the French, guilty of conspiring against the liberty of the Nation, and of acting against the general security of the state.

ARTICLE II.

The National Convention imposes upon Louis Capet the penalty of death.

ARTICLE III.

The National Convention pronounces against the wish of Louis Capet brought before its bar by his counsellors, and asking for an appeal in his behalf to the Nation, against the decision of the National Convention.

ARTICLE IV.

The Provisional Executive Council will communicate the present decree to Louis Capet during the day current, and take the proper measures in reference to police and public safety, in order to have the execution take place within twenty-four hours of this notification; and the Council will report to the National Convention as soon as the execution is over.

During this reading the King's face remained calm, but his physiognomy perfectly indicated two sentiments, wholly distinct. At the words guilty of conspiracy, a disdainful expression played upon his lips; and at the words penalty of death, he raised his eyes towards Heaven, with a look which seemed to bring the condemned into nearer communion with God.

When the reading was over, the King came a step towards Grouvelle, took the decree into his own hands, folded it, placed it in his portfolio, and drew therefrom another paper, which he presented to Garat, saying: "Monsieur Secretary of Justice, I beg you at once to forward this letter to the National Convention."

As Garat appeared to hesitate, the King said: "I will read it to you."

Then he read the following letter, in a voice which was strikingly in contrast with Grouvelle's:

I ask a delay of three days, in order to prepare myself for appearing before God.

For that purpose I ask the privilege of seeing freely the person whom I will mention to the Communal Commissioners, and that the person so named may be shielded from any fear or anxiety on account of the act of charity which he may fulfil towards me.

I ask to be freed from the perpetual espionage exercised over me by the General Council during several days past.

During the interval, I ask the privilege of seeing my family whenever I wish, and without witnesses.

I would like to have the National Convention decide at once as to the future welfare of my family, and that its members may have the right to withdraw freely whenever they wish to do so.

I commend to the Nation's good-will all persons who have been attached to my service. Many of them depended entirely upon this support; and having no longer any employ, they must be in want. Among these pensioners there were many old men, women, and children, who have no other means of livelihood.

LOUIS.

Done at the Tower of the Temple,
January 20, 1793.

Garat took the letter and said: "Monsieur, this letter shall be sent at once to the Convention."

Then the King opened his portfolio, drew from it a little square of paper, and said: "If the Convention grants my request in regard to the person whom I wish to see, here is his address."

The paper bore this name, in the writing of Madame Elizabeth:

Monsieur Edgeworth de Firmont,
No. 483, Rue Bac.

As there was nothing more to say or hear, the King took a step backward, making the same movement wherewith, in former times, he was accustomed to indicate when an audience was ended. The ministers withdrew, and also their companions.

"Cléry," said the King to his valet, who was leaning against the wall, because he felt as if his knees were giving way under him, "Cléry, order my dinner."

Cléry went into the little dining-room, to obey the royal command. There he found two city officials, who read to him a warrant by which it was forbidden that the King should be served with knives and forks. The knife only was entrusted to Cléry, so that he could cut the bread and meat for his master, in the presence of two guards.

This new order was repeated by them to the King, Cléry not wishing to tell his master of it.

The King broke his bread with his fingers, and cut his meat with a spoon. Contrary to his usual custom, he ate little, and dinner was over in a few minutes.

At six o'clock the Minister of Justice was again announced. The King rose to receive him.

"Monsieur," said Garat, "I carried your letter to the Convention, and have been ordered to bring you the reply."

Louis is at liberty to call for the service of a clergyman of any worship he prefers, and to see his family freely and without witnesses.

The Nation, always generous and just, will see to the future of his family.

The creditors of his household shall receive their just dues.

The National Convention has passed no order for a reprieve.

The King nodded, and then Garat withdrew.

"Citizen Minister," said the city officials, "how may Louis see his family?"

"In private," answered Garat.

"Impossible! By order of the Commune, we are not to lose sight of him day or night."

The situation was indeed embarrassing. However, they compromised matters by deciding that the King should receive his family in the eating-room, so as to be seen through the glass door, but that the door might be shut, so that they could not be overheard.

Meanwhile the King said to Cléry: "See if the Minister of Justice is still here, and if so, recall him."

An instant later Garat returned.

"Monsieur," said the King, "I forgot to ask if Monsieur Edgeworth de Firmont was at home, and when I can see him."

"I brought him with me, in my carriage," said Garat. "He is in the Council Hall, and will come up."

Indeed, at the moment when the Minister of Justice spoke, Monsieur Edgeworth de Firmont appeared in the doorway.

CHAPTER XL.

THE TWENTY-FIRST OF JANUARY.

MONSIEUR EDGEWORTH DE FIRMONT was Madame Elizabeth's confessor. Nearly six weeks earlier, the King, foreseeing the condemnation which had now been pronounced, asked his sister's advice as to the choice of a priest to be with him in his last moments; and Madame Elizabeth weepingly counselled her brother to send for Abbé Firmont.

This worthy ecclesiastic, having escaped the massacres of September, had retired to Choisy-le-Roi, where he lived under the name of Essex. Knowing his double address, and having notified him of the King's wish, Madame Elizabeth hoped that he would be in Paris at the time of the condemnation.

She was not mistaken. Abbé Edgeworth accepted the duty with resigned joy. On December 21 he wrote as follows to one of his friends in England:

My unfortunate master has cast his eyes upon me as the clergyman to prepare him for death, if the iniquity of the people carries them to the point of parricide.

I am preparing myself also for death, for I am convinced that the popular fury will not allow me to survive that horrible scene one hour. But I am resigned. My life is nothing. If, through its loss, I could save him whom God placed on a throne, for the ruin and resurrection of so many, I could willingly make the sacrifice, and should not die in vain.

Such was the man who was not to quit Louis Sixteenth till the King quitted earth for Heaven. Louis made him enter the private room, and then they shut the door. At eight in the evening the King came out of the cabinet, and said to the commissioners: "Gentlemen, have the kindness to conduct me to my family."

"That cannot be," they replied, "but they can come here, if you so desire."

"So be it," said the King, "provided I can see them in my chamber, and without witnesses."

"Not in your bedroom, but in your eating-room," replied the same official. "We have arranged this matter with the Minister of Justice."

"Nevertheless, you have heard that the Convention's order permits me to see my family without witnesses."

"That is true, and so you shall be by yourselves. The door may be shut, but we can see you through the upper half of the door, which is glass."

"Very well! Be it so!"

The Guards went out, and the King went into the dining-room. Cléry followed him, placed the table on one side, and pushed the chairs against the wall, in order to provide more room.

"Cléry," said the King, "bring a glass of water, in case the Queen is thirsty."

On the table was a decanter of ice-water, with which one of the Communists had reproached the King. Cléry therefore brought only a tumbler.

"Bring some ordinary water," said the King. "If the Queen drinks the ice-water it may make her ill, as she is not used to it. — Cléry, at the same time ask Monsieur de Firmont not to leave my private room. I fear lest his presence should make too great an impression upon my family."

At half-past eight the door opened. The Queen came in first, leading her boy by the hand. Madame Royale and Madame Elizabeth followed. The King opened his arms, and the weeping ladies and children threw themselves into them.

Cléry went out and shut the door. For a few minutes there was a painful silence, interrupted only by sobs. Then the Queen wished to lead the King into his bedroom.

"No," said he, detaining her, "I can only see you here."

The royal family had learned, through the usual channels of information, what sentence had been pronounced, but they did not know the details of the trial. The King gave them an account of it, excusing the men who had condemned him, and calling the Queen's attention to the fact that neither Pétion nor Manuel had voted for his death.

The Queen listened; but whenever she tried to speak, her sobs broke out afresh. God gave the poor prisoner this recompense, that in his last hours he was glorified by all who surrounded him, — even by the Queen.

As has been seen in the more romantic portion of this book, the Queen let herself be easily drawn to the picturesque side of life. She possessed a very lively imagination, which does more than temperament to make women imprudent. The Queen had been imprudent all her life, imprudent in her friendship, imprudent in her passion.

Her captivity was her regeneration, in a moral point of view. She reverted to the pure and holy love of her family, from which she had been alienated by her youthful and errant inclinations. As she could do nothing without passion, she now began passionately to love, in his affliction, the King her husband whose commonplace and dull side only she had been able to see in rosier days.

The scenes at Varennes, and at the Tuileries on August 10, showed Louis Sixteenth as an irresolute, slow, and almost cowardly man, lacking in enterprise. In the Temple she began to perceive that not only had the woman unfairly judged the husband heretofore, but also that the Queen had unfairly judged the King. In the Temple she saw him calm, patient under insult, mild and firm, like Jesus. All her worldly asperity was softened, absorbed, and turned into profit by her better self. If she had been too scornful before, now she loved too much.

"Alas," said the King to Firmont, "why do I love so much, and why am I so much loved?"

During this last interview the Queen gave way to a sentiment which resembled remorse. Her reason for wishing to take her husband into his chamber was that she might be entirely alone with him for a few moments. When she saw that this was impossible, she drew the King into the recess of the window.

There she was doubtless about to fall at his feet, and ask his pardon in a torrent of sighs and tears. The King understood all this. Checking her, he drew his will from his pocket, and said: "Read this, my well-beloved wife."

He pointed to the following paragraph, which the Queen read in a whisper:

I beg my wife to forgive me for all the ills she suffers on my account, and the mortification which I have occasioned her in the course of our union; for she may be sure I lay up nothing against her, even if she feels that she has aught wherewith to reproach herself.

Marie Antoinette took the King's hands and kissed them. There was mercy and forgiveness in that phrase, "She may be sure I lay up nothing against her," and infinite delicacy in the words, "Even if she feels that she has aught wherewith to reproach herself."

So she died peacefully, this regal Magdalen. Her love for the King, tardy as it was, merited divine and human pity. Pardon was accorded to her, not privately and secretly, like an indulgence of which the King was ashamed, but openly and publicly.

Who dare reproach her with anything, when she thus stands before posterity doubly crowned, with the glory of martyrdom and her husband's pardon?

She was sensible of this. She felt that from that moment she was strong in the eyes of History; but she felt none the less feeble in the presence of him whom she loved so tardily, feeling that she had not faithfully loved him heretofore. No more words escaped from the breast of the unhappy lady, but only sobs and gasping moans. She said she wished to die with her husband, and that if this favor were refused her, she would starve herself to death.

The officials, who witnessed this scene through the glass door, could not endure it. At first they turned away their eyes. Though they could no longer see, they could hear the moans of the royal family, and so they finally gave way to their manhood, and broke down in tears.

These tearful farewells lasted nearly two hours. Finally, at half-past ten, the King was the first to rise. Then his wife, sister, and children clung to him, like fruit upon the parent-bough. The King and Queen each held one of the Dauphin's hands. Standing by her father's left side, Madame Royale put her arms around his waist. Madame Elizabeth, on the same side with her niece, but somewhat farther back, grasped his arm. The Queen — as if she had the right to the most consolation, though she least deserved it — passed her arm about her husband's neck.

This sad group moved on together. In the midst of moaning, sobbing, weeping, could be heard such words as these: "We shall meet again, shall we not?"

"Yes, yes! Be calm!"

"To-morrow morning, — to-morrow morning at eight o'clock?"

"I promise it!"

"Why not at seven?" asked the Queen.

"Very well, yes, at seven," said the King; "but now, adieu! adieu!"

He uttered adieu in so expressive a voice, that one could see that he feared lest his courage should fail.

Madame Royale could bear it no longer. With a sigh she sank upon the floor. She had fainted. Madame Elizabeth and Cléry raised her.

The King felt that it was for him to be strong. He detached himself from the arms of the Dauphin and the Queen, and went into his chamber, crying "Good-bye, good-bye!"

Then he shut the door behind him. The Queen, completely overcome, leaned against the door, not daring to ask the King to reopen it, but weeping, sobbing, and smiting the panels with her open palm. The King was courageous enough not to come out.

The guards then requested the Queen to withdraw, and renewed the assurance already given, that she should see her husband at seven the next morning.

Cléry wished to carry Madame Royale, who was still in a swoon, to the Queen's apartments; but on the second stair the officials stopped him, and made him return to his usual place.

The King rejoined his confessor in the little room in the turret, and made him relate the way in which he had been brought to the Temple. Did this recital enter the King's mind, or did the words reach his ear only, where they were extinguished by his own personal thoughts? That, no one can say.

However, this is what the abbé had to say. Notified by Monsieur de Malesherbes, who had arranged an interview at Madame de Senozan's, that the King would send for the priest, in case the death-sentence was passed, Abbé Edgeworth, though at considerable personal risk, returned to Paris. Knowing that the sentence was pronounced on Sunday morning, he waited expectantly, in the Rue Bac. At four o'clock in the afternoon an unknown man presented himself, and gave the priest a billet, which read as follows:

The Executive Council, having a matter of the highest importance to communicate to Citizen Edgeworth de Firmont, requests him to come to its place of meeting.

The unknown man had been ordered to accompany the priest, and a carriage was in waiting at the door. The abbé went away with the unknown visitor. The carriage stopped at the Tuileries. The priest found the ministers together. At his entrance they rose.

"Are you the Abbé Edgeworth de Firmont?" asked Garat.

"Yes," responded the priest.

"Well," continued the Minister of Justice, "Louis Capet having signified his desire to have you near him in his last moments, we have sent for you, to learn if you consent to render the service he asks."

"If the King has designated me for this service, it is my duty to obey."

"In that case you will come with me to the Temple. I am going there at once."

We have seen how the priest, after fulfilling the usual formalities, came to the King's room; and how Louis, after being visited by his family, resumed his conversation with the priest, of whom he asked the details which we have recited.

This recital being over, the King said: "Monsieur, let us now forget all else, and attend to the great, the special business of my salvation."

"Sire, I am ready to do my best, and I hope that God will atone for my deficiencies. Do you not think that it would be a great consolation to hear Mass and receive the communion?"

"Yes, undoubtedly," said the King. "You can well believe that I should fully appreciate such a great favor; but how can you accomplish it?"

"That 's my task, Sire. I wish to prove to your Majesty that I am not wholly unworthy of the honor you have done me, in choosing me as your spiritual adviser. If the King will give me carte blanche, I will be responsible for the result."

"Do as you will, Monsieur," said the King; but presently he added, shaking his head: "Go, but you will not succeed."

Abbé Edgeworth bowed and went out, requesting to be shown to the Council Room, when he said to the commissioners: "He who is to die to-morrow wishes, before dying, to hear Mass and make confession."

The commissioners looked at each other in surprise. The idea had never entered their heads that anybody would make such a demand; so they said: "Where the Devil can you find a priest and church utensils at this hour?"

"The priest is found," responded the abbé, "since I am here. As for the utensils, the nearest chapel will furnish them. It is only needful to send for them."

The officials hesitated: "What if this were a trap?" said one of them.

"What trap?" asked the priest.

"What if you should poison the King, under pretence of giving him the holy wafer?"

Abbé Edgeworth looked intently at the man who suggested this doubt.

"You understand," continued the official, "that history furnishes enough examples of this sort to make us circumspect."

"Monsieur, I was so carefully searched when I came in, that you ought to be satisfied I have no poison about me. If I have any to-morrow, I must surely receive it from you, since nothing can reach me without passing through your hands."

The absent members were sent for, and the question discussed.

The request was finally granted, on two conditions. The first was, that the abbé should prepare a request, signed by his own hand. The second was, that the ceremony should be over by seven the next morning, as at eight precisely the prisoner was to be taken to the place of execution.

The priest wrote the request, and left it on the desk. Then he was reconducted to the King, to whom he announced the good news of this concession.

It was now ten o'clock. Till midnight Abbé Edgeworth was closeted with the King.

At midnight the King said: "Monsieur Abbé, I am tired. I need sleep, for I shall want all my strength to-morrow."

Then he twice called for Cléry, who came in and undressed the King, and wished to unroll his hair; but the master said, with a smile: "It is hardly worth the pains."

Thereupon the King went to bed; but he said, as Cléry drew the bed-curtains: "You may wake me at five o'clock."

Hardly was his head on the pillow before the prisoner was asleep, so overpowering were his physical needs.

Firmont lay down on Cléry's bed, who himself passed the night in a chair.

Cléry's slumber was full of fits and starts, so he was sure to hear the bells ring five o'clock. He at once arose, and began to make the fire. The noise woke the King, who said: "Ah, Cléry! Has five o'clock rung?"

"Sire, it has sounded from several clocks, but not yet from our tower," replied Cléry, approaching the bed.

"I have slept well," said the King. "I needed it. Yesterday was a very wearisome day. Where is Monsieur de Firmont?"

"On my bed, Sire."

"On your bed? And where have you passed the night?"

"On this chair."

"I am sorry. You should not have done so."

"Oh, Sire, could I think of myself at such a moment?"

"My poor Cléry!" said the King, and he offered him his hand, which Cléry kissed through his tears.

For the last time this faithful attendant began to dress the King. He had prepared for the purpose a brown coat, gray breeches, stockings of gray silk, and a vest pointed in the form of a waistcoat.

When he was dressed, Cléry brushed his hair. Meanwhile Louis detached from his watch a seal, which he put into his vest-pocket, while he laid the watch on the chimneypiece. Then he drew a ring from his finger, which he placed in the same pocket with the seal.

When Cléry handed him his coat, the King took from it his memorandum-book, his snuffbox, his glasses, and laid them on the shelf, along with his purse. All these preparations were made in presence of the city officials, who came into the chamber of the condemned man as soon as they saw the light.

Half-past five sounded. "Wake Monsieur de Firmont!" said the King to Cléry.

The priest was already awake and dressed. Hearing this order to Cléry, he came in. The King nodded, and asked him to enter the private room.

Then Cléry hastened to prepare the altar, — which was the chamber bureau, covered with a tablecloth. As to the sacerdotal utensils and ornaments, they had been found, as Father Edgeworth said, in the first church where the request was made. This was the Capuchin Church in the Marais District, near the Soubise Mansion.

When the altar was dressed, Cléry notified the King, who asked: "Can you serve the Mass?"

"I hope so," answered Cléry, "only I do not know the responses by heart."

Thereupon the King gave him a prayer-book, open at the Introit.

Father Edgeworth was already in Cléry's room, putting on his sacerdotal garments. In front of the altar the valet placed an armchair, and before the chair he laid a large cushion; but the King made him take it away, while he himself found a smaller cushion, stuffed with hair, which he ordinarily used for his prayers.

When the priest entered, the officials retired to the antechamber, doubtless fearing contamination by contact with an ecclesiastic.

It was now six o'clock. The Mass was begun. The King listened to it throughout on his knees, and in deep contemplation. After the Mass he received the eucharist; and then Father Edgeworth, leaving him alone to his devotions, went into the next room, to divest himself of his priestly attire.

The King availed himself of this opportunity to thank Cléry, and speak his last farewells. Then he went into the small room, where the abbé rejoined him, while Cléry seated himself on the bed and wept.

At seven the King came out, and Cléry ran to him. Louis led him into the recess of the window, and said: "You will give this seal to my son, and this ring to my wife. Tell them that I leave them with pain. — This packet contains locks of the hair of my whole family. You will hand this also to the Queen."

"But shall you not see her again?" asked Cléry.

The King hesitated an instant, as if his heart forsook his breast, in order to be with her; and then he said, in a decided tone: "No, no! I know I promised to see them again this morning, but I wish to spare them the grief of a situation so cruel. — Cléry, if you see them again, tell them how much it cost me to depart without receiving their last embraces."

After drying his tears he said, with a mournful accent: "Cléry, you will give them my last farewells, will you not?" Then the King returned once more to his closet and his devotions.

The city officials saw the King place these different articles in Cléry's hands, and one claimed them; but another proposed to leave them with Cléry till the Council decided what should be done with them. The latter suggestion prevailed.

A quarter-hour later the King once more came out of his cabinet, and said to Cléry, who was still in waiting. "Cléry, ask if I can have some scissors!" Then he went back again.

"Can the King have a pair of scissors?" asked Cléry of the commissioners.

"What will he do with them?"

"I don't know. Ask him!"

One of the officials entered the cabinet, and found the King kneeling before Father Edgeworth.

"You have asked for some scissors," he said. "What for?"

"To have Cléry cut my hair."

The official went down to the Council Chamber. There was a consultation of half an hour, but at the end of the half-hour the request was refused.

The official came upstairs again, and said: "The Council refuses."

"I need not touch the scissors," said the King, "and Cléry may cut my hair in your presence. I beg you to ask once more."

The official went down again, and renewed the prisoner's request; but the Council persistently objected.

An official approached Cléry, and said to him: "I believe it's time for thee to get ready to accompany the King to the scaffold."

"My God! what for?" said Cléry, trembling with fear, lest the last hour had come for him also.

"Nonsense!" said the other. "The headsman can do all that is needed!"

Day began to break. The general roll was heard, beating through all sections of the city. The noise and the universal stir penetrated the Tower, and froze the blood in the veins of Cléry and the priest.

Calmer than they, the King listened, and then said, without emotion: "Probably the National Guards are beginning to assemble."

A little later a detachment of cavalry rode into the courtyard of the Temple. The King and his companions could hear the officers talking and the horses neighing. Once more the King listened, and said, with the same calmness: "Apparently they are coming."

From seven to eight o'clock in the morning people frequently knocked at the cabinet door, under different pretexts, and for various purposes. Each time Father Edgeworth feared it was the last call; but each time Louis rose without emotion, went to the door, answered calmly those who interrupted him, and then returned to his seat by his confessor.

Father Edgeworth could not see the people who came, but he could catch some of their words.

He heard one of these intruders say to the prisoner: "Oh ho! All this was well enough when you were a king; but you 're a king no longer."

The King returned with an unruffled face; only he said: "You see how these fellows treat me, my father; but one must learn how to suffer all things!"

There was another rap, and again the King went to the door. This time he said: "These fellows see daggers and poison everywhere. How little they know me! Suicide would be a weakness. They would think I knew not how to die."

At last, by nine o'clock, the noise grew louder, and the doors slammed. Santerre came into the rooms, accompanied by seven or eight city officials, and by ten gendarmes, who ranged themselves in two lines.

Without waiting for the knock at the door, the King came out of his cabinet, and said: "You are after me?"

"Yes, Monsieur."

"I ask only for a minute." Then he went back, and closed the door.

"This time, all is over, my father," he said, throwing himself once more at the priest's knees. "Give me your final blessing, and pray God to sustain me to the end."

After the benediction was given, the King arose. Opening the door he advanced towards the city officials, who were in the middle of the bedroom. All wore their hats.

"My hat!" said the King to Cléry.

Cléry tearfully hastened to obey.

"Is there a member of the Commune among you?" asked the King. — "You are one, I believe?" he added, particularly addressing a man named Jacques Roux, — a priest who had taken the Constitutional oath, and who now asked: "What do you want of me?"

The King drew his will from his pocket, and said: "I beg you to deliver this paper to the Queen, my wife."

"We have not come here to receive thy commissions," answered Jacques, impertinently, "but to conduct thee to the scaffold."

The King received this insult with the meekness of Jesus; and with the same mildness, patterned from the divine man, he turned towards another official, named Gobeau, and said: "And you, Monsieur, will you also refuse me?"

As Gobeau seemed to hesitate, the King added: "It is only my will. You can read it. There are some things in it which I wish known to the Commune."

Gobeau took the paper.

Seeing that Cléry was not only holding the hat he had asked for, but his riding-coat also, — because the faithful man feared lest his master should shiver with the cold, and this tremor be mistaken for cowardice, — the King said: "No, Cléry. Give me my hat only."

Cléry did so; and the King took advantage of the opportunity to press his faithful servant's hand for the last time.

Then he said, in such a commanding tone as he had seldom used in all his life: "Let us go, gentlemen!" and these were the last words spoken in his rooms.

On the staircase he met Mathay, the keeper of the Tower, whom the King had found seated by the fireside a night or two before, and brusquely ordered to give up the place.

"Mathay," said Louis, "I was too hasty with you day before yesterday. Do not lay it up against me."

Mathay turned his back, without answering.

The King crossed the first courtyard on foot. In doing so he turned twice or thrice, to bid adieu to his only love, his wife, to his one dear friend, his sister, and to his sole joy, his children.

At the entrance of the courtyard they found a hack, painted green. Two gendarmes were holding the door open. At the condemned man's approach one of them entered first, and placed himself on the front seat. The King followed, and made a sign for Father Edgeworth to sit beside him on the back seat. The other gendarme took his place last, and closed the door.

Two stories were afloat. The first was, that one of these two gendarmes was a disguised priest. The second was, that both had received orders to assassinate the King at the least attempt to escape. Neither of these two assertions rested upon a solid foundation.

At quarter-past nine the procession started.

One word now about the Queen, Madame Elizabeth, and the two children, whom the King, in leaving, had saluted with a last glance.

The evening before, after that interview which was at once so sweet and so painful, the Queen was hardly strong enough to undress the Dauphin and put him to bed. She threw herself upon her own bed without undressing, and during that long winter's night Madame Elizabeth and Madame Royale could hear her moaning with cold and grief.

At quarter-past six her door opened, and they searched for a prayer-book.

Then all the family made themselves ready, believing — after the King's promise the evening before — that they should presently be summoned to his rooms.

Time passed along. The Queen and the Princess, standing all the while, heard the different noises which found the King so calm, although they made his valet and confessor shudder. The family heard the noise of doors opening and shutting. They heard the cries of the populace, greeting the King's exit. They heard finally the clatter of the horses' hoofs and the boom of the cannon.

Then the Queen fell into her chair, moaning: "He has gone without bidding us farewell!" Madame Elizabeth and Madame Royale knelt by her side.

One by one all their hopes had flown. At first they hoped for exile or continued imprisonment, but this hope vanished. Next they hoped for a reprieve, but this hope also vanished. Finally they hoped for some sudden blow on the final road, but this hope also was to vanish.

"My God, my God, my God!" cried the Queen. In this last despairing appeal to Deity, the poor woman expended her remaining force.

Meanwhile the hack rolled along, and entered the boulevards. The streets were almost deserted, and half the shops were closed. There was nobody at the doors, nobody at the windows.

A warrant from the Commune forbade any citizens, not forming a part of the armed escort, from traversing the streets leading from the boulevards, and from showing themselves at the windows along the route.

A misty sky lowered upon a forest of pikes, in the midst whereof glittered occasional bayonets. In front of the carriage rode the horsemen, and ahead of them was a legion of drummers.

The King wished to converse with his confessor, but could not do so, on account of the noise; so Father Firmont lent him his breviary, in which the King read.

At the Saint Denis Gate, he raised his head, believing he heard a different noise. Sure enough! Half a score of young men came rushing through the Rue Beauregard. Sword in hand they made their way through the crowd, shouting: "Help! — all who wish to save the King!" Three thousand conspirators were to respond to this appeal, made by the Baron de Batz, a scheming adventurer. He bravely gave the signal; but out of the three thousand conspirators, only a handful kept their pledges. The Baron de Batz and his eight or ten followers, crazed by their devotion to royalty, seeing that nothing was to be done, profited by the confusion caused by their outbreak, and escaped through the network of streets, in the neighborhood of the Saint Denis Gate.

This was the incident which distracted the King from his prayers, but it was so unimportant that the carriage did not even pause. When it did stop, at the end of two hours and ten minutes, it was because they had reached the end of the route.

When the King felt the motion cease, he leaned towards the priest's ear, and said: "Here we are, Monsieur, if I am not mistaken." Father Firmont was silent.

One of the three Samson Brothers, the headsmen of Paris, opened the door.

Resting his hand on the priest's knee, the King said, in an authoritative tone: "Gentlemen, I commend this gentleman to your courtesy. After my death, have a care that no harm comes to him. I charge you to guard him."

Meanwhile the other two headsmen drew near; and one of them said: "Yes, yes! Leave him to us. We 'll take care of him."

Louis dismounted. The assistants surrounded him, and wished to remove his coat; but he pushed them contemptuously away, and began to disrobe himself.

For an instant he remained alone in the circle about him, while he threw down his hat, untied his cravat, and took off his coat; but then the headsmen approached him, one of them holding a rope in his hand.

"What do you wish?" asked the King.

"To bind you," replied the headsman, holding the cord.

"To that I will never consent!" said the King. "Give up that idea! Do as you are ordered, but you shall never bind my hands, — no, never!"

The executioners raised their voices. In the public eye, a hand-to-hand struggle was likely to deprive the victim of the credit of six months' calmness, courage, and resignation; but one of the three Samsons, moved by pity, although doomed to fulfil this awful task, respectfully said to the King: "Sire, with this handkerchief —"

The King glanced at his confessor, who spoke with an effort: "Sire, there will be this additional resemblance between your Majesty and the Divine Being who will recompense you!"

The King raised his eyes to Heaven, with an expression of supreme grief. "No less an example is needful to make me submit to such an affront."

Turning to the executioners he resigned his hands to them. "Do what you will. I will drink the cup to its dregs."

The steps up the scaffold were high and slippery. He went up, sustained by the priest, who for an instant, feeling the King weigh more heavily upon his arm, feared lest Louis might show some feebleness in his last moments; but when they reached the upper step, the King escaped, so to speak, from the hands of his confessor, as his soul was to escape from his body, and he walked quickly across the platform. He was very red in the face, and never appeared more thoroughly vivacious and animated.

The drums were beating, but he silenced them with a look.

Then, with a strong voice, he spoke the following words: "I die innocent of all the crimes imputed to me. I forgive the contrivers of my death, and I pray God that the blood you are about to shed may not be visited upon France."

"Strike the drums!" exclaimed a voice, long believed to be Santerre's, but which was that of Monsieur de Beaufranchet, Count d'Oyat, the bastard son of Louis Fifteenth and the Courtesan Morphise, and therefore the illegitimate uncle of the condemned man.

The drummers obeyed. The King stamped his foot.

"Stop your noise!" he cried, with tremendous emphasis, "I have something else to say!" but the drums kept on.

"Do your duty!" shouted the pikemen, surrounding the scaffold, to the headsmen.

The executioners threw themselves upon the King, who was walking slowly towards the knife, glancing at the bevelled blade, for which, three years before, he himself had drawn the outline.

Then he looked back at the priest, who was kneeling in prayer, on the edge of the scaffold.

Then there was a confused movement behind the two posts of the guillotine. The hinged plank was moved down to a horizontal position. For an instant the head of the victim appeared at the sinister little window. There was a bright flash. A heavy thud was heard, and then only a huge jet of blood was to be seen.

One of the executioners picked up the head and exhibited it to the populace, thus sprinkling the boards of the scaffold with the royal blood.

At this sight the pikemen shouted for joy, and hastened to wet in this blood their pikes and sabres, — their handkerchiefs, those who had any, — while they cheered for the Republic.

For the first time this grand cry, "Long life to the Republic!" which had so often roused the popular joy, died without an echo. The Republic already bore on its forehead one of those fatal stains which can never be effaced. The Republic, as was said later by a great statesman, had committed more than a crime, — a blunder.

There was a feeling of stupefaction throughout Paris. With some this sentiment amounted to despair. A woman drowned herself in the Seine. A barber cut his throat. A bookseller lost his reason. An old officer fell dead with the shock.

At the opening of the Convention a letter was opened by the President. This letter was from a man who asked that the body of Louis Sixteenth might be sent to him, so that he could bury it beside his father's.

Head and trunk remained separate. Let us see what became of them. We know of no recital more terrible than the official report of the burial. Here it is, as it was made on that very day:

REPORT ON THE INTERMENT OF LOUIS CAPET.

On January 21, 1793, in the second year of the French Republic, we the undersigned, commissioners for the Department of Paris, as empowered by the General Council of this Department, in virtue of certain decrees of the Provisional Executive Council of the French Republic, went, at nine o'clock in the forenoon, to the house of Citizen Ricave, the rector of Saint Madeleine.

Finding him at home, we asked him if he had provided for the execution of the orders, issued by the Executive Council and the Department the evening before, for the burial of Louis Capet. He replied that he had done, point by point, what was commanded by the Executive Council and by the Department, and that all was in readiness.

Thence — accompanied by Citizens Renard and Damoreau, both vicars in Saint Madeleine Parish, charged by the Citizen Rector to attend to the burial of Louis Capet — we went to the cemetery connected with the above-named parish, situated on the Rue Anjou Saint Honoré, where we saw that the directions had been properly carried out, which had been communicated by us, the evening before, to the Citizen Rector, in virtue of the commission we had received from the General Council of the Department.

Soon after there was deposited in the cemetery, in our presence, by a detachment of gendarmes on foot, the body of Louis Capet, which we found to be entire in all its members, the head only being separated from the trunk. We took note that the hair on the back of his head was cut, and that the corpse was without a neckerchief, without a coat, without shoes; but it was clad in a shirt, a vest pointed like a waistcoat, breeches of gray cloth, and a pair of gray silk hose.

Thus clothed it was placed in a coffin, which was lowered into the grave and immediately covered.

All was arranged and executed in a manner conformable to the orders given by the Provisional Executive Council of the French Republic; and we sign this report, together with Citizens Ricave, Renard, and Damoreau, the Rector and Vicars of Saint Madeleine.

LEBLANC,
Administrator of the Department;
DUBOIS,
Administrator of the Department.

DAMOREAU, RICAVE,
RENARD.

Thus was Louis Sixteenth interred, on January 21, 1793. His age was thirty-nine years, five months, and three days. He reigned eighteen years, and was a prisoner five months and eight days.

His last wish was not accomplished; for his blood brought misery, not only upon France, but upon all Europe.

CHAPTER XLI.

CAGLIOSTRO'S COUNSEL.

On the evening of this awful day, pikemen were running about the deserted but lighted streets of Paris, — rendered all the more melancholy by this illumination, — and flourishing, at the ends of their weapons, tattered handkerchiefs and shirts, stained with blood. They shouted as they ran: "The tyrant's dead! See the tyrant's blood!"

Meanwhile two men were in the main story of a house in the Rue Saint Honoré. Both were equally silent, but their attitudes were widely different.

One, plunged in profound grief and dressed in black, was seated in front of a table, his head resting between his hands.

The other, dressed like a country tradesman, was striding up and down the room. His eye was gloomy. His forehead was scarred, and his arms were folded across his breast. Every time he passed near the table, in his diagonal walk across the room, he glanced interrogatively at the absorbed man on the other side of it.

How long had these men been sitting in this way? We cannot say.

At last the man in rustic attire, with folded arms, scarred forehead, and gloomy eye, appeared to weary of his silence. Stopping in front of the other man, in the black coat, whose head was hidden in his hands, he said, looking sharply upon the man whom he addressed: "So you call me a brigand, because I voted for the King's death, do you, Monsieur Gilbert?"

The man in black raised his eyes, shook his head sadly, and offered his hand to his companion, and said: "No, Billot, you are no more a brigand than I a man aristocrat. You voted according to your conscience, and I voted according to mine; only I voted for life, and you for death. It is a terrible thing to take from a man what no human power can restore."

"Then in your opinion," said Billot, "despotism is inviolable and liberty is rebellion; and there is no justice here below except for kings, — that is, for tyrants. What then remains for the people? The right to serve and obey! And you say this, Monsieur Gilbert, a pupil of Jean Jacques Rousseau, a citizen of the United States of America."

"I do not say that, Billot, for it would be impiety against the race."

"See here," replied Billot, "I 'm going to talk, Monsieur Gilbert, with the brutality of my coarse common sense, and I will permit you to reply with all your mental skill. Do you admit that a nation, believing itself oppressed, has the right to abolish its church, to lower or even suppress its throne, and to fight for freedom with all its might?"

"Undoubtedly!"

"Then has it not a right to consolidate the results of its victory?"

"Yes, Billot, it has that right incontestably; but consolidation is not brought about by violence and murder. Remember what is written, 'Thou hast no right to kill thy fellow-man!'"

"But the King is not my fellow-man!" cried Billot. "He is my enemy. I remember my poor mother used to read to me, in the Bible, about what Samuel said to the Israelites, when they wanted a king."

"I recall it also, Billot; but nevertheless Samuel consecrated Saul! He did not kill him."

"Oh, if I try to cross swords with your learning, I'm lost. Only let me ask you simply this, — Had we any right to take the Bastille?"

"Yes."

"Had we any right, when the King wished to deprive the people of the freedom of debate, to hold that meeting in the Tennis Court?"

"Yes."

"Had we any right, when the King wished to intimidate the Constitutional Assembly, through the banquet of the bodyguards and the assemblage of troops at Versailles, — had we any right to go to Versailles after the King, and compel him to come to Paris?"

"Yes."

"When the King tried to escape, and go into a foreign land, had we any right to arrest him at Varennes?"

"Yes."

"After he had sworn to support the Constitution of 1791, when we saw the King corresponding with the refugees and plotting with foreigners, had we any right to straighten things out, as we did on the Twentieth of June?"

"Yes."

"When he refused his sanction to laws emanating from the popular will, had we any right to get up the Tenth of August, — that is, to capture the Tuileries and proclaim the throne abolished?"

"Yes."

"When the King was confined in the Temple, but still kept up an active conspiracy against Liberty, had we, or had we not, a right to take him before the National Convention, and try him?"

"You had."

"Then if we had the right to judge, we had the right to condemn."

"Yes, to exile, to banishment, to perpetual imprisonment, — to everything except death."

"And why not to death?"

"Because his guilt was in the results of his action, not in his intention. You look at it from the people's standpoint, my dear Billot. He acted from his standpoint, which was the standpoint of Royalism. Was he a tyrant, as you call him? No! Was he an oppressor of the people? No! Was he an accomplice of aristocrats? No! Was he an enemy of Liberty? No!"

"Then you also judge him from the standpoint of Royalism, do you?" said Billot.

"No, for from the Royalist point of view, I should have absolved him altogether."

"Did you not absolve him, so far as to vote for his life?"

"Yes, but with lifelong imprisonment. Billot, believe me, when I say I had to judge him more favorably than I wished. A man of the people, — or, rather, a son of the people, — the preponderance of feeling in me leaned towards the popular side. You saw him afar off, but you did not see him as I saw him. Ill-satisfied with the royal part assigned him, he was pulled one way by the Assembly, thinking him still too powerful, and another way by an ambitious wife. He was urged one way by the uneasy and mortified Nobility, and another by the implacable Clergy. He was impelled to one course by the selfish refugees, and to another by his brothers, — who went about everywhere, stirring up enemies to the Revolution in his name. You say he was not your fellow-citizen, but your foe. Well, your enemy was beaten, and decent men do not kill vanquished enemies. A murder in cold blood is not justice, but an immolation. You have conferred something like martyrdom upon Royalism. To Justice you have given the likeness of Vengeance. Be careful! Be careful! In doing too much, you have, at the same time, not done enough. Charles the First was beheaded, but Charles the Second became King. James the Second was banished from England, and his son also died in exile. Human nature has its pathetic side, Billot, and we have now alienated from Republicanism — for fifty, perhaps for a hundred years — that immense portion of mankind which judges revolutions solely with the heart. Ah, believe me, my friend! the Republicans should most deplore the blood of Louis Sixteenth, for that blood will be required of them, and will cost them their Republic!"

"There is some truth in what you say, Gilbert," responded a voice which came from the entry door.

The two men started, and turned simultaneously. Then they exclaimed with one voice: "Cagliostro!"

"Oh Lord, yes!" answered he. "But there is also truth in what Billot says."

"Alas!" said Gilbert, "that's just the difficulty. The cause which we discuss has two sides; and each, looking at one side only, is forced to think himself right."

"Yes, but he ought also to be willing to let it be said that he is wrong," replied Cagliostro.

"Tell us your opinion, master!" said Gilbert.

"Yes, your opinion!" said Billot.

"You have tried the accused, but I am to sit in judgment on the trial. If you had condemned the king, you would have done right; but you sentenced the man, and there you blundered."

"I don't understand!" said Billot.

"Listen, for I now partly begin to see through it!" said Gilbert.

"The King ought to have been killed," continued Cagliostro, "while he was at Versailles or the Tuileries, a stranger to the people, behind his network of courtiers and his barrier of Swiss. He should have been killed on October 6 or August 10. On those days he was a tyrant! but after being left five months in the Temple, in communication with everybody, — eating before everybody, sleeping in the presence of everybody, the comrade of common folks, of the workman, of the shopkeeper, — he was elevated, by this false abasement, to the dignity of manhood, and so he should have been treated like a man, — that is, exiled or imprisoned."

"I did not understand you," said Billot to Gilbert, "but I do understand Citizen Cagliostro."

"Undoubtedly, during these five months of captivity, the King has been seen in the most touching, innocent, and worthy light. He has shown himself a good husband, a good father, a good man. What ninnies! Gilbert, I supposed they had more sense! They regenerated him. They remodelled him. As the sculptor hews the statue from the marble block by blow upon blow, so, by blow after blow on this prosaic and commonplace nature, — neither wicked, nor yet good, immersed in corporeal habits, yet straight-laced in his piety, not after the fashion of an elevated spirit, but like a parish warden, — out of such a dull nature, I say, has been moulded a statue of Courage, of Patience, of Resignation. This statue has been mounted on a pedestal of grief. This poor King has been so elevated, so broadened, so sanctified, that it has absolutely come to pass that his wife loves him."

Cagliostro laughed and added: "My dear Gilbert, who would have believed, in October, 1789, or last August, that the Queen would ever love her husband?"

"Oh," said Billot, "if I had only thought of all this!"

"Well, what would you have done about it, Billot?" asked Gilbert.

"What would I have done? I would have killed him, either in July, or October, three years ago, or else last August. It would have been so easy!"

These words were spoken in a gloomy tone of patriotism, which Gilbert pardoned, but which Cagliostro admired.

"Yes," said the latter, after a moment's silence, "but you did n't do it! You voted for his death, Billot! You, Gilbert, voted for his life. Now will you listen to a last piece of advice? Gilbert, you only had yourself elected to the Convention, in order to fulfil a duty. You, Billot, had yourself chosen in order to achieve vengeance. Duty and vengeance having been both accomplished, you are no longer needed here. Go away!"

Both men looked at Cagliostro.

"Yes," he resumed, "neither of you is a party-man. You are men of soul and reason. Now that the King is dead, the political parties will find themselves face to face, and they will destroy each other. Which will go under first? I know not; but this I know, that both will go down, one after the other. To-morrow, Gilbert, your indulgence towards the King will be regarded as a crime; and by the next day, your severity, Billot, will in its turn be treated as criminal. Believe me, in this impending mortal struggle between hatred, fear, vengeance, and fanaticism, few will remain secure and unsullied.

Some will be smirched with mud, others with blood. — Go away, my friends, go away!"

"But France?" said Gilbert.

"Yes, France?" repeated Billot.

"Outwardly France is saved. Outside enemies are beaten. The inside enemy is dead. As dangerous as the scaffold of January 21, 1793, may be for the future, it is incontestably a great power in the present, — the power of a Revolution which cannot go backward. The death of Louis Sixteenth condemns France to the vengeance of thrones, and gives to the Republic the convulsive and desperate strength of a nation under sentence of death. Look at Athens in the classic days. Look at Holland in modern times. All indecision and all negotiations cease with to-day. The Revolution stands with the axe in one hand and the tricolored flag in the other. — Go in peace! Before the axe is laid aside, the nobles will lose their heads. Before France lays down the tricolored flag, Europe will be at her feet. — Go, my friends, go!"

"God is my witness that I shall not regret leaving France, if her future is what you prophesy; but whither shall we go?"

"Ingrate! Dost thou then forget thy foster country, America? Dost thou forget all its immense lakes, its virgin forests, its prairies as vast as the ocean? Hast thou no need of nature's repose, — thou who canst repose thyself, — after the terrible agitations of society?"

"Will you follow me, Billot?" said Gilbert, rising.

"Will you pardon me?" asked Billot, going towards Gilbert.

The two men threw themselves into each other's arms.

"Very well," said Gilbert, "we will go together."

"When?" asked Cagliostro.

"In — in — a week!"

Cagliostro shook his head. "You must go to-night!" he said.

"Why to-night?"

"Because I go to-morrow," said Cagliostro.

"Where do you go?"

"You will know some day, my friends."

"But how can we go?"

"The ship Franklin will set sail for America in thirty-six hours."

"But the passports?"

"They are here!"

"My son —?" asked Gilbert.

Cagliostro went to the door and opened it, saying: "Come in, Sebastien! Your father calls you."

The lad entered, and threw himself into his father's arms. At this sight Billot sighed profoundly.

"Only a postchaise is wanting," said Gilbert.

"Mine is all harnessed and at the door," replied Cagliostro.

Gilbert went to the secretary, where there were, in the common purse, a thousand louis, — nearly five thousand American dollars, — and motioned to Billot to take his share.

"Have we enough?" asked Billot.

"We have more than enough to buy a province."

Billot looked about him in an awkward way.

"What are you looking for, my friend?" asked Gilbert.

"I am looking for something which will be useless, even if I find it, since I cannot write."

Gilbert smiled, opened his desk, and said: "Dictate!"

"I wish to send a farewell to Pitou."

"I will see to it!" said Gilbert, and began to write. When he had finished writing, Billot asked: "What have you written?"

Gilbert read it aloud :

MY DEAR PITOU : We are leaving France, — Billot, Sebastien and myself, — and we all three embrace you tenderly.

As you are at the head of Billot's farm, we think you need nothing more.

Some day we shall probably write for you to come and rejoin us. Your friend,

GILBERT.

" Is that all ? " asked Billot.

" There is a postscript ! "

" What is it ? "

Gilbert looked at the farmer, and then read the postscript :

Billot commends Catherine to your care.

Billot uttered a cry of gratitude, and again threw himself into Gilbert's arms.

Ten minutes later the postchaise was rolling along toward Havre, carrying Gilbert, Sebastien, and Billot far away from Paris.

EPILOGUE.

CHAPTER I.

WHAT ANGE PITOU AND CATHERINE BILLOT DID ON FEBRUARY 15, 1794.

On one cold and beautiful morning, in the terrible winter of 1793–1794, a little more than a year after the death of the King, and the departure of Gilbert, Sebastien, and Billot for America, three or four hundred persons — that is to say, nearly a sixth part of the population of Villers Cotterets — were waiting, on Château Square and in the courtyard of the Mayor's office, for the exit of two lovers, whom our old acquaintance, Monsieur de Longpré, was uniting in wedlock.

These two were Ange Pitou and Catherine Billot. Alas! it had taken many grave events to lead Viscount Isidore de Charny's former mistress, and little Isidore's mother, to become Madame Ange Pitou.

People related and commented upon these events in their own way; but whichever way the occurrences were twisted, they redounded to the glory and devotion of Pitou and the wisdom of Catherine; only the more interesting the bridal couple seemed, the more the two were pitied.

Perhaps they were happier than any individual man or woman in the crowd; but a crowd is so constituted as always to either pity or envy. On this occasion the tendency was towards compassion, and the crowd pitied accordingly.

The events predicted by Cagliostro, on the evening of January 21, 1793, had marched on with rapid strides, each of which left behind it an ineffaceable footprint of blood.

On February 1, 1793, the National Convention voted to raise 800,000,000 francs by the issue of assignats, or government promises. This augmented the entire amount of assignats issued to 3,100,000,000 francs, — three billions and one hundred millions, — (equal to six hundred million dollars).

On March 28, 1793, on the motion of Treilhard, the Convention passed an edict against the Royalist refugees. This edict made their exile perpetual, declared them legally dead, and confiscated their possessions for the benefit of the Republic.

On November 7 the Convention passed a vote directing the Committee of Public Instruction to present a plan for the substitution of some rational and legal form of worship, in place of that taught and practised by the Roman Catholic Church.

We need not speak of the proscription and death of the Girondists. We need not speak of the execution of the Duke of Orleans, of the Queen, of Bailly, Danton, Camille Desmoulins, and of so many others. Although these events sent their reverberations even to Villers Cotterets, they had no influence over the persons of whom it remains for us to speak.

The result of the edict of confiscation was, that Gilbert and Billot, being regarded as refugees, their estates were confiscated, and put up for sale. It was the same with the property of Charny, who was killed on August 10, and of his Countess, slain on September 2.

Catherine was therefore put out of the farm, which was regarded as national property. Pitou wished to reclaim it in Catherine's name; but Pitou, having become a Moderate, was himself somewhat suspected; and wise people advised him not to oppose the national orders, either by deed or word. Catherine and Pitou therefore withdrew to Haramont.

At first Catherine had a notion of taking up her abode, as she had done twice before, in the hut of Father Clouis; but when she presented herself at the door of the Duke of Orleans's ex-gamekeeper, he placed his finger on his lips, as a signal for silence, and shook his head, to indicate impossibility.

This impossibility arose from the fact that her old place was already occupied. The law against unsworn priests had been vigorously enforced; and one can readily understand that as the Abbé Fortier would not take the oath, he would have been banished, if he had not already banished himself.

As the times were not favorable for crossing the frontier, his exile was limited to forsaking his house at Villers Cotterets, — where he left his sister, Mademoiselle Alexandrine, to watch over his goods, — and seeking an asylum with Father Clouis, which the old man felt constrained to bestow upon him, by virtue of the old relations of both men to the Orleans family.

The hut at Clouise Rock, as may be remembered, was little more than a burrow excavated in the earth, where a single person was but poorly accommodated; and even with the additional lean-to, which Viscount Isidore had added for Catherine's convenience, before the birth of their child, there was not room enough for the priest, Catherine, and little Isidore, besides old Clouis himself.

Then we must also recall the intolerant conduct of Father Fortier at the time of Madame Billot's death. Catherine was not enough of a Christian to pardon the priest's refusal to bury her mother; and even if she had been Christian enough to forgive him, he was too good a Catholic to pardon her. She had to relinquish, therefore, all idea of living in the Clouise hut.

Then there were Aunt Angelica's house, on the road to Pleux, and Pitou's hired tenement at Haramont, with its two or three rooms.

Aunt Angelica's house was not to be thought of. The farther the Revolution progressed, the more cross-grained the old woman became, if such a thing were possible; and the leaner also she became, though this seemed incredible.

This moral and corporeal change in Aunt Angelica's condition arose from the fact that in Villers Cotterets, as everywhere else, the parish church was closed, waiting for some rational and legal worship to be invented by the Committee of Public Instruction.

The church being closed, the rental of chairs, which constituted Aunt Angelica's principal revenue, fell off to nothing; and it was this paralysis of her resources which rendered her thinner and more crabbed than ever.

We must add also, that having so often heard about the capture of the Bastille by Billot and Ange Pitou, and having seen her nephew or the farmer start posthaste for Paris on the eve of every great upheaval in the capital, she had little doubt that the French Revolution was conducted by Ange and Billot, and that Citizens Danton, Marat, Robespierre, and others were but secondary to these two chief managers.

We can well understand that Mademoiselle Alexandrine encouraged her in these absurd ideas, which Billot's regicidal vote raised to an extravagant pitch of fanatical hatred.

It would not then do to think of placing Catherine with Aunt Angelica. The only place left was Pitou's rooms in the little cottage at Haramont; but how could two, to say nothing of three, dwell in this little cottage, without prompting the worst sort of gossip? This was yet more impossible than for Catherine to think of living at Clouise Rock.

Pitou then decided to demand hospitality of his friend Désiré Maniquet, — a hospitality which the worthy Haramontesian at once accorded, and which Pitou repaid by industry of all sorts.

All this gave poor Catherine no proper position in the community. Pitou lavished upon her all the tenderness of a friend, all the kindness of a brother; but she felt that it was neither as a friend nor as a brother that she loved Pitou.

Little Isidore also felt this; for as the poor boy had never had the happiness of knowing his father, he loved Pitou as he would have loved the Viscount, — perhaps better; for it must be said that if Pitou was the worshipper of the mother, he was the slave of her child. This skilful strategist knew that the one means of ingress to Catherine's heart was through the pathway opened by her child.

However, we must hasten to say that this sort of calculation never tarnished honest Pitou's sentiments. Pitou remained what we knew him in the earlier chapters of this story, and of the one which bears his name, — an innocent and dutiful lad; and if there was any change in him it was this, — that, in attaining his majority, he became more devoted and single-hearted than ever.

All these qualities moved Catherine to tears. She felt that Pitou loved her ardently, loved her to the verge of adoration and fanaticism; and she often said to herself that she could reward such great love, such complete devotion, with a sentiment more tender than friendship.

Poor Catherine felt herself, aside from Pitou and her child, entirely alone in the world. She understood that if she should die, little Isidore would have no friend in the world except Pitou. Hence it came about, little by little, that Catherine was almost ready to give Pitou the only recompense in her power, and bestow herself upon him, body and soul; though, alas! her earliest love, the budding and odorous flower of her youth, was now transplanted in Heaven.

Nearly six months passed, during which Catherine kept her decision carefully guarded in one corner of her mind, or rather at the bottom of her heart; for she could not quite accustom herself to this new thought.

During this half-year, although Pitou was greeted every morning by a pleasanter smile, although he was welcomed every evening by a tenderer pressure of the hand, he had no idea that such a reversion in his favor was taking place in Catherine's sentiments; but as Pitou's devotion and love did not arise from hope of recompense, he loved her more and more, and grew more and more devoted, though ignorant of her changed sentiments.

This might have gone on till both Pitou and Catherine were in their graves, or till Pitou was as old as Philemon, and Catherine as aged as Baucis, without producing the least alteration in the sentiments of the Captain of the Haramont National Guards; so it fell out that Catherine had to speak first, — that is, after the feminine fashion of speaking.

One evening, instead of offering him her hand, she offered him her forehead. Pitou fancied this was an oversight on Catherine's part, and did not profit by the oversight, but recoiled a step. Catherine, instead of releasing his hand, drew him towards her, and presented not only her forehead, but her cheek. Pitou hesitated still more.

Seeing all this, little Isidore put in his word: "Papa Pitou, kiss Mamma Catherine!"

"Oh my God!" murmured Pitou, turning pale as death, as he touched Catherine's cheek with his cold and trembling lips.

Taking her child, she put him into Pitou's arms, and said: "I give you my child, Pitou. Will you not take the mother also?"

For an instant Pitou's head whirled. He shut his eyes, and while still pressing the child to his heart, he dropped into a chair, crying out, with that heart-delicacy which only another heart can appreciate: "Monsieur Isidore, my darling Monsieur Isidore, how much I love you!"

Isidore always called him Papa Pitou; but Pitou had always said Monsieur Isidore to the Viscount's son.

Pitou felt that it was chiefly because of her love for her child that Catherine was willing to love himself, and therefore he did not say outright: "How I love you, Mademoiselle Catherine!" but, "How I love you, Monsieur Isidore!"

This point being understood, that Pitou loved the child better than the mother, they talked of marriage.

Said Pitou: "I will not hurry you, Mademoiselle

Catherine. Take your own time; but if you 're willing to make me happy, don't let it be too long."

Catherine only required a month. At the end of three weeks Pitou, in full uniform, paid a respectful visit to Aunt Angelica, to ask her to take part in his approaching union with Mademoiselle Catherine Billot.

Aunt Angelica saw her prodigal nephew coming while he was yet afar off, and made haste to shut the door; but Pitou none the less kept on his way towards the inhospitable portal, at which he rapped gently.

"Who goes there?" asked Aunt Angelica, in her most rasping tones.

"Me, thy nephew, dear Aunt Angelica!"

"Go your ways, you September-man, you massacre-maker!" said the old woman.

"Aunty, I come to announce a bit of news which cannot fail to please thee, and which gives me great happiness."

"And what news is that, you Jacobin?"

"Open the door and I 'll tell thee."

"Speak through the door. I won't open it for such a scalawag."

"That 's thy last word, dear Aunt Angelica?"

"That 's my last word!"

"Well, I am to be married."

The door opened as if by magic.

"To whom?" asked Angelica.

"To Mademoiselle Catherine Billot!"

"The wretch! the rascal! the donkey! He 'll marry that light-o'-love. — Bah! Go along, and take my curse with you!" and, with a gesture full of arrogance, she put out her dry and yellow hands, to repel her nephew from her heart and hearth.

"Aunty, please understand that I am too familiar with thy curses to mind these more than the others. Nevertheless, I owed thee this courtesy of announcing my marriage. I have announced it. That ceremony is over, so Good-bye!"

Raising his hand to his three-cornered hat, Pitou saluted Aunt Angelica, and resumed his walk to Pleux.

CHAPTER II.

ON THE EFFECT PRODUCED UPON AUNT ANGELICA BY THE ANNOUNCEMENT OF HER NEPHEW'S MARRIAGE WITH CATHERINE BILLOT.

Pitou went to the house of Monsieur de Longpré, who dwelt in the Rue Ormet, to notify him of his approaching marriage; and Citizen Longpré, less prejudiced than Aunt Angelica, felicitated Pitou on the good action he was about to perform.

Pitou listened, quite astonished. He could not understand that, in achieving his own happiness, he was also doing a kind deed.

As a good Republican, Pitou was now more than ever grateful to the Republic, for abolishing the publication of the bans, and all other tardy preliminaries, through the suppression of marriages in church.

It was agreed, between Citizen Longpré and Citizen Pitou, that on the Saturday following, Catherine and Ange should be united at the townhouse.

The next day, Sunday, was the time appointed by the commissioners for the sale of Billot's farm and the Boursonnes Château. The price of the farm was set at not less than 400,000 francs ($80,000), and the price of the château at 600,000 francs ($120,000); but these prices were estimated in assignats, and this paper money had begun to fall fearfully in value. The golden louis was ordinarily worth about 24 francs in specie; but the same golden louis was now worth 920 francs in paper money.

Indeed, there were no longer any genuine gold louis in circulation.

Pitou went back to tell Catherine the good news; though, as he had allowed himself to hasten the marriage by a couple of days, he feared lest the change should be displeasing to her. Catherine did not manifest any dissatisfaction, and Pitou was accordingly among the angels, — as his name warranted; but Catherine insisted that once more Pitou should visit Aunt Angelica, to announce the precise time of the marriage, and invite her to lend her countenance to the ceremony. The old lady was Pitou's sole kinswoman; and though not a very tender kinswoman, it was proper for Pitou to fulfil all social requirements.

On Thursday morning, therefore, Pitou went to Villers Cotterets, in order to pay his aunt a second visit. Nine o'clock was ringing as he came in sight of the house. This time Aunt Angelica was not at the door; and yet the door was fastened, as if she had expected Pitou.

Pitou fancied that she had gone out, and was delighted at this circumstance. He had made his visit, and a tender and respectful letter would well take the place of the speech he had dreaded.

As the lad was, above all, conscientious, he rapped at the door, fast as it was, and as nobody responded to his knocks, he began to call his aunt's name.

At this double noise of calling and rapping, a neighbor appeared.

"Ah, Mother Fagot, do you know whether my aunt has gone out?"

"Does n't she answer?" replied Mother Fagot.

"No, as you see. Probably she has gone out."

Mother Fagot shook her head, and replied: "I should have seen her go out. My door faces hers; and it 's very seldom, when she gets up, that she does n't come into my house to get some warm ashes to put into her wooden shoes, with which she keeps herself warm all day. Is n't it so, Neighbor Farolet?"

This question was addressed to a new actor, who now opened his door, and came forward, when he heard the noise, to join in the conversation.

"What is it, Madame Fagot?"

"I am saying that Aunt Angelica can't have gone out. Have you seen her?"

"No, and I venture to say she 's still inside; for if she had been up and gone out, the shutters would certainly be open."

"That 's true!" said Pitou. "My God, can anything have happened to my poor aunt?"

"It 's possible," said Mother Fagot.

"It 's more than possible, it 's probable!" said Citizen Farolet, sententiously.

"She was n't a very affectionate aunt, 'pon my word," said Pitou. "Never mind, I should hate to have her suffer. — How can we find out?"

"Nothing difficult about it," said a third neighbor. "You only need to send for Rigolet, the locksmith."

"If it 's to open the door," said Pitou, "that delay would be useless, for I once used to open it with my knife."

"Well, open it, my boy," said Farolet. "We can bear witness that it 's done with no bad intention."

Pitou took out his knife. Then, in the presence of a dozen persons, drawn together by such an important occurrence, he began his work, with a dexterity which clearly proved that, more than once, he had employed this means of entering the home of his boyhood.

The bolt slipped from its socket. The door opened.

The obscurity in the room had been complete; but through the open door, the darksome light of a gloomy winter's morning enabled the neighbors to see Aunt Angelica lying on her bed.

Pitou twice called her by name: "Aunt Angelica! Aunt Angelica!"

The old woman remained motionless, and did not answer.

Pitou went up and took hold of her body. "Oh!" said he, "she's cold and stiff."

Somebody opened the shutters. Aunt Angelica was dead!

"What a misfortune!" said Pitou.

"Oh," said Farolet, "not so very great. She did n't love thee overmuch, my boy, this aunty of thine."

"That may be," said Pitou, "but I loved her well enough. Poor Aunt Angelica!" and, as he spoke, two great tears rolled down the good fellow's cheeks, and he fell on his knees by the bedside.

"Say, Monsieur Pitou," said Mother Fagot, "if you need any help, we're at your orders. — Goodness, we were neighbors, after all!"

"Thanks, Mother Fagot. Is your boy around?"

"Yes. — Here, Fagotin!" cried the good woman.

An urchin of fourteen years appeared on the threshold. "Here I am, Mother Fagot."

"Well," said Pitou, "ask him to run to Haramont, and tell Catherine not to be uneasy; but that I have found my aunty dead. — Poor aunt!"

He dried some fresh tears, and then added: "Tell her what is keeping me at Villers Cotterets."

"Thou hearest, Fagotin?" said Mother Fagot.

"Yes."

"Well, be off!"

"Go by way of the Soissons road," said the practical Farolet, "and notify Monsieur Raynal that there 's a case of sudden death to inquire into, at Aunt Angelica's old cottage."

"Thou hearest?" said the mother.

"Yes," said the urchin; and with that he stretched his legs, and bounded off in the direction of the Soissons highway, which was indeed a continuation of the Pleux lane.

The assemblage had greatly increased. There were now a hundred persons in front of the door. Everybody had an opinion as to Angelica's death. Some said the cause was apoplexy, others that it was a rupture of the vesicles of the heart; while others thought she had died of consumption in its last stages.

Under their breath they all said, that if Pitou were not so slow he would find a treasure on the upper shelf of a cupboard, or in a butter-crock, or under a mattress, or in an old sock.

In the midst of this chatter Doctor Raynal arrived, preceded by the Receiver-General. Now it would be known of what the old lady died.

Raynal entered, approached the bed, examined the body, laid his hand on the stomach and abdomen, and then declared, to the great astonishment of Pleux society, that the ancient maiden had died simply of cold, and perhaps of starvation.

Pitou's tears thereupon redoubled. "Poor aunt! poor aunt! and I thought she was rich! I was a wretch for leaving her alone. — Ah, if I 'd only known! — It can't be possible, Monsieur Raynal! it can't be possible!"

"Look in the meal-chest, and see if there 's any bread. Look in the shed, and see if there 's any wood. I 've always predicted she 'd die like this, — the old miser!"

They did look. There was not a shaving in the wood-box, not a crumb in the cupboard.

"Ah, why did n't she tell me?" cried Pitou. "I 'd have found wood in the forest to warm her. I 'd have poached, to get her some food. — It was your fault," continued the poor boy, accusing those who stood near. "Why did n't you tell me she was poor?"

"We did n't say she was poor," said Farolet, "for the very simple reason that everybody supposed her rich."

Doctor Raynal threw a cloth over Angelica's head, and went towards the door. Pitou ran after him. "You 're not going away, Monsieur Raynal?"

"And what can I do here, my lad?"

"She is surely dead?"

The doctor shrugged his shoulders.

"Oh, my God!" said Pitou. "Dead of cold and of hunger!"

Raynal beckoned to the young fellow, who came nearer. "My boy, all the same I advise thee to search high and low! — Understand?"

"But, Monsieur Raynal, when you say she died of hunger and cold — "

"There have been misers who died of cold and hunger, and yet lay on their treasures. — Mum!" he added, placing his finger on his lips, and then went out.

CHAPTER III.

AUNT ANGELICA'S ARMCHAIR.

DOUBTLESS Pitou would have reflected more deeply on what Raynal had said to him, but just then he saw Catherine running that way, with her child in her arms.

As soon as it was known that in all probability Aunt Angelica had died of hunger and cold, the anxiety of her neighbors to render her some last service was very great.

Catherine's arrival was most timely. As Pitou's affianced wife, she declared it would be her duty to attend to those matters for his aunt; and she did so, poor girl, with the same respect which she paid to her mother's remains, thirty months before.

Meanwhile Pitou was to give orders for the interment, which could not legally take place till the next day but one; as in case of a sudden death, like Aunt Angelica's, the body must remain above ground at least two full days.

Pitou only needed to see the Mayor, the coffin-maker, and the sexton, all religious ceremonies being forbidden at funerals as well as weddings.

"My dear," said Catherine to Pitou, as he took his hat to go for Citizen Longpré, "after this misfortune, will it not be well to put off our marriage a day or two?"

"If you wish it, Mademoiselle Catherine!"

"Will it not seem queer, if we enter upon so important an affair as marriage on the very day when we carry your aunt to the graveyard?"

"An important affair indeed, since it concerns my happiness."

"Well, my dear, consult Monsïeur de Longpré, and do what he thinks best."

"So be it, Mademoiselle Catherine!"

"And then, it might bring us bad luck to marry so near the open grave."

"Oh, as to that," said Pitou, "the moment I'm your husband, I defy ill-luck to get its teeth into me."

"Dear Pitou," said she, extending her hand, "wait till Monday. You see, I try to bring our wishes and the proprieties as near together as possible."

"Two days, Mademoiselle Catherine! That's rather long!"

"That sounds well," said Catherine. "When a man has already waited five years —"

"Many things may happen in two days!" said Pitou.

"It cannot happen that I shall love thee any the less, dear Pitou; and if, as thou pretendest, that's the only thing to fear —"

"The only one! Yes, indeed, the only one, Mademoiselle Catherine!"

"Well, in that case, — here, Isidore —!"

"Yes, mamma," said the child.

"Speak to Papa Pitou. Say to him: 'Don't fear Papa Pitou! Mamma loves thee, and will always love thee.'"

The child repeated what she said, in his soft young voice: "Don't fear, Papa Pitou. Mamma loves thee, and will always love thee."

On this assurance, Pitou interposed no further difficulty, but went after Monsieur de Longpré. When he came back, at the end of an hour, he had arranged everything, both for the burial and the wedding, paying the bills in advance. With the rest of his money he had bought fuel and provisions enough for two days.

It was time for the wood to come; for in such a poor old house, where the wind cuts in at every crevice, one might easily die of cold. Indeed, Pitou found Catherine chilled through.

The marriage, according to her wish, had been deferred till Monday. During the two intervening nights and days, Pitou and Catherine did not quit each other or the house for an instant. Despite the enormous fire which Pitou built in the fireplace, the wind would steal in, icy and sharp, and Pitou declared that if Aunt Angelica had not died of hunger, she must certainly have died of cold.

The time came for removing the body. The journey was short, for Aunt Angelica's house almost touched the cemetery.

All the Pleux population, and many other townsfolk, followed the dead woman to her last resting-place. In the country, both women and men go to the grave. Pitou and Catherine were the chief mourners.

When the ceremony was over, Pitou thanked those present, in the dead woman's name and his own; and after a drop of holy water had been thrown on the old maid's tomb, every one passed out in front of Pitou.

Left alone with Catherine, Pitou turned to the side where he had left her. She was there no longer; for she was kneeling, with little Isidore, at a slab, over which were growing four cypresses, one at each corner. This was Mother Billot's grave. The four cypresses were some which Pitou had brought from the forest, and planted here.

He did not wish to disturb Catherine in her pious occupation; but thinking she would be awfully cold when her prayer was finished, he ran round to the house, with the intention of starting up a big fire. Unluckily, one thing stood in the way of his good intentions. Since morning, the two days being over, his store of wood was exhausted.

Pitou scratched his ear. He had spent what money he had left in buying bread and wood. He looked about to see what old bit of furniture could be sacrificed to the needs of the moment. The wooden kneading-trough and the bedstead, though not of any great value, were still usable; but the armchair had for a long time been worthless to anybody save Aunt Angelica. In fact nobody, except the old maid, dared to sit down in it, so hopelessly dislocated were its joints.

The armchair stood condemned. Pitou proceeded after the fashion of the Revolutionary Tribunal. As soon as the sentence was passed, it was to be executed. He placed one knee on the morocco leather seat, black with age, and took hold of one post with both hands, and pulled. At the third pull the arm gave way. The armchair, as if to show its grief over this dismemberment, gave forth a strange moan. If Pitou had been superstitious, he might have believed that Aunt Angelica's soul was enclosed in the old armchair; as indeed it was!

As Pitou had but one superstition in the world, and that was Catherine, the armchair was condemned to the stake for Catherine's sake. If it had shed as much blood and sent forth as many groans as the enchanted trees in Tasso's poetic forest, that armchair would have been shivered into flinders just the same.

Pitou grasped the other post with an equally vigorous arm, and wrenched it from the carcass, now nearly in ruins.

Once more the armchair sent forth an odd metallic sound. Pitou was still pitiless. He grabbed the mutilated piece of furniture by the leg, and in order to smash it the better, he banged it against the floor with all his might.

This time the armchair broke in twain; and to Pitou's great amazement, through the gaping wound it poured forth, not clots of blood, but jets of gold.

It will be remembered that whenever Aunt Angelica collected twenty-four francs in silver, she always exchanged those twenty-four francs for a golden louis, and hid the louis in her armchair.

Pitou was dumfounded. He trembled with incredulity and astonishment. His first thought was, to run after Catherine and little Isidore, bring them in, and show them the treasure he had discovered; but a terrible reflection held him back. If Catherine thought him rich, would she still be willing to marry him? He shook his head. "No, she would refuse me!" he thought.

A moment he remained motionless, involved in thought. Then a smile illuminated his face. Undoubtedly he had found a way out of the embarrassment which attended this unexpected fortune.

He collected the goldpieces which were on the floor. He cut open the chair-seat with his knife, searching in the remotest corners, and pulling out all the hair stuffing. Every part of the chair had been filled with louis. There was quite enough to fill that big pot, wherein Aunt Angelica cooked the famous rooster, — that bird which gave rise to a terrible scene between aunt and nephew, recounted in the story called "Ange Pitou."

Pitou counted his louis. There were 1550. Pitou was a rich man, with 1550 louis, — that is, 37,200 francs. As every golden louis was worth 920 francs in assignats, Pitou was now worth 1,426,000 francs, almost a million and a half, — the cost of the famous Queen's Diamond Necklace.

At what a moment did this colossal treasure come to him! At a moment when, having no more money to buy wood, he was obliged to break up an old chair, in order to warm his darling Catherine.

How lucky that Pitou was so poor, the weather so cold, and the armchair so old. Who knows, except for this combination of circumstances, what might have happened to this precious inheritance?

Pitou began by stuffing his pockets with louis. Then he vigorously shook every fragment of the armchair, breaking the wood into small pieces, which he piled up in the fireplace. Then he struck the steel, partly on the flint and partly on his trembling fingers. At last he set the tinder afire, and with an unsteady hand lighted the pile of wood.

It was time. Catherine and little Isidore came back, shivering with cold. Pitou pressed the boy to his heart, kissed Catherine's cold hands, and ran away, saying: "I'm off to attend to something of vital importance. Get yourselves warm, and wait for me."

"Where's Papa Pitou going?" asked Isidore.

"I don't know," said Catherine, "but one thing is sure! When he goes so fast, he's busy, not on his own account, but on thine or mine."

Catherine might have said, "On thine and mine."

CHAPTER IV.

WHAT PITOU DID WITH THE GOLDEN LOUIS FOUND IN AUNT ANGELICA'S ARMCHAIR.

It must not be forgotten that on the next day was to take place the public auction of Billot's farm and the Charny Château. It will be remembered also that the lowest price of the farm had been set at the sum of 400,000 francs, while the château was valued at 600,000 francs, — in assignats.

When the day arrived, Citizen Longpré bought, for an unknown proprietor, both these estates, for the sum of 1350 louis in gold, — that is to say, — for 1,242,000 francs in assignats. He paid for the property on the spot.

This took place on Sunday, the night before Pitou and Catherine's wedding-day.

On that Sunday, early in the morning, Catherine started for Haramont, in order to make some of those little coquettish arrangements in which even the least ostentatious ladies like to indulge on the eve of wedlock. Perhaps also she did not care to remain in the village, so near the place where they were selling the beautiful farm where she had passed her childhood, where she had been so happy, where she had suffered so cruelly.

At eleven o'clock next day the crowd, assembled in front of the Mayor's office, both pitied and praised Pitou very strongly, for marrying a girl so completely ruined, — not alone by the loss of fortune, but by the possession of a child ; for this child, instead of some day being richer than herself, — as she had fondly hoped, — was now even poorer and more dependent than his mother.

While the crowd were pitying and praising outside, Citizen Longpré was saying to Pitou, according to the usage of the epoch : " Citizen Pierre Ange Pitou, do you take for your wife Citizeness Anne Catherine Billot ? " and to Catherine : " Citizeness Anne Catherine Billot, do you take for your husband Citizen Pierre Ange Pitou ? " and both responded in the affirmative, Pitou with a voice tremulous with emotion, and Catherine most serenely.

When the Citizen Mayor had proclaimed, in the name of the law, that the two young people were now joined in marriage, he made a sign for little Isidore to come and speak with him.

Little Isidore was placed on the Mayor's desk.

" My child," said the Mayor, " here are some papers, which thou wilt give to Mamma Catherine, after Papa Pitou takes her home."

" Yes, Monsieur," lisped the child, taking the papers in his little hand.

All was now over, except that Pitou, to the great astonishment of the onlookers, drew from his pocket five golden louis and gave them to the Mayor, saying simply : " For the poor, Citizen Mayor ! "

Catherine smiled and said : " Are we rich folks, then ? "

" One is rich when one is happy, Catherine," replied Pitou ; " and thou hast made me the richest man on earth ! "

He offered her his arm, on which she leaned tenderly. They found the crowd awaiting them at the door. The bridal couple were greeted with loud acclaim.

Meanwhile Pitou turned towards the right. "Where art thou going, my friend?" asked Catherine.

In fact, if Pitou meant to return to Haramont, he must take the road to the left, through the park. If he meant to go back to Aunt Angelica's house, he would go to the right, as far as Château Square. Why then did he go towards Fountain Square? That is what Catherine wished to know.

"Come, my well-beloved Catherine!" said Pitou. "I am taking thee to a place thou 'lt be right glad to see again."

Catherine went whither he led the way; but those who saw them said: "Where can they be going?"

Pitou crossed Fountain Square without stopping, took the Rue Ormet, went to the end of it, turned into the lane where, six years before, he met Catherine riding on her donkey, — the day when he was driven from home by Aunt Angelica, and knew not where to lay his head.

"We are not going to Pisseleu, I hope," said Catherine, checking her husband.

"Please keep on with me!" said Pitou.

Catherine sighed, but she went with him through the little lane, which led to the plain.

After walking ten minutes they reached the little bridge, where Pitou once found Catherine in a dead swoon, at the time of Viscount Isidore's sudden departure for Paris.

There she stopped and said: "Pitou! I can go no farther!"

"Oh, Mademoiselle Catherine, — only as far as the hollow willow-tree."

It was the willow wherein Pitou used to place Isidore's letters, and find those which were to be sent to the aristocratic young lover in return.

Catherine again sighed, and continued on her walk; but at the willow she said: "Now let us go back, pray!" but Pitou laid his hand on her arm and said: "Twenty more paces, Mademoiselle Catherine! That 's all I ask!"

"Ah Pitou!" said Catherine, in a tone so reproachful that Pitou paused in his turn, and said: "Ah Mademoiselle, — and I, — I thought I should be making thee so happy!"

"Thou thinkest to make me happy by taking me to see the farm where I was brought up, which belonged to my parents, which ought to belong to me, and which was sold yesterday, to go into the hands of some stranger, whose very name I do not know?"

"Mademoiselle Catherine, only twenty steps more. That 's all I 'll ask."

In twenty steps they turned an angle of the wall, which brought them into sight of the great gate of the farm.

Around this gate were gathered groups of laborers, wagoners, hostlers, milkmaids, with Father Clouis at their head. Each attendant held a bouquet.

"Ah, I understand!" said Catherine. "Before the new proprietor comes, it was thy wish to bring me here once again, that the old servants might bid me good-bye. Thanks, Pitou!"

Dropping her husband's arm and little Isidore's hand, she walked on in front of these good people, who surrounded her, and led her into the hallway of the farmhouse. Pitou took little Isidore in his arms, — the child still carrying the two papers given him by the Mayor, — and followed Catherine.

The young wife was seated in the middle of the great hallway, smoothing her forehead with her hands, as if she wished to awake from a dream.

"In God's name, Pitou," she asked, "what are they saying to me?" Her eyes were wild and her voice feverish.

"My dear husband, I do not understand what they are saying to me!" she presently added.

"Perhaps the papers thy child has will help thee to understand it all better, dear Catherine!" said Pitou; and he pushed Isidore gently to his mother's side.

Catherine took the two papers from the child's little hands.

"Read, my wife, read!" said Pitou.

Catherine opened one of the two papers, and read:

This certifies that the Boursonnes Château, and the estates thereunto appertaining, were bought of me and paid for yesterday, February 14, 1794, on account of Jacques Philippe Isidore, the minor son of Citizeness Catherine Billot; and therefore it is to this minor child the aforesaid Boursonnes Château and its appertaining grounds lawfully belong.

DE LONGPRÉ,
Mayor of Villers Cotterets.

"What does this mean, Pitou?" asked Catherine. "Thou canst see I don't understand a word of all this?"

"Read the other paper!" said Pitou.

Unfolding the other paper, Catherine read as follows:

This certifies that the farm called Pisseleu, with all its dependencies, was bought of me, and paid for, yesterday, February 14, 1794, on account of Citizeness Anne Catherine Billot, and that she is therefore the sole and lawful proprietor of this farm, and all its dependencies.

DE LONGPRÉ,
Mayor of Villers Cotterets.

"In Heaven's name," said Catherine, "tell me what this signifies, or I shall go crazy!"

"It signifies," said Pitou, "that owing to the fact that I found fifteen hundred and fifty gold louis in Aunt Angelica's old armchair, — which I was breaking up to kindle a fire, against your return from the funeral, — the estate and château of Boursonnes will not pass from the Charnys nor the Pisseleu farm from the Billot family."

Then Pitou told the story, which we have already given our readers.

"Oh, Pitou!" said Catherine, "and thou hadst courage to go on and burn up that old chair, when there were louis in thy pocket wherewith to buy wood!"

"Catherine," said Pitou, "thou wert just coming home. Before there could be any fire otherwise, it would be necessary to buy the wood, and have it brought home. Meanwhile the cold would have found thee."

Catherine opened both arms. Pitou pushed forward little Isidore.

"Thee also! thee also! dear Pitou!" said Catherine.

In one embrace she clasped to her heart both son and husband.

"Oh, my God!" murmured Pitou, choking with joy, and at the same time paying the tribute of a last tear to the old maid, "to think she should have died with cold and hunger! Poor Aunt Angelica!"

"Faith," said a big wagoner to a fresh and pretty little farm-girl, pointing to Pitou and Catherine, "faith, there are two people who don't appear likely to die in any such way!"

THE END.

LE

CHEVALIER DE MAISON-ROUGE.

CHAPTER I.

THE ENROLLED VOLUNTEERS.

It was on the evening of the 10th of March, 1793, ten o'clock was striking from Notre Dame, and each stroke sounding, emitted a sad and monotonous vibration. Night had fallen on Paris, not boisterous and stormy, but cold, damp, and foggy. Paris itself at that time was not the Paris of our day, glittering at night with thousands of reflected lights, — the Paris of busy promenades, of lively chat, with its riotous suburbs, the scene of audacious quarrels, and daring crime, — but a fearful, timid, busy city, whose few and scattered inhabitants, even in crossing from one street to another, ran concealing themselves in the darkness of the alleys, and ensconcing themselves behind their portes-cochères, like wild beasts tracked by the hunters to their lair.

As we have previously said, it was the evening of the 10th of March,1793. A few remarks upon the critical situation of the country, which had produced the changed aspect of the capital, before we commence stating the events the recital of which form the subject of this history.

France, by the death of Louis XVI., had become at variance with all Europe. To the three enemies she had first combated, — that is to say, Prussia, the Empire, and Piedmont, — were now joined England, Holland, and Spain. Sweden and Denmark alone preserved their old neutrality, occupied as they were besides in beholding Catharine II. devastating Poland.

The state of affairs was truly frightful. France, more respected as a physical power, but less esteemed as a moral one, since the massacres of September and the execution of the 21st of January, was literally blockaded, like a simple town, by the whole of Europe. England was on our coasts, Spain upon the Pyrenees, Piedmont and Austria on the Alps, Holland and Prussia to the north of the Pays-Bas, and with one accord from the Upper Rhine to the Scheldt two hundred and fifty thousand combatants marched against the Republic. Our generals were repulsed in every direction. Miacrinski had been obliged to abandon Aix-la-Chapelle, and draw back upon Liege; Steingel and Neuilly were driven back upon Limbourg; while Miranda, who besieged Maestricht, fell back upon Tongres. Valence and Dampierre, reduced to beat a retreat, did so with a loss of half their number. More than ten thousand deserters had already abandoned the army, and cleverly scattered themselves in the interior. At last the Convention, having no hope except in Dumouriez, despatched courier after courier, commanding him to quit the borders of Bribos (where he was preparing to embark for Holland), and return to take the command of the army of the Meuse.

Sensible at heart, like an animated body, France felt at Paris — that is to say, at its core — each and every blow levelled at it by invasion, revolt, or treason, even from quarters the most distant. Each victory was a riot of joy; every defeat an insurrection of terror. It is therefore easy to comprehend what tumult was produced by the news of these successive losses which we had just experienced.

On the preceding evening, the 9th of March, they had had at the Convention a sitting more stormy than usual; all the officers had received orders to join their regiments at the same time, and Danton, that audacious proposer of improbable things (but which nevertheless were accomplished), — Danton mounting the tribune, cried out, "Soldiers are wanting, say you? Offer Paris an opportunity of saving France. Demand from her thirty thousand men, send them to Dumouriez; and not only is France saved, but Belgium is secured, and Holland is conquered." This proposition had been received with shouts of enthusiasm, registers had been opened in all the sections, calling on them to assemble in the evening. Places of public amusement were closed to avoid all distraction, and the black flag was hoisted at the Hôtel de Ville, in token of distress. Before midnight, five and thirty thousand names were inscribed on the registers; only this evening, as it had before occurred in September, in every section, while inscribing their names, the enrolled Volunteers had demanded that before their departure the traitors might be punished.

The traitors were in fact the "contre-revolutionists," — the hidden conspirators who from within menaced the Revolution, thus menaced from without. But as may be easily understood, the word "traitor" extended to all those to whom the extreme parties who at this period tore France wished to apply it. The traitors were the weaker party; as the Girondins were the weakest, the Montagnards decided that the Girondins must be the traitors.

On the next day, which was the 10th of March, all the Montagnard deputies were present at the sitting. The Jacobins, armed, filled the tribunes, after having turned out the women; the mayor presented himself with the Council of the Commune, confirming the report of the Commissioners of the Convention respecting the devotedness of the citizens, but repeating the wish, unanimously expressed the preceding evening, for a Tribunal Extraordinary appointed to judge the traitors. The report of the Committee was instantly demanded with loud vociferations. The Committee met immediately, and in five minutes afterward Robert Lindet declared that a Tribunal would be formed, composed of nine judges (independent of all forms, and acquiring proof by every means), divided into two permanent sections, and prosecuting, by order of the Convention or directly, all those who were found guilty in any way of attempting to mislead the people.

This was a sweeping clause, and the Girondins, understanding it as their death-warrant, rose en masse. Death, cried they, rather than submit to the establishment of this Venetian inquisition.

The Montagnards, in reply to this apostrophe, demanded to put the matter to the vote in loud tones. "Yes," exclaimed Féraud, "let us vote to make known to the world the men who are willing to assassinate innocence under the mask of the law." They voted at length; and against all expectation the majority decided — (1) that they would have juries; (2) that these juries should be of equal numbers in the departments; (3) that they should be nominated by the Convention. At the moment when these three propositions were approved, loud cries were heard; but the Convention, accustomed to receive occasional visits from the populace, inquired their wishes, and were informed in reply that it was merely a deputation of enrolled Volunteers, who, having dined at the Halle-au-Blé, demanded to be permitted to display their military tactics before the Convention.

The doors were opened immediately, and six hundred men, armed with swords, pistols, and pikes, apparently half-intoxicated, filed off amid shouts of applause, and loudly demanded the death of the traitors. "Yes," replied Collot d' Herbois, addressing them, "yes, my friends, we will save you — you and liberty — notwithstanding their intrigues." These words were followed by an angry glance toward the Girondins, which plainly intimated they were not yet beyond reach of danger. In short, the sitting of the Convention terminated, the Montagnards scattered themselves among other clubs, running first to the Cordeliers and then to the Jacobins, proposing to place the traitors beyond the reach of the law by cutting their throats that very night.

The wife of Louvet resided in the Rue Saint Honoré, near the Jacobins. She, hearing these vociferations, descended, entered the club, and heard this proposition; then quickly retraced her steps, and warned her husband of the impending danger. Louvet, hastily arming himself, ran from door to door to alarm his friends, but found them all absent; then fortunately ascertaining from one of the servants they had gone to Pétion's house, he followed them there. He found them quietly deliberating over a decree which ought to be presented on the morrow, and which by a chance majority they hoped to pass. He related what had occurred, communicated his fears, informed them of the plot devised against them by the Cordeliers and Jacobins, and concluded by urging them on their side to pursue some active and energetic measure.

Then Pétion rose, calm and self-possessed as usual, walked to the window, opened it, looked at the sky, and then extended his hand, which he drew in covered with moisture. "It rains," said he; "there will be nothing to-night."

Through this half-opened window the last vibration of the clock was heard striking ten.

Such were the occurrences of the 10th of March and the evening preceding it, — occurrences which, in this gloomy obscurity and menacing silence, rendered the abodes destined to shelter the living like sepulchres peopled by the dead. In fact, long patrols of the National Guard, preceded by men marching with fixed bayonets, troops of citizens, armed at hazard, pushing against each other, gendarmes closely examining each doorway, and strictly scrutinizing every narrow alley, — these were the sole inhabitants who ventured to expose themselves in the streets. Every one instinctively understood that some unusual and terrible plot was in progress.

The cold and drizzling rain, which had tended so much to reassure Pétion, had considerably augmented the ill-humor and trouble of these inspectors, whose every meeting resembled preparation for combat, and who, after recognizing each other with looks of defiance, exchanged the word of command slowly and with a very bad grace. One would have said on seeing them separate and return to their several posts, that they mutually feared an attack from behind.

On the same evening, when Paris was a prey to one of these panics (so often renewed that they ought, in some measure, to have become habitual), — the evening on which the massacre of the lukewarm revolutionists was secretly debated, who after having voted (with reservation for the most part) the death of the king, recoiled to-day before the death of the queen, a prisoner in the Temple, with her children and her sister-in-law, — a woman, enveloped in a mantle of lilac printed cotton with black spots, her head almost buried in her hood, glided along the houses in the Rue Saint Honoré, seeking concealment under a door-porch, or in the angle of a wall, every time a patrol appeared, remaining motionless as a statue and holding her breath till he had passed, and once more pursuing her anxious course with increased rapidity, till some danger of a similar nature again compelled her to seek refuge in silence and immobility.

She had already (thanks to the precautions she had taken) travelled over with impunity part of the Rue Saint Honoré, when at the corner of the Rue de Grenelle she suddenly encountered, not a body of patrol, but a small troop of our brave enrolled Volunteers, who, having dined at the Halle-au-Blé, found their patriotism considerably increased by the numerous toasts they had drunk to their future victories. The poor woman uttered a cry, and made a futile attempt to escape by the Rue du Coq.

"Ah, ah, Citizen!" cried the chief of the Volunteers (for already, with the need of command natural to man, these worthy patriots had elected their chief), "Ah, where are you going?"

The fugitive made no reply, but continued her rapid movement.

"What sport!" said the chief; "it is a man disguised, an aristocrat who thinks to save himself."

The sound of two or three guns escaping from hands rather too unsteady to be depended upon, announced to the poor woman that her haste was a fatal mistake.

"No, no," cried she, stopping short, and retracing her steps; "no, Citizen; you are mistaken. I am not a man."

"Then advance at command," said the chief, "and reply to my questions. Where are you hastening to, charming belle of the night?"

"But, Citizen, I am not going anywhere. I am returning."

"Oh! returning, are you?"

"Yes."

"It is rather a late return for a respectable woman, Citizen?"

"I am returning from visiting a sick relative."

"Poor little kitten!" said the chief, making a motion with his hand, before which the horrified woman quickly recoiled, "where is your passport?"

"My passport! What is that, Citizen? What do you mean?"

"Have you not read the decree of the Commune?"

"No."

"You have heard it proclaimed, then?"

"Alas, no! What, then, said this decree, in the name of God?"

"In the first place, we no longer say 'God'; we only speak of the 'Supreme Being' now."

"Pardon my error. It is an old custom."

"Bad habit — the habit of the aristocracy."

"I will endeavor to correct myself, Citizen; but you said —"

"I said that the decree of the Commune prohibited any one to go out, after ten at night, without a civic pass. Now, have you this civic pass?"

"Alas! no."

"You have forgotten it at your relative's?"

"I was ignorant of the necessity of taking it with me on going out."

"Then come with us to the first post; there you can explain all prettily to the captain; and if he feels perfectly satisfied with your explanation, he will depute two men to conduct you in safety to your abode, else you will be detained for further information. File left! forward! quick march!"

From the cry of terror which escaped the poor prisoner, the chief of the enrolled Volunteers understood how much the unfortunate woman dreaded this interview.

"Oh, oh!" said he, "I am quite certain we hold distinguished game. Forward, forward — to the route, my little ci-devant."

And the chief seizing the arm of the captive, placed it within his own, and dragged her, notwithstanding her cries and tears, toward the post of the Palais Egalité.

They were already at the top of the barrier of Sergents, when suddenly a tall young man, closely wrapped in a mantle, turned the corner of the Rue des Petits-Champs at the very moment when the prisoner was endeavoring, by renewing her supplications, to regain her liberty. But without listening the chief dragged her brutally forward. The woman uttered a cry of grief mingled with terror. The young man saw the struggle, heard the cry, and bounding from the opposite side of the street, found himself facing the little troop.

"What is all this? What are you doing to this woman?" demanded he of the person who appeared to be the chief.

"Before you question me, you had better attend to your own business."

"Who is this woman; and what do you want with her?" repeated the young man, in a still more imperative tone than at first.

"But who are you, that you interrogate us?"

The young man opened his cloak, when an epaulet was visible, glistening on his military costume.

"I am an officer," said he, "as you can see."

"Officer! In what?"

"In the Civic Guard."

"Well, what of that?" replied one of the troop. "What do we know here of the officers of the Civic Guard?"

"What is that he says?" asked another man, in a drawling and ironical tone peculiar to a man of the people, or rather of the Parisian populace, when beginning to be angry.

"He says," replied the young man, "that if the epaulet cannot command respect for the officer, the sword shall command respect for the epaulet."

At the same time, making a retrograde movement, the unknown defender of the young woman had disengaged his arm from the folds of his mantle, and drawn from beneath it, sparkling by the glimmer of a lamp, a large infantry sabre. Then with a rapid movement which displayed his familiarity with similar scenes of violence, he seized the chief of the Volunteers by the collar of his jacket, and placing the point of the sabre to his throat, "Now," said he, "let us speak like friends."

"But, Citizen," said the chief, endeavoring to free himself.

"I warn you, that at the slightest movement made, either by you or any of your men, I pass my sabre through your body."

During this time two men belonging to the troop retained their hold of the woman.

"You have asked who I am," continued the young man, "which you had no right to do, since you do not command a regular patrol. However, I will inform you. My name is Maurice Lindey; I commanded a body of artillery-men on the 10th of August, am now lieutenant in the National Guards, and secretary to the section of Brothers and Friends. Is that sufficient?"

"Well, Citizen Lieutenant," replied the chief, still menaced with the blade, the point of which he felt pressing more and more, "this is quite another thing. If you are really what you say, — that is, a good patriot —"

"There, I knew we should soon understand each other," said the officer. "Now, in your turn, answer me: why did this woman call out, and what are you doing with her?"

"We are taking her to the guard-house."

"And why are you taking her there?"

"Because she has no civic pass, and the last decree of the Commune ordered the arrest of any and every individual appearing in the streets of Paris without one, after ten o'clock at night. Do you forget the country is in danger, and that the black flag floats over the Hôtel de Ville?"

"The black flag floats over the Hôtel de Ville, and the country is in danger, because two hundred thousand slaves march against France," replied the officer, "and not because a woman runs through the streets of Paris after ten o'clock at night. But never mind, citizens. There is a decree of the Commune, it is true, and you only did your duty; and if you had answered me at once, our explanation might have been a much shorter and probably a less stormy one. It is well to be a patriot, but equally so to be polite; and the first officer whom the citizens ought to respect is he, it seems to me, whom they themselves appointed. In the mean time, take the woman with you, if you please. You are at liberty to depart."

"Oh! Citizen," cried the woman, who had listened to the whole of this debate with the most intense anxiety, — "Oh! Citizen," she cried, seizing the arm of Maurice, "do not abandon me to the mercy of these rude and half-drunken men."

"Well, then," said Maurice, "take my arm, and I will conduct you with them as far as the Poste."

"To the Poste!" exclaimed the terrified woman, "and why to the Poste, when I have injured no one?"

"You are taken to the Poste," replied Maurice, "not because you have done any one wrong, or because you are considered capable of so doing, but on account of the decree issued by the Commune, forbidding any one to go out without a pass, and you have none."

"But, Monsieur, I was ignorant of the law."

"Citizen, you will find at the Poste brave and honorable men, who will fully appreciate your reasons, and from whom you have nothing to fear."

"Monsieur," said the young woman, pressing Maurice's arm, "it is no longer insult that I fear, it is death; if they conduct me to the Poste, I am lost."

CHAPTER II.

THE UNKNOWN.

THERE was in this voice an accent of so much terror, mingled with superiority, that Maurice was startled. Like a stroke of electricity, this vibrating voice had touched his heart. He turned toward the enrolled Volunteers, who were talking among themselves. Humiliated at having been held in check by a single individual, they were now consulting together with the visible intention of regaining their lost ground. They were eight against one; three were armed with guns, the remainder with pistols and pikes. Maurice wore only his sabre. The contest could not be an equal one. Even the woman comprehended this, as she held down her head and uttered a deep sigh.

As to Maurice, with his brows knit, his lip disdainfully curled, and his sabre drawn from its scabbard, he stood irresolute, fluctuating between the sentiments of a man and a citizen, — the one urging him to protect the woman, the other counselling him to give her up. All at once, at the corner of the Rue des Bons-Enfans, he saw the reflection of several muskets, and heard also the measured tread of a patrol, who, perceiving a crowd, halted within a few paces of the group, and through the corporal demanded, "Who goes there?"

"A friend," said Maurice. "A friend! Advance, Lorin!"

He to whom this order was addressed, placed himself at the head of his eight men, and quickly approached.

"Is it you, Maurice?" said the corporal. "Ah, libertine! what are you doing in the streets at this hour?"

"You see, I come from the section of Brothers and Friends."

"Yes; to visit that of sisters and friends. We know all about that.

"Ah, listen, ma belle,
When the dusk midnight hour
The church-bell shall toll,
I will haste to thy bower;
To thy side I will steal,
Spite of bolts and of bars,
And my love will reveal
'Neath the light of the stars.

Is it not so, eh?"

"No, friend, you are mistaken. I was on my way home when I discovered this citizen struggling in the hands of these citizen Volunteers, and ran up to inquire why they wished to detain her."

"It is just like you," said Lorin.

"For all the world knows that the fair sex so dear
Has ever a friend in the French cavalier."

Then turning toward the Volunteers, "Why did you stop this woman?" inquired the poetical corporal.

"I have already told the lieutenant," replied the chief of the little troop, "because she had no pass."

"Bah! bah!" said Lorin, "a great crime, certainly."

"Are you then ignorant of the decree of the Commune?" demanded the chief of the Volunteers.

"Yes; but there is another clause which annuls that."

"Which?"

"Listen: —

"On Pindus and Parnassus, it is decreed by Love,
That Beauty's witching face,
That Youth and fairy Grace,
Without a pass, by day or night, may through the city rove.

What do you say to this decree, Citizen? it is gallant, it seems to me."

"Yes; but it does not appear to me peremptory. In the first place it has not appeared in the 'Moniteur;' then we are neither upon Pindus nor Parnassus; it is not yet day; and lastly, the citizen is perhaps neither graceful, young, nor fair."

"I wager the contrary," said Lorin. "Prove that I am in the right, Citizen; remove your hood that all may judge if you come under the conditions of the decree."

"Monsieur," said the young woman, pressing closer to Maurice, "having saved me from your enemies, protect me now from your friends, I beseech you."

"You see," said the chief, "how she hides herself. In my opinion she is a spy of the aristocrats, — some street-walker."

"Oh, Monsieur!" said the young woman, stepping before Maurice, and discovering a face radiant with youth, rank, and beauty, visible by the light of the lamp, "do I look like what they have termed me?"

Maurice was dazzled. He had never even dreamed of beauty equal to that he had caught sight of for a moment, and only for a moment, since the unknown had again concealed her face in the hood as rapidly as she had unveiled it. "Lorin," said Maurice, in a whisper, "claim the prisoner, that you may conduct her to your post; you have a right to do so as chief of patrol."

"Very good," said the young corporal, "I understand with half a word."

Then, addressing himself to the unknown, "Let us go, ma belle," continued he; "since you will not afford us the proof that you are within the conditions of the decree, you must follow us."

"Why follow you?" said the chief of the enrolled Volunteers.

"Certainly. We shall conduct the citizen to the post of the Hôtel de Ville, where we are on guard, and there she will be examined."

"Not so, not so," said the chief of the first troop; "she belongs to us, and we will keep her."

"Citizens, citizens," said Lorin, "you will make me angry!"

"Angry, or not angry, morbleu, it is equally the same to us. We are true soldiers of the Republic, and while you patrol the streets, we go to shed our blood on the frontier."

"Take care you do not shed it by the way, citizens, which is very likely to occur, if you are not rather more polite than you are at present."

"Politeness is a virtue appertaining to the aristocracy, and we belong to the lower orders," replied the chief.

"Do not speak of these things before Madame," said Lorin, "perhaps she is an Englishwoman. Do not be angry at the supposition, my beautiful bird of the night," added he, gallantly, turning toward the unknown. "Doubtless you are conversant with the poets, and one of them tells us 'that England is a swan's nest situated in the midst of a large pond.'"

"Ah! you betray yourself," said the chief of the enrolled; "you avow yourself a creature of Pitt, in the pay of England. A—"

"Silence," said Lorin; "you do not understand poetry; therefore I must speak to you in prose. We are National Guards, affable and patient fellows enough, but still children of Paris, — that is to say, if we are provoked we strike rather hard."

"Madame," said Maurice, "from what you have now witnessed you can easily imagine what will soon follow. In five minutes ten or twelve men will be cutting one another's throats for you. Is the cause your defenders have embraced worthy of the blood they are about to shed?"

"Monsieur," replied the unknown, clasping her hands, "I can only assure you that if you permit me to be arrested, the result to myself will be dreadful, but to others fatal; and that rather than you should abandon me, I would beseech you to pierce me through the heart with the weapon you hold in your hand, and cast my corpse into the Seine."

"Madame," replied Maurice, "I will take all the responsibility upon myself;" and letting drop the hand of the lovely incognita which he held in his own, —

"Citizens," said he, addressing himself to the National Guard, "as an officer, as a patriot, and a Frenchman, I command you to protect this woman. And, Lorin, if any of these canaille say one word, put them to the bayonet."

"Carry arms!" cried Lorin.

"God of mercy!" cried the unknown, enveloping her head still closer in her hood, and supporting herself against a post, "O God! protect him!"

The Volunteers directly placed themselves on the defensive, and one among them fired his pistol, the ball passing through the hat of Maurice.

"Charge bayonets!" cried Lorin.

Then, in the darkness of night, a scene of struggling and confusion ensued, during which one or two shots were heard, followed by cries, imprecations, and blasphemies; but no one appeared, because, as we have said, a massacre was secretly debated, and it was believed that it had commenced. Two or three windows only were opened for an instant, but were immediately closed. Less in number, and worse armed, the enrolled Volunteers were in an instant defeated. Two were badly wounded and four others pinned against the wall, each with a bayonet at his breast.

"There," said Lorin, "I hope now you will remain as quiet as lambs. As for you, Citizen Maurice, I order you to conduct this woman to the post of the Hôtel de Ville. You understand you are answerable for her."

"Yes," said Maurice. Then, in a low tone, "And the password?" added he.

"The devil!" said Lorin, rubbing his ear, "the password; it is —"

"Do not fear I shall make a bad use of it."

"Faith," said Lorin; "make what use you like of it, that is your concern."

"Tell me then," said Maurice.

"I will tell you all in good time, but let us first dispose of these tipsy fellows. Then, before we part, I shall not be sorry to give you a few words of advice."

"Well, I will wait."

Lorin then turned to his National Guards, who still kept the enrolled Volunteers in subjection.

"Now," said he, to the latter, "have you had sufficient?"

"Yes, dog of a Girondin," replied the chief.

"You deceive yourself, my friend," said Lorin, coolly; "we are better sans-culottes than yourselves, seeing that we belong to the club of Thermopyles, of whose patriotism no one, I hope, entertains a doubt. Let these citizens go," continued Lorin, "they resist no longer."

"It is not the less true that if this woman is an object of suspicion —"

"If she was a suspicious character she would have made her escape during this skirmish, and not, as you see she has done, waited till it had terminated."

"Hum!" said one of the Volunteers, "What the Citizen Thermopyle observes is quite true."

"Besides, we shall know, since my friend is going to conduct her to the Poste, while we go and drink to the health of the nation."

"Are we going to drink?" said the chief.

"Certainly, I am very thirsty, and I know a pretty little cabaret at the corner of the Rue Thomas du Louvre."

"Why did you not say so at once, Citizen? We are sorry to have doubted your patriotism; and to prove it, let us, in the name of the nation and the law, embrace each other as friends."

"Let us embrace," said Lorin.

And the enrolled Volunteers and the National Guards embraced with warm enthusiasm. At this period the French people were as anxious to embrace as to behead one another.

"Let us now go," cried the two united troops, "to the corner of the Rue Thomas du Louvre."

"And we," said one of the wounded, in a plaintive voice, "do you intend to abandon us here?"

"Ah, well! yes," said Lorin, "abandon the heroes who have fallen bravely fighting for their country against patriots — it is true by mistake, but still true for all that; we will send you some wheelbarrows. Meanwhile you can sing the Marseillaise, it will divert you."

Then approaching Maurice, who was waiting for him, with the unknown, at the corner of the Rue du Coq, while the National Guards and enrolled Volunteers arm-in-arm retraced their steps toward the square of the Palais-Egalité, —

"Maurice," said he, "I promised you some counsel, and it is this. Be persuaded to accompany us, rather than compromise yourself by protecting this young woman, who, it is true, is very charming, and on that account not the less to be suspected; for charming women who run about the streets of Paris at midnight — "

"Sir," said the young woman, "judge me not from appearances, I implore you."

"In the first place, you say sir, and that is a great fault. Do you understand, Citizen, what I say?"

"Of course I do, Citizen; but allow your friend to accomplish his kind action."

"In what way?"

"By conducting me home, and protecting me on my road."

"Maurice, Maurice," said Lorin, "consider well what you are about; you will compromise yourself terribly."

"I know it well," said the young man; "but what would you have me do? If I leave the poor woman, she will be stopped at every step by the patrols."

"Oh, yes, yes! while with you, sir, — while with you, Citizen, I meant to say, I shall be safe."

"You hear," said Lorin, "safe! She then runs great danger?"

"My dear Lorin," said Maurice, "let us be just. She must be either a good compatriot or an aristocrat. If she is an aristocrat, we have erred in protecting her; if she is a good patriot, it is our duty to preserve her."

"Your pardon, friend; I am sorry for Aristotle, but your logic is at fault. See what he says: —

"Iris my reason steals away,
And yet she tells me to be wise;
Oh, lady! I can only say,
Then turn away those glorious eyes."

"Lorin," said Maurice, "a truce to Dorat, to Parny, and to Gentil-Bernard, I pray you. Speak seriously; will you, or will you not, give me the password?"

"That is to say, Maurice, you place me in this dilemma, — I must either sacrifice my duty to my friend, or my friend to my duty; but I fear, Maurice, my duty will fall the sacrifice."

"Decide, then, for one or the other, my friend; but in the name of Heaven, decide quickly."

"You will not abuse it?"

"I promise you."

"That is not sufficient; swear!"

"Upon what?"

"Swear upon the altar of your country."

Lorin pulled off his hat, presenting to Maurice the side with the cockade, and Maurice, finding the affair very simple, took, without smiling, the oath required upon this extemporary altar.

"Now, then," said Lorin, "this is the password — France and Lutece; perhaps you would say, France and Lucretia; but let that pass, it is Roman all the same."

"Fair Citizen," said Maurice, "I am now at your service. Thanks, Lorin."

"Bon voyage," cried Lorin, replacing on his head "the altar of his country," and faithful to his Anacreontic taste, departed singing: —

"Eleonora, Eleonora!
Now I 've taught you how to love,
Tell your passionate adorer
Does the lesson weary prove?"

CHAPTER III.

THE RUE DES FOSSES SAINT VICTOR.

MAURICE finding himself alone with the young woman felt for the moment deeply embarrassed. The fear of being duped, attracted by her marvellous beauty, troubled his conscience as a pure and exalted Republican, and caused him to hesitate when about to offer her the support of his arm.

"Where are you going, Citizen?" said he.

"Alas, sir, a long way from here," replied she.

"But how far?"

"By the side of the Jardin des Plantes."

"It is some distance; let us proceed on our way."

"Ah, sir!" said the unknown; "I plainly perceive I am a burden to you; but indeed it is no ordinary danger that I incur. Were it not so, believe me, I should not abuse your generosity."

"But, Madame," said Maurice, who during this tête-à-tête had totally forgotten the language imposed by the Republican vocabulary, and returned to the language of a gentleman, "how is it, in all conscience, that at this hour you are found in the streets of Paris, where, with the exception of ourselves, you do not see a solitary individual?"

"I have told you, sir; I have been paying a visit to the Faubourg du Roule. Leaving home at mid-day, and knowing nothing of what had taken place, I returned in equal ignorance, all my time having been spent in deep retirement."

"Yes," murmured Maurice, "in some retired house, the resort of the aristocrats. Confess, Citizen, that, while outwardly demanding my protection, you laugh in your sleeve at my egregious folly."

"Why should I act thus?"

"You are aware that a Republican is your guide. Well, this Republican betrays his cause, that is all."

"But, Citizen," quickly rejoined the unknown, "I, as well as you, love the Republic; you labor under a mistake concerning me."

"Then, Citizen, if you are a good patriot, you can have no cause for concealment. Where do you come from?"

"Monsieur, excuse me."

There was in this "monsieur" so much sweetness and modesty of expression, that Maurice believed it to be founded on some sentiment concealed.

"Surely," said he, "this woman is returning from some assignation."

At this moment, without knowing why, he felt deeply oppressed at this thought, and for a short time he remained silent.

When these two nocturnal promenaders had reached the Rue de la Verrerie, after having encountered three or four patrols, who, thanks to the password, allowed them free passage, the last watchman appeared somewhat suspicious. Maurice found it necessary to give his name and residence.

"That is all that is required from you," said the officer; "but the citizen, who is she?"

"The sister of my wife."

The officer permitted them to pass.

"You are then married, sir?" murmured the unknown.

"No, Madame; why do you think so?"

"Then," said she, laughing, "you had better have said I was your wife."

"Madame," said Maurice, "the name of wife is rather too sacred to be lightly bestowed. I have not the honor of your acquaintance."

The unknown in her turn felt an oppression of the heart, and remained silent and confused. At this moment they crossed the Bridge Marie. The young woman quickened her pace as they approached the end of their journey. They crossed the Bridge de la Tournelle.

"We are now, I believe, in your quarter," said Maurice, planting his foot on the Quai Saint Bernard.

"Yes, Citizen," replied the young woman; "but it is precisely here I most require your kind assistance."

"Really, Madame," said Maurice, "you forbid me to be indiscreet, yet do all in your power to excite my curiosity. This is not generous. Grant me your confidence. I have merited it, I think. Will you not do me the honor to tell me to whom I speak?"

"You speak, sir," said the unknown, smiling, "to a woman whom you have saved from the greatest danger she has ever encountered; to one who owes you a debt of everlasting gratitude."

"I do not require so much, Madame; be less grateful, and pending the second we shall yet be together, tell me your name."

"Impossible!"

"You would have told it nevertheless to the first sectionary, if you had been taken to the station."

"No, never!" exclaimed the unknown.

"But in that case you would have gone to prison."

"I had considered all that."

"And prison at this moment —"

"Means the scaffold; I know all that."

"And you would have preferred the scaffold?"

"To treason, — to discover my name would be treason."

"I said truly, you compel me to act a singular part for a Republican!"

"You act the part of a truly generous man. You find a poor woman subjected to insult; you do not contemn her because she might be 'one of the people,' but that she may be exempted from fresh annoyances, to save her from shipwreck, you reconduct her to the miserable quarter she inhabits."

"As far as appearances go, you state the matter correctly, and I might have credited you, had I never either seen you or heard you speak; but your beauty and mode of expression stamp you as a woman of distinction, and it is just this distinction, in opposition to your costume and this miserable quarter, which proves to me that your absence from home at this unseasonable hour conceals some mystery. You are silent. We will speak no more. Are we far from your house, Madame?"

At this moment they entered the Rue des Fosses Saint Victor.

"You see that small dark building," said the unknown to Maurice, pointing toward a house situated beyond the walls of the Jardin des Plantes. "When we reach there you must quit me."

"Very well, Madame, issue your orders; I am here only to obey."

"You are angry."

"I angry? — not the least in the world; besides, what does it matter to you?"

"It matters much, since I have yet a favor to ask of you."

"What is that?"

"A kind and frank adieu, — the farewell of a friend."

"The farewell of a friend! Oh, Madame, you do me too great an honor. A singular friend, not to know the name of his friend, who even conceals from him where she resides, no doubt from the fear of being too much troubled with his company."

The young woman hung down her head, but did not reply to this sarcasm.

"As to the rest, Madame," continued Maurice, "if I have discovered a secret, I did so involuntarily, and without any effort on my part to do so."

"I have now reached my destination, sir," said the unknown.

They were opposite the old Rue Saint Jacques, lined with tall dark-looking houses, intersected by obscure narrow alleys, leading to streets occupied by manufactories and tanyards, as within two steps ran the little river De Bièvre.

"Here!" said Maurice, "is it here that you live?"

"Yes."

"Impossible!"

"It is so, nevertheless. And now, adieu! my brave chevalier, my generous protector, adieu!"

"Adieu! Madame," said Maurice, with slight irony of tone, "but first again assure me you run no further risk of danger."

"None whatever."

"In that case I will leave you."

Maurice then bowed coldly and retired a few paces. The unknown remained standing for an instant in the same place.

"I do not like to take my leave of you thus," said she. "Come, Monsieur Maurice, your hand."

Maurice approached, and held out his hand, and then felt the young woman slip a ring on his finger.

"Oh, Citizen! what have you done? Do you not perceive that you have lost one of your rings?"

"Sir, you wrong me much."

"The crime of ingratitude is wanting in me; is it not so, Madame?"

"Come, I beseech you, sir — my friend, do not leave me thus. What do you wish to know? What do you ask?"

"Payment — is it not so?" said the young man, bitterly.

"No," said the unknown, with a bewitching expression; "but forgive me the secrecy I am obliged to preserve toward you."

Maurice, seeing in the obscurity those beautiful eyes wet with tears, feeling the pressure of that soft hand reposing between his own, hearing the accents of that persuasive voice, which had almost descended to the depths of prayer, felt his anger all at once yield to admiration.

"What do I ask?" said he. "To see you again."

"Impossible! utterly impossible."

"If only for once — one hour, a minute, a second."

"I tell you it is impossible."

"Do you tell me seriously," said Maurice, "that I shall never see you again!"

"Never," said the unknown, in a desponding tone.

"Madame," said Maurice, "you certainly jest with me." Then, raising his noble head, he shook his hanging curls like a man wishing to escape from some power which, in spite of himself, still bound him. The unknown regarded him with an undefinable expression. It was evident she had not altogether escaped the sentiment she had inspired.

"Listen," said she, after a moment's silence, interrupted only by a sigh, which Maurice had in vain endeavored to suppress. "Swear to me, upon your honor, to shut your eyes the moment I desire you to do so, and to keep them closed while you count sixty. Mind, upon your honor."

"If I swear, what will happen to me?"

"It will happen that I will prove my gratitude to you in a manner that I faithfully promise you I will never again to any other person, should he even do more for me than you have done, which would be no easy matter."

"But, at least, am I not to know —"

"No; trust to me. You will see —"

"In truth, Madame, I know not whether you are angel or demon."

"Will you swear it?"

"Yes; I swear to do as you desire me."

"Whatever occurs, you will not open your eyes — whatever happens. You understand? even if you should feel yourself struck with a poniard."

"You bewilder me. My word of honor required with so much urgency?"

"Swear, then, Monsieur. It appears to me that you run no great risk in so doing."

"Well, I swear," said Maurice, "whatever may happen," closing his eyes.

He hesitated.

"Let me see you only once more — only once more," said he. "I entreat you."

The young woman let fall her hood, with a smile not quite free from coquetry, when, by the light of the moon, which at this moment shed its lustre between two clouds, he again beheld, for the second time, the raven hair hanging in masses of shining curls, the beautifully arched and pencilled eyebrows overshadowing the almond-shaped eyes, so soft and languishing, an exquisitely formed nose, and lips fresh and brilliant as coral.

"Oh, you are beautiful, lovely, divine!" said Maurice.

"Shut your eyes," said the unknown.

Maurice obeyed.

The young woman took both his hands within her own, and placed him in the desired position.

Suddenly he felt a warm perfume pervade his face, and lips slightly touch his mouth, leaving between his lips the disputed ring.

All passed rapid as thought. Maurice experienced a sensation almost amounting to pain, so deep was it and unexpected, penetrating to his very inmost soul.

He made a brusque movement, and extended his arms before him.

"Your oath!" said a voice, already in the distance.

Maurice clasped his hands over his eyes the more strenuously to resist the strong inclination he felt to perjure himself. He counted no more; he thought no more, but remained tottering, his nerves totally unstrung.

In about an instant he heard a noise like that of a door closing a few paces distant from him; then again everything was silent. Then he removed his hand, and opened his eyes, looking round about him like a man just awakened from a deep sleep, and might, perhaps, have fancied all that had occurred a passing dream, had he not held between his lips the identical ring, proving that the adventure, however incredible, was an incontestable reality.

CHAPTER IV.

MANNERS OF THE TIMES.

When Maurice came to himself, he looked around, but saw only the gloomy, dirty alleys extending to his right and left. He essayed to find out exactly where he was, that he might recognize it again; but his mind was disturbed, the night was dark, and the moon, which for a moment had appeared to light up the lovely face of the fair unknown, had again retired behind the clouds. The young man, after a moment of cruel incertitude, retraced his steps toward his own house, situated in the Rue de Roule.

Arriving at the Rue Sainte Avoie, Maurice was much surprised at the number of patrols in motion in that quarter of the Temple.

"What is the matter now, Sergeant?" inquired he, of the chief of patrol, who, all on the alert, had just been thoroughly searching the Rue des Fontaines.

"What is it?" said the sergeant. "It is this, mon officier. It was intended this night to carry off the woman Capet, and the whole nest besides."

"How was that?"

"A band of Royalists had, I do not know how, procured the password, and introduced themselves into the Temple in the costume of chasseurs of the National Guard. Fortunately, he who represented the corporal, when speaking to the officer on guard, addressed him as 'Monsieur.' He sold himself, — the aristocrat!"

"The devil!" said Maurice; "and have they not arrested the conspirators?"

"No. The Royalists reached the street, and dispersed."

"And is there any hope of capturing any of these fellows?"

"There is only one among the number of sufficient importance to arrest, — that is the chief, a very slight man, who had been introduced among the men on guard by one of the municipals of the service. We gave the villain chase, but he found a door behind, and fled through the Madelonnettes."

Under any other circumstances, Maurice would have remained for the rest of the night with the patriots who guarded the safety of the Republic; but since one short hour, love of country was no longer his sole engrossing thought. He continued his way, and the tidings he had just learned were soon banished from his mind by the recent stirring events in which he had himself taken so active a part. Besides, these pretended attempts at rescue had become very frequent, and the patriots themselves were aware that under certain circumstances politicians made use of them to advance their own ends; therefore, this news caused our young Republican no great disquietude.

On returning home, Maurice found his "official" (at this epoch they had no longer servants), — Maurice, say we, found his official waiting, but who, while waiting, had fallen asleep, and while sleeping snored uneasily. He awoke him, and with all due regard for his fellow-man, made him pull off his boots, then dismissed him, that he might not interrupt his cogitations, and jumping into bed, it being very late, and he also having youth on his side, slept soundly, notwithstanding the preoccupation of his thoughts.

The next day he discovered a letter on his table-de-nuit. This letter was written in a clear, elegant hand, but unknown to him. He looked at the seal. Engraved on it was the single English word, "Nothing." The letter merely contained these words, "Thank you. Everlasting gratitude in exchange for everlasting forgetfulness." Maurice summoned his domestic (the true patriot never rang, the bell denoted servility; indeed, many officials only entered the service of their masters on this express condition).

The official of Maurice had received, nearly thirty years before, at the baptismal font, the name of John; but in '92 he was, by private authority, rebaptized (John savoring of Aristocracy and Deism), and now called himself "Scævola."

"Scævola," demanded Maurice, "do you know where this letter came from?"

"No, Citizen."

"Who brought it to you?"

"The concierge."

"And who brought it to him?"

"A messenger, no doubt, since it has no post-mark."

"Go down, and request the concierge to walk up."

The concierge complied, because it was Maurice who made the request, and he was much beloved by all the officials with whom he was concerned in any way; but at the same time the concierge declared that had it been any other tenant, he should have asked him to walk down.

The concierge was called Aristide.

Maurice interrogated him. It was a stranger who had brought the letter, about eight in the morning. The young man multiplied his questions, and varied them in every possible shape, but could elicit nothing further.

Maurice requested his acceptance of six francs, also desiring, if this stranger again presented himself, that he would follow him, without appearing to do so, and inform him (Maurice) where he went.

We hasten to say, that, much to the satisfaction of Aristide, who felt himself rather insulted by this proposition, the man returned no more.

Maurice remained alone, crushing the letter with vexation; he drew the ring from his finger, and placed it with the crumpled letter upon the table-de-nuit, then turned toward the wall, with the foolish idea of sleeping afresh; but at the end of an hour Maurice, relinquishing his attempted coolness, kissed the ring and re-read the letter. The ring was a splendid sapphire; the letter, as we have said, was a charming little billet, displaying its aristocracy in every line.

As Maurice re-read and examined it, the door opened. Maurice hastily replaced the ring on his finger, and concealed the note under his pillow. Was this the modesty of newly awakened love; or was it the shame of a patriot, who would not wish it to be known that he was in relation with people imprudent enough to write such a billet, of which the perfume alone was sufficient to compromise both the hand that penned it and the hand that received it?

He who entered was a young man attired as a patriot, but a patriot of surpassing elegance. His jacket was composed of fine cloth, his breeches of cashmere, and his stockings of fine striped silk. As to his bonnet, it might have shamed from the elegance of its form and splendid purple color even those of the Trojan Paris himself. Added to all this, he carried in his belt a pair of pistols of the royal manufacture of Versailles, and a short sabre like those of the pupils of Champ-de-Mars.

"Ah! thou sleepest, Brutus," said the new-comer, "and the country is in danger. Fi, donc!"

"No, Lorin," said Maurice, laughing, "I do not sleep, I dream."

"Yes, I understand, of Eucharis."

"Well, as for me, I cannot understand."

"Bah!"

"Of whom do you speak? Who is this Eucharis?"

"Why the woman —"

"What woman?"

"The woman of the Rue Saint Honoré, — the woman of the patrol, the unknown, the woman for whom you and I risked our heads last night."

"Oh, yes," said Maurice, who knew perfectly well what his friend would say, and only feigned ignorance, "the unknown."

"Well, who was she?"

"I know nothing about her."

"Was she pretty?"

"Pshaw!" said Maurice, pouting his lips disdainfully.

"A poor woman forgotten in some love adventure.

"Yes; weak creatures that we are,
'T is Love that ever tortures man."

"Possibly," said Maurice, to whom such an idea was at this moment peculiarly repugnant, and who would have much preferred finding the unknown to be even a conspirator rather than a light woman.

"And where does she live?"

"I know nothing concerning her."

"Come, now; you know nothing, that 's impossible!"

"Why so?"

"You escorted her back."

"She escaped from me at the Bridge Marie —"

"Escaped from you!" cried Lorin, with a roar of laughter; "a woman escape from you!

"Say, can the trembling dove elude
The vulture, — tyrant of the air;
The fawn, on whom the tiger rude Springs from his solitary lair."

"Lorin," said Maurice, "I wish you would accustom yourself to speak like other people. You annoy me horribly with your atrocious poetry."

"To speak like other people, indeed! Now, it appears to me I speak better than most people. I speak as the Citizen Demoustier, both in prose and poetry. As for my poetry, mon cher, I know a certain Emilie who does not consider it so bad. But to return to yours."

"My poetry!"

"No; your Emilie."

"Have I an Emilie?"

"Ah, ah! your gazelle may have turned tigress, and shown her teeth in a manner that may not have pleased you, although in love."

"I in love?" said Maurice, shaking his head.

"Yes, you in love.

"Deadly are the bolts of Jove,
But deadlier far the shafts of love."

"Lorin," said Maurice, arming himself with a pipe-key which lay upon the table; "I swear that if you will spout verses I will whistle."

"Then let us talk politics; besides, that brought me here. Have you heard the news?"

"I know that Widow Capet wished to escape."

"Oh, that is nothing!"

"What more is there, then?"

"The famous Chevalier de Maison-Rouge is in Paris!"

"Is that true?" said Maurice, raising himself to a sitting posture. "When did he come?"

"Yesterday evening."

"But how?"

"Disguised as a chasseur of the National Guard. A woman who is thought to be an aristocrat, disguised as a woman of the people, took him the clothes to the barrier gate; an instant afterward they came in arm-in-arm. It was not till after they had passed that the suspicion of the sentinel was excited. He had seen the woman pass with a bundle and repass accompanied by a soldier, when it suddenly struck him something was wrong, and he ran after them. They had disappeared in a hôtel of the Rue Saint Honoré, where the door was opened as if by magic. The hôtel had a second point of egress, leading on to the Champs Elysées. Bon soir to the Chevalier de Maison-Rouge and his companion; they had both vanished. Our rulers will demolish the hôtel and guillotine the proprietor, but that will not deter the chevalier from renewing the attempt which has hitherto failed; it is four months since his first failure, and yesterday was his second."

"Is he not arrested?" demanded Maurice.

"Ah! well. Yes, mon cher, as well attempt to stop Proteus, arrest Proteus; you know the trouble Aristæus had to accomplish it, —

"'Pastor Aristæus, fugiens Peneïa Tempe.'"

"Take care," said Maurice, carrying the key to his mouth.

"Take care yourself, for this time you will not whistle at me, but at Virgil."

"That is very true, and as long as you do not translate him I have nothing to say. Now, to return to the Chevalier de Maison-Rouge."

"We agree that he is a brave man."

"The fact is, that to undertake such things he must possess immense courage."

"Or intense adoration."

"Do you believe, then, in the love of the chevalier for the queen?"

"I do not believe it. I only mention what report says. Besides, she has turned the brains of so many others, that this would not be at all surprising. She has seduced Barnave, they say."

"Never mind; the chevalier must have had confederates even in the Temple."

"Very possibly, —

"Love breaks through bars,
And laughs at bolts."

"Lorin!"

"Ah! it is true."

"Then you think like the rest?"

"Why not?"

"Because according to your account the queen must have had already two hundred lovers."

"Two, three, four hundred. She is quite handsome enough for that. I do not say that she loves them; but in short, they love her. All the world beholds the sun, but the sun does not see all the world."

"You say, then, that the Chevalier de Maison-Rouge —"

"I say they are on his track at this moment, and if he escapes this time the bloodhounds of the Republic, he will be a cunning fox."

"And what does the Commune in all this affair?"

"The Commune is about to issue a decree, by which every house (like an open register) must display on the front the name of every inhabitant, both male and female.

This is realizing the dream of the ancients, — why should there not be a window in every breast, that all the world may see what passes there?"

"An excellent idea that," said Maurice.

"To place windows in men's breasts?"

"No; but to place a list of names on every door."

Maurice felt, in fact, that this might be the means of assisting him to discover the unknown, or at least afford him some clew whereby he might be able to trace her.

"Is it not so?" said Lorin. "I have already betted this measure will secure us a batch of five hundred aristocrats. By the bye, we have received this morning, at our club, a deputation of enrolled Volunteers; they arrived conducted by our adversaries of last night, whom I had not abandoned till dead drunk, — they came, I tell you, with garlands of flowers and immortal crowns."

"Indeed," replied Maurice, laughing; "and how many were there?"

"They were thirty, and were shaved, wearing bouquets in their button-holes.

"'Citizens of the Club of Thermopyles,' said the orator, 'as true patriots, we wish the union of Frenchmen not to be interrupted by any misunderstanding; we therefore come to fraternize with you anew.'"

"Well, what then?"

"Then we again fraternized, and in this reiteration, as Diafoirus expresses himself, we raised an altar to the country, with the table of the secretary and two carafes in which the nosegays were deposited. As you were the hero of the feat, you were three times summoned to appear, that you might be crowned; but as you did not reply, seeing you were not present, and it was necessary to crown something, they crowned the bust of Washington. This was the order of the ceremony."

As Lorin concluded this statement, which at this epoch had nothing of burlesque, a noise was heard proceeding from the street; and drums, first heard in the distance, now approached nearer and nearer. This, at that period, was the common way of issuing general orders.

"What is all that?" said Maurice.

"The proclamation of the decree of the Commune," said Lorin.

"I will run to the station," said Maurice, leaping from his bed, and calling his servant to assist him.

"I will return home and go to bed," said Lorin. "I had not two hours' sleep last night, thanks to those outrageous Volunteers. If they only fight a little, let me sleep; but if they fight much, come and fetch me."

"But why are you so smart to-day?" said Maurice, eyeing him all over as he rose to withdraw.

"Because on my way here I am obliged to pass the 'Rue Bethisy,' and in the Rue Bethisy, on the third flat, is a window which always opens when I pass."

"Then you do not fear being taken for a fop?"

"I a fop! I am, on the contrary, known for a French sans-culotte. But one must make some sacrifice to the softer sex. The worship of the country does not exclude that of love; indeed, one commands the other:—

"Our Republicans profess
We should follow ancient lore;
Beauty we prize none the less,
That we love our freedom more."

Dare to whistle to that, and I denounce you as an aristocrat. Adieu, mon ami."

Lorin held out his hand to Maurice, which the young secretary cordially shook, and went out thinking of a sonnet to Chloris.

CHAPTER V.

WHAT SORT OF MAN THE CITIZEN MAURICE LINDEY WAS.

WHILE Maurice Lindey, having dressed quickly, proceeds to the section of the Rue Lepelletier, of which, as we already know, he was secretary, we will endeavor to lay before the public the antecedents of this young man, introduced upon the scene by one of those impulses so familiar to powerful and generous natures.

The young man had spoken the plain truth the preceding evening, when in reply he had said his name was Maurice Lindey, resident in the Rue du Roule. He might have added he was a child of that half aristocracy accorded to the gentlemen of the robe. His ancestors, for two hundred years, had distinguished themselves by that invariable parliamentary opposition which had rendered so illustrious the names of Molé and Maupeou. His father, honest Lindey, who had passed his life grumbling against despotism, when on the fourteenth of July, '89, the Bastille had fallen by the hands of the people, died from sudden fright and the shock of seeing despotism replaced by a liberty militant, leaving his only son independent in fortune and republican in principle.

The Revolution which had closely followed this great event found Maurice in all the vigor and maturity of manhood befitting a champion about to enter the lists; his republican education improved by his assiduous attendance of the clubs, and by his reading all the pamphlets of that period. God alone knows how many Maurice had read. Deep and rational contempt for the hierarchy, philosophical consideration of the elements which form the social body, absolute denial of all nobility which is not personal, impartial appreciation of the past, ardor for new ideas, a sympathy with the people which was blended with a belief in aristocratic organizations, — such were the morals, not of the hero we should have chosen, but of him whom the journal from which we draw our facts has given us as the hero of our narrative.

As to his personal appearance, he was in height five feet eight inches, from twenty-five to twenty-six years of age, and muscular as Hercules. His beauty was of the cast characteristic of the Frank, — that is to say, fair complexion, blue eyes, curling chestnut hair, rosy cheeks, and ivory teeth.

After the portrait of the man comes the position of the citizen. Maurice, not rich, but still independent, bore a name much respected, and above all popular. Maurice, known by his liberal education and principles still more liberal than his education, — Maurice placed himself, so to speak, at the head of a party composed of all the young citizen-patriots. It was well that with the sans-culottes he passed for rather lukewarm, and with the sectionaries as rather foppish. But the sans-culottes no longer remembered his lukewarmness when they saw him snap in twain the knotted cudgels, and the sectionaries pardoned his elegance when he one day scientifically planted a blow between two eyes that had been for some time watching him in an offensive manner.

And now for the physical, moral, and civic combined. Maurice had assisted at the taking of the Bastille; he had been on the expedition to Versailles, had fought like a lion on the 10th of August; and in this memorable journey, it is only justice to observe, he had killed as many patriots as Swiss, — not being more willing to tolerate an assassin in a blouse than an enemy to the Republic in a red coat. It was he who in order to exhort the defenders of the chateau to surrender themselves, and to prevent the shedding of blood, threw himself before the mouth of a cannon which a Parisian artillery-man was about to discharge; it was he who by a window first entered the Louvre, regardless of the firing of five hundred Swiss and as many gentlemen in ambush; and when he perceived the signal of surrender, his avenging sword had already cut through more than ten uniforms. Then, seeing his friends leisurely massacring some prisoners, who having thrown down their arms and clasping their hands supplicated for life, he furiously attacked these friends, which gained for him a reputation worthy of the good days of Rome and of Greece. War declared, Maurice enrolled himself, and departed for the frontier in the rank of lieutenant, with the first 1500 volunteers the city sent against the invaders, which volunteers were each day to be followed by 1500 others.

At the first battle in which he assisted — that is to say at Jemappes — he was struck by a ball, which after having divided the muscles of his shoulder lodged against the bone. The representative of the people knew Maurice, and sent him back to Paris for surgical treatment.

For a whole month, consumed by fever, he tossed upon his bed of suffering; but in January was able to resume his command, if not by name, at least in fact, of the club of Thermopyles, — that is to say of one hundred young men of the Parisian citizens, armed to oppose any attempt in favor of the tyrant Capet. And yet more, Maurice, with contracted brows, dilated eyes, and pale face, his heart filled with a strange mixture of moral hatred and physical pity, assisted, sword in hand, at the execution of the king, and perhaps he alone of all that throng remained silent when the head of the son of Saint Louis fell on the scaffold; and then Maurice only raised on high his redoubtable sabre, while his friends, loudly shouting Vive la liberté, omitted to notice that on this occasion at least one voice did not unite itself with their own.

This was the individual who on the morning of the 14th of March bent his steps toward the Rue Lepelletier, and of whose stormy career our history will furnish further details.

Toward 10 o'clock, Maurice reached the section of which he was the secretary. The commotion was great. The question in agitation was, to vote an address to the Convention in order to repress the conspiracies of the Girondins. They impatiently awaited the arrival of Maurice.

The only subject talked about was the return of the Chevalier de Maison-Rouge, the audacity with which this arch-conspirator had for the second time entered Paris, where he well knew a price was now fixed on his head.

To this circumstance was attributed the attempt made the preceding evening on the Temple, and each one expressed his hatred and indignation against the traitors and aristocrats.

Contrary to the general expectation, Maurice appeared preoccupied and silent, wrote down the proclamation, finished his employment in three hours, demanded if the sitting had terminated, and receiving an answer in the affirmative, took his hat, and proceeded toward the Rue Saint Honoré.

Arrived there, Paris appeared quite different to him. He revisited the corner of the Rue du Coq, where during the night he had first seen the lovely unknown struggling in the hands of soldiers. Thence he proceeded to the Bridge Marie, the same road he had travelled by her side, stopping where the different patrols had stopped them, repeating in the same places (as if they had preserved an echo of their words) the sentences exchanged between them; only it was now one o'clock in the afternoon, and the sun, shining brilliantly upon this walk, reminded him at every step of the occurrences of the past night.

Maurice crossed the bridges, and entered directly the Rue Victor, as it was then called.

"Poor woman," murmured Maurice, "she did not reflect yesterday that the duration of the night was only twelve hours, and that her secret would not in all probability last longer than the night. By the light of the sun, I will endeavor to find the door through which she vanished, and who knows but I may perhaps even see her at a window?"

He then entered the old Rue Saint Jacques, and placed himself in the same spot as the unknown had placed him on the preceding evening. For an instant he closed his eyes, perhaps foolishly expecting the kiss he had then received would again impress his lips. But he felt nothing but the remembrance; 't is true that burned yet.

Maurice opened his eyes and saw two little streets, one to the right, the other to the left. They were muddy, dirty, and badly paved, furnished with barriers, cut by little bridges thrown over a kennel. There might be seen the beams of arches, nooks, corners, and twenty doors propped up, fast falling into decay. Here was hard labor in all its misery, here was misery in all its hideousness. Here and there was a garden enclosed by a fence, others by palisades of poles, some by walls; skins were hanging in the out-houses, diffusing around that disgusting odor always arising from a tanyard.

Maurice's search lasted for nearly two hours, during which he found nothing, and divined nothing, and ten times he had retraced his steps to consider where he was. But all his efforts were in vain, his search was a fruitless one, as all trace of the young woman seemed to have been effaced by the fog and rain of the previous night.

"Truly," said Maurice, "I must be in a dream. This filthy place could not for an instant have afforded refuge for my beautiful fairy of last night."

There was, in this wild Republican, more real poetry than in his friend of the Anacreontic quatrains, since he clung to this idea, fearful to sully, even in thought, the spotless purity of the unknown. But all hope had now forsaken him.

"Adieu," said he; "mysterious beauty, you have treated me like a child and a fool. Would she have led me here if she really lived in this wretched locality? No; she would only pass as a swan over the infected marsh, and like a bird in the air leave no trace behind."

CHAPTER VI.

THE TEMPLE.

THE same day and the same hour, when Maurice, disappointed and unhappy, repassed the Bridge de la Tournelle, several municipals, accompanied by Santerre, Commandant of the Parisian National Guard, made a visit of inquiry to the Temple, which had been transformed into a prison, since the 13th of August, 1793.

The visit was made especially to a portion of the third story, consisting of an antechamber and three rooms. One of these chambers was occupied by two females, a young girl, and a child of nine years old, all dressed in mourning. The elder of the females was about seven or eight and thirty. She was seated at a table reading.

The second, whose age appeared twenty-eight or twenty-nine, was engaged on a piece of tapestry.

The young girl, who was about fourteen, was seated near the child, who, ill and in bed, closed his eyes as if asleep, although that was utterly impossible, owing to the noise made by the municipals. While some moved the beds, others examined their clothes and linen; the rest, when their search was concluded, remained rudely staring at the unfortunate prisoners, who never even raised their eyes, — the one from her book, the other from her embroidery, and the third from her brother.

The eldest of these women was tall, handsome, and very pale. She appeared to concentrate all her attention on her book, although in all probability her eyes read, but not her mind. One of the municipals approached her, brutally snatched away her book, and flung it into the middle of the room. The prisoner stretched her hand across the table, took up another book, and continued to read.

The Montagnard made a furious gesture, as if he would take away the second, as he had the first; but at this attempt, which startled the prisoner at her embroidery near the window, the young girl sprang forward, and encircling the reader's head with her arms, weeping, exclaimed, "My poor mother! my poor mother!" and then embraced her. As she did so the prisoner placed her mouth to her ear, and whispered: "Marie, there is a letter concealed in the stove; remove it."

"Come! come!" said the municipal, brutally dragging the young girl toward him, and separating her from her mother, "shall you soon have finished embracing?"

"Sir," said the girl, "has the Convention decreed that children shall not embrace their mothers?"

"No; but it has decreed that traitors, aristocrats, and ci-devants shall be punished. That is why I am here to interrogate you. Answer, Antoinette."

She who was thus grossly accosted did not even deign to look at her examiner, but turned her head aside, while a flush passed over her face, pale with grief and furrowed with tears.

"It is impossible," said he, "that you are ignorant of the attempt last night. Whence came it?"

The prisoners still maintained silence.

"Answer, Antoinette," said Santerre, approaching her, without remarking the almost frenzied horror which had seized the young woman at sight of this man, who, on the morning of the 21st of January, conducted Louis XVI. from the Temple to the scaffold. "Reply. They were conspiring last night against the Republic, and seeking your escape from the captivity in which you are kept till you receive that punishment of your crimes which the will of the people may inflict upon you. Tell me, do you know who are the conspirators?"

Marie started at the harsh tone of that voice, which she endeavored to fly from by removing her chair to the greatest distance possible, but replied no more to this question than to the former ones, paid no more deference to Santerre than she had done to the municipal.

"You are then determined not to reply?" said Santerre, stamping his foot furiously.

The prisoner took up a third volume from the table, Santerre turned himself away. The brutal power of this man who commanded 80,000 men, who had only need of a gesture to drown the voice of the dying Louis XVI., was defeated by the dignity of a poor prisoner, whose head he could cause to fall, but whose will he could not bend.

"And you, Elizabeth," said he, addressing the other lady, who at that instant ceased from her embroidery to join her hands in prayer, not to these men, but to God, "will you reply?"

"I do not know what you ask," said she; "therefore I cannot reply."

"Morbleu! Citizen Capet," said Santerre, impatiently, "I think what I say is sufficiently clear too. I again tell you, that yesterday an attempt was made for your escape; and you certainly must know the culprits."

"Having no communication with those outside, Monsieur, we cannot possibly tell what people do, either for or against us."

"Very well," said the municipal; "we will now hear what your nephew will say."

And he approached the bed of the young dauphin. At this menace, Marie Antoinette suddenly rose.

"Monsieur," said she, "my son is ill, and now asleep — do not wake him."

"Reply then."

"I know nothing."

The municipal walked straight to the bed of the little prisoner, who, as we have said, feigned sleep.

"Come, wake up, Capet," said he, shaking him roughly.

The child opened his eyes and smiled.

The municipals then surrounded his bed.

The queen, agitated with fear and grief, made a sign to her daughter, who, profiting by this moment, glided from the apartment into the room adjoining, opened the mouth of the stove, drew out a letter and burned it; then, re-entering the room, reassured her mother with a glance.

"What do you want with me?" asked the sick child.

"To inquire if you heard nothing during the night?"

"No; I was asleep."

"You are very fond of sleep, it seems."

"Yes; for when I sleep I dream."

"And what do you dream?"

"That I again see my father, whom you killed."

"Then you heard nothing!" said Santerre, quickly.

"Nothing."

"These wolf's cubs are, in truth, well-agreed with the she-wolf," said the municipal, furious with rage. "There has been, notwithstanding, a plot."

The queen smiled.

"She defies us, the Austrian!" cried the municipal. "Well, since it is thus, let us execute in all its rigor the decree of the Commune. Get up, Capet."

"What would you do?" said the queen, forgetting herself. "Do you not see my son is ill, and suffering from fever? Do you wish to kill him?"

"Your son," said the municipal, "is the cause of constant alarm to the Council of the Temple; he is the point at which all the conspirators aim, and flatter themselves they shall carry you all off together. Well, let them come. Tison — call Tison."

Tison was a species of journeyman, charged with all the heavy household work in the prison. He appeared. He was a man of forty years old, much sunburnt, of a rude and ferocious aspect, with matted black hair overhanging his eyebrows.

"Tison," said Santerre, "who came yesterday to bring the prisoners' food?"

Tison gave the name.

"And their linen, who brought it to them?"

"My daughter."

"Then your daughter is a laundress?"

"Certainly."

"And you gave her the washing of the prisoners?"

"Why not? She might as well gain that as another; it is no longer the tyrant's money, but belongs to the nation, who pays for them."

"You were told to examine the linen with the greatest attention."

"Well, do I ever fail in my duty? In proof of which, they had yesterday a handkerchief tied in two knots. I took it to the Council, who ordered my wife to undo the knots, iron, and return it to Madame Capet, without saying anything about it."

At this remark of two knots being tied in the pocket-handkerchief, the queen trembled, the pupils of her eyes dilated, and she and Madame Elizabeth exchanged hasty glances.

"Tison," said Santerre, "your daughter is a person of whose patriotism no one can entertain a doubt; but when she leaves the Temple to-day she returns there no more."

"Ah, mon Dieu!" said Tison, terrified, "what are you saying to me? Shall I not see my daughter except when I go out?"

"You shall go out no more," said Santerre.

Tison looked wildly around, without allowing his eye to remain fixed on any particular object, and suddenly exclaimed, "I am not to go out; that is it, is it? Well, then, I will go out altogether. Give me my dismissal. I am neither traitor nor aristocrat, that I should be detained in prison. I tell you I will go out."

"Citizen," said Santerre, "obey the orders of the Commune, and be silent; or I tell you it may be all the worse for you. Remain here and watch all that passes. There is an eye on you. I warn you."

During this time the queen, who thought herself for a moment forgotten, recovered by degrees, and replaced her son in his bed.

"Desire your wife to come up," said the municipal to Tison.

He obeyed without a word. The threats of Santerre had rendered him as meek as a lamb.

Tison's wife came up.

"Come here, Citizen," said Santerre; "we are going into the antechamber; during that time, search all the prisoners."

"Listen, wife," said Tison; "they are not going to permit our daughter to come to the Temple any more."

"What! they will not permit our daughter to come here! Then we shall see her no more?"

Tison mournfully shook his head.

"What do you say to this?"

"I say we shall make a report to the Council of the Temple, and the Council will decide it. In the mean time —"

"In the mean time I will see my daughter again."

"Silence," said Santerre, "you were brought here for the purpose of searching the prisoners; search them, then, and afterward we shall see —"

"But — now —"

"Oh, oh!" said Santerre, knitting his brows, "you are contaminated, it appears to me."

"Do as the Citizen General tells you, wife," Tison said; "afterward, we shall see."

And Tison regarded Santerre with a humble smile.

"Very well," said the woman; "go, then, I am ready to search."

The men went out.

"My dear Madame Tison," said the queen, "you know —"

"I only know, Citizen Capet," said the horrible woman, gnashing her teeth, "that you are the cause of all the misery of the people; and also that I have reason to suspect you, and you know it."

Four men waited at the door, to assist Tison's wife, if the queen offered any resistance.

The search commenced on the queen.

There was found on her person a handkerchief tied in three knots, which unfortunately appeared a reply to the one spoken of by Tison; a pencil, a scapulary, and some sealing-wax.

"Ah! I knew it," said Tison's wife; "I have often told the municipals she wrote, the Austrian! The other day I found a lump of sealing-wax in the socket of the candlestick."

"Ah, Madame," said the queen, in a supplicating tone, "only show the scapulary, I entreat you."

"Yes," said the woman, "I feel pity for you, who have felt so much pity for me to take my daughter from me."

Madame Elizabeth and Madame Royale had nothing found upon them.

The woman Tison recalled the municipals, who entered, Santerre at their head. She showed them the articles found upon the queen, which, as they passed from hand to hand, afforded subject for an infinite variety of conjectures; but the handkerchief tied in three knots excited, above all, the imagination of these persecutors of the royal race.

"Now," said Santerre, "we are going to read the decree of the Convention to you."

"What decree?" demanded the queen.

"The decree which orders you to be separated from your son."

"Is it, then, true that this decree exists?"

"Yes; the Convention has too much regard for the health of a child confided to its guardianship, to leave him in the care of a mother so depraved."

The eyes of the queen flashed lightning.

"But make some accusation at least, tigers that you are."

"That is not at all difficult," said a municipal; and he pronounced one of those infamous accusations brought by Suetonius against Agrippine.

"Oh!" cried the queen, standing, pale with indignation, "I appeal from it to the heart of every mother."

"That is all very fine," said a municipal; "but we have already been here two hours, and cannot lose the whole day. Get up, Capet, and follow us."

"Never, never!" cried the queen, rushing between the municipals and the young Louis, and preparing to defend the approach to his bed, as a tigress the entrance to her den. "Never will I permit you to carry away my child!"

"Oh, Messieurs," said Madame Elizabeth, clasping her hands in the most touching attitude of prayer, "Messieurs, in the name of Heaven, have pity on us two mothers."

"Then speak," said Santerre; "state the names, avow the project of your accomplices; explain what they wished to intimate by the knots made in the pocket-handkerchief brought with your linen by Tison's daughter, and the meaning of those tied in the handkerchief found in your pocket, and on these conditions I will leave you your child."

A look from Madame Elizabeth seemed to implore the queen to submit to this dreadful sacrifice.

But quietly brushing from her eye a tear which sparkled like a diamond, "Adieu, my son!" cried she; "never forget your father who is in heaven, or your mother who will soon join him there, and never omit to repeat morning and evening the prayer I have taught you. Adieu! my son."

She gave him a last kiss; then rising calm and inflexible, "I know nothing, Messieurs," said she, "do as you please."

But the queen must have required more fortitude than is contained in the heart of a woman, and above all of a mother. She fell back fainting upon a chair, while they carried away the child, who with fast flowing tears held out his arms, but uttered not a single word or cry.

The door closed behind the municipals who carried away the royal child, and the three women remained alone. There was for a moment the deep silence of despair, interrupted only by occasional sobs.

The queen first broke silence.

"My daughter," said she, "that letter?"

"I burned it, as you desired me, mother."

"Without reading it?"

"Without reading it."

"Adieu, then, to the last ray of hope, divine hope!" murmured Madame Elizabeth.

"You are right, my sister, you are right; it is almost beyond endurance." Then turning toward her daughter, "But you at least saw the handwriting, Marie?"

"Yes, mother, for a moment."

The queen rose, went to the door to make sure she was not observed; then drawing a pin from her hair, approached the wall, and from a chink drew out a small paper folded like a letter, and showing it to Madame Royale, "collect your thoughts before you reply, my child," said she; "was the writing the same as this?"

"Yes, yes, mother!" cried the princess; "I recognize it!"

"God be praised, then!" cried the queen, falling with fervor on her knees. "If he could write since this morning, he is safe. Thanks, O God! thanks! So noble a friend deserves thy miraculous preservation."

"Of whom do you speak, mother?" demanded Madame Royale. "Who is this friend? Tell me his name, that I may recommend him to God in my prayers."

"You are right, my child; never forget it. This name, for it is the name of a gentleman replete with honor and courage, one not devoted to us through ambition, for he has only revealed himself since our misfortunes. He has never seen the queen of France, or rather the queen of France has never seen him, and he devotes his life to her defence. Perhaps he will be recompensed as all virtue is now recompensed, by a dreadful death. But — if he dies. — Oh! I shall still think of him in heaven. He is called — "

The queen looked uneasily around, then lowering her voice, "He is called the Chevalier de Maison-Rouge. Pray for him."

CHAPTER VII.

THE OATH OF THE GAMESTER.

THE attempted abduction however doubtful might be the fact, since if it had any reality it had failed in its very commencement, had excited the anger of some, and the interest of others. What afforded strong probability to the existence of such a project was the fact that the Committee for General Security learned that three weeks, or a month before, a number of emigrants had entered France from different parts of the frontier. It was evident that these people who thus risked their lives did not do so without design, and this design was in all probability to co-operate in carrying off the royal family.

Already, upon the proposition of the Conventionalist Usselin, the terrible decree had been promulgated, which condemned to death all emigrants convicted of having returned to France; all Frenchmen convicted of having intended to emigrate; every individual convicted of having assisted in their flight, or in their return, either a female or male emigrant; and lastly, all citizens convicted of having afforded shelter to an emigrant. With this dreadful law commenced the "Reign of Terror." All that was wanting was the law for suspected persons. The Chevalier de Maison-Rouge was an enemy far too active and audacious for his return to Paris, and his appearance in the Temple, not to call forth the gravest measures. More severe inspections than had previously taken place were made in a number of suspected houses; but with the exception of some female emigrants who allowed themselves to be taken, and some old men who did not care enough for their few remaining days to dispute with the executioner, their researches produced no other result.

The sections, as may be imagined, were after this event much occupied for several days, and consequently the secretary of the section Lepelletier, one of the most influential in Paris, had little time to think of his unknown fair one. At first, as he had resolved on quitting the old Rue Saint Jacques, he had tried to forget her, but, as his friend Lorin had observed to him, —

> " Alas ! endeavoring to forget
> But makes us recollect the more."

Maurice, however, neither said nor confessed anything. He buried in his heart all the details of that adventure which he had been able to conceal from the scrutiny of his friend. But Lorin, who knew Maurice to be of a joyous and hilarious nature, and now saw him constantly sad and thoughtful, seeking solitude, doubted not, to use his own expression, that the rogue Cupid had passed that way. It is remarkable, that, during its eighteen centuries of monarchy, France had had few years so mythological as the year of our Lord 1793.

In the mean time the chevalier was not taken, and he was no more spoken of. The widowed queen, cruelly robbed of her child, contented herself by weeping, in company with her sister and daughter. The young dauphin was consigned to the care of " Simon the Shoemaker," and entered upon that course of martyrdom which, in the short space of two years, was to reunite him with his father and mother. There was a moment's calm. The Montagnard volcano rested before devouring the Girondins.

Maurice felt the weight of this calm, as the heaviness of the atmosphere is felt in stormy weather, and not knowing how to dispose of his leisure, abandoned himself entirely to the ardor of a sentiment which if not actually love itself bordered closely upon it. He re-read his letter, again kissed his beautiful sapphire ring, and resolved (notwithstanding his oath) to make one more attempt, promising himself this should indeed be the last. The young man had first thought he would go to the section of the Jardin des Plantes, and there make inquiry from the secretary, his colleague. But the first idea (and we may add, which he still retained) that the beautiful unknown was mixed up in some political plot, still restrained him, as the thought that any indiscretion on his part might be the means of sending this lovely woman to the Place de la Revolution, and her head to the block, caused his blood to curdle and freeze in his veins. He therefore determined on seeking this adventure alone, and without any further information.

His plan, besides, was very simple. The catalogue of names inscribed on each door would certainly afford him some clew, and then by interrogating the porters he might be able to solve the mystery. In his capacity of secretary of the Rue Lepelletier, he possessed full and entire right to make all inquiries. Besides, Maurice, ignorant of the name of the unknown, was able to judge of it by analogy. It was impossible so lovely a creature should not possess a name in harmony with her form, some name appertaining to sylph, fairy, or angel, since her arrival on earth must have heen hailed as that of a superior and supernatural being. This name would then most infallibly guide him.

Maurice then dressed himself in a coat of dark brown cloth, adorned his head with the bonnet-rouge worn on great occasions, and set out on his voyage of discovery alone. He had in his hand one of those knotted cudgels called a constitution, which wielded by his vigorous hand was powerful as the club of Hercules, and in his pocket he placed his commission as secretary of the section Lepelletier. These were at once his physical security and his moral guarantee.

He prepared himself to review afresh the Rue Saint Victor, the old Rue Saint Jacques, reading by the light of the declining day all those names (inscribed by hands more or less practised) upon the panels of every door.

Maurice had reached the hundredth house, and consequently read the hundredth list, and nothing had yet occurred to induce him to imagine that he was in the least degree upon the trail of the unknown, as he had fully made up his mind that no name could be hers which did not belong to the class he had imagined, when a good-natured shoemaker, noticing the anxiety and impatience depicted on the young man's countenance, came out with his strap of leather and his punch, and looking at Maurice over his spectacles, —

"Do you wish any information respecting the tenants of this house, Citizen?" said he; "if so, I shall be happy to give it to you."

"Thanks, Citizen," stammered Maurice; "I am looking for the name of a friend."

"Tell me the name, Citizen; I know everybody in this quarter. Where does this friend live?"

"He lived, I think, in the old Rue Saint Jacques; but I fear he has removed."

"But how is he named? I must know that."

Maurice taken thus unawares hesitated for a moment, then pronounced the first name that presented itself to his memory.

"René," said he.

"And what trade?"

Maurice was surrounded by tanneries.

"A journeyman-tanner," said he.

"In that case," said a burgess, who stopped and regarded Maurice with a certain good-nature, not totally exempt from distrust, "you should address yourself to his master."

"That is true," said the door-keeper; "you are quite right, the masters know the names of their workmen; here is Citizen Dixmer, who is manager of a tannery, and has more than fifty workmen in his yard, he can perhaps tell you." Maurice turned round and saw a burgess of commanding figure and mild countenance, the richness of whose attire denoted opulence.

"Only as the citizen porter observes, it is necessary I should know the family name."

"The one I said, — René."

"René is his baptismal name; it is the family name I require. All my workmen sign their family name."

"Upon my word," said Maurice, growing impatient under this species of interrogation, "the family name? I do not know it."

"What," said the burgess, with a smile, in which Maurice thought he discerned more irony than he wished to appear, — "what, not know the surname of your friend!"

"No."

"In that case, it is not probable you will find him," and the burgess, gravely bowing to Maurice, walked a short distance and entered a house in the old Rue Saint Jacques.

"The fact is, that if you do not know his surname," said the porter —

"Well, I do not know it," said Maurice, who would not have been sorry to find some occasion to vent his ill-temper, and was at the moment much inclined to seek a quarrel. "What have you to say to that?"

"Nothing, Citizen, nothing at all; only since you do not know the name of your friend, it is as Citizen Dixmer said more than probable you will not find him," and the citizen porter went into his lodge, shrugging his shoulders. Maurice felt a great inclination to thrash this porter, but he was an old man, and his infirmities saved him. Had the porter been twenty years younger, Maurice would have given a scandalous illustration of the principle, — equal in law, unequal in physical force. Besides, the day was drawing to a close, and he had only a few moments of daylight left. He availed himself of it by returning to the first street, then to the second, examined every door, searched in every nook, looked under every palisade, climbed each wall, threw a glance into the interior of every gateway, looked through the keyholes, knocked at some deserted warehouses without receiving any reply, till at length nearly two hours had elapsed in this useless investigation.

Nine o'clock struck; no more noise was heard, no movement seen in this deserted quarter, whose life seemed to have retired with the light of day. Maurice in despair made a retrograde movement, when all at once, at the winding of a narrow alley, he discerned a light. He immediately ventured into the dark passage, without remarking that at that very moment a curious head, which for the last quarter of an hour (from the midst of a clump of trees, rising above the wall) had followed all his movements, then disappeared suddenly behind this wall. A short time after this head had disappeared, three men came out from a small door in this same wall, went into the alley where Maurice had preceded them, while a fourth, for greater security, locked the door of entrance into the alley. At the end of the alley, Maurice discovered a court; it was on the opposite side of this court that the light was burning. He knocked at the door of a poor, solitary house, but at the first sound the light was extinguished. He redoubled his efforts, but no one answered his call; he saw they were determined to make no reply, so comprehending that it was only a useless waste of time, he crossed the court and re-entered the alley. At this moment the door of the house turned softly on its hinges, three men came out, and then the sound of a whistle was heard.

Maurice turned round, and saw three shadows within a short distance. He saw in the darkness also (his eyes having become accustomed to this obscurity) the reflection of three glittering blades. He knew that he was hemmed in. He would have brandished his club, but the alley was so narrow that it touched the wall on either side. At the same moment he was stunned by a violent blow on the head. This was an unforeseen assault made upon him by the four men who entered through the door in the wall. Seven men at the same time threw themselves upon Maurice, and notwithstanding a desperate resistance, overpowered him, and succeeded in binding his hands and bandaging his eyes.

Maurice had not even uttered a cry, or called for aid. Strength and true courage are self-reliant, and are ashamed of extraneous aid. Besides, Maurice had often heard that no one would enter this deserted quarter. Maurice was thus, as we have said, thrown down and bound, but had not uttered a single complaint. He had reflected as to what would follow, — that as they had bandaged his eyes they did not intend to kill him directly. At Maurice's age respite becomes hope. He recovered his presence of mind, and listened patiently.

"Who are you?" demanded a voice, still breathless from the late struggle.

"I am a man they are murdering," replied Maurice.

"What is more, you are a dead man if you speak loud, or call for assistance, or even utter the least cry."

"If I had wished to cry, I need not have waited till now."

"Are you ready to answer my questions?"

"Let me hear them first; I shall then see whether I ought to reply."

"Who sent you here?"

"No one."

"You came then of your own accord?"

"Yes."

"You lie!"

Maurice made a desperate effort to disengage his hands, but it was in vain.

"I never lie," said he.

"In either case, whether you came of your own accord or were sent, you are a spy."

"And you are cowards!"

"We cowards!"

"You are seven or eight against one man bound, and you insult that man. Cowards! cowards! cowards!"

This violence on the part of Maurice, instead of enraging his adversaries, appeared to produce a contrary effect. It was even a proof that the young man was not what they had laid to his charge; a true spy would have trembled, and begged for mercy.

"There is nothing insulting in that," said a voice, milder yet firmer than any that had previously been heard; "in the times we live in, one may be a spy without being a dishonest man, only it is at the risk of one's life."

"If that is your opinion, you are welcome to question me, I will answer you faithfully."

"What are you doing in this quarter?"

"Looking for a woman."

This excuse was received with a murmur of incredulity; the murmur increased and became a storm.

"You lie!" replied the same voice. "There is no woman in the matter, and we know what we mean by 'woman;' there is no woman to pursue in this quarter. Avow your project, or die."

"Come," said Maurice, "you will not kill me for pleasure, unless you are downright ruffians."

Maurice made a second effort, more violent and unexpected than the first, to disengage his hands from the cord which bound them, when suddenly a cold sensation, sharp and painful, shot through his breast.

Despite himself, Maurice fell back a step.

"Ah! you felt that," said one of the men. "Well, there are eight inches like the inch with which you have just become acquainted."

"Complete your work, then," said Maurice, resignedly; "it will at least soon be over."

"Come now, who are you?" asked the voice which was at once mild and commanding.

"Do you wish to know my name?"

"Yes, your name."

"Maurice Lindey."

"What!" exclaimed a voice, "Maurice Lindey, the revolu — the patriot? Maurice Lindey, secretary of the Lepelletier section?"

These words were pronounced with so much heat that Maurice saw clearly that they were decisive. To reply was in a manner to fix irrevocably his fate.

Maurice was incapable of cowardice. He drew himself up like a Spartan, and said in a firm voice, —

"Yes, Maurice Lindey; yes, Maurice Lindey, the secretary of the section Lepelletier; yes, Maurice Lindey, the patriot, the revolutionist, the Jacobin; Maurice Lindey, in short, whose brightest day on earth will be that on which he will die for liberty."

A death-like silence followed this reply.

Maurice presented his breast, expecting every moment that the blade, whose point he had already felt, would be plunged into his heart.

"Is your statement really true?" asked a voice which betrayed some emotion; "come, young man, do not lie."

"Search my pocket," said Maurice, "and you will find my commission. Look at my shirt-bosom, and if my blood has not effaced them, you will there see embroidered my initials, M and L."

Maurice at once felt himself lifted by strong arms which bore him a short distance. He heard first one door open, then another; but the second was narrower than the first, for his bearers could scarcely pass through with him.

The murmurs and whispers continued.

"I am lost," thought Maurice. "They are going to tie a stone round my neck and throw me into some hole of the Bièvre."

But in another moment he felt that the men ascended some steps, where the air was warmer, and where they placed him on a seat. He heard a double door shut and the steps withdraw. He believed that he was left alone. He listened as intently as a man can whose life depends upon a word, and he believed that he heard that same voice whose tones had already struck him as mixing mildness with command, say to the others, —

"Let us deliberate."

CHAPTER VIII.

GENEVIÈVE.

A QUARTER of an hour elapsed, which seemed a century to Maurice. Nothing more natural; young, handsome, vigorous, supported in his strength by a hundred devoted friends, in combination with whom he sometimes dreamed of the accomplishment of great achievements, he found himself all at once without the least preparation in peril of losing his life in an ignominious den of assassins.

He understood that they had shut him up in some chamber; but was he watched?

Again he struggled to break his bonds. His muscles of steel swelled and contracted; the cord cut into his flesh, but did not break.

The most terrible thing was that his hands were fastened behind his back so that he could not remove the bandage from his eyes. If he could only see, he might escape.

As he had made these attempts to free himself without opposition, without anything stirring around him, he concluded that he was alone. The ground under his feet was soft and soundless, might be gravel or perhaps clay. An acrid and pungent smell announced the presence of vegetable matter. Maurice fancied he was in a greenhouse, or some place very like it. He took a step or two, hit the wall, turned, and groping with his hands, felt some garden-tools. He uttered an exclamation of joy.

With unparalleled exertion he examined these tools, one after the other. His flight now became a question of time. If chance, or Providence, granted him five minutes, and if among these tools he found a sharp instrument, he was saved.

He found a spade. From the way in which Maurice was bound, it required a great struggle to raise the spade a sufficient height for his purpose. He at length succeeded, and upon the iron of the spade which he supported against the wall with his back, he at last cut, or rather wore away, the cord which confined his wrists. The operation was tedious, the iron cut slowly. The perspiration streamed from his face; he heard a noise as of some one approaching; with a tremendous effort the cord, half-severed, broke. He could not help giving a cry of joy; now at least he was sure to die in defending himself.

Maurice tore the bandage from his eyes.

He had not been mistaken; he found himself not in a greenhouse, but in a kind of pavilion used as a receptacle for the more delicate plants unable to outlive the winter in the open air. In a corner the gardening implements were stowed away, one of which had been the means of rendering him so important a service. Facing him was a window; he rushed toward it; it was grated, and a man armed with a carbine placed sentinel before it.

On the other side of the garden, about thirty paces distant, rose a small turret, fellow to the one where Maurice remained prisoner. The blind was down, but through the blind a light was visible.

He approached the door and listened; another sentinel paced to and fro before this door. These were the footsteps he had heard.

But from the end of the corridor a confusion of voices resounded. The deliberation had evidently degenerated into disputation. Maurice could not hear distinctly what was said; some words, however, reached him, and amid these words — as if for them only the distance was short — he distinguished plainly, Spy! Poniard! Death!

Maurice redoubled his attention; a door opened, and he heard more distinctly.

"Yes," said one voice, "he is assuredly a spy; he has discovered something, and is certainly sent to take us and our secret unawares. In freeing him we run the risk of his denouncing us."

"But his word," said a voice.

"His word — he will give it only to betray us. Is he a gentleman that we should trust his word?"

Maurice ground his teeth at the idea which some folks still retained, that only a gentleman could keep his oath.

"But he does not know us; how can he denounce us?"

"No; he certainly does not know us nor our occupation, but he knows the address, and will return; next time he will be well accompanied."

This argument appeared conclusive.

"Then," said the voice which several times already had struck Maurice as belonging to the chief, "it is decided."

"Yes, a hundred times yes; I do not comprehend you with your magnanimity. My good sir, if the Committee for the Public Safety caught us, you would see if they acted toward us with so much ceremony."

"You persist, then, in your decision, gentlemen?"

"Without doubt, and you are not, we hope, going to oppose it."

"I have only one voice, gentlemen; it has been in favor of his liberation: you possess six, and they all vote for his death. Let it, then, be death."

Maurice felt the blood freeze in his veins.

"Of course he will howl," said a voice; "have you removed Madame Dixmer?"

"Madame Dixmer!" murmured Maurice; "I begin now to comprehend. I am in the house of the master-tanner who spoke to me in the old Rue Saint Jacques, and who went away laughing because I was unable to tell him the name of my friend. But how can it be to his interest to assassinate me?"

Looking round, Maurice perceived an iron stake with a handle of ash-tree wood.

"In any case," said he, "before they assassinate me, I will kill more than one of them."

And he sprang to secure this harmless instrument, which, in his hand, was to become a formidable weapon. He then retired behind the door, and so placed himself that he could see without being seen. His heart beat so tumultuously that in the deep silence its palpitations might be heard. Suddenly Maurice shuddered from head to foot. A voice had said, —

"If you act according to my advice, you will break a pane, and through the bars kill him with a shot from a carbine."

"Oh, no, no! — not an explosion," said another voice, "that might betray us. Besides, Dixmer, there is your wife."

"I have just looked at her through the blind; she suspects nothing — she is reading."

"Dixmer, you shall decide for us. Do you advocate a shot from the carbine, or a stroke from the poniard?"

"Avoid fire-arms as much as possible — the poniard."

"Then let it be the poniard. Come!"

"Come!" repeated five or six voices, together.

Maurice was a child of the Revolution, with a heart of flint, and in mind, like many others at that epoch, an atheist. But at the word "Come!" pronounced behind the door, which alone separated him from death, he remembered the sign of the cross, which his mother had taught him when an infant he said his prayers at her knee.

Steps approached, stopped; then the key turned in the lock, and the door slowly opened.

During this fleeting moment, Maurice had said to himself, —

"If I do not strike at once, I am a dead man. If I throw myself upon the assassins, I take them unawares — gain first the garden, then the street, and am saved!"

Immediately, with the spring of a lion, and uttering a fierce cry which savored more of menace than terror, he threw down the first two men, who believing him bound and blindfolded were quite unprepared for such an assault, scattered the others, took a tremendous leap over them, thanks to his iron muscles, saw at the end of the corridor a door leading into the garden wide open, rushed toward it, cleared at a bound six steps, found himself in the garden, and guessing his whereabouts as nearly as possible, rushed toward the gate. It was secured by a lock and a couple of bolts. Maurice drew back the bolts, tried to open the lock; but it had no key.

In the mean time his pursuers, who had reached the steps, perceived him.

"There he is!" cried they; "fire upon him, Dixmer, fire! Kill him — kill him!"

Maurice uttered a groan; he was enclosed in the garden; he measured the walls with his eye — they were ten feet in height.

All this passed in a moment. The assassins rushed forward in pursuit.

Maurice was about thirty paces in advance; he looked about him with the air of a condemned man who seeks the shadow of a chance to save himself. He perceived the turret, the blind, and behind the blind the light.

He made but one bound, — a bound of six feet, — seized the blind, tore it down, passed through the window, smashing it, and alighted in a chamber where a lady sat reading.

The lady rose terrified, calling for help.

"Stand aside, Geneviève; stand aside!" cried the voice of Dixmer, "stand aside that I may kill him!"

And Maurice saw the carbine levelled at him.

But scarcely had the woman looked at him than she uttered a frightful cry, and instead of standing aside, as desired by her husband, rushed between him and the barrel of the gun.

This movement concentrated all Maurice's attention on the generous woman, whose first impulse was to protect him from danger and death.

In his turn he uttered a cry of astonishment.

It was the unknown whom he had so eagerly sought.

"You!" he exclaimed, "you —"

"Silence!" cried she.

Then, turning toward the assassins, who, variously armed, approached the window, —

"Ah! you will not kill him!" cried she.

"He is a spy," said Dixmer, whose usually placid countenance had assumed an expression of stern resolution, — "he is a spy, and therefore must die."

"A spy — he!" said Geneviève; "he a spy! Come here, Dixmer; I need only say one word to prove that you are strangely deceived."

Dixmer and Geneviève approached the window, and in a low voice she uttered a few words.

The master-tanner raised his head quickly.

"He!" said he.

"He himself," said Geneviève.

"You are certain, quite certain?"

This time the young woman did not reply, but smiling held out her hand to Maurice.

The features of Dixmer now assumed a singular expression of coolness and gentleness. He rested the butt-end of his musket on the ground.

"This is quite another thing," said he.

Then making a sign to his companions to follow, he stepped aside with them, and after saying a few words, they disappeared.

"Conceal that ring," murmured Geneviève; "it is known by every one here."

Maurice quickly drew the ring from his finger, and slipped it into his waistcoat-pocket.

A moment afterward the door of the pavilion opened, and Dixmer, unarmed, advanced toward Maurice.

"Pardon me, Citizen," said he, "that I did not know sooner the obligation I am under to you. My wife, while retaining a grateful remembrance of the service you rendered her on the 10th of March, had forgotten your name. We were therefore completely in ignorance with whom we were concerned; otherwise, believe me, we should not for a moment have entertained suspicion either of your honor or intentions. I therefore again ask your pardon."

Maurice was bewildered; with the greatest difficulty he preserved his equilibrium; he felt his head turn round, and was near falling. He supported himself against the mantel-piece.

"Why on earth did you wish to kill me?" he asked.

"This is the secret, Citizen," said Dixmer; "I confide it to your keeping. I am, as you already know, a tanner, and principal in this concern. The greater part of the acids I employ in the preparation of my skins are prohibited goods. Now the smugglers have received intelligence of an information laid before the counsel-general. I feared you were an informer. My smugglers were more alarmed than myself at your bonnet-rouge and formidable appearance, and I do not conceal from you that your death was resolved upon."

"Pardieu! and well I know it," said Maurice; "you tell me no news. I heard your consultation, and have seen your carbine."

"I have already apologized," said Dixmer, in a tone of marked kindness. "You must understand that, thanks to the unsettled state of the times, myself and partner, Monsieur Morand, are likely to realize an immense fortune. We have the furnishing of the military bags, and finish from fifteen hundred to two thousand each day. Owing to this blessed state of things in which we live, the municipality are much occupied, and have not time strictly to examine our accounts, so that it must be confessed we fish a little in troubled waters; the more so because, as I have already told you, the preparatory materials we procure by smuggling allow us to gain two hundred per cent."

"The devil!" said Maurice, "that appears to me an honest living enough, and I can now understand your dread lest a denunciation on my part should put an end to it; but now you know me, you fear me no longer. Is it not so?"

"Now," said Dixmer, "I do not even ask your word of honor." Then, placing his hand on his shoulder and smiling, "As it is only between friends," said he, "may I inquire what brought you here, young man? But of course, if you wish to keep it secret, you are perfectly at liberty to do so."

"I have already told you, I believe," murmured Maurice.

"Yes, a woman," said the burgess; "I know there was something about a woman."

"Mon Dieu! excuse me, Citizen, I am aware some sort of explanation is due to you. Well, then, I sought a female, who the other evening, disguised, told me she resided in this quarter. I neither know her name, position, or place of abode. I only know I am madly in love with her, that she is short —"

Geneviève was tall.

"That she is fair, and of a lively temperament."

Geneviève was a brunette, with large pensive eyes.

"A grisette, in short," continued Maurice; "so to please her, I assumed the popular dress."

"That explains all," said Dixmer, with a faith which a sly wink did not belie.

Geneviève colored, and feeling herself blush, turned away.

"Poor Citizen Lindey," said Dixmer, laughing; "what a miserable evening we have caused you to pass! and you are about the last I would wish to injure, so excellent a patriot, a brother; but, in short, I believed some confounded spy had usurped your name."

"Let us say no more on the subject," said Maurice, who knew it was time for him to withdraw; "put me on my road, and let us forget —"

"Put you on your road!" exclaimed Dixmer; "let you leave us! no indeed, not yet. I give — or rather my partner and myself give — a supper to-night to those brave fellows who wished so much to slaughter you a little while ago. I reckon upon your supping with them, that you may see they are not such devils as they appear to be."

"But," said Maurice, overjoyed at the thought of being for a few hours near Geneviève, "I do not know really if I ought to accept — "

"If you ought to accept!" said Dixmer; "I know you ought; these are good and stanch patriots like yourself. Besides, I shall not consider that you have forgiven me unless we break bread together."

Geneviève uttered not a word. Maurice was in torment.

"The fact is," stammered Maurice, "I fear I may be a constraint upon you, Citizen — this dress — my ungentlemanly appearance — "

Geneviève looked timidly toward him.

"We invite you in all kindness," said she.

"I accept your invitation, Citizen," said he, bowing.

"I will go and secure our companions," said Dixmer; "in the mean time, warm yourself, my dear sir."

He went out. Maurice and Geneviève remained alone.

"Ah, Monsieur!" said the young woman, in an accent to which she in vain tried to convey a tone of reproach, "you have failed in your word; you have been exceedingly indiscreet."

"Madame," cried Maurice, "have I in any way compromised you? Ah! in that case, pardon me; I will retire, and never — "

"Goodness!" said she, rising, "you are wounded in the breast; your shirt is stained with blood."

Indeed, upon the fine, white shirt of Maurice — a shirt forming a strange contrast to his coarser clothes — a large red spot of blood had spread itself, and had dried there.

"Do not be under any alarm, Madame," said the young man, "one of the smugglers pricked me with his poniard."

Geneviève turned pale, and taking his hand, —

"Forgive me," said she, "the wrong that has been done you; you saved my life, and I have nearly caused your death."

"Am I not sufficiently recompensed in finding you? You cannot for a moment imagine it was for another that I sought."

"Come with me," said Geneviève, interrupting him; "I will find you some clean linen. Our guests must not see you thus; it would be too great a reproach to them."

"I am a great trouble to you, Madame, I fear," said Maurice, sighing.

"Not at all; I only do my duty; and," she added, "I do it with much pleasure."

Geneviève then conducted Maurice to a large dressing-room, arranged with an air of elegance he had not expected to find in the house of a master-tanner. It is true this master-tanner appeared to be a millionnaire. She then opened the wardrobes.

"Help yourself," said she; "you are at home." She withdrew.

When Maurice came out, he found Dixmer had returned.

"Come! come!" said he, "to table; we only wait for you."

CHAPTER IX.

THE SUPPER.

When Maurice entered with Dixmer and Geneviève into the dining-room, situated in the part of the house where they had first conducted him, the supper was ready but the room vacant. He saw all the guests enter successively. They were six in number, men of agreeable exterior, for the most part young and fashionably dressed; two or three even wore the blouse and red bonnet.

Dixmer introduced Maurice, naming his titles and qualifications. Then, turning toward Maurice, —

"You see," said he, "Citizen Lindey, all those who assist me in my trade. Thanks to the times in which we live, thanks to the revolutionary principles which have effaced all distinction, we all live upon the same footing of sacred equality. Every day we assemble twice at the same table, and I am happy you have been induced to partake of our family repast. Come! to table — citizens, to table."

"And — Monsieur Morand," said Geneviève, timidly, "do we not wait for him?"

"Ah, true!" said Dixmer. "This citizen of whom I have already spoken, Citizen Lindey, is my partner. He conducts, if I may so express myself, the moral part of the establishment. He attends to the writing, keeps the cash, superintends the factories, pays and receives the money, and, in short, works harder than any of us. The result is that he is sometimes rather late. I will go and tell him we are waiting."

At this moment the door opened, and the Citizen Morand entered.

He was a short man, dark, with bushy eyebrows, and wore green spectacles — like a man whose eyes are fatigued from excess of work — concealing his black eyes, but not effectually obstructing their scintillating gleams. At the first words he uttered, Maurice recognized that mild, yet commanding voice engaged in his behalf when endeavoring to save him from becoming a victim to that terrible discussion. He was habited in a brown coat, with large buttons, a white waistcoat; and his fine cambric shirt-frill was often during dinner smoothed by a hand which Maurice, no doubt from its being that of a tradesman, admired much for its beauty and delicacy of appearance.

They all took their seats. Morand was placed on Geneviève's right hand, Maurice on her left. Dixmer sat opposite his wife. The rest of the guests seated themselves promiscuously round an oblong table. The supper was excellent. Dixmer had a capital appetite, and did the honors of the table with much politeness. The workmen, or those who pretended to be such, under this example became excellent companions. The Citizen Morand spoke little, and ate still less; drank scarcely anything, and rarely smiled. Maurice, perhaps from the reminiscences his voice awakened, felt for him immediately a lively sympathy, only he was in doubt as to his age; and this rather annoyed him, as sometimes he imagined him to be a man of forty or forty-five years, and sometimes to be quite young.

Dixmer, on placing himself at table, felt obliged to offer some explanation to his guests for the admission of a stranger into their little circle. He acquitted himself like an artless man, one unaccustomed to deceit; but the guests, as it seemed, were not hard to manage on this point; for, notwithstanding the awkwardness displayed by the manufacturer of hides in the introduction of the young man, they all appeared perfectly satisfied.

Maurice regarded him with astonishment.

"Upon my honor," said he to himself, "I shall really soon think that I myself am deceived. Is that the same man who, with flaming eyes and threatening voice, pursued me, gun in hand, and absolutely wished to kill me three quarters of an hour since? Then I should have taken him for either a hero or an assassin. Goodness! how the love of hides does transform a man."

While making these observations Maurice experienced a strange feeling of joy and grief, and felt unable to analyze his own emotions. He at length found himself near his beautiful unknown, whom he had so ardently sought. As he had dreamed, she bore a charming name; he was intoxicated with the happiness of finding himself at her side; he drank in her every word; and at each sound of her voice the most secret chords of his heart vibrated; but he was deeply wounded by all he saw.

Geneviève was exactly what he had pictured her; the dream of a stormy night, reality had not destroyed. Here was an elegant woman, of sad demeanor but refined mind, affording another instance of what had so frequently occurred during the latter years preceding this present celebrated year '93. Here was a young woman of distinction compelled, from the ruin into which the nobility was ever falling, deeper and deeper, to ally herself to a commoner engaged in commerce. Dixmer appeared a trusty man. He was incontestably rich, and his manners to Geneviève were those of a man making every endeavor to render a woman happy. But could kindness, riches, or excellent intentions compensate her for what she had sacrificed, or remove the immense distance existing between husband and wife, between a refined, distinguished, charming girl, and a vulgar-looking tradesman? With what could Geneviève fill up this abyss? Alas! Maurice now guessed too well. With love! And he therefore returned to that opinion of the young woman he had formed on the evening of their first meeting, — that she was returning from some love affair.

The idea of Geneviève loving any one was torture to Maurice. He sighed, and deeply regretted having exposed himself to the temptation of imbibing a still larger dose of that poison termed love. At other moments, while listening to that ductile voice, so soft and harmonious, examining that pure and open countenance which evinced no fear that he should read every secret of her soul, he arrived at the conclusion that it was utterly impossible that this matchless creature could descend to deceit; and then he found a bitter pleasure in remembering that this lovely woman belonged solely to this good citizen, with his honest smile and vulgar pleasantries, and would never be to him more than a passing acquaintance.

They conversed of course on politics. How could it be otherwise at an epoch when politics were mixed up with everything. Political subjects were even painted on the plates, political designs covered the walls, and politics were daily proclaimed in the streets. All at once, one of the guests who had hitherto preserved silence inquired concerning the prisoners of the Temple.

Maurice started, in spite of himself, at the ring of that voice. He recognized the voice of the man who, a strenuous advocate for extreme measures, had first struck him with his dagger, and then advocated his death. Nevertheless, this man, an honest tanner, and head of the manufactory, at least so Dixmer represented him, soon incited the good humor of Maurice by the expression of ideas the most patriotic, and principles the most revolutionary. The young man, under certain circumstances, was not inimical to these extreme measures, so much in fashion at this period, of which Danton was the apostle and hero. In this man's place, from the effect of whose voice and weapon he felt himself still smarting, he would not have attempted to assassinate the man he believed to be a spy, but would rather have locked him in the garden, and there, equally armed, sword to sword, have fought him without mercy, without pity. This is what Maurice would have done; but he comprehended soon that this was too much to expect of a journeyman-tanner.

This man of extreme measures, who appeared to possess in his political ideas the same violent system as in his private conduct, then spoke of the Temple, and expressed surprise that the prisoners were confided to the guardianship of a permanent council liable to be corrupted, and to municipals whose fidelity had already been more than once tempted.

"Yes," said the Citizen Morand; "but it must be remembered that on every occasion, up to the present time, the municipals have fully justified the confidence reposed in them by the nation, and history will record that the Citizen Robespierre alone has merited the title of 'Incorruptible.'"

"Without doubt, without doubt," replied the interlocutor; "but because a thing has not yet happened, it would be absurd to suppose it never can happen. As for the National Guard," continued the foreman of the manufactory, "well, the companies of the different sections are placed, each in their turn, on duty at the Temple, and that indifferently. Will you not admit that there might be, in a company of twenty or five-and-twenty men, a band of seven or eight determined characters, who some fine night might slaughter the sentinels and carry off the prisoners?"

"Bah!" said Maurice; "you see, Citizen, this would be a foolish expedient. In fact the thing was tried three weeks or a month ago, and did not succeed."

"Yes," replied Morand; "because one of those aristocrats who composed the patrol had the imprudence in speaking to let fall the word 'Monsieur,' I do not know to whom."

"And then," said Maurice, who wished to prove that the police of the Republic did their duty, "because the entrance of the Chevalier de Maison-Rouge into Paris was already known —"

"Bah!" cried Dixmer.

"They knew that Maison-Rouge had entered Paris?" coldly demanded Morand; "and did they know by what means he entered?"

"Perfectly."

"Indeed!" said Morand, leaning forward to look at Maurice, "I should be curious to know that, as up to the present moment no one can speak positively. But you, Citizen, you, secretary of one of the principal sections in Paris, ought to be better informed."

"Doubtless; therefore, what I am about to tell you is the true statement of facts."

All the guests and even Geneviève appeared prepared to pay the greatest attention to this recital.

"Well," said Maurice, "the Chevalier de Maison-Rouge came from Vendée, it appears; he had traversed all France with his usual good fortune. Arrived during the day at the Barrière du Roule, he waited till nine o'clock at night. At that hour a woman, disguised as a woman o the people, went out through the barrier, carrying to the chevalier a costume of chasseur of the National Guard. Ten minutes afterward she re-entered with him; but the sentinel, who had seen her go out alone, felt rather suspicious when he saw her return with a companion. He gave the alarm to the post; the post turned out, when the two culprits, knowing they were pursued, flung themselves into a hotel where a second door opened into the Champs Elysées.

"It seems that a patrol devoted to the tyrants waited for the chevalier at the corner of the Rue Burre-du-Bec. You are acquainted with the rest."

"Ah, ah!" said Morand; "this is very strange."

"But positively true," said Maurice.

"Yes, it has an air of truth; but the female, do you know what became of her?"

"No; she has disappeared, and they are quite ignorant who she is, or what she is."

The partner of Citizen Dixmer, and Citizen Dixmer himself, appeared to breathe more freely.

Geneviève had listened to the whole of this recital, pale, silent, and immovable.

"But," said Morand, with his usual coolness, "who can say that the Chevalier de Maison-Rouge made one of the patrol who gave the alarm at the Temple?"

"A municipal, one of my friends, that day on duty at the Temple. He recognized him."

"He knew him from description?"

"He had seen him before."

"And what sort of man, personally, is this Chevalier de Maison-Rouge?"

"A man of five or six and twenty, short, fair, and of a pleasing countenance, with magnificent eyes and superb teeth."

There was a profound silence.

"Well," said Morand, "if your friend the municipal recognized this pretended Chevalier de Maison-Rouge, why did he not arrest him?"

"In the first place, not knowing of his arrival at Paris, he feared being the dupe of a resemblance; and then my friend, being rather lukewarm, acted as the lukewarm generally act, — gave him the benefit of his doubt, and let him alone."

"You would not have acted thus, Citizen?" said Dixmer, laughing boisterously.

"No," said Maurice; "I confess it, I would rather find myself deceived than allow so dangerous a man as the Chevalier de Maison-Rouge to escape."

"And what would you have done, then, Monsieur?" timidly inquired Geneviève.

"What would I have done, Citizen?" said Maurice, "Oh, by Jove! I would have made short work of it. I would have had every door in the Temple shut. I would have walked straight up to the patrol, have placed my hand on his collar, and said to him, 'Chevalier de Maison-Rouge, I arrest you as a traitor to the nation;' and my hand once upon his collar, I would not soon release him, I can tell you."

"And what would have happened then?" asked Geneviève.

"It would have happened that he and his accomplices would have been arrested, and that very hour would have been guillotined; that is all."

Geneviève shuddered, and darted on her neighbor a look of affright. But the Citizen Morand did not appear to notice this glance, and phlegmatically emptied his glass.

"The Citizen Lindey is right," said he; "there was nothing else to do; but, unfortunately, it was not done."

"And," demanded Geneviève, "do you know what has become of the Chevalier de Maison-Rouge?"

"Bah!" said Dixmer, "in all probability he did not wish to remain longer, and finding his attempt abortive, quitted Paris immediately."

"And perhaps even France," added Morand.

"Not at all, not at all," said Maurice.

"What! has he had the imprudence to remain in Paris?" asked Geneviève.

"He has not stirred."

A movement of general astonishment followed this assertion which Maurice had stated with so much confidence.

"This is only a supposition, Citizen, on your part," said Morand, — "merely a supposition, that is all."

"No; I affirm it as a positive fact."

"Ah!" said Geneviève; "I acknowledge, for my part, I cannot believe it is as you say; it would be such an unpardonable imprudence."

"You are a woman, Citizen; and can comprehend, then, what would outweigh, with a man of such a character as the Chevalier de Maison-Rouge, all considerations of personal security?"

"And what can outweigh the dread of losing one's life in a manner so dreadful?"

"Ah, Citizen!" answered Maurice, "love."

"Love!" repeated Geneviève.

"Certainly. Do you not know, then, that the Chevalier de Maison-Rouge is enamored of Marie Antoinette?"

Two or three incredulous laughs were faintly heard. Dixmer looked at Maurice as if he sought to penetrate the very depths of his soul. Geneviève felt the tears suffuse her eyes, and a shuddering she could not conceal from Maurice ran through her frame. The Citizen Morand spilled some wine from his glass, which he was then in the act of putting to his lips. His paleness would have alarmed Maurice, had not all the young man's attention been at the time centred on Geneviève.

"You are moved, Citizen," murmured Maurice.

"Did you not say I should understand this because I was a woman? Well, we women feel for such devotion even if opposed to our principles."

"And that of the Chevalier de Maison-Rouge is the height of devotion, as it is said he has never even spoken to the queen."

"Ah! there now, Citizen Lindey," said the man of extreme measures; "it seems to me, permit me to observe, that you are very indulgent to the Chevalier—"

"Monsieur," said Maurice, perhaps intentionally making use of a word which had ceased to be in vogue, "I love all brave and courageous natures, which does not prevent my fighting them when I meet them in the ranks of my enemies. I do not despair of one day encountering the Chevalier de Maison-Rouge."

"And—" said Geneviève.

"If I meet him—well, I shall fight him."

The supper was finished. Geneviève set the example of retiring, by herself rising from table. At this moment the clock struck.

"Midnight!" said Morand, coolly.

"Midnight" exclaimed Maurice,—"midnight already?"

"That exclamation affords me much pleasure," said Dixmer; "it proves you are not wearied, and induces me to hope we may see you again. It is the door of a true patriot which opens to receive you; and, I trust, ere long, you will find it that of a sincere friend."

Maurice bowed, and turning toward Geneviève, —

"Will the Citizen also permit me to repeat my visit?" demanded he.

"I do more than permit, I request you to do so. Adieu, Citizen," and Geneviève retired.

Maurice took leave of all the guests, particularly saluting Morand, with whom he was much pleased; pressed Dixmer's hand, and went away bewildered, but on the whole more joyful than sad, from the various and unexpected events of the evening.

"Unfortunate encounter, unfortunate encounter!" said the young woman, after Maurice's departure, and then burst into tears in the presence of her husband, who had conducted her to her room.

"Bah!" said Dixmer, "the Citizen Lindey, a known patriot, secretary to a section, admired, worshipped, and highly popular, is, on the contrary, a great acquisition to a poor tanner who has contraband merchandise on his premises."

"Do you think so, mon ami?" asked Geneviève, timidly.

"I think it is a warrant of patriotism, a seal of absolution, placed upon our house; and I think, after this evening, that the Chevalier de Maison-Rouge himself would be safe at our house."

And Dixmer kissed his wife with an affection more paternal than conjugal, and left her in the little pavilion set apart for her special benefit, passing himself into another part of the building, which he inhabited with the guests we have seen assembled round his table.

CHAPTER X.

SIMON THE SHOEMAKER.

THE month of May had commenced. A bright clear day expanded the lungs tired of inhaling the icy fogs of winter, and the rays of the sun, warm and exhilarating, shone upon the black walls of the Temple. At the wicket of the interior, which separated the tower from the gardens, the soldiers of the post were smoking and laughing. But, notwithstanding the beauty of the day, and the offer made to the prisoners to descend and walk in the garden, the three females refused to do so; as, since the execution of her husband, the queen had obstinately secluded herself in her chamber, not wishing to pass the door of the apartment lately occupied by the king on the second story. When by any chance she took the air, since the fatal occurrence of the 21st of January, she did so on the platform of the tower, where even the battlements were inclosed with shutters.

The National Guards on duty, who knew the three females had received permission to go out, waited in vain all day, expecting them to turn the authority to some account. Toward five o'clock a man descended, and approached the sergeant in command of the post.

"Ah! ah! is that you, Father Tison?" said the sergeant, who appeared to be a right merry fellow.

"Yes, it is I, Citizen; I bring you, on the part of the municipal Maurice Lindey, your friend, who is now upstairs, this permission, granted by the Council of the Temple to my daughter, to pay a visit to her mother this evening."

"And you are going out just as your daughter is coming in? Unnatural father!" said the sergeant.

"I am going much against my inclination, Citizen Sergeant. I also hoped to see my poor child, whom I have not seen for two months, and to embrace her this evening. I am going out now. This service, this damned service, compels me to go out. It is necessary I should go to the Commune to make my report. A fiacre is waiting for me at the door, with two gendarmes, and it is exactly the time when my poor Sophie will arrive."

"Unhappy parent!" said the sergeant.

"And, Citizen Sergeant, when my child comes to see her poor mother, who is dying to see her, you will allow her to pass?"

"The order is correct," replied the sergeant, whom the reader has no doubt recognized as our friend Lorin; "so I have nothing to say against it; when your daughter comes, she may pass."

"Thanks, brave Thermopyle! thanks," said Tison; and he went out to make his report to the Commune, murmuring, "My poor wife, how happy she will be!"

"Do you know, Sergeant," said one of the National Guard, seeing Tison depart, and overhearing the last words, — "do you know there is something in these things that makes my blood run cold?"

"What things, Citizen Devaux?" demanded Lorin.

"Why," replied the compassionate National Guard, "to see this man, with his surly face and heart of stone, this pitiless guardian of the queen, go out with his eyes full of tears, partly of joy, partly of grief, thinking that his wife will see his daughter, and he shall not. It does not do to reflect upon it too much, Sergeant; it is really grievous."

"Doubtless that is why he does not reflect upon it himself, this man who goes out with tears in his eyes, as you term it."

"Upon what should he reflect?"

"That it is three months since this woman he so brutally uses has seen her child. He does not think of her grief, only of his own; that is all. It is true this woman was queen," continued the sergeant, in an ironical tone rather difficult of comprehension; "and one is not obliged to feel the same respect for a queen as for the wife of a journeyman."

"Notwithstanding, all this is very sad," said Devaux.

"Sad, but necessary," said Lorin. "The best way then, is, as you say, not to think of it," and he began to sing —

"Where the branches met
On a rocky stone,
There I found Nicette,
Seated all alone."

Lorin was in the midst of his pastoral ditty, when suddenly a loud noise was heard from the left side of the post, composed of oaths, menaces, and tears.

"What is that?" demanded Devaux.

"It sounded like the voice of a child," said Lorin, listening.

"In fact," said the National Guard, "it is a poor little one they are beating. Truly they ought only to send here those who have no children."

"Will you sing?" said a hoarse and drunken voice.

And the voice sung in example —

"Madame Veto promised
That all our heads should fall—"

"No," said the child, "I will not sing."

"Will you sing?"

And the voice recommenced —

"Madame Veto promised —"

"No! no!" said the child. "No, no, no!"

"Ah! little beggar," said the hoarse voice; and the noise of a lash whirring through the air was distinctly heard. The infant screamed with agony.

"Ah! sacre bleu!" said Lorin; "it is that rascally Simon beating the little Capet."

Several of the National Guards shrugged their shoulders. Two or three tried to smile. Devaux rose and went out.

"I said truly," murmured he, "that parents should never enter here."

All at once a low door opened, and the royal child, chased by the whip of his guardian made a flying leap into the court, when something hard struck his leg, and fell on the ground behind him.

He stumbled, and fell upon his knee.

"Bring me my last, little monster, or else —"

The child rose and shook his head, in token of refusal.

"Ah! this is it, is it?" cried the same voice. "Wait, you shall see," and the shoemaker Simon rushed from his hut as a wild beast from its den.

"Hallo! hallo!" cried Lorin, frowning. "Where are you going so fast, Master Simon?"

"To chastise this little wolf's cub," said the shoemaker.

"To chastise him, for what?"

"For what?"

"Yes."

"Because the little beggar will neither sing like a good patriot, nor work like a good citizen."

"Well, what have you to do with that?" demanded Lorin. "Did the nation confide Capet to you that you might teach him to sing?"

"And what business have you to interfere, I should like to know, Citizen Sergeant?" said Simon, astonished.

"I interfere, as it becomes every man of feeling to do. It is unworthy of a man to see a child beaten, and to suffer him to be beaten."

"Bah! the son of a tyrant."

"He is a child; and the child has not participated in the crimes of the father. The child is not culpable, and, consequently, ought not to be punished."

"And I tell you he was placed with me to do what I choose with him. I choose that he shall sing 'Madame Veto,' and sing it he shall."

"Contemptible wretch!" said Lorin. "'Madame Veto' is mother to this child. Would you yourself like your child to be made to sing that you were one of the canaille?"

"Me!" cried Simon. "Vile aristocrat of a sergeant!"

"No names," said Lorin. "I am not Capet; and they shall not make me sing by force."

"I will have you arrested, vile ci-devant!"

"You!" said Lorin; "you have me arrested! you had better try to arrest a Thermopyle."

"Good, good; he laughs best who laughs last. And now, Capet, pick up my last, and come and finish your shoe, or by thunder!—"

"And I," said Lorin, turning deadly pale, and advancing a step forward, his hands clinched, and his teeth set,—"I tell you he shall not pick up your last, he shall not make shoes; do you hear, idiot? Oh, yes! you have your big sword there, but I am no more afraid of it than I am of yourself. Just you dare to draw it."

"Ah! massacre," roared Simon, turning pale with rage.

At this moment two women entered the court. One of them held a paper in her hand. She addressed herself to the sentinel.

"Sergeant," cried the sentinel, "it is Tison's daughter, who asks to see her mother."

"Let her pass, since the Council of the Temple permit it," said Lorin, who did not wish to leave for a moment, for fear Simon should avail himself of his absence and again beat the child.

The sentinel allowed the two women to pass; but hardly had they ascended four steps on the dark staircase, when they encountered Maurice Lindey, who was descending into the court. It was almost dark, so that he was unable to distinguish their features. Maurice stopped them.

"Who are you, citizens?" said he; "and what do you want?"

"I am Sophie Tison," said one of the women; "I obtained permission to visit my mother, and have come to see her."

"Yes," said Maurice; "but this permission was for yourself only, Citizen."

"I brought my friend, that there might be two of us in the midst of the soldiers, at least."

"Very good; but your friend cannot go up."

"As you please, Citizen," said Sophie Tison, pressing the hand of her friend, who, close against the wall, seemed paralyzed with surprise and terror.

"Citizen sentinels," said Maurice, raising his voice and addressing the sentinels who were stationed on every landing, "allow the Citizen Tison to pass, but do not permit her friend to pass; she will remain on the staircase. See that she is treated with all due respect."

"Yes, Citizen," replied the sentinels.

"Go up, then," said Maurice.

The two women then passed on; and Maurice, leaping over the remaining five or six steps, advanced rapidly into the court.

"What is all this?" said he to the National Guard; "and what is the cause of this noise? The cries of a child were heard as far as the prisoners' antechamber."

"It is this," said Simon, who, accustomed to the manners of the municipals, believed, on perceiving Maurice, that he came as an ally; "this traitor, this spy, this ci-devant, this aristocrat, prevents me from belaboring Capet," and he shook his fist at Lorin.

"Yes, by Heaven, I did prevent it," said Lorin, drawing his sword; "and if you again call me ci-devant, aristocrat, or traitor, I will run my sword through your body."

"A threat!" cried Simon; "guard! guard!"

"I am the guard," said Lorin; "so you had better not call; for if I come to you, I will exterminate you."

"Come here, Citizen Municipal, come here," said Simon, now seriously alarmed at Lorin's threats.

"The sergeant is quite right," said the municipal, to whom he had appealed for assistance; "you are a disgrace to the nation, coward, to beat a child."

"And why did he beat him? Do you know the reason, Maurice? Because the child would not sing 'Madame Veto;' because the child would not insult his mother."

"The miserable wretch!" said Maurice.

"And you also?" said Simon. "Am I surrounded by traitors?"

"You villain!" cried the municipal, seizing Simon by the throat, and tearing the last from his hand; "try to prove that Maurice Lindey is a traitor," and he applied the leather strap vigorously to the shoulders of the shoemaker.

"Thanks, sir," said the child, who regarded this scene with the coolness of a Stoic; "but he will revenge himself upon me."

"Come, Capet, come, my child," said Lorin; "if he beats you again, call for help; I will chastise him, the hangman. And now, little Capet, return to your tower."

"Why do you call me Capet, even you who protect me? You know very well that Capet is not my name."

"Not your name!" said Lorin; "what is your name, then?"

"I am called Louis Charles de Bourbon. Capet is the name of one of my ancestors. I know the history of France; my father taught me."

"And you want to teach a child to mend old shoes, to whom a king has taught the history of France?" cried Lorin; "it beats everything."

"You need not be concerned," said Maurice to the child; "I will make my report."

"And I mine," said Simon; "and among other things I shall say that instead of allowing one woman to enter the tower, you permitted two to pass."

At this moment the two women went out from the keep. Maurice ran after them.

"Well, Citizen," said he, addressing the one by his side, "have you seen your mother?"

Sophie Tison placed herself immediately between the municipal and her companion.

"Yes, Citizen, thank you," said she.

Maurice had wished to see the young girl's friend, or at least to hear her voice, but she was enveloped in her mantle, and seemed determined not to utter a single word. He also thought that she trembled. This appearance of fear excited his suspicion. He reascended the stairs quickly, and through the glazed partition saw the queen endeavoring to hide something in her pocket which looked like a billet.

"Ah! ah!" said he, "I have been duped."

He called his colleague.

"Citizen Agricola," said he, "enter Marie Antoinette's room, and do not lose sight of her."

"Heyday!" said the municipal, "is it because —"

"Enter, I tell you, and do not lose sight of her for an instant, a moment, a second."

The municipal entered the queen's apartment.

"Call the woman Tison," said he to one of the National Guard.

Five minutes afterward Tison's wife arrived in high spirits.

"I have seen my daughter," said she.

"Where was that?" demanded Maurice.

"Here, of course, in this antechamber."

"Well; and did not your daughter ask to see the Austrian?"

"No."

"Did she not enter her room?"

"No."

"And during the time you were conversing with your daughter, did no one come out of the prisoners' chamber?"

"How should I know? I was fully occupied with my daughter, whom I had not seen for three months."

"Recollect yourself."

"Ah, yes; I think I remember."

"What?"

"The young girl came out."

"Marie Thérèse?"

"Yes."

"Did she speak to your daughter?"

"No."

"Your daughter gave nothing to her?"

"No."

"Did she pick up nothing from the ground?"

"My daughter?"

"No, the daughter of Marie Antoinette."

"She picked up her pocket-handkerchief."

"Oh, woman! what were you thinking of?" cried Maurice.

And he rushed toward the string of a bell, which he pulled violently. It was an alarm-bell.

CHAPTER XI.

THE BILLET.

THE other two municipal guards came up hastily. A detachment of the post accompanied them. The doors were shut, and two sentinels intercepted the egress from each chamber.

"What do you want, sir?" said the queen to Maurice when he entered. "I was retiring to bed, when, five minutes since, the citizen municipal suddenly forced his entrance into my chamber, without informing me what he desired."

"Madame," said Maurice, bowing, "it is not my colleague who desires anything from you, it is myself."

"You, sir?" demanded Marie Antoinette, looking at Maurice, whose courteous behavior had caused her to regard him with some favor; "and what do you desire?"

"I request that you will be kind enough to show me the letter you were concealing when I entered just now."

Madame Royale and Madame Elizabeth trembled. The queen turned very pale.

"You are mistaken, sir; I concealed nothing."

"You lie, Austrian!" cried Agricola.

Maurice quickly placed his hand on the arm of his colleague.

"One moment, my dear colleague," said he; "leave me to speak to the citizen, I am a little bit of a lawyer."

"Go on then; but do not stand on ceremony with her, morbleu!"

"You have concealed a letter, Citizen," said Maurice, austerely; "now it is necessary we should see this letter."

"But what letter?"

"The letter that Tison's daughter brought you, and which the citizen, your daughter" (Maurice alluded to the young princess), "picked up with her pocket-handkerchief."

The three females looked at each other with terror.

"But, Monsieur, this is worse than tyranny," said the queen; "we are women! women!"

"Do not mistake," said Maurice, with firmness; "we are neither judges nor executioners, we are overseers, — that is to say, your fellow-citizens, — commissioned to guard you. We have our order; to violate it is treason. Citizen, I pray you to give me the letter you have concealed."

"Gentlemen," said the queen, with much hauteur, "since you are overseers, search, and deprive us of our rest to-night as usual."

"God forbid we should lay our hands upon women! I am now going to inform the Commune, and shall await its orders. But you cannot retire to bed; you may sleep upon these easy-chairs, if you please, and we shall guard you. If necessary, they will search you."

"What is the matter?" said Tison's wife, appearing at the door quite bewildered.

"It is this, Citizen," said Maurice, "that by lending yourself to treasonable practices, you have debarred yourself from seeing your daughter any more."

"From seeing my daughter? What do you tell me then, Citizen," demanded Tison's wife, who could not yet comprehend why she was not to see her daughter.

"I tell you, that your daughter did not come here to see you, but to bring a letter to the Citizen Capet; and therefore she shall return here no more."

"But if she does not come here, I shall not be able to see her, as we are forbidden to go out."

"This time you have no one to blame but yourself, — it is your own fault," said Maurice.

"Oh!" screamed the poor woman, "my fault! why do you say it is my fault? Nothing has happened, I assure you. If I thought anything could have happened, woe to you, Antoinette; you should pay dearly for it," and the exasperated woman shook her fist at the queen.

"Threaten no one," said Maurice; "but rather gain by kindness what we demand, for you are a woman, and the Citizen Marie Antoinette, who is herself a mother, will take pity on you. To-morrow your daughter will be arrested, — to-morrow imprisoned; then, if they discover anything, and you know that when they choose they always can do so, she is lost, and also her companion."

The woman Tison, who had listened to Maurice with increasing terror, turned wildly toward the queen.

"You hear, Antoinette? My daughter! It is you who will ruin my child!"

The queen in her turn appeared bewildered, not by the fury which sparkled in the eyes of her female jailer, but by her evident despair. "Come with me, Madame Tison," said she, "I have something to say to you."

"Holloa! No cajolery; we are not in your way here," said Maurice's colleague. "Before the municipality — everything open and above board."

"Never mind, Citizen Agricola," whispered Maurice, "provided we discover the truth, it does not matter in what fashion we do so."

"You are right, Citizen Maurice; but —"

"Let us pass behind the glazed partition, Citizen Agricola; and if you agree with me, we will turn our backs, and I am certain the individual for whom we evince this consideration will not make us repent it."

The queen heard these words, intended for her to hear, and cast upon the young man a look of grateful acknowledgment. Maurice carelessly turned his head, and walked to the other side of the glazed partition. Agricola followed him.

"You see this queen," said he to Agricola: "as a queen she is very culpable, as a woman she is high-minded and dignified. It is well to destroy crowns; princes are purified by misfortune."

"By thunder! you speak well, Citizen Maurice; I like to hear you talk, and your friend Lorin. Is that poetry you recited?"

Maurice smiled.

During this conversation, the scene which Maurice had anticipated was passing on the other side.

The woman Tison approached the queen.

"Madame," said the queen, "your despair grieves me. I do not wish to deprive you of your daughter, — that would be too cruel; but pray consider, perhaps by doing what these men require, your child will be lost none the less."

"Do what they tell you!" cried the woman, — "do what they tell you!"

"But first, at least, hear what is the matter."

"What is the matter?" demanded the woman, with almost savage curiosity.

"Your daughter brought a friend with her."

"Yes, a work-woman like herself. She did not like to come alone, because of the soldiers."

"This friend committed a letter to your daughter; your daughter let it fall. Marie, who was passing, picked it up. It is, doubtless, a paper of no consequence, but still one upon which evil-minded people might put a bad construction. Did not the municipal just tell you, when they wish that they can always do so?"

"Well, go on."

"That is all; you wish me to give up this paper, — do you wish me to sacrifice a friend, without perhaps benefiting your daughter?"

"Do what they tell you!" shrieked the woman, — "do what they tell you!"

"But if this paper implicates your daughter," said the queen; "do try to understand."

"My daughter is, like myself, a good patriot," cried the hag. "Thank God, the Tisons are well known. Do what they tell you!"

"Good Heavens!" said the queen; "how can I make you understand?"

"My child, I want them to return me my child," cried Tison's wife, stamping her feet. "Give me the paper, Antoinette, give me the paper!"

"There it is, Madame," and the queen tendered a paper to the wretched creature, which she seized, and held joyfully above her head, crying, —

"Come here, come here, citizen municipals. I have the paper; take it, and give me back my child."

"You sacrifice our friends, sister," said Elizabeth.

"No, sister," replied the queen, mournfully; "I only sacrifice ourselves. The paper implicates no one."

At the cries of the woman Tison, Maurice and his colleague came toward her, when she immediately held out the paper to them. They opened it and read, —

"At L'Orient [the east] a friend still watches."

Maurice had no sooner cast his eyes on this paper than he started. The hand-writing seemed to him not unknown.

"My God!" cried he, "can it be that of Geneviève? But no, it is impossible; I am mad. It resembles hers, certainly; but what can Geneviève have to do with the queen?"

He turned round, and observed that Marie Antoinette was watching him attentively. As for the woman Tison, as she awaited her fate, she devoured Maurice with her eyes.

"You have done a good action," said he, to Tison's wife; "and you, Citizen, a great one," addressing the queen.

"Then, sir," replied Marie Antoinette, "follow my example. Burn the paper, and you will perform a charitable one."

"You are joking, Austrian," said Agricola. "Burn a paper that may perhaps enable us to discover a whole covey of aristocrats? Good faith! no; we are not quite such fools as that."

"Ah, yes! do burn it; it might compromise my daughter," implored the woman Tison.

"I believe you; your daughter and some others," said Agricola, taking the paper from the hands of Maurice, which the latter, had he been alone, would most certainly have destroyed.

Ten minutes afterward, the paper was deposited on the bureau of the members of the Commune. It was instantly opened and commented upon in various ways.

"'At L'Orient — a friend watches.' What the devil can that mean?" said one.

"Why," replied a geographer, "at Lorient, that is clear enough. Lorient is a little town of Brittany, situated between Vannes and Quimper. Egad! we ought to burn the town, if it be true that it shelters aristocrats who are watching still over the Austrian."

"It is all the more dangerous," said another, "because Lorient being a sea-port, they might establish communication with England."

"I propose," said a third, "that we send a committee to Lorient, and that a thorough search of the place be instituted."

This proposition made the minority smile, but was approved by the majority; they accordingly resolved that a committee be sent to Lorient to watch the aristocrats.

Maurice had been informed of the consultation.

"I think it may perhaps mean the East," said he; "but I am quite sure it is not in Brittany."

The next day the queen, who, as we have previously said, would no more enter the garden, to avoid passing the door of the apartment where her husband had been imprisoned, requested permission to ascend the tower to take the air, with her daughter and Madame Elizabeth. Her wish was instantly acceded to; but Maurice followed her, and mounting the stairs, ensconced himself behind a little turret where, concealed, he awaited the result of the letter of the preceding evening. The queen at first walked without manifesting any concern, with Madame Elizabeth and her daughter, then stopped, while the two princesses continued their promenade, and turning toward the "East," observed intently a house at the windows of which several persons were visible, one of whom held a white handkerchief.

Maurice, on his part, drew a telescope from his pocket, and while he adjusted it, the queen made a quick movement, as if to request those at the window to retire; but Maurice had already remarked the head of a man, with fair hair and pale complexion, whose salutation was so respectful as almost to border on humility. Behind this young man, for he appeared to be five, or six, and twenty years of age, stood a woman partially concealed from his view. Maurice directed his glass toward her, and thinking that he recognized Geneviève, inadvertently made a motion which brought him under the notice of the party. Immediately the female, who also held a telescope in her hand, drew back, dragging the young man away with her. Was it really Geneviève? Had she also recognized Maurice? Had this couple only retired at the signal given them by the queen? Maurice waited a moment to see if the young man and woman would reappear; but seeing the window remain unoccupied, he recommended the strictest vigilance to his colleague, Agricola, quickly descended the staircase, and went and concealed himself at the corner of the Rue Portefoin, to see if they came out of the house. It was in vain; no one appeared. He could not resist the suspicion which had entered his mind from the moment the companion of Tison's daughter had persisted in maintaining so obstinate a silence. Maurice directed his course toward the old Rue Saint Jacques, where he arrived, bewildered by the strangest suspicions, doubts, and fears. When he entered, Geneviève, attired in a white morning-dress, was seated under an arbor of jasmine, where she was accustomed to breakfast. She, as usual, accorded Maurice a friendly greeting, and invited him to take a cup of chocolate with her. Dixmer on his part, who had in the mean time arrived, expressed the greatest joy at meeting Maurice at this unwonted hour; but before he permitted Maurice to take the cup of chocolate he had accepted, always enthusiastically attached to his trade, he insisted that his friend the secretary to the section Lepelletier should come with him and see the manufactory.

On their way to the work-shops Dixmer, taking Maurice's arm and hurrying him along, observed, —

"My dear Maurice, I have important news for you."

"Political?" asked Maurice, always occupied with one idea.

"Ah! dear Citizen," said Dixmer, smiling, "do you think we trouble ourselves about politics? No, no; relating to our business, thank Heaven! My honored friend, Morand, who, as you know, is a celebrated chemist, has discovered the secret of staining morocco red in an unequalled manner, — that is to say, the color remains unalterable, — by a process never discovered till now. It is this color I want to show you. Besides, you will see Morand at work; he is quite an artist."

Maurice did not exactly comprehend how making a red dye constituted an artist; but nevertheless accompanied Dixmer across the tanyards, and in a separate sort of office saw the Citizen Morand at work. He had on his blue spectacles, was in his working-dress, and seemed entirely absorbed in the intensely interesting process of changing a sheep-skin from dirty white to purple. He had tucked up his sleeves, and his hands and arms were red to the elbow. As Dixmer remarked, he had devoted himself heart and soul to cochineal.

So entirely was he preoccupied that he merely moved his head to Maurice.

"Well, Citizen Morand," said Dixmer, "what say we?"

"We shall gain a hundred thousand francs yearly by this process alone; but I have not slept for eight days, and these acids have affected my sight."

Maurice left Dixmer with Morand and joined Geneviève as he said to himself, "It must be confessed the trade of municipal is degrading to the hero! About eight days in the Temple one might fancy one's self an aristocrat and denounce one's self. Honest Dixmer! Plodding Morand! Gentle Geneviève! And I, idiot that I was, to have suspected them for a moment!"

Geneviève awaited Maurice with a sweet smile calculated most effectually to dispel every vestige of suspicion. She was as usual sweet, amiable, and charming.

The hours passed in Geneviève's society were those only in which Maurice could be said really to exist. At all other times he was infected with that fever which might be termed the fever of '93, by which Paris was separated into two hostile camps, and existence rendered a perpetual combat. Toward noon, however, he had to part with Geneviève, and return to the Tower of the Temple.

At the end of Rue Sainte Avoie he met Lorin, who was bringing down his guard from duty. He left the ranks and came to meet Maurice, who still wore upon his countenance the impress of the happiness he had enjoyed in the society of the lovely Geneviève.

"Ah!" said Lorin, cordially shaking his friend by the hand, —

> "In vain you seek your anguish
> Within your heart to hide,
> I know for whom you languish,
> For whom so long you 've sighed;
> Within your heart, within your eyes,
> Love reigns, and triumphs in his prize."

Maurice put his hand in his pocket in search of his key. This was the method he adopted to put a stop to his friend's poetical vein. But Lorin saw the movement, and ran away, laughing. "Apropos," said he retracing his steps, "you have three days more at the Temple; I recommend poor little Capet to your care."

CHAPTER XII.

LOVE.

In fact Maurice for some time had experienced a strange medley of happiness and misery. It is always thus at the commencement of the tender passion. His daily occupation at the section Lepelletier, his evening visits to the old Rue Saint Jacques, and some occasional visits to the club of the Thermopyles, filled up his days.

He did not deceive himself. He well knew that to see Geneviève daily was to imbibe large draughts of a hopeless love.

Geneviève was a woman of retired manners and pleasing appearance, who would frankly tender her hand to a friend, and would innocently approach his face with her lips, with the confidence of a sister, and the ignorance of a vestal before whom the words of love appear as blasphemy.

Thus in the purest dreams that the first style of Raphael has traced upon the canvas is a Madonna with smiling lips, chaste eyes, and heavenly expression. This creation of the divine pupil of Perugino may help us to portray the likeness of Geneviève.

In the midst of flowers she imbibed their freshness and perfume; isolated from the occupation of her husband, and from her husband himself, she appeared to Maurice each time he saw her like a living enigma, of which he could not divine the meaning, and dared not ask it.

One evening when, as usual, he had remained alone with her, they were both seated at the same window by which he had entered, a few nights since, with so little ceremony; the perfume of the lilacs in full bloom floated upon the soft breeze that had succeeded the radiant sunset. After a long silence, Maurice, having during this silence followed the intelligent and holy eye of Geneviève as she watched the appearance of the stars in the azure vault of heaven, ventured to inquire concerning the great disparity between herself and husband. She so young, and he already past the middle age; she so refined in manner, while everything around announced him a man of inferior birth and education; she so sublime in her thoughts and aspirations, while her husband had not an idea beyond his manufactory.

"Here, at the abode of a master-tanner, are harp, piano, and drawings, which you acknowledge to be your own. How is it that here I meet with aristocracy which though I detest it in others, I adore in you?"

Geneviève fixed upon Maurice a look full of candor.

"Thanks," said she, "for this inquiry; it proves to me that you are a man of delicacy, and that you have not sought information concerning me from any one else."

"Never, Madame," said Maurice. "I have a devoted friend who would die for me; I have a hundred comrades ready to follow wherever I may lead them, — but among all these hearts, when a woman is concerned, and above all, such a woman as Geneviève, I know but one I would trust, and that one is my own."

"Thanks, Maurice," said the young woman, "I will myself tell you, then, all you desire to know."

"Your maiden name first," said Maurice. "I only know your married one at present."

Geneviève detected the selfishness of love in this question, and smiled.

"Genevieve du Treilly," said she.

Maurice repeated, "Geneviève du Treilly!"

"My family," continued Geneviève, "was ruined after the American war, in which both my father and elder brother had taken part."

"Gentlemen both?" said Maurice.

"No, no," said Geneviève, blushing.

"And yet you said your maiden name was Geneviève du Treilly."

"Frankly, Monsieur Maurice, my family was rich, but had no claim to nobility."

"You do not trust me," said the young man, smiling.

"Oh, yes! I do," replied Geneviève. "In America my father was connected with the father of Monsieur Morand. Monsieur Dixmer was managing man to Monsieur Morand. We were ruined, and Monsieur Morand, knowing that Monsieur Dixmer was a man of independent fortune, presented him to my father, who in his turn presented him to me. I saw that my father had beforehand resolved on my marriage. I understood it was the wish of my family. I did not love Monsieur Dixmer, neither had I ever loved any one, but I accepted him.

"I have now been Dixmer's wife for three years, and I am bound to say that he has proved to me so good and excellent a husband, that notwithstanding the difference of taste and the disparity of age you have remarked, I have never even for a moment experienced the slightest feeling of regret."

"But," said Maurice, "when you married Monsieur Dixmer he was not at the head of this manufactory."

"No, we lived at Blois. After the 10th of August Monsieur Dixmer purchased this house and the adjoining workshops; and that I might not be annoyed by the workmen, and to spare me the sight of many things repulsive to a person of my habits, — which are, as you observed, Maurice, a little aristocratic, — he gave me this pavilion, where I live alone, retired, gratifying my various fancies and desires, and happy when a friend like yourself, Maurice, comes either to distract or partake in my reveries."

And Geneviève tendered her hand to Maurice, which he ardently kissed. Geneviève blushed slightly.

"Now, my friend," said the young woman, drawing away her hand, "you know how I became the wife of Monsieur Dixmer."

"Yes," said Maurice, regarding Geneviève with great attention; "but you have not told me how Monsieur Morand came to be associated with your husband."

"Oh, that is very simple," said Geneviève. "Monsieur Dixmer had, as I have told you, some fortune, but still not sufficient to engage alone in a large concern like this. The son of Monsieur Morand, his protector, as I have already mentioned, — this friend of my father, you will remember, — provided half the funds, and as he possesses a good knowledge of chemistry, he devotes himself to various improvements with the energy you have remarked, and, thanks to which, the business of Monsieur Dixmer, who has charge of all the practical part, has extended immensely."

"Monsieur Morand is also a great friend of yours, is he not, Madame?" said Maurice.

"Monsieur Morand is a noble-hearted being, one of the worthiest men in existence," gravely replied Geneviève.

"If he has given you no other proofs," said Maurice, a little piqued at the importance accorded by Geneviève to the young man, the partner of her husband, "than dividing the expenses of this establishment with Monsieur Dixmer, and inventing a new dye for morocco, allow me to say that you rather over-rate his merits."

"He has given me many other proofs, sir," said Geneviève.

"He is young, is he not?" said Maurice. "His green spectacles render it difficult to tell his age."

"He is thirty-five."

"You have known him then a long time?"

"From infancy."

Maurice bit his lips; he had always suspected Morand loved Geneviève.

"Oh!" said Maurice, "that explains his familiarity with you."

"It seems to me, sir," said Geneviève, smiling, "that this familiarity, which is hardly even that of a friend, does not need any explanation."

"Oh, pardon me, Madame, you know all affectionate natures are jealous, and my friendship was jealous of that you appear to feel for Monsieur Morand."

He ceased talking. Geneviève also remained silent. Nothing further was said that day respecting Morand, and Maurice quitted Geneviève more than ever in love, for he was jealous.

However blinded the young man might be by his passion, whatever turmoil might be in his heart, there were in the recital of Geneviève many gaps, much hesitation, and many concealments, to which at the moment he had paid no attention, but which now returned to his memory and strangely tortured him. The feeling that there was some mystery about the family could not be dispelled even by the liberty allowed him by Dixmer of conversing with Geneviève as often and as long as he pleased, nor by the solitary interview they had together every evening. Moreover, Maurice had now become a constant and expected guest at the house, where he not only enjoyed unrestrained intercourse with Geneviève, who seemed guarded by her angelic purity from any advances on the part of the young man, but he now escorted her in all the excursions made from time to time in the quarter in which she lived. In the midst of this established intimacy one thing surprised him. The more he sought (perhaps the better to watch his sentiments for Geneviève) the friendship of Morand, by whose genius, notwithstanding his prejudice, he felt himself captivated, and whose pleasing manners won him more and more every day, the greater the inclination evinced by this whimsical man to avoid him. Of this he complained bitterly to Geneviève; for he did not doubt that Morand had discerned in him a rival, and that his conduct proceeded from jealousy.

"The Citizen Morand hates me," said he one day to Geneviève.

"You?" said Geneviève, with a look of astonishment. "You? — Monsieur Morand hates you?"

"Yes; I am sure of it."

"And why should he hate you?"

"Do you wish me to tell you?" cried Maurice.

"Certainly," replied Geneviève.

"Well, then, because I —"

Maurice stopped; he was going to say, "because I love you."

"I cannot tell you why," replied Maurice, coloring. The fierce Republican near Geneviève was as timid and as confused as a young girl.

Geneviève smiled.

"Say," replied she, "there is no sympathy between you, and I may perhaps believe you. You are of a sanguine temperament, have a brilliant intellect; and you are a man of birth and education, while Morand is a merchant grafted on a chemist. He is timid and retiring. It is this timidity that deters him from taking the first step toward your acquaintance."

"And who asks him to make the first advance toward me? I have made fifty to him, and he has never responded. No," continued Maurice, shaking his head; "that cannot be the reason."

"What is it, then?" said Geneviève.

Maurice chose to remain silent.

The day after this conversation with Geneviève, he visited her at two o'clock in the afternoon, and found her ready dressed to go out. "Welcome," said she, "you will act as my chevalier?"

"Where are we going, then?" demanded Maurice.

"I am going to Auteuil. The weather is delightful. I mean to walk part of the way. Our carriage will convey us to the barrier, where it will wait for us. We will then walk to Auteuil, and when I have finished my business there, we will return."

"Oh!" said Maurice, "what a delightful day you offer me!"

The two young people went on their journey. Beyond Passy the carriage put them down, and they continued their journey on foot.

On arriving at Auteuil, Geneviève stopped.

"Wait for me," said she, "at the entrance to the park; when I have finished I will rejoin you."

"Where are you going then?" demanded Maurice.

"To a friend's house."

"Where I cannot accompany you?"

Geneviève smilingly shook her head.

"Impossible!" said she.

Maurice bit his lips.

"Very well," said he; "I will wait."

"Ah! what?" said Geneviève.

"Nothing," replied Maurice. "Shall you be long?"

"If I had thought it would inconvenience you, Maurice, if I had known you were engaged," said Geneviève, "I would not have requested you to do me the slight favor to accompany me to-day. I might have asked —"

"Monsieur Morand," interrupted Maurice, sharply.

"No; you are aware Monsieur Morand is at the manufactory at Rambouillet, and does not return till this evening."

"Oh, it is to that circumstance that I owe the honor?"

"Maurice," said Geneviève, softly, "I cannot keep the person I came to see waiting; but if this puts you to the least inconvenience return to Paris, only send back the carriage for me."

"No, no, Madame," replied Maurice, quickly, "I am at your service." He bowed to Geneviève, who, sighing softly, proceeded on her way, and entered Auteuil.

Maurice went to the appointed place, and commenced walking backward and forward with long impatient strides, cutting off with his cane like Tarquin all the heads of the weeds, flowers, and thistles, which he found upon the road; and like all persons whose thoughts are preoccupied, he continued without pausing to trace and retrace his footsteps.

And what occupied his thoughts? The desire to know whether Geneviève loved him or not. Her manner to him was that of a friend or sister, but he felt this was no longer sufficient. He loved her with an entire love. She had become his sole thought by day, his constantly renewed dream by night. At one time, he only asked to see her again; nothing could satisfy him now but her love.

Geneviève was absent for an hour, which to him had appeared an age; he then saw her approaching him with a smile upon her lips. Maurice, on the contrary, went to meet her with a frowning brow.

Geneviève, smiling, took his arm.

"Here I am," said she; "pardon me, mon ami, for having made you wait."

Maurice only replied by a bow; and they then entered a shady lane, which, by a winding path, conducted them into the high-road.

It was one of those delicious evenings in spring when every plant sends its fragrance on high, when every bird, either seated on the branches, or skipping from spray to spray, warbles its songs of praise to God; one of those evenings that seem destined to live forever in our memory. Maurice was silent, Geneviève pensive. She fondled with one hand the flowers of a bouquet which she held in the other that rested on the arm of Maurice.

"What is the matter with you?" said he, all at once, to Geneviève; "and what makes you so sad to-day?"

Geneviève might have answered, My happiness. She regarded him tenderly.

"But you," said she, "are you not more than usually sad to-day?"

"I," said Maurice, "have reason to be sad, — I am unhappy; but you —"

"You unhappy?"

"Doubtless; do you not perceive sometimes from my tremulous tones how much I suffer? Does it not often happen, when I am talking with you or your husband, I am compelled suddenly to seek the air, because I feel as if my heart would burst?"

"But," demanded Geneviève, embarrassed, "to what do you attribute this suffering?"

"If I were an affected lady," said Maurice, attempting a laugh, "I should say it was a nervous attack."

"And at this moment do you suffer?"

"Much," said Maurice.

"Let us return, then."

"What, already, Madame?"

"Certainly."

"True," said the young man, "I forgot Monsieur Morand would return from Rambouillet this evening; and it is fast approaching." Geneviève looked at him reproachfully.

"Oh, again!" said she.

"Why then did you, the other day, favor me with so high a eulogium of Monsieur Morand? It is your own fault."

"How long is it since, to people we esteem," demanded Geneviève, "we may not express our real opinion of an estimable man?"

"It must be a very lively esteem to cause you to accelerate your pace, as you at this moment are doing, for fear of being too late by a few minutes."

"You are to-day absolutely unjust, Maurice. Have I not passed part of the day with you?"

"You are right; and I am indeed too exacting," replied Maurice, giving way to his impetuosity. "Let us return to meet Monsieur Morand."

Geneviève felt her displeasure pass from her mind to her heart.

"Yes," said she; "let us return to Monsieur Morand. He at least is a friend who never causes me the slightest pain."

"They are, indeed, valuable friends," said Maurice, choking with jealousy, "and I, for my part, should like a few such."

They were now upon the high-road; the horizon crimsoned as the departing rays of the setting sun glistened upon the gilt moldings of the dome of the Hôtel des Invalides. A star which on a previous evening had attracted the attention of Geneviève, sparkled in the azure of heaven. Geneviève quitted Maurice's arm with melancholy resignation.

"Why have you made me suffer?" said she.

"Ah!" said Maurice, "I am not so clever as some people, and do not know how to make myself loved."

"Maurice!" said Geneviève.

"Oh, Madame, if he is always good, always composed, it is because he does not suffer."

Geneviève again placed her white hand on the powerful arm of Maurice.

"I pray you," said she, in an altered tone, "to speak no more; to speak no more!"

"And why?"

"Because your voice makes me ill."

"You are displeased with everything about me, even my voice?"

"Be silent, I conjure you."

"I will obey you, Madame," and the impetuous young man passed his hand over his face, damp with perspiration.

Geneviève saw that he really suffered. People of Maurice's temperament have griefs of their own, little known or understood by the generality of mankind.

"You are my friend, Maurice, a precious friend," said Geneviève, looking at him kindly; "do not deprive me of your valuable friendship."

"Oh, you would not long regret it," said Maurice.

"You are mistaken," said Geneviève, "I should regret it very long, and forever."

"Geneviève! Geneviève!" cried Maurice, "have pity upon me."

Geneviève shuddered. It was the first time Maurice had uttered her name in these passionate accents.

"And now," continued Maurice, "since you have divined me, let me tell you all, Geneviève, for though you should kill me with a look, I have been silent too long; I will speak, Geneviève."

"Sir," said the young woman, "I have supplicated you in the name of our friendship to remain silent; I still pray you to do so, for my sake, if not for your own. Not another word; in the name of Heaven! not another word!"

"Friendship, friendship! if it be a friendship like this you profess for me, that you feel for Monsieur Morand, I wish for no more of your friendship, — I, Geneviève, require more than others."

"Enough," said Madame Dixmer, with the gesture of a queen, — "enough, Monsieur Lindey; here is our carriage, please to conduct me to my husband's house."

Maurice trembled with fever and emotion, when Geneviève, to rejoin the carriage, which indeed was only a few paces distant, placed her hand on his arm.

They both entered the carriage; Geneviève took the front seat, and Maurice the one opposite. They traversed Paris without either one or the other having uttered a word. Only, all the way, Geneviève had held her handkerchief before her eyes. When they entered the building, Dixmer was occupied in his counting-house, Morand had just returned from Rambouillet, and was changing his dress. Geneviève held out her hand to Maurice, as she entered her chamber.

"Adieu! Maurice, you have wished it."

Maurice said nothing, but walked directly to the mantel-piece, where hung a portrait of Geneviève. He ardently kissed it, pressed it to his heart, replaced it, and went out. Maurice reached home without knowing how he arrived there; he had passed through Paris without seeing anything, without hearing anything; all that had happened to him appeared like a dream; he was unable to account for his actions, his words, or the sentiments which had induced them. There are moments when the most serene spirits succumb under the violence of their own emotions.

It was, as we have said, rather a race than a return, on the part of Maurice. He undressed himself without the assistance of his valet-de-chambre, nor did he reply to his cook, who displayed his supper duly prepared for him, but taking the day's letters from the table, he read them all, one after the other, without comprehending a single word. The mists of jealousy, that intoxication of reason, were not yet dissipated. At ten o'clock Maurice mechanically sought his bed, as, indeed, he had done everything else since his parting with Geneviève.

If Maurice in his cooler moments had been told of this extraordinary behavior in another, he would not have been able to comprehend it, but would have considered him mad to have pursued this desperate conduct, totally unauthorized either by too much reserve or too much "abandon" on the part of Geneviève. He now only felt that a terrible blow had been dealt to all his hopes, of which he had never even to himself rendered an account, and upon which, vague as they were, reposed all his visions of happiness, — dreams which like an unseizable vapor floated shapelessly toward the horizon, and there disappeared. Thus it happened, as it nearly always does in such cases, that Maurice, stunned by this blow, dropped asleep directly he found himself in bed, where he remained free from all sentiment till the morrow. He was awakened by the noise of the official opening the door, who came as usual to unclose the windows which looked upon a large garden, and to bring some flowers.

At that time, in the year '93, much attention was paid to the culture of forced flowers, and Maurice dearly loved all flowers; but now without even bestowing a glance upon them, he half raised his heavy head, and supporting it on his hand, endeavored to recall the events of the preceding evening. Maurice asked himself, without being able to account for it, the cause of this mad folly. The sole cause was jealousy of Morand; but the moment was certainly ill-chosen to give vent to his jealousy of a man when this man was at Rambouillet, and while enjoying a tête-à-tête with the woman one loves, surrounded by the most enchanting scenery, on one of the lovely days of spring.

It was not suspicion of the inmates at the house at Auteuil, where Geneviève had remained an hour; no, the incessant torment of his life was the idea that Morand loved Geneviève, and yet — singular phantasy of the brain, strange combination of caprice — not a gesture, a look, not even a word from Dixmer's partner had afforded the slightest grounds for this belief.

The voice of the valet-de-chambre aroused him from this revery.

"Citizen," said he, showing him the open letters on the table, "have you selected those you wish to keep, or shall they all be burned?"

"Burn what?" said Maurice.

"The letters the Citizen read last night, before he retired to bed."

Maurice could not remember having read one.

"Burn all," said he.

"Here are to-day's letters, Citizen," said the official.

He presented a packet of letters to Maurice, and threw the others in the fire. Maurice took the letters, felt the impression of a seal, and fancied that he recognized the perfume of a friend, and looking over his correspondence he found a sealed envelope and hand-writing that made him tremble. This man, who bravely faced danger, trembled before the odor of a letter. The official approached him to inquire what was the matter, but Maurice signified a wish to be alone.

He turned and returned this letter; he felt a presentiment it contained misery for him, and started and trembled before unknown misfortune.

Having collected all his courage he at length opened it, and read as follows: —

CITIZEN MAURICE, — It has become necessary that we should burst these bonds — bonds which, on your side, affect to exceed the bounds of friendship. You are a man of honor, Citizen, and now that a night has passed since the occurrences of yesterday evening, you ought to comprehend that your presence at our house is no longer desirable. I leave it to you to excuse yourself in any way you think best to my husband. On the arrival this day of any letter from you to Monsieur Dixmer I shall be convinced that I have to regret the loss of a friend who has unfortunately been most imprudent, and whom all social propriety will deter me from meeting for the future. Adieu forever. GENEVIÈVE.

P. S. The bearer awaits your reply.

Maurice called; the valet-de-chambre reappeared.

"Who brought this letter?"

"A messenger."

"Is he waiting?"

"Yes."

Maurice did not sigh, did not for a moment hesitate, but, partly dressing, seated himself before his writing-desk, and taking the first sheet of paper that came to hand (he found it had on it the impression of a head with the name of the section), he wrote, —

"CITIZEN DIXMER, — I respected you, and I still do so; but I cannot visit you any longer."

Maurice considered what reason he could assign for not visiting Dixmer, and one idea alone presented itself to his mind, that which at this epoch would have occurred to any one. He thus continued, —

"Certain rumors are afloat relative to your lukewarmness in public affairs. I have no wish to accuse you, and no mission to defend you. Receive my respects, and feel assured your secrets will remain forever buried in my heart."

Maurice did not even revise this letter, written, as we have said, under the impression of the first idea that presented itself. He did not doubt the effect it would produce. Dixmer, an excellent patriot, as Maurice imagined from his conversation at least, would be much grieved at receiving it, his wife and Monsieur Morand would no doubt influence him not to reply, and forgetfulness would gradually spread itself like a dark veil over the happy past, transforming it into a dark and melancholy future. Maurice signed and sealed his letter, gave it to the official, and the messenger departed.

Then a heart-felt sigh escaped the Republican; he took his hat and gloves and proceeded to the section.

He hoped, poor Brutus, to recover his stoicism by occupying himself with public affairs.

Public affairs were indeed terrible; the 31st of May was preparing. The "Terreur,' which, like a torrent, precipitated itself from the height of the Montagne, endeavored to carry away the dike opposed to it by the Girondins, those audacious "Modéréts" who had dared to demand vengeance for the massacres of September, and to wrestle for an instant to save the life of the king.

While Maurice was working with an energy that drove the fever from his heart to his head, the messenger had re-entered the old Rue Saint Jacques, filling the dwelling there with terror and astonishment.

The letter, after passing through Geneviève's hands, was given by her to Dixmer.

Dixmer opened and read it, without at first understanding it; he then communicated the contents to the Citizen Morand, who, becoming as pale as death, supported his head upon his hand.

In the situation in which Dixmer, Morand, and their companions found themselves (a situation totally unknown to Maurice, but which our readers have penetrated) this letter was like a thunderbolt.

"Is this an upright, honest man?" asked Dixmer, in great distress.

"Yes," replied Morand, without the least hesitation.

"Never mind," said the advocate for extreme measures, "you see we were very wrong not to kill him."

"My friend," said Morand, "we struggle against violence, we brand it with the name of crime. We have acted rightly, whatever may be the result, in not assassinating this man. I repeat, I believe Maurice to possess a noble, generous spirit."

"Yes; but if so noble and generous a spirit belongs to this warm Republican, perhaps he may regard it in the light of a crime, if he has made any discovery, not to immolate his own honor, as they say, 'on the altar of his country.'"

"But," said Morand, "do you think he knows anything?"

"Do you not understand? He speaks of secrets buried in his heart.

"These secrets are evidently those confided to him by me relative to our contraband transactions. He knows no others."

"But," said Morand, "this interview at Auteuil? does he suspect anything? You know he accompanied your wife?"

"It was I who told Geneviève to take Maurice with her as a protector."

"Listen," said Morand, "we shall soon see if these surmises be true. The turn of our battalion to guard the Temple happens on the 2d of June, — that is to say in eight days. You are captain, Dixmer, and I lieutenant; if our battalion or even our company receives a counter-order, like that received the other day by the battalion of Buttes-des-Moulins, which Santerre has replaced by that of Gravilliers, all is discovered, and we have only to flee from Paris, or die fighting. But if all follows in the usual course of things —"

"We are lost all the same," replied Dixmer.

"How so?"

"Pardieu! does not all revolve upon the co-operation of this young municipal? Was it not he who, without knowing it, was to open the road for us to the queen?"

"That is true!" said Morand, confounded.

"You see, then," said Dixmer, knitting his brows, "that at any price we must renew our intimacy with this young man."

"But if he refuse, if he fear to compromise himself?"

"Listen!" said Dixmer, "I will question Geneviève; she saw him last, perhaps she may know something more."

"Dixmer," said Morand, "it is with pain I see you mixing Geneviève with all our plots; not that I fear any indiscretion on her part. O great God! the drama we are acting is a dreadful one, and I at once blush and tremble to place the head of a woman at stake."

"The head of a woman," said Dixmer, "weighs as heavily as that of a man, where stratagem, candor, and beauty can do as much and sometimes even more than force, strength, power, or courage. Geneviève shares in our convictions and our sympathies. Geneviève shall also share our fate."

"Well, my friend," said Morand, "I have said all I ought to say. Geneviève is in every way worthy of the mission you have given her, or rather, that she has taken upon herself. It is saints who become martyrs."

And he held out his delicate and effeminate hand to Dixmer, who roughly pressed it between his own. Then Dixmer, recommending Morand and his companions to watch with increased vigilance, quitted them, and entered Geneviève's apartments.

She was seated before a table, bending over a piece of embroidery. She turned round at the noise of the opening door, and recognized Dixmer.

"Ah! is it you, mon ami?" said she.

"Yes," said Dixmer, with a placid, smiling countenance. "I have received a letter from your friend Maurice, which I cannot understand in the least. Read it, and tell me what you think of it."

Geneviève took the letter with a hand of which (with all her self-command) she could not disguise the tremor, and read. Dixmer followed her eyes as they ran over every line.

"Well?" said he, when she had finished.

"Well! I think that Monsieur Maurice Lindey is an honest man, and from him we have nothing to fear," replied Geneviève, with the greatest calmness.

"You think he is ignorant who the persons are you visited at Auteuil?"

"I am certain that he is."

"Why then this sudden determination? Did he appear yesterday less friendly or more excited than usual?"

"No," said Geneviève; "I believe he was just the same."

"Consider well what you tell me, Geneviève, for you must understand your reply will greatly influence our future projects."

"Wait, then," said she, with an emotion that overthrew all her attempt at calmness. "Wait —"

"Well!" said Dixmer, all the muscles of his face slightly contracting; "collect your thoughts, Geneviève."

"Yes!" said the young woman, "yes, I remember, yesterday he was not particularly civil. Monsieur Maurice," continued she, "is a little tyrannical in his friendship, and," hesitatingly added, "sometimes we have quarrelled for whole weeks."

"This is then merely a quarrel?" demanded Dixmer.

"Most probably."

"Geneviève, understand this: in our position it is not probability that will suffice, it is certitude we require."

"Ah, well, dear, I am certain."

"This letter, then, can be only a pretext for not visiting us again?"

"Mon ami, how can you wish that I should speak to you about such things?"

"Speak, Geneviève, speak; of any other woman I would not ask it."

"It is a pretext," said Geneviève, looking down.

"Ah!" said Dixmer. Then after a moment's silence, placing upon his wife's chair the hand with which he had been striving to compress the beatings of his heart, —

"Will you do me a service?" said he.

"What service?" said Geneviève, turning around surprised.

"To prevent even the shadow of danger. Maurice is, perhaps, deeper in our secrets than we imagine. That which you believe a pretext may, perhaps, be a reality. Write him a line."

"I!" said Geneviève, starting.

"Yes, you. Tell him that you have opened the letter and desire an explanation. He will then call, you can interrogate him, and will easily discover what is the matter."

"Oh, no!" cried Geneviève, "I cannot do as you wish me; I will not do it."

"Dear Geneviève, when interests so powerful as those that rest upon us are at stake, will you recoil before any paltry consideration of self-love?"

"I have told you my opinion of Maurice, Monsieur," said Geneviève, "he is honest and brave, but capricious; and I do not choose to submit to any authority but that of my husband."

This answer, returned with so much calmness, and at the same time firmness, convinced Dixmer that to insist further at this moment would be worse than useless. He did not add another word, but looked at Geneviève without seeming to do so, wiped the perspiration from his forehead, and went out.

Morand was awaiting his return with great anxiety. Dixmer repeated word for word all that had been said.

"Well!" said Morand, "we will wait, and think no more about it; rather than I would cast a shadow of care on your wife, rather than wound her self-love, I would renounce —"

Dixmer placed his hand upon his shoulder.

"You are mad, sir," said he, looking at him steadily, "or else you do not know what you are saying."

"What! Dixmer, do you think —"

"I think, Chevalier, that you have no more self-command than I have, to give utterance to sentiments on the impulse of the moment. Neither you, I, nor Geneviève belong to ourselves, Morand. We are the chosen defenders of a certain cause, and this cause depends upon its supporters."

Morand trembled, and preserved a gloomy and thoughtful silence. They took several turns round the garden without exchanging a word. Then Dixmer left Morand.

"I have some orders to give," said he, in a calm voice. "I must leave you, Monsieur Morand."

Morand held out his hand to Dixmer, and looked after him as he turned away.

"Poor Dixmer," said he, "I fear much that in all this you risk the most."

Dixmer returned to the manufactory, and having issued several orders, looked over the day-book, and distributed bread and fuel to the poor of the section, went home, and changed his working dress for his walking costume immediately on his arrival there.

An hour afterward Maurice Lindey, while deeply engaged in his readings and allocutions, was interrupted by the voice of his official, whispering in his ear, —

"Citizen Lindey, some one who, so he pretends at least, has something of importance to say to you, is waiting at your house."

Maurice, on entering, was much surprised at meeting the master-tanner, who had there comfortably installed himself, and was turning over the newspapers. All the way along he had questioned the domestic, who, of course, not knowing Dixmer, could afford him no clew to his recognition.

On perceiving Dixmer, Maurice stopped at the threshold of the door, and blushed in spite of himself.

Dixmer smilingly arose, and held out his hand.

"What ails you? and what have you written to me?" he inquired of the young man. "Indeed, my dear Maurice, I feel it sensibly. You designate me as 'lukewarm and a false patriot.' Now as you dare not repeat these accusations to my face, acknowledge you wish to seek a quarrel with me."

"I will avow anything you please, my dear Dixmer, for your conduct to me has always been that of a worthy man; but I have nevertheless made a resolution, and that resolution is irrevocable."

"But how is that?" said Dixmer, "when according to your own confession you have nothing to reproach us with, and yet, notwithstanding, you leave us?"

"My dear Dixmer, believe me, acting as I now am, and depriving myself of such a friend, I must be actuated by powerful motives."

"Yes; but under any circumstances," said Dixmer, affecting to smile, "these reasons are not those you have written. What you have written to me is merely a subterfuge."

Maurice reflected an instant.

"Listen, Dixmer," said he; "we live in an epoch when a doubt conveyed in a letter can and must annoy you; this I can well understand. It would then be acting like a dishonorable man to allow you to remain in this state of inquietude. Yes, Dixmer, the reasons I gave you were not the true ones."

This avowal, which should have cleared the face of the merchant, only seemed the more to cloud it.

"But at least tell me the true motive," said Dixmer.

"I cannot tell you," said Maurice; "and yet I am certain if you knew it, you would afford me your approval."

Dixmer still continued to press him.

"Then you really wish to know it," said Maurice.

"Yes," replied Dixmer.

"Well, then," replied Maurice, who felt a sensation of relief as he approached the truth; "this is the truth. You have a young and beautiful wife, who is as virtuous as she is beautiful; yet Madame Dixmer's well-known character cannot prevent my frequent visits to your house from being misinterpreted."

Dixmer turned rather pale.

"Indeed!" said he. "Then, my dear Maurice, the husband should thank you for the wrong you do the friend?"

"Understand," said Maurice, "I have not the folly to suppose my presence can be dangerous to your repose, or that of your wife; but it might, perhaps, afford subject for calumny, and you are aware the more absurd the scandal, the easier it gains belief."

"Absurd!" said Dixmer, shrugging his shoulders.

"Absurd, as much as you please," said Maurice, "but separate, we shall not the less be good friends, for we shall have nothing to reproach ourselves with; while, on the contrary, if near —"

"Well! What then?"

"There would be food for scandal."

"Do you think, Maurice, that I should believe —"

"Oh, let us say no more," said the young man.

"But why did you write this instead of telling it to me, Maurice?"

"Just to avoid the scene of this moment."

"And are you vexed, Maurice, that I respected you sufficiently to demand an explanation?"

"No; on the contrary, I swear I am glad to have seen you once again before our final separation."

"Our final separation, Citizen! you whom we esteem so much!" taking Maurice's hand and pressing it between his own.

Maurice started.

"Morand," continued Dixmer, who failed not to notice this start, "Morand said to me again and again this morning, 'Do all in your power to bring back Maurice.'"

"Monsieur," said the young man, frowning and drawing away his hand, "I did not believe I stood very high in the estimation of Monsieur Morand."

"Do you doubt it?" said Dixmer.

"I!" replied Maurice, "I neither believe nor doubt it, and have no motive to inquire on the subject. When I went to your house it was to visit yourself and your wife, and not on account of Monsieur Morand."

"You do not know him, Maurice," said Dixmer; "Morand possesses a noble soul."

"I grant it," said Maurice, smiling bitterly.

"Let us, however, return to the object of my visit," continued Dixmer.

Maurice bowed, like a man who hears all, but has nothing more to say.

"You say, then, that these reports have already circulated?"

"Yes, Citizen."

"Well, then, let us speak frankly. Why should you pay any attention to the silly prattling of idle neighbors? Have you not your own clear conscience, Maurice; and Geneviève, has she not her sense of honor?"

"I am younger than you," said Maurice, who began to be astonished at this pertinacity, "and perhaps view things with more susceptibility. This is why I declare that on the reputation of such a woman as Geneviève a shadow even should not be permitted to be cast. Permit me, therefore, my dear Dixmer, to adhere to my former resolution."

"And now," said Dixmer, "since we are in order for confession, tell me one thing more."

"What!" said Maurice, coloring, "what more do you wish me to avow?"

"That it is neither politics, nor the report of your assiduity at my house, that induces you to leave us."

"What is it, then?"

"The secret you have discovered."

"What secret?" demanded Maurice, with so naïve an expression of curiosity, as completely to reassure the tanner.

"The secret of the smuggling affair, which you discovered the same evening when our acquaintance commenced in so strange a manner. You have never forgiven me this fraud, and accuse me of being a bad Republican because I employ English products in my manufactory."

"My dear Dixmer, I solemnly declare to you that when I visited at your house, I had totally forgotten I was in the house of a contrabandist."

"Truly?"

"Truly."

"You really, then, had no other reason for abandoning the house than that you have stated?"

"Upon my honor."

"Well," said Dixmer, rising and taking the young man's hand, "I hope you will re-consider this resolution which has been productive of pain to us all, and will again return to us as usual."

Maurice bowed, but made no reply, which was of course equivalent to a refusal. Dixmer left, annoyed at not having been able to re-establish an intimacy with this man whom certain circumstances had rendered not only useful to him but almost indispensable. Maurice was agitated by a variety of emotions of a contrary nature. Dixmer entreated him to return. Geneviève would pardon him. Why then should he despond? Lorin in his place would have selected a crowd of aphorisms from his favorite authors. But then he had Geneviève's letter, that formal dismissal, which he had carried with him to the section and placed near his heart; also the little word received from her the day after he had rescued her from the cowards who insulted her; and lastly, the obstinate jealousy entertained by the young man against the detestable Morand, the first cause of his rupture with Geneviève.

Maurice remained inflexible in his resolution. But it must be acknowledged the privation of his daily visits to the old Rue Saint Jacques formed a sad blank in his existence; and when the hour arrived at which he had been accustomed to pay his daily visit to the quarter Saint Victor, he fell into a profound fit of melancholy, and began, from that moment, to experience every aspect of hope and regret.

Each morning on awakening he expected to receive a letter from Dixmer, and acknowledged to himself that he who had so firmly resisted all personal persuasion, would now at last yield to a letter; each day he sallied out in hopes of meeting Geneviève, and, beforehand, had arranged a thousand means of accosting her; each evening he returned home in hopes of there finding that messenger who had one morning unwittingly brought him the grief which had now become his constant companion.

Often, in his hours of despair, his strong nature rebelled at the idea of enduring so much torture, without retaliating upon the primary cause of all his suffering and all his misery, Morand. Then he formed a project to go and seek some quarrel with Morand; but Dixmer's partner was so inoffensive and gentlemanly that to insult or provoke him would be a cowardly proceeding on the part of a Colossus like Maurice.

It was fortunate that Lorin came to distract the attention of Maurice from troubles which he obstinately concealed from his friend, though he did not deny to him their existence. Lorin had used every argument of theory and practice to secure to its country that heart overwhelmed in grief by another love. But although the political situation was grave, and although in another state of mind it might have dragged Maurice into the centre of the whirlpool, it could not restore to the young Republican that first activity which had distinguished him as a hero on the 14th of July and the 10th of August.

In fact, two systems, for the last ten months in view of each other, which thus far had only made some light attacks on each other, and had engaged in a few skirmishes as a prelude, now prepared to meet body to body, and it was evident that the struggle once begun would end fatally for one or the other. These two systems, born in the bosom of the Revolution itself, were those of Moderation, represented by the Girondins, — that is to say, by Brissot, Pétion, Vergniaud, Valazé, Lanjuinais, Barbaroux, etc., — and the Terror, or the Mountain, represented by Danton, Robespierre, Chénier, Fabre, Marat, Collot d'Herbois, Hébert, etc.

After the 10th of August, as after every action, the power appeared to pass into the hands of the Moderates. A ministry had been formed from the wreck of the former ministry, and of a new coalition. Roland, Servien, and Clavières, former ministers, had been recalled; Danton, Monge, and Le Brun had been nominated afresh. With one exception only, all these ministers belonged to the Moderate party. Of course when we say "Moderate" we speak relatively.

But the 10th of August had had its echo from afar, and the coalition hastened to march, not to the assistance of Louis XVI. personally, but of the royalist principle tottering at its basis. Then were heard the menacing words of Brunswick, and as a terrible realization, Longwy and Verdun had fallen into the power of the enemy. Then the Terrorist reaction had taken place; then Danton had dreams of the days of September, and had realized the bloody dream which displayed to the enemy all France as a scene of wholesale assassination, and ready to struggle for her precarious existence with all the energy of despair. September had saved France, but in saving her had rendered her lawless. France saved, and the Energetic party having become powerless, the Moderates regained some strength, and wished to recriminate those dreadful days. The words "murderer" and "assassin" had been uttered; a new name had even been added to the national vocabulary, — it was that of "Septembriseur."

Danton had bravely accepted it. Like Clovis he had for a moment inclined his head under the baptism of blood, only to raise it still more lofty and menacing. Another opportunity to renew the Terror presented itself; it was the process of the king. Violence and moderation entered, not altogether to wrestle against persons but principles. The trial of relative strength was made on the royal prisoner. Moderation was overcome, and the head of Louis XVI. fell upon the scaffold.

As the 10th of August, so the 21st of January had restored to the coalition all its energy. It was still the same man who opposed them, but not the same fortune. Dumouriez, arrested in his progress by the disorder of all the administrations, which prevented the succor of men or money from reaching him, declared against the Jacobins, whom he accused of causing this disorganization, adopted the party of the Girondins, and ruined them in declaring himself their friend.

Then the Vendée arose; the departments threatened; misfortune producing treason, and treason misfortune. The Jacobins accused the Moderates, and wished to strike their death-blow on the 10th of March, — that is to say, on the eventful evening when our story commenced. But too much precipitation on the part of their adversaries saved them, and perhaps also the rain which caused Pétion (that profound anatomist of the Parisian mind) to remark, —

"It rains! there will be nothing to-night."

But since the 10th of March everything threatened ruin to the Girondins. Marat was accused and acquitted. Robespierre and Danton were reconciled, at least as a lion and tiger are reconciled before killing the bull they both intend to devour; Henriot, the Septembriseur, nominated Commandant-General to the National Guard; everything presaged that awful day which would carry away by storm the last obstacle the Revolution opposed to the Terror.

Such were the great events in which under any other circumstances Maurice would have taken that active part for which his powerful nature and exalted patriotism so fully qualified him. But happily, or unhappily, for Maurice, neither the exhortations of Lorin, nor the terrible demonstrations on the streets, had been able to divert his mind from the one idea that possessed it; and when the 31st of May arrived, the fierce assailant of the Bastille and the Tuileries was laid upon his bed, devoured by that fever which destroys the strongest, and which nevertheless a word can dissipate, a look can heal.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE THIRTY-FIRST OF MAY.

DURING the morning of the 31st of May, when the tocsin and beat of drum had been sounding since the break of day, the battalion of the faubourg Saint Victor entered the Temple.

When all the usual formalities had been gone through, and the posts distributed, the municipals on service arrived, bringing with them four pieces of cannon in addition to those already forming the battery at the gate of the Temple.

At the same time Santerre arrived, with his epaulets of yellow wool, and a coat on which his patriotism was displayed by large spots of grease. He reviewed the battalion, which was in a prôper state, but on counting the municipals, found only three.

"Why are there only three municipals?" inquired he; "and who is the bad citizen who fails us?"

"The absent citizen, General, is not lukewarm," replied our old acquaintance, Agricola; "for it is the secretary of the section Lepelletier, the chief of the brave Thermopyles, the Citizen Maurice Lindey."

"Well, well," said Santerre, "I know as well as yourself the patriotism of the Citizen Maurice Lindey; but that will not deter me, if he is not here in five minutes, from inscribing his name in the list of the absent."

And Santerre passed on to other details.

A few paces from the general, at the moment he pronounced these words, a captain of chasseurs and a soldier had stationed themselves, one leaning against his gun, the other seated on a cannon.

"Did you hear?" said the captain to the soldier, in a low tone. "Maurice has not yet arrived."

"Yes; but rest assured he will arrive, unless there should be a riot."

"In case he should not come," said the captain, "I will place you sentinel on the staircase; and as she will probable ascend to the tower, you will be able to speak a word to her."

At this moment a man, evidently a municipal from his tricolored scarf, entered; but this man being a stranger to the captain and the chasseur, they both regarded him attentively.

"Citizen General," said the new-comer, addressing Santerre; "I request you to accept me in place of Citizen Maurice Lindey, who is ill. Here is the medical certificate; in eight days it will be my turn to mount guard. I now exchange with him; in eight days he will do duty for me, as to-day I will for him."

"Provided the Capets and Capettes live eight days longer," said one of the municipals.

Santerre replied by a slight smile to this pleasantry, and turning toward Maurice's proxy, —

"Very good," said he; "sign the register, in lieu of Maurice Lindey, and state in the column of observations the reason for this exchange."

The captain and chasseur exchanged looks of delight, mingled with astonishment.

"In eight days," said they.

"Captain Dixmer," cried Santerre, "take your position in the garden with your company."

"Come, Morand," said the captain to the chasseur his companion.

The drum sounded, and the company led by the master-tanner filed off in the direction prescribed. They piled arms, and the company divided into groups, which, according to their inclination, walked to and fro.

Their place of promenade was the same garden where, in the time of Louis XVI., the royal family came sometimes to take the air. This garden was naked, barren, and desolate, completely despoiled of trees, flowers, or verdure of any kind.

At about five-and-twenty paces, or perhaps rather nearer that portion of the wall built on the Rue Portefoin, was a species of cottage, which the foresight of the municipality had established for the convenience of the National Guard stationed at the Temple, who in days of riot, when they were not permitted to go out of the grounds, found it an accommodation to take their meals in this little cottage. The direction of this little alehouse had been a matter of contention, till at length concession was made in favor of an excellent patriot, the wife of a suburban killed on the 10th of August, who bore the name of Plumeau.

This little cabin, built of planks and mud, rose in the middle of a border, of which the bounds may still be recognized by a hedge of dwarf box-trees. It was composed of a single chamber, twelve feet square, under which extended a cave, the descent to which was by steps rudely cut in the earth itself. Here the Widow Plumeau stowed away her wine and provisions. This department was alternately managed by herself and daughter, a girl of twelve or fifteen years of age.

Hardly established at their bivouac, the National Guards separated, as we have said, some to saunter in the garden, while others chatted with the hostess. Some amused themselves by criticising the designs traced upon the walls, which were all meant to be of a patriotic character, — such as the king pendent with this inscription, "Monsieur Veto taking an air-bath;" or the king guillotined with this, "Monsieur Veto spitting in the sack;" while others were giving gastronomical orders to Madame Plumeau, according to the suggestions of their different appetites. Among the latter were the captain and the chasseur whom we have previously remarked.

"Ah, Captain Dixmer!" said the cantinière, "I have some famous Saumur wine."

"But, Citizen Plumeau, in my opinion, at least, the Saumur wine is nothing without Brie cheese," replied the captain, who, before he stated this opinion, had carefully looked round, and detected the absence of his favorite viand.

"Ah! Captain, it is true; but the last morsel has been consumed."

"Well," said the captain, "no Brie cheese, no Saumur wine for me; and remark, Citizen Plumeau, my order would have been of some amount, as I had intended to treat all my company."

"But, Captain, I ask you to wait only five minutes, and I will run and procure some at the house of the citizen concierge who competes with me, and who always has it. I shall pay very dear, and you, I am sure, are too good a patriot not to compensate me."

"Yes, yes," replied Dixmer; "and in the mean time we will go down into the vault, and select our own wines."

"Make yourself at home, Captain, pray do."

And the Widow Plumeau ran with all her might toward the lodge of the concierge, while the captain and chasseur, provided with a light, raised the trap-door, and descended into the cave.

"Good," said Morand, after an instant's inspection, "the cave extends in the direction of Rue Portefoin. It is nine or ten feet in depth, and there is no brickwork."

"What is the nature of the soil?" inquired Dixmer.

"Chalk; it is all made earth. These gardens have been turned over many times. There is nowhere any rock."

"Be quick," cried Dixmer, "I hear the clogs of our vivandière; take two bottles of wine and let us go up."

They both appeared at the trap-door as Madame Plumeau entered, carrying the cheese so strenuously insisted upon by Dixmer, while several chasseurs followed her, attracted by the favorable appearance of the said cheese.

Dixmer did the honors; he offered twenty bottles of wine to his company, while the Citizen Morand recounted the devotion of Curtius, the disinterestedness of Fabricius, and the patriotism of Brutus and Cassius, — histories almost as much appreciated as the Brie cheese and the Anjou wine offered by Dixmer, which is not saying a little.

Eleven o'olock struck. At half-past, the sentinels were relieved.

"Does not the Austrian generally take her walk from twelve to one?" asked Dixmer of Tison, who passed the cabin.

"From twelve to one, exactly," and he began to sing.

His song was received with a shout of laughter from the National Guard. Dixmer immediately summoned those men in his company whose duty it was to mount guard from half-past eleven o'clock till half-past one, told them to hasten their breakfast, and made Morand take arms, in order to place him, as had been agreed, on the highest story of the tower, in the same turret behind which Maurice was hidden the day he had intercepted the signs intended for the queen from the window in Rue Portefoin. If any one had noticed Morand at the moment he received this order, simple and expected as it was, he would have seen him grow pale beneath the masses of his long black hair.

Suddenly a dull noise shook the courts of the Temple, and sounds were heard in the distance like the roaring of a hurricane.

"What is that?" asked Dixmer of Tison.

"Oh!" replied the jailer, "it is nothing; some little uproar these rascally Brissotins are making before they go to the guillotine."

The noise became more and more threatening, the roar of artillery was heard, and a crowd of people rushed past, near the Temple, shouting, —

"Long live the Sections!" "Long live Henriot!" "Down with the Brissotins!" "Down with the Rolandists!" "Down with Madame Veto!"

"Good!" said Tison, clapping his hands, "I will go and open the door for Madame Veto, that without any disturbance she may enjoy the love the people evince for her."

He approached the wicket of the turret-keep.

"Holloa, Tison!" cried a formidable voice.

"Yes, General," replied he, stopping short.

"No egress to-day," said Santerre; "the prisoners are not to quit their chambers."

The order was peremptory.

"Good!" said Tison, "so much the less trouble."

Dixmer and Morand exchanged looks of disappointment; then waiting till the hour for duty had struck (though nothing could now be attempted), they both went to walk between the cabin and the wall running toward Rue Portefoin. Morand began to measure the distance, taking geometrical steps, — that is to say of three feet.

"What is the distance?" inquired Dixmer.

"Sixty to sixty-one feet," replied Morand.

"How many days will be required?"

Morand considered, then traced on the ground with a stick some geometrical signs, which he immediately effaced.

"Seven days at least," said he.

"Maurice will be on guard in eight days," murmured Dixmer. "It is, then, absolutely imperative that within eight days we should be reconciled to Maurice."

The half-hour struck; Morand, sighing, resumed his musket, and conducted by the corporal, went to relieve the sentinel who paraded the platform before the tower.

CHAPTER XIV.

DEVOTION.

THE day following these events, — that is to say the 1st of June, — at ten o'clock in the morning, Geneviève was seated in her accustomed place near the window. She asked herself why, for the last three weeks, the days for her rose so sad; why they passed so slowly; and lastly, why instead of waiting for the evening with impatience, she now dreaded its return.

Her nights above all were wretched, — those nights that used to be so happy; those nights passed in dreaming of the past and of the future.

At this moment her eyes fell upon a case of magnificent striped and crimson carnations, which since the winter she had removed from the little greenhouse where Maurice had been imprisoned, to bloom in her own apartment.

Maurice had taught her to cultivate them in the mahogany case in which they were inclosed; she had watered and trimmed them herself so long as Maurice had been there, for when he came in the evening she delighted to show him the progress, thanks to their united care, that the flowers had made during the night.

But since the cessation of Maurice's visits the poor carnations had been quite neglected, and for want of requisite care and attention the opening buds had withered, turned yellow, and fallen down outside the balustrade.

Geneviève comprehended, from this sight alone, the reason of her own melancholy. She said to herself, "It is with flowers as with certain friendships which we nourish and cultivate with ardor till they bloom in the heart, and then, in a moment, a suspicion, a caprice, an unkindness strikes at the root of this friendship, and the heart that it had revived again contracts, languishes, and dies." The young woman experienced a sensation of anguish. She examined her inmost thoughts; the sentiments she had endeavored to combat, and which she had hoped to conquer, she feared now more than ever would only die with her; then she felt a moment's despair, for she knew the struggle would become more and more impossible. She meekly bowed her head, imprinted a kiss upon the withered flowers, and wept.

Her husband entered at this moment. He, on his side, was too much preoccupied with his own thoughts to notice the trying ordeal through which his young wife was passing, nor did he pay the least attention to the tell-tale redness of her eyelids.

It is true Geneviève rose quickly to meet him, and in so doing turned her face from the window, standing in the dim light.

"Well?" said she.

"Well, nothing new; impossible to approach her, impossible to convey any message to her, impossible even to see her."

"What!" cried Geneviève, "with all the noise there has been in Paris?"

"It is this very uproar which has made the guard redouble their vigilance, from the fear that some might avail themselves of the general excitement to make an attempt on the Temple; and the very moment when her Majesty was about to walk upon the platform, an order was given by Santerre that neither the queen, Madame Royale, nor Madame Elizabeth should go out to-day."

"The poor chevalier! he must be sadly disappointed."

"He was in despair when he saw the chance had thus escaped us, and turned so pale that I had to drag him away lest he should betray himself."

"But," asked Geneviève, timidly, "was there not then at the Temple any municipal of your acquaintance?"

"There ought to have been one, but he did not come."

"Who?"

"The Citizen Maurice Lindey," said Dixmer, in a tone he endeavored to render indifferent.

"And why did he not come?" said Geneviève, in her turn making a similar effort at self-command.

"He was ill."

"He — ill?"

"Yes, and seriously so. Patriot as you know him to be, he was obliged to cede his turn to another."

"This is most unfortunate."

"But, goodness, Geneviève!" replied Dixmer, "if he had been there, as matters now stand, it might have been just the same. Unfriendly as we are at present, he might perhaps have even avoided speaking to me."

"I think," replied Geneviève, "you exaggerate the unpleasantness of our situation. Monsieur Maurice may have taken a whim not to come here; may have some futile reasons to see us no more, — but is not on that account our enemy. Coolness does not exclude politeness, and I am convinced on seeing you come to him, he would meet you half-way."

"Geneviève," replied Dixmer, "what we require from Maurice needs something more than politeness, — a firm and attached friendship. This feeling is destroyed; we have nothing further to hope from him."

And Dixmer heaved a deep sigh, while his usually placid face bore a troubled expression.

"But," said Geneviève, hesitatingly, "if you think that Monsieur Maurice is so necessary to your projects — "

"It amounts to this," replied Dixmer, "that I despair of being able to succeed without him."

"Well, then, why do you not try some new method to regain the Citizen Lindey?"

It seemed to her that in speaking of the young man by his surname, her voice sounded less tender than when she called him by his Christian name.

"No," replied Dixmer, shaking his head; "I have done all that I could. Any new proceeding would appear singular, and necessarily arouse his suspicions; and then, look you, Geneviève, I see further than you into this affair. Maurice feels deeply wounded."

"Wounded!" exclaimed Geneviève, greatly moved. "What would you say? Speak."

"You know as well as I do, Geneviève, that in our rupture with the Citizen Lindey there is more than caprice."

"To what then do you attribute this rupture?"

"To pride, perhaps," said Dixmer, quickly.

"To pride!"

"Yes; he did us honor, in his opinion at least, this good burgess of Paris, this demi-aristocrat of the gown, — concealing his susceptibilities under his patriotism; he conferred honor upon us, this Republican so powerful in his section, in his club, in his municipality, by according his friendship to a manufacturer of hides. Perhaps we have made too few advances; perhaps we have forgotten ourselves."

"If we had even been guilty in this respect, I think your last step would have redeemed all that," replied Geneviève.

"Yes; supposing the offence came from me; but if, on the contrary, it proceeded from you."

"From me! Do you imagine that I have in any way offended Monsieur Maurice?" said Geneviève, astonished.

"Who knows, with a person like him! Did you not yourself at first accuse him of caprice? I therefore return to my first opinion, Geneviève; you did very wrong not to write to him."

"I!" cried Geneviève; "do you think so?"

"Not only do I think so now, but have done so ever since this rupture of the last three weeks."

"And —" asked Geneviève, timidly.

"I look upon this step as indispensable."

"No, no! Dixmer; do not exact this of me."

"You know, Geneviève, I make no exactions of you; I only entreat you. Well, listen; I beseech you to write the Citizen Maurice."

"But —" said Geneviève.

"Hearken!" said Dixmer, interrupting her; "there is between you and Maurice either some serious cause of quarrel, — for, so far as I am concerned, he has had no reason to complain of my conduct toward him, — or some childish disagreement."

Geneviève made no reply.

"If this is merely a silly broil, it is folly to render it lasting; and if you have serious motives for quarrelling, situated as we are, you ought not even to value your dignity or self-respect. We must not place in the balance the quarrels of young people against objects of the highest interest. Make one effort; subdue your own feelings, and write one word only to Maurice Lindey, and he will return."

Geneviève reflected a moment.

"But," said she, "could we not find some means less compromising to renew friendly intercourse between Monsieur Maurice and yourself?"

"Compromising, do you call it? It appears to me, on the contrary, to be the most natural way possible."

"No; not for me, mon ami."

"You are very obstinate, Geneviève."

"Allow me to tell you it is the first time, at least, that you have discovered it."

Dixmer, who for some time had been crushing his handkerchief between his hands, now wiped the perspiration from his brow.

"Yes," said he; "and it is this that increases my astonishment."

"Good Heaven!" said Geneviève, "is it possible, Dixmer, that you do not divine the cause of my resistance, and that you wish to force me to speak?"

And overcome with contending emotions, her head sunk upon her breast, and her arms fell listlessly by her sides. Dixmer appeared to make a strenuous effort to command himself, took Geneviève's hand, compelled her to raise her head, looked into her eyes, and began to laugh; but in a manner so forced and unnatural, that had Geneviève been less agitated at the moment, it must have been evident even to her.

"I see how it is," said he; "you are in the right, and I was blind. With all your wit and distinction, my dear Geneviève, you have fallen into a vulgar notion, — you have been fearful that Maurice might fall in love with you."

Geneviève felt as if an icy chill had penetrated to her heart. This irony on the part of her husband, relative to Maurice's affection for her, — that love of which, from the knowledge she possessed of the character of the young man, she could estimate all the violence, and in which, though only acknowledged with deep remorse, she participated in the depths of her heart, — this irony petrified her. She felt it was utterly impossible to reply.

"I have guessed rightly, have I not?" said Dixmer. "Well, reassure yourself, Geneviève; I know Maurice to be a fierce Republican, whose heart contains no other love than love of country."

"Sir!" exclaimed Geneviève, "are you certain of what you say?"

"Eh, without doubt," replied Dixmer. "If Maurice loved you, instead of quarrelling with me he would redouble his attentions and civilities to one whom it was his interest to deceive. If Maurice loved you, he would not so easily renounce his title of 'friend of the family,' generally used to cover these intrigues."

"Do not, I beseech you," cried Geneviève, "make a jest of these things."

"I do not jest, Madame; I only tell you Maurice does not love you, that is all."

"And I — I," said Geneviève, "tell you that you are mistaken."

"In that case," replied Dixmer, "Maurice, who has had sufficient strength to tear himself away rather than make a cuckold of his host, is an honest man; and as such men are rare, Geneviève, one cannot do too much to reclaim them when lost. Geneviève, you will write to Maurice, will you not?"

"Oh, my God!" cried the young woman, letting her head fall on her hands, for he to whom she looked for support in a moment of danger had precipitated instead of restraining her fall.

Dixmer regarded her for a moment, then forcing a smile, —

"Come, darling," said he, "no woman's self-esteem. If Maurice wishes to recommence a declaration, laugh at the second as you did at the first. I know you, Geneviève, you are a worthy and noble woman. I can depend on you."

"Oh!" exclaimed the young woman, sinking on her knees, "how can one place confidence in others when one cannot place confidence in himself?"

Dixmer turned pale, as if all his blood had rushed back to his heart.

"Geneviève," said he, "I have done very wrong to cause you so much anguish of mind. I ought to have explained myself at once. Geneviève, we live at an epoch of self-sacrifice. I have devoted myself to the queen, our benefactress, — not only my arm, not only my head, but my happiness. Others will give her their lives; I do more than give her my life, — I risk my honor; and if that perishes, only one more tear will fall into the ocean of miseries which is preparing to swallow up France. But my honor runs no risk under the guardianship of such a woman as my Geneviève."

For the first time Dixmer had entirely revealed himself. Geneviève raised her head, and fixed her beautiful eyes, full of admiration, upon him; then slowly rose, and presented her forehead to him to kiss.

"You wish it?" said she.

Dixmer made a sign in the affirmative.

"Dictate, then," and she took up a pen.

"No; it is sufficient to use, not to abuse this worthy young man," said Dixmer; "and since he will be reconciled himself to us on receipt of a letter from Geneviève, this letter should be from Geneviève, and not from Monsieur Dixmer."

And Dixmer a second time kissed his wife's forehead, thanked her, and went out.

Then Geneviève tremblingly wrote, —

CITIZEN MAURICE, — You know how much my husband respects you. Have three weeks of separation, which to us have appeared an age, made you forget? Come, we await you; your return will be a real fête. GENEVIÈVE.

CHAPTER XV.

THE GODDESS REASON.

As Maurice had informed General Santerre the preceding evening, he was seriously ill.

While he kept his chamber, Lorin in his daily visits had made use of every argument to induce him to enter into some active pursuit calculated to divert his mind from its trouble; but Maurice continued obstinate. There are some maladies we do not desire to heal. On the 1st of June, Lorin came about one o'clock.

"Is there anything particular going on to-day," asked Maurice, "that you are so superb?"

Indeed, Lorin was splendidly attired. He wore the bonnet-rouge, the carmagnole, and the tricolored girdle ornamented with two instruments, then called the "cruets of the Abbé Maury," but which before and since have been plumply and plainly termed pistols.

"In the first place," said Lorin, "it is generally the breaking up of the ice of the Gironde which is in train, but by beat of drum. At this moment, for example, they are heating the bullets red on the Place du Carrousel; then, in particular, there is a grand solemnity to which I invite you the day after to-morrow."

"But what is there to-day? You came for me, you say?"

"Yes; to-day we have the rehearsal."

"What rehearsal?"

"Why, the rehearsal of this great solemnity."

"My dear fellow," said Maurice, "you know that it is now eight days since I last went out; consequently I am ignorant of everything, and therefore the more require to be fully informed."

"What! Have I not told you?"

"You have told me nothing."

"First, you already know, we had suppressed God for some time past, and have replaced him with the 'Supreme Being.'"

"Yes; I know all that."

"Well, it seems they have found out something; that the 'Supreme Being' was a Moderate, a Rolandist, and, in short, a Girondin."

"No jesting on sacred subjects, Lorin; you know I do not like it."

"What would you have, my boy? we must keep up with the age. I too like the ancient God well enough; first, because I was accustomed to him. As for the 'Supreme Being,' it appears he really has faults, and since he has been above yonder, everything has been playing at cross-purposes; at all events, our legislators have decreed his downfall."

Maurice shrugged his shoulders.

"Shrug your shoulders as much as you please," said Lorin; "but now we are going to worship the 'Goddess Reason.'"

"And are you engaged in all these masquerades?"

"Ah! mon ami, if you knew the Goddess Reason as I know her, you would be one of her warmest partisans. Listen; I wish you to know her, and will present you to her."

"A truce with all this folly. I am out of spirits, you well know."

"The very thing, then; she will enliven you; she is a nice girl. Ah! but you know the austere goddess whom the Parisians wish to crown with laurels, and drive about in a gilded paper-car! It is — guess."

"How can I guess?"

"It is Arthémise."

"Arthémise!" said Maurice, taxing his memory in vain to recollect the name.

"Yes; a tall brunette, with whom I formed an acquaintance last year at the Opera-ball; by the same token, you came to sup with us, and made her tipsy."

"Ah! yes," said Maurice, "I remember now. It is she, is it?"

"She has the best chance. I presented her to the concourse. All the Thermopyles have promised me their votes. In three days the general election will take place. To-day we enjoy the preparatory dinner, to-day we spill the wine of Champagne; perhaps after to-morrow we may spill blood! But let them spill what they like, Arthémise shall be goddess, or may the devil carry me away! Come, come, we will help her on with her tunic."

"Thanks; but I have always entertained a repugnance for things of this sort."

"To robe goddesses? Peste! old fellow, you are difficult to please. Let me see; if that does not suit you, I will put her tunic on, and you shall take it off."

"Lorin, I am ill, and not only out of spirits, but the gayety of others makes me miserable."

"Ah, that is it! You frighten me, Maurice; you no longer either laugh or fight. You surely are not engaged in any plot?"

"I? Would to God —"

"You mean, Would to the Goddess Reason!"

"Leave me, Lorin; I cannot, and will not, go out. I am in bed, and here let me rest in peace."

Lorin scratched his ear.

"Well," said he, "I see how it is."

"What do you see?"

"That you wait for the Goddess Reason."

"By Jove," cried Maurice, "witty friends are great bores. Go, or I shall load both you and your goddess with curses."

"Charge! charge!"

Maurice raised his hand to curse him, when he was interrupted by his official, who at this moment entered, bearing in his hand a letter for his brother citizen.

"Citizen Agesilaus," said Lorin, "you enter at an unfortunate moment. Your master was just going to be eloquent."

Maurice let fall his hand, which he listlessly extended for the letter; but the instant he touched it he started, and eagerly examining both the seal and handwriting, grew very pale in the anticipation of bad tidings, and broke the seal hastily.

"Oh, our interest is awakened at last," said Lorin, "it seems to me."

Maurice heard him not; his whole soul was merged in the four lines of Geneviève. He read and re-read them three or four times over; and then raising his head, gazed at Lorin like a man quite stupefied.

"The deuce!" said Lorin; "the intelligence must be wonderful indeed, which that letter contains."

Maurice read the letter for the fifth time; a hue of vermilion suffused his face, his eyes brightened, and a deep sigh relieved his breast; then forgetting at once his illness and attendant weakness, he leaped from his bed.

"My clothes!" cried he to the astonished official, — "my clothes, my dear Agesilaus. Oh, my poor Lorin — my good Lorin, I expected this every day, but in truth I did not hope for it. Here, my white trousers and frilled shirt; please dress my hair and shave me immediately."

The official hastened to execute Maurice's orders, and dressed and shaved him in a trice.

"Oh, I shall again behold her! I shall again behold her!" cried the young man, "Lorin, I never till this moment knew what happiness meant!"

"My poor Maurice," said Lorin, "I think you require the visit I recommended to you."

"Oh, my dear friend, pardon me; for truly reason has forsaken me."

"Then I offer you mine," said Lorin, laughing at his own execrable pun.

The most surprising thing was that Maurice laughed also. His present happiness had made him so cheerful.

This was not all. "Wait," said he, cutting some orange blossom from a tree in full bloom; "present this from me to the worthy Widow Mausole."

"A la bonne heure!" said Lorin; "in consideration of your gallantry, I pardon you. Then it appears to me you are absolutely in love, and I always feel profound respect for the unfortunate."

"Yes, I am in love," said Maurice, and his heart dilated with joy. "I am in love; and now, since she loves me, I may declare it; for since she has recalled me, must she not love me, Lorin?"

"Doubtless," complacently replied the adorer of the Goddess Reason; "but take care, Maurice, for the fashion in which you take this makes me fear for you."

"Bravo, bravo!" cried Maurice, clapping his hands; then taking to his heels, he descended the steps four at a time, and directed his steps toward the well-known old Rue Saint Jacques.

"He is worse than I thought him," said Lorin, in his turn descending the staircase in rather a calmer mood. Arthémise was not Geneviève.

Hardly had Lorin and his orange blossom arrived at the Rue Saint Honoré, when a crowd of young citizens, to whom he had been accustomed to administer either kicks or half-pence, according to his humor, respectfully followed him, — mistaking him, no doubt, for one of those virtuous individuals to whom Saint Just had proposed people should offer a white robe and a bunch of orange blossoms.

As the cortège every moment increased in numbers, — for even at this epoch a virtuous man was a rare sight to behold, — there were several thousand young citizens present when the bouquet was offered to Arthémise, a homage which made several other "Reasons" who had joined the ranks very ill with sick headache next day. It was on the same evening the famous distich was circulated through Paris, —

"Long life to Goddess Reason —
The pure, clear dawn of day."

And as it has come down to us without any knowledge of the author, — a fact which has exceedingly exercised the sagacity of revolutionary archæologists, — we have the audacity to affirm it was composed for the fair Arthémise by our poetical friend, Hyacinthe Lorin.

CHAPTER XVI.

THE PRODIGAL CHILD.

MAURICE could not have been quicker, had he even possessed wings. The streets were crowded, but Maurice only remarked the crowd as it retarded his course. It was said everywhere that the Convention was sitting; that the majesty of the people was offended through the representatives, whom they prevented from coming out; and of this there seemed some probability, as the ring of the tocsin was heard, and the thunder of the cannon sounding an alarm. But what at this moment, to Maurice, mattered either the tocsin or the cannon? What cared he. whether the deputies were or were not able to come out, when the prohibition did not extend to him? So he quickened his pace, that was all. While running, he pictured to himself Geneviève waiting at the little window overlooking the garden, in order to see him; and that she would perceive him far off; and then her smile, more than ever charming, would welcome him back again.

Dixmer also was no doubt informed of this happy return, and would tender him his coarse, large hand, so frank and loyal in its greeting. He loved Dixmer; now even his love almost extended to Morand with his black locks and his green spectacles, behind which he fancied he could see the glitter of his brilliant but saturnine eyes.

He loved the whole world, for he was happy, and would willingly have showered flowers on the heads of all mankind that they might be as happy as himself.

But for once he was deceived. Poor Maurice! he deceived himself, as a man generally does when he reckons according to his wishes.

Instead of the sweet smile awaiting Maurice, which was to receive him when he would be seen from afar, Geneviève had determined on meeting Maurice with the most distant politeness, — a feeble rampart with which to oppose the torrent that threatened to invade her heart. She had retired to her chamber on the first floor, and did not intend coming down till sent for.

Alas! she also deceived herself.

Dixmer alone was not deceived; he watched for Maurice through a wired lattice, and smiled ironically.

Morand was gravely occupied in dyeing black some tails which are placed on white cat-skin to imitate ermine.

Maurice pushed open the little door of the alley, to enter unceremoniously through the garden; as of old, the door opening rang a little bell which indicated the arrival of Maurice.

Geneviève, who had stationed herself behind the closed window, started, and let fall the curtain she had drawn on one side.

The first sensation experienced by Maurice on entering his friend's house was disappointment. Not only was Geneviève absent from the window on the ground-floor, but on entering the little salon where he had uttered his last adieu, he found her not, and was compelled to announce himself, as if an absence of three weeks' duration had transformed him into a stranger. His heart was oppressed.

It was Dixmer whom Maurice first saw. He came forward, and embraced him with exclamations of joy.

Geneviève then came down. She had tried in vain to restore some color to her pallid cheek; but before she had proceeded twenty steps the blood receded to her heart.

Maurice saw Geneviève appear in the shadow of the door; he advanced toward her smiling, intending to kiss her hand, and then only perceived how sadly she was changed. She on her part noticed with anxiety the attenuated frame of Maurice, and his fevered look of wild excitement.

"You are here then, sir," said she, in a voice whose emotion she could not subdue.

She had determined to address him with perfect indifference.

"Good-day, Citizen Maurice; why have your visits been so rare of late?"

This fickleness appeared more strange still to Maurice, and now what a shadow was cast upon all!

Dixmer cut short this examination, and put an end to all reciprocal reproaches by ordering dinner to be served; it was nearly two o'clock. They passed into the salle-à-manger, where Maurice saw a cover was placed for him. Then the Citizen Morand arrived, dressed in the same chestnut-colored coat and in the same waistcoat — he always wore his green spectacles — and white frilled shirt, and had the same long thick black hair. Maurice felt so well-disposed toward him that he wondered now when he had Morand before him that he should have ever felt the least concern about his rivalry at a distance. In short, what probability was there that Geneviève loved this little chemist? He was in love, and in consequence a fool to allow such folly to enter into his head.

Besides, the moment would have been badly chosen for jealousy. Maurice carried within his waistcoat pocket Geneviève's last letter, and his heart, bounding with joy, beat beneath it.

Geneviève had recovered her serenity. There is this peculiarity in the organization of women, that the present is able to efface all hues of the past, and distances all fears for the future.

Geneviève felt happy, having resumed her self-command: that is to say, she became calm and dignified, though still kind, — another shade which Maurice had not the requisite skill to comprehend. Lorin would have found the explanation in "Parny," in "Bertin," or the "Gentil Bernard."

The conversation turned upon the Goddess Reason. The fall of the Girondins, and the new mode of worship by which the kingdom of heaven had fallen to the lot of the distaff were the prevailing topics of the day. Dixmer pretended he should not have been sorry to see this unparalleled honor offered to Geneviève. Maurice felt inclined to laugh. Geneviève, however, concurred in the opinion of her husband, while Maurice regarded them both with astonishment, wondering that patriotism could so far mislead a sensible man like Dixmer and a woman of so poetical and refined a nature as Geneviève.

Morand developed the theory of female politicians. He cited Théroigne de Méricourt, the heroine of the 10th of August, and Madame Roland, the "Soul" of the Girondins. Then, en passant, he launched out against the "Tricoteuses." These words made Maurice smile. It was, however, a cruel joke against these female patriots that they were latterly termed "the female leeches of the guillotine."

"Ah! Citizen Maurice," said Dixmer, "we respect patriotism even when it is mistaken."

"As for me," said Maurice, "as far as I know of patriotism, I always find the women sufficiently good patriots, when not too high aristocrats."

"You are quite right," said Morand; "and as for myself, I frankly confess I consider a woman very contemptible when she affects the demeanor of a man, and a man a coward, unworthy of the name, when he insults a woman, even were she his bitterest enemy."

Morand was gradually drawing Maurice on to delicate ground. Maurice on his side replied by an affirmative sign. The lists being opened, Dixmer, like the sounding herald, added, —

"One moment, one moment, Citizen Morand; you except, I hope, those women who are known enemies of the nation?"

A silence of some moments succeeded this "parry and thrust" to the response of Morand and the sign of Maurice. Maurice first interrupted the silence.

"Let us except no one," said he, sadly; "those females who have been enemies to the nation are now, it appears to me, sufficiently punished."

"You allude to the prisoners of the Temple, — to the Austrian, the sister and daughter of Capet?" cried Dixmer, with a rapidity which deprived his words of all expression.

Morand changed color while awaiting the reply of the young Republican, seeming to sink his nails into his breast in the intensity of his interest.

"Just so," said Maurice, "it is of them I am speaking."

"Who?" said Morand, in stifled tones. "Is what they say, true?"

"What do they say?" demanded the young man.

"That the prisoners are cruelly maltreated, sometimes even by those whose duty it is to protect them."

"There are individuals," said Maurice, "who do not deserve the name of men. There are some cowards who, totally deficient in real courage, retain a desire to torture the vanquished in order to persuade themselves that they are the conquerors."

"You are not one of those men, Maurice, I am quite certain," said Geneviève.

"Madame," replied Maurice, "I who now speak to you mounted guard near the scaffold on which perished the late king. My drawn sabre in my hand, I was prepared to slay any one who attempted to rescue him. Notwithstanding, on his approach I removed my hat, and turning toward my men said, —

"'Citizens, I here warn you that I shall run my sword through the body of the first man that insults the king.'

"And I defy any one to assert that a single shout was heard to proceed from my company. From my hand first emanated those ten thousand placards affixed to the walls of Paris after the king's return from Varennes, —

"'Whoever acknowledges the king shall be flogged. Whoever insults the king shall be hanged.'

"Well," continued Maurice, without noticing the deep impression his words had produced on his listeners, — "well, I have proved to you that I am a frank, good patriot, that I hate all kings and their partisans. Yet I declare, notwithstanding my opinion, which is nothing short of a firm conviction, that, notwithstanding the certainty I feel that the Austrian is in a great measure the cause of the miseries that desolate France, never, never shall any man, — let him be who he may, even Santerre himself, — insult the ex-queen in my presence."

"Citizen," said Dixmer, shaking his head as if he disapproved of so much hardihood, "are you aware you ought to be very sure of us before you make such declarations in our presence?"

"I make them before you, and would do so before all the world, Dixmer; and I will add, she may perhaps perish on the same scaffold as her husband, but I am not one to fear a woman; on the contrary, I have a kindly regard for all those who are weaker than myself."

"And the queen, Monsieur Maurice?" demanded Geneviève, timidly; "has she sometimes evinced her sense of this delicacy, to which she is so little accustomed?"

"The prisoner has thanked me several times for my consideration for her, Madame."

"Then she must expect your turn to guard with pleasure?"

"I believe she does, Madame," replied Maurice.

"Then," said Morand, tremulous as a woman, "since you have confessed what no one nowadays confesses, — that you have a generous heart, — you will not surely persecute the children either?"

"I!" said Maurice; "ask the infamous Simon the weight of the arm of the municipal before whom he had the audacity to beat the little Capet."

This answer produced a spontaneous movement at Dixmer's table. All the guests rose respectfully; Maurice alone remained seated, and had not the slightest idea that he had elicited this mark of admiration.

"Why, what on earth is the matter?" said he, astonished.

"I thought some one called from the manufactory," said Dixmer.

"No," said Geneviève; "at first I thought so too; but we are mistaken." And all resumed their seats.

"Ah! it is you then, Citizen Maurice," said Morand, in a tremulous voice, "who are the municipal so much talked about, and who so nobly defended a child."

"Talked about?" said Maurice, with the utmost naïveté.

"Yours is a noble heart," said Morand, rising from the table. That he might give way to his feelings, he retired to the manufactory, as if some pressing business there awaited him.

"Yes, Citizen," replied Dixmer; "they do speak about it, and it should be said that all those possessed of brave, generous hearts applaud without knowing you."

"And let him remain unknown," said Geneviève. "The glory he would acquire would be replete with danger."

Thus in this singular conversation, without knowing it, each had contributed his word of heroism, devotion, and sensibility. There had been love and admiration which could not be expressed in words.

CHAPTER XVII.

THE MINERS.

At the moment they left the table, Dixmer was told that his notary awaited him in his study. He excused himself to Maurice; besides, he was accustomed to leave him thus, and proceeded to attend his man of business.

He was negotiating for the purchase of a small house, Rue de la Corderie, facing the garden of the Temple. It was rather, as to the rest, a lot than a house that Dixmer was purchasing, for the present building was in a state of dilapidation; but it was his intention to rebuild it.

The bargain had not been delayed with the proprietor; that same morning the notary had seen him and agreed to pay 19,500 francs. He therefore brought the agreement for signature, and came to receive the requisite money for the purchase, as the proprietor would that day clear out the building that the workmen might commence operations on the morrow.

The contract signed, Dixmer and Morand accompanied the notary to the Rue de la Corderie, to view this new acquisition; for they had purchased without seeing it.

It was a house situated near where No. 20 now stands, — three stories in height, and surmounted by a curved roof. The lower part at one time had been let to a wine-merchant, and contained some most excellent cellarage.

The proprietor, above all things, vaunted his cellars; they were the best part of the house. Dixmer and Morand appeared to attach very little interest to these cellars, yet both, as if from mere politeness, descended with the proprietor into what he called his vaults.

An exception to the general rule, he had not exaggerated. The cellars were magnificent; one of them extended under the Rue de la Corderie, and from this cellar they could hear the carriages roll over their heads.

Dixmer and Morand did not appear to appreciate this advantage. They even spoke of filling them up, observing that however convenient they might be to a wine-merchant, they became perfectly useless to honest burgesses, who intended to occupy the whole of the house.

After the cellars they visited the first, second, and third story; from the third they completely over-looked the garden of the Temple. It was, as usual, invaded by the National Guard, who enjoyed this privilege, since the queen never walked there now.

Dixmer and Morand recognized their friend, the Widow Plumeau, with her usual activity, doing the honors of her tavern; but doubtless their anxiety to be in their turn remembered by her was not very great, as they kept themselves concealed behind the proprietor, while he expatiated on the advantages of this view, at once so varied and agreeable.

The purchaser then wished to see the attics.

The proprietor, doubtless, was unprepared for this demand, since he had not got the key; but soothed by the bundle of bills shown him, he descended to search for it.

"I was not deceived," said Morand, "and this house will answer our purpose exactly."

"And what do you say to the vaults?"

"That it is an interposition of Providence, which will spare us two days' labor at least."

"Do you think that it is in the direction of the cantine?"

"It inclines a little to the left; but that is of no consequence."

"But," said Dixmer, "how will you be able to follow your subterranean line with the certainty of its terminating where you wish?"

"Rest assured," said Morand; "that is my affair."

"If we were every day to give a signal from here that we are watching?"

"But from the platform the queen could not see it; for the attics alone are as high as the platform, and I am doubtful even about them."

"Never mind," said Dixmer, "either Maury or Toulan may see it from some opening, and they will inform the queen."

And Dixmer tied several knots in a white calico curtain, passing it backward and forward before the window as if shaken by the wind.

Then both, as if impatient to visit the roof, awaited the proprietor's return on the staircase, having first closed the door, not wishing to afford the worthy man a sight of his waving curtain.

The garrets, as Morand had foreseen, did not reach the height of the summit of the tower. This was at once an advantage and disadvantage, — a disadvantage, because they could not communicate by signs with the queen; and an advantage, because the very impracticability alone disarmed all suspicion. The highest houses were naturally the objects of the strictest surveillance.

"It is necessary, either by means of Toulan, Maury, or Tison's daughter, to find some way to tell her to keep upon the watch," murmured Dixmer.

"I have thought of that," said Morand.

They descended; the notary waited in the salon with the contract signed.

"It is all right," said Dixmer; "the house suits me; so hand over to the proprietor the sum of 19,500 francs in payment, and let him give a receipt."

The proprietor did so, first scrupulously counting the money.

"You understand, Citizen," said Dixmer, "the principal clause, that the house must be vacated this evening; that, in short, I must put the workmen in to-morrow."

"Well, Citizen, I agree to do so. You can take the keys this evening at eight o'clock; all will be free."

"Pardon me," said Dixmer, "but did you not tell me, Citizen Notary, there was a way out leading into the Rue Portefoin?"

"Yes, Citizen," said the proprietor; "but I had it closed; for having only one official, the poor devil had too much fatigue, being obliged to watch both doors. But it is so built up that at any time it can be reopened in two hours at least. Would you wish to convince yourselves, citizens?"

"Thanks, it is not necessary," said Dixmer, "I attach no importance to this way out; it is useless to me."

They then both left, having for the third time reminded the landlord of his promise that the apartments should be empty at eight o'clock that evening.

At nine o'clock they both returned, followed by five or six men at a distance, of whom, in the confusion then reigning in Paris, no one took any notice. They both entered first. The landlord had kept his word; the house was totally empty.

They closed the shutters with the greatest care, and with the aid of a tinder-box, lighted some wax candles which Morand had taken in his pocket.

Then one after another the six men entered. These were the ordinary guests of the master-tanner, the same contrabandists who one evening wished to kill Maurice, but had now become his friends.

They closed the doors, and descended into the vault.

This vault, so contemptuously treated during the day, had become at night the most important part of the house.

Having first stopped up every crevice through which a curious eye might penetrate to the interior, Morand placed a cask upright, and began to trace with a crayon geometrical lines upon a piece of paper.

While he was thus engaged, his companions, conducted by Dixmer, left the house, following the Rue de la Corderie, and at the corner of the Rue de Beauce stopped before a covered carriage. In this carriage was a man who silently distributed to each one the instrument of a pioneer, — to one a spade, to another a mattock, to this one a lever, to that a pickaxe ; each man concealed his tool under his overcoat, or mantle. The miners retraced the road to the small house, and the carriage disappeared.

Morand had finished his calculation.

He went straight to an angle of the cave.

" There," said he, " dig ! "

And the work of deliverance immediately commenced.

The situation of the unhappy prisoners in the Temple became daily more serious and hourly more wretched. For an instant the queen, Madame Elizabeth, and Madame Royale had indulged some hope. The municipals Toulan and Lepître, touched with compassion for the august prisoners, had evinced some interest in them. At first little habituated to the marks of sympathy, the poor women were suspicious ; but suspicion ceases to exist where there is hope. Besides, what now could happen to the queen, separated from her son by a prison, from her husband by death. To follow him to the scaffold, — this idea had possessed her for some time, and she had now become accustomed to it.

The first time Toulan and Lepître returned on guard, the queen particularly requested, if they really felt any interest in her misfortunes, they would describe to her the last moments of the king. This was putting their sympathy to a sad test. Lepître had assisted at the execution; he obeyed the order of the queen.

The queen demanded the journals containing the report of the execution. Lepître promised to bring them when next on guard; it would be his turn again in three weeks. In the king's time they had at the Temple four municipals; the king dead, they had only three, — one to watch during the day, two during the night. Toulan and Lepître invented a stratagem, that they might always keep watch together at night.

The hours of guard were drawn by lot; they wrote on one ballot "day," on two others "night." Each drew his ballot from a hat, and chance decided the night-watch.

Every time that Toulan and Lepître were on guard they wrote "day" on three ballots, and presented the hat to the municipal they wished to oust, and he, thrusting his hand into the improvised urn, necessarily drew forth a ballot on which was inscribed "day." They then destroyed the other two, murmuring against the hazard which always decreed them the most wearisome watch of the two, — that is to say, the night.

When the queen was sure of her guards she corresponded with the Chevalier de Maison-Rouge. Then an escape was attempted, but the attempt was detected. The queen and Madame Elizabeth were to flee disguised as municipal officers, with cards that would be provided for them. As to the two children, — that is to say, Madame Royale and the young dauphin, — they had remarked that the man who came to light the lamps of the Temple was always accompanied by two children, of the same age apparently as the Princess Royale and the dauphin. It was therefore arranged that Turgy, of whom we have previously spoken, should dress himself as the lamplighter, and carry away the prince and princess.

We will mention in a few words who Turgy was.

Turgy was an old waiter of the king's, introduced at the Temple with part of the family from the Tuileries, for the king had at first been permitted a well-appointed table. The first month this consideration cost the nation thirty or forty thousand francs.

It may easily be understood this prodigality could not last. The Commune decreed otherwise. They dismissed the chiefs, the cooks, and scullions; one single manservant only was retained, — that man was Turgy.

He was naturally the medium of communication between the prisoners and their partisans, for Turgy was permitted to go out, and consequently was enabled to forward their letters, and introduce the replies. These billets were generally twisted round the stoppers of the carafes containing the milk of almonds brought to the queen and Madame Elizabeth. They were written with lemon-juice, and perfectly illegible till held near the fire.

All was prepared for the escape, when one day Tison lighted his pipe with the paper-stopper of a carafe. As the paper burned, the writing became visible. He instantly extinguished the half-burned paper, and carried the remaining fragment to the Council of the Temple, when, being held near the fire, they could only read a few disjointed words, the other part being burned to ashes. But they recognized the handwriting of the queen. Tison, being questioned, mentioned some slight marks of attention and sympathy he fancied he had observed on the part of Lepître and Toulan toward the prisoners. The two guards were immediately denounced to the municipality, and allowed no more to enter the Temple.

Turgy remained.

But suspicion was now excited to the highest degree. He was never left a single moment alone with the princesses. All communication with the exterior was now utterly impossible.

Madame Elizabeth had nevertheless one day given Turgy a little gold knife to clean, with which she used to cut fruit. Turgy suspected something, and when wiping the knife drew off the handle, and in the handle found a letter.

This letter contained an alphabet of signs.

He returned the knife to Madame Elizabeth; but a municipal then present prevented him, and in his turn securing the knife, took the blade and handle apart; but fortunately the letter was no longer there. The municipal nevertheless confiscated the knife.

It was at that time the indefatigable Chevalier de Maison-Rouge meditated this second attempt, which they intended to carry into execution by means of the house which Dixmer had purchased.

The prisoners, however, had by degrees lost all hope. That day the queen, terrified by the noise in the streets which reached her ears, and learning from these cries they were debating the accusation of the Girondins, the last supporters of moderation, felt dreadfully depressed. The Girondins dead, the royal family lost their only defence in the Convention.

At seven o'clock the supper was served. The municipals examined every plate as usual, unfolded each napkin successively, searched the bread, the one with a fork, the other with his fingers, and concluded by breaking into pieces the macaroons and walnuts, for fear any letter should reach the prisoners. These precautions being concluded, the royal family were invited to their meal in these simple words: —

"Widow of Capet, you may eat."

The queen shook her head, signifying she was not hungry. But at this moment Madame Royale advanced, as if to embrace her mother, and whispered, —

"Seat yourself at table, Madame. I fancied Turgy made a sign."

The queen, tremblingly, raised her head. Turgy was opposite to her. The napkin laid over his left arm, and with his right hand he touched his eye.

She immediately rose, without any further objection, and resumed her usual place at table.

The two municipals assisted at the meal, being strictly prohibited from leaving the princesses alone for an instant with Turgy.

The feet of the queen and Madame Elizabeth met, and pressed each other under the table.

As the queen was seated opposite Turgy, not one of his gestures escaped her notice; besides, they were all so natural that they neither could nor did inspire the municipals with any suspicion whatever.

At the removal of the supper the same precautions were used as before; the smallest pieces of bread were taken up and examined. After which, Turgy went out first, the two municipals following; the woman Tison remained.

This woman had become ferocious since her separation from her daughter, of whose fate she was totally ignorant. Every time the queen lavished a caress on Madame Royale, it threw her into an excess of rage almost bordering on frenzy; so much so, that the queen, who so well understood the griefs of a mother, often denied herself this consolation — now, alas! the only one left her — of pressing her daughter to her heart.

Tison came now to seek for his wife, who at first declared she would not leave till Widow Capet was in bed.

Madame Elizabeth then wished the queen good-night, and entered her chamber.

The queen and princess having also retired, Tison's wife took the candle and went out.

The municipals had already thrown themselves upon their beds in the corridor.

The moon, pale visitant of the unhappy princesses, shone through the window of the roof, casting her rays across the foot of the queen's bed.

For an instant everything remained calm and silent in the chamber.

Then a door turned softly on its hinges, a shadow passed through the rays of the moon, and approached the queen, — it was Madame Elizabeth.

"Did you notice?" said she, in a whisper.

"Yes," replied the queen.

"And you understood?"

"So well that I dare not believe it."

"Let us see; repeat the signs."

"First, then, he touched his eye to indicate he had some news for us; then he passed his napkin from his left to his right, which meant that they were occupied in our deliverance. Then he put his hand to his face, to signify that the expected aid would reach us from the interior, and not from a stranger; then when you asked him not to forget the milk of almonds to-morrow, he made two knots in his pocket-handkerchief. Thus it is again the Chevalier de Maison-Rouge, — noble-hearted man that he is."

"It is he," said Madame Elizabeth.

"Are you asleep, my child?" demanded the queen.

"No, ma mère," replied Madame Royale.

"Then pray for you know whom."

Madame Elizabeth quietly regained her chamber, and for some minutes during the silence of the night the soft, sweet voice of the youthful princess might be heard addressing her prayer to God. It was at that moment, at a signal from Morand, the first stroke of the pick-axe sounded in the small house at Rue de la Corderie.

CHAPTER XVIII.

CLOUDS.

ASIDE from the intoxication of renewed visits, Maurice was certainly much disappointed at the reception of Geneviève, and reckoned upon solitary interviews to regain the road he had lost, or seemed to have lost, in her affections.

But Geneviève had wisely arranged her plan, and did not intend to allow him an opportunity for a tête-à-tête, being conscious of their danger even from the happiness they afforded her.

Maurice trusted to the morrow. A kinswoman of Geneviève's, no doubt previously invited, came to call upon her, and Geneviève had retained her. This time there was nothing to be said; it could not be the fault of Geneviève. When leaving, Maurice was requested to escort this relation to Rue des Fossés Saint Victor, where she resided. Maurice went away pouting, but Geneviève smiled, and he construed this smile into a promise.

Alas! Maurice deceived himself. The next day, the 2d of June, that terrible day that witnessed the downfall of the Girondins, Maurice dismissed his friend Lorin, who absolutely wished to carry him off to the Convention, and put everything aside that he might visit his fair friend. The Goddess of Liberty had a frightful rival in Geneviève.

Maurice found Geneviève in her little salon, all grace and amiability, but near her was a young femme-de- chambre with the tricolored cockade, engaged in marking pocket-handkerchiefs in the corner of the window, who never left her place.

Maurice knitted his brows, and Geneviève, perceiving he was not in the best temper possible, redoubled her assiduities; but since her amiability was not carried so far as to dismiss the young official, he impatiently left an hour earlier than usual.

All this might have perhaps happened by chance. Maurice took patience. The political situation, besides, was so terrible that long as it was since he had interested himself in public affairs, the report reached even him. It required nothing less than the downfall of a party who had reigned in France for ten months to withdraw his attention from his all-engrossing passion for Geneviève.

The next day witnessed the same management on the part of Geneviève, and Maurice, having foreseen this, had arranged his plan. So ten minutes after his arrival, seeing that the young woman, having finished marking a dozen pocket-handkerchiefs, commenced six dozen of table napkins, Maurice, we say, drew out his watch, rose, bowed to Geneviève, and went out without saying one word.

Still more, as he left, he did not even once look back.

Geneviève, who had risen to watch him across the garden, remained an instant speechless, pale, and trembling, then dropped into her chair, thunderstruck at the effect of her diplomacy.

At this moment Dixmer entered.

"Maurice gone?" said he, with astonishment.

"Yes," stammered Geneviève.

"But he had only just arrived."

"He was here a quarter of an hour, or nearly so."

"Then he will return?"

"I much doubt it."

"Leave us, Muguet [lily of the valley]," said Dixmer.

The femme-de-chambre had assumed the name of the flower from hatred to her baptismal name of Marie, which was unfortunately that of the Austrian.

She rose at the command of her master, and quitted the room.

"Well, dear Geneviève," said Dixmer, "is peace restored between you and Maurice?"

"On the contrary, I think we are cooler than ever."

"And this time, who is to blame?" said Dixmer.

"Maurice, without the slightest doubt."

"Permit me to judge."

"What!" said Geneviève, blushing, "you cannot guess —"

"Why he is angry? No."

"It seems to me, it is some whim about Muguet."

"Bah! truly; then you must send the girl away. I will not deprive myself of a friend like Maurice for the sake of a femme-de-chambre."

"Oh!" said Geneviève, "he is not, I think, so angry as to require her to be sent away; it will suffice to —"

"What?"

"To exile her from my chamber."

"And Maurice is right," said Dixmer; "it is you he comes to visit, and not Muguet; it is therefore quite unnecessary that she should be present."

"But, my dear Dixmer," replied she, regarding her husband with astonishment.

"Geneviève," replied Dixmer, "I hoped to have found in you an ally who would render more easy the task imposed upon me, and find, on the contrary, that your fears redouble our dangers and difficulties. Four days since

I thought all was settled between us, and now everything must be done over again. Have I not told you that I confide in you, in your honor? Have I not told you that it is positively necessary that Maurice should become our friend, more intimate than before, but less suspicious than ever? Oh, mon Dieu! these women are an everlasting obstacle to our projects."

"But, is there no other way? I have told you before, that for all our sakes it would be better if Monsieur Maurice returned here no more."

"Yes, for our sakes, perhaps; but for the sake of her who is far above us, of her for whom we have promised to sacrifice our lives, fortune, and happiness, it is necessary that this young man should return. Are you aware they begin to suspect Turgy, and talk of placing another servant near the queen?"

"Well, I will send away Muguet."

"Gracious Heaven! Geneviève," said Dixmer, with a movement of impatience very unusual with him, "why do you speak to me thus; why stifle the ardor of my ideas by your own; why strive to create difficulties where too many already exist? Geneviève, act like an honorable, devoted woman; act as you feel you ought to act. I tell you, to-morrow I go out — to-morrow I take Morand's place as engineer. I shall not dine with you, but he will; he has something to ask Maurice, and will explain to you what it is. What he has to request you may imagine, Geneviève, is a thing of vital import; it is not indeed the goal to which we march, but the way leading to it. It is the last hope of that devoted, noble-minded man, our protector, to whom we are bound to dedicate our lives."

"And for whom I will freely give mine," cried Geneviève, with enthusiasm.

"Well, this man, Geneviève, I cannot tell why, as you must have seen is not loved by Maurice, by whom, above all things, it is necessary he should be respected. In short, from the bad temper in which you have put Maurice to-day, he may perhaps refuse Morand that which it is so imperative we should obtain at any price. Do I now need to tell you, Geneviève, to what dread end your petty delicacy and sentimentality are leading Morand?"

"Oh, sir!" cried Geneviève, clasping her hands and turning pale, "let us never mention that!"

"Then," said Dixmer, pressing his lips to his wife's forehead, "reflect upon it, and form your resolution;" and he went out.

"O my God!" murmured Geneviève, with anguish, "with what violence do they compel me to accept this love toward which my whole soul inclines!"

The next day, as we have already said, was Sunday.

It was customary in the family of Dixmer, as in all the burgesses' families at that period, that the dinner should be longer and more ceremonious on that day than on any other. Since their intimacy, Maurice, having received a general invitation, never omitted to dine with them on that day. Although they did not dine till two o'clock, Maurice used to come at noon.

From the manner of their parting, however, Geneviève almost despaired of seeing him that Sunday.

In short, twelve o'clock struck, then half-past, then one.

It would be impossible to describe what passed in the heart of Geneviève during this period of anxious expectation.

She was at first dressed with the greatest simplicity; then, seeing that he delayed his coming, she, with a feeling of coquetry natural to the heart of woman, had placed a flower at her side, a flower in her hair, and still listened, her heart each moment beating faster and faster. The dinner-hour had almost arrived, and Maurice had not appeared.

At ten minutes to two, Geneviève heard the sound of a horse's feet, that sound she knew so well.

"Oh!" cried she, "his pride could not wrestle against his love. He loves me! he loves me!"

Maurice dismounted, and gave his horse to the gardener, desiring him to remain where he was. Geneviève saw with anxiety that the gardener did not lead the horse to the stables.

Maurice on this day looked superlatively handsome. A splendid black coat, a white waistcoat, breeches of chamois leather designed for limbs after the model of Apollo, a white cambric stock, and his waving hair, displaying a fresh, beaming face, formed altogether a type of manly beauty.

He entered. As we have already said, his presence swelled the heart of Geneviève, who received him joyfully. "Ah!" said she, holding out her hand, "you have come to dine with us, have you not?"

"On the contrary, Citizen," said Maurice, coldly, "I have come to ask your permission to absent myself."

"To absent yourself?"

"Yes; the sectional affairs claim my attention. I feared you might wait, and would accuse me of being wanting in politeness, therefore came to make my excuses in person."

Geneviève again felt her heart sink within her.

"Ah, mon Dieu!" cried she, "and Dixmer, who does not dine at home, counted upon finding you here on his return, and desired me to detain you."

"Ah, then, Madame! I comprehend your importunity, it is a command of your husband's; and I not to guess all this! I shall never cure myself of conceit."

"Maurice!"

"It is for me, Madame, to draw my inference from your actions rather than your words; it is for me therefore to comprehend that if Dixmer is absent the greater the reason I should not remain. His absence would surely add to your constraint."

"Why so?" timidly inquired Geneviève.

"Because you appear, since my return, sedulously to avoid me, notwithstanding I returned for your sake, and yours only; and you well know, mon Dieu! that ever since my return I have invariably found some one with you."

"Then," said Geneviève, "you are still angry, mon ami, although I endeavor to act for the best."

"No, Geneviève; you would do much better to receive me as before, or drive me away altogether."

"Maurice," said Geneviève, tenderly, "understand my situation, consider my anguish, and do not enact the tyrant over me any longer."

And the young woman regarded him mournfully.

Maurice remained silent.

"What do you require then?" continued she.

"I require your love, Geneviève; since I now feel I cannot live without that love."

"Maurice! have pity on me."

"Then, Madame, you leave me to die."

"To die?"

"Yes, to die, or to forget."

"You could then forget?" said Geneviève, the tears rushing from her heart to her eyes.

"Ah, no, no!" said Maurice, falling on his knees before her; "no, Geneviève, I may die, perhaps, but forget you, never, never!"

"And yet," replied Geneviève, with firmness, "that would be the best, Maurice; for this love is criminal."

"Have you said this to Monsieur Morand?" said Maurice, recalled to himself by her sudden frigidity of manner.

"Monsieur Morand is not a madman like yourself, and has never yet compelled me to indicate to him how he should conduct himself in the house of a friend."

"I wager," said Maurice, smiling ironically, "that if Dixmer dines out Morand is not absent. Ah, Geneviève, by this means you can always deter me from loving you; for while Morand is here, forever at your side, not quitting you even for a single moment," continued he, contemptuously, "I should not love you, or rather I should not confess that I loved you."

"And I," cried Geneviève, driven to extremity by this eternal suspicion, and seizing the young man's arm with a species of frenzy, "I swear solemnly — now, Maurice, mark me well, and let it be once for all — that Morand has never breathed to me a word of love, that he neither loves me nor ever will love me. I swear this on my honor; I swear this by the soul of my mother

"Alas! alas!" said Maurice, "I wish I could believe you."

"Oh, believe me, poor foolish youth!" said she, with a smile which to any one else than one blind with jealousy would have been a charming confession of the state of her heart, — "believe me. Besides, if you wish to know more, Morand loves a woman in whose presence all others sink into insignificance, as the flowers of the field fade before the stars of heaven."

"And who is this woman who is able to eclipse all other women," demanded Maurice, "when among the number we find Geneviève?"

"Do we not always," said Geneviève, smiling, "consider the one we love as the chef d'œuvre of the creation?"

"Then," said Maurice, "if you do not love me, Geneviève —"

The young woman waited with anxiety the end of the sentence.

"If you do not love me," continued Maurice, "will you at least swear never to love another?"

"Ah! that, Maurice, I will swear with all my heart," cried the young woman, delighted that he had thus compromised with her conscience.

Maurice seized the hands she was raising to Heaven, and covered them with ardent kisses.

"And now," said he, "I will be kind, indulgent, and confiding. I will even be generous. I wish to see you smile, and myself to be happy."

"And you will ask me nothing more?"

"I will endeavor."

"And now," said Geneviève, "I think it will be useless to hold the horse any longer. The section will wait."

"Oh, Geneviève! the whole world might wait, if I could only stay with you!"

Steps were heard in the court-yard.

"They come to tell us that dinner is ready," said Geneviève. They silently pressed each other's hands.

It was Morand, who came to tell them they only awaited their presence at table. He also was in full dress for the Sunday's dinner.

CHAPTER XIX.

THE REQUEST.

In the mean time Morand did not a little excite the curiosity of Maurice. The most refined of fops could not discover a fault in the tie of his cravat, the folds of his boots, or the texture of his linen; but it must be allowed his hair and spectacles were always the same. It then appeared to Maurice, so much was he reassured by the oath of Geneviève, that he now for the first time viewed these locks and spectacles in a proper light.

"The devil!" said Maurice to himself as he went to meet him, — "the devil take me if I am now ever again jealous of this worthy Citizen Morand. Put on every day, if you choose, your full-dress coat, or even make yourself one of cloth of gold, since from this time I promise to see nothing but your hair and spectacles, and above all, never again to accuse you of loving Geneviève."

We can easily understand that the shake of the hand bestowed upon the Citizen Morand at the conclusion of this soliloquy was more frank and cordial than usual. Contrary to custom, the party was small, covers being placed for only three on a narrow table.

Geneviève was seated nearly opposite Maurice, between himself and the light, which reflected on her luxuriant black curls, tingeing them with the blue hue of the raven's wing, and enhancing the brilliancy of her eyes and complexion.

Beyond his pigeon-colored suit, Morand appeared to have dismissed all recollection of the day from his mind, — that brilliant mind which Maurice had sometimes heard burst fresh from the lips of this singular man, which would no doubt have been accompanied by flashes from his eyes, had they not been totally obscured by the green spectacles.

He uttered a thousand witticisms, but never himself smiled; indeed, what added piquancy to his witticisms and a strange charm to his sallies was his own imperturbable gravity. This merchant, who had made numerous voyages and visited various countries, trading in every sort of skin, from the skin of the panther to that of the rabbit; this chemist, with arms dyed with his own chemical preparations, — was as conversant with Egypt as Herodotus, Africa as Lavaillant, and the Opera and the boudoir as any fop.

"But the devil take me, Monsieur Morand," said Maurice, "you are not only a clever man, but a scholar also."

"Ah! I have both seen and read much," said Morand; "and then it is necessary I should prepare myself in some degree for the life of pleasure I intend to lead when I retire on my fortune. It is time, Citizen Maurice, it is time."

"Bah!" said Maurice; "you talk like an old man. What age then are you?"

Morand turned round, startled by this question, natural as it certainly was.

"I am thirty-eight," said he. "Ah! see what it is to be a scholar, as you term it. It makes one old."

Geneviève began to laugh, and Maurice joined in; but Morand merely smiled.

"You have, then, made several voyages?" demanded Maurice, pressing Geneviève's foot between his own.

"Part of my youth," replied Morand, "was passed in a foreign land."

"And you have seen much? — pardon me, I ought to say, have observed much; for a man like yourself cannot see without observing," replied Maurice.

"Ma foi! yes; seen much?" replied Morand, "I have seen almost everything."

"Everything, Citizen," replied Maurice, laughing; "that is saying a great deal. If you were to search — "

"Ah, yes! you are right; there are two things I have never seen. It is true, in our days, these two things are becoming more and more rare."

"What are they, then?" demanded Maurice.

"The first," said Morand, gravely, "is a god."

"Ah!" said Maurice, "but in lieu of a god I shall be able to show you a goddess, Citizen Morand."

"How so?" interrupted Geneviève.

"Yes; a goddess of quite modern creation, — the Goddess Reason. I have a friend, of whom you have sometimes heard me speak, — my dear and brave Lorin, — with a heart of gold, whose only fault is that of making verses and vile puns."

"Well?"

"Well, he selected for Paris a Goddess Reason, in good condition, and in whom they can discover nothing at all objectionable. It is the Citizen Arthémise, ex-dancer to the Opera, and at present dealer in perfumes, Rue Martin. As soon as she is definitely received as goddess, I will show her to you."

Morand bowed his head in token of thanks, and continued, —

"The other," said he gravely, "is a king."

"Ah! that is more difficult," said Geneviève; "there are no more of them," she added, forcing a smile.

"You should have seen the last," said Maurice; "it would have been prudent to do so."

"The result is," said Morand, "I have not the least idea of a crowned head; it must be very sad?"

"Very sad, indeed," said Maurice; "I will answer for it, — I who see one nearly every month."

"A crowned head?" demanded Geneviève.

"At least," said Maurice, "one that has borne the weight and miserable burden of a crown."

"Ah, yes! the queen," said Morand; "truly, Monsieur Maurice, it must be a melancholy sight — "

"Is she as proud and beautiful as they say?" demanded Geneviève.

"Have you never seen her then, Madame?" demanded Maurice, surprised in his turn.

"I? never!" replied the young woman.

"Indeed!" said Maurice, "that is strange."

"And why strange?" said Geneviève. "We lived in the country till '91; since '91 we have resided in the old Rue Saint Jacques, which much resembles the country, only here they have neither light nor air, and still less flowers. You are acquainted with my life, Monsieur Maurice? It has always been the same. How do you suppose I could have seen the queen, when I have had no opportunity whatever of so doing?"

"And I do not think you will avail yourself of that which unfortunately, perhaps, may present itself," said Maurice.

"What do you mean?" demanded Geneviève.

"The Citizen Maurice," replied Morand, "alludes to a thing no longer a secret."

"To what?" demanded Geneviève.

"To the probable condemnation of Marie Antoinette, and to her death upon the same scaffold where her husband died. The citizen said, in short, that you would not avail yourself of the opportunity offered you of seeing her the day when she will quit the Temple for the Place de la Revolution."

"Oh, certainly not!" cried Geneviève, as Morand pronounced these words with the utmost sang-froid.

"Then you can only lament," said the impassible chemist; "for the Austrian is well guarded, and the Republic a fairy that renders invisible whatever she pleases."

"I acknowledge, however," said Geneviève, "I have been very desirous to see this poor woman."

"Let us see," said Maurice, anxious to gratify all the wishes of Geneviève; "have you really such an inclination? Then only say the word. I agree with the Citizen Morand that the Republic is a fairy; but I, in quality of municipal, am somewhat of a wizard."

"Could you procure me a sight of the queen, you, Monsieur?" cried Geneviève.

"Certainly, I can."

"And how?" demanded Morand, exchanging a rapid glance with Geneviève, which escaped the notice of the young man.

"Nothing more simple," said Maurice. "There are certainly some municipals of whom they are distrustful; but as for me, I have given sufficient evidence of my devotion to the cause of liberty to render me above all suspicion. Besides, admittance to the Temple depends conjointly on the municipals and the chiefs of the post. Now, the chief of the post is, just at this moment, my friend Lorin, who appears to me to be called indubitably to replace General Santerre, seeing that in three months he has risen from the rank of corporal to that of adjutant-major. Well, come and see me at the Temple the day I shall be on guard, — that is to say, next Thursday."

"Well," said Morand, "I hope now your wishes will be gratified. There is the whole matter arranged."

"Oh! no, no," said Geneviève; "indeed, I would not have it thus."

"And wherefore not?" said Maurice, who only anticipated in this visit to the Temple an opportunity of seeing Geneviève on a day when he had expected to be deprived of this happiness.

"Because," answered Geneviève, "it might perhaps, dear Maurice, expose you to some unpleasant dispute; and if anything were to happen to you through gratifying a whim of mine, I should never, while I lived, forgive myself."

"You have spoken wisely, Geneviève," said Morand. "Suspicion is at present very rife; the best patriots even are now suspected. Renounce this project, which, as you say, is after all a mere caprice of curiosity."

"They will say that you are envious, Morand, and that not having yourself seen either king or queen, you do not wish others to do so. Come, to end all discussion, join the party."

"I! good faith! No."

"It is then no longer the Citizen Dixmer who wishes to visit the Temple; it is I who entreat both her and you to come there, to divert a poor prisoner. For the great door once closed upon me, I remain for twenty-four hours as much a prisoner as the king would be, or a prince of the blood." And pressing between his own feet the foot of Geneviève, "Come then," said he, "I entreat you!"

"What do you say, Morand," said Geneviève, "will you come with me?"

"It will be losing a day," said Morand, "and will retard by just so long the time when I expect to retire from business."

"Then I shall not go," said Geneviève.

"But why?" demanded Morand.

"Because I cannot depend upon my husband to escort me; and if you will not accompany me — you, a respectable man, thirty-eight years of age — I have not the hardihood to encounter alone all the chasseurs, artillerymen, and grenadiers, requesting to speak to one of the municipals only three or four years older than myself."

"Then," said Morand, "since you deem my presence indispensable, Citizen — "

"Come! come! learned Citizen, be as gallant as if you were simply an ordinary man, and sacrifice half a day to the wife of your friend," said Maurice.

"Well, let it be so," said Morand.

"Now," said Maurice, "I only require one thing from you, — that is, discretion. Visiting the Temple is considered a suspicious proceeding, and should any accident occur in consequence, we should all be guillotined. The Jacobins do not jest. Peste! you see how they have treated the Girondins."

"The devil!" said Morand, "this observation of the Citizen Maurice requires consideration. This would be a sort of retiring from business that would not suit me at all."

"Did you not hear," said Geneviève, smiling, "that the Citizen Maurice said all?"

"Well, what of that? All?"

"All, together."

"Yes, without doubt," said Morand, "company is very agreeable; but I much prefer, fair sentimentalist, to live in your society than to die in it."

"What the devil was I thinking of," said Maurice to himself, "when I imagined this man loved Geneviève?"

"Then it is all settled," said Geneviève. "I address myself to you, Morand, thoughtful, absent man that you are, — remember it is on Thursday next; so do not on the Wednesday evening commence some chemical experiment that will occupy your time and attention for the next twenty-four hours, as very frequently happens."

"You may be perfectly easy on that point," said Morand. "Besides, you can remind me."

Geneviève then rose from table, and Maurice followed her example. Morand was about to leave also, and perhaps to follow them, when one of the workmen brought the chemist a small vial containing some liquid which instantly engrossed all his attention.

"Let us make haste," said Maurice, drawing away Geneviève.

"Oh, be assured," said she, "he will remain there for an hour at the very least."

And the young woman allowed him to take her hand, which he tenderly pressed between his own. She felt remorse for her treachery, and tried to compensate for it by her kindness.

"Do you see," said she to Maurice, crossing the garden and showing him the carnations, which had been removed into the air with the hope of reviving them, — "do you see my flowers are all dead?"

"What killed them?" said Maurice; "your neglect? Poor carnations!"

"It was not my neglect, but your desertion, kind sir."

"They required, my little Geneviève, some water, that was all; besides, my absence should have left you plenty of time."

"Ah!" said Geneviève, "if flowers were watered with tears, the poor carnations, as you call them, would not have died."

Maurice threw his arms round Geneviève, and drawing her to him, before she had time to prevent him, pressed his lips upon the half-smiling, half-languishing eye, now fixed upon the drooping, dying flowers.

Geneviève felt so much self-reproach it made her lenient to others.

Dixmer returned home late, and on his return found Morand, Maurice, and Geneviève talking botany in the garden.

CHAPTER XX.

THE FLOWER-GIRL.

At length the anticipated Thursday, the day of Maurice's guard, arrived. It was now the month of June. The sky was of a deep and cloudless blue, and against this sheet of blue rose the heavy white mass of new houses. The coming of the dreadful dog-star was already foreseen, — that dog represented by the ancients as thirsting with an unquenchable thirst, and which, to borrow the phraseology of the plebeian Parisians, licked the pavement very dry. Paris was clean as a carpet, and perfumes filled the air, mounting from the trees, emanating from the flowers, circulating and intoxicating with joy, as if to render the inhabitants of the capital forgetful for a few moments of that vapor of blood which rose without intermission from the pavement of their streets.

It was Maurice's duty to enter the Temple at nine o'clock; his two colleagues were Mercevault and Agricola. At eight o'clock he was in the old Rue Saint Jacques, in grand costume as citizen municipal, — that is to say, with a tricolored scarf tightly fastened round his lithe, muscular frame. He as usual rode there on horseback, and on his route won the sincere approbation, admiration, and eulogiums of the fair patriots who saw him pass. Geneviève was already prepared; she wore a simple muslin dress, a species of light taffeta mantle, and a small bonnet ornamented with the tricolored cockade. Thus attired, she was of dazzling beauty.

Morand, who, as we have seen, had been earnestly solicited to accompany them, had, no doubt for fear of being mistaken for an aristocrat, attired himself in his usual costume, — half-burgess, half-artisan. He had just entered, and his countenance betrayed great fatigue; he said he had been at work all night, in order to complete some urgent business.

Dixmer had gone out immediately on the return of his friend Morand.

"Well," demanded Geneviève, "what have you decided on, Maurice; and how are we to see the queen?"

"Listen," said Maurice, "I have arranged everything. I shall arrive at the Temple with you, and then introduce you to my friend Lorin, who commands the guard; I then take my post, and on the first opportunity will come for you."

"But," demanded Morand, "where are we to see the prisoners, and how are we to see them?"

"At either their breakfast or their dinner, if that will suit you, through the glazed partition of the municipal."

"Perfectly," said Morand.

Maurice then saw Morand approach a cupboard at the farther end of the salle-à-manger, and drink hastily a glass of pure wine, which rather surprised him, as Morand was usually very abstemious, his strongest beverage being water merely colored with wine.

Geneviève saw that Maurice regarded him with astonishment.

"Only imagine," said she, "he must be half-dead with fatigue; he has taken nothing since yesterday morning"

"Did he not dine here?" asked Maurice.

"No; he was trying some experiments in the city."

Geneviève took a useless precaution with respect to Maurice, since lover-like he was an egotist, and had merely bestowed upon the action of Morand that superficial attention which an amorous man accords to everything except the woman whom he loves.

To his glass of wine Morand added a crust of bread, which he hastily swallowed.

"And now," said he, "dear Citizen Maurice, I am quite ready; when you choose we will depart."

Maurice, who was stripping the decayed petals from one of the dead carnations he had plucked in passing, now offered his arm to Geneviève, saying, —

"Let us start."

On their way Maurice felt so happy that he could scarcely contain himself; he would have uttered cries of joy had he not restrained his emotion. What could he desire more? Not only had he acquired the certainty that she did not love Morand, but also the hope that he possessed her affection. The glorious sun shone upon the world, the arm of Geneviève was reposing within his own, while the public-criers, shouting at the top of their voices the triumph of the Jacobins and the defeat of Brissot and his party, announced that the country was saved.

There are truly moments of life when the heart of man seems too small to contain the joy or grief concentrated there.

"Oh, what a lovely day!" exclaimed Morand.

Maurice turned round in surprise. This was the first burst of feeling he had ever heard issue from the lips of this singularly reserved and absent man.

"Oh, yes; it is indeed lovely," said Geneviève, pressing closer the arm of Maurice; "would that it may continue till evening pure and cloudless as it is now!"

Maurice applied these words to himself, and his happiness redoubled each moment.

Morand at the same time regarded Geneviève through his green spectacles with a peculiar, grateful expression. Perhaps he also applied her wish to himself.

They thus crossed the Petit Pont, the Rue de la Juiverie, and the Bridge Notre Dame; they then proceeded to the Place de l'Hôtel de Ville, the Rue Barre-du-Bec, and the Rue Sainte Avoie. As they progressed, Maurice's step became more and more elastic, while on the contrary those of his male and female companions waxed slower and slower.

They had reached the corner of the Rue des Vieilles-Audriettes, when all at once a flower-girl impeded their passage, by offering them her basket filled with flowers.

"Oh, what magnificent carnations!" cried Maurice.

"Oh, yes, very beautiful!" said Geneviève; "it seems the cultivator of these had no pre-occupation to distress him, for they are not withered and dead."

This speech sank deep into the heart of the young man.

"Ah! my brave Municipal," said the flower-girl, "purchase a bouquet for the pretty citizen. She is dressed in white; look at these superb crimson carnations; white and purple look well together. She will place the bouquet upon her heart, and as her heart is near to your blue coat, you will have there the national colors."

The flower-girl was young and pretty; her compliment was well-turned and well-chosen, for had it been made expressly for that occasion, it could not have better applied to the circumstances. Besides, the flowers were almost symbolical; they were similar to those now dead.

"I will purchase some," said Maurice, "since they are carnations; all other flowers I detest."

"Ah, Maurice," said Geneviève, "it is useless, we have so many of them in the garden."

But although her lips uttered the refusal, her eyes expressed a longing desire to possess them.

Maurice selected the most beautiful of the bouquets. It was the one the pretty flower-girl had presented to him.

It consisted of twenty deep red carnations, emitting an odor at once sweet and pungent; in the centre, towering above the rest, rose a magnificent carnation.

"Here," said Maurice to the seller, throwing on her basket a bill of five francs, "that is for you."

"Thanks, my brave Municipal," said the flower-girl, "a thousand thanks."

And she went toward another couple, trusting the day commenced thus auspiciously would so continue till its close. During this apparently simple scene, which had only occupied a few seconds at most, Morand seemed scarcely able to support himself, and wiped the perspiration from his pallid brow, while Geneviève also turned pale and trembled. She took the nosegay which Maurice presented to her, and clasping it in her lovely hand, held it to her face, less to inhale the odor than to conceal her emotion.

The remainder of the journey was pleasant, at least so far as concerned Maurice. As for Geneviève, her gayety seemed affected, and Morand evinced his enjoyment in a fashion peculiar to himself, — that is to say, in smothered sighs or startling bursts of laughter, and occasionally uttering some formidable witticisms which fell upon the passers-by like sparks of fire.

At nine o'clock they reached the Temple.

Santerre called over the municipals.

"I am here," said Maurice, leaving Geneviève under the care of Morand.

"Welcome," said Santerre, holding out his hand to the young man.

Maurice took care not to refuse the hand thus offered to him. The friendship of Santerre was certainly most valuable at this epoch. At sight of this man who had commanded the famous rolling of drums, Geneviève shuddered, and Morand turned pale.

"Who is this handsome citizen?" demanded Santerre of Maurice, "and what does she here?"

"She is the wife of the brave Citizen Dixmer; you have heard this excellent patriot spoken of, Citizen General?"

"Yes, yes," replied Santerre; "the chief of a tannery, captain of chasseurs of the legion Victor."

"The same."

"Good! good! My faith, she is pretty. And this ugly fellow who has given her his arm?"

"That is the Citizen Morand, her husband's partner, and chasseur in Dixmer's company."

Santerre approached Geneviève.

"Good-day, Citizen," said he.

Geneviève made an effort.

"Good-day, Citizen General," replied she, smiling.

Santerre felt flattered by both title and smile.

"And what brings you here, fair patriot?" continued Santerre.

"The citizen," replied Maurice, "has never seen the Widow Capet, and would like to see her."

"Yes," said Santerre, "before—" and he made an atrocious gesture.

"Precisely," replied Maurice, coldly.

"Very well," said Santerre, "only mind they are not seen entering the keep: it would be a bad example; in other respects, do as you think fit."

Santerre again shook hands with Maurice, made an inclination of his head to Geneviève in a friendly and protecting manner, and went to attend to his other duties.

After a great many evolutions of gendarmes and chasseurs, after some manœuvring with cannon, the heavy reverberations of which, it was considered, carried to the environs a salutary admonition, Maurice gave Geneviève his arm, and followed closely by Morand, advanced toward the post, at the door of which Lorin was vociferating loudly, commanding the manœuvres of his battalion.

"Good!" cried he, "why there is Maurice; peste! with a female too who appears to me rather agreeable. Does the sly rascal wish to bring her into competition with my Goddess Reason? If it were so, poor Arthémise!"

"Hallo! Citizen Adjutant," said the captain.

The drums rolled, the company dispersed to their respective places, and when each was at his post, Lorin hastened to exchange compliments with his friend. Maurice presented Lorin to Geneviève and Morand. Then an explanation commenced as to the purport of their visit.

"Yes, I understand," said Lorin; "you wish your friends to enter the keep; that is easily managed. I will go directly and station the sentinels, then I will order them to admit you and your friends."

In ten minutes afterward Geneviève and Morand entered behind the three municipals, and placed themselves behind the glazed partition.

CHAPTER XXI.

THE CRIMSON CARNATION.

THE queen had just risen. Having been indisposed for two or three days, she had remained in bed longer than usual; but having heard from her sister that there had been a splendid sunrise, she made an effort to quit her couch, and that she might be enabled to breathe the pure air with her daughter, had requested permission to walk on the platform, which had been granted her without the slightest difficulty.

She had also been induced to act thus from another cause. Once, and it is true once only, from the height of the tower she had seen the dauphin playing in the garden. But at the first signal of recognition between the mother and child, Simon interfered, and compelled the boy to retire immediately.

Nevertheless, she had seen him; that was a great source of happiness to her. True, the poor little prisoner was very pale and much changed. Then he was dressed as a child of the people, in a blouse and coarse trousers. But his beautiful fair waving curls were still left him, forming around him a glory which God no doubt intended the infant martyr to retain in heaven.

If she could only see him once again, oh, what a cordial to the heart of the unhappy mother!

There was yet another motive.

"My sister," Madame Elizabeth had said to her, "you know we found in the corridor a straw standing upright in a corner of the wall. In the language of our signs this desires us to be watchful, as a friend is coming near us."

"That is true," replied the queen; who, regarding her sister and child with pity, would not on their account permit herself to despair of their ultimate safety.

The duties of the service accomplished, Maurice was then highest in authority in the keep of the Temple, since chance had elected him as guard during the day, and the other municipals, Agricola and Mercevault, as guards during the night.

The municipals had left, after laying their procès-verbal before the Council of the Temple.

"Ah, Citizen Municipal," said the woman Tison, coming forward to salute Maurice, "you bring company, then, to see our caged pigeons? It is only I who am condemned no more to see my poor Sophie."

"They are friends of mine," said Maurice, "who have never yet seen the Widow Capet."

"Ah! well, they will see admirably behind the partition."

"Assuredly," said Morand.

"Only," said Geneviève, "we shall seem to be actuated by that cruel curiosity which induces some persons to mock the misery of unfortunate prisoners from the outside of an iron grating."

"Ah! then why not take your friends to the tower walk, since the woman Capet will take an airing there to-day with her sister and her daughter; for they have left her a daughter, while I who am not guilty, have been deprived of mine. Oh, these aristocrats! it will always be the case; let us do what we will, favor is always shown to them, Citizen Maurice."

"But they have taken from her, her son," replied he.

"Ah! if I had a son," murmured the female jailer, "I should lament my daughter less."

Geneviève during this time had exchanged looks with Morand several times.

"Mon ami," said the young woman to Maurice, "the citizen is in the right. If you could by any means place me in the way of Marie Antoinette, it would be less repugnant to my feelings than gazing at her here. It seems to me that this manner of viewing people is at once humiliating both to them and to us."

"Kind Geneviève," said Maurice, "you possess true delicacy of mind."

"Egad! Citizen," said one of Maurice's colleagues who was at that moment breakfasting in the antechamber on bread and sausages, "if you were the prisoner, and Capet's wife felt curiosity to see you, she would not be so very particular about the indulgence of her fancy, — the jade!"

Geneviève, with a movement quicker than lightning, threw a rapid glance toward Morand, to note the effect of these words upon him. In effect, Morand quivered, a strange phosphorescent light gleamed from under his eyelids, and his hands were clinched for an instant; but all this was so momentary that it passed unperceived.

"What is the name of this municipal?" asked she of Maurice.

"It is the Citizen Mercevault," replied the young man; and then added, as if to apologize for his coarseness, "a stone-cutter."

Mercevault heard it, and cast a sidelong glance at Maurice.

"Come! come!" said the woman Tison; "finish your sausage and your half-bottle, that I may clear the table."

"It is not the fault of the Austrian if I finish them now," grumbled the municipal; "for if she could have murdered me on the 10th of August she would have done so; thus the day when she 'sneezes in the sack' I shall be in the first rank, firm at my post."

Morand turned as pale as death.

"Come! Citizen Maurice," said Geneviève, "let us go where you promised to take us; here it seems as if I were a prisoner. I feel suffocated."

Maurice conducted Geneviève and Morand out, when the sentinels, previously instructed by Lorin, allowed them to pass without any difficulty. They installed themselves in a little passage on the upper story, so that the moment when the queen, Madame Royale, or Madame Elizabeth ascended to the gallery, these august personages could not do otherwise than pass before them.

As the promenade was fixed for ten o'clock, and they had only a few minutes to wait, Maurice not only did not quit his friends, but further, in order that the slightest suspicion might not be excited by this rather illegal proceeding, having met Agricola, he took that municipal with him.

It struck ten.

"Open!" cried a voice from the base of the tower, which Maurice knew to be that of General Santerre.

Immediately the guard assumed arms and closed the iron gratings; the sentinels also prepared arms. There was then heard in all the court a confused noise of iron, stones, and footsteps, which vividly impressed both Morand and Geneviève, for Maurice observed them both turn pale.

"All these precautions to guard three poor women," murmured Geneviève.

"Yes," said Morand, endeavoring to smile; "if those who tempt them to escape were now here, and in our place saw what we see, it would disgust them with their trade."

"In fact," continued Geneviève, "I begin to think they will never escape."

"I hope they never will," said Maurice, inclining over the staircase as he spoke.

"Attention," cried he; "here are the prisoners."

"Name them to me," said Geneviève, "for I do not know any of them."

"The first two who are ascending are the sister and daughter of Capet. The last one, preceded by a little dog, is Marie Antoinette."

Geneviève made a step forward. Morand, on the contrary, instead of looking at them, pressed himself close against the wall, his lips more livid and earthy than the stones of the keep.

Geneviève, with her white robe and bright pure eyes, appeared like an angel awaiting the prisoners to cheer them on their dark and dreary road, and to administer in passing a ray of comfort to their desolate and blighted hearts.

Madame Elizabeth and Madame Royale pursued their way, having only thrown a glance of astonishment at the strangers. No doubt the former imagined they were those whom the signals announced, for turning round quickly to Madame Royale, she pressed her hand, and while so doing, dropped her handkerchief, as if to inform the queen.

"Pay attention, my sister," said she; "I have dropped my handkerchief."

And she passed on with the young princess.

The queen, with panting breath accompanied with a short dry cough indicating ill-health, stooped to pick up the handkerchief which had fallen at her feet, when her little dog, more agile than its mistress, seized it, and ran forward with it to Madame Elizabeth. The queen continued her ascent slowly, and after some steps found herself in her turn before Geneviève, Morand, and the young municipal.

"Flowers!" cried she; "oh, how long it is since I have seen any flowers! How deliciously they smell! You are happy to possess these flowers, Madame."

Quick as the idea formed in her mind, prompted by these melancholy words, Geneviève extended her hand to offer her bouquet to the queen.

Then Marie Antoinette raised her head, looked at her, and an almost imperceptible blush passed over her colorless face.

But by a natural movement, from an habitual passive obedience to regulation, Maurice put out his hand to arrest the arm of Geneviève.

The queen then remained hesitating, when, looking at Maurice, she recognized him as the young municipal who had always spoken to her with so much firmness, but at the same time tempered with equal respect.

"Is this forbidden, sir?" said she.

"No, no, Madame. Geneviève, you can offer your bouquet," said Maurice.

"Oh, thanks, thanks, sir," said the queen, with grateful acknowledgments; and bowing with gracious affability to Geneviève, the queen extended her emaciated hand, and selected at random a single carnation from the mass of flowers.

"Take them all, Madame, take them all," timidly said Geneviève.

"No," said the queen, with a fascinating smile; "this bouquet may come perhaps from one you love. I will not deprive you of it."

Geneviève blushed, and at this blush the queen smiled.

"Move on! Citizen Capet," said Agricola, "you must continue your route."

The queen bowed, and ascended the steps, but before she disappeared, turned around and murmured, —

"How sweet these carnations smell! and what a beautiful young lady!"

"She has not seen me," murmured Morand, who almost kneeling in the shade of the corridor, had quite escaped the notice of the queen.

"But you had a good view of her, had you not, Morand? Had not you, Geneviève?" said Maurice, doubly happy, first from the sight he had procured his friends, and also that he had afforded ever so slight a gratification to the unhappy prisoner.

"Oh, yes, yes!" said Geneviève; "I saw her very well, and were I to live for a thousand years, I should never forget her."

"And what do you think of her?"

"She is charming."

"And you, Morand."

Morand clasped his hands, but made no reply.

"Tell me," said Maurice, laughing, in a whisper to Geneviève, "is it the queen of whom Morand is enamoured?"

Geneviève started, but recovering herself instantly, replied smilingly, —

"It really looks like it."

"You have not yet told me what you think of her, Morand," persisted Maurice.

"I thought her very pale," replied he.

Maurice retook the arm of Geneviève, to descend toward the court. In the dark staircase it seemed to him that Geneviève kissed his hand.

"Ha! what does that mean, Geneviève?"

"It means, Maurice, that I shall never forget that to gratify a whim of mine you have risked your life."

"Oh!" said Maurice, "what exaggeration, Geneviève! Between you and me, you well know that gratitude is not the sentiment I wish to inspire you with."

Geneviève pressed his arm softly.

Morand followed with faltering steps.

When they reached the court, Lorin came and identified the two visitors, showing them to the gate.

Before leaving the Temple, Geneviève made Maurice promise to dine the next day in the old Rue Saint Jacques.

CHAPTER XXII.

SIMON THE CENSOR.

When Maurice returned to his post, in a state of transcendent happiness, he found Tison's wife weeping.

"What have they done to you now, mother?" asked Maurice.

"All this makes me furious," replied the female jailer.

"Why?"

"Because there is nothing but injustice for poor people in this world."

"But how?"

"You are rich, you are a burgess, you come here only for a day, and they permit pretty women to visit you here, who present bouquets to the Austrian; while I who nestle everlastingly in this dove-cot am not allowed to see my poor Sophie."

Maurice took her hand, and slipped into it a bill of ten francs.

"There, good woman, take that, and do not despair. Goodness! the Austrian will not last forever."

"Ten francs," said the female jailer, "that is kind of you; but I would rather have even a curl-paper from my poor girl's hair."

As she finished these words, Simon, who was then coming up, heard them, and saw the female jailer put in her pocket the bill Maurice had given her.

We will mention what sort of a temper Simon was in.

He came from the court where he had encountered Lorin. Now, a decided antipathy existed between these two men.

This hatred was less induced by the violent scenes with which our readers are already familiar than by difference of race, an everlasting source of detestation, which, however mysterious it may at first appear, is easily explained.

Simon was hideous, Lorin handsome; Simon was vulgar, Lorin the very opposite; Simon was a Republican bully, Lorin one of those ardent patriots who had sacrificed everything to the Revolution; and then, if they had on a former occasion come to blows, Simon instinctively felt that the fist of the fop, no less effectually than that of Maurice, would have inflicted upon him a plebeian punishment.

Simon on perceiving Lorin, stopped short, and turned pale.

"It is still this battalion that mounts guard," growled he.

"Well," said a gendarme who overheard this apostrophe, "it is as good as another, it seems to me."

Simon drew a pencil from his pocket, and pretended to note down something on a piece of paper almost as black as his hands.

"Ah!" said Lorin, "you know how to write then, Simon, since you are tutor to young Capet? Look, citizens, upon my honor he takes notes; he is Simon the Censor."

A universal shout of laughter proceeded from the ranks of the young National Guards, almost all men of education, at the ridiculous title bestowed upon the wretched cobbler.

"Very well, very well," said he, grinding his teeth, and turning white with rage; "they say you have permitted strangers to enter the keep, and that without the consent of the Commune. Very well, I am going to draw out the procès-verbal by the municipal."

"He at least knows how to write," said Lorin; "it is Maurice, Maurice with the Iron Hand; don't you know him?"

At this moment Morand and Geneviève went out.

On seeing this, Simon rushed into the keep, at the very moment, as we have said, when Maurice, by way of consoling her, presented the woman Tison with the bill of ten francs.

Maurice paid no attention to the presence of this miserable wretch, whom by a natural instinct he always avoided if he by any chance encountered him, regarding him in the light of a disgusting and venomous reptile.

"Ah, well!" said Simon to Tison's wife, who was wiping her eyes with her apron; "so you wish to bring yourself to the guillotine, Citizen?"

"I!" said the woman, "what put such a thought into your head?"

"Why, because you receive money from the municipal for allowing aristocrats entrance to the Austrian."

"I!" said the woman Tison; "be silent, you are mad!"

"This shall be entered in the procès-verbal," said Simon, emphatically.

"Come, now, they are friends of the Municipal Maurice, one of the best patriots that ever existed."

"Conspirators, I tell you. Besides, the Commune shall be informed; it will judge for itself."

"What! you mean to lodge information about me then, spy of the police!"

"Exactly so, if you do not lodge information yourself."

"Information about what? About what do you wish me to lodge information?"

"About what has happened."

"But nothing has happened."

"Where were these aristocrats?"

"There, upon the staircase."

"When Capet's wife ascended the stairs?"

"Yes."

"And they spoke to her?"

"They exchanged two words."

"Two words! Besides, there is a perfume of the aristocrat here."

"It is the scent of carnations."

"Carnations! what carnations?"

"Why, the citizen had a bunch of them, which perfumed the whole place."

"What citizen?"

"The one who saw the queen pass."

"Oh, the thing is clear; you say the queen! woman Tison this consorting with aristocrats will be your ruin! Ah, what is this I am treading upon?" continued Simon, stooping down.

"Ah!" said the woman Tison, "it is a flower, a carnation; it must have fallen from the hand of the Citizen Dixmer, when Marie Antoinette took one from her bouquet."

"The woman Capet took a flower from the Citizen Dixmer's bouquet?" said Simon.

"Yes; and it was I who gave her the bouquet," said Maurice, in a loud and menacing tone, who had been for some moments listening to this colloquy, and whose patience was nearly exhausted.

"It is all very well, it is all very well; one sees what one sees, and one knows what one says," growled Simon, who still held in his hand the carnation crushed by his huge foot.

"And I also know one thing," replied Maurice, "which I am now going to tell you; it is that you have nothing whatever to do in this keep, and that your honorable post of hangman is down there with the little Capet, whom I would, for your own sake, recommend you not to chastise to-day, as I am here to defend him."

"Do you threaten me? Do you call me hangman?" cried Simon, crushing the flower in his hand. "Ah! we shall see if it is permitted these aristocrats — why, what is this?"

"What?" asked Maurice.

"That I feel in this carnation? Ah! ah!"

The eyes of Maurice were transfixed with astonishment as Simon drew from the calyx of the flower a small paper, rolled with the most exquisite care, which had been artistically introduced into the centre of the clustering leaves.

"My God!" said Maurice, "what can this mean?"

"We shall know, we shall very soon know," said Simon, approaching the window. "Ah! you and your friend Lorin told me I did not know how to read. Well! you shall see."

Lorin had calumniated Simon; he could read all kinds of print, and manuscript also when sufficiently large. But the writing on the little billet was so minute that Simon was obliged to have recourse to his spectacles. He consequently placed it on the window, while he proceeded to take an inventory of the contents of his pockets; but while thus engaged, the Citizen Agricola opened the door of the antechamber exactly facing the little window, thereby causing a current of air which blew away the little paper, light as a feather from a bird's wing, so that when Simon, after a moment's exploration, had discovered his spectacles, placed them on his nose, and turned himself round, his labor was lost, — the paper had disappeared.

"There was a paper here," roared Simon, crimson with rage and disappointment, — "there was a paper here. Look to yourself, Citizen Municipal, for it must and shall be found."

And he descended precipitately, leaving Maurice in a state of stupefaction.

Ten minutes afterward three members of the Commune entered the keep. The queen was still upon the platform, and strict orders had been issued that she should be kept in total ignorance of all that had just occurred. The members of the Commune desired to be conducted to her presence.

The first object which met their view was the crimson carnation, which she still held in her hand. They regarded her with surprise, and approaching her, —

"Give us this flower," said the president of the deputation. The queen, who had not expected this intrusion, started and hesitated.

"Surrender your flower, Madame," said Maurice, in a sort of alarm, "I entreat you."

The queen tendered them the carnation. The president took it and retired, followed by his colleagues, into a neighboring apartment to make an examination, and draw up the procès-verbal.

They opened the flower — it was empty.

Maurice breathed afresh.

"Wait a moment," said one of the members, "the heart of the carnation has been removed. The calyx is empty, it is true, but in this calyx most unquestionably a letter has been introduced."

"I am quite ready and willing," said Maurice, "to furnish all necessary explanation; but first of all, I request to be arrested."

"We shall make a minute of your proposal, but shall not act upon it," said the president. "You are known as a stanch patriot, Citizen Lindey."

"And I will answer with my life for the friends I had the imprudence to bring with me."

"Answer for no one," replied the procurator.

A tremendous hubbub was now heard in the court. It was Simon, who having long and vainly sought for the little billet wafted away by the wind, went to Santerre and informed him that an attempt had been made to carry off the queen, with all the accessories which the powers of his excited imagination could lend to such an event. Santerre was in great haste; he investigated the Temple, and changed the guard, to the great disgust of Lorin, who stoutly protested against this offence offered to his battalion.

"Ah! vile cobbler," said he to Simon, menacing him with his sabre, "I have you to thank for this pleasantry; but only wait a little, and I will pay you back in your own coin."

"I think rather that the entire nation will pay you," said the shoemaker, rubbing his hands.

"Citizen Maurice," said Santerre, "hold yourself at the disposal of the Commune, who will examine you."

"I await your orders, Commandant; but I have already said that I desire to be arrested, and I repeat my request."

"Wait, wait," murmured Simon, with a malicious smile; "since you are so bent upon it, we shall try to settle that little matter for you," and he went to find the woman Tison.

CHAPTER XXIII.

ARTHÉMISE.

They searched during the whole day in the court, in the garden and its environs, for the little billet which had caused all this tumult, and which they no longer doubted contained the whole plot.

They interrogated the queen, after having separated her from her daughter and sister, but elicited nothing more from her than that she had, on the staircase, encountered a young woman carrying a bouquet, and had drawn a single flower from the centre.

"Moreover, she would not have plucked this flower had she not first obtained the consent of the Municipal Maurice."

She had nothing more to tell. This was the truth in all its force and simplicity.

This was all reported to Maurice when his turn came to be questioned, and he declared that the deposition of the queen was quite correct.

"But," said the president, "there was then a plot."

"Impossible," said Maurice; "I was dining at Madame Dixmer's, and proposed that she should see the prisoners, hearing her remark she had never done so; but neither the day nor the manner of so doing was arranged."

"But the flowers were purchased," said the president; "the bouquet had been made beforehand."

"Not at all; I myself purchased these flowers from a flower-girl, who offered them to us at the corner of the Rue des Vieilles-Audriettes."

"But at least this flower-girl presented the bouquet to you?"

"No, Citizen; I selected it myself from ten or twelve others. Certainly, I purchased the most beautiful."

"But was there a possibility of secreting this billet on your road to the tower?"

"Impossible, Citizen. I never left Madame Dixmer's side for a moment, and to perform the operation named on each flower, — for remark that every flower, according to Simon's account, must have contained a like billet, — would at least occupy half a day or more."

"But, in short, could not two prepared billets have been placed in the flowers?"

"The prisoner in my presence took one at random, after having declined the rest."

"Then, in your opinion, Citizen Lindey, there was not a plot at all?"

"Oh, there must have been a plot!" replied Maurice, "and I am the first not only to believe but to affirm it; my friends, however, were not concerned in it. Nevertheless, as the nation must necessarily be alarmed, I offer security by surrendering myself prisoner."

"Not at all," said Santerre; "should we act thus with tried friends like you? If you surrender yourself prisoner to answer for your friends, I surrender myself prisoner to answer for you. The thing is simple. There is no positive accusation. No one will know what has passed. Let us henceforth act with redoubled vigilance, — you especially, — and we shall succeed in probing this matter to the bottom, and at the same time avoid publicity."

"Thanks, Commandant," said Maurice; "but I shall answer as you would answer were you in my place. We must not stop here; we must discover the flower-girl."

"The flower-girl is far away, but be perfectly easy on that point; she shall be sought for. As for you, watch your friends, while I will guard the prison correspondence."

No one had thought of Simon, but he had formed his own project.

He arrived toward the conclusion of the sitting, and learned the decision of the Commune.

"Ah! then all that is needed is a formal accusation," said he, "to make sure work. Wait five minutes and I will lay one before you."

"What is it?" said the president.

"It is," said Simon, "the courageous Citizen Tison who accuses of secret practices that partisan of the aristocracy, Maurice, and denounces the intrigues of another equally false patriot, one of his friends named Lorin."

"Take care, take care, Simon; your zeal for the nation perhaps misleads you. Maurice and Lorin are tried patriots."

"That will be seen at the tribunal," replied Simon.

"Consider well, Simon; this will be a disgraceful proceeding in the sight of all true patriots."

"Disgraceful or not, what is that to me? Do I dread disgrace? We shall at least learn the whole truth about traitors."

"Then you persist in lodging an accusation in the name of the woman Tison?"

"I will accuse them myself this very night to the Cordeliers, and you too, Citizen President, if you do not at once command the arrest of that traitor Maurice.

"Well, so be it," said the president, who, after the manner of those wretched times, trembled before those who clamored the loudest; "he shall be arrested."

While this decision was forming against him, Maurice had returned to the Temple, where the following billet awaited him, —

Our guard being violently broken up, I shall not be able, in all probability, to see you before to-morrow morning. Come then and breakfast with me ; during that meal you shall give me a true and particular account of the plots and conspiracies discovered by Simon.

A pink the culprit was, —
So honest Simon does depose ;
But I shall information seek
This morning from a lovely rose.

And to-morrow, in my turn, I shall lay before you all Arthémise's answers to my questions.

Yours faithfully,

LORIN.

Maurice replied, —

There is nothing new ; so sleep in peace to-night, and breakfast without me to-morrow, as, on reviewing the incidents of the day, I find I shall not, in all probability, be able to leave till noon.

I should like to be a zephyr to waft a kiss to the rose of which you speak.

I give you leave to whistle at my prose as much as I do at your verse.

Yours faithfully,

MAURICE.

P. S. For the rest, I believe the conspiracy was only a false alarm, after all.

Lorin had indeed left at one o'clock with the whole of his battalion, thanks to the brutal conduct of the shoemaker ; he however consoled himself with a quatrain, and went to visit Arthémise.

Arthémise was delighted to see Lorin. The weather, as we have said, was magnificent; she therefore proposed a walk along the quay, to which Lorin of course assented. They had walked some distance, discoursing on politics, Lorin recounting his expulsion from the Temple and vainly endeavoring to divine the cause, when, on reaching the height of the Rue des Barres, they perceived a flower-girl, who, like themselves, was walking up the right bank of the Seine.

"Ah, Citizen Lorin!" said Arthémise, "I hope you are going to present me with a bouquet?"

"Two, if you wish it," said Lorin; and they both redoubled their speed to overtake the flower-girl, who walked at a rapid pace.

On arriving at the Bridge Marie, the young girl stopped, and leaning over the parapet, emptied the contents of her basket into the river.

The flowers separated, whirled round for an instant in the air, while the bouquets, dragged down by their weight, fell more quickly, till at last both flowers and bouquets floated upon the surface, following the course of the water.

"Stop!" said Arthémise, regarding the flower-girl thus strangely occupied; "it is said — but yes — but no — but if — ah! this is strange."

The flower-girl placed her finger on her lips, as if to entreat Arthémise to be silent, and disappeared.

"Who is this, then?" said Lorin; "do you know this mortal, goddess?"

"No; I fancied at first — but certainly I am deceived."

"She, however, made a sign to you," persisted Lorin.

"But why is she a flower-girl this morning?" said Arthémise to herself.

"You acknowledge, then, that you know her, Arthémise?" asked Lorin.

"Yes," replied Arthémise; "she is a flower-girl I sometimes deal with."

"At all events," said Lorin, "she has a strange method of disposing of her merchandise."

And both, after having looked for the last time at the flowers, which already arrived at the wooden bridge had received a fresh impetus from the arm of the river passing under its arches, continued their route toward the Rapée, where they anticipated dining tête-à-tête.

This incident was forgotten for the moment; but as it was at least singular, and of rather a mysterious character, it vividly impressed Lorin's poetic imagination.

In the mean time, the accusation brought by Tison's wife against Maurice and Lorin caused a great tumult at the club of the Jacobins; and Maurice was informed at the Temple by the Commune that his safety was endangered by the public indignation. This was a recommendation to the young municipal to conceal himself if he were guilty; but with conscious rectitude Maurice remained at the Temple, where he was found at his post when they came to arrest him, and at the same time to interrogate him.

Remaining firm in his resolution not to endanger the safety of his friends, in whom he felt the most implicit confidence, Maurice was not the man to sacrifice himself by a ridiculous silence worthy of a hero of romance, and therefore demanded that the flower-girl should be arrested.

It was five o'clock in the evening when Lorin returned home, and heard, at the same moment, of the arrest of Maurice, and also of the demand made by him.

The flower-girl of the Bridge Marie instantly recurred to him like a sudden revelation. This singular individual casting her flowers into the Seine; the coincidence of place; the half admission of Arthémise, — all these facts combined convinced him that this was the solution of the mystery demanded by Maurice.

He bounded from his chamber, flew rather than ran down four flights of stairs, and precipitated himself into the presence of the Goddess Reason, who was engaged in embroidering golden stars on a robe of blue gauze. It was her robe of divinity.

"A truce to the stars, sweetheart," said Lorin; "they have arrested Maurice this morning, and, in all human probability, this evening I shall share the same fate."

"Maurice arrested!"

"By Heaven, he is! In these times nothing is more common than the occurrence of such troubles; but they excite little attention because they come in troops, that is all. Almost all important matters originate in trifles. Never neglect trifles. Who was that flower-girl we met this morning, sweetheart?"

Arthémise started.

"What flower-girl?"

"The one who so recklessly cast her flowers into the Seine."

"Ah, my goodness!" said Arthémise; "is this circumstance, then, so serious that you return to question me so urgently about it?"

"So serious, sweetheart, that I entreat you to answer my question without loss of time."

"Dear Lorin, I cannot do so."

"Goddess, with you nothing is impossible."

"I am in honor bound to keep silence."

"And I am bound in honor to make you speak."

"But why do you insist upon it thus?"

"Why? Zounds! that Maurice may not have his throat cut!"

"Merciful Heavens! Maurice guillotined!" cried the young woman, much alarmed.

"Without speaking of myself; for to tell you the truth my head feels by no means secure upon my shoulders."

"Ah! No, no!" said Arthémise, "to speak would be the poor girl's utter ruin."

At this moment Lorin's official rushed into the apartment.

"Ah! Citizen," cried he, "save yourself! save yourself!"

"And why?" demanded Lorin.

"Because the gendarmes have arrived; and while they were forcing an entrance, I gained the next house by the roof, and hastened to prevent your return."

Arthémise uttered a heart-rending cry, for she truly loved Lorin.

"Arthémise," said Lorin, "do you really place the life of a flower-girl in comparison with that of Maurice and that of your lover? If so, I declare to you that I no longer regard you as the Goddess Reason, but shall proclaim you the Goddess Folly."

"Poor Sophie!" exclaimed the ex-dancer of the Opera; "if I betray you, it is not my fault."

"Well done, my darling!" said Lorin, presenting a paper to Arthémise, "you have already favored me with her Christian name, oblige me now with her surname and address."

"Oh, write it! never, never!" cried Arthémise; "I would rather tell you."

"Tell me, then, and rest assured I shall not forget."

And Arthémise, in an agitated voice, gave the name and address of the pretended flower-girl to Lorin.

"She is called Sophie Tison, and lives, Rue des Nonandières, No. 24."

At this name, Lorin uttered an exclamation, and fled. He had not reached the corner of the street when a letter was delivered to Arthémise. It only contained three lines, —

Not a word concerning me, dear friend ; the revelation of my name would infallibly ruin me. Wait till to-morrow. I quit Paris to-night.

Thine,

SOPHIE.

"Oh, my God!" cried the future goddess, "if I could only have divined this I should have waited till to-morrow," and she rushed to the window to recall Lorin, if there was yet time ; but he had disappeared.

CHAPTER XXIV.

THE MOTHER AND DAUGHTER.

We have already said that in a few hours the news of this event had circulated through Paris. In short, there were at this epoch various indiscretions easy to comprehend on the part of a government of which the political schemes were made and unmade in the street.

The rumor gradually gained ground, till it at length reached the old Rue Saint Jacques, and two hours after the arrest of Maurice they heard of his detention.

Thanks to the activity of Simon, the details of the plot were quickly reported beyond the Temple; but as every one embellished the original according to his fancy, the truth was somewhat altered by the time it reached the master-tanner's. One said a poisoned flower had been conveyed to the queen, by means of which the Austrian would stupefy her guards, and thus be enabled to escape from the Temple; it was also said that certain suspicions were entertained of the fidelity of the battalion dismissed by Santerre on the preceding evening, — so that already several victims were consigned to the hatred of the people.

But the inhabitants of the old Rue Saint Jacques were not, of course, deceived as to the real nature of the event; and Morand on one side, and Dixmer on the other, went out immediately, leaving Geneviève a victim to the most violent despair.

If this misfortune had befallen Maurice, it was she who had been the sole cause of it. It was her hand that had conducted the young man blindfold to the entrance of the dungeon which now enclosed him, and which, in all human probability, he would quit only for the scaffold.

But under any circumstances Maurice should not lose his head on account of his devotion to her wishes. If Maurice were condemned, she would accuse herself before the tribunal, and would confess all. She would take all the responsibility upon herself, and at the expense of her life would save Maurice. And Geneviève, instead of feeling any fear of death, experienced, on the contrary, a melancholy happiness at the idea of dying for Maurice.

She loved the young man, she loved him more than was right in a woman who belonged not to herself; and to die would be for her the means of giving back to God her soul, pure and unspotted as she had received it from him.

On quitting the house, Dixmer and Morand separated, the former took the road to the Rue de la Corderie, the latter hastened to the Rue des Nonandières. Arriving at the end of the Bridge Marie, Morand perceived that crowd of idlers and common people which in Paris during or after the occurrence of anything remarkable collects at the place, as crows assemble on the field of battle.

At this sight Morand stopped short, a universal tremor shook his frame, and he leaned for support against the parapet.

At length, after a few seconds, he regained the almost miraculous power which under trying circumstances he exercised over his feelings, and mingling with the various groups, commenced his inquiries, and learned that a short time before they had taken from the Rue des Nonandières,

No. 24, a young woman, most certainly guilty of the crime of which she stood then accused, as they surprised her in the act of making these packets. Morand inquired before what club the poor girl would be interrogated, and found they had conducted her to the section Mère, where he immediately followed her.

The club was thronged, but by making free use of his elbows and fists, he succeeded in forcing an entrance. The first sight he encountered was the tall and noble figure of Maurice, standing haughtily in the place of the accused, and annihilating Simon by his looks.

"Yes, Citizens," cried Simon, who was concluding his accusation; "the Citizen Tison accuses the Citizen Lindey and the Citizen Lorin. The Citizen Lindey mentions a flower-girl, upon whom he endeavors to cast all the blame; but, as I told you before, the flower-girl will not be found, and that it is a vile plot formed by a body of aristocrats who toss back the ball from one to the other, like cowards as they are. You have seen, besides, that the Citizen Lorin had decamped when his presence was required; and he will return no more than the flower-girl."

"Then you have lied, Simon," cried a furious voice; "he will return, for he is here."

And Lorin strode into the hall.

"Room for me!" said he, pushing aside the spectators. "Room for me!" And he placed himself near Maurice.

The entrance of Lorin, so natural, and without affectation, yet combining all the freedom and strength inherent in the character of the young man, produced an immense effect upon the Tribunes, who instantly greeted him with cries of applause.

Maurice contented himself by smiling and holding out his hand to his friend, — the friend concerning whom he had said to himself, "I shall not long stand alone at the bench of the accused."

The spectators gazed with visible interest on these two handsome young men whom the foul shoemaker of the Temple, like a demon envious of their youth and beauty, had accused.

He soon perceived the unfavorable impression he had made, and determined to strike the last blow.

"Citizens!" roared he; "I demand that the generous Citizen Tison should be heard; let her speak, and bring forward her accusation."

"Citizens," said Lorin, "I demand that the flower-girl who has just been arrested, and who no doubt will be brought before you, may be first heard."

"No, no," said Simon; "it is just some false evidence, — some partisan of the aristocrats. Besides, the woman Tison is most impatient to forward the means of justice."

Meanwhile Lorin took the opportunity to whisper to Maurice.

"Yes," cried the Tribunes; "the deposition of the woman Tison; let her depose!"

"Is the woman Tison in the hall?" demanded the president.

"Without doubt she is here," cried Simon. "Citizen Tison, answer for yourself."

"I am here, President; but if I depose, will they give me back my daughter?" said the female jailer.

"Your daughter has nothing at all to do with the affair with which we are at present engaged," said the president. "Make your deposition first, and then appeal to the Commune to restore your child."

"Do you hear?" said Simon; "the citizen president commands you to make your deposition. Do so at once!"

"A moment," said the president, turning toward Maurice, astonished at the calmness of a man generally so impetuous. "One moment. Citizen Municipal, have you nothing to say first?"

"No, Citizen President, — except that before Simon attached the words 'traitor and coward' to a man like myself, it would have been better to have waited till he was more correctly informed."

"You say that? you say that?" replied Simon, with the sneering accent peculiar to the plebeian Parisian.

"I say, Simon," replied Maurice, with more of sorrow than anger, "that you will experience your punishment immediately, when you see what is about to happen."

"What is about to happen, I should like to know?" demanded Simon.

"Citizen President," said Maurice, without deigning to notice the question of his hideous accuser, "I unite with my friend Lorin in demanding that the young girl who has just been arrested may be heard before this poor woman is compelled to speak, who, no doubt, has been prompted to this deposition."

"Listen, Citizen!" said Simon; "listen! They say down there that you are a false witness?"

"I a false witness!" cried the woman Tison. "You shall see; you shall see! Wait!"

"Citizen," said Maurice, "in pity desire this woman to remain silent."

"Ah! you are afraid," said Simon, — "you are afraid! Citizen President, I require the deposition of the woman Tison."

"Yes! yes! the deposition!" cried the Tribunes.

"Silence!" cried the president; "the Commune returns."

At this moment the sound of a carriage was heard outside, amid the noise of shouts and arms.

Simon turned uneasily toward the door.

"Quit the box," said the president to him; "you have nothing more to tell." Simon descended.

At this moment some gendarmes entered, with a crowd of curious idlers, which was soon driven back, and a woman was pushed toward the judgment-hall.

"Is it she?" whispered Lorin to Maurice.

"It is," replied Maurice. "Miserable woman, she is lost!"

"The flower-girl! the flower-girl!" murmured the Tribunes, whose curiosity was raised to the highest pitch. "Is this the flower-girl?"

"I demand, before everything else," roared Simon, "the deposition of the woman Tison. You commanded her to depose, President, and she has not yet done so."

The woman was recalled, and entered upon a dreadful and circumstantial deposition. The flower-girl, it was true, was alone criminal; but Maurice and Lorin were her accomplices.

This denunciation produced an incredible effect upon the public mind; and now, indeed, Simon was in the ascendant.

"Gendarmes," said the president, "bring forward the flower-girl."

"Oh, this is frightful!" said Maurice, concealing his face in his hands.

The flower-girl was called, and placed before the Tribune, exactly opposite to Tison's wife, whose testimony had convicted her of a capital crime.

She raised her veil.

"Sophie!" cried the woman Tison; "my child. You here!"

"Yes, mother," replied the young woman, gently.

"And why do you enter between two gendarmes?"

"Because I am accused, mother."

"You! Accused, and by whom?" cried the woman, in anguish.

"By you, mother."

A frightful silence, like the precursor of death, fell suddenly upon the noisy assemblage, while the painful feeling excited by this horrible scene oppressed every heart.

"Her daughter," was whispered, as if by voices in the distance, — "her daughter! Unhappy woman!"

Maurice and Lorin regarded both the accuser and the accused with sentiments of deep commiseration, mingled with respectful pity for their unhappy fate.

Simon, anxious to witness the conclusion of this tragedy, in which he hoped both Maurice and Lorin would remain actors, endeavored to withdraw from the attention of the woman Tison, who gazed wildly around.

"What is your name, Citizen?" said the president to the young girl, himself affected at the scene.

"Sophie Tison, Citizen."

"What is your age?"

"Nineteen years."

"Where do you reside?"

"Rue des Nonandières, No. 24."

"Did you sell the Citizen Lindey, whom you now see on the bench, a bouquet of carnations this morning?"

The young girl turned round and looked at Maurice.

"Yes, Citizen, I did," said she.

The mother herself gazed at her daughter, her eyes dilated with terror.

"Are you aware that every carnation contained a billet addressed to the widow of Capet?"

"I know it," replied the accused.

A movement of horror and admiration spread itself through the hall.

"Why did you offer these carnations to the Citizen Maurice?"

"Because I perceived that he wore the scarf of a municipal, and I imagined he was going to the Temple."

"Who are your accomplices?"

"I have none."

"What! have you then concocted this plot alone?"

"If it is a plot, I alone am concerned in it."

"But did the Citizen Maurice know —"

"That the flowers contained the billets?"

"Yes."

"The Citizen Maurice is a municipal; the Citizen Maurice could converse with the queen at any hour of the day or the night. The Citizen Maurice, if he had wished to say anything to the queen, had no occasion to write; he could speak."

"And you do not know the Citizen Maurice Lindey?"

"I had sometimes seen him come to the Temple while I was there with my poor mother, but I only know him by sight."

"Do you see, miserable wretch," said Lorin, shaking his fist at Simon, who, dismayed at the turn of affairs, with his head lowered, was attempting to sneak away unperceived, — "do you see what you have done?"

Every one regarded Simon with looks of deep indignation.

The president continued.

"Since you made up these bouquets, you of course are aware that each flower contained a paper, and therefore must know also what was written upon that paper?"

"Of course I do."

"Well, then, tell us what it was?"

"Citizen," said the young girl, with firmness, "I have told all I either can, or will, tell."

"Then you refuse to answer this question?"

"Yes."

"Do you know to what you expose yourself?"

"Yes."

"You trust perhaps to your youth and beauty?"

"I trust in God."

"Citizen Maurice Lindey, Citizen Hyacinthe Lorin," said the president, "you are free. The Commune recognizes your innocence, and admires your loyal spirit. Gendarmes, conduct the Citizen Sophie to the prison of the section."

At these words the woman Tison seemed to awake, and uttering a piercing cry, attempted to rush forward once more to embrace her daughter, but was withheld by the guards.

"I forgive you, mother," said the young girl, as they led her away.

The woman Tison uttered a savage roar, and fell down as if dead.

"Noble girl!" murmured Morand, filled at once with grief and admiration.

CHAPTER XXV.

THE CONSPIRACY.

IMMEDIATELY following the events we have just narrated, a last scene came to fill up the complement of the drama which was unfolding its sombre turns of fortune.

The woman Tison, struck as by a thunderbolt at what had occurred, and totally abandoned by those who had escorted her, — for there is something revolting even in an involuntary crime, and it certainly amounts to a great crime when a mother condemns her own daughter to an ignominious death, were it even from excess of zealous patriotism, — the woman, we say, after remaining for some time in a state of insensibility, at length raised her head, looked wildly around, and finding herself deserted and alone, uttered a loud cry, and rushed toward the door.

At this door a few idlers more curious than the rest still remained congregated together, who dispersed when they beheld her, and pointing with their fingers, said one to another, —

"Do you see that woman? It is she who denounced her daughter."

The wretched woman uttered a cry of despair, and rushed toward the Temple. But on reaching the third of the Rue Michel le Comte, a man placed himself in front of her, impeding her progress, and concealing his face in his mantle.

"Are you content," said he, "now you have killed your child?"

"Killed my child!" cried the poor mother, — "killed my child! no, no, it is not possible!"

"It is so, notwithstanding, for your daughter has been sentenced."

"And where have they taken her?"

"To the Conciergerie; from there she will be sent to the Revolutionary Tribunal, and you know what becomes of those who are sent there."

"Stand aside," said the woman Tison, "and let me pass."

"Where are you going?"

"To the Conciergerie."

"What are you going there for?"

"To see her again."

"They will not allow you to enter."

"They will permit me to lie at the door, to live there, to sleep there. I will remain there till she comes out, and then at least I shall see her once more."

"Suppose some one promised to restore you your child?"

"What do you say?"

"I ask you, supposing a man were to promise to give you back your child, would you do what that man required of you in return?"

"Anything for my child! anything for my Sophie!" cried the woman, wringing her hands in despair, — "Anything! anything! anything!"

"Listen," said the unknown. "It is God who now punishes you."

"And for what?"

"For the tortures you have inflicted so mercilessly on a poor mother as unhappy as yourself."

"Of whom do you speak? What do you mean?"

"You have often driven the unhappy prisoner to the very verge of that despair where you are yourself at this moment, by your revelations and brutalities. God now punishes you for all this by conducting this daughter, whom you love so much, to the scaffold."

"You said there was some man who could save her. Where is that man; what does he want; what does he demand?"

"This man requires that you cease to persecute the queen; that you ask her pardon for the outrages already committed against her; and that if at any time you perceive that this woman, who is also a weeping, despairing mother, by any unforeseen circumstance, or by some miracle from Heaven, is upon the point of saving herself, instead of opposing her flight, you do all in your power to aid and abet it."

"Listen, Citizen," said the woman Tison. "You are the man, — is it not so?"

"Well."

"It is you who promise to save my child?"

The unknown remained silent.

"Will you engage to do it? Will you promise; will you swear it? Answer me."

"All that a man can do to save a woman, I will do to save your daughter."

"He cannot save her!" cried the woman, uttering piercing cries, — "he cannot save her! When he promised me he lied."

"Do what you can for the queen, and I will do all in my power for your daughter."

"What care I for the queen? She is a mother who has a daughter. But if they come to cutting off heads, it will not be her daughter's they will cut off, but her own. They may cut my throat so that they spare my child. They may lead me to the guillotine, so that they do not harm a hair of her head, and I will go there singing, —

"Ah! ça ira, ça ira, ça ira,
Les aristocrates à la lanterne. . . . "

And she commenced singing in a frightful voice, then suddenly stopped short, and burst into a fit of frenzied laughter.

The man in the mantle himself appeared alarmed at this burst of madness, and retreated a step or two from her.

"Ah! you shall not escape me thus," said the woman Tison, in despair, and retaining her hold of his mantle; "you shall not at one moment come and say to a mother, 'Do this, and I will rescue your child,' and afterward say, 'Perhaps.' Will you save her?"

"Yes."

"When?"

"The day she is conducted from the Conciergerie to the scaffold."

"But why wait — why not to-night? this evening — this moment, even?"

"Because I cannot do so."

"Ah! you know you cannot; you well know you cannot!" cried the woman Tison; "but as for me, I can."

"What can you do?"

"I can persecute the prisoner, as you call her; I can watch the queen, as you term her, aristocrat that you are! and I can enter the prison any hour of the day or night. All this will I do. And as to her escaping, we shall see. Yes, we shall very well see — since they will not save my daughter — if that woman will escape. Head for head. Do you like that? Madame Veto has been queen; that I know. Sophie Tison is only a poor girl; that I know. But under the guillotine we are all equal."

"Well, be it so," said the man in the mantle. "But you perform your part, and I will fulfil mine."

"Swear!"

"I swear it."

"By what do you swear?"

"Anything you choose."

"Have you a daughter?"

"No."

"Well, then," said the woman, in a disappointed tone, "by what then will you swear?"

"Listen. I swear by God."

"Bah!" exclaimed the woman Tison, "you know very well they have demolished the old one, and have not yet decided on the new."

"I swear by the tomb of my father."

"Swear not by a tomb, for that is prophetic of evil. Oh, my God! my God! When I think that perhaps in three days I may swear by the tomb of my child also! My daughter! My poor Sophie!" cried the woman Tison, frantically, till at the sound of her voice, raised to a shrill scream, several windows were opened.

At sight of the opened windows, another man, who seemed to detach himself from the wall, advanced toward the first.

"Nothing can be done with this woman," said the first; "she is mad."

"No; she is a mother," replied the other, and dragged his companion away.

When she saw them leaving her, the woman Tison seemed to come back to herself.

"Where are you going?" cried she. "Are you going to rescue Sophie? Wait for me then; I will go with you. Wait for me; do wait for me!"

And the poor wretch followed them, screaming, till at the corner of the nearest street, she lost sight of them altogether; and not knowing which way to turn, she remained for an instant undecided, looking on every side, when seeing in the silence and darkness of the night only a double symbol of death, she uttered a cry of horror and fell on the pavement without sense or motion.

The clock struck ten.

During this time, and while the same hour was resounding from the Temple clock, the queen as usual sat in her chamber, between her daughter and her sister, near a smoky lamp. She was concealed from the sight of the municipals by Madame Royale, who, pretending to embrace her, was reading over again a small billet written on the smallest piece of paper imaginable, and in characters so minute that her eyes, already nearly blinded by her scalding tears, scarcely retained strength to decipher it.

The billet contained the following lines, —

"To-morrow, Tuesday, ask permission to walk in the garden; this will be accorded without objection, as an order has been issued to grant you this favor whenever you think proper to solicit it. After two or three turns, feign to feel fatigued, approach the cabin, and ask the Widow Plumeau to allow you to sit down. Then, in a moment, pretend to feel worse, and faint away. They will then close all the doors that they may be able to render you assistance, and you will remain with Madame Elizabeth and Madame Royale. Immediately the trap-door of the cellar will open. Precipitate yourself, your sister, and daughter through this aperture, and you are all three saved."

"Mon Dieu!" said Madame Royale, "does our evil destiny tire in the pursuit?"

"If this billet should prove only a trap," said Madame Elizabeth.

"No, no," said the queen; "these characters have always indicated to me the presence of a mysterious but equally brave and faithful friend."

"Is it the Chevalier?" demanded Madame Royale.

"He himself," replied the queen.

Madame Elizabeth clasped her hands.

"Let us each read the billet again very softly," replied the queen, "so that if one of us forget any particular, another will remember."

They all three re-read the letter, and had just finished so doing, when they heard the door of their chamber turn slowly on its hinges. The two princesses turned round; the queen alone remained stationary, except that by an almost imperceptible movement she raised her hand to her hair and hid the billet in her head-dress. It was a municipal who opened the door.

"What is your business, Monsieur?" demanded Madame Elizabeth and Madame Royale, at the same moment.

"Hum!" said the municipal, "it appears to me that you retire very late to-night?"

"Is there, then," said the queen, with her usual dignity, "a new decree from the Commune, stating the hour at which I am to go to bed?"

"No, Citizen," said the municipal; "but if necessary they will make one."

"In the mean time, Monsieur," said Marie Antoinette, "respect, I do not say the chamber of a queen, but that of a woman."

"Truly," growled the municipal, "these aristocrats always speak as if they were something—"

But in the mean time, subdued by that dignity, haughty in her prosperity, but which three years of suffering had calmed down, he withdrew.

An instant afterward the lamp was extinguished, and the three females retired in darkness, as usual.

The next morning at nine o'clock, the queen, having re-read the letter before she arose, in order that she might not misconstrue any of the instructions contained there, tore it into almost invisible fragments. She then hastily finished her toilet, awoke her sister, and entered the chamber of the princess.

A minute afterward she came out, and called the municipals on guard.

"What do you want, Citizen?" said one of them, appearing at the door, while the other did not even discontinue his breakfast to answer the royal appeal.

"Sir," said Marie Antoinette, "I have just left my daughter's chamber, and find her very ill. Her limbs are pained and swollen for want of exercise; and you know, sir, it is I who have doomed her to this life of inaction. I received permission to walk in the garden, but in descending I had necessarily to pass before the door of the room occupied by my husband in his lifetime. When I made the attempt my heart failed me, and I had not courage to do so, and have since limited my walks to the platform. Now, however, I find this exercise insufficient for my poor child. I therefore entreat you, Citizen Municipal, to request of General Santerre, in my name, the renewal of this privilege."

The queen had pronounced these words in a manner at once so mild, yet dignified; had so strenuously avoided all allusions to anything that could wound the feelings of the Republican, — that he who had entered her presence with his head covered, as for the most part was the custom of these men, gradually raised his red bonnet, and when she had finished, said, bowing respectfully, —

"Rest assured, Madame, your request shall be laid before the citizen general."

Then on retiring, as if to convince himself he had yielded to justice rather than weakness. "It is just," said he, "after all; it is only right."

"What is just?" demanded the other municipal.

"That this woman should be permitted to walk in the garden with her child, who is an invalid."

"Bah!" said the other, "when she asks to be allowed to walk from the Temple to the Place de la Revolution, that will be permitted her fast enough."

The queen heard these words, and grew pale, but still drew from them fresh courage for the great attempt she meditated.

The municipal finished his breakfast, and descended. The queen requested permission to take hers in her daughter's room, which was granted.

Madame Royale, to confirm the statement concerning her ill-health, did not quit her bed; the queen and Madame Elizabeth remained near her.

At eleven o'clock Santerre arrived. His coming was, as usual, announced by the drums beating the march, and by the entrance of a fresh battalion and other municipals, who came in their turn to relieve those on guard.

When Santerre had fully reviewed the battalion leaving, and the one about to take its place, and had paraded his large heavy-limbed horse round the court of the Temple, he stood still for a moment. This was for the purpose of receiving any claims, denunciations, or requests.

The municipal, availing himself of this halt, approached him.

"Well, what do you want?" said Santerre, bruskly.

"Citizen," said the municipal, "I come to entreat on the part of the queen —"

"Who is the queen?" interrupted Santerre.

"True!" said the municipal, astonished at his own mistake. "What have I said — I must be mad! I came to speak on the part of Madame Veto —"

"All in good time," said Santerre. "Now I understand you, what have you to say to me?"

"The young Veto is ill, it appears, from want of proper air and exercise."

"Well, is it necessary again to bring this before the public? The nation granted her permission to walk in the garden, and she refused it. Good-morning."

"That is exactly it. She regrets this now, and requests you will permit her to do so."

"There is no difficulty about that. You all hear," said Santerre, "that Capet's wife will come down to walk in the garden. Now," addressing the whole battalion, "take care she does not abuse this favor granted her by the nation, by making her escape over the wall; for if that happens I will cut off every one of your heads." A roar of laughter followed this pleasantry of the citizen general. "Now that is settled," said Santerre, "adieu. I am going to the Commune. It appears that they have reunited Roland and Barbaroux, and the question under debate is to deliver them a passport to another world."

It was this intelligence that had put the citizen general in such good humor.

He then galloped away.

The battalion who were removing the guard followed him; then the municipals also gave place to those who had received Santerre's instructions respecting the queen.

One of the municipals went up to Marie Antoinette and informed her that the general had granted her request.

"Oh!" thought she, looking through the window toward heaven, "does thy wrath abate, Lord? and does thy terrible right hand grow weary of pressing so heavily upon us?"

"Thanks, Monsieur," said she to the municipal, with that fascinating smile which had proved the ruin of Barnave, and turned the heads of so many of his fellow-men, — "thanks!"

Then turning round to her little dog, who leaped after her, walking on his hind-legs, for he well understood from the looks of his mistress that something unusual was about to take place, —

"Come, Jet," said she, "we are going for a walk."

The little animal began to yelp and jump, and after looking at the municipal attentively, comprehending, no doubt, that from this man originated the intelligence which had made his mistress so happy, ran toward him, and wagging his long and silky tail, ventured even to caress him.

This man, who perhaps might be insensible to the prayers of a queen, could not resist the caresses of a little dog.

"If only on account of this little beast, you should go out more frequently, Citizen Capet. Humanity commands us to take care of every creature."

"At what hour shall we go out, sir?" asked the queen. "Do you not think the sun would do us good?"

"You may go out when you please," said the municipal; "there has been no restriction on the subject. If you like to go out at mid-day, as that is the time they change the sentinels, there will be less bustle in the court."

"Then let it be at mid-day," said the queen, pressing her hand to her side to still the beating of her heart.

And she looked at this man, who appeared to her less stern than his associates, and who, perhaps, for kindly yielding to the wishes of the prisoner might fall a sacrifice to the conspiracy which they meditated.

But at the moment when compassion was stealing over the heart of the woman, the soul of the queen was aroused. She thought of the 10th of August and of the corpses of her faithful friends strewed upon the floors of the palace; she recalled to memory the 2d of September, and the head of the Princess Lamballe carried on a pike before her windows; she remembered the 21st of January when her husband died upon the scaffold, the noise of drums drowning his feeble voice; finally, she thought of her son, poor child! whose cries of distress had more than once reached her ears when she had no power to render him help, — and her heart became hardened.

"Alas!" cried she, "misfortune is like the blood of the ancient Hydras, — it teems with crops of future evils!"

CHAPTER XXVI.

THE LITTLE DOG JET.

THE municipal left to call his colleagues and to read the procès-verbal left by the former municipals.

The queen remained alone with her sister and child. They all three looked at one another. Then Madame Royale threw her arms round the queen, and warmly embraced her. Madame Elizabeth approached her sister, and held out her hand.

"Let us offer up our prayers to God," said the queen, "but in such a manner that no one can hear us."

There are fatal epochs when prayer, that natural hymn of praise which God has implanted in every human heart, becomes suspicious in the eyes of men, since prayer is an act of praise and acknowledgment for mercies received. But in the ideas of her keepers hope and gratitude afforded subject for inquietude; since the queen could hope only for flight, and could thank God only for affording her the means of effecting it.

This mental prayer concluded, all three remained without uttering a word.

Eleven o'clock struck, then twelve. At the moment when the last stroke resounded from the bronze bell, the noise of arms was heard on the spiral staircase ascending to the queen.

"They are relieving sentinels," said she; "they come for us."

She saw her sister and daughter turn very pale.

"Courage!" said she, trembling herself with emotion.

"It is noon," cried a voice from below. "Bring down the prisoners."

"We are here, gentlemen," replied the queen, who, with a sentiment almost of regret, took a parting glance at the black walls and the rude appurtenances which had been more or less the companions of her captivity.

The first wicket opened, they gained the corridor, which, being dark, enabled the three captives to conceal their emotions. Before them frolicked little Jet; but when they arrived at the second, — that is to say the door from which Marie Antoinette endeavored to turn her eyes, — the faithful little animal first placed his nose to the ground, then laid his head upon his paws, and gave utterance to a succession of plaintive cries which terminated in a prolonged howl.

The queen passed on quickly, not having strength sufficient to recall her dog, and supported herself against the wall.

After advancing a few steps, her limbs refused their office, and she felt herself compelled to stop. Her sister and daughter approached her, and for a few moments the three females remained motionless, forming a melancholy group, the mother resting her face upon the head of her daughter, when little Jet rejoined them.

"Well!" cried the voice, "is she coming down or not?"

"We are coming," said the municipal, who had remained standing, respecting the queen's grief, so great in its simplicity.

"Come," said the queen, and again continued to descend.

When the prisoners had reached the bottom of the winding stair opposite the last door, under which the sun shed his rays of bright gold, the rolling of the drum was heard summoning the guard; then a profound silence, the effect of curiosity, ensued, and the massive door opened, revolving slowly upon its creaking hinges.

A woman was seated on the ground, or rather on the corner of the stone contiguous to this door. It was the woman Tison, whom the queen had not seen for four and twenty hours, and whose absence at supper the preceding evening and at their morning's meal had excited her surprise.

The queen already saw the light, the trees, the garden, and beyond the barrier which enclosed the garden her eyes eagerly sought the little hut of the canteen, where her friends doubtless awaited her; when, at the sound of footsteps, the woman Tison removed her hands, and the queen beheld a pale and care-worn face beneath a mass of gray dishevelled locks.

The change wrought in these few hours was so great that the queen stood overwhelmed with astonishment.

Then, with the deliberation peculiar to those deficient in reason, the woman Tison knelt down before the door, impeding the passage of Marie Antoinette.

"What do you want, my good woman?" demanded the queen.

"He said it was necessary that you should pardon me."

"Who said so?" demanded the queen.

"The man in the mantle," replied the woman Tison.

The queen looked at Madame Elizabeth and her daughter, surprised at this appeal.

"Go along, go!" said the municipal; "let the Widow Capet pass; she has permission to walk in the garden."

"I know it," said the old woman; "that is why I came to wait for her here, since they will not allow me to go up; and as I had to ask her forgiveness, I was obliged to wait for her coming out, to see her."

"But why then are you not permitted to go up?" demanded the queen.

The woman began to laugh.

"Because they pretend that I am mad," said she.

The queen looked at her and saw indeed that the wild eyes of the unhappy being reflected a strange light, — that vague light denoting aberration of intellect.

"Good Heaven!" said she. "Poor woman! what has happened to you?"

"Happened! Do you not know?" said the woman; "but if — You know very well, since it was on your account she was condemned."

"Who?"

"Sophie."

"Your daughter?"

"Yes, she, my poor child!"

"Condemned! by whom; how; why?"

"Because she sold a bouquet."

"What bouquet?"

"A bouquet of carnations. She is not a flower-girl, though," continued the old woman, as if endeavoring to collect her thoughts; "then how could she sell the bouquet?"

The queen shuddered; an invisible link connected this scene with her present situation. She understood that the time must not be lost in useless conversation.

"My good woman," said she, "allow me to pass, I entreat you; you can tell me all this by-and-by."

"No, now; you must pardon me, and I must assist you to escape, that he may save my daughter."

The queen turned as pale as death.

"My God!" murmured she, raising her eyes to heaven, then turning toward the municipal, —

"Sir," said she, "have the kindness to remove this woman; you see that she is mad."

"Come, come, mother," said the municipal; "decamp!"

But the woman clung to the wall, still reiterating, —

"She must pardon me, that he may save my daughter."

"But who is he?"

"The man in the mantle."

"Sister," said Madame Elizabeth, "try to console her."

"Oh, willingly," said the queen; "I believe, indeed, that will be the shortest way;" then turning toward the mad woman, —

"What do you desire, good woman?" said she.

"I wish you to pardon me all the suffering I have caused you by my unjust behavior; all the accusations I have made against you; and trust that when you see the man in the mantle, you will command him to save my daughter; for he will do all that you desire."

"I do not know whom you mean by the man in the mantle," said the queen; "but if all that is necessary to your peace of mind is to obtain my pardon for the offences you imagine you have committed against me, I freely forgive you, my poor woman, from the depths of my heart, and trust only that any one I may have offended will as sincerely pardon me."

"Oh!" cried the woman Tison, with an indescribable accent of joy, "he will save my child, since you have forgiven me. Your hand, Madame! your hand —"

The queen astonished, and at a loss to comprehend the meaning, presented her hand to the woman, who seized it, and ardently pressed it to her lips.

At this moment the hoarse voice of a hawker was heard in the Temple, resounding from the street.

"Here," cried he, "is the judgment and decree condemning Sophie Tison to the penalty of death for the crime of conspiracy!"

Scarcely had these words reached the ears of the woman Tison, than rising from her knees, with an air of dogged resolution, she extended her arms to impede the passage of the queen.

"O God!" cried the queen, who had not lost one word of the hawker's terrible cry.

"Condemned to death!" cried the mother; "my child condemned! — my Sophie lost! He has not then saved her, and now he cannot save her! Too late! too late!"

"Poor woman," said the queen, "believe me, I feel for you."

"You!" said she, looking at her fiercely with her blood-shot eyes. "You pity me? Never! never!"

"You are mistaken. I pity you from my heart; but do pray allow me to pass."

The woman burst into a hoarse laugh.

"Let you pass? No, no! I would have assisted you to escape, because he promised if I did so and asked your forgiveness he would rescue my daughter; but since she is condemned to death you shall not escape."

"Gentlemen!" cried the queen, "help! Do you not see that this woman is mad?"

"No, I am not mad; I know well what I am saying!" cried the woman. "It is the truth, — there was a conspiracy, and Simon discovered all. It was my poor daughter who sold the bouquet. She confessed it before the Revolutionary Tribunal — A bouquet of carnations — They had papers concealed in them."

"Madame," exclaimed the queen, "in the name of Heaven!"

The voice of the crier was again heard, repeating, —

"This is the judgment and decree condemning the girl Sophie Tison to the punishment of death for the crime of conspiracy!"

"Do you hear it?" screamed the lunatic, around whom the National Guards had now gathered; "do you hear? Condemned to death; it is you who have killed my daughter — you, Austrian, you!"

"Gentlemen," said the queen, "for pity's sake, if you will not release me from this poor mad creature, allow me at least to return to my apartments. I cannot support the reproaches of this woman; unjust though they are, they crush my heart," and she turned away, sighing deeply.

"Yes, yes; weep, hypocrite!" cried the maddened wretch; "your bouquet cost her dear — She might have known it. Thus it is with all those who serve you. You bring misery, Austrian, everywhere! Your friends are dead, — your husband and your defenders have all perished, — and now they will sacrifice my unhappy child! When will your turn come, that no more may die for you?" And the miserable creature accompanied these last words with threatening gestures.

"Unhappy woman!" observed Madame Elizabeth, venturing to speak, "do you forget that she whom you address is the queen?"

"The queen!" repeated the maniac, whose madness every moment increased, "if she is the queen, let her defend my poor girl from the hangmen who seek her life — Let her show mercy to my poor Sophie! — Kings show mercy — Render me back my child, and I will acknowledge you as queen. Till then, you are only a woman, and a woman who brings misery upon all, and kills all — "

"Oh, have pity, Madame!" cried Marie Antoinette; "you see my tears and distress," and she again made an attempt to pass, no longer from any hope of escape, but to free herself from this cruel attack.

"You shall not pass!" roared the old woman. "You want to escape, Madame Veto — I know it all, the man in the mantle told me; you want to go and rejoin the Prussians. But you shall not escape," continued she, clasping the robe of the queen; "I will prevent you. À la lanterne, Madame Veto! To arms, citizens! let us march — "

And with her arms wrestling, her grizzled locks dishevelled and hanging over her haggard countenance, her eyes blood-shot, the unfortunate creature fell to the ground, in her fall tearing the robe she still held in her hand.

The queen, terrified, but freed at last from the maniac, was flying to the side of the garden, when all at once a terrible cry resounded, mingled with loud barking, and accompanied with a strange uproar, arousing the National Guards from their stupor, who, attracted by the uproar, immediately surrounded Marie Antoinette.

"To arms! to arms! Treason!" shouted a man, whom from his voice the queen recognized as the shoemaker Simon.

Near this man, who, sword in hand, guarded the threshold of the cabin, little Jet was barking furiously.

"To arms! every one to his post!" cried Simon; "we are betrayed. Compel the Austrian to turn back. To arms! to arms!"

An officer ran up, when Simon spoke to him, pointing with enraged gestures to the interior of the hut. The officer in his turn then cried "To arms!"

"Jet! Jet!" called the queen, advancing some steps.

But the dog only continued to bark more furiously.

The National Guard ran to arms, and rushed toward the hut, while the municipals took possession of the queen, her daughter, and sister, and compelled them to re-enter the wicket, which they closed behind them.

"Prepare your arms!" cried the municipals to the sentinels. And the sound of firearms being made ready for action was heard.

"It is there! it is there!" cried Simon, "under the trap. I saw it move, I am certain of it. Besides, the Austrian's dog, a good little animal who was not in the plot, barked at the conspirators, who are no doubt still in the cellar. Hold! he barks again."

Indeed, Jet, instigated by Simon's cries and shouts, began to bark again more strenuously than before.

The officer seized the ring of the trap, but seeing he was unable to raise it, two of the gendarmes went to his assistance, but without the slightest success.

"You perceive they hold the trap-door from below. Fire through the trap-door, my friends, fire!" said Simon.

"Oh!" cried Madame Plumeau, "you will break my bottles."

"Fire!" repeated Simon, "fire!"

"Be silent, brawler!" said the officer, "bring some hatchets, and open the planks. Now let a platoon make ready, and fire into the trap-door the instant an opening is made." The groaning of planks and a sudden jerk informed the National Guards that some movement was taking place in the interior. Directly afterward they heard a motion under ground, like an iron portcullis being closed.

"Courage!" cried the officer to the sappers, who worked indefatigably.

The hatchets severed the planks. Twenty guns were lowered in the direction of the opening, which enlarged every moment.

But through the aperture no one could be seen.

The officer lighted a torch and threw it into the cave. It was empty.

They then raised the trap-door, which now offered no resistance. "Follow me!" said the officer, bravely leaping down the steps.

"Forward! forward!" cried the National Guards, following the example of their officer.

"Ah! Madame Plumeau," said Simon, "you lend your cellar to aristocrats!"

The wall was broken down; the humid soil had been trampled by numerous feet; and a conduit of three feet wide and five feet high, like the branch of a trench, plunged in the direction of Rue de la Corderie. The officer ventured into this opening, resolved to follow these aristocrats into the bowels of the earth; but when he had advanced three or four steps he found all farther progress impeded by an iron grating.

"Halt!" cried he, to those who were closely pressing behind him; "we can proceed no farther until this portcullis is removed."

"Well," said the municipal, who having placed the prisoners in security anxiously awaited the news, — "well, what have you discovered?"

"Parbleu!" said the officer, reappearing, "it was doubtless a conspiracy; the aristocrats wanted to carry off the queen during her walk, and she was probably in collusion with them."

"Plague take it!" cried the municipal, "send some one for the Citizen Santerre, and inform the Commune!"

"Soldiers," said the officer, "remain in this cellar, and if any one presents himself, kill him!"

And the officer, having given this order, ascended the winding stair to make his report.

"Ah! ah!" said Simon, rubbing his hands, "ah! ah! will they still say I am a fool? Brave Jet! Jet is a famous patriot; Jet has saved the Republic. Come here, Jet, come!"

And the brute who had coaxed the poor little dog, the moment he approached him, raised his foot and kicked him to a distance of several feet.

"I like you, Jet," said he; "ah, you will cut your mistress's throat! Come here, Jet, come!"

But this time instead of obeying him, Jet ran away howling, on the road toward the keep.

CHAPTER XXVII.

THE MUSCADIN.

It was near two o'clock. Lorin was promenading up and down in Maurice's room, while Agesilaus polished his master's boots in the antechamber, only for the greater convenience of conversation the door remained open, and during his walk Lorin often stopped and questioned the official.

"And you say, Citizen Agesilaus, that your master left home this morning?"

"Oh, upon my soul! yes."

"At the usual hour?"

"It might be ten minutes earlier, or ten minutes later, I cannot say exactly."

"And you have not seen him since?"

"No, Citizen."

Lorin continued his walk, and after three or four turns again stopped and renewed his questions.

"Had he his sword with him?" demanded he.

"When he goes to the section he invariably carries it."

"Are you sure he has gone to the section?"

"He told me so, at least."

"In that case I shall join him," said Lorin; "but in case I miss him, tell him I have been here, and am coming back."

"Wait!" said Agesilaus.

"Why?"

"I hear his footstep on the staircase."

Almost at the same moment the door opened, and Maurice entered. Lorin bestowed a hasty glance upon him, and perceived nothing extraordinary in his appearance.

"So you are come at last," said he. "I have been waiting here these two hours."

"So much the better," said Maurice, smiling; "that has afforded you plenty of time to compose distichs and quatrains."

"Alas! mon ami," replied the improvisator, "I do not make them now."

"Why, is the world coming to an end?"

"My dear Maurice, I am very unhappy."

"You unhappy?"

"Yes, I am miserable. I am suffering from remorse."

"Remorse?"

"Oh, by Heaven! yes," said Lorin. "Between you and her I had to choose! — between you and her I could not hesitate; but, you see, Arthémise is in despair, for she was her friend."

"Poor girl!"

"And it was she who gave me her address — "

"You would have done much better to have allowed things to take their natural course."

"Yes; and at this very moment you would have been condemned in her stead. Powerfully argued, dear friend. And I came to ask your advice! I thought you were wiser than that."

"Never mind, ask away."

"This poor girl: do you understand? I wish to attempt some means of saving her. Even if I could only give or receive a blow in her defence, I feel as if it would do me good."

"You are mad, Lorin," said Maurice, shrugging his shoulders.

"Perhaps if I made an appeal to the Revolutionary Tribunal?"

"It is too late, she is condemned."

"Truly," said Lorin, "it is dreadful to see this poor girl sacrificed thus."

"The more so since it was my safety that has entailed her death. But after all, Lorin, we have one consolation. She was a conspirator."

"Goodness!" said Lorin, "does not every one conspire nowadays? She has done no more, poor girl, than every one else does."

"Grieve for her neither too much, nor too loudly, my friend," said Maurice, "for we have to bear our share in this trouble. Believe me, we are not so fully cleared from the accusation of being her accomplices, that no stain remains behind. To-day, at the section, I was termed 'Girondin,' by the Captain of the Chasseurs of Saint Leu; and I, at the same time, found it necessary to convince him by a stroke from my sword that he was mistaken."

"Then that was the reason you returned so late?"

"Just so."

"But why did you not inform me?"

"Because in affairs of this nature you cannot restrain yourself, and the thing had to be concluded immediately, that it might make no noise."

"And that scum called you 'Girondin,' Maurice, — you, a thoroughbred Republican?"

"By Jove, he did! and this will convince you that another adventure of this nature and we become unpopular; and you well know, Lorin, in these times unpopular is a synonymous term for suspected."

"I know it well," said Lorin; "and that word appalls the bravest heart; but never mind — It is repugnant to my feelings to allow this poor Sophie to be led to the guillotine without asking her forgiveness — "

"What do you wish to do?"

"I wish you to remain here; you have nothing to reproach yourself with, so far as she is concerned. With me, you see, the case is very different. Since I can do nothing for her, I will meet her on her way. I wish to go there, Maurice; do you comprehend me? Were she to give me only a wave of her hand — "

"I will accompany you then," said Maurice.

"Impossible, my friend; you are a municipal, secretary to a section, and you have just been tried, while I have only been your defender. They would think you guilty, therefore remain here. As for me, it is quite another thing. I risk nothing, and therefore go."

"Go then," said he, "but be prudent."

Lorin smiled, shook Maurice's hand, and left.

Maurice opened his window, and waved a sad adieu; but before Lorin had turned the corner of the street, Maurice could not help gazing wistfully at him more than once, and each time, as if drawn by magnetic influence and sympathy, Lorin turned round, looked at him, and smiled.

At last, when the latter had disappeared at the corner of the quay, Maurice closed the window, threw himself into a fauteuil, and fell into one of those dreamy moods which in people of strong mind and vigorous constitution are often the presentiments of misfortune, as they resemble the calm which is the precursor of the storm. He was softly awakened from his revery, or rather state of stupor, by his official, who, on returning from the execution of some commission, entered with the sprightly air of a servant anxious to communicate his budget of news. Seeing his master preoccupied, however, he dared not interrupt him, and consoled himself by constantly passing and re-passing before him, without any reasonable cause for so doing.

"What is it?" at length said Maurice; "speak, if you have anything to tell me."

"Ah! Citizen, another desperate conspiracy."

Maurice merely shrugged his shoulders.

"A conspiracy enough to make the hair of one's head stand upright," continued Agesilaus.

"Indeed!" replied Maurice, like a man accustomed to hear daily of thirty conspiracies at this epoch.

"Yes, Citizen," replied Agesilaus; "it drives me to frenzy, you see. The very thought of it makes a good patriot's flesh creep."

"Let us hear this conspiracy," said Maurice.

"The Austrian has all but escaped."

"Nonsense!" said Maurice, beginning to listen with greater attention.

"It seems," continued Agesilaus, "that the Widow Capet was in communication with the girl Tison, who is to be guillotined to-day. She has not escaped that fate, unfortunate creature!"

"How had the queen communication with this girl?" demanded Maurice, who felt the perspiration exuding at every pore.

"Through a carnation. Can you imagine, Citizen, how they could have conveyed the plan to her in a carnation?"

"In a carnation? Who did this?"

"Monsieur le Chevalier de — wait then! His name is notorious, but as for me, I forget all these names. A Chevalier de Chateau — what a fool I am! It is not a Chateau — a Chevalier de Maison."

"De Maison-Rouge?"

"That is it."

"Impossible!"

"How impossible? when I told you they have found the trap-door, the subterranean passage, and coaches."

"On the contrary, you have told me nothing of all this."

"Well, I am going to tell you, then."

"Go on, then. If it is a story, it is at least a good one."

"No, Citizen, it is not a story, very far from it; and in proof of that, I had it from a citizen porter. The aristocrats had dug a mine, and this mine commenced at Rue de la Corderie, and terminated in the cellar of the little cabin belonging to Madame Plumeau, who has narrowly escaped being arrested as an accomplice. You know her, do you not?"

"Yes," replied Maurice; "go on!"

"Capet's wife was to escape by the subterranean passage. She already had her foot on the first step, when Simon caught her by her robe — But stay, they are beating to arms in the city, and the recall in the sections. Do you not hear the drum? There! It is said that the Prussians are at Dumartin, and have reconnoitred as far as the frontiers."

In the midst of this maze of words, a medley of truth and falsehood, probability and impossibility, Maurice seized the guiding thread. All sprung from the carnation presented before his eyes to the queen, and purchased by himself from the poor miserable flower-girl. This carnation contained the plan of a plot which had just come to light, the details of which, more or less true, had been reported by Agesilaus. At this moment the noise of the drum came nearer, and Maurice heard the crier proclaim in the street, —

"Tremendous conspiracy discovered at the Temple by the Citizen Simon! Grand conspiracy in favor of the Widow Capet discovered at the Temple!"

"Yes, yes," said Maurice; "it is just as I thought. There is some truth in all this. And Lorin, in the midst of this popular excitement, goes to offer his hand to this girl and be cut to pieces."

Maurice snatched up his hat, buckled his sword-belt, and with two bounds was in the street.

"Where can he be?" said Maurice to himself. "Probably on the road to the concierge," and he rushed toward the quay.

At the extreme end of the Quai de la Megisserie some pikes and bayonets, bristling in the midst of the crowd, attracted his attention, and he fancied in the centre he could distinguish the uniform of a National Guard, and in the group signs of hostile movements. He ran, his heart oppressed with the dread of impending misfortune, toward the assemblage on the banks of the river.

The National Guard pressed by the company of Marseillais was Lorin. He was very pale, his lips compressed, his eyes menacing; his hand upon the handle of his sword, measuring the place best calculated to strike the blows he fully intended to inflict on his cowardly assailants.

Within two feet from Lorin stood Simon. He was laughing ferociously, and pointing him out to the Marseillais and the populace, saying, —

"Look at him! look well at him! He is one of those that I drove from the Temple yesterday for an aristocrat. He is one of those who favored the correspondence with the carnations. This is an accomplice of the girl Tison, who will pass here presently. Well, do you see? — he walks quietly on the quay while his coadjutor goes to the guillotine; and perhaps she was even more to him than an assistant. She might be his mistress, and he is here to bid her farewell, or to try to save her!"

Lorin was not the man to endure more. He drew his sword. At the same time the crowd opened before a man who charged headlong into the group, whose broad shoulders had already knocked down two or three spectators who were preparing to become actors in this scene.

"Be happy, Simon," said Maurice. "You regretted, no doubt, that I was not with my friend to enable you to turn your new title of Denunciator to full account. Denounce! Simon, denounce! I am here."

"Faith! yes," said Simon, with his hideous sneer; "and your arrival is very apropos. This," continued he, "is the elegant Maurice Lindey, who was accused at the same time as the girl Tison, but was acquitted because he was rich."

"To the lamp-post with them! to the lamp-post!" cried the Marseillais.

"Yes, forsooth, you had better make the attempt!" said Maurice, and advancing a step he pricked one of the foremost of the cut-throats in the forehead, so that the blood from his wound nearly blinded him.

"Have at the murderer!" cried the latter.

The Marseillais lowered their pikes, raised their hatchets, and loaded their guns, while the frightened crowd dispersed, leaving the two friends to contend alone against this storm of blows. They regarded each other with a last sad, yet sublime smile, while calmly awaiting their destruction from the whirlwind of iron and flame which threatened them, when all at once the door of the house against which they were leaning opened, and a swarm of young people, attired in the habits of those termed

"Muscadins," or "Fops," each wearing a sword and brace of pistols in his girdle, rushed upon the Marseillais, and were instantly engaged in a terrific contest.

"Hurrah! hurrah!" cried Maurice and Lorin, simultaneously, animated by this unexpected relief, without reflecting that to fight in the ranks of the new-comers was to confirm Simon's accusation, — "Hurrah!"

But if they were forgetful of their own safety, another thought for them. A short young man, about five-and twenty years of age, with blue eyes, who fought without any intermission, with infinite science and valor, with a heavy sword which any one would have thought his delicate and feminine hand incapable of wielding, perceiving that Maurice and Lorin, instead of escaping by the door which he seemed to have left open for that purpose, remained fighting by his side, turned to them and said in a low voice, —

"Fly directly through this door; pay no attention to what we do here, or you will uselessly compromise yourselves."

Then, seeing the two friends hesitate, he suddenly cried, addressing himself to Maurice, "Away! no patriots among us, Citizen Lindey; we are aristocrats here!"

At these words, united to the audacity which would induce a man publicly to accuse himself of what at this period must lead to certain death, the crowd uttered a loud shout.

But the fair young man and two or three of his friends, without evincing any symptoms of alarm, pushed Maurice and Lorin into the alley, and closed the door behind them. They then threw themselves into the mêlée, which was now considerably augmented by the approach of the fatal cart.

Maurice and Lorin, thus miraculously saved, regarded each other in amazement. The outlet seemed to have been designed for the express purpose of their escape. They entered a court, and at the end discovered a small private door which opened into Rue Saint Germain l'Auxerrois.

At this moment a detachment of gendarmes issued from Pont au Change, who had soon swept the quay, although, from the cross-street where our two friends had concealed themselves, they heard for an instant the noise of an obstinate struggle. These gendarmes preceded the cart which conducted the hapless Sophie to the scaffold.

"Gallop!" cried a voice, — "gallop."

The cart proceeded at a quick pace, and Lorin saw the unfortunate girl standing, a smile upon her lips, and calm reliance in her eye, but was unable to exchange even a gesture with her, as she passed without seeing him, in the midst of a perfect maelstrom of people, shouting, —

"To the guillotine with the aristocrat! to the guillotine!"

The noise decreased in the distance till it reached the Tuileries. Then the little door through which Maurice and Lorin had escaped, again opened, and three or four Muscadins, with their clothes torn and stained with blood, passed through. It was probably all that remained of the little troop. The fair young man went through the last.

"Alas!" said he, "this cause is then accursed!" and casting from him his sword, notched and bloody, he rushed toward Rue des Lavandières.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

THE CHEVALIER DE MAISON-ROUGE.

MAURICE hastened to return to the section to enter a complaint against Simon. It is true that before quitting Maurice, Lorin had found a more expeditious way; this was to collect some Thermopyles to lie in wait for him, and on his first exit from the Temple to kill him in a pitched battle. But Maurice strenuously opposed this plan.

"You are ruined," said he, "if you make use of these means. Crush Simon, but do it legally. That ought to be an easy thing enough to the lawyers."

Consequently, the next morning, Maurice laid a formal complaint before the section, but was both astonished and annoyed when the president turned a deaf ear, excusing himself by saying he could not interfere between two good citizens, each incited by the love of country.

"Good," said Maurice. "I know now how to act to merit the reputation of a good citizen. To assemble the people in order to assassinate a man who displeases you: this you call being 'incited by love of country.' Well, I return to Lorin's opinion, which I was wrong to dispute. After to-day, as you hear, I shall adopt patriotism, and shall first experiment upon Simon."

"Citizen Maurice," replied the president, "you are, after all, perhaps more to blame in this affair than Simon. He discovered a conspiracy, which it was not his province to do. You saw nothing, although the discovery formed part of your duty; and more, you have held communication — accidentally or intentionally, we know not which — with the enemies of the nation."

"I?" said Maurice. "Well, this is something new. And with whom, pray, Citizen President?"

"With the Citizen Maison-Rouge."

"I?" said Maurice, stupefied. "I had communication with the Chevalier de Maison-Rouge? I do not know him — I never —"

"You have been seen speaking to him."

"I?"

"Shaking his hand."

"I?"

"Yes."

"Where? When, Citizen President?" said Maurice, carried away by the firm conviction of his own innocence. "You have lied!"

"Your zeal for your country carries you too far, Citizen Maurice;" said the president, "and you will regret what you have said, when I tell you I can prove that I have advanced nothing but the truth. Here are three different reports accusing you."

"Now," said Maurice, "do you really think me simple enough to believe in your 'Chevalier de Maison-Rouge'?"

"And why should you not believe it?"

"Because it is only the ghost of a conspirator, with whom you always have a conspiracy ready to amuse your enemies."

"Read the denunciations."

"I will read nothing," said Maurice. "I protest I have never seen the Chevalier, — never spoken to him. Let any one who doubts my word of honor come and tell me so. I shall know how to answer him."

The president shrugged his shoulders. Maurice, who did not wish to be in arrears with any one, did the same. An air of gloomy silence pervaded the remainder of the sitting. After the meeting was concluded, the president, a stanch patriot raised to the highest rank in the district by the votes of his fellow-citizens, approached Maurice, and said, —

"Come, Maurice, I want to speak to you."

Maurice followed the president, who conducted him into a little cabinet adjoining that where the sittings were held. On arriving there, he regarded Maurice for a moment in silence; then placing his hand on his shoulder, —

"Maurice," said he, "I knew and esteemed your father; this makes me esteem and love you. Believe me, you incur great danger from want of faith, — the first falling off of a truly revolutionary spirit. Maurice, my friend, they who lose their faith also lose their fidelity. You do not believe in the enemies of the nation, therefore you pass near without seeing them, and become an instrument in their plots without being aware of it."

"What, the devil!" said Maurice, "I know, Citizen, I am a man of feeling, and possess some share of patriotic zeal; but my zeal does not render me a fanatic. There are twenty pretended conspiracies, to which the public assign the same name. I demand once for all to face my accuser."

"You will not believe in conspirators, Maurice," said the president; "then tell me, do you believe in the red carnation for which Sophie Tison was yesterday guillotined?"

Maurice started.

"Do you believe in the subterranean passage drilled under the Temple garden communicating through the cellar of Citizen Plumeau with a certain house in the Rue de la Corderie?"

"No," said Maurice.

"Then do as Thomas the Apostle did, — go and see."

"I am not on guard at the Temple, and they would not allow me to enter."

"Any one may enter the Temple now."

"How is that?"

"Read this report, since you are so incredulous. I shall only proceed by official information."

"Ah!" said Maurice, reading the report, "has it come to this?"

"Continue."

"Are they going to remove Marie Antoinette to the Conciergerie?"

"They are; and do you think that from a dream, or what you call an imaginary idea or an idle story, the Committee of Public Safety would have adopted so grave a measure?"

"This measure has been adopted, but will never be executed, like many more I have seen sanctioned and all —"

"Read to the end," said the president, and he presented him with the last paper.

"The receipt of Richard, the jailer of the Conciergerie!" cried Maurice.

"She has been there these two hours." This time Maurice remained deep in thought.

"The Commune, as you know," continued the president, "acts with profound judgment. It is digging a furrow long and straight in its course; its measures are not puerile, and it has put in execution the principle of Cromwell, — 'Kings should be struck on the head.' Read this secret note from the minister of police."

Maurice read, —

"Seeing that we possess the certainty that the ci-devant Chevalier de Maison-Rouge is in Paris; that he has been seen in several places; that he has left traces of his appearance in various plots, happily frustrated, — I request all chiefs of sections to redouble their vigilance — "

"Well?" asked the president.

"I must believe you, Citizen President," said Maurice, and he continued, —

"Description of the Chevalier de Maison-Rouge: In height, five feet three inches; fair hair, blue eyes, straight nose, chestnut-colored beard, dimpled chin, soft voice, and hands like a female's."

At this description a strange light burst upon Maurice; he thought of the young man who commanded the troop of Muscadins, and who on the preceding evening saved the lives of himself and Lorin, and so valiantly drew his sword upon the Marseillais in their defence.

"The deuce!" muttered Maurice, "it must be he; in that case the accusation that I have been seen speaking to him is not false. But I cannot remember taking his hand."

"Maurice," asked the president, "what do you say to all this, now, my friend?"

"That I believe what you have said," said Maurice, musing sadly, who for some time past, without understanding what evil influence saddened his life, had noticed everything darkening around him.

"Do not trifle thus with popularity," said the president. "In these days, Maurice, popularity is life. As for unpopularity, it is to be suspected of treason; and the Citizen Maurice Lindey ought not to brook the suspicion of being a traitor."

Maurice had nothing to reply to sentiments so much in accordance with his own. He thanked his old friend and left the section.

"Ah!" murmured he, "there is too much suspicion and battling. Now," drawing a deep breath, — "now for peace, innocence, and joy; now to Geneviève," and Maurice took the road to the old Rue Saint Jacques.

When he reached the abode of the master-tanner, Dixmer and Morand were supporting Geneviève, who was suffering from a violent attack of hysterics. Thus, instead of being allowed to enter unceremoniously as he was accustomed to do, a servant met him in the passage.

"Announce me, at all events," said he, "and if Dixmer cannot conveniently receive me, I will retire."

The domestic entered the little pavilion, while Maurice remained in the garden. It seemed to him that something strange was going on in the house, and the workmen, instead of being occupied in their usual employment, were pacing restlessly about the garden. At length Dixmer himself appeared.

"Come in, dear Maurice," said he, — "come in; you are not one of those against whom the door is closed."

"What is the matter?" inquired the young man.

"Geneviève is ill," said Dixmer; "indeed, more than ill, — she is delirious."

"Gracious Heaven!" cried the young man, overcome at again encountering trial and suffering; "what, then, is the matter with her?"

"You are aware, my friend," said Dixmer, "one never knows anything concerning the illness of women, especially their husbands."

Geneviève was lying on a lounge; near her stood Morand, offering her some salts, which she smelled occasionally.

Well?" asked Dixmer.

"Always the same thing," replied Morand.

"Sophie! Sophie!" murmured the young woman, from between her closed teeth and white lips.

"Sophie!" repeated Maurice, in much surprise.

"Oh, my God! yes," replied Dixmer, greatly affected; "Geneviève most unfortunately saw the cart pass yesterday conveying the unhappy girl to the scaffold. Since then she has had five or six attacks of hysterics, and keeps on continually calling upon Sophie."

"But the most astonishing thing of all is, that in her she recognized the girl who sold the carnations, which you already know about," said Morand.

"Certainly, I know about them," said Maurice, "since in consequence of them I very narrowly escaped having my throat cut."

"Ah! we have heard all that, dear Maurice, and, believe me, we have not been slightly alarmed; but Morand was at the sitting, and saw you fully acquitted and liberated."

"Silence!" said Maurice; "she again speaks."

"Oh, those empty, unintelligible words!" exclaimed Dixmer.

"Maurice," murmured Geneviève; "they are going to kill Maurice. Rescue him, Chevalier, — rescue him!" A profound silence followed these words.

"Maison-Rouge," again murmured Geneviève; "Maison-Rouge!"

Maurice felt a slight suspicion, but he could make out nothing clearly, and was too much affected by the suffering of Geneviève to attend much to her words.

"Have you called in a physician?" demanded Maurice.

"Oh, it will prove nothing," said Dixmer; "a momentary delirium, that is all," and he shook his wife so violently by the arm that she revived, and uttering a shrill cry, opened her eyes, which till now had remained closed.

"Ah, you are both here, and Maurice with you. Oh, I am so glad to see you, dear friend; if you knew what I have —" she corrected herself — "what we have suffered for the last two days."

"Yes, we are all here," said Maurice; "have no more terror on that account. But there is one name above all others you must not accustom yourself to pronounce, seeing that at this moment it does not bear a very high repute."

"What name?" quickly demanded Geneviève.

"The Chevalier de Maison-Rouge."

"Have I named the Chevalier de Maison-Rouge?" inquired Geneviève, bewildered.

"Without doubt you have," said Dixmer, with a forced laugh; "but understand, Maurice, there is nothing surprising in that, since it is said he was an accomplice with the girl Tison, and that it was he who concocted the whole plan of escape so happily frustrated yesterday."

"I do not say there is anything surprising in it," said Maurice; "I only say he should keep himself well concealed."

"Who?" demanded Dixmer.

"Zounds! The Chevalier de Maison-Rouge. The Commune seeks for him; and their bloodhounds have a fine scent."

"Provided that, before they arrest him," said Morand, "he has not accomplished some new enterprise that may succeed better than the last."

"At all events," said Maurice, "it will not be in favor of the queen."

"Why not?" demanded Morand.

"Because she is henceforth shielded from his bold attempts."

"Where is she then?" inquired Dixmer.

"At the Conciergerie," replied Maurice; "she was taken there this evening."

Dixmer, Geneviève, and Morand uttered a cry which Maurice mistook for one of surprise.

"Thus you see," continued he, "adieu to the Chevalier's plans for the queen. The Conciergerie is more secure than the Temple."

Morand and Dixmer exchanged looks unperceived by Maurice.

"Ah!" exclaimed Maurice, "Madame Dixmer has turned faint again."

"Geneviève!" said Dixmer, "you must go to bed, my child; you suffer."

Maurice took the hint. He respectfully kissed Geneviève's hand, and quitted the house. Morand left with him, and accompanied him as far as the old Rue Saint Jacques, where he parted with him to exchange some words with a man, a superior sort of domestic, who held a horse ready saddled and bridled. Maurice was so much occupied with his own thoughts that he did not even ask the man's name; indeed, he and Morand had not exchanged a word since they quitted the house together.

Maurice took the road to Rue des Fossés Saint Victor, and gained the quay.

"It is strange," said he, walking on. "Is my mind weakened, or are these events assuming undue importance? Everything appears to me as if viewed through a magnifying glass." And to recover his equanimity, Maurice leaned over the parapet of the bridge and presented his face to the breeze.

CHAPTER XXIX.

THE PATROL.

As he lost himself in these reflections, and leaning over the parapet of the bridge, enjoyed a melancholy pleasure in gazing on the dark still water, he heard the measured tread of a little troop, like that of a patrol. Maurice turned round; it was a company of the National Guard, arrived by the other extremity, and in the obscurity he fancied he recognized Lorin. It was he, indeed. The instant he saw his friend Maurice he ran toward him with open arms.

"Found at last," cried Lorin. "Faith, it is not with out some trouble that we have rejoined you.

> "'But since I find a friend so fond,
> My fate assumes an aspect new.'

This time you will not complain, I hope, for I have given you Racine instead of Lorin."

"But what do you do here as patrol?" inquired Maurice, anxiously.

"I am the chief of the expedition, old fellow; the business is to establish our blemished reputation upon its original footing." Then turning toward his company, "Carry arms! Present arms! Shoulder arms!"

"There, my lads, it is not yet sufficiently dark, so you can talk over your little affairs while we follow your example." Then turning to Maurice, "I have heard great news at the section to-day," continued Lorin.

"What!"

"First, that you and I are beginning to be suspected."

"I know it. What next?"

"Secondly, that the whole conspiracy of the carnations was conducted by the Chevalier de Maison-Rouge."

"I know that also."

"But this you do not know, — that the conspiracy of the carnations and that of the subterranean passage are one and the same."

"Again, I know it."

"Then let us pass on to the third piece of news. This I am certain you cannot know. We go this night to capture the Chevalier de Maison-Rouge."

"To take the Chevalier de Maison-Rouge?"

"Yes."

"Have you then turned gendarme?"

"No; but I am a patriot. A patriot belongs to his country. Now my country is horribly ravaged by this Chevalier, who forms plot upon plot. Well, my country commands me, being a patriot, to free her from this Chevalier de Maison-Rouge, who distresses her horribly, and I obey my country."

"It is all the same," said Maurice; "but it is singular that you should be charged with this commission."

"I am not charged; I charge myself, or rather, I should say, I solicited the commission. It required a brilliant stroke to reinstate us in our former position; while our re-establishment will not only prove security for our lives, but still more the right of putting, at the very first opportunity offered, six inches of steel into the belly of that hideous Simon."

"But how are they sure it was the Chevalier who was the instigator of this subterranean plot?"

"They are not yet certain, but they presume so."

"You proceed, then, upon inference?"

"No; we proceed by certainty."

"How do you make out all this?"

"Listen."

"I am listening."

"I had scarcely heard the cry 'Grand conspiracy discovered by the Citizen Simon,' — that beast Simon (the wretch is everywhere), — than I wished to judge of the truth for myself. Then, they spoke of a subterranean passage."

"Does it really exist?"

"It does; I have seen it;

"'Seen it with both my eyes; that I call seeing, —'

There, why do you not whistle?"

"Because that is Molière; and besides, these events, I must confess, appear to me rather too serious for pleasantry."

"What can we jest about, if we do not jest about serious things?"

"You say, then, that you have seen it?"

"I repeat that I have seen the subterranean passage. It extends from the cellar of the Widow Plumeau to a house in the Rue de la Corderie, No. 12 or 14, I cannot remember which."

"Really? Have you passed through it, Lorin?"

"I have, the whole length; and, faith, it is a trench prettily cut, I assure you; and moreover it was divided by three iron gratings, which they have been obliged to remove one after the other, but which, in case these conspirators had succeeded, would have given them time, by sacrificing two or three of their number, to have placed Madame Widow Capet in a place of safety. Happily it is not so, and that hideous Simon discovered all!"

"But it appears to me," said Maurice, "those who ought to have been first arrested were the inhabitants of the house in the Rue de la Corderie."

"This would have been, had they not found the house perfectly uninhabited."

"But at least this house must belong to some one?"

"Yes, to a new proprietor; but no one knows who. They know the house changed masters two weeks since, and that is all. The neighbors have often heard a noise; but the house being very old, they had imagined it was undergoing thorough repair. As to the late proprietor, he has left Paris. In the mean time I arrived."

"'Upon my word!' said I to Santerre, drawing him aside, 'you are in an awkward situation.'

"'Indeed we are,' replied he.

"'This house has been sold, has it not?'

"'Yes, it was, about a fortnight ago.'

"'Was it sold in the presence of a notary?'

"'Yes.'

"'Then we must search all the notaries in Paris, to discover which of them sold this house, and then make him produce the agreement, at the bottom of which will be found the name of the purchaser.'

"'Well and good!' said Santerre, 'that is capital advice, and coming too from a man they accuse of not being a good patriot. Lorin! Lorin! I will re-establish you, or may the foul fiend seize me!'

"To be brief," continued Lorin, "this was no sooner said than done. The notary was sought for, the act was found, and upon the agreement the name and domicile of the culprit were written. Then Santerre took me aside, and I have engaged to arrest him."

"Was this man the Chevalier de Maison-Rouge?"

"No, only his accomplice, — that is to say, in all probability he was so."

"Then how is it you say you are going to arrest the Chevalier de Maison-Rouge?"

"We are going to arrest them all together."

"Do you, then, know this Chevalier de Maison-Rouge?"

"Perfectly."

"Have you seen the description of him?"

"By thunder! Santerre gave it to me. Five feet two or three inches, fair hair, blue eyes, straight nose, etc.; besides, I have seen him."

"When?"

"This very day."

"You have seen him?"

"And so have you."

Maurice started.

"The short, fair young man who rescued us this morning, — he who commanded the troop of Muscadins, and struck so hard."

"Was that the Chevalier?" demanded Maurice.

"Himself. They followed and lost him in the environs of the domicile of our proprietor of the Rue de la Corderie, so that we surmise they live together."

"It seems probable."

"It is certain."

"But it seems to me, Lorin," added Maurice, "that if this evening you arrest him who rescued you this very morning, you are much wanting in gratitude."

"Go along, then," said Lorin; "why, you don't suppose he saved us for our own sakes, do you?"

"For what else, then?"

"Not at all; they were in ambush to carry off the poor girl, Sophie Tison, as she passed to the scaffold. Our cut-throats embarrassed them, so they fell upon the cut-throats; that was the whole of it. We have been saved by a contre-coup. Now, as the intention is everything, and there was no intention, I have nothing to accuse myself with on the score of ingratitude. Besides, do you see, Maurice, the capital point is necessity; and the necessity is that we should reinstate ourselves by some brilliant achievement. And then I have promised for you."

"To whom?"

"To Santerre; he knows that you command this expedition."

"How can that be?"

"'Are you sure of arresting these criminals?' said he to me.

"'Yes,' I replied; 'if Maurice is with me.'

"'But are you sure of Maurice? For some time he has been looked upon as rather lukewarm.'

"'Those who say so are totally deceived. Maurice is no more lukewarm in the cause than I am myself.'

"'And you will answer for his fidelity?'

"'As for my own.' I then went to your house, but could not find you at home. I took this road first because it lay in my way, and then I remembered it was the one you usually frequented; so at last we have met. Forward! March!

> "'Where Victory leads us still onward we go, > Ever joyfully singing we 'll face every foe.'"

"My dear Lorin, I am in despair. I do not feel the slightest taste for this expedition. Say that you were not able to find me."

"Impossible! all our men have seen you."

"Well, then, say you met me, and I was not willing to join you."

"Again impossible."

"But why so?"

"Because this time you will not only be considered lukewarm, but a suspect; and you well know the fate of these suspects. They are conducted to the Place de la Revolution, and are there invited to salute the statue of Liberty; only instead of saluting with the hat they substitute the head."

"Well, Lorin, I hardly care how soon this fate may befall me; but without doubt it seems strange to you to hear me say so."

Lorin opened his eyes wide, and looked at Maurice.

"Well," said Maurice, "I am weary of life."

Lorin burst into a roar of laughter.

"Ah! ah!" said he, "we have had a quarrel with our beloved, and that fills us with melancholy ideas. Come, my handsome Amadis! let us return to the man, and from that we shall pass to the citizen. As for me I am never a better patriot than when I am embroiled with Arthémise. Apropos, her Divinity the Goddess Reason charged me with a thousand gracious messages for you."

"Pray thank her for me. Adieu, Lorin."

"Adieu! how adieu?"

"Yes, I am going."

"Where are you going?"

"I am going home."

"Maurice, you will ruin yourself."

"I laugh at the idea."

"Maurice, reflect; my friend, reflect!"

"I have done so."

"I have not repeated all —"

"What?"

"That Santerre said to me."

"What did he say?"

"When I asked for you to be chief of this expedition, he said to me, 'Take care!'"

"'Of whom?'

"'Of Maurice.'"

"Of me?"

"Yes, Maurice; and he also added, 'he often goes into that quarter?'"

"Into what quarter?"

"Into that of Maison-Rouge."

"How?" cried Maurice, "is it here he hides himself?"

"They fancy so, since it is here his supposed accomplice resides, the purchaser of the house in the Rue de la Corderie."

"Faubourg Victor?" demanded Maurice.

"Yes; Faubourg Victor."

"And in what street?" —

"In the old Rue Saint Jacques."

"O God!" murmured Maurice, as if struck by a thunderbolt. And he pressed his hand before his eyes. But after a moment's interval, during which he had collected all his courage, —

"What trade?" said he.

"A master-tanner."

"His name?"

"Dixmer."

"You are right, Lorin," said Maurice, by a violent effort controlling his emotion; "I will go with you."

"And you do well; are you armed?"

"I always carry my sword."

"Take also this pair of pistols."

"And you?"

"I have my gun. Carry arms! Lower arms! Forward! March!"

The patrol commenced its march, accompanied by Maurice, who walked near Lorin. They were preceded by a man dressed in gray, who directed their movements. This was an agent of police.

From time to time a shadow might be seen emerging from the angles of the streets or the doors of the houses, who exchanged some words with the man in gray. This was the inspector. On arriving at the little street, the man in gray did not hesitate for an instant. He was well instructed, and entered the street at once. Before the door of the garden where Maurice had been so nearly garroted, he stopped.

"It is here," said he.

"What is here?" demanded Lorin.

"It is here we shall find the two principals."

Maurice supported himself against the wall; he felt as if he were sinking to the ground.

"Now," said the man in gray, "there are three entrances, — the principal entrance, this one, and another which leads into a pavilion. I shall enter with six or eight men through the principal entrance, in the mean time keep guard here with four or five men, and place three sure men at the entrance of the pavilion."

"I will get over the wall," said Maurice, "and watch in the garden."

"The very thing," said Lorin, "as from the interior you can open the door to us."

"Willingly," said Maurice, "but do not clear the passage, or come, till I call you. All that passes in the interior I shall see from the garden."

"You are acquainted with the house, then?" demanded Lorin.

"Some time back I wished to buy it."

Lorin proceeded to conceal his men in the corners of the hedges and angles of the doors, while the agent of police retired with six or eight National Guards to force his way by the principal entrance. In an instant the noise of their receding steps ceased in the distance, without having awakened the least suspicion. Maurice's men were at their post, and did their best to keep concealed. One would have declared that everything was perfectly quiet, and that nothing extraordinary was passing in the old Rue Saint Jacques. Maurice then began to climb the wall.

"Listen," said Lorin.

"To what?"

"The word."

"Right."

"Carnation and Vault. Stop all those who cannot give these three words. Permit all to pass who can. This is the password."

"Thanks," said Maurice, dropping from the top of the wall into the garden.

CHAPTER XXX.

THE PASSWORD.

THE first blow was terrible. It indeed required all Maurice's self-command to enable him to conceal from Lorin how powerfully he was affected by these startling events; but once in the garden, once alone in the silence of night, his mind became more calm, and his ideas, instead of running disordered through his brain, became once more under the control of reason.

What! this house that Maurice had so often visited with the purest pleasure; this house which had formed for him a paradise on earth, — was in reality only a den of sanguinary intrigues. The kind and flattering receptions bestowed on his ardent friendship resulted then from sheer hypocrisy; the love of Geneviève from fear.

The plan of the garden is well-known, our readers having more than once followed our young folks there. Maurice glided from bush to bush till he was shaded from the moon's rays by the little conservatory where he had been imprisoned previous to his first introduction to the house. This conservatory was opposite the pavilion inhabited by Geneviève. But this evening, instead of gleaming stationary from her chamber, the light moved frequently from one window to another. Maurice saw Geneviève through the curtain, evidently raised by accident, hastily packing some things in a portmanteau, and with astonishment beheld some weapons in her hands. He raised himself upon a post to enable him to see farther into the room. A large fire was blazing on the hearth, where Geneviève was destroying papers.

At this moment the door opened and a young man entered the room. At first Maurice imagined this man was Dixmer. The young woman ran toward him, seized his hands, and they both stood facing each other for a moment, evidently influenced by some deep emotion. What this emotion meant he could not divine, as their words did not reach his hiding-place. But all at once Maurice measured his height with his eye.

"This is not Dixmer," murmured he. Indeed, the man who had entered was small and delicate, while Dixmer was tall and masculine. Jealousy is an active stimulant, and in a second he had compared the figure of this man with that of her husband.

"This is not Dixmer!" murmured he, compelled as it were to repeat it, to convince himself of the perfidy of Geneviève.

He approached still nearer to the window, but the nearer he came the less he saw. His brain was on fire. He stumbled on a ladder; the window was seven or eight feet high. He seized the ladder, and planting it firmly against the wall, ascended and placed his eye at an aperture in the curtain.

Geneviève's unknown visitor was a fair young man, about twenty-six or twenty-seven years of age, with blue eyes, and an elegant demeanor; he retained both the young woman's hands within his own, and was speaking soothingly, endeavoring fruitlessly to assuage the grief of Geneviève, which was plainly evinced by the tears which suffused her charming countenance. A slight noise, accidentally made by Maurice, caused the young man to turn his face toward the window. Maurice suppressed a cry of astonishment, he recognized his mysterious deliverer of the Place du Chatelet. At this moment Geneviève withdrew her hands from those of the unknown, and went toward the fireplace to ascertain that the papers were utterly consumed.

Maurice could no longer command his indignation. All those fierce passions which torture the heart of man — love, vengeance, and jealousy — lacerated him with their fangs of fire. He at once threw open the ill-closed casement, and vaulted into the chamber. At the same moment two pistols were pressed to his breast.

Geneviève, who had turned round at the noise, on perceiving Maurice stood speechless.

"Sir," said the young Republican, coldly, to him who had a double hold on his life, "you are the Chevalier de Maison-Rouge."

"And what if I am?" replied the Chevalier.

"It is this: you are a brave man, and consequently a cool one, and I would say two words to you."

"Say on," said the Chevalier, without lowering his pistols.

"You can kill me; but you cannot do so before I have uttered a cry, or rather I will not die without giving an alarm. Should I do so, the thousand men who surround this house will have reduced it to ashes ere the lapse of ten minutes; so lower your pistols and listen to what I have to say to the lady."

"To Geneviève?" said the Chevalier.

"To me?" murmured the young woman.

"Yes, to you."

Geneviève, pale as a statue, seized Maurice's arm; but he repulsed her coldly.

"You know what you affirmed, Madame," said Maurice, with profound contempt. "I now see that you told the truth. You indeed do not love Monsieur Morand."

"Maurice! hear me," said Geneviève.

"I have nothing to hear, Madame; you have severed with a single stroke every cord that united my heart with your own. You told me you did not love Morand, but you did not tell me you loved another."

"Sir," said the Chevalier, "what say you of Morand; or rather of what Morand do you speak?"

"Of Morand the chemist."

"Morand the chemist stands before you. Morand the chemist is the Chevalier de Maison-Rouge."

And extending his hand toward the table, he in an instant resumed the black wig which for so long a period had concealed him from the young Republican.

"Ah, yes," said he, with redoubled disdain, — "yes, I understand. It is not Morand that you love, since Morand does not exist; but the subterfuge, for all its acuteness, is none the less contemptible."

The Chevalier made a threatening movement.

"Sir," said Maurice, "permit me to speak a moment with the lady; join in the conversation if you like; it will not be long, I assure you."

Geneviève, with a gesture, asked Maison-Rouge to have patience.

"Thus, Geneviève, thus," continued Maurice, "you have made me a laughing-stock to my friends and a curse to my party. You have rendered me, blind fool that I was, an instrument in all your plots and an easy tool in your hands. Listen! It was an infamous deed; but you will be punished, Madame, for in five minutes this man, who is going to kill me before your eyes, will be lying dead at your feet; or if his life be spared, it will only be to lose his head upon the scaffold."

"He die!" cried Geneviève; "he lose his head upon the scaffold! But you do not know then, Maurice, that he is my protector, and that of my family; that I will give my life for his; that if he dies I will die; and that if you are my love, he is my religion!"

"Ah!" said Maurice, "perhaps you still mean to pretend that you love me. Really, women are sadly weak and contemptible."

Then turning to the young Royalist, —

"Now, sir," said he, "you must either kill me or die yourself."

"Why so?"

"Because, if you do not kill me, I shall arrest you."

Maurice extended his hand to seize him by the collar.

"I shall not dispute my life with you," said the Chevalier de Maison-Rouge; and he flung his pistols on a chair.

"And why do you not dispute your life?"

"Because my life is not equivalent in value to the remorse I should experience in feeling that I had killed a brave man, and more than all since Geneviève loves you."

"Ah!" cried the young woman, clasping her hands, "you are always kind, great, loyal, and generous, Armand!"

Maurice regarded them both, almost stupefied with astonishment.

"One moment," said the Chevalier, "allow me to return to my chamber. I give you my word of honor it is not to escape; I wish to conceal a portrait."

Maurice turned his eyes quickly toward that of Geneviève; it hung in its place. Perhaps the Chevalier divined Maurice's thoughts, or perhaps he wished to try his generosity to the utmost.

"Come," said he, "I know you are a Republican, but I know also that you possess a pure and loyal heart. I will trust you to the end. Look!"

And he drew a miniature from his breast, and displayed it to Maurice. He beheld before him the portrait of the queen. Maurice bowed his head, and rested his forehead on his hand.

"I await your orders, sir," said Maison-Rouge; "if you desire my arrest, knock at this door when it is time for me to give myself up. I care not for my life from the moment it is not sustained by the hope of saving my queen."

The Chevalier quitted the room without a gesture from Maurice offering to detain him.

As he left the chamber Geneviève cast herself at the young man's feet.

"Pardon, Maurice," sobbed she, — "pardon for all the evil I have done. Forgive my deception; forgive me, if only on account of my tears and suffering, for believe me I have wept much and suffered much. My husband left me this morning; I know not where he is gone, and perhaps I may see him no more. And now I have only one friend left, — nay more than friend, a brother, — and you will destroy him. Pardon, Maurice, pardon!"

Maurice raised the young woman.

"What would you?" said he. "There is fatality in all this. Every one stakes his life in these days; the Chevalier de Maison-Rouge has played like all the rest, but he has lost the game, and he must therefore pay."

"That means that he must die, if I understand you rightly?"

"Yes."

"He must die; and it is you who tell me this?"

"It is not I, Geneviève; it is fatality."

"Fatality has not uttered its last word, since you can save him."

"At the expense of my word, and consequently of my honor. I comprehend, Geneviève."

"Shut your eyes, Maurice; that is all I ask; and as far as a woman may evince her gratitude I will promise you mine."

"I should close my eyes to little purpose, Madame; there is a password given, and without this password no one could go out. Besides, the house, as I have told you, is surrounded."

"And you know the word?"

"Certainly I know it."

"Maurice!"

"Well?"

"Dear friend Maurice, tell me this password; I must know it."

"Geneviève," cried Maurice, "do you mean to say to me, 'Maurice, for the love I bear you, sacrifice your word and your honor, betray your cause, abjure your opinions.' What do you offer me, Geneviève, in exchange for all this, you who tempt me thus?"

"Oh, Maurice, save him, save him first! and then ask of me my life."

"Geneviève," replied Maurice, in a desponding tone, "hear me! I have one foot on the road to infamy before I make a final descent I wish at least to find a sufficient excuse for so doing. Geneviève, swear to me you do not love the Chevalier de Maison-Rouge!"

"I love him as a sister and a friend; not otherwise, I swear."

"Geneviève, do you love me?"

"Maurice, I do love you; it is true, as God now hears me."

"If I do what you ask me, will you abandon relatives, friends, country, and fly with the traitor?"

"Maurice! Maurice!"

"She hesitates! Oh, she hesitates!"

And he turned from her with all the violence of disdain. Geneviève, who was leaning upon him, feeling suddenly her support give way, fell upon her knees.

"Maurice," said she, wringing her hands, "I will swear to do all that you require of me. Order, and I will obey."

"You will be mine, Geneviève?"

"I will."

"Swear it, by Christ."

Geneviève extended her arms.

"My God," cried she, "thou didst pardon one poor woman who had gone astray; I trust in thy mercy that thou wilt also pardon me."

And the great tears rained down her cheeks, falling upon her long hair hanging dishevelled on her bosom.

"Not thus!" said Maurice, "swear not thus! or I cannot accept that oath."

"O Heaven!" replied she, "I swear to devote my life to Maurice, to die with him, and if requisite, for him, if he will save my friend, my brother, my protector, the Chevalier de Maison-Rouge."

"'T is well: he shall be saved," said Maurice.

And he went toward his chamber.

"Sir," said he, "resume your costume of the tanner Morand; I return your parole, you are free. And you, Madame," said he turning to Geneviève, "this is the password, 'Carnation and Vault.'" And as if horrified to remain in the chamber where he had pronounced the words which constituted him a traitor, he opened the window, and sprang from the room into the garden below.

CHAPTER XXXI.

THE SEARCH.

MAURICE had returned to his post in the garden, opposite the window of Geneviève, only it was now quite dark, she having left her apartment to enter that of the Chevalier.

It was time Maurice returned, for scarcely had he reached the corner of the conservatory when the garden-door opened, and the man in gray appeared, followed by Lorin, and five or six gendarmes.

"Well?" asked Lorin.

"You see I am at my post," said Maurice.

"And no one has attempted to force past you?" said Lorin.

"No one," replied Maurice, happy to escape by an evasion, from the way in which the question was put to him. "No one. And what have you done?"

"Why, we have acquired the certainty that the Chevalier entered the house an hour ago, and has not left it since," replied the agent of police.

"Do you know his chamber?" said Lorin.

"His room is only separated from that of Madame Dixmer by a corridor."

"Ah! ah!" said Lorin. "It appears this Chevalier de Maison-Rouge is a gallant."

Maurice felt the hot blood rush to his forehead; he closed his eyes, yet saw a thousand internal lights.

"Well, but Citizen Dixmer, what said he to that?" asked Lorin.

"Why, he thought himself highly honored."

"Come," said Maurice, in a choking voice; "upon what do we decide?"

"We have decided," said the police agent, "to arrest him in his chamber, perhaps in his bed."

"He does not, then, suspect anything?"

"Absolutely nothing?"

"What is the ground plan?" inquired Lorin.

"We have an exact plan," said the man in gray. "A pavilion situated at a corner of the garden, there it is; you ascend four steps — do you see them here? — and find yourself on a landing; to the right is the apartment of Madame Dixmer, — no doubt it is that of which we see the window. Facing this window, at the back part, is a door opening on the corridor, and in this corridor the entrance to the chamber of the traitor."

"Well, with so careful a specimen of topography," said Lorin, "we might, I think, easily find our way blindfold, much more with our eyes open. Come on!"

"Are the streets well guarded?" said Maurice, with an interest which the assistants very naturally attributed to his fear lest the Chevalier should escape.

"The streets, the passages, even the crossings," said the man in gray. "I defy any one to pass who has not the watchword."

Maurice shuddered; all these precautions being taken, made him fear that he had uselessly parted with his honor to add to his happiness.

"Now," said the man in gray, "how many men do you require to secure the Chevalier?"

"How many men?" said Lorin. "I hope Maurice and I are sufficient for that. Are we not, Maurice?"

"Yes," murmured the municipal, "we are certainly sufficient."

"Listen!" said the police agent; "no vain boasting. Do you mean to take him?"

"Zounds! Do we mean it?" said Lorin; "I should think so! We are bound to take him, are we not, Maurice?" Lorin laid a stress upon these words, for as he had truly said, suspicion began to settle upon them; and it was not wise to allow time for suspicion, which marched with such rapid strides at this epoch, to assume a firmer consistence, for Lorin well knew that no one would presume to doubt the stanch patriotism of any two men who had captured the Chevalier de Maison-Rouge.

"Well, then," said the police agent, "if you are in earnest, better take three men than two, and four than three, with you. The Chevalier invariably sleeps with pistols under his pillow, and his sword on a table by his side."

"Deuce take it!" said one of the gendarmes of Lorin's company. "Let us go in, without standing on ceremony who should enter first. If he resists, we will cut him to pieces; if he surrender, we will reserve him for the guillotine."

"Well said!" exclaimed Lorin; "do we go in by the door or the window?"

"By the door," said the agent of police; "it may be the key is in the lock, while if we enter by the window we must break some panes, and that would make a noise."

"On for the door, then!" said Lorin; "as long as we enter, it little matters how. Forward! sword in hand, Maurice."

Maurice mechanically drew his sword from the scabbard, and the little troop advanced toward the pavilion. The information of the man in gray proved perfectly correct; they first found the steps, then the landing, and at last entered the vestibule.

"Ah!" cried Lorin, joyfully, "the key is in the door." In short, extending his hand in the dark, his fingers had encountered the cold key.

"Then open it, Citizen Lieutenant," said the man in gray.

Lorin cautiously turned the key in the lock. The door opened. Maurice wiped the perspiration from his brow.

"We shall find him here," said Lorin.

"Not yet," said the man in gray; "if our chart is correct, this is the apartment of Citizen Dixmer."

"We can soon ascertain that," said Lorin; "light a wax candle; there is some fire in the grate."

"Light the torches," said the man in gray, "they are not so soon extinguished as candles," at the same time taking two torches from the hand of a gendarme, which he lighted by the dying embers. He placed one in the hand of Maurice, the other in that of Lorin. "You see," said he, "I was not deceived; here is the door opening into Citizen Dixmer's sleeping apartment, and here the one opening into the corridor."

"On, for the corridor!" said Lorin. They opened the door at the farther end, which was not more firmly secured than the first, and found themselves fronting the door of the Chevalier's chamber. Maurice had seen this door twenty times before, and never thought of inquiring where it led to. All his world was centred in the room where he was received by Geneviève.

"Oh! oh!" said Lorin, in a low voice, "here we must change our tactics; no more keys, and the door locked."

"Are you," asked Maurice, hardly able to articulate, "sure that he is here?"

"If our plan is correct, he ought to be here," replied the police agent; "besides, we shall soon see. Gendarmes, force open the door; and you, citizens, hold yourselves in readiness, and the instant the door is opened, dash into the chamber!"

Four men, selected by the emissary of police, raised the butt-ends of their muskets, and on a signal from the man who conducted this enterprise, gave one blow all together, when the door flew into a thousand fragments.

"Surrender, or you are a dead man!" cried Lorin, rushing into the chamber.

No one replied, and the curtains of the bed were closely drawn.

"Mind the bed!" said the emissary of police; "at the first movement of the curtains, fire!"

"Wait!" said Maurice, "I will open them."

And no doubt in the hope that the Chevalier de Maison-Rouge might be concealed behind them, and that it would be his lot to meet the first stab or pistol shot, Maurice hastily pulled apart the curtains, which, creaking along the iron rod, left the tenantless bed exposed to view.

"The devil!" exclaimed Lorin, "there is no one here."

"He must have escaped," murmured Maurice.

"Impossible, citizens, impossible!" cried the man in gray. "I tell you he was seen to enter here an hour ago, and no one has been seen to go out, and all the outlets from the garden are well guarded.

Lorin opened the cabinets, the wardrobes, and looked everywhere, even where it was physically impossible that a man could be concealed.

"You see, however, that no one is here."

"No one!" repeated Maurice, with an emotion easily understood, — "you see no one is here."

"To the chamber of Madame Dixmer," said the police agent, "perhaps he may be there?"

"Oh!" said Maurice, "respect the chamber of a woman."

"Certainly we will respect it," said Lorin, "and Madame Dixmer also, but for all that we must visit it."

"Then," said Maurice, "permit me to pass first."

"Pass on, then," said Lorin, "you are captain: honor the powers that be," and leaving two men to guard the apartment, they returned to that where they had lighted the torches. Maurice approached the door opening into the chamber of Geneviève. It was the first time he had ever entered there. His heart beat violently. The key was in the door. Maurice laid his hand upon the key, but still hesitated.

"Well," said Lorin, "open!"

"But," said Maurice, "if Madame Dixmer should be in bed?"

"We shall look in her bed, under her bed, in the chimney, in the wardrobes, and then if we find no one there but herself, we shall wish her good-night," said Lorin.

"No, not so," said the police agent; "we shall arrest her; the Citizen Geneviève Dixmer is an aristocrat who has been recognized as an accomplice of the girl Tison and the Chevalier de Maison-Rouge."

"Open it yourself, then," said Maurice, "I do not arrest women." The agent of police looked at Maurice, sideways, and the men murmured among themselves.

"Oh, you grumble, do you?" said Lorin; "then you shall have two to grumble about. I am of Maurice's opinion," and he made a step backward.

The man in gray seized the key, opened the door, and the soldiers rushed into the chamber. Two wax lights burned upon a little table, but the chamber of Geneviève, like that of the Chevalier de Maison-Rouge, was uninhabited.

"Empty!" cried the police agent.

"Empty!" cried Maurice, turning pale; "where is she, then?"

Lorin regarded Maurice with astonishment.

"Let us search," said the agent of police, and closely followed by the military, he began to rummage the house from the cellars to the workshops. At length, when their backs were turned, Maurice, who had followed them impatiently with his eyes, in his turn darted into the chamber, opening the presses, which had already been opened, and calling in a voice replete with anxiety, "Geneviève! Geneviève!" But Geneviève made no reply; the chamber was indeed vacated. Then he began to search the house in a species of frenzy, outhouses, conservatories, sheds, — nothing was omitted, but all without success.

Suddenly a noise was heard, a troop of armed men presented themselves at the door, exchanged the password with the sentinel, entered the garden, and dispersed themselves over the house. At the head of this reinforcement waved the red plume of Santerre.

"Well!" said he to Lorin, "where is the conspirator?"

"How! where is the conspirator?"

"Yes! I asked what have you done with him?"

"I shall ask you that question. If your detachment had guarded the outlets properly, ere this he must have been arrested, since he was not in the house when we entered it."

"What! do you mean to say," cried the furious general, "that you have really allowed the Chevalier to escape?"

"We could not allow him to escape since we have never taken him."

"Then I can comprehend nothing," said Santerre.

"Of what?" said Lorin.

"Of the message you sent me by your envoy."

"We sent you an envoy!"

"Yes; a man in a brown coat, with black hair, and green spectacles, who came from you to inform me you were on the eve of capturing Maison-Rouge, but that he was defending himself like a lion; upon hearing which I hastened to your assistance."

"A man in a brown coat, black hair, and green spectacles?" repeated Lorin.

"Yes, with a female on his arm."

"Young and pretty?" cried Maurice, glancing toward the general.

"Yes, young and pretty."

"It was he and Madame Dixmer," said Maurice.

"What, he!" exclaimed Santerre. "Maison-Rouge! Oh, blockhead that I was not to have killed them both! Come, Citizen Lindey, we may capture them yet."

"But how the devil," asked Lorin, "came you to let them pass?"

"Zounds!" said Santerre, "I let them pass because they gave the password."

"They had the password?" exclaimed Lorin; "then there is surely a traitor among us!"

"No, no, Citizen Lorin; you are known, and we well know that there are no traitors among you."

Lorin looked around him as if to detect the miscreant, and publicly proclaim his shame. He encountered the gloomy face and wandering eye of Maurice.

"Ah!" murmured he, "what means this?"

"The man cannot be very far off," said Santerre; "let us search the environs; perhaps he has fallen in with some patrol who, more wide awake than we, did not allow themselves to be gulled so easily."

"Yes, yes; let us search," said Lorin; and, under the pretence of so doing, he seized Maurice by the arm, and drew him into the garden.

"Yes, let us search," said the soldiers; "but before we search —" and one of them flung his still burning torch into an adjacent shed, filled with bundles of fagots and dried herbs.

"Come," said Lorin, "come!"

Maurice offered no resistance. He followed Lorin like a child; they both ran as far as the bridge without speaking; there they stopped, and Maurice turned round. The sky was red from the horizon to the Faubourg, and above the houses ascended innumerable sparks.

CHAPTER XXXII.

THE FIRE.

MAURICE shuddered as he extended his hand toward the Rue Saint Jacques.

"The fire!" said he, — "the fire!"

"Yes," said Lorin, "the fire; what then?"

"Gracious Heavens! if she has returned."

"Who?"

"Geneviève."

"Geneviève means Madame Dixmer, does it not?"

"Yes."

"There is no danger of her return; she did not go away for that purpose."

"Lorin, I must find her. I will have my revenge."

"Oh, oh!" said Lorin.

> "None can escape thy puissant sceptre, Love.
> Thou reign'st on earth and in the heavens above."

"You will assist me in my search, will you not, Lorin?"

"Zounds! there will be no difficulty in that."

"Why so?"

"Without doubt, if you are so much interested, as to me you appear to be, in Madame Dixmer's fate, you, being intimate with her, ought, knowing her, also to know her friends. She has not quitted Paris; her friends have every motive to stay; she has taken refuge in the house of some confidential acquaintance, and to-morrow morning you will receive a billet by some 'Rose,' or some 'Marton,' couched as follows, —

> "Wouldst see again, my Mars, thy Venus true?
> Borrow of Night her scarf of azure hue.

And requesting you to present yourself at the porter's lodge, such a number, such a street, and to inquire for Madame Three-stars; that is all."

Maurice shrugged his shoulders; he well knew there was no one with whom Geneviève could take refuge.

"We shall not find her," said he.

"Will you permit me to say one thing, Maurice?"

"What?"

"That it will be no great misfortune if we should not find her."

"If we do not, Lorin, I shall die."

"The devil!" exclaimed the young man; "it was, then, of this love that you lately so nearly died."

"Yes," replied Maurice.

Lorin reflected an instant. "Maurice," said he, "it is now nearly eleven o'clock; this quarter is deserted; here is a stone seat, particularly adapted for the reception of two friends. Accord me the favor of a private interview, as they used to say, under the ancient régime. I give you my word of honor that I shall speak only in prose."

They seated themselves upon the bench.

"Speak!" said Maurice, resting his aching head upon his hand.

"Without exordium, periphrasis, or commentary, I tell you one thing, old fellow, — it is this, that we are ruining ourselves, or rather that you are ruining us."

"How so?" demanded Maurice.

"There is, my friend, a decree issued by the Committee of Public Safety, which declares every man a traitor to his country who enters into any relationship with the acknowledged enemies of the said country. Eh ! do you know this decree ?"

"To be sure I do," replied Maurice.

"Well, it seems to me, you are not a vile traitor to your country. What say you ? as Manlius says."

"Lorin !"

"Undoubtedly ; unless you believe that those idolize their country who give house-room, bed, and board to Monsieur le Chevalier de Maison-Rouge, who is not a high Republican, as I suppose, and has not been accused at any time of having taken part in the days of September."

"Ah ! Lorin," said Maurice, sighing heavily.

"Still, it appears to me," continued the moralist, "that you have been, and still are, too intimate with the enemies of your country. Come ! Come, friend Maurice, do not rebel ! you are like the whilom Enceladus ; you move a mountain each time you turn yourself."

Lorin pronounced these words in the kindest manner possible, and glossed them over with an artifice truly Ciceronian.

Maurice merely made a gesture of dissent, but the gesture was unheeded, and Lorin continued, —

"If we exist in a green-house temperature, a healthy atmosphere, where, according to botanic rules, the barometer invariably points to sixteen degrees, I should say, my dear Maurice, that this is elegant, satisfactory ; what though we are occasionally rather aristocratic, we flourish and do well. But if scorched in a heat of thirty-five or forty degrees, the sap burns, so that it rises slowly, and from the excess of heat seems cold ; when cold, then comes the blight of suspicion, — you know this, Maurice, — and once suspected, you possess too much good sense not to know what we shall be, or rather that ere long we shall be no more."

"Well, then," said Maurice, "they can kill me, and there will be an end of me, for I am weary of my life."

"For the last quarter of an hour," said Lorin; "indeed scarcely so long that I should leave you to act according to your own pleasure on this subject; and then to die now, it is necessary to die a Republican while you would die an aristocrat."

"Ah!" said Maurice, whose blood began to boil from impassioned grief, resulting from the consciousness of his own criminality, "you go too far, friend Lorin."

"I shall go farther still, and forewarn you, that if you turn aristocrat —"

"You will denounce me?"

"For shame! No. I will confine you in a cellar, and have you sought after to the sound of the drum, like something lost; then I will proclaim that the aristocrats, knowing what you had in reserve for them, had seized, victimized, and starved you, so that, like Provost Élie de Beaumont, Monsieur Latude, and others, when found, you will be publicly crowned with flowers by the ladies of La Halle, and the ragpickers of Section Victor. Make haste, then, to appear again an Aristides, else your business is concluded."

"Lorin! Lorin! I feel that you are right; but I am dragged along. I am sliding down the precipice. Are you displeased with me, because my fate drags me onward?"

"I am not displeased with you, but I shall remonstrate with you. Call to mind a few of the scenes enacted daily between Pylades and Orestes, — scenes which prove beyond all doubt that friendship is a paradox, since these model friends quarrelled without ceasing."

"Leave me to my fate, Lorin, you had much better do so."

"I will never abandon you."

"Then, allow me to love, to be mad, at my ease; to be criminal, perhaps, for if I again see her, I fear I shall kill her."

"Or fall upon your knees. Ah, ah, Maurice, Maurice, to love an aristocrat, I never could have credited it! It is like poor Osselin with the Marquise de Charny."

"No more, Lorin, I beseech you."

"Maurice, I will cure you, or may the Devil take me! I do not wish you to be drawn in the lottery of Saint Guillotine, as the grocer of the Rue des Lombards observes. Maurice, you will exasperate me! Maurice, you will render me bloodthirsty! I feel as if I wanted to set fire to the isle of Saint Louis! A torch! a firebrand!

> "The toil were idle. Maurice, thy passion dire > Sufficient is Paris to set on fire."

Maurice smiled in spite of himself.

"You know," said he, "that it was agreed between us that we should speak only in prose."

"But you exasperate me with your folly," said Lorin. "Drink, Maurice, become a drunkard, do anything, study political economy; but for the love of Jupiter, let us fall in love with nothing but Liberty!"

"Or Reason?"

"Ah! that is true; by the way, the Goddess Reason talks much about you. She thinks you are a charming mortal."

"Are you not jealous?"

"Maurice, to save a friend I feel capable of any sacrifice."

"Thanks, my poor Lorin, and I truly appreciate your devotion; but the best way to console me is to leave me to sate my grief. Adieu! Lorin, go to your Arthémise."

"And you; where are you going?"

"I shall return home."

And Maurice turned toward the bridge.

"You live, then, in the direction of the old Rue Saint Jacques now?"

"No; but it pleases me to go that way."

"To look once again upon the place inhabited by your fair inconstant?"

"To see if she has not returned where she knows I am awaiting her. Ah, Geneviève! Geneviève! I could not have believed you capable of so much deceit!"

"Maurice, a tyrant who well knew the fair sex, since he died from having loved them too well, said, —

"'Woe to the man who trusts his heart
To woman, changeful as the breeze.'"

Maurice sighed, and the two friends took the road to the old Rue Saint Jacques.

As they approached they heard a great noise, and saw the light increase; they listened to patriotic chants, which on a brilliant day in the glorious sunshine, or in the atmosphere of combat, sounded like hymns of heroism, but which by the red light of an incendiary fire savored more of the diabolic incantations of drunken cannibals.

"Oh, my God! my God!" cried Maurice, forgetting that God had been abolished, as he wiped the perspiration from his face.

Lorin watched him attentively and muttered, —

"Alas! when caught in Cupid's snare,
To Prudence we must bid adieu."

All the inhabitants of Paris appeared moving toward the theatre of the events we have just narrated. Maurice was obliged to cross a hedge formed by the gendarmes, the ranks of the sections, then the impetuous crowd of this always furious populace, at this epoch easily aroused, and who ran howling from spectacle to spectacle without intermission. As they approached, Maurice impatiently hastened his steps; Lorin, with some trouble, kept close behind him, for he did not like to leave his friend to himself at such a moment.

It was nearly all over. The fire had communicated from the shed where the soldier had flung his torch to the workshops, constructed of planks so put together as to allow the free circulation of air; the merchandise was consumed, and the house itself was now in flames.

"O God!" said Maurice to himself, "if she has returned, should she find herself in a chamber encircled by the devouring element, waiting for me, calling on me —" and Maurice, nearly insensible from grief, liked better to think of the folly of those he loved than of his treason. He rushed headlong toward the door, of which he caught a glimpse through the mass of burning flame. Lorin still followed him. He would have followed him to the infernal regions. The roof was in flames; the fire had now indeed commenced its work of destruction on the staircase. Maurice hastened to visit the first floor, the parlor, the chamber of Geneviève, of the Chevalier de Maison-Rouge, and the corridors, calling, in stifled accents, "Geneviève! Geneviève!"

No one replied. On returning from the search our two friends saw volumes of flame now entering the door; but not heeding the shouts of Lorin, who pointed to the window, Maurice passed through the flames, then ran to the house, crossed, notwithstanding all impediments, a court-yard strewed with broken furniture, searched the dining-room, Dixmer's parlor, Morand's laboratory, — all filled with smoke, fragments, and broken glass. The fire had reached this part of the house, and the work of destruction would soon be complete. Maurice, as in the pavilion, did not omit visiting a single chamber, or leave unexamined even a corridor. He then descended to the cellars; perhaps Geneviève had taken refuge from the fire there. He found no one.

"Zounds!" said Lorin; "no one but a salamander could take refuge here, and it is not that fabulous animal that you are in search of. Let us go; we can make inquiry in this assemblage. Some one has perhaps seen her."

It needed all Lorin's force to drag away Maurice; hope still detained him there.

Then they commenced their investigation; they visited the environs, stopped all the females who passed, searched all the alleys, without any result. It was now one o'clock in the morning, and Maurice, notwithstanding his athletic vigor, was overpowered and broken down with fatigue, and at length desisted from his worse than useless efforts.

A carriage passed; Lorin hailed it.

"Come, bear up, old fellow," said he to Maurice; "we have done all in the range of human possibility to recover Geneviève. We have broken our backs, been roasted, and have been cruelly cuffed for her. Cupid, however exacting he may be, could require no more from a man in love, and above all, from one who is not. So jump into the carriage, and let us return home."

Maurice submitted without making any reply. They arrived at Maurice's door without either of the friends having uttered a single word. As Maurice descended from the carriage, they heard a window of his apartment closed.

"All right!" said Lorin, "he is waiting; I shall rest easy now. Knock, however."

Maurice knocked, the door opened.

"Good-night!" said Lorin, "wait for me to-morrow morning to go out!"

"Good-night," said Maurice, mechanically, as the door closed behind him. Upon the first steps of the staircase he met his official.

"Ah! Citizen Lindey," he exclaimed, "how much uneasiness you have caused us!" The word us struck Maurice.

"You?" said he.

"Yes, me and the little lady who is waiting for you."

"The little lady," repeated Maurice, feeling the moment ill-chosen to remind him of his former loves; "you were right to tell me. I shall sleep at Lorin's."

"That is impossible; she was at the window, and saw you alight, and cried out, 'There he is!'"

"What care I whether she knows I am here or not? I have no heart for love. Go upstairs, and tell this woman she is mistaken."

The official made a movement as if to obey him, then stopped.

"Ah! Citizen," said he, "you are wrong. The little lady is already very sad; your message will drive her to despair."

"But," asked Maurice, "who is this woman?"

"Citizen, I have not seen her face; it is concealed by her mantle, and she weeps, that is all I know."

"She weeps!" exclaimed Maurice.

"Yes, but very softly, stifling her sobs."

"She weeps," repeated Maurice; "there is then some one in the world who loves me sufficiently to feel anxious in my absence?" and he ascended slowly behind the official.

"Here he is, Citizen, here he is!" cried the latter, rushing into the chamber. Maurice entered behind him.

He then beheld in a corner of the room the trembling form of a woman whose face was hid in the cushions, and whom he would have thought dead, but for her convulsive moaning, which made him start. He signed to his official to leave the room, who went out, closing the door behind him. Then Maurice ran to the young woman, who raised her head.

"Geneviève!" cried the young man, "Geneviève here! good Heavens! am I then mad?"

"No, you are in possession of your senses, my friend," replied the young woman. "I promised to be yours if you would save the Chevalier de Maison-Rouge. You have saved him, and I am here; I was awaiting you."

Maurice mistook the meaning of these words; he recoiled a step, and looked sadly at the young woman.

"Geneviève," said he, "you do not love me."

Geneviève regarded him with tearful eyes; then turning from him, leaned her head on the pillow of the sofa, and gave free vent to her sobs and tears.

"Alas!" said Maurice, "it is evident that you no longer love me; and not only that you love me no more, Geneviève, but that you must entertain a feeling of hatred toward me, to experience this despair."

Maurice had spoken so nobly, yet with so much feeling, that Geneviève arose and took his hand.

"Mon Dieu!" said she, "and is it ever thus that those we think the best prove merely egotists?"

"Egotists, Geneviève! what do you mean?"

"Can you not then imagine what I suffer? My husband a fugitive, my brother proscribed, our house in flames, and all this in one night; and then that dreadful scene between you and the Chevalier was added to the rest!"

Maurice listened with delight, for it was impossible even for the maddest passion not to admit that this accumulation of trouble was more than sufficient excuse for Geneviève's deep and violent grief.

"And now you are come, I shall keep you; you shall leave me no more!"

Geneviève started.

"Where should I go?" replied she, with bitterness. "Have I an asylum, a shelter, a protector, save he who has put a price upon his protection? Oh, rash and foolish that I am! I stepped over the Pont Neuf, Maurice, and in passing I stopped to gaze at the dark water, dashing angrily against the corners of the arches; it attracted and fascinated me. Then said I to myself, there, poor woman, is a shelter for you; there inviolable repose and oblivion!"

"Geneviève! Geneviève!" cried Maurice, "you said that? Then you do not love me?"

"I said it," replied Geneviève, — "I said it; but I am here."

Maurice drew a deep breath, and fell at her feet.

"Geneviève," murmured he, "weep no more! Geneviève, console yourself for all your grief, since you love me. Tell me, Geneviève, for the sake of Heaven! that it was not the violence of my menaces that brought you hither. Assure me that even had you not seen me this evening, on finding yourself alone, isolated, and without an asylum, you would have come to me; and accept the oath which I now make you, to annul the one that I compelled you to take."

Geneviève looked down upon the young man with an expression of ineffable gratitude. "Generous!" said she; "Oh, my God! I thank thee, he is generous."

"Listen, Geneviève!" said Maurice. "God, whom they have here driven from their temples, but whom they cannot expel from our hearts, where he has implanted love, has made this evening in appearance dark and gloomy, but conceals behind its sombre curtain a silvery cloud. God has conducted you to me, Geneviève, and speaks to you through me. God is at length willing to compensate us for all the sufferings we have endured, for the virtue we have displayed in combating this love, as if this sentiment so long entertained, and so profound, could be a crime! Weep no more, Geneviève, weep no more; give me your hand! Do you wish to live in the house of your brother? Do you wish he should kiss the hem of your robe, and pass over the threshold of his door without turning his head? Well, say but the word, make but one sign, and I am gone, and you are free. But on the other hand, my adored Geneviève, will you call to mind that I have loved you so ardently that I had almost died of this love, which it remains with you to render so fatal or so fortunate to me; that for this love I have been a traitor to my party, and am become vile and contemptible in my own eyes, — will you now consider all the happiness which the future has in store for us, the strength and energy which our youth and love possess to defend this happiness, now but in the bud, from all who would dare attack it? Ah! Geneviève, what will you reply? You who are an angel of mercy, will you render a man so happy that he no longer regrets life, and ceases to desire eternal felicity? Then, instead of repelling me, smile, my Genevière ; let me place your hand upon my heart, and incline toward one who worships you from the inmost recesses of his soul. Geneviève, my love, my life, do not take back your vow ! "

The heart of the young woman swelled at these words. The fatigue of her late suffering had worn out her strength, and though her tears no longer flowed, occasional sobs relieved her overcharged bosom.

" You still weep, my Geneviève," continued Maurice, with profound melancholy, — " you still weep. Oh, reassure yourself ! I will never impose my love on scornful grief, and never soil my lips with a kiss empoisoned by a single tear of regret."

He averted his face, and coldly turned away.

" Ah, Maurice ! " murmured Geneviève, " do not abandon me, Maurice ; I have no one left me in the world but you ! "

CHAPTER XXXIII.

THE MORROW.

A BEAUTIFUL sun beamed across the green window-blinds, gilding the leaves of three large roses placed in a flower-stand before the window of Maurice. These flowers, more precious as the season was on the decline, perfumed with a delicious fragrance the little dining-room of spotless neatness, where at a table served with every elegancy, but without profusion, sat Maurice and Geneviève. The door was closed, for as the table contained all that was requisite, it was understood they waited on themselves. They heard the official stirring in the adjoining room. The warmth and life of the last few lovely days entered through the half-open jalousie, making glitter like emeralds and rubies the rose-leaves caressed by the rays of the sun.

Geneviève let fall upon her plate the golden fruit she held in her hand. She appeared to be deep in thought, and smiling only with her lips, while her eyes languished with a melancholy expression. She remained thus silent, abstracted, and happy in the sun of her love, as the beautiful flowers in the sun of heaven. Soon her eyes sought those of Maurice, and encountered his gazing upon her. She placed her soft white arm upon the young man's shoulder, and leaned on his breast with that faith and confidence far exceeding love.

Geneviève looked at him without speaking, and blushed as she regarded him. Maurice slightly inclined his head to imprint a kiss upon the half-open lips of Geneviève. He bent his head, while she turned pale, and closed her eyes as the delicate flower conceals its calyx from the rays of light. They remained dreaming thus, when a sharp ring at the door-bell suddenly startled them.

The official entered mysteriously, and closed the door.

"Here is the Citizen Lorin," said he.

"Ah! dear Lorin," said Maurice, "I will go and dismiss him. Pardon, Geneviève."

Geneviève stopped him.

"Dismiss your friend, Maurice!" said she, "and such a friend! one who has consoled, assisted, and sustained you? No; I would no more drive such a friend from your house than from your heart. Let him come in, Maurice; let him come in."

"With your permission?" said Maurice.

"I wish it," said Geneviève.

"Ah! you will find that to love you is not enough," cried Maurice, delighted with her delicacy; "it is necessary to adore you!"

Geneviève held her blushing face to the young man. He opened the door, and Lorin entered, smart as usual in his costume of demi-muscadin. On perceiving Geneviève he manifested great surprise, which was succeeded by a respectful salute.

"Come here, Lorin, come here, and look at the lady! You are dethroned, Lorin. I have now some one I prefer to yourself. I would have given my life for you; for her, — I tell you nothing new, Lorin, — for her I have sacrificed my honor."

"Madame," replied Lorin, in accents of deep emotion, "I shall endeavor to value Maurice the more, that he has not altogether ceased to care for me."

"Sit down, sir," said Geneviève, smiling.

"Yes, sit down," said Maurice, who, having pressed in his right hand that of his friend, and in his left that of his mistress, presented the appearance of a man arrived at the height of human felicity.

"Then you do not wish to die now; do not wish any longer to kill yourself?"

"What do you mean?" asked Geneviève, turning pale.

"Oh, in good truth!" said Lorin, "man is a most versatile animal, and philosophers have good cause to despise his levity. Here is one, would you believe it, Madame, who no longer ago than yesterday evening wished to leap into the fire, throw himself into the water; who declared there was no more happiness for him in this world. And behold him this morning, gay, joyous, with a smile upon his lips, his countenance resplendent with happiness, life in his heart, seated at a well-furnished table; it is true he has not eaten much, but that does not prove he is unhappy."

"Did he wish to do all this?" said Geneviève.

"All this, and much more. I will tell you all, some day, but at this moment I am very hungry; it is all Maurice's fault for making me yesterday evening run all over the Quarter Saint Jacques. Permit me, then, to make an attack upon the breakfast, which I perceive you have neither of you yet touched."

"That is right," said Maurice, with childish glee; "I have not breakfasted, nor have you, Geneviève."

He watched Lorin's eyes as he uttered her name; but Lorin evinced no surprise.

"Ah!" said Maurice, "you have already surmised who it is, Lorin."

"Zounds!" said Lorin, cutting himself a large slice of white and rosy ham, and not seeming to hear Maurice's remark.

"I, also, am hungry," said Geneviève, holding her plate.

"Lorin," said Maurice, "I was ill yesterday."

"You were worse than ill; you were mad."

"Well, I think it is you who are suffering at this moment."

"Why?"

"You have not yet given us any verses."

"I will sing you one this moment," said Lorin, —

"Phœbus, in the midst of the Graces,
The lyre in his hand still retained,
Till following of Venus the traces,
'T was lost, and could not be regained."

"Always ready with a quatrain," said Maurice, laughing.

"And you will have to be contented with it, as it is now necessary to turn our attention to more serious affairs."

"Has anything new occurred, then?" said Maurice, anxiously.

"I am ordered on guard at the Conciergerie."

"At the Conciergerie!" said Geneviève, "near the queen?"

"Near the queen. I believe so, Madame."

Geneviève turned pale. Maurice frowned, and made a sign to Lorin, who cut himself another slice of ham, double the size of the first. The queen had indeed been removed to the Conciergerie, whither we shall follow her.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

THE CONCIERGERIE.

At a corner of the Point au Change and of the Quai aux Fleurs rose the remains of the old palace of Saint Louis, called par excellence the palace, as Rome is called the city, and which still continues to retain the royal cognomen, when the only kings who inhabit it are the registrars, the judges, and the pleaders.

The house of justice was a large and sombre building, exciting more fear than love for the merciless goddess. There might be seen united in this narrow space all the instruments and attributes of human vengeance. The first wards were assigned to those who had been arraigned for crime; farther on were the halls of judgment, and lower down the dungeons of the condemned. By the door was a small space where the red-hot iron stamped its mark of infamy; and about one hundred and fifty paces from the first another space, far more extensive, where the last act of the fearful tragedy took place, — that is to say, La Grève, where they finished the work previously sketched out for them at the Palace. Justice, as we see, reigned paramount over all.

All these portions of the edifice joined one with another, sullen-looking, dark, and gray, pierced by iron-grated windows where the gaping arches resemble the grated dens extending along the side of the Quai des Lunettes. This is the Conciergerie.

This prison contains dens washed by the black mud from the waters of the Seine; it also possesses mysterious outlets, through which were formerly conducted to the river those miserable victims whom it was thought necessary to remove.

As seen in 1793, the Conciergerie, unwearying procureur for the scaffold, — the Conciergerie overflowed with occupants, which within an hour became the victims of the guillotine. At this epoch the old prison of Saint Louis was literally the Hold of Death. Under the arches some gates were hung, and at night a red lantern was suspended there, fit emblem of this abode of misery and despair.

The evening preceding the day when Lorin, Maurice, and Geneviève were breakfasting together, a dull rumbling shook the pavement of the quay and rattled the windows of the prison, then ceased before the arched gate. The gendarmes knocked with the handles of their swords, the gate opened, and a carriage entered the court; when the hinges had turned, and the rusty bolts had creaked, a female descended.

The gaping wicket opened immediately to receive her, and closed upon her. Three or four curious heads, protruding to gaze upon the prisoner by the light of the torches, appeared in mezzo-tinto, then vanished in the darkness, while vulgar jokes and rude laughter passed between the men leaving, who could be heard though not seen.

The person thus brought remained within the first wicket with the gendarmes; she saw it would be necessary to pass through a second, but forgot at the same time to raise the foot and lower the head, as there is a step to ascend and a beam which descends. The prisoner, not yet well habituated to prison architecture, notwithstanding her long sojourn there, omitted to stoop, and struck her forehead violently against the bar.

"Are you much hurt, Citizen?" demanded one of the gendarmes.

"Nothing can hurt me now," she replied tranquilly, and passed on without uttering a single complaint, although sanguinary traces of the injury remained upon her brow.

Shortly the arm-chair of the porter became visible, — a chair more venerated by the prisoners than the throne of the king by his courtiers; for the porter of a prison is the dispenser of favor, and all mercy is important to a prisoner, as sometimes the smallest kindness may change the darkest gloom to a heaven of light.

The porter Richard, installed in his arm-chair, felt a due perception of his own importance. He remained undisturbed even when the rumbling of the carriage announced a new arrival. He inhaled some snuff, regarded the prisoner, opened a large register, and looked for a pen in the little ink-horn of black wood, where the ink, incrusted on the sides, retained in the centre a mouldy humidity, as in the midst of the crater of a volcano there always remains some melted matter.

"Citizen Porter," said the chief of the escort, "write, and write quickly, for they are impatiently awaiting us at the Commune."

"I will not be long," said the porter, at the same time emptying into the inkstand some drops of wine remaining at the bottom of his glass; "I am a good hand at this, thank God! Your name and surname, Citizen,' said he, and dipping his pen at the same time into this improvised ink, he commenced entering the new arrival at the bottom of a page already nearly filled; while standing behind his chair, Madame Richard, a female of benevolent aspect, contemplated, with a mixture of astonishment and respect, this woman, so sad, so noble, and so proud, whom her husband interrogated.

"Marie Antoinette Jeanne Josèphe de Lorraine," replied the prisoner, "Archduchess of Austria and Queen of France."

"Queen of France!" repeated the porter, raising himself in astonishment by the arms of his chair.

"Queen of France," repeated the prisoner, in the same voice.

"Otherwise called the Widow Capet," said the chief of the escort.

"Under which of these names am I to enter her?" demanded the porter.

"Whichever you please, only do it quickly," said the chief of the escort.

The porter reseated himself, and with a trembling hand wrote down the name, surname, and titles given him by the prisoner, inscriptions the ink of which still appears visible to this day upon the register of which the revolutionary rats of the Conciergerie have nibbled the leaf at its most precious part.

Richard's wife still retained her position behind her husband's chair, and remained standing with her hands clasped together, commiserating the situation of the unfortunate being before her.

"Your age?" continued the porter.

"Thirty-seven years and nine months," replied the queen.

Richard wrote this down, then the description, and finished with the regular notes and forms.

"There," said he, "that is completed."

"Where shall we conduct the prisoner?" said the chief of the escort.

Richard helped himself to a second pinch of snuff, and looked at his wife.

"Indeed," said she, "we did not anticipate this, and have had but brief notice, so that we hardly know — "

"You must find out," said the brigadier.

"There is the council chamber," said Richard's wife.

"Too large," murmured Richard.

"The larger the better; we can the more easily place the guards."

"Go to the council chamber," said Richard. "But it is not habitable at this moment; it has no bed."

"True," replied his wife, "I had quite forgotten that."

"Bah!" said one of the gendarmes, "you can put a bed there to-morrow, and to-morrow will soon be here."

"Besides, the citizen could occupy our chamber for one night; could she not, good man?" said Richard's wife.

"And what are we to do?" said the porter.

"Oh, we can do without a bed for one night; and as the citizen gendarme observes, 'the night is nearly gone.'"

"Then," said Richard, "conduct the citizen to our chamber."

"And in the mean while you will prepare our receipt?"

"It shall be ready on your return."

Richard's wife took the candle from the table, and led the way.

Marie Antoinette followed without uttering a word, calm and pale as usual. Two turnkeys, at a sign from Richard's wife, followed them. The queen was shown her bed, on which the woman hastened to place clean sheets. The turnkeys installed themselves outside; the door was double-locked; and Marie Antoinette was left alone.

How she passed that night no one ever knew, as she passed it in close communion with her God. On the next day the queen was conducted to the council chamber, a long four-sided room, the wicket-door of which opened upon a corridor of the Conciergerie, and which had been divided in its whole length by a partition which did not reach the height of the ceiling.

One of these compartments was occupied by the men on guard. The other was the chamber of the queen. A window, thickly-grated with small iron bars, lighted both these cells. A folding-screen, the substitute for a door, secluded the queen from the guards, and closed the aperture in the middle. The whole of this room was paved with brick. The walls, at one period or another, had been covered with gilded wood, where still hung some shreds of paper fleur-de-lis. A bed was placed opposite the window, and a single chair near the light. This was all the furniture the royal prison contained.

On entering, the queen requested that her books and work might be brought her. They brought her the "Revolutions of England," which she had commenced in the Temple, the "Voyage de Jeune Anacharse," and her tapestry.

The gendarmes established themselves in the adjoining compartment. History has preserved their names, as it has done that of many others more infamous, associated by destiny in great events, and who see reflected on themselves a fragment of that light cast by the thunderbolt which destroys the thrones of kings, perhaps even the kings themselves.

They were called Duchesne and Gilbert.

These two men were selected by the Commune, who knew them to be stanch patriots. They were to remain at their post in their cell till the sentence of Marie Antoinette. They hoped by this measure to avoid the irregularities consequent upon a change of office several times during the day, and therefore laid the guards under a heavy responsibility.

The queen first became acquainted with this new regulation from the conversation of the gendarmes, whose discourse, not being softly uttered, reached her ears. She experienced at once joy and disquietude; for if on the one hand she felt that these men ought to be trustworthy since they had been chosen from a multitude, on the other side she reflected that her friends might more easily corrupt two known men at their post than a hundred unknown individuals selected by chance, passing near her occasionally, and then only for a single day.

On the first night before she retired one of the gendarmes, according to his usual custom, began to smoke. The noxious vapor glided imperceptibly through the apertures of the partition, enveloping the unfortunate queen, whose misfortunes had irritated instead of deadening her nerves. She soon felt herself seized with nausea and swimming in the head; but true to her indomitable system of firmness, she uttered no complaint.

During her melancholy vigil, while nothing disturbed the deep silence of the night, she fancied she heard plaintive cries outside. These cries were mournful and prolonged; there was about them something weird and piercing, like the howling of wind in the dark and deserted corridor when the tempest borrows the human voice to animate the passions of the elements.

She soon became aware that the noise that had at first startled her was the doleful and persevering cry of a dog howling on the quay. She immediately remembered her poor little Jet, whom she had not thought of when they removed her from the Temple, and now believed she could recognize his voice. Indeed, the poor little animal, who by his mistaken vigilance had ruined his mistress, had unperceived descended behind her, had followed the carriage as far as the grating of the Conciergerie, where he continued till he narrowly escaped being cut in two by the double iron portcullis which closed behind her.

But the faithful creature had soon returned, and comprehending that his mistress was confined in this great stone building, he whined and howled, waiting, within ten feet of the sentinel, a caressing reply. The queen replied by a heart-broken sigh which reached the ears of her guards; but as this sigh was not repeated, and no other sound proceeded from the queen's chamber, they again composed themselves, and relapsed into their former state of drowsiness.

At break of day the queen rose and dressed herself, then took her seat near the window, the light from which, intercepted by the grating of iron bars, fell with a bluish tint upon her emaciated hands, in which she held a book. She was apparently reading, but her thoughts were far away.

The Gendarme Gilbert half opened the screen, and regarded her in silence. The queen heard the noise of the screen, but did not turn her head. She was so seated that the gendarme could see her head bathed in the morning light. Gilbert made a sign to his comrade to advance and look through the opening with him. Duchesne approached.

"Look!" said Gilbert, in a low tone; "how very pale she is; it is frightful! Those red circles round her eyes denote her suffering. She has surely been weeping."

"You well know," said Duchesne, "Capet's widow never weeps. She is too proud for that."

"Then she must be ill," said Gilbert, and raising his voice, "Tell me, Citizen Capet," said he, "are you ill?"

The queen slowly raised her eyes, and fixed an inquiring look upon the two men.

"Did you address me, gentlemen?" demanded she, in a voice full of sweetness, for she fancied she detected the accent of kindness in him who had spoken to her.

"Yes, Citizen, we spoke to you," replied Gilbert; "we feared you were ill."

"Why so?"

"Because your eyes are so red."

"And at the same time you are so pale," added Duchesne.

"Thank you, gentlemen, I am not ill; only I suffered much last night."

"Ah, yes, your misfortunes!"

"No, gentlemen, my miseries are always the same; and my religion having taught me to carry them to the foot of the cross, I do not suffer more one day than another. No; I am out of sorts because I could not rest last night."

"Ah! your new lodging and different bed?" said Duchesne.

"And then the lodging is not very comfortable," added Gilbert.

"Ah! it is not that, gentlemen," said the queen, shaking her head. "Lofty or lowly, it is all the same to me."

"What is it then?"

"I ask pardon for telling you; but I have suffered much inconvenience from the smell of the tobacco which that gentleman is smoking at this moment."

Indeed, Gilbert was smoking, which was his habitual occupation.

"Confound my stupidity!" cried he, much grieved from the kindness with which the queen had expressed herself. "Why did you not tell me so before, Citizen?"

"Because I thought, sir, I had no right to deprive you of any enjoyment."

"Well, you shall be incommoded no more, — by me, at least," said Gilbert, casting away his pipe, which broke upon the tiles, "for I shall smoke no more."

He turned round, his companion followed, and he closed the screen.

"Possibly they may cut off her head, that is an affair of the nation; but why should we cause her any suffering, poor woman? We are soldiers, and not hangmen, like Simon."

"It rather savors of the aristocrat, comrade, what you did just now," said Duchesne, shaking his head.

"Whom do you term an aristocrat? Explain yourself!"

"I call aristocrats all those who annoy the nation, and succor its enemies."

"Then, according to your theory, I annoy the nation because I cease to annoy with my smoking the Widow Capet? Go along, then! As for me," continued the brave fellow, "I remember my oath to my country, and the order of my brigadier. As for my order, I know it by heart. Not to permit the prisoner to escape; not to allow any one to see her; to resist all correspondence she may endeavor to institute; and to die at my post, — this is what I promised, and to this will I keep. Vive la nation!"

"That is what I tell you," said Duchesne. "It is not that I disapprove of your conduct, but I fear lest you should compromise yourself."

"Hush! here is some one."

The queen had not lost one word of this conversation, although carried on in a low voice. Captivity had rendered her hearing doubly acute.

The noise which had attracted the attention of the two guards was the sound of several steps approaching the door. It opened, and two municipals entered, followed by the porter and some of the turnkeys.

"Well," they inquired, "where is the prisoner?"

"Here she is," replied the two gendarmes.

"How is she lodged?"

"You can see." And Gilbert touched the screen.

"What do you wish?" demanded the queen.

"It is the visit of the Commune, Citizen Capet."

"This man is kind," thought the queen; "and if my friends —"

"Very good, very good!" said the municipals, pushing Gilbert aside and entering the queen's chamber; "so much ceremony is not requisite here."

The queen did not even raise her head; and it might have been believed from her impassibility that she neither saw nor heard them, but fancied herself alone. The delegates of the Commune curiously observed everything around the chamber, sounded the wainscoting, the bed, shaking the grating of the window which looked upon the court of the female prisoners, and then having recommended to the gendarmes the utmost vigilance, took their departure without having addressed a word to the queen, who on her part seemed not to have been aware of their presence.

CHAPTER XXXV.

LA SALLE DES PAS-PERDUS.

TOWARD the decline of the day on which we have seen the municipals so carefully inspecting the queen's prison, a man attired in a gray jacket, his head covered with a mass of black hair, and on his head one of those hairy bonnets, which then among the people was a distinguishing mark of the most exaggerated patriotism, was walking about in the large hall so philosophically termed "La Salle des Pas-Perdus," and seemed most attentively observing all the goers and comers forming the general population of this hall, — a population considerably augmented at this period, when trials had acquired greater importance, and when the only pleading was to dispute their heads with the hangman and with Fouquier Tinville their indefatigable purveyor.

The attitude assumed by this man whose portrait we have just sketched was in very good taste. Society at this epoch was divided into two classes, — the lambs and the wolves. The one naturally inspired the other with fear, since one half of society devoured the other. Our fierce promenader was rather short, and wielded in his dirty black hand one of those knotted cudgels then called "constitutions." It is true the hand that flourished this horrible weapon might have appeared rather small to any one who might take into his head to act the inquisitorial part toward this singular personage which he had arrogated to himself with respect to others; but no one felt the least inclined to risk it, for this man's aspect was far too terrible.

Indeed, this man with the cudgel caused much disquietude to several groups of petty scribes engaged in the discussion of public affairs, which at this time daily progressed from bad to worse, or from better to better, according as they were considered from a conservative or revolutionary point of view. These valorous folks looked askance at his long black beard, his green eyes surmounted by overhanging, shaggy eyebrows, and trembled whenever the promenade of the mighty patriot (a promenade which extended the whole length of the great hall) brought them in near contact with one another.

This terror was augmented from the fact that whenever they ventured to approach him too nearly, or even looked at him too attentively, the man with the cudgel struck his powerful weapon with its full weight upon the pavement, smashing the flag-stones upon which it fell, sometimes with a dull and heavy, sometimes with a sonorous and clashing sound.

But it was not only these brave men among the scribes, designated generally as the "rats of the Palace," who experienced this formidable impression; it was also the various individuals who entered the Salle des Pas-Perdus by the great door, or through some of its narrow vomitories, who also quickened their pace on perceiving the man with the cudgel, who obstinately continued his journey from one end of the hall to the other, finding each moment some pretext for making his weapon ring on the pavement.

If these writers had been less timorous, and the promenaders more clear-sighted, they would have discovered that our patriot, capricious like all eccentric or pronounced characters, appeared to evince a preference for certain flag-stones, those for instance situated a little distance from the wall on the right, near the centre of the hall, which emitted a clear and ringing sound. He even finished by concentrating his anger upon some particular stones in the centre of the hall. At the same time he so far forgot himself as to stop, and with his eye seemed to be estimating the distance.

True, it was a momentary absence of mind only, and he immediately resumed his former expression, which a gleam of pleasure had replaced for an instant.

Almost at the same moment another patriot, — for at this epoch every one wore his opinions on his forehead, or rather in his dress, — almost at the same moment, say we, another patriot entered by the door of the gallery, and without appearing the least in the world to partake of the fear generated by the former occupant, began to cross the hall at a pace equal to his own, so that in the centre of the promenade they encountered each other.

The new arrival had, like the former, a hairy bonnet, a gray jerkin, dirty hands, and in one of them a cudgel; indeed, in addition he carried a sword, which struck against his legs at every step; and on the whole he appeared a greater subject for terror than his predecessor. The first had an air of ferocity, the last seemed replete with sinister cunning.

Although these two men appeared to belong to the same cause, and entertained the same opinions, the assembly ventured to watch the result, not of their meeting, for they were not walking in the same line, but their approach toward each other. At the first turn they were disappointed in their expectation, as the patriots contented themselves with exchanging looks; at the same time the smaller of the two turned slightly pale, — only from an involuntary movement of the lips it was evident it was not caused by fear, but by disgust.

However, at the second turn, as if the patriot had made a violent effort, his countenance, till now so overcast, cleared up suddenly, and something like a smile passed over his lips as he inclined slightly to the left, with the evident intention of stopping the second patriot in his course.

Near the centre they joined each other.

"Why, upon my word, here is the Citizen Simon!" said the first patriot.

"Himself. But what do you want with the Citizen Simon? And, in the first place, who are you?"

"It seems, then, that you do not recognize me?"

"I do not recognize you, and for an excellent reason, — I never saw you before."

"Not recognize me! — when I had the honor to carry the head of the Princess Lamballe!"

At these words, pronounced with savage fury, and bursting passionately from the mouth of the patriot, Simon started.

"You?" said he, "you?"

"Ha! that surprises you! I thought that you would remember your friends better than that, faith! Ah, Citizen! you grieve me."

"You have done very well," said Simon; "but I did not recognize you."

"It is a greater privilege to act as guardian to the young Capet; it brings you more into notice. As for myself, I both know and esteem you."

"Ah! Thank you."

"You have no reason — are you taking a walk?"

"Yes; I am waiting for some one. And you?"

"I am doing the same."

"What is your name? I will make mention of you at the club."

"I am called Theodore."

"What else?"

"Nothing else: is not that enough?"

"Oh, certainly. Who are you waiting for, Citizen Theodore?"

"A friend to whom I wish to make a fine little denunciation."

"Indeed! Do tell me."

"A whole covey of aristocrats."

"What are their names?"

"No, indeed; I only tell that to my friend."

"You are wrong; for here is mine advancing toward us, who, it seems to me, is sufficiently acquainted with business to settle at once all this affair."

"Fouquier Tinville!" cried the first patriot.

"No one less, friend."

"That 's all right."

"Yes. Good-day, Citizen Fouquier."

Fouquier Tinville, calm and pale, opening wide, according to habit, his large black eyes shaded by his bushy eyebrows, at this moment entered by a side-door, his register in his hand, and a bundle of papers under his arm. "Good-day, Simon," said he; "anything new?"

"Several things. First, a denunciation from Citizen Theodore, who carried the head of the Princess Lamballe. I will introduce him to you."

Fouquier fixed his scrutinizing glance upon the patriot, who, notwithstanding his strong nerves, felt rather uneasy while undergoing this examination.

"Theodore!" said he; "and who is Theodore?"

"I!" said the man in the jerkin.

"You carried the head of the Princess Lamballe?"

said the public accuser, with an unmistakable expression of doubt.

"I. Rue Saint Antoine."

"But I know a person who boasts that he did so," said Fouquier.

"I know ten," replied the Citizen Theodore, courageously; "but, indeed, as they all make some claim for having done so, and I ask nothing, at least I ought to have the preference, I hope."

This reply excited Simon's laughter, and dispersed the cloud on the accuser's brow.

"Right," said he; "and if you did not do it, you ought to have done so. But leave us now; Simon has some business to transact with me."

Theodore retired, very little hurt by the frankness of the public accuser.

"One moment," cried Simon. "Do not send him away so; let us first hear his denunciation."

"Ah!" said Fouquier Tinville, with an absent air, "a denunciation?"

"Yes; a covey of conspirators," replied Simon.

"All in good time. Speak; what is the matter now?"

"Oh! not much; only the Chevalier de Maison-Rouge and some of his friends."

Fouquier made a leap backward, while Simon raised his arms toward heaven.

"Is this the truth?" they exclaimed, both together.

"The pure truth; will you take them?"

"At once. Where are they?"

"I met the Chevalier de Maison-Rouge in the Rue de la Grande Tissanderie."

"You are mistaken; he is not in Paris," replied Fouquier.

"I tell you I have seen him."

"Impossible! a hundred men have been sent in pursuit of him; he would not show himself in the streets of Paris."

"It was he, by Heaven!" said the patriot. "A tall dark man, as strong as three and bearded like the pard."

Fouquier shrugged his shoulders disdainfully.

"Another blunder," said he; "the Chevalier de Maison-Rouge is short, pale, and has not the slightest sign of a beard."

The patriot dropped his weapon with an air of consternation.

"Never mind, your good intention is taken for the act. Come, Simon, we must both make haste; they require the register, this is the time for the carts."

"Well, there is nothing new; the child is well." The patriot turned his back that he might not appear indiscreet, but remained in a position which enabled him to hear.

"I will go," said he, "lest I should intrude."

"Adieu!" said Simon.

"Good-day," said Fouquier.

"Tell your friend that you were deceived," added Simon.

"Well, I shall wait," and Theodore removed to a short distance, and stood resting on his cudgel.

"So the child goes on well; but how fares he morally?" asked Fouquier.

"I mould him to my will."

"He will speak then?"

"When I choose."

"Do you think he will testify in the trial of Antoinette?"

"I do not think it; I am sure of it."

Theodore was leaning against a pillar, his eyes directed toward the door. But his eye was wandering, while his ears were erect and uncovered under the hairy bonnet he wore. Perhaps he saw nothing, but most assuredly he heard something.

"Reflect well," said Fouquier, "and do not make what is termed a blunder of this commission. You feel sure that Capet will speak?"

"He will say all that I require."

"Has he told you what we are going to ask him?"

"He has told me."

"It is important, Simon, that you should promise this; the child's evidence is fatal to the mother."

"Zounds! I count upon that."

"There will have been nothing equal to it seen since the intimacy between Nero and Narcissus. Once more, reflect, Simon."

"One would fancy you took me for a brute, repeating constantly the same thing. Take this as an example: when I put leather in water it becomes supple, does it not?"

"But — I do not know," replied Fouquier.

"It becomes soft. Well, in my hands the little Capet becomes supple as the softest leather. I have my own method for that."

"It may be so," said Fouquier. "Is that all you have to say?"

"All — I forgot. There is a denunciation."

"Again? You will overwhelm me with business," said Fouquier.

"One must serve his country."

Simon presented a small paper, black as the leather he had just mentioned, but certainly less supple. Fouquier took it and read the contents.

"Again the Citizen Lorin; you have a great hatred to this man."

"I find him always acting in hostility to the law. He said, 'Adieu, Madame,' to a woman who saluted him from a window yesterday evening. To-morrow, I hope to give you a little information concerning another 'suspect;' that Maurice who was Municipal at the Temple when that affair of the red carnation occurred."

"Be sure! be sure!" exclaimed Fouquier, smiling at Simon.

He held out his hand, and then turned away with an abruptness that evinced little favor toward the shoemaker.

"What the devil do you wish me to be sure of? Many have been guillotined for much less."

"Patience," replied Fouquier, quietly; "everything cannot be done at the same time," and he passed quickly through the wicket.

Simon looked round for the Citizen Theodore, to console himself with him. He was no longer to be seen.

He had hardly crossed the western iron gate, when Theodore reappeared at the corner of a writer's hut. The occupant of the hut accompanied him.

"At what hour are the iron gates closed?" asked Theodore of this man.

"At five o'clock."

"Then what do they do here?"

"Nothing; the hall remains empty till next day."

"No rounds, no visits?"

"No, sir; our barracks are locked."

The word "sir" made Theodore knit his brows, and look round with distrust.

"Are the crowbar and pistols safe in the barracks?" said he.

"Yes, under the carpet."

"Return home, then — By the bye, show me again the chamber of the Tribunal that has not a grated window, and looks upon the court near the Place Dauphine."

"To the left, between the pillars under the lantern."

"Go, now, and have the horses ready at the place assigned!"

"A glorious chance! — a glorious chance! — depend fully upon me."

"Now is your time — No one is looking — open your barrack."

"It is done, sir; I will pray for you."

"It is not for me you ought to pray. Adieu."

And the Citizen Theodore, after an eloquent look, glided so adroitly under the low roof of the barrack, that he disappeared like the shadow of the writer who closed the door.

The worthy scribe drew the key from the lock, took some papers under his arm, and went out of the vast hall with the few employees that the stroke of five sent rushing from their desks like a rear guard of belated bees.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

THE CITIZEN THEODORE.

NIGHT had enveloped in her gray mantle the immense hall, whose sad echoes had to repeat the severe words of the advocates and the suppliant ones of the pleaders.

From afar, in the midst of the obscurity, upright and immovable, a white column seemed watching, in the centre of the hall, like a phantom protector over the sacred place.

The only noise heard in this darkness was the nibbling and galloping of innumerable rats, which gnawed the papers enclosed in the writer's huts, after drilling their way through the wood.

Sometimes the sound of a carriage penetrated as far as this sanctuary of Themis (as an Academician would say), and the vague clanking of keys, which appeared to proceed from under the ground; but all this only reverberated in the distance, and nothing save these distant sounds ever broke the deep silence, or penetrated the thick darkness save the glimmering of some far remote light.

Certainly the man would be seized by bewildering terror who at this hour would have ventured into the vast hall of the Palace, the exterior of whose walls was yet stained with the blood of the victims of September; whose staircases this very day had witnessed the descent of twenty-five human beings condemned to an ignominious death, and were separated only by a few feet from the dungeons of the Conciergerie, peopled with bleached skeletons.

Nevertheless, in the middle of this frightful night, in the midst of this almost solemn silence, a low grating noise was heard; the door of a writer's hut turned upon its creaking hinges, and a shadow, darker than the shadow of night, glided cautiously out of the barrack.

Then the fierce patriot we have heard addressed as "sir," but who called himself Theodore, stepped lightly over the uneven stones. He held in his right hand a ponderous iron lever, and with his left felt that his double-barrelled pistol was secure in his belt.

"I reckoned twelve flag-stones from the stall; and see, here is the end of the first!" murmured he; and while calculating, he groped with the point of his foot to discover the chinks which time had rendered more perceptible.

"Let me see," said he, stopping; "have I taken my measurement correctly? Shall I possess strength sufficient; and she — will she have the courage? Oh, yes, her courage is known to me. Oh, my God! When I shall take her hand — when I can say, Madame, you are saved!"

He suddenly paused, as if oppressed by the weight of so great a hope.

"Ah!" he resumed, "rash and foolish project! others will say, hiding themselves under their bedclothes, or contenting themselves by sauntering about disguised as lackeys through the Conciergerie; but they have not my motive for daring all, — it is, that I not only desire to serve the queen, but the woman.

"Well, to work; let us again sum up the whole.

"To raise the stone is nothing, to leave it open is the danger, — they may perhaps make the rounds; but yet they never do so. They cannot suspect anything, for I have no accomplices; and then what time is needed by an ardor like mine to dart through the dark passage? In three minutes I am under her chamber; in other five I raise the stone which is on the hearth. She will hear me working, but has too much firmness to feel alarmed; on the contrary, she will understand that a deliverer is near — She is guarded by two men who will doubtless hasten to the spot —

"Well, after all," said the patriot, with a melancholy smile, looking first at the weapon concealed in his girdle, and then at the one he held poised in his hand, "a double shot from this pistol, or a couple of strokes from this iron bar. Poor creatures! they will die like others not more culpable than themselves."

And Citizen Theodore resolutely pressed his lever between the chinks of the flag-stones.

At this moment a vivid light gleamed like a ray of gold across the stones, and a noise, repeated by the echoes of the vault, caused the conspirator to turn, and then with a single bound to conceal himself in the stall.

Soon voices, weakened by the distance, and softened by the emotion experienced by every one at night in a large and desolate building, reached the ears of Theodore.

He stooped down, and through an aperture in the stall perceived first a man in military costume, whose long sabre clanking on the pavement partly produced the sound which had attracted his attention; then, a man in a pistachio-colored suit, holding a rule in his hand and a roll of papers under his arm; thirdly, a man in a large waistcoat of ratteen and a fur bonnet; and lastly, a fourth, with wooden shoes and a jerkin.

The iron gate Des Merciers creaked upon its sonorous hinges, rattling the chain intended to keep it open during the day.

The four men entered.

"A round," murmured Theodore. "God be praised! ten minutes later and I should have been ruined."

He then with the utmost attention endeavored to recognize the individuals who composed the round, — indeed, three of them were known to him.

He who walked first, clad in the uniform of a general, was Santerre; the man in the ratteen waistcoat and fur bonnet was Richard the porter, and the man in clogs and jerkin was in all probability a turnkey.

But he had never seen the man in the pistachio-colored coat, who held a rule in his hand and a bundle of papers under his arm. Who or what could this man be; and what brought, at ten o'clock at night, to the Salle des Pas-Perdus, the general of the Commune, the keeper of the Conciergerie, a turnkey, and this other man? The Citizen Theodore knelt on one knee, holding in one hand his loaded pistol, while with the other he replaced his bonnet and hair, which his precipitous movement had deranged too much to look natural.

Up to this moment the nocturnal visitors had kept silence, or if they had spoken, their words had not reached the ears of the conspirator; but when about ten paces from his lurking place Santerre spoke, and his voice was distinctly heard by the Citizen Theodore.

"We are now," said he, "in the Salle des Pas-Perdus. It is for you now to guide us, Citizen Architect, and to endeavor to convince us that your revelation is no idle story; for you see the Revolution has done justice to all this folly, and we believe no more in these subterranean passages than in ghosts. What do you say, Citizen Richard?" added Santerre, turning toward the man in the fur bonnet and ratteen vest.

"I have never said there was no subterranean passage under the Conciergerie," he replied. "Here is Gracchus, who has been turnkey for ten years, and consequently is as familiar with the whole of the Conciergerie as he is with the alphabet, and yet he ignores the existence of the vault of which the Citizen Giraud has spoken. However, as the Citizen Giraud is the city architect, he ought to know better than any of us. It is his business."

Theodore shivered from head to foot on hearing these words.

"Fortunately," murmured he, "the hall is large, and before they find what they search for, two days at least must expire."

But the architect opened his great roll of papers, put on his spectacles, and knelt down to examine the plan by the flickering light of the lantern which Gracchus held in his hand.

"I fear," said Santerre, ironically, "that the Citizen Giraud has been dreaming."

"You will see, Citizen General, if I am a dreamer. Wait a little; wait!"

"You see we are waiting," said Santerre.

"Good!" said the architect; and he began to calculate. "Twelve and four make sixteen," said he, "and eight are twenty-four, which, divided by six, makes four, and then half remains; that is it. I can tell the very spot; and if I am mistaken by so much as a foot, you may henceforth dub me an ass."

The architect pronounced these words with an assurance which curdled the blood of the Citizen Theodore.

Santerre regarded the plan with a species of respect, but evidently admired more than he comprehended it.

"Now follow what I say."

"Where?" asked Santerre.

"Zounds! upon this chart which I have drawn. Here we are! thirteen feet from the wall is a movable stone I have marked A; do you see it?"

"Certainly, I see A," said Santerre. "Do you think I do not know how to read?"

"Under this stone," continued the architect, "is a staircase; do you see? It is marked B."

"B!" said Santerre; "I see B, but I do not see the staircase," and the general laughed heartily at his own facetiousness.

"When once the stone is raised, and the foot upon the last step, count fifty paces, look up, and you will find yourself exactly at the register-office where the subterraneous passage terminates, passing under the cell of the queen."

"Capet's widow, you mean, Citizen Giraud," said Santerre, knitting his brows.

"Yes, Capet's widow."

"But you said 'the queen.'"

"The force of old habit."

"You say, then, it may be found under the register-office?" demanded Richard.

"Not only under the register-office, but I will tell you also in what part of the office you will discover it,—under the stove."

"That is curious," said Gracchus, "for I have noticed that every time I dropped a log in that place the stone sounded hollow."

"In short, if we find your statement correct, Citizen Architect, I shall pronounce geometry a fine thing."

"Then declare it, Citizen Santerre, for I am now going to conduct you to the place indicated by the letter A."

The Citizen Theodore sank his nails into his flesh.

"When I have seen it," said Santerre, — "when I have seen it! I rather resemble Saint Thomas."

"Ah! you said Saint Thomas."

"Yes, as you said 'the queen,' from mere habit; but they cannot accuse me of conspiring for him."

"Nor I for the queen."

After this retort the architect delicately placed his rule, reckoned the distance, then stopped, having apparently finished his calculation, and struck upon a particular stone.

This was the identical stone struck by the Citizen Theodore in his fit of frantic rage.

"It is here, Citizen General," said the architect.

"You fancy so, Citizen Giraud."

Our concealed patriot so far forgot himself as to strike his thigh with his clinched fist, at the same time groaning deeply.

"I am positive," said Giraud; "and your examination, combined with my report, will prove to the Convention that I have not been deceived. Yes, Citizen General," continued the architect, with emphasis, "this stone opens upon a subterranean passage, terminating at the register-office, and passing below the cell of the Widow Capet. Let us raise the stone; descend with me into the vault, and I will convince you that two men, even one man, could effect a rescue in a single night, without any one suspecting it."

A murmur of terror and admiration, elicited by the architect's words, ran through the group, and faintly reached the Citizen Theodore, who seemed turned to stone.

"Look at the danger we run," continued Giraud. "Well, now with a grating which I shall place in the middle of this underground passage before it reaches the cell of the Widow Capet, I shall save the country."

"Ah, Citizen Giraud!" said Santerre, "that is an idea bordering on the sublime."

"Perdition seize you, addle-pated fool!" grumbled the patriot, with redoubled fury.

"Now raise the stone," said the architect to the Citizen Gracchus, who in addition to a lantern carried a crowbar.

Gracchus set to work, and in a second the stone was raised.

The vault appeared open, with the staircase lost in its profundity, while the moist air escaped like a pestilent vapor.

"Another abortive attempt," murmured the Citizen Theodore. "Alas! Heaven does not will that she should escape, and her cause must be accursed!"

CHAPTER XXXVII.

THE CITIZEN GRACCHUS.

For an instant the three men remained motionless at the entrance to the vault, while the turnkey plunged his lantern into the opening without being able to penetrate its depth. The architect triumphantly exulted over his companions from the summit of his genius.

"Well!" said he, at length.

"Faith! yes," replied Santerre, "here incontestably is the passage. It only remains to know where it leads to."

"Yes,' repeated Richard, "it remains to know that."

"Well, then, descend yourself, Citizen Richard, and then you will see if I have told you the truth."

"I have something better to do than go in there," said the porter. "We will return with you and the general to the Conciergerie. There you can raise the hearthstone, and we shall see."

"Very well," said Santerre, "we will return."

"But we must be careful," said the architect; "this stone remaining unclosed may suggest an idea to some one."

"Who the devil do you imagine ever comes here at this hour?" said Santerre.

"Besides," said Richard, "the hall is deserted, and to leave Gracchus here is sufficient. Remain here, Citizen Gracchus, and we will return to you from the other side of the subterranean passage."

"All right," said Gracchus.

"Are you armed?" demanded Santerre.

"I have my sword and this crowbar, Citizen General."

"Just the thing! keep strict watch; in ten minutes we will be with you."

And having closed the iron gate, the three took their departure by the Gallery des Merciers, to repair to the private entrance of the Conciergerie.

The turnkey watched their receding footsteps, and followed them with his eyes as far as he could see, and listened as long as he had anything to hear; then all relapsed into silence, and supposing himself in perfect solitude, he placed his lantern on the ground, sat down, his legs overhanging the depths of the vault, and began to meditate. Turnkeys meditate sometimes; but people, generally speaking, do not trouble themselves to find out what is the subject of their meditations.

All at once, in the midst of his profound revery, he felt a hand press heavily upon his shoulder. He turned round, and attempted, on seeing a stranger, to give the alarm, but at the same instant the cold point of a pistol was pressed to his forehead.

The accents were arrested in his throat, his arms fell listlessly by his side, and his eyes assumed the most suppliant expression.

"Not a word," said the intruder, "or you are a dead man."

"What do you want, sir?" stammered the turnkey.

Even in '93, there were moments when, renouncing their idea of universal equality, they forgot to address each other as "Citizen."

"I wish," said the Citizen Theodore, "to be allowed to go down there."

"What for?"

"Never mind."

The turnkey regarded the person who had proffered this request with the most profound astonishment; but in the mean time his interlocutor fancied he detected in the man's look a ray of intelligence.

He lowered the pistol.

"Would you refuse to make your fortune?"

"I don't know. Hitherto no one has ever made me proposals on the subject."

"Well, then, I will begin."

"You offer to make my fortune?"

"Yes."

"What do you mean by a fortune?"

"Fifty thousand golden francs, for instance. Money is scarce, and fifty thousand francs now are worth a million. Well, I offer you that sum."

"To allow you to go down there?"

"Yes; but on condition that you come with me, and afford me your assistance in my undertaking."

"But what are you going to do? In five minutes that vault will be filled with soldiers, who will arrest you."

The Citizen Theodore was forcibly struck by this argument.

"Cannot you prevent the soldiers from descending there?"

"I have no means of so doing, I know none, and cannot think of any."

Indeed, it was evident the turnkey was taxing all his mental energies to discover some means of winning the fifty thousand francs.

"But," demanded the Citizen Theodore, "could we not enter to-morrow?"

"Yes; but to-morrow a grate of iron will be placed across the passage, occupying its whole width; and for the greater security it is arranged that this partition should be entirely solid, and without even a door."

"Then we must think of something else," said Theodore.

"Yes; we must find some other way," said the turnkey.

It will be seen from the joint manner in which Gracchus expressed himself, that an alliance had already been struck between himself and the Citizen Theodore.

"That will be my concern," said Theodore. "What do you do at the Conciergerie?"

"I am a turnkey."

"What are your duties?"

"I open the doors and shut them."

"Do you sleep there?"

"Yes, sir."

"Do you take your meals there?"

"Not always. I have my hours of recreation."

"And then?"

"I avail myself of them."

"What to do?"

"To pay my respects to the mistress of a tavern called Noah's Well, who has promised to marry me when I am possessed of twelve hundred francs."

"Where is the tavern Noah's Well?"

"Near the Rue de la Vieille-Draperie."

"Very well."

"Hush, sir."

The patriot listened.

"Ah! ah!" said he.

"Do you hear?"

"Yes. Voices and footsteps."

"They are returning."

"You see very well that we should not have had time."

This we was becoming more and more pronounced.

"That is true. You are a brave fellow, Citizen, and are through me predestinated —"

"To what?"

"To be rich one day."

"God grant it!"

"You then still believe in God?"

"Sometimes; here and there. To-day, for example —"

"Well?"

"I should willingly believe."

"Believe, then," said the Citizen Theodore, putting ten louis into the man's hand.

"The devil!" said he, regarding the gold by the light of the lantern. "Is it, then, serious?"

"It could not be more so."

"What must I do?"

"Meet me to-morrow at Noah's Well; I will then tell you what I require of you. What is your name?"

"Gracchus."

"Well, Citizen Gracchus, get yourself dismissed from here to-morrow by the porter Richard."

"Dismissed! give up my place!"

"Do you reckon on remaining a turnkey, with fifty thousand francs?"

"No, but being a turnkey and poor, I am certain of not being guillotined."

"Certain?"

"Or nearly so; while being free and rich —"

"You will hide your money, and make love to a spinster instead of to the mistress of Noah's Well."

"Well, then, it is settled."

"To-morrow at the tavern."

"At what hour?"

"At six in the evening."

"Flee quickly; there they are. I tell you to be quick, because, I presume, you descend and go through the vaults."

"To-morrow," repeated Theodore, hastening away.

And not before it was time, for the voices and steps drew near, and lights were already seen approaching in the obscurity of the underground passage. Theodore gained the gate which the writer from whom he had taken the hut had shown him, opened the lock with his crowbar, reached the window, threw it open, dropped softly into the street, and found himself upon the pavement of the Republic once again.

Before quitting the Salle des Pas-Perdus he heard the Citizen Gracchus again question Richard, and also his reply.

"The Citizen Architect was quite right; the vault passes below the chamber of the Widow Capet, and it was dangerous."

"I well believe it," said Gracchus, who in this instance told the perfect truth.

Santerre reappeared at the opening of the staircase.

"And the workmen, Citizen Architect?" demanded he of Giraud.

"Before daybreak they will be here; and during the session the grating will be placed," replied a voice which seemed to proceed from the bowels of the earth.

"And you will have saved the country," cried Santerre, half in jest, half in earnest.

"You little know the truth of what you say, Citizen General," murmured Gracchus.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

THE ROYAL CHILD.

In the mean time, as we have seen in the chapter preceding, the queen's trial was about to take place.

It was already surmised that by the sacrifice of this illustrious head the popular hatred, so long displayed in murmurs, would at length be satisfied.

The means were not wanting for the completion of this tragedy; and in the mean time Fouquier Tinville, that fatal accuser, had resolved not to neglect the new mode of accusation which Simon had promised to place in his hands.

The day after he and Simon had met in the Salle des Pas-Perdus, the noise of arms again startled the prisoners who remained in the Temple.

These prisoners were Madame Elizabeth, Madame Royale, and the child who after having been called "Your Majesty" in his cradle, was now styled simply the "Little Capet."

General Hanriot, with his tricolored plume, his splendid horse, and long sword, followed by several of the National Guard, dismounted, and entered the dungeon where the royal child languished.

By the general's side walked a registrar of very unprepossessing appearance, carrying a writing-desk, a large roll of paper, and flourishing a pen of immoderate length.

Behind the scribe walked the public accuser. We have seen, we know, and shall meet again at a later period, this dry, jaundiced, cold man, with his bloodshot eyes, who made the ferocious Santerre himself tremble, even when cased in his armor.

Several National Guards and a lieutenant followed them.

Simon, smiling hypocritically, and holding his bear-skin bonnet in one hand and his shoemaker's stirrup in the other, walked before to show the committee the way.

They came to a very dirty chamber, spacious and ill-furnished, at the end of which, seated upon his bed, was the young Louis, in a state of perfect immobility.

When we saw the poor child fleeing from the brutal anger of Simon, he still retained a species of vitality, resenting the unworthy treatment of the shoemaker of the Temple. He fled, he wept, he prayed; then he feared and suffered, but still he hoped.

But now both fear and hope had vanished; without doubt the suffering still existed, but if it still remained, the infant martyr, whom they had made pay after so cruel a fashion for his parents' faults, buried it in the depths of his heart, and veiled it under an appearance of total insensibility. He did not even raise his head when the commissioners walked up to him.

Without further ceremony they instantly installed themselves. The public accuser seated himself at the head of the bed, Simon at the foot, the registrar near the window, the National Guard and their lieutenant on the side and rather in the shade.

Those among them who regarded the little prisoner with the slightest interest, or even curiosity, remarked the child's pallor, his extraordinary stoutness (resulting from his bloated condition), and his bent legs, the joints of which had already begun to swell.

"That child is very ill," said the lieutenant, with an assurance that caused Fouquier to turn round, though already seated and prepared to question his victim.

Little Capet raised his eyes to discover who had uttered these words, and recognized the same young man who had already once before saved him from Simon's cruelty in the court of the Temple. A sweet and intelligent glance shot from his deep blue eyes, and that was all.

"Ah, ah! is that you, Citizen Lorin?" said Simon, thus calling the attention of Fouquier Tinville to the friend of Maurice.

"Myself, Citizen Simon," said Lorin, with his usual nonchalance.

And as Lorin though always ready to face danger was not the man to seek it uselessly, he availed himself of this circumstance to bow to Fouquier Tinville, which salutation was politely returned.

"You observed, I think, Citizen," said the public accuser, "that the child was ill; are you a doctor?"

"I have studied medicine, at least, if I am not a medical man."

"Well, and what do you discover in him?"

"Symptoms of sickness, do you mean?" asked Lorin.

"Yes."

"I find his cheeks and eyes puffed up, his hands thin and white, his knees swollen; and were I to feel his pulse, I should certainly count eighty-five or ninety pulsations in a minute."

The child appeared insensible to the enumeration of his sufferings.

"And to what might science attribute the condition of the prisoner?"

Lorin rubbed the tip of his nose, murmuring, —

"Phyllis wants to make me speak,
I am not the least inclined.

"Faith, Citizen!" replied he, "I am not sufficiently acquainted with little Capet's constitution to reply. However—"

Simon lent an attentive ear, and laughed in his sleeve to find his enemy so near committing himself.

"However," said Lorin, "I think he does not have sufficient exercise."

"I believe the little scoundrel," said Simon, "does not choose to walk."

The child remained quite unmoved by this apostrophe of the shoemaker.

Fouquier Tinville arose, advanced to Lorin, and addressed some words to him in a low tone. No one heard the words, but it was evident they assumed the form of interrogatories.

"Oh, oh! do you believe that, Citizen? It is a serious charge for a mother —"

"Under any circumstances, we shall find out. Simon pretends he has heard him say so, and has engaged to make him acknowledge it."

"This would be frightful," said Lorin; "but indeed it is possible; the Austrian is not exempt from sin, and right or wrong, does not concern me— They have made her out a Messalina; but not content with that, they wish to make her an Agrippina. I must acknowledge it appears to me rather hard."

"This is what has been reported by Simon," said the impassible Fouquier.

"I do not doubt that Simon has said all this. There are some men who stick at nothing, even the most impossible accusations. But do you not find," said Lorin, fixing his eyes steadily on Fouquier, — "do you not find — you, an intelligent and upright man, possessed with a strong mind — that to inquire of a child concerning such circumstances as those which all the most natural and most sacred laws of Nature command us to respect, is to insult all human nature in the person of a child?"

The accuser did not frown, but took a note from his pocket and showed it to Lorin.

"The Convention enjoins me to investigate," said he; "the rest does not concern me. I shall investigate."

"It is just," said Lorin; "and I declare that if this child acknowledges —" And the young man shook his head, expressive of disgust.

"Besides," continued Fouquier, "it is not only upon the denunciation of Simon that we proceed; the accusation is public."

And Fouquier drew a second paper from his pocket.

This was a number of the paper entitled "Le Père Duchesne;" which, as is well known, was written by Hébert.

The accusation indeed appeared there in full.

"It is written, and even printed," said Lorin; "but till I hear a similar accusation proceed from the lips of the child, — mind, I mean voluntarily, freely, and without menaces, — notwithstanding Simon and Hébert, I shall disbelieve it, as much as you in reality do yourself."

Simon impatiently awaited the issue of this conversation.

The miserable creature was not aware of the power exercised upon an intelligent man by the looks which he receives from the crowd, expressive either of sympathy or subtle hatred. Sometimes this subtle influence repels, sometimes it attracts, makes the thought flow out and even draws the person of the man toward that other man of equal or superior mental calibre whom he recognizes in the crowd.

But Fouquier Tinville had felt the keen observation of Lorin, and was anxious to be fully understood by him.

"The examination is about to commence," said the public accuser. "Registrar, resume your pen!"

The registrar, who had just drawn out the preliminaries of the investigation, was waiting, like Hanriot, Simon, and all the rest, till the colloquy between Fouquier and Lorin had ceased.

The child alone appeared perfectly unconscious of the scene in which he was soon to become the principal actor, and his face, which had for an instant gleamed with a ray of the highest intelligence, had relapsed into its listless, apathetic expression.

"Silence!" cried Hanriot, "the Citizen Fouquier Tinville is going to interrogate the child."

"Capet," said the public accuser, "do you know what has become of your mother?"

The little Louis turned from an ashy paleness to a brilliant red, but made no reply.

"Did you hear me, Capet?"

He still remained silent.

"Oh, he hears well enough," said Simon, "only he is like the ape, he will not reply for fear he should be taken for a man, and so made to work."

"Reply, Capet!" said Hanriot; "it is the Commission of the Convention that interrogates you. You must show obedience to the laws."

The child turned pale, but did not reply.

Simon made a frantic gesture of rage. With natures so stupid and brutal as his, anger becomes an intoxication, attended with all the loathsome symptoms of alcoholic inebriety.

"Will you reply, wolf's cub?" showing him the strap.

"Be quiet, Simon," said Fouquier Tinville; "you have not the right to speak."

This expression, which had become habitual to Tinville at the Revolutionary Tribunal, now escaped him involuntarily.

"Do you hear, Simon?" said Lorin. "This is the second time you have been told this in my presence; the first was when you accused Tison's daughter, whom you had the pleasure of bringing to the scaffold."

Simon was silent.

"Does your mother love you, Capet?" asked Fouquier.

Still the same silence.

"They say not," continued the accuser.

Something like a ghastly smile passed over the child's pale lips.

"But then, I say," roared Simon, "he has told me she loves him too much!"

"Look here, Simon," said Lorin, "you are angry that the little Capet chatters so much when you are together, and remains silent before company to-day."

"Oh, if we were alone!" said Simon.

"Yes, if you were alone; but unfortunately you are not alone. Oh, if you were, brave Simon, excellent patriot! how you would belabor the poor child, eh? But you are not alone, and dare not show your rage before honest men like us who know that the ancients, whom we endeavor to take for our models, respected all who were weak. You dare not, for you are not alone; and you are not valiant, my worthy man, when you have children of five feet six inches to combat."

"Oh!" muttered Simon, grinding his teeth.

"Capet," said Fouquier, "have you confided any secrets to Simon?"

The child never turned round, but his face assumed an expression of irony impossible to describe.

"About your mother?" continued Fouquier.

A look of supreme contempt passed over his countenance.

"Reply, yes or no!" cried Hanriot.

"Say yes!" roared Simon, holding his leather stirrup over the child's head.

The child shuddered, but made no movement to avoid the blow. Those present uttered a cry expressive of their disgust. Lorin did more. Before the wretch could lower his arm he darted forward and seized him by the wrist.

"Will you let me go?" roared Simon, purple with rage.

"Come, there is no harm," said Fouquier, "in a mother loving her child. Tell us in what way your mother loved you, Capet. It may be useful to her."

The young prisoner started at the idea of being useful to his mother.

"She loves me as a mother loves her son, sir," said he; "there are not two ways for mothers to love their sons, or sons to love their mothers."

"And I, little serpent, declare that you have told me your mother —"

"You have dreamed that," interrupted Lorin, quietly, "you must often have the nightmare, Simon."

"Lorin! Lorin!" growled Simon, grinding his teeth.

"Yes, again, Lorin. There is no way of beating Lorin, since he chastises the wicked; there is no way to denounce him for what he did in arresting your arm, as it was done before General Hanriot and Fouquier Tinville, who approve of it, and they are not lukewarm in the cause. There is then no way to bring him to the guillotine, as you did poor Sophie Tison. It is very grievous, very vexatious, very enraging; still it is so, my poor Simon!"

"Later! later!" replied the shoemaker, with his mocking laugh.

"Yes, dear friend," said Lorin, "I hope with the help of the Supreme Being — Ah! you expected I was going to say with the help of God! But I hope with the assistance of the Supreme Being, and my good sword, to disembowel you first; but move aside, Simon, you prevent me from seeing."

"Rascal!"

"Be silent, you prevent me from hearing," and Lorin silenced him with a threatening look.

Simon clinched his black hands and shook his fists, but as Lorin had told him, he was obliged to confine himself to these manifestations.

"Now he has begun to speak," said Hanriot, "he will continue no doubt. Go on, Fouquier!"

"Will you reply now?" demanded Fouquier.

The child returned to his former silence.

"You see, Citizen! you see!" exclaimed Simon.

"The obstinacy of this child is strange," said Hanriot, troubled in spite of himself at this royal firmness.

"He is ill advised," said Lorin.

"By whom?" demanded Hanriot.

"By his guardian."

"Do you accuse me?" cried Simon, — "do you denounce me? Ah! that is curious —"

"Let us try gentleness," said Fouquier. Then turning toward the child, whom one would have supposed to be insensible, —

"My child," said he, "reply to the National Commission; do not aggravate your situation by refusing us any useful information. You have spoken to the Citizen Simon about your mother, — how you caress her and love her; how she caresses and loves you?"

Louis threw a glance around the assembly, which gleamed with hatred when it rested on Simon, but he did not reply.

"Do you feel yourself unhappy?" demanded the accuser; "are you uncomfortably lodged, badly fed, and unkindly treated? Would you wish more liberty, better food, another prison, another guardian? Would you like a horse to ride upon, and some companions of your own age?"

Louis still maintained the profound silence he had only once broken, to defend his mother.

The Commission was utterly confounded at so much firmness and intelligence evinced by a child.

"Ah, these kings!" said Hanriot, in a low voice, "what a race! They are like tigers; even the young ones inherit their wickedness."

"How are we to write the investigation?" asked the registrar, much embarrassed.

"There is no charge against Simon; there is nothing to write," said Lorin; "that will suit him exactly."

Simon again shook his fist at his implacable enemy.

Lorin began to laugh.

"You will not laugh like that the day you will sneeze in the sack," said Simon, drunk with fury.

"I do not know whether I shall precede or follow you in the little ceremony you menace me with," said Lorin; "but this I do know, that many will laugh when your turn comes. Gods! — I have spoken in the plural, — gods! you will not be ugly then, Simon; you will be hideous."

And Lorin retired behind the Commission, with a fresh burst of laughter.

The Commission, having nothing more to attend to, withdrew.

As for the poor child, released from his tormentors, he began to sing a little melancholy ditty which had been a great favorite of his deceased father.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

THE BOUQUET OF VIOLETS.

As might be foreseen, the felicity of Geneviève and Maurice was not of long continuance.

In the tempest which unchains the wind and hurls the thunderbolt, the nest of the doves is shaken in the tree where they had retired for shelter.

Geneviève passed from one terror to another. She no longer feared for Maison-Rouge, she now trembled for Maurice.

She knew her husband sufficiently well to feel convinced, the moment of his disappearance, that he was saved; but sure of his safety, she thought now of her own.

She dared not confide her grief to the least timid man of this epoch when all from desperation were devoid of fear, but it was plainly evinced by her red eyes and pallid cheeks.

One day Maurice softly entered, so quietly indeed that Geneviève, buried in a profound revery, did not notice his entrance. He stopped upon the threshold and saw Geneviève sitting immovable, her eyes fixed on vacancy, her hands lying listlessly on her lap, her head hanging pensively upon her bosom.

He gazed at her for a moment with an expression of deepest sadness, for all that was passing in the young girl's heart was suddenly revealed, as if he had read even to her latest thought. He stepped up to her.

"You have ceased to care for France, Geneviève; confess it is so. You fly from the air breathed here, and not without the greatest reluctance will you even approach the window."

"Alas!" said Geneviève, "I know I cannot conceal my thoughts from you, Maurice; you have divined rightly."

"It is nevertheless a fine country," said the young man; "life is here important, and well occupied now. This bustling activity of the Tribune, the clubs, the conspiracies, renders sweeter the hours spent by our own fireside. One loves it the more ardently, it may be, from the fear of not being able to love it on the morrow, for on the morrow one may have ceased to exist."

Geneviève shook her head. "An ungrateful country to serve," said she.

"Why so?"

"Yes; you who have labored so much for the cause of liberty, are you not to-day more than half suspected?"

"But you, dear Geneviève," said Maurice, with a look replete with tenderness, "you a sworn enemy to this liberty, — you who have done so much against it! You yet sleep, peaceable and inviolate, beneath the roof of a Republican; and there, you see, is my recompense."

"Yes," said Geneviève, "but that cannot last long; that which is wrong cannot endure."

"What do you mean?"

"I mean to say that I, — that is to say an aristocrat, — that I who dream quietly of the defeat of your party and the ruin of your plans; I who plot, even in your house, the return of the ancient régime; I who, recognized, would condemn you to death and dishonor, according to your opinions at least, — I, Maurice, will not remain here as the evil genius of your house; I will not drag you to the scaffold."

"And where will you go, Geneviève?"

"Where shall I go, Maurice? One day when you are out I shall go and denounce myself, without saying where I come from."

"Oh!" cried Maurice, wounded to the heart's core, "already ungrateful?"

"No," cried the young woman, throwing her arms round Maurice's neck; "it is love, and the most devoted love, I swear. I should not wish my brother to be taken and slaughtered as a rebel; I do not wish my lover to be arrested and guillotined as a traitor."

"And you will do this, Geneviève?"

"As truly as there is a God in heaven," replied the young woman; "besides, I not only experience fear but remorse," and she bowed her head as if remorse were a burden too heavy to be borne.

"Oh, Geneviève!" said Maurice.

"You will understand all that I say, all that I feel, Maurice, for you yourself experience this remorse. You know I gave myself to you while I belonged to another, and you have taken me without my possessing the right to dispose of myself."

"Enough!" said Maurice, "enough!" He knit his brow, and a melancholy resolution shone in his clear bright eyes. "I will show you, Geneviève, how entirely I love you," said the young man, "I will prove to you that no sacrifice is beyond my love. You hate France. Well, so be it. We will quit France."

Geneviève clasped her hands, and regarded her lover with enthusiastic admiration.

"You will not deceive me, Maurice," murmured she.

"Have I ever deceived you?" asked Maurice, "and is this the time when, to obtain you, I have dishonored myself?"

Geneviève approached her lips to Maurice's, and remained hanging on the neck of her lover.

"Yes, you are right," said Geneviève; "it is I who am mistaken. What I feel is not remorse, perhaps it is a degradation of soul; but you will comprehend at least I love you far too much to feel any other emotion than the all-engrossing one, the fear of losing you. Let us go far away, Maurice, let us go far away where no one can ever reach us."

"Oh, thanks!" said Maurice, transported with joy.

"But how can we flee?" said Geneviève, trembling at the hazard. "It is not so easy to escape nowadays from the poniard of the assassins of the 2d of September, or the hatchet of the executioners of the 21st of January."

"Geneviève," said Maurice, "God will protect us. Listen to me! A good action which I endeavored to perform, on that very 2d of September which you have just named, is now about to receive its reward. I wished to save a poor priest who had studied with me. I went to Danton, and at his request the Committee of Public Safety signed a passport for the unfortunate man and his sister. This passport Danton forwarded to me; but the unfortunate priest, instead of coming to my house for it, as I had advised him to do, went and shut himself up with the Carmelites, from whom he was taken and killed."

"And the passport?" asked Geneviève.

"I have it now. It is worth a million. It is worth more than that, Geneviève, — it comprises both life and happiness!"

"Oh, God be praised!" cried the young woman.

"Now, my property, as you are aware, consists of an estate managed by an old servant of the family, a stanch patriot, and strictly loyal, in whom we may confide. He will send remittances whenever I wish. On arriving at Boulogne, we will go to his house."

"Where does he reside then?"

"At Abbeville."

"When shall we go, Maurice?"

"Within an hour."

"No one need know of our departure."

"No one will know it. I will run to Lorin; he has a cabriolet and no horse, while I have a horse and no carriage. We will set out immediately on my return. Remain you here, Geneviève, and prepare everything for our departure. We want but little luggage; we can purchase all that we require in England. I shall give Scævola some commission that will remove him out of the way. Lorin will explain our departure to him this evening. By that time we shall be far away."

"But if we should be arrested upon the road?"

"Have we not our passport? We shall go to Hubert's house, — that is the steward's name. Hubert is a member of the town council of Abbeville; from Abbeville to Boulogne he will accompany us as safeguard. At Boulogne we will purchase and freight a vessel. I could, besides, proceed to the Committee, and make them give me a mission to Abbeville. But no; we shall use no fraud, Geneviève. It is better to risk our lives to save and secure our happiness."

"Yes, yes, dear Maurice; and we shall succeed. But how you are perfumed this morning!" said the young woman, concealing her face on Maurice's breast.

"True; I purchased a bunch of violets for you this morning, passing before the Palace d'Egalité; but on my return, finding you so sad, I thought of nothing but inquiring into the cause of your distress."

"Oh, give it to me; I will return it."

Geneviève inhaled the odor of the bouquet with that intense delight which persons of nervous organization always experience from the perfume of flowers. Suddenly her eyes suffused with tears.

"What is the matter?" asked Maurice.

"Poor Sophie!" murmured Geneviève.

"Ah, yes!" said Maurice, with a sigh; "but let us think of ourselves, and leave the dead, wherever they may be, to rest in the grave dug by their devotion. Adieu! I am going."

"Return quickly."

"In less than half an hour I shall be here again."

"But if Lorin is not at home?"

"What does it matter? his servant knows me. And even in his absence I can take what I please, as he would do here in mine."

"Very well."

"Now, my Geneviève, prepare everything; but, as I have told you, confine yourself to necessaries. I do not wish our departure to appear like a removal."

The young man advanced a step toward the door.

"Maurice!" said Geneviève.

He turned round, and saw the young woman extend her arms toward him.

"Good-by for the present, dear love," said he; "in half an hour I shall be here."

Geneviève remained alone, occupied, as we have said, in preparations for their departure.

She accomplished her task in feverish haste. As long as she remained in Paris, the part she was acting appeared to her doubly culpable. Once out of France, once among strangers, it seemed that her crime — a crime rather of fatality than her own — would weigh the less heavily on her conscience.

She even hoped, isolated and in solitude, she might at last forget the existence of any other man than Maurice.

They would fly to England; everything was arranged. There they would hire a little cottage, standing alone, very retired, shut out from all eyes; they would change their names, and instead of two names would have one.

There they would have two servants who would be perfectly ignorant of their past. Fortunately, both Geneviève and Maurice spoke English.

Neither of them left anything to regret in France, save that mother whom one always regrets, even when she is only a step-mother, — one's country. Geneviève commenced, then, making preparations for their voyage, or rather flight.

She took singular pleasure in selecting from the rest those objects for which Maurice had evinced any predilection. The coat setting off his tall figure to advantage, the cravat and waistcoat best suited to his complexion, the books whose leaves he had most frequently turned.

She had already made her selection. Clothes, linen, and books, waiting to be packed, strewed the floor, the chairs, the sofa and the piano.

Suddenly she heard the key turn in the lock.

"Why, Scævola has returned," said she; "surely Maurice could not have met him."

And she continued her occupation.

The doors of the salon were open, and she heard Scævola moving in the antechamber. She held a roll of music in her hand, and was looking for some string to tie round it.

"Scævola!" cried she.

An approaching step sounded in the adjoining room.

"Scævola!" repeated Geneviève, "do come here, please!"

"I am here," said a voice.

At the sound of this voice Geneviève turned quickly round, and uttered a terrified cry.

"My husband!" cried she.

"Himself," said Dixmer, coolly.

Geneviève was upon a chair, searching for some string in the wardrobe. She felt her head turn round, and extending her arms, fell backward, wishing she could precipitate herself into an abyss beneath.

Dixmer took her in his arms, and carried her to a sofa.

"What is the matter, my dear? What is it? My presence seems to have produced a most disagreeable effect upon you."

"I am dying," murmured Geneviève, turning from him, and pressing both hands over her eyes that she might shut out the frightful apparition.

"What!" said Dixmer, "did you believe me dead, my dear, and do you take me for a ghost?"

Geneviève looked round her with a bewildered air, when, perceiving the portrait of Maurice, she glided from the sofa and fell upon her knees, as if to implore the assistance of this powerless and insensible image, which still continued to smile.

The unhappy woman fully comprehended the menaces concealed by Dixmer under his affected calmness.

"Oh, my dear child," continued the master-tanner, "it is indeed myself. Perhaps you thought I was far from Paris; but no, I remained here. The day after I had left the house, I returned, and found in its stead a heap of ruins. I inquired after you. No one had seen you. I then commenced a search for you, and have had much trouble to find you. I avow that I did not think you were here; however, I had my suspicions. So, as you see, I came. So here I am; and there are you. And how is dear Maurice? Indeed, I fear you have suffered much. You so stanch a Royalist, compelled to seek shelter under the roof of so fanatical a Republican."

"My God! my God!" murmured Geneviève, "take pity upon me!"

"After all, my dear," continued Dixmer, "what serves to console me most is that you are so comfortably lodged here, and that you do not appear to have suffered much from the proscription. As for myself, since the burning of our house, and the ruin of our fortune, I have had my share of wandering adventures, sometimes living in caves, sometimes in boats, and sometimes even in the common sewers which empty into the Seine."

"Sir!" said Geneviève.

"You have there some beautiful fruit; as for me, I have often gone without any dessert, not having had any dinner."

Geneviève, sobbing bitterly, supported her head between her hands.

"Not," continued Dixmer, "that I was destitute of money. I have, thank God! generally carried with me thirty thousand francs in gold, which at this time is worth five hundred thousand francs; but how should a 'collier,' a 'fisherman,' or a 'rag merchant' draw louis from his pocket to purchase a morsel of cheese or a sausage. Eh! my God! yes, Madame, I have successively adopted these three costumes. To-day, the better to disguise myself, I am dressed as a patriot of the patriots; I lisp, and I swear. An outlaw cannot conceal himself so easily in Paris as a young and pretty woman, and I have not the happiness of knowing an ardent young female Republican who could hide me from every eye."

"Sir! sir!" cried Geneviève, "have mercy upon me! you see that I am dying."

"Anxiety; I can understand you have had much anxiety about me; but console yourself, you see me now. I have returned, and we shall part no more, Madame."

"Oh, you will kill me!" cried Geneviève.

Dixmer regarded her with a frightful smile.

"Kill an innocent woman! Oh, Madame, what makes you say so? It must be that grief for my absence has turned your brain."

"Sir!" cried Geneviève, "sir, I beseech you to kill me at once, rather than torture me with these cruel railleries. No, I am not innocent; yes, I am criminal; yes, I merit death. Kill me, sir, kill me!—"

"Then you acknowledge that you merit death?"

"Yes! yes!"

"And to expiate this I know not what crime of which you accuse yourself, you will submit to death without complaint?"

"Strike, sir, I will not utter a cry; and instead of cursing I will bless the hand that strikes me."

"No, Madame, I do not wish to strike you; nevertheless in all probability you will die. Only your death, instead of being as you seem to fear an ignominious one, shall be most glorious. Thank me, Madame; while punishing, I will immortalize you."

"What then will you do, sir?"

"You will follow the end to which we were tending when interrupted on our route. In your own eyes and in mine, you will die guilty; in the eyes of the world you will die a martyr."

"Oh, my God! you will drive me mad by speaking thus. Where are you conducting me? Where are you dragging me?"

"In all probability to death."

"Let me then offer up one prayer."

"To whom?"

"It matters not to you. The moment you deprive me of life, my debt is cancelled. My debt paid, I owe you nothing."

"True," said Dixmer, retiring into another room; "I will await you." And he left her once more alone.

Geneviève sank on her knees before the portrait, pressing her hands against her breaking heart.

"Maurice," said she, in a low tone, "pardon me; I did not expect to be happy, but I hoped to make you so. Maurice, I am depriving you of a joy that constituted your life; pardon me for causing your death, my best beloved."

Then severing a ringlet from her mass of curls, she bound it round the bouquet of violets, and placed them beneath the portrait, which insensible, and speechless as it was, still appeared to assume an expression of grief at her departure.

At least so it appeared to the unfortunate Geneviève, as she gazed at it through her tears.

"Well, are you ready, Madame?" demanded Dixmer.

"So soon?" murmured Geneviève.

"Oh, take your time, Madame," replied Dixmer; "I am in no hurry. Besides, I dare say Maurice will not be long, and I shall be delighted to thank him for all his kindness and hospitality toward you."

Geneviève trembled with terror at the idea of a meeting between her lover and husband. She automatically raised herself.

"It is finished, sir," said she, "and I am ready now."

Dixmer went out first, and the trembling Geneviève followed him with half-closed eyes, her head turned back to take a last fond look. They ascended the carriage which was waiting at the door. It rolled away.

As Geneviève had said, "It was finished."

CHAPTER XL.

THE TAVERN OF NOAH'S WELL.

This man attired in a jerkin, whom we have seen traversing with long and rapid strides the Salle des Pas-Perdus; whom we have heard, during the expedition of the architect Giraud, General Hanriot, and Richard, conversing with the turnkey left to guard the subterranean passage; this fierce patriot, who had introduced himself to Simon as having carried the head of the Princess de Lamballe, — found himself, on the next evening, about seven o'clock, at the tavern of Noah's Well, situated, as we have said, at the corner of the Rue de la Vieille Draperie.

He was seated at the end of a dirty room, redolent of tobacco and candles, pretending to devour a plate of fish swimming in melted butter.

The room where he supped was nearly deserted; two or three habitués of the house alone remained after the rest, enjoying the privilege to which their daily visit to the establishment entitled them.

The tables were for the most part empty; but we ought to remark, in honor to the tavern of Noah's Well, that the stained tablecloths denoted the departure of a satisfactory number of satisfied guests.

The last three successively disappeared, and at about a quarter to eight our patriot found himself alone. Then, with true aristocratic disgust, he pushed away the greasy plate, which an instant before he had appeared to think so delicious, and drew from his pocket a tablet of Spanish chocolate, which he ate slowly and with a very different expression to that we have seen him endeavor to give to his countenance.

From time to time, while eating his chocolate and black bread, he cast toward a glass door, shaded by a red and white checked curtain, anxious and impatient glances. Sometimes he interrupted his frugal repast to listen; in short, evinced an absence of mind sufficient to induce the mistress of the mansion — seated at her counter, and near the door on which the patriot so eagerly fixed his eyes — to conclude that she might without vanity consider herself the object of his preoccupation.

At length the door-bell sounded in a way that made him start; he drew the plate again before him, and without attracting the woman's observation, threw half the contents to a famished-looking dog, and the remainder to a cat, who treated the dog to some stinging strokes of her velvet paws.

The door opened, and a man entered, dressed almost the same as the patriot, with the exception of the hairy cap, which he had replaced with the red bonnet. An enormous bunch of keys hung from his girdle, from which also depended a sword.

"My soup! my half-pint!" cried the man, entering the public room without removing his bonnet, but merely saluting the mistress of the house by a slight inclination of his head. With a sigh of fatigue, he seated himself at a table adjoining that where our patriot was discussing his black bread and chocolate.

The mistress of the tavern, in consequence of the deference she entertained for the new-comer, rose herself to order the requisite viands.

The two men turned their backs to each other, — one to look into the street, the other toward the end of the room, — not a word was exchanged between them till the mistress of the tavern had disappeared.

When the door had closed behind her, by the light from a single candle, suspended from the end of an iron wire so as to divide the light equally between the two guests, the man in the bear-skin bonnet — thanks to the glass placed before him — at length saw that the room was deserted.

"Good-evening," said he to his companion, without turning round.

"Good-evening, sir!" said the new-comer.

"Well," asked the patriot, with the same affected indifference, "where are we now?"

"Well! it is done!"

"What is done?"

"As we agreed, I have had some conversation with Father Richard about the situation. I complained of swimming in the head, dimness of eyesight, — in short, of general ill-health."

"What then?"

"Father Richard called his wife, and she rubbed my temples with vinegar, and that revived me. Then, as we had arranged between us, I said that want of fresh air produced this swimming in the head, that I was of too full a habit, and that the duty at the Conciergerie, which contains at the present moment four hundred prisoners, was killing me."

"What did they say to that?"

"Richard's wife pitied me, but he showed me to the door."

"It was not enough to show you to the door."

"But wait! Then his wife, who is a good soul, reproached him with having no heart, seeing that I was the father of a family."

"What did he say to that?"

"He said that she was right; but that the very first condition annexed to the situation of turnkey was to remain within the prison to which he was attached; that the Republic did not jest, but would without ceremony cut the throats of those who grew dizzy in the exercise of their duty."

"The devil!" exclaimed the patriot.

"And he was not far wrong either; for since the Austrian has been there, it is a perfect hell of surveillance. One would act the spy there upon his own father." The patriot here gave his plate to the dog to lick, who was directly bitten by the cat.

"Go on!" said he, without turning round.

"At last, sir, I began to groan, and to say that I felt very ill; asked concerning the infirmary, and said I was certain my children would die of hunger if my pay was stopped."

"And Father Richard?"

"The Father Richard replied that turnkeys had no business with children."

"But you had his wife on your side, I suppose?"

"Fortunately! She made a great to-do with her husband, reproached him with possessing a bad and hard heart, and Richard finished by saying to me, —

"'Well! Citizen Gracchus, speak to some one of your friends who will advance you something on your wages, present him to me, and I promise to accept him as your substitute.' Upon which I left him, saying, —

"'Very good, Father Richard, I will directly seek one.'"

"And you have found one, my brave fellow."

At this moment the mistress of the establishment entered, bringing the Citizen Gracchus his soup and half-pint.

This did not suit either the patriot or Gracchus, who evidently had still some communications to make to each other.

"Madame," said the turnkey, "I have received a slight remuneration from Father Richard to-day, which will permit me to treat myself to some better fare. So bring me a pork cutlet with cucumbers and a bottle of Burgundy wine; send your servant to fetch the one from the pork-butcher's, and bring me the other yourself fresh from the cellar."

The hostess immediately went to execute his orders.

"Well," said the patriot, "you are an intelligent fellow."

"So far intelligent that I do not hide from myself what, notwithstanding all your fine promises, will be the end of us both. Do you suspect what it may be?"

"Yes, perfectly."

"We both stake our necks."

"Do not be uneasy about mine."

"It is not yours, sir, I must confess, that causes me the greatest uneasiness."

"It is your own?"

"Yes."

"But what if I estimate it at double its worth?"

"Ah, sir, there is nothing more precious than one's neck!"

"Not yours."

"Why not mine?"

"At this moment at least."

"What do you mean by that?"

"I mean to say your neck is not worth a cent, seeing that if I, for example, were an agent of the Committee of Public Safety, you would be guillotined to-morrow."

The turnkey suddenly turned round so abruptly that the dog barked at him.

He was as pale as death.

"Neither turn round nor turn pale about it," said the patriot, "but finish your soup quietly. I am not an agent, friend. Let me once enter the Conciergerie, install me in your situation, give me the keys, and to-morrow I will count out to you fifty thousand francs in gold."

"Is all this true?"

"Well, you have excellent security, — my head."

The turnkey considered for some seconds.

"Come," said the patriot, who could see him in the glass, "do not indulge in meditations of evil. If you denounce me, as you will only have done your duty, you will not receive a sou from the Republic; if you serve me, and on the contrary are deficient in this same duty to the Republic, as it is unjust in this world to do anything for nothing, I will give you fifty thousand francs."

"I understand perfectly," said the turnkey. "I have every inducement to do what you require, but I fear the results — "

"The results! And what have you to fear? I will not denounce you; very far from it."

"No doubt."

"The day after I am duly installed, take a turn through the Conciergerie, and I will count you twenty-five rolls each containing two thousand francs. These you can easily dispose of in your two pockets. With the money I will give you a ticket to leave France. You go, and wherever you are you will be, if not rich, at least independent."

"Well! it is settled, Monsieur, happen what may. I am a poor devil who never dabbled in politics. France has always got on very well without me, and will not perish through any fault of mine; if you do a wicked action so much the worse for you."

"At all events," said the patriot, "I think I shall never do worse than they are doing at this moment."

"Sir, permit me to decline passing an opinion upon the politics of the National Convention."

"You are a pattern of philosophy and indifference. When, however, will you present me to Father Richard?"

"This evening, if you please."

"Yes, certainly; but who am I?"

"My cousin Mardoche."

"Mardoche, then, let it be; the name pleases me. What trade?"

"A breeches-maker."

"Either breeches-maker or tanner. I have that at my fingers' ends."

"Are you a tanner?"

"I could be one."

"True."

"At what time will you present me?"

"In half an hour if you like."

"At nine o'clock then."

"When shall I have the money?"

"To-morrow."

"You must be enormously rich."

"I am in easy circumstances."

"A former nobleman? Is it not so?"

"What does it matter to you?"

"To possess money, and give it away to run the risk of being guillotined; surely the former nobility must be great blockheads."

"What would you have? Your red Republicans have too much sense to leave any for others."

"Hush! here is my wine."

"This evening, in front of the Conciergerie."

"All right."

The patriot paid his bill and went out. At the door his stentorian voice was heard, —

"Come, Citizen, quick! make haste with the pork cutlets; my cousin Gracchus is dying of hunger!"

"Mardoche is a good fellow," said the turnkey, tasting the wine poured out for him by the hostess, while she regarded him tenderly.

CHAPTER XLI.

THE REGISTRAR OF THE MINISTER OF WAR.

THE patriot left, but he had not gone far. Through the smoky panes he kept watch over the turnkey, to discover if he entered into conversation with any of the agents of the Republican police, one of the best that ever existed, since one half of society closely watched the other, less from the desire of promoting the great glory of the government than for the greater security of their own heads.

But nothing occurred of what the patriot feared. At a few minutes before nine the turnkey rose, chucked the hostess under the chin, and went out.

The patriot rejoined him at the quay of the Conciergerie, and they entered the prison together.

On that same evening the affair was concluded, and Father Richard accepted Mardoche as a substitute for Gracchus.

Two hours before this arrangement took place, another scene had been enacted in a different part of the prison, which, although apparently of no interest, was possessed of vital importance to the principal personages of this history.

The registrar of the Conciergerie, fatigued with his day's labor, was folding up his papers and preparing to leave, when a man, conducted by Madame Richard, presented himself in his office.

"Citizen Registrar," said she, "here is your fellow registrar of the Minister of War, who comes on the part of the Citizen Minister to transfer some military entries."

"Ah, Citizen," said the registrar, "you are too late; I have just put away all my papers."

"Dear brother, pardon me," said the new-comer; "but we are really so overwhelmed with business that we can only achieve our course by turning our leisure to profit; and our leisure is the time occupied by others in eating and sleeping."

"That alters the case, my dear fellow; so make haste, for, as you observe, it is near supper-time, and I am very hungry. Have you your documents?"

"Here they are," said the registrar of the Minister of War, exhibiting a portfolio of papers which his brother, anxious as he was to leave, scrutinized with the strictest attention.

"Oh, they are all right!" said Richard's wife, "and my husband has already thoroughly inspected them."

"Never mind, never mind!" said the registrar, continuing his examination. The registrar of the Minister of War remained like a man who had expected the strict accomplishment of all due formalities.

"Perfectly correct," said the registrar of the Conciergerie; "and you can now commence as soon as you please. Have you many entries to transfer?"

"A hundred."

"That will occupy you for several days."

"Therefore dear brother, I wish to form a small establishment with you, — that is to say, if you will permit me."

"How am I to understand you?" said the registrar of the Conciergerie.

"I will explain it to you fully, if you will join us at supper this evening. You say you are hungry?"

"I do not deny it."

"Well, you shall see my wife, who is a good housekeeper; and you will become better acquainted with me, and will acknowledge me for a good companion."

"Faith, yes; you strike me as such, my dear brother; yet, notwithstanding —"

"Oh, come without ceremony, and partake of some oysters that I will purchase as I pass the Place du Châtelet, a roasted chicken, and a few dishes which Madame Durand excels in."

"You tempt me, my brother," said the registrar of the Conciergerie, delighted at the bill of fare, to which he was totally unaccustomed as a registrar paid by the Revolutionary Tribunal at the rate of two livres in paper money, in reality hardly equal to two francs.

"Then you will accept my invitation?"

"Yes, willingly."

"In that case, to work to-morrow; this evening let us go."

"All right; let us start."

"Are you ready?"

"In an instant, only I must first inform the gendarmes who guard the Austrian."

"Why must you tell them?"

"So that when they know that I am absent, and that there is no one at the wicket, they may become suspicious of every noise."

"Ah, that is a very wise precaution, faith!"

"You understand now?"

"Perfectly."

The registrar of the Conciergerie went and knocked at the wicket, which was opened by one of the gendarmes.

"Who is there?"

"I, the registrar, you know. I am going out. Good-evening, Citizen Gilbert."

"Good-evening, Citizen Registrar," and the wicket was shut.

The registrar of the Minister of War had paid the greatest attention to this scene, and while the door of the queen's prison remained open, his looks rapidly penetrated to the first compartment, when, seeing the other gendarme Duchesne seated at table, he felt perfectly assured the queen had only two guards.

When the registrar of the Conciergerie returned, his fellow registrar's face had resumed its expression of stolid indifference.

As they went out of the Conciergerie two men entered. They were the Citizen Gracchus and his cousin Mardoche.

On seeing each other, Cousin Mardoche and the registrar of the Minister of War each, by a simultaneous movement arising from the same impulse, pulled over their eyes, the one his hairy bonnet, the other his broad-brimmed hat.

"Who are these men?" asked the registrar of the Minister of War.

"I only know one of them; it is a turnkey named Gracchus."

"Ah!" said the other, with affected indifference, "do the turnkeys then go out of the Conciergerie?"

"They have their day."

The investigation did not proceed any further, and the new friends took the road to the Pont-au-Change. At the corner of the Place du Châtelet, the registrar of the Minister of War, following the programme he had announced, purchased some oysters, and continued his way by the Quai de Grève.

The dwelling of this individual was simple. The Citizen Durand inhabited three little rooms in the Place de Grève, in a house without any porter. Each tenant had a key of the door in the passage, and it was agreed that if any one had omitted to take his key, he should intimate the same by one, two, or three raps with the knocker, according to the story he inhabited, and any one who was waiting, and heard the signal, then descended and opened the door; but the Citizen Durand, having provided himself with his key, had not any occasion to knock. They ascended two flights of stairs, when the Citizen Durand drew another key from his pocket, and they both entered.

The registrar of the Palace found his friend's wife much to his taste. She was indeed a charming woman; an appearance of profound melancholy diffused over her countenance stamped it with an expression of deep interest. It has always been allowed that sadness is seductive in women, especially pretty women. It attracts all men without exception, even registrars, — for registrars are but men after all; and what man possessed with natural feeling would not wish to console a pretty woman in affliction, and, as the Citizen Dorat remarks, "Change the pale tint of the white rose to a livelier hue"?

The two registrars did ample justice to their excellent supper; it was only Madame Durand who ate nothing.

In the mean time conversation proceeded. The registrar inquired of his brother registrar — with a curiosity the more remarkable in these days, when such frightful dramas were daily enacted — concerning the customs of the Palace, the days of judgment, and the means of surveillance.

The registrar of the Palace, delighted at being listened to with so much deference, replied with the greatest complaisance, spoke of the manners of the jailers, of Fouquier

Tinville, and lastly of Citizen Sanson, the principal actor in the tragedies daily performed upon the Placé de la Revolution.

Then in his turn, addressing his colleague and host, he made various inquiries concerning his vocation and ministry.

"Oh!" said Durand, "I am not so well informed as yourself, being a person of much less importance, seeing that I am rather secretary to the registrar than the incumbent of the place. I do the work of the registrar-in-chief, — an obscure employment, — laborious for me, profitable for them; but that is the way with all bureaucracies, not excepting those of the Revolution. Heaven and earth may perhaps change one day, but these things never."

"Well, I will assist you, Citizen," said the registrar of the Palace, charmed with the excellence of his host's wine, and above all with the beautiful eyes of Madame Durand.

"Thanks!" said he to whom this offer had been made, "anything to vary the habits; and locality is some distraction to a poor employee. I wish to protract my work at the Conciergerie rather than to hasten it, and therefore thought if I might every day bring Madame Durand with me to the office, who is very dull here — "

"I do not see any inconvenience in that," said the registrar of the Palace, delighted with the prospect of the charming recreation afforded him by his colleague.

"She can dictate the papers," said the Citizen Durand; "and occasionally when our work is finished, if you have not found this evening unpleasant, you can return and spend an hour or two with us."

"Yes; but not too often," replied the registrar of the Palace, foppishly; "for I declare I shall be scolded if I return later than usual to a small house in the Rue du Petit Musc."

"Oh, we shall arrange all that splendidly; shall we not, my dear?"

Madame Durand, pale and melancholy as usual, raised her eyes toward her husband, and replied, —

"What you wish shall be done."

Eleven o'clock struck, announcing it was time to retire. The registrar of the Palace rose and took leave of his new friends, expressing the great pleasure he felt in making their acquaintance.

The Citizen Durand conducted his friend to the landing, then re-entered the apartment.

"Go, Geneviève, go to bed!" said he.

The young woman made no reply, but rose directly, took her lamp, and withdrew to the bedroom on the right. Durand, or rather Dixmer, watched her departure, remained stationary for a moment with a gloomy, thoughtful expression of countenance, and then passed into his own chamber on the opposite side.

CHAPTER XLII.

THE TWO BILLETS.

From this time the registrar of the Minister of War worked every evening indefatigably in his colleague's office, while Madame Durand dictated from the registers previously prepared, which Durand copied with avidity.

Durand strictly examined everything, while appearing to notice nothing. He had remarked that every evening, at nine o'clock, a basket of provisions, carried by either Richard or his wife, was placed at the door.

The instant the registrar said to the gendarme, "I am going, Citizen," one of the guards, either Gilbert or Duchesne, came out, took the basket, and carried it to Marie Antoinette.

During three consecutive evenings, when Durand had remained rather later at his post, the basket also was left untouched, since it was only when opening the door to say adieu to the registrar that the gendarme took in the basket containing the provisions, which a quarter of an hour afterward was returned empty to the same place by one of the two guards.

On the evening of the fourth day, it was the beginning of October, when after the ordinary sitting the registrar of the Palace had withdrawn, and Durand, or rather Dixmer, remained alone with his wife; he laid down his pen, looked around and listened as if his very life was at stake; he then rose hastily, and running noiselessly toward the door of the wicket, raised the cloth which covered the contents of the basket, and in the new bread destined for the prisoner inserted a small silver case.

Pale and trembling with that emotion which even men of the strongest organization feel when they have done an act of the most vital importance, the moment for which has been long planned and patiently awaited, he quickly regained his seat, and sank down overpowered, placing one hand on his forehead, the other on his heart.

Geneviève regarded him in silence; indeed, since the day her husband had taken her from Maurice, she had never spoken till he addressed her first. But this time she first broke silence.

"Is it to be this evening?" she inquired.

"No; to-morrow," replied Dixmer.

He then rose, and having again looked and listened, closed the registers, and approaching the wicket, knocked at the door.

"What now?" said Gilbert.

"Citizen," said he, "I am going."

"Well," said the gendarme, from the end of the cell, "good-night."

"Good-night, Citizen Gilbert."

Durand heard the grinding of the bolts, and knew that the gendarme was opening the door. He went out.

In the passage leading from the apartment of Father Richard to the court, he jostled against a turnkey dressed in a bear-skin bonnet, and dangling a heavy bunch of keys.

Dixmer was much alarmed. Perhaps this man, brutal as the generality of his species, was about to interrogate him, to watch him, and perhaps to recognize him. He drew his hat over his eyes, while Geneviève concealed herself, as she best could, in the folds of her cloak. But he was mistaken.

"Pardon!" said the turnkey only, although he was the man who had been nearly overthrown.

Dixmer trembled at the sound of that sweet soft voice. But the turnkey was doubtless pressed for time; he glided into the passage, opened Richard's door, and disappeared. Dixmer continued his road, leading Geneviève.

"It is strange," said he, when outside and the gate had closed behind them, and the freshening breeze had cooled his fevered brow.

"Oh, yes, 't is very strange!" murmured Geneviève.

In former times they would have communicated to each other the cause of their astonishment, but Dixmer now confined his thoughts to his own breast, and combated them as an hallucination; while Geneviève contented herself, on turning the corner of the Pont-au-Change, with casting a last look at the dark and gloomy Palace, where something like the phantom of a lost friend awoke in her memory many sweet and bitter remembrances.

They both reached La Grève without having exchanged a single word.

During this time the Gendarme Gilbert had brought in the basket of provisions intended for the queen. It contained some fruit, a cold chicken, a bottle of white wine, a carafe of water, and half a loaf.

Having first raised the napkin, and ascertained that everything was arranged as usual, he opened the screen.

"Citizen," said he, "here is your supper."

Marie Antoinette divided the bread; but as her fingers pressed it, they came in contact with the silver. In an instant she comprehended that the bread contained something unusual.

When she looked around her the guard had already disappeared.

The queen remained for an instant motionless, calculating his retiring footsteps. When she felt certain he was seated by his comrade, and not till then, she drew the case from its place of concealment. It contained a billet, which she opened, and read as follows: —

"Madame, be ready to-morrow at the hour when you receive this billet, as to-morrow at this hour a female will be introduced into your Majesty's prison. This female will exchange dresses with you, and you will then quit the Conciergerie on the arm of one of your most devoted servants.

"Do not be alarmed at any noise that passes in the first compartment; let neither cries nor groans deter you, only attire yourself quickly in the dress and mantle of the female who comes to take your Majesty's place."

"This is devotion!" murmured the queen. "Thank God, I am not, as it is said, an object of execration to all!"

She then re-read the billet, when the second paragraph attracted her attention, — "Let neither cries nor groans deter you."

"Oh! that means they will sacrifice my two guards. Poor men, who have evinced so much kindness and pity toward me! Oh, never! — never!"

She tore off the blank portion of the letter, and having neither pen nor ink, pricked on the paper the following words, —

I neither can nor will accept the sacrifice of any one's life in exchange for my own. M. A.

She then replaced the paper in the case, which she concealed in the other half of the broken bread.

This operation was just completed when ten o'clock struck; and the queen, holding the piece of bread in her hand, sadly counted the strokes which vibrated slowly and distantly, when she heard at one of the windows opening upon the court termed the women's court a grating sound, like that produced by a diamond dividing the glass. This noise was followed by a slight knock upon the window, which was several times repeated, with the intention of concealing the cough of a man. Then at the corner of the pane a small roll of paper appeared, which glided slowly down and fell on the inside of the wall. The queen then heard the sound of keys jingling and clashing against each other, and receding footsteps on the pavement.

She was aware that the window had been perforated at this corner, and that through this aperture the departing individual had conveyed a paper which was doubtless a billet. It was now lying on the ground. The queen fixed her eyes upon it, listening if either of her guards was approaching, but heard them conversing in a low tone as they usually did, as if by a tacit agreement not to annoy her with their voices. Then she rose softly, holding her breath, and secured the paper. Some minute and hard substance slipped from it, which, falling on the bricks, sounded like metal. It was the most exquisite file that could be imagined, — more of the jewel than the tool, — one of those steel springs, with which the most feeble and uninitiated hand could, in a quarter of an hour, divide a bar of iron. The paper said: —

"Madame, to-morrow, at half-past nine, a man will be conversing with the gendarmes who guard you, through the window of the women's court. During this time your Majesty will saw the third bar of your window, going from the left to the right. Cut slanting. A quarter of an hour will suffice for your Majesty; and then be prepared to escape through the window. This advice reaches you from one of your most devoted and faithful subjects; one who has consecrated his life to your Majesty's service, and would be happy also to sacrifice it for you."

"Oh!" murmured the queen, "it must be a snare. But no; this writing appears familiar to me, — it is the same as at the Temple. It is — it must be that of the Chevalier de Maison-Rouge! God is perhaps willing that I should escape."

And the queen fell on her knees, and took refuge in prayer, the only balm and consolation undenied to the unfortunate prisoner.

CHAPTER XLIII.

THE PREPARATIONS OF DIXMER.

THE morrow, prefaced by a sleepless night, at length arrived, presenting a terrible appearance, and it might, without exaggeration, be said that the sky was the color of blood.

Indeed, each day at this epoch and in this year, however beautiful the sun, had a livid hue.

The queen slept with difficulty, and it was a sleep without repose. Hardly had she closed her eyes than she seemed to see blood, than she seemed to hear cries.

She had dropped asleep with the file in her hand. One part of the day was devoted by her to prayer, and the guards, seeing her often thus engaged, did not feel any alarm at what they considered an increase of religious feeling.

From time to time, however, she examined the file transmitted to her by one of her intended deliverers, and compared the fragility of the instrument with the strength of the bar.

Fortunately, these bars were only secured in the wall on one side, — that is to say, at the lower part.

The upper part was set in a crossbar; the lower part divided, there was only to pull the bar, and it of course would yield.

But it was not the physical difficulties which arrested the queen. She perfectly comprehended that the thing was possible, and it was this very possibility which caused hope, like a blood-red meteor, to dazzle her eyes.

She felt that to reach her, her friends must necessarily sacrifice her guards; and could she at any price consent to the death of the only individuals who, for a length of time, had evinced any interest in her, or pity for her?

On the other hand, beyond these bars which she had been directed to saw, over the bodies of the two men who would have to die in endeavoring to prevent her deliverers from reaching her, were life, liberty, and perhaps vengeance, — three things so sweet, especially to a woman, that she asked pardon of God for so earnestly desiring them.

She believed, moreover, that not the slightest suspicion agitated the minds of her guards; that they had not any idea of a snare (if such a thing existed) into which it was intended their prisoner should fall.

These simple men would have betrayed themselves to eyes so much exercised as those of this woman, habituated to detect evil from having so severely suffered from it.

The queen, then, entirely abandoned the idea that these double overtures were contrived as a trap; but as the fear of being betrayed into this snare disappeared, the still greater apprehension increased of bloodshed for her sake, before her very eyes.

"Strange destiny! sublime sight!" murmured she; "two conspiracies united to save a poor queen, or rather a poor female prisoner who has had no means of inducing or encouraging these conspiracies which are about to take place at the same moment! Who knows? Perhaps there may be one only. Perhaps it may be a double mine, leading to one and the same point.

"If I wished, I might then be saved.

"But a poor woman sacrificed in my stead! — two men killed before this woman could reach me! God and the future might perhaps forgive me. Impossible! impossible!"

Then passed and repassed in her mind visions of the great devotion of servants for their masters, and the ancient traditions of the right exercised by masters over the lives of their retainers, — phantasies almost effaced from the mind of expiring royalty.

"Anne of Austria would have accepted this," said she. "Anne of Austria would have set aside every consideration to the safety of the royal person.

"Anne of Austria was of the same blood, and was almost in the same situation as myself.

"What madness to have come to France to pursue Anne of Austria's principles of royalty! Was I not brought hither? Two kings said, 'It is important that two royal children who have never seen or loved each other, who perhaps never may love each other, should be married at the same altar, to die upon the same scaffold.

"And then will not my death accelerate that of my poor child, who in the eyes of my few friends is still king of France?

"And when my son, like his father, is dead, will not their shades both smile on me in pity, seeing me, in order to spare some drops of plebeian blood, stain with my own the remains of the throne of Saint Louis?"

In this ever-increasing anguish of thought, this fever of doubt whose pulsations went on in geometrical progression, and in a tempest of terror and fear, the unhappy queen continued till the arrival of night.

She had several times closely scrutinized her guards; but they had never appeared more composed.

Never had she been more forcibly struck by the invariable kindness and attention of these two uneducated men.

When the darkness of night reigned in the cell; when the steps of the round, the noise of resounding arms, and the barking of dogs awoke the echoes of the gloomy vaults; when all the horrors of the prison revealed themselves, gloomy and hopeless, — Marie Antoinette, subdued by the natural weakness of a woman, rose affrighted.

"Oh, I will fly! I will fly!" said she. "Yes, yes; I will fly! When he comes, when he speaks, I will saw the bar. I will await what God and my deliverers ordain me. I owe myself to my children. They shall not murder them; or if they slay them, and I am free — oh, then, at least — "

She did not conclude; her eyes closed, and her deep emotion checked all utterance. This was a frightful vision to the unfortunate queen, enclosed with gratings and iron bars. But soon this vision disappeared, and in its stead another presented itself to her view. Gratings and bolts had vanished. She saw herself in the midst of a dark, stern, inflexible army; she orders the fire to consume, the sword to leap from the scabbard, and vengeance to be taken on a people she will no longer claim as her own.

During this time Gilbert and Duchesne were conversing tranquilly, and preparing their evening repast.

At this time, also, Dixmer and Geneviève entered the Conciergerie, and installed themselves in the office as usual. At the end of an hour the registrar of the Palace, having completed his business, according to custom took his departure, leaving them alone to themselves.

Directly the door had closed on his colleague, Dixmer rushed toward the empty basket placed at the door in exchange for that of the evening. He seized the bread, broke it, and found the case. The queen's answer was enclosed within it; he grew pale on reading it.

Geneviève observed him tear it into a thousand pieces, and throw them into the mouth of the burning stove.

"It is well," said he; "all is arranged."

Then turning toward Geneviève, —

"Come here, Madame," said he; "I must speak with you, and must speak low." Geneviève, motionless and cold as marble, gave a gesture of assent, and approached him.

"The time has arrived, Madame; listen to me!"

"Yes, sir."

"You prefer a death beneficial to your cause, — a death that will insure you the blessings of your party and pity from the whole nation, — to an ignominious and revengeful end of life, do you not?"

"Yes, sir."

"I might have killed you on the spot when I found you in the house of your lover; but a man who, like myself, consecrates his life to a holy and honorable cause, ought to be able to profit by his own private griefs by rendering them subservient to this cause. This I have done, or rather intend to do. I have, as you see, denied myself the pleasure of doing myself justice, and have also spared your lover."

Something resembling a fugitive but appalling smile flitted over the lips of Geneviève.

"But as for your lover, you who know me should be well aware that I only bide my time."

"Monsieur," said Geneviève, "I am ready. Then wherefore all this prelude?"

"You are ready?"

"Yes, I am ready. Kill me, if you choose; you have good cause to do so."

Dixmer looked at Geneviève, and started in spite of himself. She at this moment appeared sublimely beautiful; a glory the most brilliant of all shone around her, — the glory that emanates from love.

"To continue," said Dixmer, "I have informed the queen; she expects you, notwithstanding she will in all probability raise numerous objections. You must overrule them all."

"Give me your orders, sir, and I will execute them."

"Immediately," continued Dixmer, "I shall knock at the door; Gilbert will open it, and with this poniard —" here Dixmer threw open his coat, and half drawing from its scabbard a double-edged poniard — "with this I shall kill him."

Geneviève shuddered.

Dixmer made a motion with his hand to command her attention.

"The instant I strike him, dart into the second chamber, that of the queen. There is, as you are aware, no door, only a screen. You will exchange clothes with her while I despatch the other soldier. Then I shall take the queen's arm, and pass through the wicket with her."

"Very well," said Geneviève, coldly.

"You understand me?" said Dixmer. "You have been seen each evening in your black taffeta mantle which conceals your face. Place your mantle upon her Majesty, and arrange it on her precisely as you have been accustomed to arrange it on yourself."

"All shall be done as you desire, sir."

"It remains now for me to pardon and to thank you, Madame."

Geneviève shook her head with a scornful smile.

"I neither want your pardon nor your thanks, sir," said she, extending her hand. "What I have done, or rather am about to do, would efface a crime. I have only been guilty of a weakness; and again, this weakness — recall your own conduct, sir — you all but forced me to commit. I withdrew myself from him; you drove me back into his arms; so you are at the same time instigator, judge, and avenger. It remains for me to pardon you my death; and I do pardon you. It is I who should thank you for death, since life has become insupportable to me, separated from the only man I love; since that hour especially when you severed by your savage vengeance every tie that bound me to him."

Dixmer drove his nails into his flesh. He strove to reply, but his voice failed him.

He moved toward the wicket.

"Time passes," said he, at last. "Madame, every moment is of consequence. Are you ready?"

"I have told you, sir," replied Geneviève, with the calmness and courage of a martyr, "I await you."

Dixmer collected his papers, saw that the gates were fast closed, so that no one could enter the wicket, and then wished to reiterate his instructions.

"It is unnecessary, sir," said Geneviève. "I know perfectly all I have to do."

"Then, adieu!" and Dixmer extended his hand, as if at this supreme moment all recrimination was effaced before the grandeur of the situation and the sublimity of the sacrifice.

Geneviève, shuddering, touched with the tips of her fingers the proffered hand of her husband.

"Place yourself near me, Madame, and the moment I have struck Gilbert, pass on."

"I am ready."

Then Dixmer grasped in his right hand his poinard; with his left he knocked at the gate.

CHAPTER XLIV.

THE PREPARATIONS OF THE CHEVALIER.

DURING the scene described in the preceding chapter as passing at the door of the register-office leading into the prison of the queen, or rather into the first compartment occupied by the two gendarmes, other preparations were taking place on the opposite side, — that is to say, in the women's court.

Suddenly a man appeared, like a statue of stone which had detached itself from the wall. He was followed by two dogs, and was humming the "Ça ira," a song much in vogue at this period. He held in his hand a large bunch of keys, which, in passing, he had rattled against the bars which barricaded the window of the queen.

The royal prisoner at first started, but recognizing the signal, immediately opened her window softly to commence her work, with a hand more experienced than would have been believed; for more than once in the blacksmith's shop where her royal husband amused himself by passing part of the day, she had with her delicate fingers handled instruments similar to that upon which at this moment depended her every chance of safety and deliverance.

Directly the man with the keys heard the queen's window open, he knocked at that of the gendarmes.

"Ah! ah!" said Gilbert, looking through the window, "here is the Citizen Mardoche."

"Himself," said the turnkey. "Well, but it appears you keep strict watch?"

"Much as usual, Citizen Key-bearer. It seems to me you do not often find us at fault?"

"Ah!" said Mardoche; "and vigilance is more than ever necessary to-night."

"Bah!" said Duchesne, who had now approached.

"Truly."

"Why, then?"

"Open the window, and I will tell you all about it."

Gilbert opened it, and shook hands with Mardoche, who had already made friends with the two gendarmes.

"What is it, Citizen Mardoche?" repeated Gilbert.

"The sitting of the Convention has been rather hot to-day. Have you read about it?"

"No. What passed then?"

"It was first stated that the Citizen Hébert had made a discovery."

"What?"

"It is, that the conspirators believed to be dead are found to be alive, and very much alive indeed."

"Oh! yes," said Gilbert; "Delessert and Thierry; I have heard speak of that. They are in England, the scoundrels!"

"And the Chevalier de Maison-Rouge?" asked the key-bearer, raising his voice so that the queen might hear.

"What, is he in England also?"

"Not at all," said Mardoche; "he is in France," still speaking in the same loud key.

"He has returned, then?"

"He has never quitted it."

"Well, he, for one, has good courage," said Duchesne.

"Indeed, he has."

"Well, are they going to arrest him?"

"Certainly; but that is much easier said than done."

At this moment the queen's file grated so forcibly upon the iron bars that the key-bearer feared it might be heard, notwithstanding all his efforts to drown the sound. He hastily trod upon the paw of the nearest of his dogs, which uttered a prolonged howl of pain.

"Oh, poor beast!" said Gilbert.

"Bah!" said the key-bearer, "he had not put on his clogs. Be quiet, Girondin; will you be quiet?"

"Is your dog named Girondin, Citizen Mardoche?"

"Yes; that is the name I have given him."

"But pray go on with what you were telling us," said Duchesne, who, imprisoned himself, took that lively interest in news that all prisoners feel.

"I was telling you that in the Citizen Hébert you see a good patriot; and Hébert has made a motion to return the Austrian to the Temple."

"And why so?"

"Faith! because he pretends that she was only withdrawn from the Temple to remove her from the immediate inspection of the Commune of Paris."

"Yes; and from the attempts of that cursed Maison-Rouge," said Gilbert; "it seems too that the subterranean passage still exists."

"That was the reply the Citizen Hanriot made; but Hébert said, the instant that was defeated there was no more danger; that at the Temple, fewer precautions were requisite for the security of Marie Antoinette than here; and finally, that the Temple was differently enclosed from the Conciergerie, and another thing altogether."

"Faith!" said Gilbert, "for my part, I wish they would remove her again to the Temple."

"I understand; you are tired of the confinement?"

"No; but it makes me melancholy."

Maison-Rouge coughed loudly, as the noise of the file biting through the iron bar was distinctly heard.

"Well, what have they decided on?" said Duchesne, when the key-bearer's cough had subsided.

"It is settled that she shall remain here, but that her trial shall take place immediately."

"Poor woman!" said Gilbert.

Duchesne, whose sense of hearing was no doubt more acute than that of his colleague, or his attention less engrossed by the recital of Mardoche, stooped down to listen on the left side of the compartment.

The key-bearer saw the movement.

"So you see, Citizen Duchesne," said he, in an animated tone, "the attempts of the conspirators will become the more desperate from the fact of their having less time before them for their execution. They are going to double the guards of the prisons; so look out, Citizen Gendarme, since the matter in question is nothing less than the irruption of an armed force into the Conciergerie. They will murder all, sacrifice every impediment, till they effect an entrance to the queen, — to the widow of Capet, I mean to say."

"Ah! bah! How can these conspirators of yours get in?"

"Disguised as patriots, they will appear to recommence the 2d of September, the rascals! and when once the gates are open, good-night!"

There was an instant's silence, produced by the astonishment of the guards.

The key-bearer heard with emotions of joy and terror the continued grating of the file. Nine o'clock struck.

At the same moment there was a knock at the wicket, but the gendarmes, preoccupied, did not reply.

"Well, we shall watch, we shall watch!" said Gilbert.

"And if necessary, will die at our post like stanch Republicans," added Duchesne.

"She must soon be done," said the key-bearer to himself, wiping the drops of perspiration from his face.

"And you on your side," said Gilbert, "keep on the lookout, I presume? They would spare you no more than us, were such an event as you have been talking of to take place."

"I should think so," said the key-bearer. "I pass the night in going the round; thus I am always on the alert. The rest of you at least relieve each other, and can sleep every other night."

At this moment a second summons at the wicket was heard. Mardoche started; any event, however trifling, might mar the execution of his project.

"What is it, then?" demanded he, in spite of himself.

"Nothing, nothing!" said Gilbert; "it is only the registrar of the Minister of War. He is going now, and comes to inform me of it."

"Oh, very well!" said Mardoche.

The registrar still continued to knock.

"All right!" cried Gilbert, without leaving the window. "Good-night! Adieu!"

"I think he is speaking to you," said Duchesne, turning toward the door. The voice of the registrar was then heard.

"Come here, Citizen Gendarme," said he; "I wish to speak to you."

This voice, which appeared affected by some strong emotion which deprived it of its natural accent, startled the key-bearer, who fancied he recognized it.

"What do you want, Citizen Durand?" asked Gilbert.

"I wish to speak a word with you."

"Well, you can tell me to-morrow."

"No, this evening; it must be this evening," replied the same voice.

"Hah!" murmured the key-bearer, "what is about to happen now? It is Dixmer's voice."

Sinister and vibrating, this voice seemed to borrow something funereal from the far-off echoes of the gloomy corridor.

Duchesne turned round.

"Well," said Gilbert, "if he wishes it I must go," and he directed his steps toward the door.

The key-bearer availed himself of this moment when the attention of the two gendarmes was thus occupied by this unforeseen circumstance. He ran toward the window of the queen.

"Is it done?" said he.

"I have more than half finished," said the queen.

"Oh, for the love of God!" murmured he; "make haste! make haste!"

"Hallo! Citizen Mardoche," said Duchesne, "what has become of you?"

"Here I am," said the key-bearer, returning quickly to the window of the first compartment.

At that very moment, and as he turned to resume his former station, a frightful cry resounded through the prison, then an oath, and the ring of a sword snatched from its scabbard.

"Villain! brigand!" cried Gilbert, and the sound of a struggle was heard in the corridor.

At the same moment the door opened, displaying to the eyes of the turnkey two shadows struggling in the wicket, and thus affording free passage to a female, who, pushing aside Duchesne, rushed into the queen's chamber.

Duchesne, without noticing the woman, ran to his comrade's assistance.

The turnkey sprang toward the other window, and beheld the female on her knees before the queen, praying and supplicating her Majesty to exchange clothes with her.

He lowered his burning eyes, endeavoring to gain a clearer view of this woman whom he feared he had already recognized too well. All at once he uttered a dreadful cry.

"Geneviève! Geneviève!" murmured he.

The queen had dropped the file from her hand, and seemed transfixed with despair. Here, alas! was another abortive attempt.

The turnkey seized the bar with both hands, shook it with all his strength; but the file had not accomplished its work, the bar of iron would not yield to his efforts.

Meanwhile Dixmer had hurled Gilbert back into the prison, and would have entered with him, but Duchesne, leaning against the door, prevented him. But he was unable to close it, for Dixmer, in despair, had placed his arm between the gate and the wall.

In his hand he still retained the poniard, which in the contest, checked by the buckle of the belt, had glided over the gendarme's breast, tearing open his coat and lacerating his flesh.

The two gendarmes encouraged each other to reunite their efforts, at the same time calling loudly for assistance.

Dixmer felt his arm must break; he placed his shoulder against the door, shook it violently, and succeeded in withdrawing his bruised arm.

The door closed with a great noise; Duchesne pushed the bolts, while Gilbert turned the key.

A rapid step was heard in the corridor, then all was over. The two gendarmes looked at each other, and searched everywhere around them.

They detected the sound of the assumed turnkey wrenching the bar.

Gilbert rushed into the queen's chamber, where he found Geneviève entreating her Majesty on her knees to exchange clothes with her.

Duchesne seized his gun and ran to the window; he discovered a man hanging to the bar, which he shook with rage, and tried in vain to scale.

He pointed his gun.

The young man saw it levelled at him.

"Oh, yes! yes!" cried he, "kill me! kill me!" and sublime in his despair, he bared his breast to the bullet.

"Chevalier," said the queen, — "Chevalier, I entreat you to live."

At the sound of the queen's voice the Chevalier sank upon his knees. The gun was discharged, but this movement saved him; the ball passed over his head. Geneviève, imagining her friend was dead, fell upon the ground without sense or motion. When the smoke disappeared, no one was seen in the women's court.

Ten minutes afterward, thirty soldiers, led by two Commissaries, searched the Conciergerie even to its most inaccessible retreats.

They discovered no one; the registrar had passed, calm and smiling, before Father Richard's arm-chair.

As to the turnkey, he had gone out crying, "Alarm! alarm!"

The sentinel opposed his egress with his bayonet, but his two dogs seized the soldier by the throat.

Geneviève alone was arrested, interrogated, and imprisoned.

CHAPTER XLV.

THE INQUIRY.

We can no longer leave in forgetfulness one of the principal personages of this history, he who, during the accomplishment of the various incidents of the preceding chapter had suffered most of all, and whose anxieties merit the liveliest sympathy on the part of our readers.

The sun shone gloriously in the Rue de la Monnaie, and the gossips were discoursing merrily at their doors, as if for the last ten months a mist of blood had not hung over the city, when Maurice returned home, bringing, as he had promised, the cabriolet with him. He gave the bridle of the horse to a shoeblack, on the pavement of Saint Eustache, and hastily ran upstairs, his heart filled with joy.

Love is a vivifying sentiment. It animates hearts long deadened to every other sensation; it peoples the desert; it resuscitates before the eyes the shade of the beloved one; it causes the voice which sings in the soul of the lover to display before him the entire creation illumined by the brilliant rays of hope and happiness, — at the same time it is egotistical, blinding him who loves to all but the existence of the beloved object.

Maurice neither saw these women nor listened to their commentaries; he saw only Geneviève preparing for a departure which was at last to bring them durable happiness; he heard only Geneviève singing carelessly her customary song, and this little song trilled so sweetly in his ear that he might have sworn he was listening to the varied modulations of her voice, mingled with the less harmonious sound of closing locks.

Upon the landing Maurice stopped; the door was half open; it was generally kept closed, and this circumstance surprised Maurice. He looked all around, thinking Geneviève was in the corridor. She was not there. He entered, looked in the antechamber, the dining-room, the parlor, the bed-chamber; but anteroom, parlor, and bed-chamber were all empty. He loudly called. No one replied.

The official, as he knew, had gone out. Maurice imagined that during his absence Geneviève had perhaps required some cord to fasten her trunk, or some refreshments to store in the carriage, and had gone out to purchase them. He thought it imprudent; but although every moment his anxiety increased, he as yet feared nothing serious.

Maurice waited for some time, walking up and down the room with long impatient strides, and occasionally leaning out of the window, which, half opened, admitted puffs of air charged heavily with rain.

But soon he believed that he heard a step upon the staircase; he listened, it was not that of Geneviève; he ran to the landing, looked over the palisade, and recognized the official, who leisurely mounted the stairs after the manner of domestics.

"Scævola!" cried he.

The official raised his head.

"Ah! is it you, Citizen?"

"Yes. Where is the lady?"

"The lady?" demanded Scævola, with much surprise, as he continued mounting the stairs.

"Certainly! Have you seen her below?"

"No."

"Go down, then, and ask the porter, and inquire of all the neighbors!"

Scævola descended.

"Quicker! quicker!" said his master; "do you not see I am burning with impatience?"

After waiting five or six minutes, and Scævola not having made his appearance, Maurice re-entered the apartment and again leaned out of the window. He saw Scævola enter several shops. and leave them without having gained any fresh intelligence. He called him. The official raised his head, and saw his master impatiently looking from the window. Maurice signed to him to come up.

"It is impossible that she has gone out," said Maurice to himself, and again he called, "Geneviève! Geneviève!"

All was silent as death; even the solitary chamber appeared no longer to have an echo. Scævola reappeared.

"Well?" demanded Maurice.

"The porter is the only person who has seen her."

"The porter has seen her; how was that?"

"He saw her go out."

"She has gone out, then?"

"It seems so."

"Alone! It is impossible Geneviève would go out alone."

"She was not alone, Citizen; she had a man with her."

"How! a man with her?"

"That is what the porter says, at least."

"Go and seek him. I must find out who this man was."

Scævola made a step toward the door, then, turning, "Wait," said he, appearing to reflect.

"What is it?" said Maurice. "Speak, or you will be the death of me!"

"Perhaps it was the man who ran after me."

"What for?"

"To tell me that you wished the key."

"What key, stupid! will you not tell me?"

"The key of your apartment."

"You gave the key of the apartment to a stranger?" cried Maurice, seizing the official by the collar with both hands.

"It was not to a stranger, sir; it was to one of your friends."

"Ah, yes! to one of my friends. It is Lorin, no doubt. She has gone out with Lorin," and smiling a ghastly smile Maurice wiped away the drops of agony which had gathered on his brow.

"No, sir; no, it was not he. Zounds! I think I should know Monsieur Lorin."

"Who was it, then?"

"You know the man who came here one day?"

"What day?"

"The day when you were so sad; and he took you away with him, and you returned so happy."

Scævola had remarked all these things.

Maurice regarded him with a bewildered air; a cold shudder ran through his body. Then after a long silence:

"Dixmer!" cried he.

"By my faith! yes. I think it was he, Citizen."

Maurice tottered, and fell back upon a chair.

"Oh, my God!" murmured he.

When he re-opened his eyes they encountered the violets, forgotten, or rather left there by Geneviève.

He rushed toward them, seized and kissed them; then, remarking where she had placed them, —

"There is no longer any doubt," said he, "these violets — It is her last adieu."

When Maurice turned round he perceived for the first time that the trunk was half full, the rest of the linen was on the floor, or in the half-opened wardrobe.

The linen which lay upon the floor had no doubt fallen from Geneviève's hand at the appearance of Dixmer.

It was all explained now. The scene rose vivid and terrible before his eyes, between these four walls that had lately witnessed so much happiness.

Till now Maurice had remained crushed and heart-broken. Now the reaction was fearful. His rage bordered on frenzy.

He rose, closed the window, took from the top of his desk a pair of pistols, ready loaded for their intended journey, looked to the priming, and finding all right placed them in his pocket.

He also furnished himself with two rolls of louis, which notwithstanding his patriotism he had thought it prudent to conceal at the bottom of a drawer, and taking his sabre in his hand, —

"Scævola," said he, "you are attached to me, I think; you have served my father and myself for fifteen years."

"Yes, Citizen," replied the official, terrified at the pallor and nervous trembling he had never before remarked in his master, who had always been justly considered one of the most courageous and vigorous of men, — "yes; what are your orders for me?"

"Listen! if this lady who lived here — " He stopped; his voice trembled so much in pronouncing these words that he was unable to proceed. "If she should return," continued he, after a moment's pause, "receive her, close the door after her, take this gun, and station yourself upon the staircase; and for your head, for your life, for your soul, do not permit a single person to enter here! If any one should try to break through the door, defend it! Strike! kill! kill! and fear nothing, Scævola, for I will answer for all."

The young man's impetuous harangue, his vehement confidence, electrified Scævola.

"I will not only kill, but will even suffer death for the Citizen Geneviève," said he.

"Thanks. Now attend! This apartment is odious to me, and I shall not enter it again until I find her; if she has been able to effect her escape, if she return, place before the window the Japan vase with the china-asters, which she loved so much. That is, during the day. At night, put a lantern. Every time I pass the end of the street I shall know, and if I see neither vase nor lantern I shall still continue my researches."

"Be prudent, sir! Oh, pray be prudent!" continued Scævola.

His master made no reply, but rushing from the chamber flew down the staircase as if possessed of wings, and ran toward Lorin's house.

It would be difficult to paint the astonishment and rage of our worthy poet when he heard the news; we might as well attempt to indite the touching elegies with which Orestes inspired Pylades.

"And you do not know where she is?" he repeated, incessantly.

"Lost! disappeared!" shrieked Maurice, in accents of despair, "he has killed her, Lorin! he has killed her!"

"No, my dear friend; no, Maurice; he has not killed her; it is not after so many days of reflection that he would be likely to kill a woman like Geneviève. If he had thought of doing so, he would have done it on the spot, and have left her corpse there in token of his just vengeance. No, no; he has taken her away, only too happy at having regained his lost treasure."

"You do not know him, Lorin; you do not know him! This man had something fatal in his look."

"You are mistaken," said Lorin; "he always struck me as a brave man. He has taken her as a sacrifice. He will get himself arrested with her; and they will die together. Ah, there is the danger!"

These words redoubled Maurice's fury.

"I will find her! I will find her, or perish in the attempt!" cried he.

"Oh, as to that, we are certain to find her," said Lorin; "only calm yourself. They fail in success who do not reflect; and when agitated as you are, we reflect badly and unwisely."

"Adieu, Lorin, adieu!"

"Where are you going, then?"

"I am going."

"You will leave me, then? Why is that?"

"Because this concerns me only. I alone should risk my life to save Geneviève's."

"Do you wish to die?"

"I will face all. I will find out the president of the Committee of Surveillance. I will speak to Hébert, to Danton, to Robespierre. I will avow all; but she must be restored to me."

"Very well," said Lorin; and without adding another word he rose, adjusted his belt, put on his military cap, and as Maurice had done, provided himself with a pair of pistols, ready loaded, which he put in his pocket.

"Let us go," said he, simply.

"But you will compromise yourself," said Maurice.

"Well! what of that?"

"Where shall we seek her first?" asked Maurice.

"We will first search in the old quarter, you know, — the old Rue Saint Jacques; then we will watch for Maison-Rouge, as where he is, doubtless Dixmer will be also; then we will draw near the houses in the Vieille Corderie. You know they talk of transferring Marie Antoinette to the Temple; believe me, men like them will not, till the last moment, abandon the hope of saving her."

"Yes," repeated Maurice; "you are right — Maison-Rouge, do you think he is in Paris?"

"Dixmer is certainly."

"It is true, it is true; of course they will be together!" said Maurice, to whom these vague ideas seemed partially to restore reason.

The two friends commenced their search immediately, but all in vain. Paris is large and well adapted for concealment. Never was a pit known to conceal more obscurely the secret confided to its keeping by crime or misery.

A hundred times Maurice and Lorin passed over the Place de Grève, a hundred times passed the house that contained Geneviève, watched incessantly by Dixmer, as the priests watch the victim destined for sacrifice.

Geneviève on her side, seeing herself destined to perish, like all generous souls accepted the sacrifice, and only wished to die quietly and unnoticed; besides, she dreaded less for Dixmer than for the cause of the queen the publicity that Maurice would not fail to give to his vengeance.

She kept, then, a silence as profound as if death had already sealed her lips.

In the mean time, without saying anything to Lorin, Maurice had applied to the members of the terrible Committee of Public Safety; and Lorin, without speaking to Maurice, had, on his part, determined to adopt similar proceedings.

Thus on the same day a red cross was affixed by Fouquier Tinville to both their names, and the word "Suspects" united them in a sanguinary embrace.

CHAPTER XLVI.

THE SENTENCE.

On the twenty-third day of the month of the second year of the French Republic, one and indivisible, corresponding to the 14th of October, 1793, old style, as it was then called, a curious crowd had since the morning invaded the galleries of the hall where the revolutionary sittings were held.

The passages of the Palace, the avenues of the Conciergerie, were lined with greedy and impatient spectators, who made over one to another their reports and passions, as the waves transmit their froth and foam.

Notwithstanding the curiosity with which each spectator was agitated, and perhaps even on account of this curiosity, each wave of this sea, swaying, pressed between two barriers, — the outer barrier which urged it forward, the inner barrier which urged it backward, — each wave kept, in this flux and reflux, almost the same position which it had at first taken. Thus those more conveniently situated, comprehending it was necessary they should obtain forgiveness for their good fortune, kept this object in view by transmitting to their neighbors less comfortably and commodiously placed than themselves, and who in their turn recounted to others, the first words they heard, and all they saw.

Near the door of the Tribunal a group of men was collected, rudely disputing for ten lines of space in width and height, — for ten lines in breadth sufficed to see between two shoulders the corner of the hall and the form of the judges; for ten lines in height was sufficient to overlook the entire hall and see the face of the accused.

Unfortunately, this entrance to the passage of the hall, this narrow defile, was almost entirely filled by a man with broad shoulders, and his arms akimbo, who most effectually excluded the wavering crowd ready to drop into the hall if this rampart of flesh were to give way.

This immovable man was young and handsome; and at every push bestowed on him by the crowd, he shook his head of hair, thick as a lion's mane, under which gleamed a dark and resolute expression; then, when either by a look or a movement he had repelled the crowd and resisted their violent attacks, he fell back into his attentive immobility.

A hundred times this compact mass had, notwithstanding, striven hard to overthrow him, — as, from his great height, to see anything behind him was utterly impossible, — but, as we have said, firm as a rock, he stood his ground.

In the mean time, at the other extremity of this human sea, in the midst of the crushing crowd, another man was forcing a passage, with a perseverance almost amounting to ferocity. Nothing impeded his indefatigable exertions, — neither the blows of those he left behind, the fearful imprecations of those he almost stifled in passing, nor the wails of the women, for there were many females in this crowd.

To blows he responded with blows; to imprecations, by a look before which the most courageous quailed; to complaints, by a carelessness bordering on disdain.

At last he arrived behind the powerful young man who, so to speak, closed the entrance to the hall. In the midst of the general expectation — for all were anxious to see how the contest between two such rude antagonists would terminate — he essayed his peculiar method, which consisted in planting like wedges his elbows between two spectators, and thus breaking through the thickest of the crowd.

He was, notwithstanding, a short young man, whose wan face and emaciated appearance betokened latent illness.

His elbows had scarcely touched the young man before him, when he, indignant at the aggression, turned sharply round, at the same moment raising his clinched fist, which threatened, in falling, to crush the slender form of the intruder.

The two antagonists now found themselves face to face, when a cry of recognition escaped from each.

"Ah, Citizen Maurice," said the delicate young man, with an accent of inexpressible anguish, "permit me to pass; only let me see her, I entreat you; you may kill me afterward."

Maurice — for it was indeed he — felt himself affected by admiration and compassion for this ceaseless devotion, this adventurous daring.

"You here!" murmured he. "How imprudent!"

"Yes; but I am exhausted — O God! she speaks. Let me see her; let me hear her!"

Maurice drew aside, and the young man passed before him, and being at the head of the crowd there was nothing now to intercept the view of him who had undergone so many blows, so much buffeting, to attain his end.

All this scene, and the murmurs it occasioned, aroused the curiosity of the judges.

The accused also turned round, and immediately perceived and recognized the Chevalier.

A shudder ran through the queen's frame, seated in the iron arm-chair. The examination, conducted by the President Harmand, interpreted by Fouquier Tinville, discussed by Chauveau Lagarde, the counsel for the queen, lasted as long as the strength of the judges and the accused permitted.

During all this time Maurice remained motionless in his place, while several times already the concourse was renewed both in the hall and the corridors.

The Chevalier leaned against a pillar. He was no less pale than the marble that supported him.

The day was succeeded by a dark night; some lighted candles on the tables of the jurors, and some smoky lamps on the walls of the hall threw a red and sinister expression on the noble face of that woman who had been the cynosure of all eyes at the splendid fêtes at Versailles.

She was alone there, replying in brief and dignified language to the questions of the president, and occasionally addressing some words to her counsel in a low voice.

Her white and polished forehead retained all its wonted haughtiness. She was attired in a black dress, which she had worn ever since her husband's death.

The judges retired from the hall. The sitting had terminated.

"Have I evinced too much contempt for them, sir?" said she, addressing herself to Chauveau Lagarde.

"Ah, Madame," replied he, "you are always right when you act like yourself."

"How proud she is!" cried a woman among the audience, as if a voice from the people had replied to the question of the unfortunate queen to her advocate.

The queen turned and looked at her.

"Yes," repeated the woman, "you are proud, Antoinette; and I tell you, pride has been the ruin of you."

The queen blushed. The Chevalier turned toward the female who had uttered these words, and replied softly, "She was queen."

Maurice seized him by the wrist, saying, in a low tone, "Take care; do not forget yourself!"

"Oh, Monsieur Maurice!" replied the Chevalier, "you are a man yourself, and you know you are speaking to a man. Tell me, oh, tell me! do you think they will condemn her?"

"I do not think it," said Maurice; "I am sure of it."

"What! a woman!" said the Chevalier, with a deep groan.

"No, a queen," said Maurice; "you have yourself said so."

The Chevalier in his turn seized Maurice by the wrist, and with a force of which he appeared incapable compelled him to bend his ear. It was half-past three in the morning. Many vacuums were visible among the spectators; and a few lights burning here and there served only to render darkness visible. In one of the most obscure parts of the hall were the Chevalier and Maurice, the latter listening to what the former was telling him.

"Why are you here? What brings you here?" demanded the Chevalier; "you, sir, who have not a tiger's heart?"

"Alas!" said Maurice, "to discover what has become of an unfortunate woman."

"Yes, yes," said Maison-Rouge; "she whom her husband forced into the queen's cell? The female who was arrested before my eyes?"

"Geneviève?"

"Yes, Geneviève."

"Then Geneviève is a prisoner, sacrificed by her husband, killed by Dixmer? Oh, I comprehend all; I understand all now! Chevalier, tell me all that has occurred; tell me where she is; tell me where I can find her! Chevalier, this woman constitutes my life; do you hear me?"

"I witnessed all. I was there when she was arrested. I was there also to effect the escape of the queen; but our different projects not having been communicated to each other, injured instead of assisting our mutual cause."

"Why did you not save her, at least. — your sister, Geneviève?"

"How could I when an iron bar divided us? Oh, if you had only been there, if you had united your efforts with mine, the bar must have yielded, and both might have been saved!"

"Geneviève! Geneviève!" murmured Maurice. Then regarding Maison-Rouge with an indefinable expression of hatred and rage, —

"And Dixmer, where is he?" demanded he.

"I know not; he saved himself, as I did also."

"Oh!" said Maurice, grinding his teeth, "if ever I meet him —"

"Yes; I understand. But there is nothing yet to despair about concerning Geneviève," said Maison-Rouge; "her case is not yet desperate; but the queen — Oh! stop, Maurice, you are a man of feeling, an influential man; you have friends — Oh! I pray to you as I would pray to my God — Maurice, help me to save the queen! Maurice, Geneviève supplicates you through me!"

"Pronounce not that name, sir! Who knows but that, like Dixmer, you may have sacrificed this unhappy woman?"

"Sir," replied the Chevalier, haughtily, "when I attach myself to a cause, I know better than to sacrifice any one but myself."

Maurice was about to reply, when the door of the chamber of debate opened.

"Silence, sir! silence!" said the Chevalier, "the judges are returning," and Maurice felt the hand tremble which Maison-Rouge had placed upon his arm. "Ah!" murmured the Chevalier, "my heart fails me now!"

"Have courage and constrain yourself, or you are lost!" said Maurice.

The Tribunal re-entered; and the news of its return spread rapidly through the corridors and galleries. The crowd again congregated in the hall, and even the dim lights appeared to burn brighter at this solemn and decisive moment. The queen rose and stood erect, haughty and immovable, her eyes fixed, her lips closed. The decree was then read which doomed the queen to death. She heard her sentence without even turning pale or uttering a sigh; her countenance evinced not the slightest emotion. Then turning toward the Chevalier, she regarded him with a long and eloquent look, as if to indicate her gratitude to this man whom she had ever seen a living statue of devotion, and supported on the arm of the officer of the gendarmes who commanded the forces, with a calm and dignified demeanor she quitted the court.

Maurice drew a deep sigh. "Thank God!" said he, "nothing in this declaration can compromise Geneviève; there is yet hope."

"Thank God!" murmured the Chevalier on his side, "it is all finished, and the struggle at length terminated. I have not strength to go further."

"Courage, sir!" said Maurice, in a low voice.

"I will take courage, sir," replied the Chevalier; and having shaken hands, they disappeared by different outlets. The queen was reconducted to the Conciergerie; the large clock struck four as she entered. At the end of Pont Neuf, Maurice was stopped by Lorin.

"Halt!" said he; "you do not pass here!"

"Why?"

"First, where are you going?"

"I am going home. I can return there now, since I know what has become of her."

"So much the better; but you must not enter there."

"For what reason?"

"The reason is, that two hours ago the gendarmes went there to arrest you."

"Ah!" cried Maurice. "Well, that is the greater reason why I should go!"

"Are you mad? And Geneviève?"

"You are right. But where are we to go?"

"Zounds! To my house."

"But I shall ruin you!"

"The more reason, then, that you should come," said Lorin, dragging Maurice away with him.

CHAPTER XLVII.

THE PRIEST AND THE EXECUTIONER.

On leaving the court, the queen had been conducted back to the Conciergerie. On reaching her chamber she had taken a pair of scissors, and cut off her long and beautiful ringlets, rendered still more so from the absence of powder, which she had not used for a year; she enclosed them in a packet, on which was inscribed, "For my son and daughter." She then seated herself, or rather sank into a chair, and worn out with fatigue, the trial having lasted eighteen hours, she fell asleep. At seven o'clock the noise of the opening screen roused her suddenly, and turning round, she beheld a man perfectly unknown to her.

"What do you want?" demanded she.

He approached and saluted her as respectfully as if she had not been the queen.

"I am called Sanson," said he.

The name was sufficient. The queen slightly shuddered and rose up.

"You are here early, sir; could you not have made it rather later?"

"No, Madame," replied Sanson; "I received orders to come."

As he uttered these words, he advanced still nearer to the queen. At this moment everything about this man was expressive and terrible.

"I understand," said the prisoner; "you wish to cut off my hair?"

"It is necessary, Madame," replied the executioner.

"I knew it, sir; and I wished to spare you the trouble. My hair is on the table."

Sanson followed the direction of the queen's hand.

"Only," said she, "I should like my hair sent to my children to-night."

"Madame," said Sanson, "this does not concern me."

"However, I thought — notwithstanding — "

"Oh, I get nothing, replied the executioner; "the clothes, the jewels — unless formally made over to me — all go to La Salpêtrière, and are allotted to the poor of the hospital. The Committee of Public Safety has so arranged these things."

"But, sir," persisted Marie Antoinette, "may I at least depend upon this packet being forwarded to my children?"

Sanson remained silent.

"I will endeavor to send it," said Gilbert.

The prisoner cast upon him a look of deep gratitude.

"I came," said Sanson, "to cut off your hair; but since you have done so, I can, if you wish it, leave you for a moment alone."

"I entreat you to do so, sir. I wish to collect my scattered thoughts, and offer up a prayer."

Sanson bowed and retired, when the queen once more found herself in solitude. While the condemned knelt on a low chair which served her as a prie-dieu, a scene no less terrible was passing in the parsonage of the small church of Saint Landry, in the city. The curé had just got up; the old housekeeper had prepared the humble morning meal, when a loud summons at the gate was heard. Even in our day, an unexpected visit to a clergyman is in general the precursor of some serious event, — either a baptism, a marriage "in extremis," or a last confession; but at this epoch the visit of a stranger announced some matter of far graver import. Indeed, at this period the priest was no longer the mandatary of God, but rendered his account to man.

However, the Abbé Girard was of the number of those who had least cause for fear, as he had sworn to abide by the Constitution, — in him conscience and probity had spoken louder than either self-love or religious spirit. No doubt the Abbé Girard admitted the possibility of improvement in the government, and much regretted the abuses committed under the name of the Divine will, and had, while retaining his God, accepted the fraternity of the Republican régime.

"Go and see, Dame Jacinthe," said he, "who disturbs us at this early hour; and if the business is of no very pressing nature, say that this morning I have been sent for to the Conciergerie, and must go there directly."

Dame Jacinthe, formerly called Madeleine, had accepted this flowery appellation in lieu of her own, as the Abbé Girard had taken the title of citizen instead of that of curé. At the suggestion of her master, Jacinthe hastened down the steps of the little garden leading to the entrance gate. She drew back the bolts, when a thin, pale young man, much agitated, but with a frank and amiable expression, presented himself before her.

"Monsieur l' Abbé Girard?" said he.

Jacinthe, not slow to remark the disordered dress, the neglected beard, and the nervous tremor of the newcomer, augured unfavorably of him.

"Citizen," said she; "there is here neither 'Monsieur' nor 'abbé.'"

"Pardon me, Madame," replied the young man; "I meant to say the Curé of Saint Landry."

Jacinthe, notwithstanding her patriotism, was struck by the title "Madame," with which the Republicans would not have honored an empress. She, however, replied, —

"You cannot see him now; he is repeating his breviary."

"In that case I will wait," replied the young man.

"But," said Jacinthe, in whom this obstinate persistence revived her first unfavorable impression, "you will wait in vain; for he has been summoned to the Conciergerie, and must go there immediately."

The young man turned frightfully pale, or rather from pale to livid.

"It is then true!" murmured he; then raising his voice, "This, Madame, is the business which brings me to the Citizen Girard."

And in spite of the old woman he had, while speaking, effected an entrance; then coolly but firmly closing the bolts, and notwithstanding the expostulations and even menaces of Dame Jacinthe, he not only entered the house, but also the chamber of the curé, who on perceiving him uttered an exclamation of surprise.

"Forgive me, Monsieur le Curé," immediately said the young man; "I wish to speak to you on a very serious subject; permit us to be alone."

The aged priest had experienced deep sorrow, and knew what it was to endure. He discerned deep and devouring passion in the confusion of the young man, and intense emotion in his fevered tones.

"Leave us, Dame Jacinthe!" said he.

The visitor impatiently followed with his eyes the receding steps of the housekeeper, who, from being accustomed to the confidence of her master, hesitated to comply; then when at length the door was closed,

"Monsieur le Curé," said the unknown, "you will first wish to know who I am. I will tell you. I am a proscribed man, doomed to death, who only at this moment lives from the power of audacity; I am the Chevalier de Maison-Rouge."

The abbé started in horror from his arm-chair.

"Fear nothing!" said the Chevalier, "no one has seen me enter here; and even those who might have seen me would never know me. I have altered much these last two months."

"But what do you wish, Citizen?" asked the curé.

"You are going this morning to the Conciergerie, are you not?"

"Yes; the porter has sent for me."

"Do you know why?"

"To perform the duties of my sacred office to an invalid, or some dying person, perhaps even to one condemned."

"You are right; it is to one condemned."

The old priest regarded the Chevalier with undisguised astonishment.

"But do you know who this person is?" demanded Maison-Rouge.

"No; I do not know."

"This person is the queen!"

The abbé uttered an exclamation of grief.

"The queen! Oh, my God!"

"Yes, sir; the queen! I made inquiry as to the priest who would attend her, and learned it was you. I therefore came directly to seek an interview."

"But what do you require of me?" asked the priest, alarmed at the wild accents of the Chevalier.

"I wish — I wish nothing, sir. I implore, I entreat, I supplicate you!"

"For what, then?"

"To allow me to enter with you into the presence of her Majesty?"

"You are mad!" exclaimed the curé; "you would not only ruin me, but would sacrifice yourself."

"Fear nothing."

"The poor woman is condemned, and that is the end of her."

"I know it, and it is not to make any attempt to save her that I wish to see her; it is — But listen to me, my father; you are not listening."

"I do not listen to you, since what you ask is impossible; I do not listen to you, since you act like a man bereft of his senses," said the aged man. "I do not listen to you, because you terrify me."

"Father, reassure yourself," said the young man, endeavoring to calm himself; "believe me, Father, I am in my senses. The queen, I know, is lost; but if I could only for an instant prostrate myself at her feet, it would save my life. If I do not see her I shall kill myself; and as you will have caused my despair, you will at the same moment destroy both body and soul."

"My son! my son!" replied the priest, "you ask me to sacrifice my life for you! Old as I am, my existence is still necessary to the unfortunate; old as I am, to precipitate my own death is to commit suicide."

"Do not refuse me, Father," replied the Chevalier; "you must have a curate, an acolyte; take me, let me go with you."

The priest tried to maintain his firmness, which was beginning to give way.

"No, no!" said he; "this would be a dereliction of duty; I have sworn to the Constitution, and I am bound heart, soul, and conscience. The unhappy woman condemned to death is a guilty queen. I would accept death, if by so doing I could benefit a fellow-creature; but I will not depart from the path of duty."

"But," cried the Chevalier, "when I tell you, and again repeat, even swear to you, I do not want to save the queen; here by the Gospel, by the crucifix, I swear I do not go to the Conciergerie to prevent her death!"

"What is your motive, then?" said the old man, affected by such undisguised accents of despair.

"Hearken!" said the Chevalier, whose soul seemed to speak from his lips; "she was my benefactress; she is attached to me; to see me in her last moments will I feel sure prove a consolation to her."

"And this is all that you desire?" demanded the curé, yielding to these irresistible accents.

"Absolutely all."

"And you have woven no plot to attempt to rescue the condemned?"

"None. I am a Christian, Father; and if there rests in my heart a shadow of deceit; if I entertain any hope of her life, or try in any way to save it, — may God visit me with eternal damnation!"

"No, no!" said the curé; "I can promise nothing," as the innumerable dangers attendant on an act so imprudent returned to his mind.

"Now listen to me, Father!" said the Chevalier, in a voice hoarse with emotion; "I have spoken like a submissive child; I have not uttered one bitter word or uncharitable sentiment; no menace has escaped my lips. Yet now my head whirls; fever burns in my veins; now despair gnaws my heart; now I am armed. Behold! here is my dagger." And the young man drew from his bosom a polished blade which threw a livid reflection on his trembling hand. The curé drew back quickly.

"Fear nothing," said the Chevalier, with a mournful smile; "others, knowing you to be so strict an observer of your word, would have terrified you into an oath. But no! I have supplicated, and I still continue to supplicate, with hands clasped, my forehead in the dust, that I may see her for a single moment. Look! here is your guarantee!" And he drew from his pocket a billet which he presented to Girard, who opened it and read as follows: —

I, René, Chevalier de Maison-Rouge, declare by God and my honor, that I have by threats of death compelled the worthy curé of Saint Landry to convey me to the Conciergerie, notwithstanding his refusal and great repugnance to do so. In proof of which I have signed —

MAISON-ROUGE.

"It is well," said the priest; "but swear to me once again that you will be guilty of no imprudence. It is not sufficient that my life is saved, I am answerable also for yours."

"Think not of that," said the Chevalier. "Then you consent?"

"I must, since you so absolutely insist. You can wait outside, and when she comes to the wicket you will see her."

The Chevalier seized the hand of the old priest and kissed it with all the ardor and respect he would have kissed the crucifix.

"Oh!" murmured the Chevalier, "she shall die at least like a queen, and the hand of the executioner shall never touch her!"

CHAPTER XLVIII.

THE CART.

IMMEDIATELY after having obtained this permission from the curé of Saint Landry, Maison-Rouge withdrew into a cabinet, the door of which, being half opened, he had recognized as the priest's dressing-room. There his long beard and mustachios speedily disappeared under the stroke of the razor; and then only he was fully aware of his frightful pallor and altered appearance. It was terrible to behold. He re-entered perfectly calm, and seemed to have forgotten that notwithstanding the absence of his beard and mustachios, he might still probably be known at the Conciergerie. He followed the abbé, whom, during his momentary absence, two officials were seeking; and with the cool audacity which disarms suspicion, entered the iron gate at this time opening into the court of the Palace. He was, like the Abbé Girard, dressed in black, — sacerdotal habits at that period being abolished.

In the register-office they found about fifty persons assembled; some employed about the prison, some deputies, some commissaries, all waiting in the expectation of seeing the queen pass; there might be some mandataries and many idlers. Maison-Rouge's heart beat so violently when he found himself opposite the wicket that he heard not even the parley that ensued between the abbé, the gendarmes, and the porter. Only a man with a pair of scissors in his hand and a piece of stuff newly cut pushed against Maison-Rouge upon the threshold. He turned round and recognized the executioner.

"What do you want, Citizen?" demanded Sanson.

The Chevalier endeavored to repress the shudder which, in spite of himself, ran through his veins.

"You see, Citizen Sanson," replied the Chevalier, "that I accompany the curé of Saint Landry."

"Oh, very well!" said the executioner, drawing himself on one side, and giving orders to his assistant.

During this time Maison-Rouge had passed into the interior of the office, and from there into the compartment inhabited by the two gendarmes.

These men were overcome by contending emotions. Proud and haughty as she had been to others, she had ever been gentle and condescending to them. They seemed more like her servants than her guards.

In his present position the Chevalier could not obtain a view of the queen, — the screen was closed. It had been opened to give entrance to the curé, but directly closed behind him. When the Chevalier entered, the conversation had already commenced.

"Sir," said the queen, in a clear and firm voice, "since you have sworn allegiance to the Republic — in whose name they have condemned me to death — I have no confidence in you. We do not even worship the same God!"

"Madame," said Girard, struck by this disdainful profession of faith, "a Christian about to die should dismiss all hatred from her heart, and ought not to repulse her God, under whatever form he may be presented to her."

Maison-Rouge advanced a step to open the screen, hoping that when she saw him, and knew what brought him, she would change her opinion in regard to the curé; but the gendarmes detected the movement.

"But," said Maison-Rouge, "I am the acolyte of the curé —"

"Then, since she refuses the curé," said Duchesne, "she does not require you."

"But still, perhaps she may accept me," said he, raising his voice; "it is impossible she would refuse me." But Marie Antoinette was too much engrossed by the sentiment which agitated her either to hear or recognize the Chevalier's voice.

"Go, sir!" continued she; "leave me!" addressing Girard; "since at this time we in France live under the régime of liberty, I claim the right to die according to my own fashion."

Girard offered some resistance.

"Leave me, sir!" said she. "I desire you to leave me."

Girard endeavored to speak.

"I will not hear you; leave me!" said she, with the gesture of Marie Thérèse.

Girard went out.

Maison-Rouge essayed to gain a glimpse of her through the opening in the screen; but the prisoner had turned her back. The executioner's assistant crossed before the curé; he came in holding a cord in his hand. The two gendarmes pushed the Chevalier toward the door; amazed, despairing, and utterly bewildered, before he had been able to utter a cry or make the slightest movement to effect his purpose, he found himself with the curé in the corridor of the turnkey. This corridor brought them again into the register-office, where the news of the queen's refusal had already circulated, and where the Austrian pride of Marie Antoinette was to some the pretext of the coarsest invectives, and to others the subject of secret admiration.

"Go!" said Richard to the abbé, "return home, since she repulses you, and let her die as she likes."

"Well, she is in the right," said Richard's wife, "and I would act in the same way."

"Then you would do wrong, Madame," said the curé.

"Be silent," said the porter, opening his eyes very wide; "what does it concern you? Go, Abbé, go!"

"No," said Girard, "no; I will, notwithstanding all, accompany her; one word, only one word, if she will listen, might bring her back to duty; besides, I am sent by the order of the Commune, and I must discharge my office."

"Send back your sexton, then," brutally observed the adjutant-major, commandant of the armed forces. He had been formerly an actor of French comedy, named Grammont. The eyes of the Chevalier flashed lightning, as he mechanically thrust his hand into his breast, where Girard knew he had the poniard. He checked him with a suppliant look.

"Spare my life," said he, in a low voice; "you see that your cause is ruined; do not destroy yourself with her. I will mention you to her on the route; I swear to you I will tell her you risked your life that you might see her once more on earth."

These words calmed the effervescence of the young man, and the ordinary reaction taking place, he sank into a state of quiescence. This man of heroic mind, of marvellous power, had arrived at the termination of both strength and will, and glided irresolute, or rather exhausted and vanquished, into a state of torpor that might have been imagined to be the precursor of death.

"Yes, I believe," said he, "it should be thus: the cross for Jesus, the scaffold for her, — gods and kings drink deep of the chalice presented to them by men." This thought produced resignation; and now, totally prostrated, he allowed himself to be pushed without offering any resistance, except an occasional involuntary groan, to the outer gate, passive as Ophelia when, devoted to death, she found herself borne away by the remorseless waves.

At the bottom of the gates and at the doors of the Conciergerie, a crowd was assembled, which unless once seen it was impossible to describe. Impatience ruled every passion; and each passion spoke its own language; and these combined formed an immense and prolonged uproar, as if the whole noise and the entire population of Paris were on this occasion concentrated in the quarter of the Palais de Justice.

In front of this crowd the whole army was encamped, with guns intended to guard the procession, and also to secure the privilege of those who came to witness the last act of the tragedy.

It would have been vain to attempt to pierce this deep rampart, increasing gradually, since the condemnation of the queen was now known not only at Paris, but by the patriots of the faubourgs.

Maison-Rouge, expelled from the Conciergerie, naturally found himself in the first rank among the soldiers, who instantly demanded who he was. He replied, "he was the vicar of the Abbé Girard, but having bound himself by the same oath, he, like the curé, had been dismissed and refused by the queen;" on which the soldiers, in their turn, pushed him into the first row of spectators, where he was again compelled to repeat what he had previously told them.

Then the cry arose, "He has just left!" "He has seen her!" "What did she say?" "What did she do?" "Is she as haughty as usual?" "Is she cast down?" "Does she weep?" The Chevalier replied to all these questions in a feeble but sweet and affable tone; as if this voice was the last manifestation of life suspended on his lips. His answer was couched in the language of truth and simplicity. It contained an eulogium on the firmness of Marie Antoinette; and that which he recounted with the simplicity and faith of an evangelist cast sorrow and remorse over many hearts.

When he spoke of the little dauphin, and of Madame Royale; of this queen without a throne; of this wife without a husband; this mother bereft of her children; this woman alone and abandoned, without a friend, surrounded by executioners, — more than one face here and there assumed a sad expression, and more than one tear of regret was clandestinely wiped from eyes a moment before animated by hatred.

The Palace clock struck eleven. All murmuring at this moment ceased. One hundred thousand human beings counted these strokes, echoed by the pulsations of their own hearts.

When the last vibration had ceased and died away in the distance, a loud noise was heard within the gates, and at the same time a cart, advancing from the side of the Quai aux Fleurs, broke through the crowd, then the guards, and drew up at the bottom of the steps.

The queen soon appeared on the top of the staircase. Looks expressive of all kinds of passion were bent upon her; the mob stood in breathless expectation. The queen's hair was cut short; the greater portion had turned gray during her captivity, and this shade of silver rendered still more delicate the mother-of-pearl pallor which at this moment lent an almost angelic beauty to this daughter of the Cæsars. She was attired in a white robe, and her hands were fastened behind her back. When she appeared with the Abbé Girard on her right, who notwithstanding all opposition would still accompany her, and the executioner on her left, both dressed in black, there ran throughout the crowd a murmur, of which God alone, who reads all hearts, could comprehend and sum up the truth.

A man passed between the executioner and Marie Antoinette; it was Grammont. He conducted her to the fatal car. The queen recoiled.

"Mount!" cried Grammont.

This word was distinctly heard by all. Emotion held every breath suspended on the lips of the spectators. A blush suffused the face of the queen, mounting even to the roots of her hair, but it immediately disappeared, and her face resumed its former death-like hue.

"Why a car for me," said she, "when the king had a carriage to convey him to the scaffold?"

The Abbé Girard advanced, and addressed a few words to her in a low tone; doubtless he condemned this last utterance of royal pride. The queen remained silent, but tottered so much that Sanson held out his arms to support her; but she recovered her self-possession before he could touch her. She then descended the staircase, while the assistants placed a foot-board behind the car. The queen entered first; the abbé followed her.

When the car was in motion it caused a great movement in the assemblage; and the soldiers at the same time, ignorant of its cause, united their efforts to push back the crowd, and consequently, a large space was cleared between the people and the vehicle of death, when suddenly a mournful howling was heard. The queen started, and instantly rose, looking around her. She then saw her little dog, which had been lost for two months, and which, unable to follow her into the Conciergerie, regardless of kicks, blows, and thrusts, now rushed toward the car; but almost directly poor Jet, emaciated, starving, and bruised, disappeared under the horses' feet. The queen followed him with her eyes; she could not speak, for her voice was drowned in the noise; she could not point her finger toward him, for her hands were tied; and had she been able to do either, who would have regarded her? Having closed her eyes for an instant, she soon revived. He was in the arms of a pale young man, who, standing on a cannon, was conspicuous above the crowd, and whose natural stature seemed enlarged from the unspeakable elevation of the sentiments with which he was animated, while he saluted the queen and pointed to heaven. Marie Antoinette looked upward and smiled sweetly.

The Chevalier uttered a groan, as if this smile had broken his heart; and as the fatal car turned toward the Pont-au-Change, he fell back among the crowd, and disappeared.

CHAPTER XLIX.

THE SCAFFOLD.

Upon the Place de la Revolution, leaning against a lamp-post, two men were waiting. Of those who followed with the crowd, some were carried to the Place du Palais, others to the Place de la Revolution, while the rest spread, impatient and tumultuous, over the whole road separating the two places. They were waiting until the queen should reach the instrument of punishment, which, defaced by the sun and storm, worn by the hand of the executioner, and, most horrible! blunted by too frequent contact with its victims, reared its head with a sinister pride over the subjacent mass, like a queen ruling her people. The two men, arm-in-arm, and speaking by fits and starts, with pale lips and contracted brows, were Lorin and Maurice. Lost in the crowd, but not in a way calculated to excite suspicion, they continued in a low tone their conversation, which was perhaps not the least interesting one then circulating among the various groups which, like an electric chain, a living sea, was agitated from the Pont-au-Change to the Pont de la Revolution.

The idea we have expressed regarding the scaffold seemed to have struck them both.

"See," said Maurice, "how the hideous monster rears her red arms; might it not be said that she calls us, and grins at us through her wicket as if it was her horrid mouth?"

"I," said Lorin, "must confess I do not belong to the school of poetry which sees everything blood-color. I see everything couleur-de-rose, and even at the foot of that dreadful machine I should sing and hope still. 'Dum spiro spero.'"

"You hope when they murder women?"

"Maurice," said Lorin, "child of the Revolution, do not deny your mother! Ah! Maurice, remain a stanch and loyal patriot. She who is condemned to die is unlike all other women; she is the evil genius of France."

"Oh, it is not her that I regret; it is not for her I weep!" cried Maurice.

"Yes; I understand, it is Geneviève."

"Ah!" said Maurice, "there is one thought that drives me mad! It is that Geneviève is in the hands of those purveyors to the guillotine, Hébert and Fouquier Tinville, — in the hands of the men who sent here the poor Sophie, and are now sending the proud Marie Antoinette."

"Well!" said Lorin, "it is this very fact that inspires me with hope. When the rage of the people has feasted on two tyrants it will be satiated for some time at least, — like the boa-constrictor, which requires three months to digest what he has devoured. Then the popular rage will swallow no more; and as is said by the prophets of the faubourg, 'the lesser morsels will be no longer palatable.'"

"Lorin! Lorin!" said Maurice, "I am more positive than you, and I say it in a whisper, but am ready to repeat it aloud, — Lorin, I hate the new queen who seems destined to succeed, the Austrian, whom she destroys. It is a sad queen whose purple is daily dyed in blood, and to whom Sanson is prime minister."

"Bah! we shall escape her."

"I do not think so," said Maurice, shaking his head; "to avoid being arrested at your house we have no resource but to live in the street."

"Bah! we can quit Paris; there is nothing to prevent us. We need not complain. My uncle will await us at Saint Omer; money, passport, nothing will be wanting. There exists not the gendarme who shall arrest us; what do you think? We remain in Paris because we choose to do so."

"No; that is not correct, excellent friend, devoted and faithful as you are — You remain because I wish to continue here."

"And you wish to remain to discover Geneviève. Well! nothing is more simple, just, or natural. You think she is in prison; nothing more probable. You wish to keep watch over her, and on that account we cannot quit Paris."

Maurice drew a deep sigh; it was evident his thoughts were wandering.

"Do you remember the death of Louis XVI?" said he. "I can see him yet, pale with pride and emotion. I was then one of the chiefs of this crowd, in whose folds I conceal myself to-day. I was greater at the foot of the scaffold than the king upon it had ever been. What a change, Lorin! and when one thinks that nine short months have sufficed to work this change!"

"Nine months of love, Maurice — Love ruined Troy!"

Maurice sighed; his wandering thoughts now took another direction.

"Poor Maison-Rouge," said he; "this is a sad day for him!"

"Alas!" said Lorin, "shall I tell you what appears to me the most melancholy thing about revolutions?"

"Yes," said Maurice.

"It is that one often has for friends those we should prefer as enemies; and for enemies those we would wish —"

"There is one thing I can hardly believe," interrupted Maurice.

"What?"

"It is that he will not invent some project, though the most hopeless, to save the queen."

"What! one man stronger than a hundred thousand!"

"I said, 'though the most hopeless.' I know that to save Geneviève —" Lorin frowned.

"I again tell you, Maurice," said he, "you are wild! No; even were it possible for you to save Geneviève, you would not become a bad citizen. But enough of this, Maurice; they are listening to us. Look how the heads undulate; see! there is Sanson's valet raising himself from under his basket, and looking in the distance. The Austrian arrives."

In short, as if to accompany this undulation which Lorin had remarked, a shuddering, prolonged and increasing, pervaded the crowd. It was one of those hurricanes which commence with a whistle and terminate with a bellow. Maurice raised himself by the help of the lamp-post, and looked toward the Rue Saint Honoré.

"Yes," said he shuddering; "there she is." And another machine now made its appearance, almost as revolting as the guillotine. It was the fatal car.

On the right and left glittered the arms of the escort; while in front marched Grammont, replying with flashes of his sabre to the shouts and cries of some fanatics. But ever as the cart advanced these cries subsided under the haughty courage of the condemned.

Never had a countenance commanded more respect; never had Marie Antoinette looked more the queen. Her proud courage struck terror into those around her.

Indifferent to the exhortations of the Abbé Girard, who despite of her opposition accompanied her, her face moved neither to the right nor left; her deep thought was as immutable as her look; even the jolting motion of the cart upon the uneven pavement did not by its violence disturb the rigidity of her demeanor. She might have been taken for a marble statue conveyed in the car, had it not been for her brilliant eyes, and her hair waving in the wind.

A silence equal to that of the desert fell suddenly upon the three hundred thousand spectators of this scene, witnessed by the heavens for the first time by the light of the sun.

In the place where Maurice and Lorin were standing they heard the creaking of the axles and the snorting of the horses.

The car stopped at the foot of the scaffold.

The queen, who doubtless was not thinking of this moment, recalled herself, and understood it all; she threw a haughty glance upon the crowd, and again beheld the pale young man she had previously seen standing on the cannon. He was now mounted on a wall, and repeated the respectful salutation he had before offered her as she left the Conciergerie. He then disappeared. Many persons seeing him, it was soon reported, from his being dressed in black, that a priest was in attendance on Marie Antoinette, to give her absolution ere she ascended the scaffold.

Further than that no one disturbed the Chevalier. In moments of highest concern, certain things are treated with marked deference.

The queen cautiously descended the steps from the car, supported by Sanson, who to the last moment, in accomplishing the task to which he himself appeared to be condemned, treated her with the greatest respect.

As the queen walked toward the steps of the scaffold some of the horses reared, and several of the foot-guards and soldiers appeared to oscillate and lose their equilibrium; then a shadow was seen to glide under the scaffold; but tranquillity was almost instantaneously re-established, since no one was willing to quit his place at this solemn moment, — no one was willing to lose the minutest detail in the dreadful tragedy about to be accomplished. All eyes were directed toward the condemned.

The queen was already on the platform of the scaffold. The priest still continued to address her; an assistant moved her gently forward, while another removed the scarf from her shoulders.

Marie Antoinette felt the touch of the infamous hand upon her neck, and making a sudden movement trod upon Sanson's foot, who, without her having seen him, was engaged in fixing her to the fatal plank. Sanson drew back his foot.

"Excuse me, sir," said the queen; "I did not do it intentionally."

These were the last words pronounced by the daughter of the Cæsars, the queen of France, the widow of Louis XVI.

As the clock of the Tuileries struck a quarter after twelve, the queen was launched into eternity.

A terrible cry — a cry comprising at once joy, terror, sorrow, triumph, expiation — rose like a storm, drowning a feeble burst of lamentation which at the same moment issued from beneath the scaffold.

The gendarmes heard it notwithstanding, feeble as it was, and advanced some steps in front. The crowd, now less compact, expanded like a river whose dike has been enlarged, threw down the fence, dispersed the guards, and rushed like the returning tide to beat the foot of the scaffold, which was already shaking.

All wished for a nearer view of the remains of that royalty which they believed, root and branch, forever exterminated in France

But the gendarmes had another object in view, — they sought the shadow which had repassed their lines, and glided beneath the scaffold.

Two of them returned leading between them by the collar a pale young man, whose hand held a blood-stained handkerchief, which he pressed to his heart; he was followed by a little spaniel howling piteously.

"Death to the aristocrat! death to the noble!" cried some men of the people; "he has dipped his handkerchief in the Austrian's blood, — to death with him!"

"Good Heavens!" said Maurice to Lorin, "do you recognize him? Do you recognize him?"

"Death to the royalist!" repeated the madmen; "take away the handkerchief he wishes to preserve as a relic! wrest it from him! tear it from him!"

A haughty smile flitted across the young man's lips, he tore open his shirt, bared his breast, and dropped the handkerchief.

"Gentlemen," said he, "this blood is not the queen's, but my own. Let me die in peace;" and a deep gushing wound appeared widely gaping under the left breast. The crowd uttered one cry and retired. The young man sank slowly upon his knees, and gazed upon the scaffold as a martyr looks upon the altar.

"Maison-Rouge!" whispered Lorin to Maurice.

"Adieu!" murmured the young man, bowing his head with an angelic smile, — "adieu! or rather, au revoir!" and he expired in the midst of the stupefied guards.

"There is still this expedient, Lorin," said Maurice, "before becoming an unworthy citizen."

The little spaniel turned toward the corpse, terrified and howling lamentably.

"Why, there is Jet," said a man, holding a large club in his hand, — "why, there is Jet; come here, old fellow."

The dog advanced toward him, but was scarcely within arm's length of the man who had called him, when the brutal wretch raised his club and dashed out his brains, at the same time bursting into a hoarse laugh.

"Cowardly wretch!" cried Maurice.

"Silence!" whispered Lorin, "or we are lost. It is Simon."

CHAPTER L.

THE VISIT TO THE DOMICILE.

Lorin and Maurice returned to their home; but the latter, in order not to compromise his friend too openly, usually absented himself during the day, and returned at night.

In the midst of these events, being present at the removal of the prisoners to the Conciergerie, he watched daily for the sight of Geneviève, not having been yet able to discover her place of imprisonment. Lorin, since his visit to Fouquier Tinville, had succeeded in convincing Maurice that on the first ostensible act he was lost, and would then have sacrificed himself without having benefited Geneviève; and Maurice, who would willingly have thrown himself into prison in the hope of being united to his mistress, became prudent from the fear of being separated from her forever.

He went every morning from the Carmelites to Port Libre, from the Madelonnettes to Saint Lazare, from La Force to the Luxembourg; he stationed himself before the prisons to watch the cars as they came out to convey the accused to the Revolutionary Tribunal. Then when he had scanned the victims, he proceeded to the other prisons to prosecute this hopeless search, for he soon became aware that the activity of ten men would prove inadequate to keep watch over the thirty-three prisons which Paris could boast of at this period. He therefore contented himself by going daily to the Tribunal, there to await the appearance of Geneviève.

He was already beginning to despair. Indeed, what hope was there for a person condemned, after arrest? Sometimes the Tribunal, whose sittings commenced at ten o'clock, had condemned twenty or thirty people by four o'clock: those first condemned had six hours to live, but the last, sentenced at a quarter to four, fell at half-past beneath the axe. To resign himself to such a fate for Geneviève, would be to grow weary in his battle against destiny.

Oh, if he had known beforehand of the imprisonment of Geneviève, how Maurice would have baffled the blind, human justice of this epoch; how easily and promptly would he have torn Geneviève from prison! Never were escapes more easy; and it may be said, never were they so rare. All the nobles, once placed in prison, installed themselves there as in a château, and died at leisure. To fly was like evading a duel; the women even blushed at liberty acquired at this price.

But Maurice would not have shown himself so scrupulous. To kill the dogs, to bribe a door-keeper, what more simple? Geneviève was not one of those splendid names calculated to attract general attention. She would not dishonor herself by flying, and besides — when could she be disgraced!

Oh, how bitterly he thought of the gardens of Port Libre, so easy to scale; the chambers of Madelonnettes, so easy of access to the street; the low walls of the Luxembourg, and the dark corridors of the Carmelites, where a resolute man could so easily penetrate by opening a window.

But was Geneviève in one of these prisons?

Then devoured by doubt, and worn out with anxiety, he loaded Dixmer with imprecations; he threatened, and nourished his hatred against this man, whose cowardly vengeance concealed itself under an apparent devotion to the royal cause.

"I shall find him out too," thought Maurice; "for if he wishes to save the unhappy woman, he will show himself; if he wishes to ruin her, he will insult her. I shall find him out, the scoundrel! and it will be an evil day for him!"

On the morning of the day when the events occurred which we are about to relate, Maurice went out early to take his usual station at the Revolutionary Tribunal, leaving Lorin asleep.

Lorin was suddenly awakened by a loud noise at the door, the voices of women and the butt-ends of guns. He threw around him the startled glance of a surprised man who wished to convince himself that nothing that could compromise him was in view. Four sectionaries, two gendarmes, and a commissary entered at the same moment. This visit was sufficiently significant, and Lorin hastened to dress himself.

"Do you come to arrest me?" said he.

"Yes, Citizen Lorin."

"What for?"

"Because you are suspected."

"Ah, all right!"

The commissary scribbled some words at the bottom of the warrant for arrest.

"Where is your friend?" he inquired.

"What friend?"

"The Citizen Maurice Lindey."

"At home, probably."

"No; he lodges here."

"He! go along! Search, and if you find —"

"Here is the denunciation," interrupted the commissary, "it is plain enough;" offering Lorin a paper in vile writing and enigmatical orthography. It stated that every morning the Citizen Lindey, suspected and ordered for arrest, was seen going out of the Citizen Lorin's house. The denunciation was signed "Simon."

"Why," said Lorin, "the cobbler will lose his custom if he follows two trades at the same time, — a spy and boot-mender. He is a Cæsar, this Monsieur Simon," and he burst into a fit of laughter.

"The Citizen Maurice, where is he?" asked the commissary. "We summon you to deliver him up."

"When I tell you he is not here!"

The commissary passed into the chamber adjoining, then ascended to the loft where Lorin's official slept, and at last opened a lower apartment, but found no trace of Maurice. But upon the dining-room table a recently written letter attracted the attention of the commissary. It was from Maurice, who had deposited it there on leaving in the morning without awakening his friend.

"I go to the Tribunal," said Maurice; "take breakfast without me. I shall not return till night."

"Citizens," said Lorin, "however anxious I may feel to obey your commands, I cannot follow you undressed. Allow my official to assist me."

"Aristocrat," said a voice, "do you require assistance to put on your breeches?"

"Oh, goodness! yes," said Lorin; "I resemble the Citizen Dagobert, — mind, I did not say king."

"Well, dress," said the commissary; "but make haste!"

The official came down to help his master to dress. However, it was not exactly that Lorin required a valet-de-chambre; it was that nothing might escape the notice of the official, and that consequently he might detail everything to Maurice.

"Now, gentlemen, — pardon, citizens. Now, Citizens, I am ready, and will follow you; but permit me, I beg, to carry with me the last volume of 'Lettres à Émilie,' by Monsieur Demoustier, which has just appeared, and I have not read. It will enliven the hours of my captivity."

"Your captivity?" said Simon, sharply, now become municipal in his turn, and entering, followed by four sectionaries, "that will not last long. You figure in the trial of the woman who wanted to assist the Austrian to escape. They try her to-day; and to-morrow, when you have given your testimony, your turn will come."

"Cobbler," said Lorin, "you stitch your soles too quickly."

"Yes; but what a nice stroke from the leather-cutting knife!" replied Simon; "you will see, you will see, my fine grenadier!"

Lorin shrugged his shoulders.

"Well," said he, "let us go; I am waiting for you."

As each one turned round to descend the staircase Lorin bestowed on the municipal Simon so vigorous a kick that he sent him rolling and howling down the entire flight of stairs. The sectionaries could not restrain their laughter. Lorin put his hands in his pockets.

"In the exercise of my functions!" cried Simon, livid with rage.

"Zounds!" said Lorin, "are we not all here in the exercise of our functions?"

He got into the carriage, and was conducted by the commissary to the Palais de Justice.

CHAPTER LI.

LORIN.

If for the second time the reader is willing to follow us to the Revolutionary Tribunal, we shall find Maurice in the same place where we have already seen him, only now infinitely more pale and agitated.

At the moment our scene again opens upon the lugubrious theatre, whither we are led by a tissue of events rather than by our own inclinations, the jury were deliberating; a cause had just been tried. Two of the accused had already, by one of those insolent anticipations by which they ridiculed the judges, attired themselves for the scaffold, and were conversing with their counsel, whose words somewhat resembled those of a physician who despairs of the life of his patient.

The people of the Tribune were this day in a ferocious mood, calculated to excite the severity of the jury placed under the immediate surveillance of the gossips and inhabitants of the suburbs. The juries under these circumstances became more excited and energetic, resembling an actor who redoubles his efforts beneath the eyes of a censorious public.

Since ten in the morning five condemnations had already taken place under the decisions of these harsh and insatiable juries.

The two individuals who now found themselves on the bench of the accused awaited the decisive moment when

"yes" or "no" would return them to life or doom them to death.

The audience, rendered savage by the daily occurrence of these spectacles, now become their favorite pastime, prepared them by exclamations and anticipations for the awful moment.

"There! there! look at the tall one!" said a beldam, who, not having a bonnet, wore a tricolored cockade as large as a hand on her head, — "there! is he not pale? One would swear he was already dead."

The condemned regarded the woman with a contemptuous smile.

"What do you say?" replied her neighbor; "why, he is smiling."

"Yes; on the wrong side of his mouth."

One of the men looked at his watch.

"What is the time?" inquired his companion.

"A quarter to one. This has lasted three quarters of an hour."

"The same as at Domfront, that unfortunate town, where you arrive at noon, and are hung in an hour."

"And the short one! the short one!" cried another person, "will he not be ugly when he sneezes in the sack?"

"Bah! it is done so quickly, you will barely have time to perceive it."

"Then we will demand the head from Sanson; one has a right to see it."

"Look! what a beautiful blue coat he has on. It is rather a pleasant thing that the poor can shorten the rich and well-dressed people."

Indeed, as the executioner had told the queen, the poor inherited the spoils of each victim; they were carried to La Salpêtrière, immediately after the execution, and distributed among the indigent; and there even the clothes of the unfortunate queen had been conveyed.

Maurice heard this whirlwind of words without paying any attention; for he was at this moment occupied by one engrossing thought, to the exclusion of all else. For several days his heart beat only at certain moments, and by fits and starts, as from time to time hope or fear appeared to suspend all vital action, and these perpetual oscillations to bruise the most tender sensibilities of his soul.

The jury returned to their places; and as had been fully anticipated, the president pronounced the condemnation of the two accused, who were directly removed, walking with a firm step and erect bearing, — for at this epoch every one learned to die boldly.

The solemn and sinister voice of the usher was again heard.

"The public prosecutor against the Citizen Geneviève Dixmer."

A shudder ran through Maurice's frame, and a cold sweat bedewed his brow. The little door by which the accused entered suddenly opened, and Geneviève appeared. She was dressed in white; her ringlets were tastefully arranged, instead of being cut short, hanging in long masses of clustering curls. Doubtless, to the last moment poor Geneviève wished to appear beautiful to her lover, who might perchance be able to see her.

Maurice beheld Geneviève, and felt that all the strength he had collected was inadequate to this occasion, notwithstanding he had expected this blow, since for twelve days he had not omitted a single sitting, and three times already had the name of Geneviève proceeded from the mouth of the public prosecutor, and reached his ear. But there are certain griefs and miseries so profound that it is quite impossible to sound the depths of the abyss.

All those who witnessed the appearance of this young female, so lovely, so pale and innocent, uttered a simultaneous cry; some of fury, — for at this period there existed a class of people who detested everything bordering on superiority of beauty, riches, or of birth, — others of admiration, and some of pity. Geneviève, doubtless, among all these cries had recognized one cry, amid all these voices had distinguished one voice, for she turned in the direction of Maurice, while the president, looking up at her from time to time, turned over the law papers of the accused.

At the first glance she discovered Maurice, concealed as his features were under the broad brim of his hat; and turning round with a sweet smile, and a gesture still more engaging, she pressed her rosy but trembling hands upon her lips, and depositing her whole soul with her breath, she gave wings to a last kiss, which only one in this vast crowd had the right to appropriate to himself.

A murmur of interest ran through the hall. Geneviève, recalled, turned toward her judges, but stopping suddenly in the midst of this movement, her eyes dilated, and became fixed with an undefinable expression of horror toward one point of the hall.

Maurice in vain raised himself on his toes; he saw nothing, or rather something of more consequence recalled his attention to the scene that was being enacted, — that is to say, to the Tribunal.

Fouquier Tinville had commenced reading the act of accusation. This act stated that Geneviève Dixmer was the wife of an obstinate conspirator suspected of having assisted the ex-Chevalier de Maison-Rouge in his successive attempts to rescue the queen. She had, besides, been surprised at the feet of the queen, entreating her to exchange garments with her, and offering to die in her stead. This absurd fanaticism, continued the act, merited, no doubt, the admiration of the counter-revolutionists; but in our day every French citizen owes his life to the nation; it is therefore double treason to sacrifice it to the enemies of France.

Geneviève, when asked if she acknowledged that she had knelt before the queen, as stated by the two gendarmes Gilbert and Duchesne, and had entreated her to exchange vestments, simply replied, "Yes."

"Then," said the president, "inform us of your plan, and what hope you entertained of its success."

Geneviève smiled.

"A woman might conceive hopes," said she, "but a woman could not form a plan like this of which I am the victim."

"How came you there, then?"

"Not of my own accord. I was compelled."

"Who compelled you?" demanded the public prosecutor.

"Those who menaced me with death if I did not obey;" and again the agitated look of the young woman was centred on that part of the hall invisible to Maurice.

"But to escape from this death which menaced you, did you not know that you faced that death which must result from your condemnation?"

"When I consented, the knife was at my throat, while the guillotine was only in perspective. I succumbed under present violence."

"Why did you not call for assistance? All good citizens would have defended you."

"Alas! sir," said Geneviève, in a voice at once so sad and sweet that it caused Maurice's heart to beat tumultuously, "I had no one near me."

Commiseration succeeded to interest, as interest had succeeded to curiosity. Many heads were lowered, some to conceal their tears, many to allow them to flow freely.

Just then Maurice perceived on his left an immovable head and an inflexible countenance. It was Dixmer, standing dark, gloomy, and implacable, never for a moment losing sight of Geneviève or of the Tribunal.

The blood rushed to the young man's temples; rage mounted from his heart to his forehead, filling his whole being with intense desire for vengeance. He darted at Dixmer a look so replete with burning hate, so condensed and powerful, that he, as if attracted by the electric fluid, turned his head toward his enemy. Their glances encountered like two flashes.

"Tell us the names of your instigators," said the president.

"There was only one, sir."

"Who?"

"My husband."

"Do you know where he is?"

"Yes."

"Inform us of his retreat."

"He has been brutal, but I will not be cowardly. It is not for me to tell you his retreat, but for you to find him."

Maurice looked at Dixmer. He never moved. One idea flashed through the young man's brain. It was to denounce him at the same time that he denounced himself; but he quickly suppressed the thought.

"No," said he; "it is not thus that he should die."

"Then you refuse to assist us in our search?" said the president.

"I think, sir, I could not do so without rendering myself as contemptible in the eyes of others as he is in mine."

"Are there any witnesses?" demanded the president.

"There is one," replied the usher.

"Call the witness."

"Maximilien-Jean Lorin!" shouted the usher.

"Lorin!" cried Maurice, "Oh, my God! what has happened?"

This scene took place the same day that Lorin had been arrested, and Maurice was in utter ignorance of the fact.

"Lorin!" murmured Geneviève, looking round with anxious solicitude.

"Why does not the witness answer to the call?" demanded the president.

"Citizen President," said Fouquier Tinville, "upon a recent denunciation the witness was arrested at his own house; he will be brought directly."

Maurice started.

"There is another still more important witness," continued Fouquier; "but we have not yet been able to find him."

Dixmer turned toward Maurice smiling. Perhaps the same idea flitted through the mind of the husband which had before entered that of the lover.

Geneviève, pale and horror-stricken, uttered a low groan.

At this moment Lorin entered, followed by two gendarmes.

After him, and by the same door, Simon appeared, who came to take his seat in the judgment-hall, according to his custom in that locality.

"Your name and surname?" inquired the president.

"Maximilien-Jean Lorin."

"Your condition in life?"

"Independent."

"You will not remain so long," muttered Simon, shaking his fist at him.

"Are you related to the prisoner at the bar?"

"No; but I have the honor of being one of her friends."

"Are you aware that she conspired to carry off the queen?"

"How could I be aware of it?"

"She might have confided in you?"

"In me! a member of the section of the Thermopyles? A likely story!"

"Notwithstanding, you have sometimes been seen with her."

"I might have been seen with her often."

"Did you know that she was an aristocrat?"

"I knew her as the wife of a master-tanner."

"But her husband did not in reality follow the business which he pretended to."

"Of that I am ignorant; her husband was not one of my friends."

"Tell us what you know of this husband."

"Oh, very willingly. He is a villain, who —"

"Monsieur Lorin," said Geneviève, "for pity's sake!"

Lorin continued unmoved.

"He is a villain, who has sacrificed his wife, the poor woman before you, not so much to his political opinions as to his private hatred. Faugh! I look upon the brute as lower and more degraded even than Simon."

Dixmer became livid with rage. Simon wished to speak, but a gesture from the president imposed silence.

"You appear to know the whole history, Citizen Lorin," said Fouquier; "continue your testimony."

"Pardon me, Citizen Fouquier," said Lorin, rising; "I know nothing more." He bowed and reseated himself.

"Citizen Lorin," said Fouquier, "it is your bounden duty to enlighten this Tribunal."

"It has received all the light that I can give it. As to this poor woman, I repeat she has only acted under compulsion. Look at her! does she look like a conspirator? What she has done she was compelled to do. That is all."

"You think so?"

"I am sure of it."

"In the name of the law," said Fouquier, "I require that the witness Lorin shall be placed before this Tribunal as an accomplice of this woman."

Maurice groaned, while Geneviève buried her face in her hands.

Simon screamed out in a transport of joy, "Citizen Prosecutor, you are the savior of your country!"

As to Lorin, he leaped over the balustrade without making any reply, and seating himself near to Geneviève, took her hand, and respectfully kissed it, saying, "Good-day, Madame," with a coolness which electrified the assembly; "how do you do?"

Then he took his seat on the bench of the accused.

CHAPTER LII.

SEQUEL TO THE PRECEDING.

ALL this scene had passed before Maurice like a fantastic vision. Leaning upon the handle of his sword, which he had never quitted, he saw his friends precipitated one after another into that gulf which never yields back its victims; and this fatal sight so affected him that he asked himself why he, the companion of these unfortunates, should still cling to the brink of the precipice, and not surrender himself to the giddiness which was dragging him with them.

In leaping the balustrade Lorin saw the dark and sneering features of Dixmer.

When, as we have said, he had placed himself near Geneviève, she whispered in his ear.

"Mon Dieu!" said she, "do you know that Maurice is here?"

"Where?"

"Do not look round directly; one look might prove his ruin."

"Calm yourself."

"Behind us, near the door. What a trial for him if we are condemned!"

Lorin regarded the young woman with tender sympathy.

"We shall be," said he. "I conjure you not to doubt it. The deception would be too cruel if you were to permit yourself to hope."

"Oh, my God!" said Geneviève, "pity our poor friend, who will remain alone in the world!"

Lorin then turned round toward Maurice, and Geneviève also could not refrain from glancing at him.

His eyes were fixed upon them both, and one hand was placed upon his heart.

"There is one way to save you," said Lorin.

"Are you sure?" said Geneviève, her eyes sparkling with joy.

"Oh, of that one I am sure," replied Lorin.

"Oh, if you can save me how I will bless you!"

"But this way —" replied the young man.

Geneviève read his hesitation in his eyes.

"You have also seen him?" said she.

"Yes; I have seen him. Will you be saved? Let him, in his turn, take his seat in the iron arm-chair, and you will be safe." Dixmer, doubtless from Lorin's look and the expression of his countenance, divined what he uttered. He at first turned pale, but soon recovered his gloomy composure and satanic smile.

"Impossible!" said Geneviève; "I can no longer hate him."

"Say that he knows your generous nature, and defies you."

"No doubt; for he is sure of him, of me, of us all."

"Geneviève! Geneviève! I am less perfect than you. Let me bring him here! Let him perish!"

"No, Lorin, I conjure you. Nothing in common with that man, not even death. It seems to me I should be unfaithful to Maurice were I to die with Dixmer."

"But you will not die."

"How can I live when Maurice is to die?"

"Ah!" said Lorin, "Maurice has reason to love you; you are an angel, and heaven is the angels' home. Poor dear Maurice!"

In the mean time Simon, who could not overhear the conversation between the accused, devoured their looks instead of their words.

"Citizen Gendarme," said he, "prevent those conspirators from continuing their plots against the Republic, even in the Revolutionary Tribunal."

"You know, Citizen Simon," replied the gendarme, "that here they conspire no more, and if they do so it will not be for long. These citizens are only conversing together; and since the law does not forbid them to do so in the car, why should it be forbidden at the Tribunal?"

This gendarme was Gilbert, who, having recognized the prisoner taken in the queen's chamber, avowed with his ordinary honesty the interest which he could not help according to her courage and devotion.

The president having consulted the court, at the request of Fouquier Tinville commenced his questions.

"Accused Lorin," demanded he, "of what nature was your acquaintance with the citizen Madame Dixmer?"

"Of what nature, Citizen President?

"The pure flame of friendship bound us one to another;
As a sister she loved me, and I her as a brother."

"Citizen Lorin," said Fouquier Tinville, "your poetry is out of season here, and the rhythm is bad."

"Why so?"

"You have one syllable too many."

"Cut it off! cut it off! Citizen Prosecutor! that is your trade, you know."

The imperturbable countenance of Fouquier Tinville assumed a pallid hue at this horrible pleasantry.

"And in what light," demanded the president, "did the Citizen Dixmer view this liaison of a professed Republican with his wife?"

"As to that I can tell you nothing, declaring that I was never acquainted with the Citizen Dixmer, and never had any desire to be so."

"But," resumed Fouquier Tinville, "you did not tell us that your friend Maurice Lindey formed the link of this pure friendship between yourself and the accused?"

"If I did not say so," replied Lorin, "it was because it seemed to me wrong to speak of it; and I think that you might even follow my example."

"The citizen jurors," said Fouquier Tinville, "will appreciate this singular alliance between an aristocrat and two Republicans, and at the very moment when this aristocrat is convicted of the blackest plot that could be concocted against the nation."

"How should I know anything concerning this plot you speak of?" demanded Lorin, disgusted by the brutal stupidity of the argument.

"You were acquainted with this woman; you were her friend; you term yourself her brother; you speak of her as your sister, — and you were not cognizant of her proceedings? Is it then probable, as you have yourself remarked," continued the president, "that she would have committed alone this act imputed to her?"

"She did not commit it alone," replied Lorin, repeating the technical words used by the president; "since, as she has told you, and I have told you, and now repeat, her husband compelled her."

"Then how is it that you are not acquainted with the husband," said Fouquier Tinville, "since the husband was united with the wife?"

It remained only for Lorin to recount the first disappearance of Dixmer; to mention the amours of Geneviève and his friend; and, in short, to relate the manner in which Dixmer had carried off and concealed his wife in some impenetrable retreat, — it needed only this to ex-culpate himself from all connivance, and to elucidate the whole mystery. But for this he must betray the secrets of his two friends; to do this would be to put Geneviève to shame before five hundred people. Lorin shook his head, as if saying "no" to himself.

"Well?" demanded the president, "what do you reply to the public prosecutor?"

"That his logic is crushing," said Lorin; "and I am now convinced of one thing which I never even suspected before."

"What is that?"

"That I am, as it appears, one of the most frightful conspirators that has ever been seen."

This declaration elicited a roar of laughter; even the jury could not refrain, so ludicrous was the young man's manner in enunciating these words.

Fouquier felt the ridicule; and since with his usual indefatigable perseverance he had managed to know all the secrets of the accused as well as they did themselves, he could not help feeling toward Lorin a sentiment of pity mingled with admiration.

"Come, Citizen Lorin," said he, "speak in your own defence. The Tribunal will lend a willing ear. We are acquainted with your previous conduct, and it has always been that of a stanch Republican."

Simon essayed to speak; but the president made him a signal to remain silent.

"Speak, Citizen Lorin!" said he; "we are all attention;" but Lorin only shook his head.

"This silence is confession," said the president.

"Not so," said Lorin; "silence is silence, that is all."

"Once more," said Fouquier Tinville; "will you speak?"

Lorin turned toward the audience to encounter the eyes of Maurice, and to learn from them what course he would wish him to pursue; but Maurice made no sign to him to speak, and Lorin maintained his former silence. This was self-condemnation.

All that followed was quickly executed. Fouquier summed up his accusation; the president reviewed the evidence; the jury retired, and unanimously returned a verdict of "guilty" against Lorin and Geneviève.

The president condemned them both to suffer the penalty of death.

Two o'clock sounded from the great clock of the Palace.

The president had just time sufficient to pronounce the condemnation as the clock struck.

Maurice heard the two with a sense of confusion and utter bewilderment.

When the vibration had ceased, his strength was utterly exhausted. The gendarmes led away Geneviève and Lorin, who had offered her his arm.

Both saluted Maurice, but in different ways. Lorin smiled; but Geneviève, pale and fainting, wafted him a last kiss upon her fingers, bathed in tears.

She had till the last moment clung to the hope of life, and now wept, not the loss of her life, but of her love, which must perish with her.

Maurice, half mad, had not replied to his friends' farewell. He rose, pale and bewildered, from the bench on which he had fallen. His friends had disappeared.

He felt only one sentiment alive within him. It was the hatred which was gnawing at his heart.

He threw a last look around him and recognized Dixmer, who was leaving with the rest of the spectators, and at that moment stooped to pass under the arched door of the passage.

With the rapidity of a steel spring when it unbends, Maurice sprang from bench to bench, and reached the door.

Dixmer had already passed through, and descended into the darkened corridor. Maurice followed behind him. At the moment Dixmer planted his foot on the pavement of the grand hall, Maurice tapped him on the shoulder.

CHAPTER LIII.

THE DUEL.

At this epoch it was always a serious thing to feel a touch upon the shoulder. Dixmer turned, and recognized Maurice.

"Ah! good-day, Citizen Republican," said Dixmer, without evincing any other emotion than an almost imperceptible start, which he immediately repressed.

"Good-day, Citizen Coward," replied Maurice. "You were waiting for me, were you not?"

"That is to say," replied Dixmer, "that, on the contrary, I had ceased to expect you."

"Why was that?"

"Because I expected you sooner."

"I still arrive too soon for you, assassin!" added Maurice, with a murmured growl rather than a voice, since it resembled the grumbling of a storm gathered in his heart, his looks being like the lightning's flashes.

"You fling fire from your eyes, Citizen," replied Dixmer. "We shall be recognized, and followed."

"Yes; and you fear to be arrested, do you not? You dread lest you might be conducted to the scaffold where you send others. Let them arrest us, so much the better; for it seems to me that the life of one guilty wretch was due to national justice."

"As there is one name the less on the list of people of honor. Is it not so — since yours has disappeared?"

"Well, we shall speak about all that again, I hope; but, in the mean time, you are avenged — miserably avenged — upon a woman. Why, since you have waited for me elsewhere, did you not do so at my house, when you stole away Geneviève?"

"You were the first thief, I believe."

"Neither by your wit nor your words have I ever known you, sir. I know you better by your actions, — witness the day when you wanted to murder me. That day your true nature spoke."

"And I have more than once regretted that I did not listen to it," answered Dixmer, coolly.

"Well," said Maurice, touching his sword, "I offer you your revenge."

"To-morrow, if you like, but not to-day."

"And why to-morrow?"

"Or this evening."

"Why not directly?"

"Because I am engaged till five o'clock."

"Another hideous project!" said Maurice; "another ambush!"

"Really, Monsieur Maurice, you are rather ungrateful!" replied Dixmer. "In truth you are. Here, for six months, I have allowed you to make love to my wife; for six months have permitted your meetings, and have not noticed your smiles. Never man, you must confess, has evinced so little of the tiger in his composition as myself."

"That is to say, you thought I might be useful, and you could mould me to your purpose."

"Without doubt," returned Dixmer, calmly, who ruled his own passion as much as Maurice was carried away by his. "Without doubt; while you were betraying your Republic, and were selling it to me for a look from my wife; while you were dishonoring yourselves, — you by your treason, she by her adulterous love, — I remained the sage and hero. I waited, and I triumphed."

"Horrible!" said Maurice.

"Is it not? Yes; you appreciate your own conduct fully, sir. It is horrible! — it is infamous!"

"You deceive yourself, sir; the conduct I term horrible and infamous is that of the man to whom the honor of a woman had been confided, who had sworn to guard this honor pure and unsullied, and who, instead of keeping his word and oath, employed her beauty as a shameful bait to ensnare a feeble heart. It was your sacred duty beyond all others to protect this woman, and instead of protecting her, you have sold her."

"What I had to do, sir," replied Dixmer, "I will tell you. I had to save my friend who united with me in this sacred cause. Even as I have sacrificed my property to this cause, so have I sacrificed my honor. As for me, I have completely forgotten, completely effaced myself. Now my friend is no more; he has died by the poniard. My queen is no more; she has died ignominiously on the scaffold. Now! now! I can think of revenge."

"Say of assassination."

"One cannot assassinate an adulteress; when she is killed, she is but punished for her crime."

"This sin you imposed upon her, therefore it was rendered lawful."

"You think so?" said Dixmer, with a sardonic smile. "Judge from her remorse if she believes she has acted lawfully."

"Those who punish strike openly. You, you do not punish; for while striking you fly, and while casting her head to the guillotine you conceal yourself."

"I fly! I hide myself! when did you see that, poor idiot that you are?" demanded Dixmer. "Is it concealing myself to be present at her condemnation? Is it flying when I go into the Salle des Morts to fling her my last adieu?"

"You are going to see her again, — to fling her a last adieu?" cried Maurice.

"Decidedly you are not expert at revenge, Citizen," replied Dixmer, shrugging his shoulders. "Thus, in my situation you would abandon these events to their strength alone, these circumstances to their natural course; thus, for example, the adulterous woman having merited death, the moment she has received the punishment of death I am quits with her, or rather she is quits with me. No, Citizen Maurice; I know better than that. I have discovered a way to return this woman all the evil she has done me. She loves you, and will die far from you; she detests me, and I will be near her. There!" said he, drawing a pocket-book from his pocket, "do you see this? It contains a card signed by the registrar of the Palace. With this card I can gain near access to the condemned. I will penetrate to Geneviève; I will call her 'Adulteress!' I shall see her curls fall under the hand of the vile executioner, and as they are severed she shall still hear my voice hissing, 'Adulteress!' I will even accompany her to the fatal car, and as she plants her foot upon the scaffold, the last sound that greets her ear shall be the word 'Adulteress!'"

"Take care! she will not have strength to support so much cowardice; she will denounce you."

"No," cried Dixmer, "she hates me too much for that. If she had wished to denounce me she would have done so when her friend urged her so softly. If she did not denounce me to save her life, she will not do so that I may die with her; for she well knows in that case I should retard her execution for a day. She well knows that if she denounces me, I shall go with her not only to the lowest step of the Palace, but even to the scaffold; she well knows that instead of leaving her at the foot of the ladder, I shall ascend into the car with her, and that, seated by her side, the whole length of the road I shall constantly repeat the one dreadful word 'Adulteress;' that even on the scaffold I shall continue to do so till the moment she sinks into eternity and the accusation falls with her."

Dixmer was frightful in this state of anger and hatred. He seized Maurice by the hand and shook it with a force unknown to the young man, upon whom this had acted with a contrary effect; as Dixmer became excited, Maurice grew calm.

"Listen!" said the young man, "in your vengeance you have omitted one thing."

"What?"

"That you will be able to tell her, 'On leaving the Tribunal, I have seen your lover, and have killed him.'"

"On the contrary, I prefer telling her that you live, and will suffer for the remainder of your days from the spectacle of her death."

"You shall kill me, notwithstanding," said Maurice; "or," added he, turning round and finding himself nearly master of his position, "I will kill you!"

And pale with emotion, and excited by fury, finding his strength redoubled from the restraint he had imposed upon his feelings while listening to the unfolding of Dixmer's horrible project, he seized him by the throat and drew him backward toward a stair which led to the high bank of the river. At the contact with his hand, Dixmer, in his turn, felt hatred rush over him like hot lava.

"You need not compel me by force, I will follow."

"Come, then. You are armed."

"I will follow you."

"No, go first; but I give you notice, at the least sign or gesture I will cleave your skull with my sword."

"You know I am a stranger to fear," said Dixmer, with a smile rendered frightful from his pallor.

"Fear of my sword," said Maurice, "no; but fear of losing your revenge; and now that we are face to face you may bid it adieu."

They had, indeed, arrived at the water's brink; and had any one seen and followed them, he could not have arrived in time to prevent the duel from taking place, since an equal desire for vengeance now animated both. While speaking, they had descended the short stair leading to the Palace square, and gained the nearly deserted quay; for as the condemnations continued, seeing it was two o'clock at least, the crowd still filled the judgment-hall, the corridors, and the courts.

They appeared equally to thirst for each other's blood.

They plunged under one of those arches leading from the cells of the Conciergerie to the river; at this time drained, but then foul and saturated with blood, serving more than once as a means of conveyance for the corpses, which floated far away from the dungeons, leaving no trace behind.

Maurice placed himself between Dixmer and the water.

"I decidedly think I shall kill you, Maurice," said Dixmer, "you tremble so much."

"And I, Dixmer," said Maurice, taking his sword in hand and carefully enclosing him so as to cut off all retreat, — "I, on the contrary, believe that I shall kill you; and having killed you, shall remove from your pocketbook the pass signed by the registrar of the Palace. Nay, you need not button your coat; my sword shall open it, I will be bound, were it even formed of brass like the cuirasses of old."

"And this paper," roared Dixmer, "you will take it, will you?"

"Yes," said Maurice; "I will use the pass. With this talisman I will secure an entrance to Geneviève. I will sit next her in the car; I will murmur in her ear while her life remains, 'I love thee;' and when the last stroke has fallen, I will murmur still, 'I loved thee.'"

Dixmer made a movement with his left hand to take the pass from his pocket, and together with the pocket-book to cast it into the river, when rapid as a thunder-bolt, and trenchant as a hatchet, Maurice's sword fell upon his hand, nearly severing it from the wrist. The wounded man uttered a cry, and shaking his mutilated limb, flung himself furiously on his antagonist.

Then in the obscurity of this gloomy vault the deadly combat commenced. The two men, enclosed in a space so narrow that the sword strokes could not diverge from the line of the body, slid upon the humid pavement, and with difficulty supported themselves by the sides of the arch; the impatience of the combatants caused them to redouble their blows. Dixmer, who, as he felt his life-blood flow, was aware that his strength diminished, charged Maurice so furiously that the latter was compelled to step backward; in so doing he lost his footing, and his enemy's sword grazed his breast. But by a movement rapid as thought, kneeling as he was, he raised the blade with his left arm and turned the point toward Dixmer, who, maddened with rage, darted forward, and impelled by the inclining ground, fell on the sword, the point of which entered his body. He uttered a fearful imprecation, and the two bodies rolled to the outside of the arch.

One only rose. It was Maurice, — Maurice covered with blood, but with the blood of his enemy.

He drew his sword toward him, and as he drew it the remnant of life which still agitated with a nervous shuddering the limbs of Dixmer, ceased.

Then, when assured that he was dead, Maurice stooped toward the corpse, opened the dead man's coat, withdrew the pass, and hurried away directly.

But on looking at himself he felt assured that in his present state he should not proceed far without being arrested. He was literally covered with blood.

He approached the water's edge, and bending toward the river, washed his hands and coat. He then rapidly ascended the steps, casting a last look toward the arch, from whence a red, smoking stream issued, advancing slowly toward the river.

On approaching the Palace he opened the pocket-book, and there found the pass signed by the registrar.

"Thanks, just God!" murmured he, and he rapidly mounted the steps leading to the Salle des Morts.

It struck three.

CHAPTER LIV.

THE SALLE DES MORTS.

It must be remembered that the registrar of the Palace had opened his jailer's book to Dixmer, and had also entered into an arrangement with him which the presence of Geneviève rendered peculiarly agreeable. This man, it may be imagined, was terribly alarmed when the news of Dixmer's plot was communicated to him. He would doubtless be considered as nothing less than an accomplice of Dixmer, his false colleague, and would therefore be condemned to die with the wretched Geneviève. Fouquier Tinville had summoned him to appear before him.

It may easily be understood that this poor man would have some trouble to prove himself innocent in the eyes of the public prosecutor; he had, however, succeeded in so doing, thanks to Geneviève, whose declaration had clearly established his utter ignorance of the plot of her husband. He had succeeded, thanks to Dixmer's flight, and above all from the interest excited in Fouquier Tinville, who wished to preserve his administration free from all stain.

"Citizen," said he, flinging himself upon his knees before Fouquier, "pardon me, for I have been deceived."

"Citizen," replied the public prosecutor, "an employee of the nation who in these days permits himself to be deceived deserves to be guillotined."

"I may have been a blockhead, Citizen," replied the registrar, who was longing to call Fouquier Tinville "Monseigneur."

"Blockhead or not," replied the rigid prosecutor, "no one should allow his love for the Republic to sleep. The spies of the Capitol were only geese, yet they were sufficiently awake to save Rome."

The registrar looked upon this argument as totally unanswerable; he groaned, and remained waiting.

"I pardon you," said Fouquier Tinville. "I will go so far as to defend you, since I do not wish one of my employees to be even suspected; but you will bear in mind that at the least word that reaches my ears, the least revival of this affair, you shall go to the scaffold."

It is scarcely necessary to say with what anxiety this man sought the newspapers, always in haste to tell what they know, and sometimes more than they can certify, even should they cause the heads of ten men to fall by the guillotine.

He sought Dixmer everywhere, to recommend him to keep his own counsel; but Dixmer had very naturally changed his apartments, and was nowhere to be found.

Geneviève had been placed on the bench of the accused, and had already, in her testimony, declared that neither herself nor husband had any accomplices; and he thanked the poor woman with his eyes as she passed before him on her way to the Tribunal.

When she had passed, and he was returning to the office to fetch some law papers for Fouquier Tinville, he all at once saw Dixmer approaching him with a calm and quiet step.

This vision petrified him.

"Oh!" said he, as if he had seen a spectre.

"Do you not know me?" said the new-comer.

"Of course, I do. You are the Citizen Durand, or rather the Citizen Dixmer."

"Just so."

"But are you a dead man, Citizen?"

"Not yet, as you see."

"I mean to say that they will arrest you."

"Who wants to arrest me? — no one knows me."

"But I know you; and it only needs one word from me to send you to the guillotine."

"And two words from me to send you there with me."

"It is shameful of you to say that."

"No; it is logic."

"But what is your business? Make haste, — speak quickly; for the less time we are together the less danger we incur from each other."

"My wife is about to be condemned, is it not so?"

"I greatly fear for her, poor woman!"

"Well, I wish to see her once more, to bid her adieu."

"Where?"

"In the Salle des Morts."

"Would you dare to enter there?"

"Why not?"

"Oh!" said the registrar, like a man whose hair stood on end at the very thought.

"There must be some way," continued Dixmer.

"To enter the Salle des Morts? Without doubt there is."

"How?"

"To procure a pass."

"And where are these passes to be procured?"

The registrar turned frightfully pale, and stammered, "Where are they to be procured, you ask?"

"I inquire where are they to be procured?" replied Dixmer; "the question is plain enough, I think."

"They are procured — here."

"Ah! true; and who usually signs them?"

"The registrar."

"But you are the registrar?"

"Certainly I am."

"Oh, how lucky that is!" said Dixmer, seating himself, "you will sign me a pass."

The registrar made one bound.

"Do you ask for my head, Citizen?" said he.

"No; I ask you for a pass, that is all."

"I shall have you arrested, unhappy man!" said he, summoning all his energy.

"Do," said Dixmer; "and the next moment I will denounce you as an accomplice, and instead of leaving me to go alone to the famous hall, you shall accompany me."

The registrar turned ghastly pale.

"Villain!" said he.

"There is no villany in that," said Dixmer; "I wish to speak to my wife, and all I require of you is a pass to enable me to do so."

"Is it then so imperative that you should speak to her?"

"It seems so, since I risk my head to do so."

This appeared very plausible to the registrar, and Dixmer immediately perceived that he was relenting.

"Rest assured," said he, "no one shall know anything. The devil! why surely sometimes a similar case to mine must present itself to your notice!"

"Very rarely; it is by no means a common occurrence. But, let me see; let us arrange it in another way."

"If it is possible, I should ask nothing better."

"Nothing is more possible. Enter by the door of the condemned; there a card is not required. Then, when you have spoken to your wife, call me, and I will let you out."

"Not a bad idea," said Dixmer; "but unfortunately there is a story current in the city."

"What story?"

"The history of a poor hunchback who mistook the door, thinking to enter the archives, but instead of so doing found himself in the hall of which we are now speaking. Only since he had entered by the door of the condemned instead of the large door, as he had no pass to prove his identity, once there he was not permitted to go out. They strenuously maintained that since he entered the door with the other condemned, he was condemned likewise. In vain he protested, swore, appealed; no one believed him, no one came to his assistance, no one helped him to get out. So that, notwithstanding his protestations, his oaths, and supplications, the executioner first cut off his hair, and afterward his head. Is this anecdote true, Citizen Registrar? You ought to know better than any one else."

"Alas! yes; it is too true," said the registrar, trembling.

"You must see then that with such a precedent I should be a fool to enter this cut-throat place without a pass."

"But I shall be there, I tell you."

"But if you should happen to be called away; if you should be otherwise engaged; if you should forget?"

Dixmer laid particular stress on these last words, "if you should forget."

"But since I promise you —"

"No; besides it would compromise you. They would see you speaking to me; and, in short, it does not suit me. I therefore prefer a pass."

"Impossible!"

"Then, dear sir, I will speak; and we shall both take a ride together to the Place de la Revolution."

The registrar, bewildered, stupefied, half-dead with terror, signed a pass for a "citizen."

Dixmer rose and went out precipitately to take his station in the judgment-hall, where we have already seen him. The rest is known to us.

At the same moment the registrar, to avoid all accusation of connivance, went and seated himself near Fouquier Tinville, leaving the management of the office to his head clerk.

At ten minutes to three, Maurice, furnished with the pass, crossing a hedge of turnkeys and gendarmes, arrived without interruption at the fatal door.

When we say fatal, we exaggerate, for there were two doors, — the principal one by which those possessing passes entered and returned; and the door of the condemned, by which no one departed except to the scaffold.

The place that Maurice entered was divided into two compartments. One of these was set apart for those employed in registering the name of the arrivals; the other, furnished only with wooden benches, was appropriated for the reception of those who were arrested and those who were condemned, which amounted to pretty nearly the same thing.

The hall was very dark, lighted only from the panes of the partition which divided it from the register-office.

A female dressed in white, in a half-fainting attitude, lay in a corner, supported against the wall.

A man was standing in front of her, from time to time shaking his head. His arms were crossed upon his breast, and he hesitated to speak to her, as if fearful of restoring her to the consciousness she appeared to have lost.

Around these two individuals several condemned persons were scattered promiscuously, — some giving vent to their feelings in sobs and groans, others joining in patriotic songs, while the remainder walked rapidly up and down, as if to chase away the thoughts which devoured them.

This was indeed the antechamber of death, and the furniture rendered it worthy of the name. Here were seen half-opened coffins filled with straw, seeming as if to invite the living to their beds of repose, the receptacles provided for the ashes of the dead.

There was a large closet opposite the partition. A prisoner, prompted by curiosity, opened it, but recoiled horror-struck. It contained the blood-stained garments of those executed on the preceding evening; long tresses of hair hanging here and there, the executioner's perquisites, who sold them to the relatives when not enjoined by the authorities to burn these precious relics.

Maurice, trembling with emotion, had hardly opened the door, when the whole tableau at once presented itself to his view. He advanced three steps into the hall, and fell at Geneviève's feet. The unfortunate woman uttered a cry, which Maurice stifled on her lips.

Lorin, weeping, pressed his friend in his arms; these were the first tears he had shed.

Strange that all these unhappy individuals, assembled to die together, scarcely looked at the touching tableau presented to their view by their unfortunate fellow-creatures! Every one suffered too much himself to take part in the miseries of others.

The three friends remained for a moment united in a silent embrace, happy, almost joyous. Lorin was the first of the ill-fated group to disengage himself.

"Are you, then, condemned also?" said he to Maurice.

"Yes," replied he.

"Oh, happiness!" murmured Geneviève.

But the joy of those who have only one hour to live cannot last even as long as their lives. Maurice, having contemplated Geneviève with looks of ardent and profound affection, and having thanked her for the expression, at once so egotistical and so tender, which had just escaped her, turned toward Lorin.

"Now," said he, taking Geneviève's hands within his own, "let us talk together."

"Yes," said Lorin; "let us converse while the time remains to us. It is only right so to do. What do you wish to say to me, Maurice?"

"You have been arrested for my sake, condemned on account of her. As for Geneviève and I, we are paying our debt; it is not fair, at the same time, that you should be made to pay also."

"I do not understand you."

"Lorin, you are free."

"I free? You are mad!" said Lorin.

"No, I am not mad; I repeat that you are free. See, here is a pass. They will inquire who you are; you are employed at the registrar-office of the Carmelites, and are going to speak to the registrar of the Palace; you have, from motives of curiosity, requested a pass from him to see the condemned; you have seen them, and are now leaving, perfectly satisfied with your visit."

"This is a joke, is it not?"

"No, indeed, my friend; here is the pass, take advantage of it. You are not a lover, like myself; you do not need to die that you may be enabled to pass a few more minutes in the society of the well-beloved of your heart, and not to lose a second of eternity with her."

"But, Maurice," replied Lorin, "if one might be able to get out from here — a circumstance I swear to you I could not have believed possible — why do you not first save the lady? As to yourself, we will consider afterward about that."

"Impossible!" said Maurice, with a frightful oppression at his heart, "this card is for a man, not for a lady; besides, Geneviève would not depart, and leave me here, to live herself, while knowing that I remained to die."

"If she would not, then why should I? Do you imagine I possess less courage than a woman?"

"No, dear friend; I know and acknowledge your bravery, but nothing can excuse your obstinacy in this case. Then profit by this moment, and allow us the supreme felicity of knowing and feeling that you are free and happy."

"Happy!" exclaimed Lorin; "you are facetious, surely? Happy without you, eh? What the devil am I to do in this world without you; in Paris, without my usual avocations? Never to see you again, never to weary you more with my doggerel rhymes, — ah, good faith, no!"

"Lorin, my friend —"

"Exactly; it is because I am your friend that I persist in my opinion. With the prospect of recovering you both, were I a prisoner as I now am, I would tear down the walls; but to save myself, and go out from here alone into the streets, my head bowed down with a feeling resembling remorse, and a continual cry in my ears: 'Maurice! — Geneviève!' To pass into certain quarters and before certain houses where I have seen your persons, but shall now only recognize your shadows; to come at last to such an extremity of despair as to execrate this dear Paris that I have loved so well; ah, by my faith, no! And I find there was good reason for proscribing kings, were it only on account of King Dagobert."

"And what relation has King Dagobert with what concerns us?"

"What? Did not this frightful tyrant say to the great Éloi, 'The best company must part?' Ah, well! I am a Republican, and I say that nothing should make us quit good company, not even the guillotine; I feel very comfortable here, and here I will remain."

"My poor friend! my poor friend!" said Maurice.

Geneviève said nothing, but looked at them with eyes bathed in tears.

"You regret to lose your life, then?" said Lorin.

"Yes, on her account."

"I am not in the least sorry at losing mine, not even on account of the Goddess Reason, who, I had forgotten to tell you, has latterly behaved most shamefully to me; who will not take the trouble even to console herself, like the other Arthémise of old. I shall go to my death perfectly cool and rather facetious. I will amuse all the beggarly wretches who follow the car. I will repeat a pretty quatrain to Monsieur Sanson, and wish the company good-night, — that is to say — wait! —" Lorin interrupted himself. "Ah! to be sure," said he, "I will go out. I well knew that I loved no one, but I forgot that I hated some one. The time, Maurice, the time?"

"Half-past three."

"I have time, Heaven! there is time."

"Certainly," cried Maurice; "there are nine more accused persons still to be tried, this will not terminate before five o'clock; we have therefore nearly two hours' respite."

"That is all that I require; give me your pass, and lend me twenty sous."

"Mon Dieu! what are you going to do?" murmured Geneviève. Maurice pressed his hand. The all-important thing for him was that Lorin was going out.

"I have my own plan," said Lorin.

Maurice drew his purse from his pocket, and placed it in his friend's hand.

"Now, the pass, for the love of God! — I ought to say for the love of the Supreme Being."

Maurice gave him the pass.

Lorin kissed Geneviève's hand, and availing himself of the moment when a fresh batch of the condemned were ushered in, he leaped the benches, and presented himself before the principal entrance.

"Eh!" said the gendarme, "here is one, it appears to me, trying to escape."

Lorin drew himself up and presented his pass.

"Hold, Citizen Gendarme," said he, "and learn to know people better."

The gendarme recognized the signature of the registrar, but belonging to a class of functionaries rather wanting in confidence, and as at this moment the registrar himself came down from the Tribunal with a nervous shudder, which had not left him since he had so imprudently hazarded his signature, —

"Citizen Registrar," said he, "here is a pass bearing your signature, with which this person wishes to leave the Salle des Morts, is it all right?"

The registrar turned pale with fright, and feeling convinced that if he turned his eyes in that direction it would only be to encounter the terrible look of Dixmer, hastily seized the card and replied, —

"Yes, yes; it is my signature."

"Then," cried Lorin, "if it is your signature, return it to me."

"No;" said the registrar, tearing it into a thousand pieces; "these cards can be available only once."

Lorin remained for a moment irresolute.

"So much the worse," said he; "but above all things it is necessary I should kill him;" and he passed through the office.

Maurice had followed Lorin with an emotion easy to comprehend. When he had disappeared, Maurice returned, saying with an exultation nearly amounting to joy, "He is saved! Geneviève; the card is destroyed, therefore he cannot enter. Besides, even if he were able to gain admission, the sitting of the Tribunal will have terminated. At five o'clock, he will return; but we shall have ceased to live."

Geneviève shuddered, and breathed a deep sigh.

"Oh, press me in your arms," said she, "and let us separate no more! Why is it not possible, oh, my God! for one blow to annihilate us both, that together we might breathe our last sigh?"

Then retiring into the depth of the gloomy hall, Geneviève placed herself near Maurice, and twined her arms round his neck. Thus they remained, rendered by the strength of their love insensible to the surrounding scene, almost to the approach of death itself.

Half an hour passed thus.

CHAPTER LV.

WHY LORIN WENT OUT.

SUDDENLY a loud noise was heard; the gendarmes entered by the lower door, behind them appearing Sanson and his assistants, the latter carrying rolls of cord.

"Oh, my love!" said Geneviève, "the fatal moment has arrived, and I feel that my senses are leaving me!"

"There you are wrong," said the cheering voice of Lorin.

"That you are wrong is plain, you see;
For what is death but to be free?"

"Lorin!" cried Maurice, in despair.

"They are not good, are they? I have adopted your opinion since yesterday; I can only make contemptible —"

"Ah! that is the question. You are returned, unhappy man, you are returned!"

"I considered that was our agreement But listen, as what I have to say to you will also interest the lady."

"My God! my God!"

"Allow me to speak, or I shall not have time to tell you all. I wished to go out that I might purchase a knife in the Rue de la Baullerie."

"What did you want with a knife?"

"I wished to despatch this nice Monsieur Dixmer."

Geneviève shuddered.

"Ah!" said Maurice, "I comprehend."

"I purchased it. Listen attentively to what I said to myself, and you will understand your friend has a mind for logic; indeed, I begin to think I should have been a mathematician instead of a poet. Unfortunately, it is now too late. This is the way I reasoned: Monsieur Dixmer has compromised his wife; Monsieur Dixmer was present at her trial; and Monsieur Dixmer will not deprive himself of the pleasure of seeing her pass in the fatal car; especially as we accompany her. I will then look out for him among the foremost of the spectators. I will glide near him, and say, 'Good-day, Monsieur Dixmer;' and I will plunge my knife into his heart."

"Lorin!" cried Geneviève.

"Compose yourself, dear friend; Providence had arranged all. Picture to yourselves the spectators, instead of remaining stationary in front of the Palace, according to their usual custom, made a half-turn to the right, and lined the quay. 'Oh!' said I to myself, 'it is doubtless a dog drowned. Why should not Dixmer be there? Even a dog drowning will serve to pass away the time.' I approached the parapet, and beheld all along the high bank a crowd of people who, throwing their arms aloft into the air, and uttering loud exclamations, stooped down to gaze at something on the ground. I joined them, and also looked down. There was something! — Guess what it was."

"Dixmer!" said Maurice, in a gloomy tone.

"Yes. How could you guess that? Yes; it was Dixmer, killed by a ghastly wound. The unfortunate wretch had no doubt committed suicide in expiation of his guilt."

"Ah," said Maurice, with a sad smile, "do you think so?"

Geneviève let her head droop between her two hands. She was too feeble to support these successive emotions.

"Yes; I thought so, from his blood-stained sword being found near him; unless, indeed — he had met some one."

Maurice, without reply, availing himself of the moment when Geneviève, overpowered by emotion, did not observe him, opened his coat and displayed to Lorin his waistcoat and shirt stained with blood.

"Ah! that alters the case," said Lorin, as he held out his hand to Maurice. "Now," said he, whispering in his ear, "they have not searched me, seeing that I entered in Sanson's suite. I have still the knife, if the guillotine is too revolting to your feelings."

Maurice seized the weapon with a joyful expression.

"No," said he, "she would suffer too much," and he returned the knife to Lorin.

"You are right," said Lorin; "long live Monsieur Guillotine! Why, what is it, after all? A fillip on the neck, according to Danton. And what signifies a fillip?"

And he flung his knife in the midst of a group of the condemned, one of whom immediately seized and buried it in his breast. He was dead in an instant.

At the same moment Geneviève awoke, and uttered a piercing cry. She felt the pressure of the executioner's hand upon her shoulder.

CHAPTER LVI.

LONG LIVE SIMON !

At the sound of this cry Maurice understood that the struggle was about to commence. The influence of love may be able to exalt the soul to heroism, — it may, against natural instinct, impel a human being to desire death, but it had not in this instance extinguished the repugnance to pain. It was evident that Geneviève resigned herself the more patiently to death since Maurice was to die with her; but resignation does not exclude suffering, and to quit this world is not only to fall into the abyss termed unknown, but also to suffer in the descent.

Maurice, at a glance, embraced the entire scene, and thought of what would follow.

In the centre of the hall lay the suicide, from whose breast the gendarme had just torn the weapon of destruction, fearing, probably, it might be used by some of the others.

Around him were several individuals mute with despair and scarcely heeding him, inscribing in their pocket-books some disconnected words, or pressing one another's hands; some repeating, without any intermission, a cherished name, or bathing with tears a portrait, a ring, or tress of hair; some venting imprecations against tyranny, a state of affairs cursed by all, ay sometimes even by the tyrants themselves. In the midst of these unfortunates, Sanson, oppressed less from his fifty years than his melancholy office, — Sanson, as mild, and as much their con-soler as his terrible vocation permitted him to be, to this one offered advice, to that one some sad consolation or encouragement, finding some Christian responses to their accents of despair as well as to their bravado.

"Citizen," said he to Geneviève, "I must remove your scarf, and cut off your hair, if you please."

Geneviève began to tremble.

"Come, dear lady," said Lorin, softly, "take courage!"

"May I remove the lady's hair?" asked Maurice.

"Oh, yes," cried Geneviève; "I entreat you to permit him to do so, Monsieur Sanson."

"He may," said the old man, turning away his head.

Maurice first took off his necktie, and Geneviève, stooping, fell on her knees before the young man, presenting her charming head, appearing more beautiful in her grief than she had ever been in her days of sunshine and happiness.

When Maurice had completed the funereal operation, his hands were so tremulous and his countenance betrayed so much grief that Geneviève exclaimed, —

"Ah! I am courageous, Maurice."

Sanson turned round.

"Is it not so, sir?" said Geneviève; "am I not courageous?'

"Certainly, Citizen," replied the executioner, in a perturbed voice, "for yours is true courage."

In the mean time the first assistant had glanced over the list forwarded by Fouquier Tinville.

"Fourteen," said he.

Sanson counted the condemned.

"Fifteen, including the dead," said he; "why, how is this?"

Lorin and Geneviève counted after him, both struck by the same thought.

"You say there are only fourteen condemned, and that we are fifteen?" said she.

"Yes; the Citizen Fouquier Tinville must have made a mistake."

"Ah! you spoke falsely, then," said Geneviève, turning to Maurice; "you were not condemned."

"And why wait for to-morrow, when you die to-day?" said Maurice.

"My love," said she, smiling, "you reassure me; I am now convinced that it is easy to die."

"Lorin," said Maurice, "now for the last time — no one here can recognize you — say that you came to bid me adieu; say that you have been shut in by mistake; call the gendarme who saw you go out. I am the true criminal who ought to die. But you, my friend, we beseech you to live to guard our memory. There is yet time, Lorin; we entreat you!"

Geneviève joined her hands in an attitude of prayer. Lorin took both her hands and kissed them.

"I have said no, and I mean no," said Lorin, in a firm voice; "say no more on the subject, or I shall think I am a bore to you."

"Fourteen," repeated Sanson, "and here are fifteen;" then elevating his voice, "Is there any one here who can protest against this?" said he; "is there any one here who can prove he is here by mistake?"

Perhaps some lips half-opened at this question, but closed again without uttering a single word; since those who felt inclined to lie were ashamed to do so, and those who would not lie were determined not to speak.

A silence of several minutes ensued, during which the assistants continued their mournful office.

"Citizens, we are ready," said old Sanson, in his deep and solemn voice. He was answered only by sobs and groans.

"Well!" said Lorin, "so be it!

No death is nobler, none more high,
Than for our native land to die.

Yes, to die for our native land; but decidedly I begin to think we do not die for her, but for the pleasure of those who witness our deaths. Faith! Maurice, I have adopted your opinion. I am disgusted with the Republic!"

"The call!" said a commissary, at the door.

Several gendarmes entered the hall, closing up the issues, thus placing themselves between life and the condemned, as if to prevent them from returning to it.

The death-roll was called.

Maurice, who had witnessed the trial of the condemned man who had destroyed himself, when his name was called answered in his stead. They then found that, excepting the dead man, the number was correct.

The corpse was removed from the hall; but if the man's identity had been established, and he had been recognized as one condemned, he would have been guillotined with the rest, though already dead.

The survivors were pushed toward the outlet, in order that as each passed before the wicket his hands might be tied behind his back. For the space of ten minutes not a word was exchanged between these unfortunates; the executioners alone seemed endowed with life or motion.

Maurice, Geneviève, and Lorin, not being any longer able to retain their hold of each other, crowded together that they might not be separated.

When the condemned were removed from the Conciergerie into the court, the scene became truly appalling. Several grew faint at the sight of the carts, and the turnkeys were compelled to assist them to mount the steps of these vehicles of death. Behind the still closed doors was heard the confused murmur of the crowd; and it might be inferred from the sound that the concourse was immense.

Geneviève courageously ascended the car; Maurice at her side sustained her; he sprang in rapidly after her.

Lorin did not hurry himself, but carefully selected his seat at the left of Maurice.

The doors opened, and foremost in the crowd stood Simon. The two friends immediately recognized him; indeed, the recognition was mutual. He was standing upon a fence near which the cars must pass, for there were three of them. The car containing our three friends moved first.

"Ah! good-day to you, my brave grenadier!" said Simon to Lorin; "you are going to try the effect of my leather-cutting machine, I suppose?"

"Yes," said Lorin; "and I will be careful not to notch it, that it may be ready when your turn comes."

The two remaining cars followed the direction of the first. And now commenced a terrific tempest of cries, shouts, groans, and maledictions, surrounding and following the condemned.

"Courage! Geneviève, take courage!" murmured Maurice.

"Oh!" replied the young woman, "I do not wish for life since I die with you. I regret only that my hands are tied, so that I cannot embrace you before I die."

"Lorin," said Maurice, "feel in my waistcoat pocket, there you will find a knife."

"Zounds!" said Lorin, "a penknife is the very thing needed; I should be ashamed to die, garroted like a calf."

Maurice placed his pocket on a level with his friend's hands; Lorin found the knife, which between them they succeeded in opening. Maurice then placed it between his teeth, and severed the cord which bound Lorin's hands, who, the moment they were free, performed the same office for Maurice.

"Make haste!" said the young man; "Geneviève is fainting."

In fact, to accomplish this operation Maurice had for a moment turned from Geneviève, when, as if all her strength had been derived from him, her eyes closed, and her head sank upon her breast.

"Geneviève, open your eyes, my love," said Maurice; "we have only a few minutes more to see each other in this world."

"The cords wound me," murmured the young woman.

Maurice unbound them. She immediately re-opened her eyes, and rose, radiant with almost celestial beauty. She threw one fair arm around Maurice's neck, and with the other hand took that of Lorin; and thus, all three standing in the cart, with two more victims lying at their feet wrapped in the stupor of anticipated death, they gazed toward heaven with a look of ardent gratitude for having been permitted to support and console each other, while those who had outraged and insulted them previously were now perfectly silent. The scaffold was in sight. Maurice and Lorin beheld it. Geneviève did not; she saw naught but her lover. The car stopped.

"I love thee!" said Maurice to Geneviève; "I love thee!"

"The woman first! the woman first!" shouted a thousand voices.

"Thanks, good people," said Maurice; "who then can call you cruel?"

He took Geneviève within his arms, pressed his lips fondly upon hers, and delivered her to Sanson.

"Courage!" cried Lorin; "courage!"

"I have it!" said Geneviève; "I have it!"

"I love thee!" murmured Maurice; "I love thee!"

They were no longer victims about to be slaughtered, but friends making a festival of death.

"Adieu!" cried Geneviève to Lorin.

"Farewell, till we meet again!" replied he.

And Geneviève disappeared under the fatal drop.

"After you," said Lorin.

"After you," replied Maurice.

"Hark! she calls you."

At this moment Geneviève uttered her last cry.

"Come!" said she.

A furious uproar took place in the crowd. The fair and graceful head had fallen.

Maurice rushed forward.

"It is exactly correct," said Lorin; "let us follow logic. Do you hear me, Maurice?"

"Yes."

"She loved you, and they have murdered her first; you are not condemned, and therefore die the second; and I, who have done nothing, being the greatest criminal of the three, die the last.

> And thus you see how passing clear
> Logic makes everything appear.

Good faith! Citizen Sanson, I promised you a quatrain; but you must be content with a distich."

"I did love thee!" murmured Maurice, lying on the fatal plank, and smiling at the head of his beloved, — "I did lo —" The knife cut short the last word.

"Now for my turn!" cried Lorin, bounding on the scaffold, "and be quick, or I shall lose my head! Citizen Sanson, I owe you two verses, instead of which I offer you a pun."

Sanson placed him in his turn.

"Let us see," said Lorin, — "it is the fashion to cry long live something, when dying. Once it was, 'Vive le Roi,' but now there is no king; next the cry was, 'Vive la Liberté,' but there is no more liberty. Faith, Long live Simon! say I, who unites us all three."

And the head of the generous and noble-hearted young man fell near those of Maurice and Geneviève.

THE END.
